the ordinary rules of Grammar. However he ſupplied that want by converſing with the books themſelves, from whence thoſe rules had been drawn. That no doubt was a better way, though much more difficult; and he afterwards found this benefit by it, that having got the Greek and Roman Languages, as he had done his own, not by precept but uſe, he practiſed them not as a ſcholar but as a native. He was afterwards removed to Trinity-College in the Univerſity of Cambridge, of which he was elected Scholar in 1636 (c), where by the progreſs and continuance of his wit, it appeared that two things were joined in it, which ſeldom met together, that it was both early-ripe and laſting (d). His exerciſes of all kinds were received by the Univerſity with prodigious applauſe, and with this particular praiſe, that they were not only fit for the obſcurity of an Academical life, but to have been ſhewn on the true Theatre of the world. In 1638 he publiſhed a Paſtoral Comedy, intitled Love's Riddle [C], and a Latin Comedy, intitled Naufragium Joculare [D]. Before the twentieth year of his age he laid the deſign of divers of his moſt maſculine works, which he finiſhed long after (e). He took the degree of Maſter of Arts, and in the beginning of the year 1643, was with ſeveral Gentlemen ejected out of his College, and obliged to quit the Univerſity; upon which he retired to Oxford, and ſettled in St. John's College (f), and under the name of a Scholar of Oxford publiſhed the ſame year a Satyr, intitled, The Puritan and the Papiſt [E]. In St. John's College he proſecuted his ſtudies with great ſucceſs; nor in the mean time was he wanting to his duty in the war itſelf; for he was preſent and in ſervice in ſeveral of the King's journies and expeditions. By theſe occaſions and the report of his uncommon merit he ſoon gained the friendſhip of the chief perſons of the Court and the Gown, whom the fortune of war had drawn together, and particularly of the Lord Falkland, one of the Principal Secretaries of State (g). He left Oxford a little before the ſurrender of it to the Parliament, and went to Paris, where he was ſettled in the family of Henry Lord Jermyn, afterwards Earl of St. Alban's [F], who having a great reſpect for him, he by that Nobleman's intereſt was deſigned for the Maſterſhip of the Savoy, "which tho' "granted, ſays Mr. Wood (b), to his high merit by both the Charles's Iſt and IId, yet "by certain perſons, enemies to the Muſes, he loſt that place." He was abſent from his native country above twelve years, according to Dr. Sprat (i), or ten years, according to Mr. Wood (k) [G], which were wholly ſpent either in bearing a ſhare in the diſtreſſes of the Royal Family, or labouring in their affairs [H]. His Poems, intitled the

(c) Wood, ubi ſupra, and Sir Thomas Pope Blount, ubi ſupra.

(d) Sprat, ubi ſupra.

(e) Idem, ibid.

(f) Wood, ubi ſupra.

(g) Sprat, and Wood, ubi ſupra.

(b) Ubi ſupra. See likewiſe Faſti Oxon. vol. 1. col. 271.

(i) Ubi ſupra.

(k) Faſti Oxon. vol. 3. col. 120.

XI.

Thus would I double my life's fading ſpace,
For he that runs it well, twice runs the race.
And in this true delight,
Theſe unbought ſports, that happy ſtate,
I would not fear, nor wiſh my fate,
But boldly ſay each night,
To morrow let my Sun his beams diſplay,
Or in clouds hide them; I have liv'd to day.

[C] In 1638 he publiſhed a Paſtoral Comedy, intitled, Love's Riddle.] It was written while he was at Weſtminſter-School, and dedicated to Sir Kenelm Digby, and printed at London 1638. Mr. Gerard Langbaine (5) tells us that it was firſt printed with his Poetical Bloſſoms London 1633 in 4to, and ſince printed in the ſecond volume of his works in fol. London 1681. "If this Play, continues he, be conſidered according to the Author's years at that time, it will "certainly be allowed ſtandard; or at leaſt needs no "other apology than what the Author makes for it "in his Dedication to his Patron,"

(4) Wood, ubi ſupra, col. 121.

(5) Account of the Engliſh Dramatic Poets, pag. 82. edit. Oxford 1691.

Take it as early fruits, which rare appear,
Though not half ripe, but worſt of all the year;
And if it pleaſe your taſte, my Muſe will ſay,
The Birch, which crown'd her then, is grown a Bay.

[D] A Latin Comedy, intitled, Naufragium Joculare.] It was acted before the Univerſity of Cambridge in Trinity-College February 2d 1638, and was printed at London 1638 in 8vo (6).

(6) Wood, ubi ſupra, and Langbaine, pag. 86.

[E] Under the name of a Scholar of Oxford, publiſhed in 1643 a Satyr, intitled, The Puritan and the Papiſt.] It was printed in one ſheet and an half in 4to, and was republiſhed at London 1682 in 4to in a Book intitled, Wit and Loyalty revived in a Collection of ſome ſmart Satyrs in Verſe and Proſe on the late Times. The Writer of the Preface complains, that this Satyr of Mr. Cowley was not publiſhed by the Editor of his firſt Collection of Poems, and gives two preſumptive reaſons of it, and wonders that his Poem called Brutus, and that upon the Biſhop of Lincoln's Enlargement from the Tower, which he imagines not to have been written by our Author, have met with ſo good fortune as to have a place there (8).

(8) See Wood, col. 121.

[F] Went to Paris, where he was ſettled in the Family of Henry Lord Jermyn, afterwards Earl of St. Albans.] Dr. Sprat tells us (9), that the firſt occaſion of his entering into buſineſs was the Elegy, which he wrote upon Mr. William Harvey's Death, and which brought him into the acquaintance of Mr. John Harvey, the brother of his deceaſed friend, from whom he received many offices of kindneſs through the whole courſe of his life, and principally this, that by his means he came into the ſervice of my Lord St. Albans. But Mr. Wood gives us this account (10), that when Mr. Cowley came to Paris, he fell into the acquaintance of Dr. Stephen Goffe, a Brother of the Oratory, by whoſe means he was preferred and placed in the Family of the Lord Jermyn.

(9) Ubi ſupra.

(10) Col. 120. See likewiſe Faſti Oxon. vol. 1. col. 271.

[G] He was abſent from his native country above twelve years, according to Dr. Sprat, or ten years, according to Mr. Wood.] The latter of theſe Writers obſerves (11), that he left Oxford a little before the ſurrender of that city to the Parliament, which was in June 1646; and ſince Mr. Cowley returned to England in 1656, Mr. Wood is in the right in aſſerting, that our Author was abſent from his native country about ten years, and not above twelve years, as Dr. Sprat imagined.

(11) Faſti Oxon. vol. 2. col. 120.

[H] Which were wholly ſpent either in bearing a ſhare in the diſtreſſes of the Royal Family, or labouring in their affairs.] To this purpoſe he performed ſeveral dangerous journeys into Jerſey, Scotland, Flanders, Holland, or wherever elſe the King's troubles required his attendance. But the chief teſtimony of his fidelity was the laborious ſervice, which he underwent in maintaining the conſtant correſpondence between King Charles I and his Queen. In that weighty truſt he behaved himſelf with indefatigable induſtry and unſuſpected ſecrecy. For he cyphered and decyphered with his own hand the greateſt part of all the Letters, which paſſed between their Majeſties, and managed a vaſt intelligence in many other parts; which for ſome years together took up all his days, and two or three nights every week. In the Miſcellanea Aulica: Or a Collection of State Treatiſes, never before publiſhed: containing the Miſtreſs, were printed at London 1647 in 8vo [I], and his Comedy, intitled The Guardian in 1650 [K]. In the year 1656 (l) it was thought proper by thoſe on whom he depended, that he ſhould come over into England, and under the pretence of privacy and retirement ſhould take occaſion of giving notice of the poſture of affairs in the Nation. Upon his return he publiſhed an edition of his Poems [L]. He was ſoon after ſeized containing Letters of King Charles and King James II, in their exile; from the Earl of Arlington to Sir Bern. Gaſcoign, about the intended Match of the Duke of York with the Archduchеſs of Inſpruch; a Deſcription of Germany, its Government &c. By Sir B. Gaſcoign &c. Faithfully collected from their Originals by Mr. Thomas Brown. London 1702 in 8vo, we have ſeveral Letters of Mr. Cowley to Mr. Bennet, afterwards Earl of Arlington, containing a ſhort account of King Charles II's affairs before he went to be crowned in Scotland in 1650.

(l) Idem, ibid.

[I] His Poems, intitled the Miſtreſs, were printed at London 1647 in 8*vo.*] They were printed under this title, The Miſtreſs; or ſeveral Copies of Love-Verſes. In the Preface to his Poems publiſhed at London 1656 in fol. ſpeaking of theſe Poems, he tells us, that Poets are ſcarce thought Freemen of their Company without paying ſome duties, and obliging themſelves to be true to love. Sooner or later they muſt all paſs through that tryal, like ſome Mahometan Monks, that are bound by their Order, once at leaſt in their life to make a pilgrimage to Mecca.

In furias ignemque ruunt, Amor omnibus idem.

But we muſt not always make a judgment of their manners from their writings of this kind, as the Romaniſts uncharitably do of Beza, for a few laſcivious Sonnets compoſed by him in his youth. It is not in this ſenſe that Poeſy is ſaid to be a kind of painting; it is not the picture of the Poet, but of things and perſons imagined by him. He may be in his own practice and diſpoſition a Philoſopher, nay a Stoick, and yet ſpeak ſometimes with the ſoftneſs of an amorous Sappho:

Feret & Rubus aſper Amomum.

He profeſſes too much the uſe of Fables (though without the malice of deceiving) to have his teſtimony taken even againſt himſelf. " Neither would I here be miſunder-
" ſtood, as if I affected ſo much gravity, as to be a-
" ſhamed to be thought really in love. On the con" trary I cannot have a good opinion of any man,
" who is not at all capable of being ſo. But I ſpeak
" to excuſe ſome expreſſions (if ſuch there be) which " may happen to offend the ſeverity of ſupercili-
" ous readers, for much exceſs is to be allowed in " love, and even more in Poetry, ſo we avoid the two
" unpardonable vices in both, which are Obſcenity
" and Profaneneſs, of which I am ſure if my words
" be ever guilty, they have ill repreſented my thoughts
(12) Ubi ſupra. " and intentions." Dr. Sprat (12) tells us, that he is not aſhamed to commend Mr. Cowley's Miſtreſs, and only excepts one or two expreſſions, which he wiſhed he could have prevailed with thoſe, who had the right of the other edition, to have left out. But of all the reſt, ſays he, I dare boldly pronounce, that never yet ſo much was written on a ſubject ſo delicate, that can leſs offend the ſevereſt rules of Morality. The whole Paſſion of Love is intimately deſcribed, with all its mighty train of hopes and joys and diſquiets. Beſides this amorous tenderneſs, I know not how in every copy there is ſomething of more uſeful knowledge very naturally and gracefully inſinuated, and every where there may be ſomething found to inform the minds of wiſe men, as well as to move the hearts of young men or women.

[K] His Comedy, intitled, The Guardian.] It was acted before Prince Charles at Trinity College in Cambridge March 12, 1641, and printed at London in (13) Wood, col. 121. 4to 1650 (13). He tells us himſelf in the Preface to his Poems, that " it was made and acted before the Prince
" in his paſſage through Cambridge towards York at " the beginning of the late unhappy war, or rather
" neither made, nor acted, but rough-drawn only,
" and repeated; for the haſte was ſo great, that it
" could neither be reviſed or perfected by the Author,
" nor learned without Book by the Actors, nor ſet
" forth in any meaſure tolerably by the officers of the " College. After the Repreſentation, (which, I con-
" feſs, was ſomewhat of the lateſt) I began to look it
" over, and changed it very much, ſtriking out ſome
" whole parts, as that of the Poet and the Soldier;
" but I have loſt the copy, and dare not think it de-
" ſerves the pains to write it again, which makes me
" omit it in this publication, though there be ſome
" things in it, which I am not aſhamed of, taking
" the excuſe of my age and ſmall experience in hu" man converſation when I made it. But as it is, it
" is only the haſty firſt ſetting of a picture; and there-
" fore like to reſemble me accordingly." Mr. Langbaine aſſures us (14), that this Comedy, notwithſtanding Mr. Cowley's modeſt opinion of it, was acted ſeveral times after privately, during the prohibition of the ſtage, and after the Reſtoration publicly at Dublin, and never failed of applauſe. This Mr. Langbaine ſuppoſes put our Author upon reviſing it, and there being many things in it, which he diſliked, and finding himſelf at leiſure in the country, he altered it almoſt throughout, and then permitted it to appear publicly on the ſtage under a new title, as indeed it was in a manner a new Play, calling it The Cutter of Coleman-Street.

(14) Ubi ſupra, pag. 81.

[L] Upon his return he publiſhed a new edition of his Poems.] They were printed at London 1656 in fol. and contained, I. Miſcellanies. II. The Miſtreſs, or Love-Verſes. III. Pindarique Odes, written in imitation of the ſtyle and manner of the Odes of Pindar. With Notes &c. In the Preface he tells us, that upon his return to England, he met with a Book, intitled, The Iron Age, publiſhed under his name, which he abſolutely diſclaims; and then proceeds to give an account of the Poems contained in that volume. With regard to the Pindaric Odes, he tells us, that he was in great doubt whether they will be underſtood by moſt readers; nay even by very many, who are well enough acquainted with the common roads and ordinary tracks of Poetry. " They either are, ſays he, or at leaſt " were meant to be of that kind of ſtyle, which Dion.
" Halicarnaſſeus calls Μιγαλοφυὶς κ᾽ ἠδὺ μετὰ δεινότη-
" τος, and which he attributes to Alcæus. The di-
" greſſions are many and ſudden, and ſometimes long
" according to the faſhion of all Lyriques, and of " Pindar above all men living. The figures are unu-
" ſual and bold even to temerity, and ſuch as I durſt
" not have to do withal in any other kind of Poetry.
" The numbers are various and irregular, and ſome-
" times (eſpecially ſome of the long ones) ſeem harſh
" and uncouth, if the juſt meaſures and cadencies be " not obſerved in the pronunciation. So that almoſt
" all their ſweetneſs and numeroſity (which is to be " found, if I miſtake not, in the rougheſt, if rightly " repeated), lies in a manner wholly at the mercy of
" the reader." Dr. Sprat (15) obſerves, that the occaſion of his falling into this way of writing was his accidental meeting with Pindar's works, in a place, where he had no other Books to direct him, and that having then conſidered at leiſure the height of his invention, and the majeſty of his ſtyle, he tried immediately to imitate it in Engliſh; and performed it without the danger, that Horace preſaged to the man, who ſhould dare to attempt it. Mr. Dryden tells us (16), that our Author brought Pindaric Verſe as near perfection as was poſſible in ſo ſhort a time. But, ſays he, if I may be allowed to ſpeak my mind modeſtly, and without injury to his ſacred aſhes, ſomewhat of the purity of Engliſh, ſomewhat of more equal thoughts, ſomewhat of ſweetneſs in the numbers, in one word, ſomewhat of a finer turn and more Lyrical Verſe is yet wanting. As for the ſoul of it, which conſiſts in the warmth and vigour of fancy, the maſterly figures, and the copiouſneſs of imagination, he has excelled all others in this kind. Yet if the kind itſelf be capable of more perfection, tho' rather in the ornamental parts of it, than the eſſential, what rules of morality or reſpect have I broken in naming the defects, that they may hereafter be amended? Imitation is a nice point, and there are few Poets, who deſerve

(15) Ubi ſupra.

(16) Preface to the Firſt Part of Miſcellany Poems, publiſhed by Mr. Dryden, pag. 32, 33. 4th edit. London 1716, in 24mo.

to ſeized and confined for ſome time [M]; "but afterwards complying, as Mr. Wood tells "us (m), with the men then in power, (which was much taken notice of by the Royal "Party) he obtained an order to be created Doctor of Phyſic, which being done "to his mind (whereby he gained the ill-will of ſome of his friends) he went into France "again, having made a copy of verſes on Oliver's death." This account of Mr. Wood reflects upon Mr. Cowley's loyalty; but Dr. Sprat endeavours to vindicate him from all imputations of that kind [N]; and informs us, that after his return to France, he remained in the ſame ſtation as before till near the time of the Reſtoration (n), upon which he wrote an Ode, and printed it at London 1660, in 4to. In 1662 he publiſhed his two Books of Plants in 8vo, reprinted at London 1668 and 1678, with his other Latin Poems [O]. At the Reſtoration he was now paſt the fortieth year of his age; the greateſt to be models in all they write. The Earl of Mulgrave, afterwards Duke of Buckingham, ſpeaking of the nature of Pindaric Odes, writes as follows (17):

(m) Ubi ſupra.

(n) He was actually created Doctor of Phyſick Decem. 2d 1657. Idem, ibid.

(17) Eſſay on Poetry.

The Poet here muſt be indeed inſpir'd,
With fury too, as well as fancy fir'd.
Cowley might boaſt to have perform'd this part,
Had he with nature join'd the rules of art;
But ill expreſſion gives ſometimes allay
To that rich fancy, which can ne'er decay.

(18) Preface to his Pindarique Ode to the Queen, publiſhed in his Works, vol. 3. pag. 344, 345. edit. London 1730, in 12mo.

Mr. Congreve (18) having excepted againſt the irregularity of the meaſure of the Engliſh Pindaric Odes, obſerves, that "there is that great deference due to the me-"mory, great parts, and learning of Mr. Cowley, that "nothing ſhould be objected to the latitude he has taken "in his Pindaric Odes. The beauty of his Verſes are "an atonement for the irregularity of his Stanza's; "and tho' he did not imitate Pindar in the ſtrictneſs of "his numbers, he has very often happily copied him "in the force of his figures, and ſublimity of his "ſtyle and ſentiments." With regard to his Davideis, a ſacred Poem of the troubles of David, in four Books, our Poet tells us (19) that he deſigned it to conſiſt of twelve Books, not for the Tribes ſake, but after the pattern of Virgil; and intended to cloſe all with that moſt poetical elegy of David on the Death of Saul and Jonathan. Dr. Sprat (20) obſerves, that this Poem was wholly written in ſo young an age, that if we ſhall reflect on the vaſtneſs of the argument, and his manner of handling it, he may ſeem like one of the miracles, that he there adorns, like a boy attempting Goliah. "I have often heard you, continues Dr. "Sprat addreſſing himſelf to Mr. Martin Clifford, de-"clare, that he had finiſhed the greateſt part of it, "while he was yet a young Student at Cambridge. "This perhaps may be the reaſon, that in ſome places "there is more youthfulneſs and redundance of fancy, "than his riper judgment would have allowed. . . . . "But for the main of it, I will affirm, that it is a bet-"ter inſtance and beginning of a divine Poem, than "I ever yet ſaw in any language. The contrivance "is perfectly ancient, which is certainly the true "form of Heroic Poetry, and ſuch as was never yet "out-done by any new devices of modern Wits. The "ſubject was truly divine, even according to God's "own heart. The matter of his invention all the "treaſures of knowledge and hiſtories in the Bible. "The model of it comprehended all the learning of "the Eaſt. The characters lofty and various; the "numbers firm and powerful; the digreſſions beauti-"ful and proportionable; the deſign to ſubmit mor-"tal wit to heavenly truths; in all there is an admi-"rable mixture of human virtues and paſſions, with "religious raptures." Mr. Thomas Rymer (21) is of opinion, that a more happy genius for Heroic Poeſy appears in our Author, than either in Spenſer or Davenant; and that he underſtood the purity, the perſpicuity, the majeſty of ſtyle, and the virtue of numbers. He could diſcern what was beautiful and pleaſant in nature, and could expreſs his thoughts without the leaſt difficulty or conſtraint. He underſtood how to diſpoſe of the matters, and to manage his digreſſions. In ſhort, he underſtood Homer and Virgil, and as prudently made his advantage of them. Yet as it may be lamented, that he carried not on the work ſo far as he deſigned, ſo it might be wiſhed, that he had lived to reviſe what he did leave us. I think the troubles of David is neither title nor matter proper for an heroic Poem, ſeeing it is rather the actions, than the ſufferings, that make an Heroe. Nor can it be defended by Homer's Odyſſeis, ſince Ulyſſes's ſufferings conclude with one great and perfect action. But notwithſtanding this cenſure of Mr. Rymer, he afterwards tells us, that in the "Davideis (fragment "and imperfect as it is) there ſhines ſomething of a "more fine, more free, more new, and more noble "air, than appears in the Hieruſalem of Taſſo, which, "for all his care, is ſcarce perfectly purged from pe-"dantry."

(19) Preface, ubi ſupra.

(20) Ubi ſupra.

(21) Preface to his Tranſlation of Father Rapin's Reflections upon Ariſtotle's Treatiſe of Poetry.

[M] He was ſoon after ſeized and confined for ſome time.] Dr. Sprat tells us (22), that while he lay hid in London, he was ſeized on by miſtake, the ſearch having been intended after another Gentleman of conſiderable note in the King's party. "Being made a "priſoner, he was often examined before the uſurpers, "who tried all imaginable ways to make him ſer-"viceable to their ends. That courſe not prevail-"ing, he was committed to ſevere reſtraint, and ſcarce "at laſt obtained his liberty upon the hard terms of "a thouſand pound bail, which burden Dr. Scarbo-"rough very honourably took upon himſelf. Under "theſe bonds he continued till the general redemp-"tion."

(22) Life of Cowley.

[N] But Dr. Sprat endeavours to vindicate him from all imputations of that kind.] He obſerves, that ſome perſons had attempted to bring Mr. Cowley's loyalty in queſtion upon occaſion of a few lines in the Preface to one of his Books; but that the real ſtate of the caſe was thus. Upon his coming over he found the condition of the Royal party very deſperate. He perceived the ſtrength of their enemies ſo united, that till it ſhould begin to break within itſelf, all endeavours againſt it were like to prove unſucceſsful. On the other ſide he beheld their zeal for the King's cauſe to be ſtill ſo active, that it often hurried them into inevitable ruin. He ſaw this with much grief. And though he approved their conſtancy as much as any man living, yet he found their unſeaſonable ſhewing it did only diſable themſelves, and give their adverſaries great advantages of riches and ſtrength by their defeats. He therefore believed, that it would be a meritorious ſervice to the King, if any man, who was known to have followed his intereſt, could inſinuate into the uſurper's minds, that men of his principles were now willing to be quiet, and could perſuade the poor oppreſſed Royaliſts to conceal their affections for better occaſions. And as for his own particular, he was a cloſe priſoner, when he wrote that againſt which the exception is made; ſo that he ſaw it was impoſſible for him to purſue the ends, for which he came thither, if he did not make ſome kind of declaration of his peaceable intentions. This was then his opinion; and the ſucceſs of things, ſays Dr. Sprat, ſeems to prove, that it was not very ill grounded. For certainly it was one of the greateſt helps to the King's affairs about the latter end of that tyranny, that many of his beſt friends diſſembled their counſels, and acted the ſame deſigns under the diſguiſes and names of other parties.

[O] In 1662 he publiſhed his two Books of Plants in 8vo, reprinted at London in 1668 and 1678 with his other Latin Poems.] He added four Books of Plants to the two former; and all his Latin Poems were printed in the edition of London 1678, in 8vo, with his picture before it, and a ſhort account of his Life in Latin by Dr. Sprat, under the following title: Abrahami Cowleii Angli Poemata Latina; in quibus continentur ſex Libri Plantarum, viz. duo { Herbarum / Florum / Sylvarum } & unus Miſcellaneorum. Huic Editioni ſecundæ acceſſit Index rerum antehac deſideratus. An Engliſh Tranſlation of the fifth book of Plants was printed at Loneſt part of which had been ſpent in a various and tempeſtuous condition (o); and "not "finding, according to Mr. Wood (p), that preferment conferred upon him, which he "expected, while others for their money carried away moſt places, he retired diſcontented "into Surrey," where he ſpent the remaining part of his life in a private and ſtudious manner, chiefly at Chertſey, where he had a leaſe of a farm held of the Queen, procured for him by George Duke of Buckingham from the Earl of St. Alban's (q). Dr. Sprat, who repreſents his retirement as the effect of choice, and not of diſcontent, obſerves (r), that he obtained a plentiful eſtate by the favour of that Earl, and the bounty of the Duke of Buckingham; and that though he had frequent invitations to return to buſineſs, yet he never gave ear to any perſuaſions of profit or preferment. However the Writer of a Letter in the Spectator (s) tells us, "that though our Poet tells the ſtory of Aglaus (t) "with ſo much pleaſure, it was not till after frequent diſappointments that he termed "himſelf the melancholy Cowley, and he praiſed ſolitude, when he deſpaired of ſhining "in a Court." He died at a houſe called the Porch-Houſe towards the Weſt-end of Chertſey in Surrey July the 28th 1667, aged forty nine years; and his body being attended by a great number of perſons of the moſt eminent quality was interred Auguſt the third in Weſtminſter-Abbey near the aſhes of Chaucer and Spenſer, where a monument was erected to his memory in May 1675 by George Duke of Buckingham, with a Latin inſcription, written by his friend Dr. Thomas Sprat, afterwards Biſhop of Rocheſter (u). King Charles II, upon the news of his death, declared, that Mr. Cowley had not left a better man behind him in England. There have been many editions of his works [P]. He

(o) Idem, ibid.
(p) Ubi ſupra.
(q) Idem, ibid.
(r) Ubi ſupra.
(s) Num. 613. vol. 8. pag. 212. edit. London 1715 in 12mo.
(t) Printed among his Eſſays in Verſe and Proſe.
(u) Wood, col. 121.

don 1680 in 4°; and all the ſix books were tranſlated by ſeveral hands, and publiſhed at London in fol. Dr. Sprat obſerves (23) that in "his Latin Poems he has expreſ- "ſed to admiration all the numbers of verſes and fi- "gures of Poeſy, that are ſcattered up and down a- "mongſt the antients. There is hardly to be found "in them all any good faſhion of ſpeech or colour of "meaſure, but he has comprehended it, and given "inſtances of it, according as his ſeveral arguments "required either a majeſtic ſpirit, or a paſſionate, or "a pleaſant. This is the more extraordinary in that "it was never yet performed by any ſingle Poet of "the antient Romans themſelves. They had the "Language natural to them, and ſo might eaſily have "moulded it into what form or humour they pleaſed; "yet it was their conſtant cuſtom to confine all their "thoughts and practice to one or two ways of writ- "ing, as deſpairing ever to compaſs all together." The occaſion of his chooſing the ſubject of his ſix Books of Plants, was this: When he returned to England, he was adviſed to diſſemble the main intention of his coming over under the diſguiſe of applying himſelf to ſome ſettled profeſſion. And that of Phyſic was thought moſt proper. To this purpoſe, after many Anatomical diſſections, he proceeded to the conſideration of Plants; and having furniſhed himſelf with books of that nature, retired into a fruitful part of Kent, where every field and wood might ſhew him the real figures of thoſe Plants, of which he read. Thus he ſpeedily maſtered that part of the art of medicine. But then, as one of the Ancients did before him in the ſtudy of the Law, inſtead of employing his ſkill for practice and profit, he preſently digeſted it into that form, which we behold. The two firſt books treat of Herbs, in a ſtyle reſembling the Elegies of Ovid and Tibullus in the ſweetneſs and freedom of verſe, but excelling them in the ſtrength of the fancy and vigour of the ſenſe. The third and fourth Diſcourſe of Flowers in all the variety of Catullus and Horace's numbers; for the laſt of which Authors he had a peculiar reverence, and imitated him not only in the ſtately and numerous pace of his Odes and Epodes, but in the familiar eaſineſs of his Epiſtles and Speeches. The two laſt ſpeak of Trees in the way of Virgil's Georgics. Of theſe the ſixth book is wholly dedicated to the honour of his country. For making the Britiſh Oak to preſide in the Aſſembly of the Foreſt-trees, upon that occaſion he enlarges on the hiſtory of our late troubles, the King's affliction and return, and the beginning of the Dutch war; and manages all in a ſtyle, that to ſay all in a word, is equal to the greatneſs and valour of the Engliſh Nation. The Books of Plants are highly commended by the Author of Alterius Delectus ſpecimen, ex nuperis maximè Poetis ab Electoribus prætermiſſis (24), ſubjoined to Epigrammatum Delectus ex omnibus tum veteribus tum recentioribus Poetis accuratè decerptus; printed at London 1689 in 24°.

(23) Life of Cowley.
(24) Pag. 8. 1689, in 24°.

[P] There have been many editions of his Works.] There was an edition of them printed at London 1707 in two volumes in 8vo. In the laſt volume we have, A propoſition for the advancement of experimental Philoſophy; a Diſcourſe by way of viſion concerning the government of Oliver Cromwell; and ſeveral Diſcourſes by way of Eſſays in verſe and proſe. Dr. Sprat obſerves (25), that he intended theſe Diſcourſes as a real character of his own thoughts upon the point of his retirement; and deſigned to have added to them many others, and dedicated them all to the Earl of St. Alban's as a teſtimony of his entire reſpects to him, and a kind of Apology for having left human affairs in the ſtrength of his age, while he might ſtill have been ſerviceable to his country. The ſame Writer likewiſe informs us, that it was his reſolution during his retirement to ſearch into the ſecrets of divine and human knowledge, and betake himſelf to the ſtudy of nature; and that he intended to have publiſhed a Diſcourſe concerning Style, and taken a review of the principles of the primitive Church; which examination he purpoſed ſhould reach to our Saviour's and the Apoſtles Lives, and their immediate ſucceſſors for four or five Centuries, till intereſt and policy prevailed over devotion. He hoped to have abſolutely compaſs'd it in three or four years, and when that was done, there to have fixed for ever, without any ſhaking or alteration in his judgment. "Indeed, ſays Dr. Sprat, "it was a great damage to the Church that he lived "not to perform it. For very much of the primi- "tive light might have been expected from a mind, "that was endued with the primitive meekneſs and "innocence. And beſides ſuch a work coming from "one, that was no Divine, might have been very "uſeful for this age, wherein it is one of the princi- "pal cavils againſt Religion, that it is only a mat- "ter of intereſt, and only ſupported for the gain of "a particular profeſſion". In the Miſcellany Poems publiſhed by Mr. Dryden (26) we have A Poem on the Civil War, begun in the year 1641. By Mr. Abraham Cowley. Not printed in any edition of his Works. The publiſher tells the reader, that meeting accidentally with this Poem in Manuſcript, and being informed that it was a piece of the incomparable Mr. Abraham Cowley's, he thought it unjuſt to hide ſuch a treaſure from the world. "I remembered, "ſays he, that our Author in the preface to his "Works, makes mention of ſome Poems, written by "him on the late Civil Wars, of which the follow- "ing is unqueſtionably a part. In his moſt imper- "fect and unfiniſhed pieces you will diſcover the "hand of ſo great a maſter. And (whatever his "own modeſty might have adviſed to the contrary) "there is not one careleſs ſtroke of his but what "ſhould be kept ſacred to all poſterity. He could "write nothing that was not worth the preſerving, "being habitually a Poet, and always inſpired. In "this piece the judicious reader will find the turn "of verſe to be his; the ſame copious and lively "imagery of fancy, the ſame warmth of paſſion and

(25) Life of Cowley.
(26) Part 3. pag. 225, & ſeqq. edit. 4. London 1716.

He was a man of a very amiable character [Q], as well as an admirable genius [R]. The Spectator tells us (t), that our Author's "magnanimity is as much above that of other con"siderable men as his underſtanding; and it is a true diſtinguiſhing ſpirit in the elegant
"Author, who publiſhed his Works, to dwell ſo much upon the temper of his mind and "delicacy of wit that ſparkles in all his writings.
"And certainly no labour of a genius ſo rich in its "ſelf and ſo cultivated with Learning and Manners,
"can prove an unwelcome preſent to the world."
This Poem had been printed at London 1679, in 4to.

(t) Num. 114. vol. 2. pag. 118. 2d edit. London 1713.

[Q] He was a man of a very amiable character.] He had a perfect natural goodneſs, which neither the uncertainties of his condition, nor the largeneſs of his wit could pervert. Nothing vain or fantaſtical, nothing flattering or inſolent appeared in his humour. He had great integrity and plainneſs of manners. There was nothing affected or ſingular in his habit, perſon, or geſture. In his ſpeech neither the pleaſantneſs excluded gravity, nor was the ſobriety of it inconſiſtent with delight. None but his intimate friends ever diſcovered he was a great Poet by his diſcourſe. His learning was large and profound, well compoſed of all antient and modern knowledge. But it ſate exceedingly cloſe and handſomly upon him; it was not imboſs'd in his mind, but enamell'd. He never guided his life by the whiſpers or opinions of the world; yet he had a great reverence for a good [reputation. He was a paſſionate lover of liberty and freedom from reſtraint both in actions and words. But what honeſty others receive from the direction of Laws, he had by native inclination; and he was not beholden to other men's wills, but to his own, for his innocence. He performed all his natural and civil duties with admirable tenderneſs. His friendſhips were inviolable. His thoughts were never above nor below his condition. He was accompliſhed [with all manner of abilities for the greateſt buſineſs, if he would but have thought ſo himſelf (27).

(27) Dr. Sprat.

[R] As well as admirable genius.] We ſhall give the judgment of ſeveral Writers upon it. Sir John Denham gives the following character of it (28).

(28) Denham's Poems, pag. 90, 91. of the 3d edit.

Old mother Wit and Nature gave Shakeſpear and Fletcher what they have:
In Spencer and in Johnſon art
Of flower Nature got the ſtart.
(29) Cowley. But both in him (29) ſo equal are,
None knows, which bears the happieſt ſhare:
To him no Author was unknown,
Yet what he wrote was all his own.
He melted not the antient gold,
Nor with Ben Johnſon did make bold
To plunder all the Roman ſtores
Of Poets and of Orators.
Horace his wit and Virgil's ſtate
He did not ſteal, but emulate;
And when he would like them appear,
Their garb, but not their cloaths, did wear.

(29) Cowley.

In the Seſſion of the Poets printed in the Miſcellany Poems publiſhed by Mr. Dryden (30), we have the following lines upon our Author.

(30) Part 2. pag. 90, & ſeqq. 4th edit. London 1716.

Savoy-miſſing (31), Cowley came into the Court,
Making apologies for his bad Play;
Ev'ry one gave him ſo good a report,
That Apollo gave heed to all he could ſay.
Nor would he have had, 'tis thought, a rebuke,
Unleſs he had done ſome notable folly:
Writ verſes unjuſtly in praiſe of Sam. Tuke (32),
Or printed his pitiful Melancholy.

(31) See above in the Text of this Article.

(32) Mr. Cowley wrote a copy of verſes in commendation of Sir Samuel Tuke's Adventures of Five Hours, printed at London 1662, in 4to.

Mr. Addiſon (33) writes of him as follows:

(33) Account of the greateſt Engliſh Poets. To Mr. H. S. April 3, 1689.

"Great Cowley then, a mighty genius, wrote,
"O'er-run with wit, and laviſh of his thought:
"His turns too cloſely on the reader preſs:
"He more had pleas'd us, had he pleas'd us leſs.
"One glitt'ring thought no ſooner ſtrikes our eyes
"With ſilent wonder, but new wonders riſe.
"As in the Milky-way a ſhining white
"O'erflows the heav'ns with one continued light;
"That not a ſingle ſtar can ſhew his rays,
"Whilſt jointly all promote the common blaze.
"Pardon, great Poet, that I dare to name
"Th' unnumber'd beauties of thy verſe with blame.
"Thy fault is only wit in its exceſs,
"But wit like thine in any ſhape will pleaſe.
"What muſe but thine cou'd equal hints inſpire,
"And fit the deep-mouth'd Pindar to thy lyre?
"Pindar, whom others, in a labour'd ſtrain
"And forc'd expreſſion, imitate in vain.
"Well-pleas'd in thee he ſoars with new delight,
"And plays in more unbounded verſe, and takes a nobler flight."

Mr. Addiſon (34) having obſerved that Mr. Locke in his Eſſay of Human Underſtanding has given us the beſt account of Wit in ſhort, that can any where be met with, defining Wit to lie in the aſſemblage of Ideas, and putting thoſe together with quickneſs and variety, wherein can be found any reſemblance or congruity, thereby to make up pleaſant pictures and agreeable viſions in the fancy; and that true wit generally conſiſts in the likeneſs of ideas, and is more or leſs wit, as this likeneſs in ideas is more ſurprizing and unexpected; tells us, that beſides this true wit, which is a ſimilitude in Ideas, and falſe wit, which is only a ſimilitude in words, there is another of a middle nature, that has ſomething of both in it; and that Ovid is the greateſt admirer of this mixed wit of all the Antients, as Cowley is among the Moderns. He explains the nature of this mixed wit in this manner (35). "When
"in two ideas, that have ſome reſemblance with each "other, and are both expreſſed by the ſame word,
"we make uſe of the ambiguity of the word to "ſpeak that of one idea included under it, which is "proper to the other. Thus, for example, moſt
"languages have hit on the word, which properly
"ſignifies fire, to expreſs love by (and therefore we "may be ſure there is ſome reſemblance in the ideas
"mankind have of them;) from hence the witty
"Poets of all languages, when they have once cal-
"led Love a Fire, conſider it no longer as the paſſion,
"but ſpeak of it under the notion of a real fire; and
"as the turn of wit requires, make the ſame word
"in the ſame ſentence ſtand for either of the ideas
"that is annexed to it. When Ovid's Apollo falls in "love, he burns with a new flame; when the Sea-
"nymphs languiſh with this paſſion, they kindle in
"the water: the Greek Epigrammatiſt fell in love
"with one, that flung a ſnow ball at him, and there"fore takes occaſion to admire how fire could be "thus concealed in ſnow. In ſhort, whenever the "Poet feels any thing in his love that reſembles
"ſomething in fire, he carries on this agreement
"into a kind of allegory; but if, as in the preceding
"inſtances, he finds any circumſtance in his love con"trary to the nature of fire, he calls his love a fire,
"and by joining this circumſtance to it ſurpriſes his "reader with a ſeeming contradiction". The ſame Author writes to this purpoſe in another of his works (36), and having ſtated the notion of mixt wit, tells us, that "it abounds in Cowley more than in any other
"Author that ever wrote"; and remarks, that as the paſſion of love in its nature has been thought to reſemble fire, the witty Poets have therefore taken an advantage from the doubtful meaning of the word fire to make an infinite number of witticiſms. Mr. Addiſon illuſtrates this by remarking, that Cowley obſerving the cold regard of his miſtreſs's eyes, and at the ſame time their power of producing love in him, conſiders them as burning-glaſſes made of ice; and finding himſelf able to live in the greateſt extremities of love, concludes the Torrid Zone to be habitable. When his miſtreſs has read his Letter written in juice of Lemon by holding it to the fire, he deſires her to read it over a ſecond time by love's flames. When ſhe weeps, he wiſhes it were inward heat that diſtilled thoſe drops from the Limbeck. When ſhe is abſent

(34) Notes on his Tranſlations from Ovid's Metamorphoſes; publiſhed in his Miſcellaneous Works, vol. 1. pag. 248, 249. edit. London 1726, in 12mo.

(35) Ibid. pag. 249.

(36) Spectator, vol. 1. num. 62.

" and the moderation of his desires. By this means he has rendered his friend as amiable " as famous."

sent he is beyond eighty, that is, thirty degrees nearer the Pole than when she is with him. His ambitious love is a fire, that naturally mounts upwards; his happy love is the beams of heaven, and his unhappy love flames of hell. When it does not let him sleep, it is a flame, that sends up no smoke; when it is opposed by counsel and advice, it is a fire, that rages the more by the winds blowing upon it. Upon the dying of a tree, in which he had cut his loves, he observes that his written flames had burnt up and withered the tree. When he resolves to give over his passion, he tells us, that one burnt like him, for ever dreads the fire. His heart is an Ætna, that instead of Vulcan's shop incloses Cupid's forge in it. His endeavouring to drown his love in wine, is throwing oil upon the fire. He would insinuate to his mistress, that the fire of love, like that of the Sun (which produces so many living creatures) should not only warm, but beget. Love in another place cooks pleasure at his fire. Sometimes the Poet's heart is frozen in every breast, and sometimes scorched in every eye. Sometimes he is drowned in tears, and burnt in love, like a ship set on fire in the middle of the Sea.

" The reader may observe, concludes Mr. Addison, " in every one of these instances, that the Poet mixes " the qualities of fire with those of love; and in the " same sentence speaking of it both as a passion and " as a real fire, surprizes the reader with these seeming resemblances or contradictions, that make up " all the wit in this kind of writing. Mixt wit " therefore is a composition of pun and true wit, and " is more or less perfect, as the resemblance lies in " the ideas or in the words. Its foundations are " partly laid in falshood and partly in truth: reason " puts in her claim for one half, and extravagance " for the other. The only province therefore for " this kind of wit is epigram, or those little occasional Poems, that in their own nature are nothing " else but a tissue of epigrams. I cannot conclude " this head of mixt wit, without owning, that the " admirable Poet, out of whom I have taken the examples of it, had as much true wit, as any Author " that ever writ, and indeed all other talents of an " extraordinary genius." T

CRANTOR, a Greek Philosopher and Poet [A], was born at Solos in Cilicia. He left his native country, where he was admired, and went to Athens, and there studied with Polemon under Xenocrates (a) [B]. Polemon succeeding Xenocrates in the Academy towards the end of the 116th Olympiad (b), had the pleasure to see amongst his scholars the same Crantor, who had been formerly his fellow-disciple. This was a great honour to him, for the scholar was learned enough to teach Philosophy; and the world was so sensible of it, that when during a sickness he retired into the temple of Æsculapius (c), several persons resorted thither, with an intention to study under him, imagining that he designed to establish a school there. Arcesilaus, his favourite, did not go thither with the same view, but because he hoped, that Crantor would recommend him effectually to Polemon. He obtained what he desired, and Crantor was so far from being angry with his petition, that as soon as he was recovered, he became himself one of Polemon's disciples (d). He was considered as one of the chief supporters of the Platonic Sect [C], and he was the first who wrote Commentaries upon Plato's Works (e). If he did not explain other things more clearly, than he did what relates to the nature of our soul (f), he wanted a new Commentator himself as well as Plato. He wrote a book of Consolation, which is lost, and was very much esteemed [D]. He was not very old when he

(a) Diog. Laert. lib. 4. num. 24. Instead of Polemon, we read Philemon in Moreri.

(b) See Diog. Laert. in Xenocrate, lib. 4. num. 14.

(c) Idem, ibid.

(d) Laert. ibid. num. 25.

(e) Πρῶτος τῶν Πλατώνος ἐξηγητής. Proclus, lib. 1. in Timæum, apud Menagium, Not. in Diog. Laert. lib. 4. num. 27.

(f) See his opinions upon this subject in Plutarch's Treatise. Περὶ τῆς ἐν Τιμαίῳ ψυχογονίας, pag. 1012, &c.

[A] He was a Greek . . . Poet.] It is observed, that after he had sealed up his Poems, he lodged them in the Temple of Minerva at Solos (1). Compare this with what I have said of Heraclitus in the Remark [E] of the article EURIPIDES.

(1) Diogen. Laert. lib. 4. num. 25.

[B] He studied with Polemon under Xenocrates.] Charles Stephens, Lloyd and Hofman should not have said, that he was Plato's disciple with Xenocrates and Polemon.

[C] He was considered as one of the chief supporters of the Platonic Sect.] Cicero affords me the proof of this in the following words. Crantor ille, qui in nostra Academia vel in primis fuit nobilis (2). i. e. " Crantor, " who was eminent even amongst the most illustrious " of our Academy." He seldom forgets him, when he mentions Plato's first successors. Speusippus Platonis sororis filius, & Xenocrates, qui Platonem audierat, & qui Xenocratem Polemo & Crantor, nihil ab Aristotele, qui una audierat Platonem magnopere dissensit . . . . Arcesilas primum &c (3). Observe by the way, that this passage may serve to confute the Authors of Dictionaries, whom I have censured in the foregoing Remark. They assert that Xenocrates and Polemon introduced new doctrines into Plato's School. You will find the whole passage of Cicero in the article ARCESILAUS (4), with some other passages (5), which confirm what I ascribe to the Roman Orator, and if you have a mind to know, how much Crantor was esteemed, read the following lines from Horace,

(2) Cicero, Tusculan. lib. 3. cap. 6.

(3) Idem, De Orat. lib. 3. cap. 18.

(4) Quotation (42) of the Article ARCESILAUS.

(5) Add to them a passage from the book de Finib. lib. 5. cap. 1.

Qui quid sit pulcrum, quid justum, quid utile, quid non Plenius ac melius Chrysippo & Crantore dicit (6).

This is said of Homer.

(6) Horat. Epist. 2. lib. 1. ver. 3.

[D] He wrote a Book of Consolation, which . . . was very much esteemed.] It is quoted under that title in the first Book of the Tusculan Questions. Simile quiddam est in Consolatione Crantoris (7). What follows in Cicero proves, that Crantor did not forget the common topic of men's miseries, which indeed cannot be well omitted in a work upon that subject. Is it possible to argue against a father, who laments the death of his children? is it possible, I say, to collect arguments in order to comfort him, without remembring to what misfortunes the life of man is subject, and which an infinite number of persons would have escaped, had they not lived long? Here follows an Answer, which a father received by an Oracle from the dead (8).

(7) Cicero, Tuscul. 1. cap. 48.

(8) Psychomanteum.

Ignaris homines in vita mentibus errant.
Euthynous potitur fatorum munere læto,
Sic fuit utilius finire ipsique tibique.

You weep for the death of a son, and you ask what is the cause of so great a misfortune: know then, that men are ignorant. He enjoys the blessed favour, which fate bestowed upon him; it was both his interest and yours, that he should leave this world (9). You have there a passage from Crantor's Book. I believe the title of his work was περὶ πένθους de Luctu (concerning grief:) for thus Diogenes Laertius gives it; I shall quote his own words, because they contain a very great commendation: Θαυμάζεται δὲ αὐτῆ μάλιστα βιβλίον τὸ περὶ πένθους (10). i. e. " His Book concerning mour- " ning (11) is chiefly admired." I must quote the following passage for the same reason. Legimus omnes Crantoris veteris Academici de Luctu, est enim non magnus verum aureolus, & ut Tuberoni Panætius præcipit, ad verbum ediscendus libellus (12). i. e " We have " read the treatise of mourning, written by Crantor " of the ancient Academy. It is not indeed a large " book, but worth its weight in gold, and it deserves

(9) Apud Cic. Tuscul. 1. cap. 48. ex Crantor. Plutarch relates this more at length, De Consolatione, pag. 109; tho' he does not quote Crantor.

(10) Diog. Laert. lib. 4. num. 27.

(11) Thus it must be translated, and not concerning pain or grief (douleur) as Moreri has done.

(12) Cicero, Academic. Quæst. lib. 4. cap. 44.

he died (g) of a dropsy (h). He left his estate to Arcesilaus; it amounted to twelve talents (i). It is not true, as some have asserted (k), that he taught in the Academy after the death of Crates the Philosopher, for he died before Crates and Polemon (l).

(g) Diog. Laert. lib. 4. num. 25.
(h) Idem, ibid. num. 27.
(i) Idem, ibid. num. 25.
(k) Monsr. Foucher, pag. 28. of his Histoire de la Philosophie des Academiciens.
(l) Diog. Laert. lib. 4. num. 27.

" to be learnt by heart word for word, as Panætius advises Tubero." It will be of some use to observe on what occasion this was said: it was in order to prove, that the ancient Academy did not teach the Indolence or Insensibility, which was a part of the Stoic's System. One of the persons introduced by Cicero proves the contrary, by this little Book of Crantor; and it is certain that this Philosopher did not approve the doctrine of the Stoicks, and asserted, that the being free from all passions would cost too dear, since we could not obtain it, but by making the body senseless, and the soul savage. Μὴ γὰρ νοσοῖμεν (φησὶν ὁ Ἀκαδημαϊκὸς Κράντωρ) νοσήσασι δὲ παρεῖη τὰς αἰσθήσεις εἴτ' ὑπ' ἰτέμνοιτό τι τῶν ἡμετέρων, εἴτ' ἀποσπῶτο. Τὸ γὰρ ἀνώδυνον τοῦτο οὐκ ἄνευ μεγάλων ἰσχύσεται μισθῶν τῷ ἀνθρώπῳ τιθηριῶσθαι γὰρ εἰκὸς, ἐκεῖ μὲν σῶμα τοιοῦτον, ἐνταῦθα δὲ ψυχήν (13). That is, " It were to be wished (says Crantor the Academick) " that we were never sick. But if we are sick, we " cannot but have a sense of it; whether some part " of our body be cut or torn off. For such an insen- " sibility cannot be obtained without a great detri- " ment to man; for his body and soul must first be " entirely made savage and wild." Cicero has related the same reflection of Crantor. See the margin (14).

(13) Plutarch. De Consolatione, pag. 102. D.

(14) Minime, inquit (Crantor) assentior his, qui istam nescio quam indolentiam magnopere laudant, quæ nec potest ulla esse, nec debet. Nec ægroto etiam, inquit, nisi it, qui fuerat sensus, adsit, sive secetur, quid sive avellatur a corpore. Nam istud nihil dolere, non sine magna mercede, contingit immanitatis in animo, stuporis in Corpore. Cicero, Tuscul. Quæst. lib. 3. cap. 6.

We learn from Plutarch, that Crantor composed this Book in order to comfort Hippocles, who had lost his children (15). Plutarch borrowed some reflections from this Treatise, which he employed in his work upon Consolation, addressed to Apollonius. This same Book of Crantor was of great use to Cicero, who extracted several things from it, when he wrote upon the same subject: He owned it, and therefore Pliny did not rank him amongst the Plagiaries. Scio enim, says he (16), conferentem auctores me deprehendisse a juratissimis & proximis veteres transcriptos ad verbum, neque nominatos: non illa Virgiliana virtute ut certarent, non Ciceroniana simplicitate, qui in libris de Republica Platonis se comitem profitetur; in Consolatione filiæ Crantorem, inquit, sequor. i. e. " For I know, that " by comparing Authors, I have found that the most " credible writers, and they who come next to them, " have transcribed the Ancients word for word, and " even, without quoting them. They have not imi- " tated Virgil's sincerity, nor Cicero's plain-dealing; " who in his Book concerning the Commonwealth " owns that he follows Plato, and in his Consolatio " (Comfort) to his daughter, I imitate Crantor, says " he." Father Hardouin observes in his Note upon these words of Pliny, that Cicero said, Crantor intitled his work De luctu minuendo. But it is certain, that in the passage (17) quoted by this learned Jesuit, Cicero speaks of his own work, and not of Crantor's. Monsieur Dacier asserts (18), that Cicero had the following words in his Consolation. Sed ego Crantorem sequor, cujus legi brevem illum quidem, sed vere aureum, & ut Panætio placuit, ad verbum ediscendum de Luctu librum, qui acutè universam doloris medicinam complexus est. He supposes, that this passage is different from that in the second Book of his Academick Questions. I have not met with it in the fragments, which have been collected in the Book de Consolatione, but it is to be found in the Book, which Sigonius would pass upon the world, with the same title, for Cicero's work. Monsr. Dacier is not perhaps of the same opinion with those Criticks, who thought that Sigonius endeavoured to impose upon the publick. Observe, that one of the Reflections, which Cicero borrowed from Crantor, is, that we come into the world in order to atone for our sins. Cicero, cum in principio Consolationis suæ dixisset, luendorum scelerum causa nasci homines; iteravit id ipsum postea, quasi objurgans eum, qui vitam pœnam non esse putet (19). i. e. " Cicero " having said in his Consolatio, that men are born to " atone for their sins; repeated the same thing after- " wards, as tho' he would reprove them, who denied " this life to be a punishment." Compare this with the following Greek passage from Plutarch, and you will find, that I am in the right. Πολλοῖς γὰρ καὶ σοφοῖς ἀνδράσιν (ὡς φησι Κράντωρ) ὀ γὺν ἀλλὰ πάλαι κέκλαυσαι τ' ἀνθρώπινα, τιμιφίαν ἡγεμένους εἶναι τὸν βίον, καὶ ἀρχὴν τὸ γένεσθ' ἀνθρώπον συμφορὰν τὴν μεγίστην (20). i. e. " A great many wise men, as Crantor asserts, " have not only of late, but even long ago bewailed " the condition of mankind, being of opinion, that " this life is a punishment, and that to be born was " the greatest misfortune." The learned Casaubon had not took notice of Pliny's words, which I have quoted; for in order to confirm his conjecture, that Cicero had made use of Crantor's book, he quotes only St. Jerom. Eum libellum . . . dubium non est, quin in suo de Consolatione magnam partem expressisset (Cicero), quod & Hieronymus his verbis testatur. Legimus, inquit, Crantorem, cujus volumen ad confovendum dolorem suum secutus est Cicero (21). i. e. " It is certain, " that Cicero transcribed a great part of that Book in " his Treatise of Consolation; as St. Jerom witnesses " in the following words; We have read Crantor, " says he, whose Book Cicero imitated, in order to " cherish his grief."

(15) Plutarch. De Consolat. pag. 104, B.
(16) Plin. in Præfat.
(17) Epist. 21. lib. 12. ad Attic. It is the 20th in Grævius's edition.
(18) Dacier, sur la 2 Epitre du 1 Livre d'Horace, pag. m. 142, 143. de viii tome.
(19) Lactant. lib. 3. cap. 18. pag. m. 197.
(20) Plutarch. De Consolat. pag. 115, B.
(21) If. Casaubon. Not. Diog. Laert. lib. 4. num. 27.

CRATERUS, the Author of a book, the loss of which ought to be regretted [A], was a Macedonian (a). We must not however believe with Vossius, that he is the same Craterus

(a) Plutarch. in Aristide, sub finem, pag. 234, F.

[A] He was the author of a Book, the loss of which ought to be regretted.] It was a Collection of the Decrees of the Athenians (1). How many difficulties might be solved by that Book, if it were extant? How many particulars should we not find there concerning the great men, who were banished, or otherwise ill-used in that famous Commonwealth. Craterus was a very accurate Writer; he related the form of the accusation and the judgment, which had been given, and quoted the Authors, who furnished him with these materials (2). There is even room to believe, that he had inserted the Treaties of Peace entire into his work (3). I believe Mr. de Maussac would have bought such a Book, tho' it had cost never so much, notwithstanding all the scorn and indignation he seems to have for the modern compilers of Decrees and Sentences (4). Hodie, says he, nos hujusmodi homines e rivio vocamus Collecteurs d'Arrests; ad quorum nugas & somnia excudenda & typis mandanda divina hæc excudendi Ars potius inventa videtur, quam ad seria & non ita futiles doctorum virorum lucubrationes, posteris imperitiam hujus sæculi hominum miraturis, & typographorum avaritiam contempturis relinquendas (5). i. e. " That common sort of men we call in French " Collecteurs d'Arrets, (Compilers of Decrees:) and it " seems that the noble Art of Printing was invented " to usher into the world their trifles and dreams, ra- " ther than to publish the least idle and more serious " lucubrations of learned Men; whence it will happen " that posterity will wonder at the ignorance of this " Age, and despise the covetousness of our Booksel- " lers."

(1) Schol. Aristoph. in Ran. Act. 1. Sc. 7.
(2) Τούτων οὐδὲν ἔγραψεν ὁ Κράτερος τεκμήριον παρέσχεν, οὔτε δίκην οὔτε ψήφισμα, καίτοι, εἰ δεῖ γράφειν τὰ τοιαῦτα, καὶ παρατίθεσθαι τοὺς ἱστοροῦντας. Plutarch. in Aristide, pag. 335, A.
(3) See Plutarch. in Cimone, pag. 487, A. and above, quotation (83) of the article CIMON.
(4) You will find in Furetiere's Dictionary the names of several of such Compilers under the word Arrestegraphe.
(5) Maussac, Not. in Harpocrat. voce Ἀρκτῶσαι.

AN objection upon the complaints made against the Booksellers.

Observe by the by, that it is no new thing to hear the learned complain, that the Booksellers choose rather to print bad than good Books. We should not complain of the Booksellers, but of the Readers; for if the Booksellers found their account as well in the printing of good Books as they do the printing of others, I do not doubt but they would prefer good copies before bad ones. I call those Books good, which are so really in themselves, and not those which are good only in the Bookseller's style.

You will find this confirmed by Monsieur Du Pin. " There are an infinite number of small French Books " published every day, and there is scarce one ancient " Book either Greek or Latin printing. It is true, " the Booksellers say it is not their fault, but that of " the public: That the former sell well, and they " get estates by them, whereas the latter rot in their " shops, and they are often ruined by them. We must " therefore blame the men of this Age for this, who " are become capricious, and having lost all taste

" for

Craterus, who had a great ſhare in Alexander's friendſhip [B]. It is ſurpriſing that Pinedo knew nothing of him, but what he found in Voſſius [C]. Moreri has been very much miſtaken, with regard to CRATERUS, Alexander's favourite (b).

(b) See the Remark [B].

" for antiquity, like nothing, but what is new. True " and ſolid learning is out of date, and men are ſa- " tisfied, if they do but know things ſuperficially. " They do not ſtudy thoroughly, they learn antiqui- " ty in modern Authors, and ſeldom conſult the ori- " ginals. This is a ſad miſfortune for the Republick " of Letters, and it is much to be feared, that this " ſuperficial way of ſtudying will at laſt throw us in- " to a worſe condition, than the ignorance of former " times was (6)."

(6) Du Pin, Nouvell. Biblioth. des Auteurs Eccleſ. tom. 2. pag. 200. Dutch edition.

[B] We muſt not believe with Voſſius, that he is the ſame Craterus, who had a great ſhare in Alexander's friendſhip.] I wonder Voſſius could propoſe ſuch a conjecture as this is. Suſpicor eſſe eum ipſum, qui cum Alexandro M. militavit, de quo ſequenti libro dicemus (7). He offers the ſame conjecture again, when he ſpeaks of the Craterus, who accompanied Alexander. Fortaſſe idem eſt ille Craterus Macedo, de quo inter incertæ ætatis ſcriptores dictum fuit libro tertio (8). He had quoted Strabo, who mentions a certain Letter of Craterus to his mother Ariſtopatra, and who ſays, that this Letter contains ſeveral incredible things, which do not agree with any other account (9). This relates to the Indies. I am apt to believe, that this Letter was ſuppoſititious: for tho' it be poſſible, that the favourite of a great Monarch, and one of the chief Commanders of a Conqueror's Army, ſhould divert himſelf with writing a Letter full of falſe ſtories, yet I do not think it probable, that he ſhould write ſuch things to his own mother. I think it much leſs probable, that a great Lord like Craterus, eminent in the ſhare he had in Alexander's conqueſt and friendſhip, ſhould reſolve to make a collection of all the Decrees of the Athenians, with all their circumſtances, and all the neceſſary quotations. This was a Lawyer's Province; it required a man covered with the duſt of Regiſters and ancient Records, and not with the duſt that comes from roads and camps. As for an hiſtory of Alexander's actions, an account of his campaigns, it is another thing; I own that Craterus, that Conqueror's favourite, might have gained a great reputation that way; and he really applied himſelf to it, if we may depend upon Moreri. Craterus, ſays he, gave great proofs of his wit, by the beautiful works he wrote concerning Alexander's conqueſts. Strabo, who mentions them, quotes in his fifteenth Book a Letter of Craterus. This is ſuppoſing, that Strabo diſtinguiſhes this Letter from the Account of Alexander's Conqueſts: but this is falſe; for he mentions only that Letter. Freinſhemius indeed ranks Craterus amongſt the Hiſtorians of Alexander; but we need only conſider how he expreſſes himſelf, to be ſatisfied, that we know nothing of this. Craterus cum ſub Alexandro res gereret, ejus hiſtoriam dicitur conſcripſiſſe (10). i. e. " It is ſaid, that when Craterus ſerved un- " der Alexander, he wrote his Hiſtory." Voſſius, the only Author, whom Moreri had examined, ſpeaks only of the Letter mentioned by Strabo, ſo that all we can affirm, is, that Craterus wrote a Letter concerning the Wonders of the Indies. For my part, I cannot but think it ſpurious. I alſo think, that if this Craterus had made the compilation of the Decrees of the Athenians, Plutarch or ſome of the Authors, who quote it, would have mentioned the employment he had under Alexander the Great, and that ſince they do not mention it, their ſilence is an argument againſt Voſſius.

(7) Voſſius, de Hiſtor. Græc. lib. 3. pag. 347.

(8) Idem, ibid. lib. 4. pag. 462.

(9) Ἐκδίδοται δέ τις καὶ Κρατέρου πρὸς τὴν μητέρα Ἀριστοπάτραν ἐπιστολὴ, πολλά τε ἄλλα παράδοξα φράζουσα, καὶ οὐχ ὁμολογοῦσα οὐδενί. Strabo, lib. 15. pag. 484.

(10) Freinſhem. Prolegom. ad Q. Curtium, cap. 4.

[C] . . . . Pinedo knew nothing of him, but what he found in Voſſius.] What Voſſius has ſaid of Craterus, the Collector of Decrees, amounts to this; that Plutarch cites him for his voucher; that Stephanus Bizantinus quoted the third and ninth Book of his Decrees (11), and that Harpocration under the word Ἀνδρων, quotes the ſame work (12). Pinedo, having ſet down the places where Stephanus Bizantinus quotes Craterus, and a paſſage, where the quotation was wrong, refers us to Voſſius, and owns frankly, that he muſt ſtop there (13). I am certain, he would not have ſtopt there, had he been acquainted with Mauſſac's Obſervations. This learned critic obſerves, that the Tranſcribers have often changed the name of Craterus into Carterus (14), and inſtances in the following words of Pollux (15). Καρτέρῳ πιστεύειν τῷ τὰ ψηφίσματα συναγαγόντι; he corrects a blunder of the Tranſlator, who inſtead of ſaying to believe Craterus the compiler of the Decrees, Cratero fidem habere, qui decreta in unum collegit, tranſlates, to believe Carterus who gathered the Votes, Carterio fidem habere ſuffragia poſcenti. He corrects a conſiderable error in Suidas; Craterus's ninth Book of Sophiſms is there quoted (16). Thus it is that Books are multiplied; how many perſons are there, who would think, that beſides the Compilation of Decrees, Craterus alſo made a Compilation of Sophiſms? The changing of one ſyllable might occaſion this error (17). Mauſſac alſo conjectures, that inſtead of Κρατίνῳ ἐν τοῖς ψηφίσμασι, we ſhould read Κρατέρῳ (18) in a paſſage of Harpocration (19). It is true, that he alſo thinks, that Cratinus, the Comic Poet, wrote perhaps a Play intitled, ψηφίσματα (the Decrees). Valeſius declared, that we muſt write Craterus inſtead of Cratinus (20). Here follows ſomething that deſerves more attention, Mauſſac obſerves, that Alexis compoſed a Poem againſt Craterus, juſt ſo, ſays he, as Ariſtotle wrote one againſt Hermias (21). I will not inſiſt much upon two ſmall blunders that are here, and which Henricus Valeſius did not obſerve: the one, that he ſhould have ſaid Alexinus and not Alexis; the other, that Ariſtotle wrote a Hymn to the honour of and not againſt Hermias. Let this paſs: but we muſt obſerve, that Mauſſac's Remark affords ſome means to gueſs at the time in which Craterus lived, and which Voſſius did not dare to determine even by gueſs. After what manner ſoever Athenæus's words are explained, it ſeems, that we may infer from them, that Craterus and Alexinus were contemporaries; for it is not probable, that Alexinus would have written a Poem either for or againſt Craterus, if he had never had any correſpondence with him. Παιὰν δ' ἐστὶ κατ' αὐτοῦ εἰς Κρατερὸν τὸν Μακεδόνα γραφείς, ὃν ἐποιήσατο Ἀλεξῖνος ὁ διαλεκτικὸς . . . ᾄδεται δὲ κατ' αὐτὸν ἐν Δελφοῖς κιθαριζομένου γέ τινος παιδός (22). i. e. " There " is a Hymn written againſt Craterus the Macedonian, " which Alexinus the Dialectician compoſed. It is " ſung at Delphos, whilſt a child plays upon the lyre." I know that Alexinus, being a great diſputer (23), and a ſubtle dialectician, would have attacked the dead and the living, if the queſtion had been with regard to Philoſophy (24). But this was not Craterus's caſe. Now if he lived in the time of Alexinus, we may place him towards the 120th Olympiad. For Alexinus was Eubulides's diſciple, who was contemporary with Ariſtotle. See Diogenes Laertius's ſecond Book, Num. 109. But Valeſius overthrows here the foundation of our building (25). He pretends that Mauſſac is miſtaken in ſuppoſing that the Craterus in the paſſage from Athenæus in the Compiler of the Decrees. It is againſt Craterus the ſucceſſor of Alexander, ſays he, that the Poem was written. He does not ſupport this aſſertion with any argument, and cites no authority. Many things might be ſaid for and againſt his opinion, but this would be diſputing without hopes of diſcovering any thing certain. Some perſon, who has leiſure, will perhaps endeavour to clear up this point. I ſhall cloſe this remark with obſerving, that the Scholiaſt upon Ariſtophanes quotes our Craterus twice at leaſt, with regard to the ſentence, which was given againſt the impious Diogenes. See the article DIAGORAS (26).

(11) Citat tertium & nonum è Crateri Libris, περὶ ψηφισμάτων, de Scitis ſive Decretis. Voſſius, de Hiſt. Græc. pag. 347.

(12) Idem, pag. 462.

(13) See Voſſium, de Hiſt. Græcis, lib. 3, & lib. 4. cap. 9. Ego enim nihil de illo memoratu dignum habeo dicere. Pinedo, in Steph. pag. 759.

(14) Mauſſac, in Harpocrat. Voce Ἀνδρων.

(15) Lib. 8. cap. 10.

(16) In voce Νύμφαιον. I do not find that error in Æmilius Portus's edition of Suidas, printed at Geneva in 1619.

(17) Non σοφίσματα ſed ψηφίσματα Craterus ille congerat. Mauſſac, in Harpocrat. voce Ἀνδρων.

(18) Mauſſac ſhould have written Κρατερῷ.

(19) In Ἀρκτινοσας.

(20) Valeſ. Not. in Not. Mauſſac, pag. 99.

(21) Mauſſac, in Harpocrat. Voce Νύμφαιον.

(22) Athen. lib. 15. pag. 606.

(23) He was ſurnamed the Dialectician, as appears from Athenæus's words, which I have juſt now quoted. See Diog. Laert. lib. 2. in Euclid. num. 109.

(24) Jonſius, lib. 2. cap. 2. ſays, that Alexinus wrote againſt Ariſtotle: he cites Hierocles and Hermippus. He is miſtaken with regard to the latter. Hermippus, ſays lib. 1. de Ariſtotele apud Athenæum lib. 15. cap. 16. Alexini in Ariſtotelem petulantiam notat. Athenæus does not relate this.

(25) Valeſius, Not. in Notas Mauſſaci, pag. 99.

(26) Surnamed the Atheiſt, at the end of the remark [D].

CRATIPPUS, a Peripatetick Philoſopher, had a very great reputation [A]. He was

[A] He had a very great reputation.] This appears by Cicero's words. Cratippus Peripateticorum omnium, quos quidem ego audierim, meo judicio, facile princeps (1). i. e. " In my opinion Cratippus is by far the greateſt " of all the Peripatetick Philoſophers, whom I ever " heard." Let us obſerve on what occaſion this Encomium was beſtowed upon him; it was, when Cicero had ſaid, that Cratippus came from Mitylene to Epheſus, was of Mitylene, and taught Philoſophy there. He went afterwards to Athens (a), where he followed the ſame profeſſions, and had amongſt his diſciples Cicero's ſon. This great Orator had a high eſteem for him (b), and prevailed upon Cæſar to grant him the freedom of Rome, after which he engaged the Areopagus to make a decree, by which Cratippus was deſired to continue at Athens, as an ornament to the City (c), and to read Lectures to the youth there (d). We may be perſuaded, that theſe Lectures muſt have been very uſeful and inſtructive, ſince Brutus went to hear them when he was making preparations for the war againſt Mark Anthony (e). There are circumſtances, which prove, that he was none of thoſe Profeſſors, who have no knowledge of the world, for he was not obſtinate in diſputing with Pompey upon Divine Providence [B], at a time when this Roman General's misfortunes rendered him leſs capable to yield to the arguments

(1) Cicero, de Univerſitate, cap. 1.

(a) See the Remark [A].

(b) See the ſame Remark.

(c) Ὡς κοσμοῦντα τὴν πόλιν. Plut. in Cicerone, pag. 873, A.

(d) Plutarch. in Cicerone, pag. 873, A.

(e) Plutarch. in Bruto, pag. 994. F.

ſus, to pay his reſpects to him, who was going to command in Cilicia (2) The beginning of the firſt Book of Cicero's offices is another proof of Cratippus's merit. Quamquam te, Marce fili, annum jam audientem Cratippum, idque Athenis, abundare oportet præceptis, inſtitutiſque Philoſophiæ, propter ſummam & doctoris auctoritatem, & urbis, quorum alter te ſcientia augere poteſt, altera exemplis, tamen &c (3). That is, "Since it is now a year, my dear ſon Marc, that you "ſtudy under Cratippus, and that at Athens, you "ought to be very much improved in the knowledge "of the precepts and maxims of Philoſophy, conſi- "dering the great reputation both of your teacher and "of the city where you are, the one being capable to "impart wiſdom to you, and the other to furniſh you "with great examples, yet, &c." We meet with a greater Encomium ſtill, in a third Book of the ſame Treatiſe. Quamquam à Cratippo noſtro, principe hujus memoriæ Philoſophorum, hæc te aſſidue audire atque accipere confido, tamen conducere arbitror talibus aures tuas vocibus undique circumſonare . . . ſuſcepiſti onus præterea grave & Athenarum & Cratippi; ad quos cum tanquam ad mercaturam bonarum artium ſis profectus, inanem redire turpiſſimum eſt dedecorantem & urbis auctoritatem & magiſtri (4). i. e. "Tho' I truſt, that you "hear theſe things continually from our friend Cra- "tippus, the beſt Philoſopher of this Age, yet I think "it uſeful, that ſuch precepts be from all ſides impart- "ed to you. . . . . you have taken a heavy taſk upon "you, with regard both to the Athenians and to Cra- "tippus; you are gone, as it were, to a plentiful "market of ſcience and learning; to come back with "empty hands, would be the greateſt ſhame in the "world, and an affront to the reputation both of the "City and of your Maſter."

(2) In the year 702 ſince the building of Rome.

(3) Cic. de Officiis, lib. 1. init. cap. 1. See alſo the 2d chap. of the 2d book of the ſame work.

(4) Idem, ibid. lib. 3. cap. 2. pag. m. 283.

[B] He was not obſtinate in diſputing with Pompey upon Divine Providence.] Pompey, after the battle of Pharſalia, went to Mitylene to meet his ſpouſe (5). His whole Fleet conſiſted only of one ſingle ſhip, which he had borrowed. On his arrival the inhabitants flocked to the Sea-ſhore, and deſired him to enter their city, but he thanked them. Cratippus was one of them who went to pay their reſpects to him. Pompey complained, and diſputed a little upon divine Providence; but Cratippus gently yielded to him, giving him hopes of better times, leſt he ſhould have tired and vexed him, by anſwering and refuting his objections. For Pompey might have aſked him, how the Providence of the Gods appeared in what had happened to him; Cratippus's anſwer ſhould have been, that the ill management of publick affairs at Rome required that the Commonwealth ſhould be governed by a ſingle perſon; then he might have put this queſtion to him. How, and by what arguments, will you have us believe, Pompey, that you would have made a better uſe of fortune, had you been the conqueror, than Cæſar has done, or will do? But this muſt be left to the Providence of the Gods, to manage it as they pleaſe (6). Cratippus behaved on this occaſion like a man of wit. If his knowledge had extended no farther than ſchool-learning, he would have followed Pompey till he went on board, and would have had the laſt word: He would have carried his common-place arguments to the laſt reply, and would have took a pride in vanquiſhing him in a diſpute more fully, than Cæſar had done in a drawn battle. He had not underſtood, that the circumſtances Pompey was in did not ſuffer this, and that we ought to act with regard to the paſſions of the ſoul, as we do with regard to the diſeaſes of the body. Purging and bleeding, which if performed in good time, may ſave a patient's life, will kill him if unſeaſonably preſcribed. The ſame muſt be ſaid with regard to the paſſions; we muſt chooſe a convenient time, if we will labour effectually to cure them. You will bring afflicted perſons much eaſier to reaſon, if you let them take ſome advantage over you; ſuffer yourſelf to be vanquiſhed ſometimes, do not anſwer all their reflections, or if you will refute them, do it ſide-ways, if I may ſay ſo, and indirectly, and in ſuch a manner that your anſwer be attended with complacency and condeſcenſion; and laſtly be the firſt that is ſilent, keeping your arguments for a better opportunity; time will diſpoſe the patient to make a better uſe of your Philoſophy.

(5) Plutarch in Pompeio, pag. 658.

(6) Plutarch, in Pompeio, pag. 659.

Impatiens animus, nec adhuc tractabilis arte
Reſpuit, atque odio verba monentis habet.
Aggrediar melius tunc, cum ſua vulnera tangi
Jam ſinet, & veris vocibus aptus erit.
Quis matrem, niſi mentis inops, in funere nati
Flere vetet? Non hoc illa monenda loco.
Cum dederit lachrymas, animumque impleverit ægrum;
Ille dolor verbis emoderandus erit.
Temporis ars medicina fere eſt, data tempore proſunt,
Et data non apto tempore vina nocent.
Quin etiam accendas vitia, irriteſque vetando;
Temporibus ſi non aggrediare ſuis (7).

(7) Ovidius, de Remedio amoris, ver. 123, & ſeq.

Cratippus was not acquainted with this method, and knew very well how to employ it towards Pompey. This great man was not then in a condition to reaſon calmly upon Providence; his wound was too freſh ſtill; and the refuting of his complaints would have but vexed him more and more: the contradicting of him would have ſerved only to exaſperate and tranſport him with anger. His complaints were like a fire, which would have blazed more and more by being ſtirred, and which, if left to itſelf, it might be hoped it would ſoon be extinguiſhed for want of ſtirring (8). It was therefore better to break off the diſpute. But a Pedant, a Philoſopher, who had been nothing but a Philoſopher, would have acted quite the contrary. Obſerve, that there are Writers of the ſeventeenth Century, who aſſert, that Cratippus did really make the anſwer contained in the paſſage from Plutarch, which I have quoted above. They are admirable people indeed, who pretend to know theſe things better than the ancient Hiſtorians, or to ſpeak more properly, who taking no pains to conſult the originals, corrupt and ſpoil Hiſtory. The Jeſuit Biſſelius ſuppoſes, that Cratippus told Pompey, that conſidering the diſorders of the Commonwealth, Rome muſt periſh of neceſſity, unleſs it were reduced under a monarchical Government (9). He adds, that they who heard this anſwer, aſked Cratippus, Why then did the Gods, if they be wiſe, chooſe rather to grant this Monarchy to Cæſar than to Pompey? And that the Philoſopher anſwered, Do you know, whether Pompey would have governed better than Cæſar? The Gods alone know it (10). Muſt we wonder, that News-Writers ſhould give falſe accounts of what they have been told? Do Authors relate well, what they might read in Plutarch? They might read there, that Cratippus choſe rather to be ſilent, becauſe otherwiſe he would have been obliged to anſwer this and that; and they are ſo bold as to aſſert, that he really anſwered all theſe things, and that after he had ſaid them, he went away, that he might not be obliged to reply ſhocking truths. Inter hæc ne Pompeio ſe pluribus fortaſſis impugnaturo, veridicis reſponſis moleſtiam aggravaret, obticuit Cratippus, & abivit (11).

(8) Vidi ego jactatas mota face creſcere flammas; Et vidi, nullo concutiente, mori.

(9) Joannes Biſſelius, Ruinar. illuſtr. Decade 4. Part 4. pag. 2856.

(10) Cujus mehercule eventus præſcientia penes ſolos (adjecit) immortales, penes nos, nihil minus eſt. Idem, ibid.

(11) Idem, ibid.

Let

ments that might have been propoſed to him. He knew alſo how to make himſelf agreeable to his diſciples, and to pleaſe them by the delights of his converſation, which was free from that pedantick gravity [C], which others cannot get rid of, and which is proper only to diſcourage young people. He wrote ſome books concerning Divination, and expoſed himſelf to an inconveniency, which is ſeldom avoided by thoſe, who explode ſome doctrines only by halves. It was proved to him, that the arguments he made uſe of to ſupport what he admitted were alſo proper to eſtabliſh that part of the ſyſtem which he rejected [D]. Moreri ſays without any ground, that he taught at Athens in the year 706 ſince the building of Rome (f).

(f) He was ſtill at Mitylene after the battle of Pharſalia in the year 705 (and not in 706 as Jonſius ſays, pag. 203) and no Author tells us, that he left that City the next year.

CREECH

Let us ſay here, that it has been obſerved, that Pompey did not begin to be unfortunate, but when he ſupported the good cauſe (12): You will ſee this in a paſſage from la Mothe le Vayer, where you will alſo find an opinion contrary to mine concerning Cratippus's behaviour. There is a certain wiſdom, which abounds with vanity, and in its arrogance dares to find fault with the decrees of Heaven, and to controul God's Providence. Such was Cato's wiſdom, when he aſked, what the Providence of the Gods was, when they ſuffered Pompey to be invincible, when he did nothing that was reaſonable, and laboured only to ſatisfy his own ambition; whereas when he declared for the good cauſe, and fought to ſupport the liberty of his country, his fortune failed him, and he fell before Cæſar, who was the Uſurper *. Pompey himſelf, being ſelf-conceited, held the like diſcourſes to the Philoſopher Cratippus in the Iſland of Mitylene, after his overthrow at Pharſalia. Plutarch commends this Philoſopher for his prudent compliance with this great and unfortunate General's opinions, being contented to give him ſome hopes of better times. But in my opinion he had done much better had he had leſs of that worldly prudence, and if he had repreſented to Pompey, what reſpect is due to the Decrees of the Almighty; for thus he might have diſſuaded him from his impiety, which made him blaſpheme againſt that Providence, of which we, weak mortals, cannot comprehend the motives nor the end, though it is always directed for the general good of all mankind. I think Cratippus's Philoſophy had been neither leſs prudent, nor leſs comfortable, had he followed that method; nay, it would have been much wiſer, ſince there would have been nothing baſe in it, nothing that could flatter Pompey's paſſion and anger, which did only incenſe God more and more againſt him (13).

(12) O rem miſeram! malas cauſas ſemper obtinuit, in optima concidit. Cicero, Ep. 25. libri VII ad Atticum.

* Plutarch. in Cat. & Pomp.

(13) La Mothe le Vayer, Dialogue 6. de la promenade, pag. 104. of the 13th vol. of his works. See alſo pag. 146. where he confutes thoſe who excuſe Cratippus.

[C] He knew . . . . how to pleaſe his diſciples by the delights of his converſation, which was free from a pedantick gravity.] We find this in a Letter of Cicero's ſon's. Cratippo me ſcito, ſays he (14), non ut diſcipulum, ſed ut filium eſſe conjunctiſſimum. Nam cum & audio illum libenter, tum etiam propriam ejus ſuavitatem vehementer amplector. Sum totos dies cum eo, noctiſque ſæpenumero partem. Exoro enim ut mecum quam ſæpiſſime cœnet. Hac introducta conſuetudine, ſæpe inſcientibus nobis & cœnantibus obrepit, ſublataque ſeveritate philoſophiæ, humaniſſime nobiſcum jocatur. Quare da operam ut hunc talem, tam jucundum, tam excellentem virum videas quamprimum. i. e. "Know then, "that Cratippus loves me not as a diſciple but as a ſon: "and as I am very well pleaſed to hear his lectures, "ſo I am extremely delighted with his ſweet temper. "I paſs whole days with him, and often part of the "night. I have prevailed upon him to ſup with me "very often: and this being now cuſtomary, he comes "often to us unawares, when we are at ſupper, and "laying aſide his philoſophical gravity, he is ſo kind "as to laugh and joke with us. Therefore I beg of "you, that you would endeavour to ſee ſuch an agree"able and excellent man, as ſoon as you can." This is a very great encomium which he paſſes on his Profeſſor, and he could not but make a great progreſs under ſuch a maſter; and therefore when Tribonius would take young Cicero with him into Aſia, he reſolved to take Cratippus alſo along with him (15). Cratippus had brought ſome learned men from Mitylene to Athens with him, I do not doubt but they were his pupils. Young Cicero writes as a great piece of news, that he was very intimate with them. Utor familiaribus & quotidianis convictoribus, quos ſecum Mitylenis Cratippus adduxit, hominibus & doctis & illi probatiſſimis (16). You may look upon this as a proof, that Cratippus made very good ſcholars. Let us take notice here of a miſtake of Jonſius. He ſays, that Cicero's ſon had a very great ſhare in this Philoſopher's friendſhip, at Athens in the year 708 from the building of Rome (17). This is a chronological error; for the Treatiſe de Officiis, written after Cæſar's death, proves that this young man had ſtudied then but one year at Athens under Cratippus.

(14) Epiſt. 21. lib. 16. Ciceron. ad Familiares, pag. m. 455.

(15) Epiſt. 16. lib. 12. Ciceronis ad Familiares.

(16) Ibid. Epiſt. 21. lib. 16. pag. 457.

(17) Jonſius, de Scriptor. Hiſt. Phil. pag. 203.

[D] The arguments . . . to ſupport what he admitted, were alſo proper to eſtabliſh that part of the Syſtem, which he rejected.] He admitted a Divination by dreams and in a frenzy; his hypotheſis or ſyſtem was as follows. He maintained, that the ſoul of man had her origin partly from a divine Mind, which is without us, and that that part of the ſoul, which has ſenſations, which moves and deſires, is not ſeparated from the body; but that the part, which is endowed with reaſon and underſtanding has more ſtrength, when it is leſs connected with matter (18). He grounded his ſyſtem upon an opinion of Ariſtotle, which Averroes has explained, in order to infer from it his monſtrous doctrine of an univerſal Mind, which he ſuppoſes to be the ſame in every individual perſon. After this, Cratippus collected as many inſtances as he could; he obſerved that the event had confirmed ſuch and ſuch dreams, and ſuch or ſuch predictions; then he argued after the following manner. It is impoſſible to ſee without eyes; it's true, they do not always inform us right; however if they do but once diſcover the truth to us, we may conclude hence with certainty, that we have organs to ſee with. Thus if there was no Divination at all, one could never divine; but tho' there be a Divination it does not follow from thence, that what we divine muſt always happen. Yet as we ſometimes divine the truth, it is plain, that there muſt be an art or power of divining (19). Let me beg leave to obſerve here, that Cicero did not much mind accuracy in this part of his work; I do not think it is poſſible, to repreſent a man's opinion more careleſly, than he has done that of Cratippus; I could eaſily prove it, if this was a proper place to explain the true rules of Parallels and Antitheſes. He refutes with more clearneſs Cratippus's compariſon, and the conſequences he infers from it. He ſays, that the eyes which diſcover the truth are directed by nature, and by ſenſation. But if our ſoul divines the truth by dreams or extaſies, it happens only by chance (20). Cratippus's conſequences were grounded upon this ſuppoſition, that it was not by chance, ſo many dreams and ſo many predictions happened to be true. Cicero denies this ſuppoſition, and aſſerts, that all this was owing to mere chance. He then makes uſe of an argument ad hominem. You reject, ſays he, the Divinations of the Augurs, and Auſpices, thoſe of the Aſtrologers, &c. and yet they proved ſometimes to be true; it follows therefore, either that you reject them without reaſon, or that you admit without reaſon your two ways of divining. I cannot imagine what Cratippus could have anſwered to this; but let us tranſcribe Cicero's own words; they very well deſerve it. Aſſumit Cratippus hoc modo; ſunt autem innumerabiles præſentiones non fortuitæ; at ego dico, nullam. Vide quanta ſit controverſia, jam aſſumptione non conceſſa nulla concluſio eſt. At impudentes ſumus, qui quod tam perſpicuum ſit non concedamus. Quid eſt perſpicuum? Multa vera, inquit, evadere. Quid quod multo plura falſa? Nonne ipſa varietas, quæ eſt propria fortunæ, fortunam eſſe cauſam, non naturam eſſe docet? Deinde ſi tua iſta concluſio, Cratippe, vera eſt (tecum enim mihi res eſt) nonne intelligis eadem uti poſſe & aruſpices, & fulguratores, & interpretes oſtentorum, & augures, & ſortilegos, & Chaldæos; quorum generum nullum eſt, ex quo non aliquid, ſicut prædictum ſit, evaſerit? Ergo aut ea quoque genera divinandi ſunt, quæ tu rectiſſime improbas; aut ſi ea non ſunt, non intelligo, quur hæc duo ſint, quæ relinquis. Qua ergo ratione hæc inducis, eadem illa poſſunt eſſe quæ tollis (21). I do not doubt, but the Cratippus, whom Tertullian placed in the Catalogue of thoſe who wrote Books upon Dreams (22), is the ſame with him, who is the ſubject of this article.

(18) Cicero, lib. 1. de Divinat. cap. 32.

(19) Idem, ibid.

(20) Oculi vera cernentes utuntur natura atque ſenſu. Animi ſi quando vel vaticinando, vel ſomniando vera viderunt, uſi ſunt fortuna atque caſu. Idem, ibid. lib. 2. cap. 48.

(21) Idem, ibid.

(22) Tertullian. lib. de Anima.

☞CREECH (THOMAS), an eminent Poet in the ſeventeenth Century, was ſon of Thomas Creech Gent. and born at Blandford in Dorſetſhire in the year 1659. He was educated in Grammar under Mr. Thomas Curganven of Sherbourne, to whom he inſcribes one of the Idylliums of Theocritus which he had tranſlated. He was entered a Commoner of Wadham-College in the Univerſity of Oxford [A] in Lent-Term 1675, being then ſixteen years of age, and was placed under the tuition of Mr. Robert Pitt, and afterwards of Mr. Peter Balch, Fellows of that College. September the 28th in the year following he was admitted ſcholar of that houſe (a). October 27, 1680 (b), he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts, and the ſame year was appointed by his Tutor Mr. Balch, then one of the Proctors of the Univerſity, his Quadrageſimal Collector of the Bachelors, who were to determine in the latter end of that year; at which time, ſays Mr. Wood (c), he was accounted a good Philoſopher and Poet, and a ſevere Student. June the 13th 1683 he took the degree of Maſter of Arts (d), and not long after was elected Probationer-Fellow of All-Souls-College [B]; "at which time, ſays the Writer above-"quoted (e), he gave ſingular proof of his claſſical Learning and Philoſophy before "thoſe that were his examiners." He ſoon began to diſtinguiſh himſelf by the works which he publiſhed [C]; but Father Niceron tells us in his Memoires pour ſervir à l'Hiſtoire des Hommes Illuſtres (f), that they were of no great advantage to his fortune, ſince his circumſtances were always very indifferent. He died in a very unfortunate manner; for Monſieur Bernard in his Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (g) informs us, that in the year 1700 he fell in love with a woman, who treated him with great neglect, tho' ſhe was complaiſant enough to ſeveral others. He could not digeſt this affront, and reſolved not to ſurvive it. Upon which he ſhut himſelf into his ſtudy, where he hanged himſelf about the end of June 1700, and was found three days after in that circumſtance. Mr. Giles Jacob in his Lives and Characters of all the Engliſh Poets (h) gives us a different account of this affair; for having obſerved that he was a man of excellent parts, ſound judgment, and perfectly maſter of the Greek and Latin tongues, he tells us, that he was naturally

(a) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 1104. 2d edit. London 1721.

(b) Idem, Faſti Oxon. vol. 2. col. 212.

(c) Athen. Oxon. ubi ſupra.

(d) Idem, Faſti Oxon. vol. 2. col. 221.

(e) Idem, Athen. Oxon. ubi ſupra.

(f) Vol. 31. pag. 44. edit. de Paris 1735.

(g) For September 1701.

(h) Vol. 1. pag. 39. edit. London 1723, in 8vo.

[A] Entered a Commoner of Wadham-College in the Univerſity of Oxford.] Mr. Wood (1), as we have obſerved in the text of this article, tells us, that this Father was a Gentleman; but Mr. Giles Jacob in his Lives and Characters of all the Engliſh Poets (2) aſſerts, that his parents circumſtances not being ſufficient to ſupport him in a liberal education, his diſpoſition and capacity for learning raiſed him a patron in Colonel Strangeways, whoſe generoſity ſupplied that defect; and that this Gentleman ſent him to Wadham-College, where he was admitted a ſcholar on the foundation.

(1) Athen. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 1104. 2d edit. London 1721.

(2) Vol. 1. pag. 39. edit. London 1723, in 8vo.

[B] And not long after was elected Probationer-Fellow of All-Souls College.] Mr. Jacob obſerves (3), that the great reputation of his Tranſlation of Lucretius recommended him to that College, where he was elected Fellow.

(3) Ubi ſupra.

[C] He ſoon began to diſtinguiſh himſelf by the works, which he publiſhed.] The Catalogue of them is as follows: I. A Tranſlation of Titus Lucretius Carus, the Epicurean Philoſopher, de Naturâ Rerum, printed at Oxford 1682 in 8vo, and recommended by a Latin Diſtich of Dr. Edward Bernard, Savilian Profeſſor of Aſtronomy in that Univerſity, and by a copy of Engliſh Verſes of Mr. Thomas Brown of Chriſt-Church. This Tranſlation was reprinted at Oxford 1683 in 8vo, and was uſhered into the world by the recommendatory Poems of Mr. Dryden, Mr. Thomas Flatman, Mr. Nahum Tate, Mrs. Behn, Mr. Thomas Otway, John Evelyn Eſq; Edmund Waller Eſq; Mr. Thomas Adams, and Mr. Richard Duke. Mr. Dryden in the Preface to the Miſcellany Poems publiſhed by him ſpeaks of this Tranſlation in terms of the higheſt approbation, and ſtiles Mr. Creech the ingenious and learned Tranſlator of Lucretius. A certain Writer † treats Mr. Creech with great ſeverity on account of this Tranſlation; for having obſerved, that the only Book now in being, which from one end to the other is an open defenſe of Atheiſm, is that of Lucretius, he tells us, that this "moſt impious Book in Charles II's reign was with "infinite pains turned into Engliſh Verſe, that the "ſmoothneſs and ſweetneſs of the metre might ſupply "what was wanting in the argument; that the ele-"gance of the expreſſion, the melodious harmony of "numbers, and all thoſe other bewitching beauties, "which attend good Poetry, might inſenſibly inſtil "the poiſon into the minds of unthinking people, e-"ſpecially of the youth, whoſe imagination is gene-"rally too ſtrong for their reaſon, and their fancy too "powerful for their judgment. And this celebrated "Tranſlation was not only made by an Oxford Scho-"lar, (who was thereupon preferred) but it was li-"cenſed by the Univerſity of Oxford, where he was "look'd on as a raw lad, that had not read the Lu-"cretius of Creech, who died, as he lived, like a true "Atheiſt; but being a High-Church Prieſt, his mur-"dering himſelf was not made to paſs for a judg-"ment." II. Titi Lucretii Cari de Rerum Naturâ Libri ſex, quibus Interpretationem & Notas addidit Thomas Creech. Oxon 1695 in 8vo. It was dedicated to Mr. Chriſtopher Coddrington, Fellow of All-Souls-College, and afterwards Governor of Barbadoes Another Edition priori multo auctior was publiſhed at London 1717 in 8vo. III. In a collection of Miſcellany Poems, containing a new Tranſlation of Virgil's Eclogues, Ovid's Love-Elegies, Odes of Horace, and other Authors; printed at London 1684 in 8vo, Mr. Creech has theſe Tranſlations from Latin into Engliſh; 1. The ſecond Elegy of Ovid's firſt Book of Elegies. 2. The 6th, 7th, 8th, and 12th Elegies of Ovid's ſecond Book of Elegies. 3. The ſecond and third Eclogue of Virgil's Eclogues. 4. The Story of Lucretia out of Ovid de Faſtis, Book II. IV. The Odes, Satyrs, and Epiſtles of Horace tranſlated into Engliſh. London 1684 in 8vo, dedicated to John Dryden Eſq;. This Tranſlation was reprinted likewiſe at London 1718 in 24° under the following title: The Works of Horace in Latin and Engliſh in two volumes. The Engliſh Verſion by Mr. Creech. The fifth Edition. V. A Tranſlation of the Idylliums of Theocritus, with Rapin's Diſcourſe of Paſtorals. Oxford 1684 in 8vo, dedicated to Mr. Arthur Charlet of Trinity College Oxon. VI. The Life of Pelopidas, printed among the Lives of illuſtrious Men, written in Latin by Cornelius Nepos, and tranſlated into Engliſh by ſeveral hands, and printed at Oxford in 8vo. VII. A Tranſlation of the XIIIth Satyr of Juvenal, with Notes, printed in the Engliſh Tranſlation of the Satyrs of Juvenal and Perſius, publiſhed at London 1693 in fol. VIII. A Tranſlation into Engliſh of the Verſes prefixed to Mr. Quintinie's Compleat Gardiner, printed with the Tranſlation of that Book at London 1690 in fol. IX. A Tranſlation of the Lives of Solon and Pelopidas, publiſhed in the firſt and ſecond Volume of Plutarch's Lives tranſlated from the Greek by ſeveral hands, and printed at London 1683 and 1684 in 8vo. X. Laconic Apotheghms; or remarkable Sayings of the Spartans, tranſlated from the Greek of Plutarch, and printed in the firſt Volume of Plutarch's Morals tranſlated by ſeveral hands. London 1684 in 8vo; and a Tranſlation of A Diſcourſe concerning Socrates his Dæmon, and the two firſt Books of the Sympoſiacs, tranſlated from the Greek, and publiſhed in the ſecond Volume of Plutarch's Morals. XI. A Tranſlation of Manilius's Aſtronomicon. A Tranſlation of Plutarch's Life of Cleomenes. H.

† Nation Vindicated from the Aſperſions caſt on it in a late Pamphlet intiled, A Repreſentation of the preſent State of Religion, &c. Part 2. pag. 38, 39. edit. London 1712, in 8vo.

naturally of a moroſe temper, and too apt to deſpiſe the underſtandings and performances of others. "This made him leſs eſteemed than his great merit deſerved; and his reſentments on this account frequently engaged him in thoſe heats and diſputes, which in the end proved fatal to him. He was preſented by the College to the Living of Welling in Hertfordſhire; but before he left Oxford (the cauſe unknown) he unfortunately made away with himſelf in the year 1701." There appears to be an inconſiſtency in this paſſage; for Mr. Jacob's aſſertion, that the heats and diſputes, which our Author's moroſe temper and too great a contempt of others engaged him in, proved in the end fatal to him, can hardly be reconciled with his obſerving afterwards, that the cauſe of his death was unknown. The Abbé du Bos (i) ſtiles him the beſt Commentator upon Lucretius, but obſerves that Mr. Creech is miſtaken in his life of that Poet, in aſſerting that he died the ſame day, on which Virgil was born. Mr. Dryden ſtiles him a learned and judicious Writer (k).

(i) Reflexions Critiques ſur la Poeſie & ſur la Peinture, tom. 2. pag. 125. edit. Utrecht 1732, in 12mo.

(k) Dedication of his Tranſlation of Virgil's Æneid. See Virgil's works tranſlated into Engliſh Verſe by Mr. Dryden, vol. 2. pag. 424. edit. London 1730, in 8vo.

CREMONIN (CÆSAR) Profeſſor of Philoſophy at Ferrara for ſeventeen years, and for forty years at Padua [A], was born at Cento in the Modeneſe (a) in the year 1550. He gained ſo great a reputation, that Kings and Princes would have his picture. His Lectures were exceedingly eſteemed, but his printed works did not ſell very well [B]. He has been reckoned a Free-thinker, who did not believe the immortality of the ſoul [C], and (a) This is the opinion of Imperialis, and of Craſſo; but Jerom Baruffaldus refutes it, and ſays, that Cento is in the Ferrareſe.

[A] He was a Profeſſor of Philoſophy . . . . . for forty years at Padua.] He had been firſt Collegue to the celebrated Picolomini, who was firſt Profeſſor of Philoſophy at Padua, and after that great man's death, he was preferred to the ſame poſt. His method was this: He firſt explained Ariſtotle's doctrine, and then cleared up the difficulties either according to his own opinion, or according to the expoſition of Alexander Aphrodiſæus. He hardly ever mentioned the diſputes of the Schoolmen, he openly deſpiſed the opinions of the moderns, and laboured only to revive thoſe of the Ancients. He delivered his Lectures ſo agreeably and with ſuch a gravity, that it would be difficult to find any Profeſſor like him in that reſpect. His private converſations with his ſcholars were not very remarkable: his affability and politeneſs appeared more in them than his learning (1). I do not think he deſerves to be blamed for it: for after all, our mind cannot always be bent, and the more a man labours for his public Lectures, the more does he want ſome relaxation in his private converſations; they would become extremely fatiguing, if a man was obliged to be cloſely intent upon the diſcuſſing of ſome difficult point. One muſt then be at liberty to ramble from one thing to another, and to touch but ſlightly upon ſuch ſubjects, as are ſtarted in the courſe of the converſation. This is the moſt agreeable and moſt honeſt entertainment, which a Doctor can procure himſelf, whoſe function is to teach publickly.

(1) Ex Joanne Imperiali, in Muſæo Hiſtor. pag. 173.

[B] His Lectures were exceedingly eſteemed, but his printed works did not ſell very well.] This wants to be explained, otherwiſe I ſhould not give a true repreſentation of my Author's meaning. The works which Cremonin cauſed to be printed, ſays he, grow mouldy in the Bookſeller's ſhops, but what he dictated to his ſcholars, whilſt he was a walking, according to the cuſtom of the Peripateticks, is ſo excellent, that it is impoſſible to wiſh for any thing more agreeable or more perfect, for diſcovering the myſteries of Philoſophy. Illud nobis mirandum, quod elaborata ipſius opera typis excuſa, in officinis hactenus evileſcunt: ſcripta vero peripatetico more diſcipulis ab ipſo deambulante dictata ſic excellunt, ut nihil ad arcana philoſophiæ detegenda perfectius ac ſuavius deſiderari poſſit (2). That we ſhould more admire a Sermon or a Lecture, when we hear it delivered, than when we read it (3), is nothing extraordinary, nay it is even very common. That a man, who ſpeaks in public, ſhould better ſucceed, when he gives himſelf up to the ſtrength and fire of his imagination, than when he writes his diſcourſe down, and meditates with all poſſible care what he has to ſay, is not ſo common, and yet it is not very extraordinary neither: that an Author's works ſhould be more eſteemed when they are handed about in manuſcript, than after they are printed, is a thing which happens frequently (4): but here follows ſomething more extraordinary. What Cremonin dictated to his ſcholar, was abſolutely perfect, and what he publiſhed was expoſed to the utmoſt contempt. This is what Imperialis aſſerts. This may be accounted for by two ſuppoſitions: firſt, by ſaying that Cremonin was one of thoſe Authors who ſpoil their own works, by reviſing and correcting them, or whoſe whole ſtrength conſiſts only in the firſt ſallies of their imagination, which ſlackens and grows dull, when they follow cloſely the ſeries of a profound meditation. The ſecond ſuppoſition is, that Imperialis did not well expreſs himſelf, and that in order to give us a true account of the matter, he ſhould have told us, that Cremonin's works, which were thought to be excellent, as long as there were but manuſcript copies of them, loſt all their reputation as ſoon as they were printed. This laſt ſuppoſition ſeems more probable to me than the former; for if the miſchief had been owing to Cremonin's ſpoiling his works, when he prepared them for the preſs, it might have been remedied by means of the manuſcript copies, which were in his diſciples hands. Some officious friend would have reſtored him to his reputation, by publiſhing his admirable writings, as he had dictated them.

(2) Imperialis, in Muſæo Hiſtorico, pag. 174.

(3) See above, Rem. [O] of the Art. CASSIUS SEVERUS (TITUS), and Remark [K] of the article HORTENSIUS (Quintus), and remark [C] of the article NARNI.

(4) Mr. Varillas is an inſtance of this.

[C] He has been reckoned a Free-thinker, who did not believe the immortality of the ſoul.] Several Authors aſſert, that it was for this reaſon he would have his epitaph be Cæſar Cremoninus hic totus jacet. i. e. "Here lieth Cæſar Cremonin entire." If there were no other arguments but this, it would not be an eaſy matter to prove him a Free-thinker; for the celebrated Profeſſor Giſbert Voetius having alledged that argument, retracted it afterwards, becauſe the ſame friend, who had furniſhed him with it, let him know that it was grounded upon a falſe ſtory. Antehac, ſays he (5), ab eruditiſs. Viro & amico mihi communicatum erat, Epitaphium quod dicebatur ſibi feciſſe. Totus Cremoninus hic jacet. Sed poſtea ab eodem aliunde aliter informato monitus revocavi illud in prima hujus diſputationis editione. For want of this proof, he alledges another, which has not much weight in it; it is as follows. Fortunius Licetas relates, that having undertook to refute Alexander Aphrodiſæus's opinion concerning the nature of the ſoul, he was not diſſuaded from purſuing this commendable deſign by Cremonin his Collegue, and by Lewis Albertus Profeſſor of Divinity, who threatned him, that they would write againſt his book. They were both, ſays he (6), Frederic Pendaſius's diſciples, and very much addicted to Alexander Aphrodiſæus's opinion. It is plain, that ſince a Profeſſor of Divinity at Padua threatened to write in ſupport of that opinion, he could not pretend that Alexander Aphrodiſæus maintained the mortality of the ſoul. Common ſenſe will tell you, that neither in Italy nor in any other place, a Divine would not dare to write in favour of an opinion, which he ſhould acknowledge to be inconſiſtent with the ſoul's immortality: if therefore Cremonin held no other opinion but that which the Divinity-Profeſſor boaſted he would maintain, he was ſufficiently orthodox with regard to the immortality of the ſoul. We want therefore other proofs of his having been a Free-thinker; as I do not aſſert any thing upon my own authority, I am not obliged to find them.

(5) Voet. Selectorum Diſputat. Theol. vol. 1. pag. 206.

(6) Ambo Doctrinæ Aphrodiſæi cultores non ſemel dixerint, ſe Volumini meo contradicturos, qui nulla contradictione relicta diem obeuntes fato ceſſerint. Fortun. Licetas, Hiſt. proprior, Operum. cap. 16. apud Voetium, ibid.

Here follows a paſſage, which is curious enough: I have extracted it from one of Balſac's Letters, in which he recommends one Monſieur Drouet to Monſieur and whoſe opinions upon other ſubjects were far from agreeing with the Chriſtian Religion [D]. He died of the Plague in 1630, and was buried in the Convent of St. Juſtina, to which he had left his whole eſtate. He was extremely civil to every body, he knew very well how to affect an obliging countenance; he was even too ſcrupulouſly addicted to the ceremonies or offices of civility; but in reality he never was any perſon's friend faithfully and with ſincerity. He took a delight in ſetting his ſcholars at variance; he affected to be impartial amongſt their ſeveral factions; he could with his utmoſt eaſe hide his ſentiments under an artful kindneſs, whilſt at the ſame time he laboured with all his heart, to keep up the quarrels, eſpecially to the detriment of thoſe ſcholars, whom he knew not to be of his ſide (b). There is in the firſt volume of the Mercurius Jeſuitarum (c) the Oration which he delivered in 1591 before the Senate of Venice in favour of the Univerſity of Padua againſt the Jeſuits. His titles were unknown to one of Count Ullefeld's Hiſtorians [E]. Father Rapin, who makes him flouriſh in the fifteenth Century (d) in the Univerſity of Piſa (e), is very much miſtaken.

(b) Taken from Imperialis, in Muſæo Hiſtorico, pag. 173.

(c) Pag. 490.

(d) Rapin, Compar. de Platon & d'Ariſtote, pag. m. 399.

(e) Rapin, Reflexions ſur la Philoſoph. pag. m. 360.

fieur de Lorme, the King's Phyſician. If you open to him the myſteries of the Arabians (he is perfectly well acquainted with thoſe of the Greeks) he will hear you, neither like a profane perſon, nor like one newly initiated. His name is written in a large character in the Records of the Univerſity of Padua. When he came from the great Cremonin's School he was almoſt as great and as learned as he. Yet he was not a blind follower of his late maſter: I can aſſure you that he admits only his lawful ſentiments, and never was a believer more perſuaded, than he is, that the God of Abraham, of Iſaac, and of Jacob is not the God of the dead, but of the living, &c (7).

(7) Balzac, Lettres choiſies, pag. 35. of the Dutch edition.

Lorenzo Craſſo's work, which I had not by me, when this article was printed the firſt time, is ſince come into my hands. I find there the confirmation of a conjecture, which I then thought of; namely, that Cremonin did not maintain abſolutely the Mortality of the Soul, but only in caſe Ariſtotle's ſentiment was to be followed. This queſtion de facto, which is after all of very little importance, has been a long while controverted in the Schools of Italy, and yet there was no reaſonable ground to ſtyle thoſe Hereticks, who aſſerted, that Ariſtotle did not hold the Soul's Immortality. Such was Cremonin's reſtriction. E veleno d'animo contagioſo l'inſegnare che l'anima dell' huomo ſoggetto alla corruzione non differiſca nella morte dell' huomo da quella de' bruti, com' egli faceva, ancorche ſagacemente aſſeriſſe ſoſtener ciò ſolamente in ſentenza d'Ariſtotile (8). Moreri has omitted this proviſo mentioned by Lorenzo Craſſo, which is a very capital omiſſion on this occaſion. Obſerve, that this is almoſt the only circumſtance, which Lorenzo has added to Imperialis's account. He is ſo much the more to be commended for this addition, that he was perſuaded, Cremonin's reſtriction was only an artifice. He aſſerts that he had no Religion at all, and adds, that ſome perſons ſuſpected he had inſpired ſeveral of his moſt truſty diſciples with the ſame wicked opinions. Fù ben compoſto di corpo, auſtero di volto, brieve di ſonno, ambizioſo di ſaper molto, finto di coſtumi, LONTANO D'OGNI RELIGIONE, havendo ſecondo il parer d'alcuni fatto non pochi allievi confidenti di queſta prava ſua dottrina (9).

(8) Lorenzo Craſſo, Elogii d'huomini letterati, tom. 2. pag. 124.

(9) Idem, ibid. pag. 125.

[D] . . . His opinions upon other ſubjects were far from agreeing with the Chriſtian Religion.] It was found that his explications concerning Fate, the world and the minds that preſide over the celeſtial motions, were erroneous, and that he yet maintained them more zealouſly, than a Chriſtian ought to have done (10).

(10) Imperialis, in Muſæo Hiſtorico, pag. 174.

[E] . . . His titles were unknown to one of Count Ullefeld's Hiſtorians.] This Hiſtorian's name is Rouſſeau de la Vallette: his hiſtorical Novel, entitled Le Comte d'Ullefeld, was printed at Paris in the year 1677. We read there, that this Count having deſerved, by the follies of his youth, to be expelled his father's houſe, met with Signor Cremonini a noble Venetian at Padua, engaged in a very ſtrict friendſhip with him, and was ſo much improved by his converſations during the ſpace of one year, that he has often confeſſed, he was indebted to him for the beſt part of his learning.

CRESPET (PETER) a Celeſtine Monk, and Prior of the Convent of that Order at Soiſſons, publiſhed in the ſixteenth Century ſeveral works [A], by which it appeared, that he read a great deal, and made a vaſt number of Compilations, both from Eccleſiaſtical and Prophane Authors. You may ſee in Moreri, that he was a native of Sens (a), and died in 1595. But it ſhould not have been added, that he lived at a time when Polite Literature was very much neglected.

(a) He ſtyles himſelf in the title of his books A Celeſtine of Paris; but that may ſignify, that it was at Paris he entered into the Order of the Celeſtines.

[A] He publiſhed ſeveral works.] His Jardin de Plaiſir & de Recreation ſpirituelle, (Garden of ſpiritual Pleaſure and Recreation) was printed at Paris in two volumes 8vo, in the year 1602. It is an edition which he had reviſed and corrected. It is divided into five parts, which contain ſeveral diſcourſes, concerning the nature, origin, conditions, effects, and heinouſneſs of the ſins, which ought to be ſhut out or extirpated out of the garden of the ſoul; as alſo concerning the nature, admirable effects, and excellencies of the virtues, which ought to be planted and happily cultivated and improved there. He added to it an encomiaſtical Treatiſe concerning the excellencies of thoſe virtues, namely, chaſtity, virginity and continence, though he had already ſufficiently treated of theſe noble virtues in the ſix Books concerning Continence, which he had tranſlated from the Latin of Monſieur d'Eſpenſe in the preliminary Epiſtle of theſe Books, and again in his myſtical Granade, Treatiſe the 1ſt, Sect. 9 (1). The Dedication of the firſt volume of this Garden is dated October the firſt 1586, and that of the ſecond volume, May the firſt, 1587. He quotes now and then in this Book his diſcourſes concerning the origin, excellency and immortality of the ſoul. He alſo wrote ſome diſcourſes upon the hatred of Satan, which have often been cited by Martin del Rio in his Diſquiſitiones Magicæ. He publiſhed beſides the Latin Summa eccleſiaſticæ Diſciplinæ & totius Juris Canonici; i. e. "An Abridgment of the "Church Diſcipline, and of the whole Canon-Law."

(1) Creſpet, Jardin de Plaiſir & de Recréation ſpirituelle, at the end of the 2d vol. pag. m. 451.

CRESPIN (JOHN) in Latin Creſpinus, a famous Printer at Geneva, whither he retired for the ſake of his Religion in the year 1548 (a), was of the Province of Artois (b). He applied himſelf with great ſkill and diligence to the printing of ſeveral books (c), and eſpecially of a Greek and Latin Lexicon [A], and of a Martyrology of the Proteſtants (d). He died of the Plague at Geneva in the year 1572 (e). Euſtace Vignon, his ſon-in-law,

(a) Melchior Adam, in Vita Theod. Bezæ, pag. 205.
(b) Beza, Reſponſ. ad Balduinum, pag. 316. tom. 2. Oper.
(c) Idem, ibid.

(d) Melchior Adam, in Vita Th. Bezæ, pag. 205. obſerves that this Martyrology was firſt printed in Latin in 8vo, in the year 1556, and ſince in 4to in 1560.

[A] He applied himſelf . . . to the printing . . . of a Greek and Latin Lexicon.] It was not in the year 1595, as Valerius Andreas (1), and Konig (2) aſſert, for he died in 1572. Several Bibliographers ſtumble upon this ſtone, they aſcribe to a man even the editions of his Book, which have been printed after his death.

(1) Valer. Andreas, Bibliotb. Belg. pag. 488.
(2) Konig, Bibliotb. pag. 223.

(e) Beza, Ep. 64. pag. 278. tom. 3. Operum.

in-law, continued to ſupport the reputation of his Printing-houſe (f). Valerius Andreas Deſſelius relates, that Creſpin, the ſon of a Civilian of Arras, ſtudied five years at Lovain, and that there was a great friendſhip between him and Francis Baudouin, which continued very long, and that he wrote Notes upon the Inſtitutes, and a Treatiſe concerning Apoſtates [B] &c. (g). He does not mention a book, which has been often reprinted, and which Baudouin very much deſpiſed [C]. You will find in Moreri ſome circumſtances which I would not repeat, and ſome errors, of which I ſhall take notice below [D]. I ſhall alſo mention thoſe, which have been committed in the Hiſtory of Printing [E]. Conrad Badius printed ſome time for our Creſpin [F].

(f) Idem, Præfat. tom. 2. Operum.

(g) Valer. And. Deſſelius, Bibl. Belgica, pag. 417.

[B] . . . . A Treatiſe concerning Apoſtates.] It is a Commentary upon the third Law of the Code De Apoſtatis. He wrote it in favour of Calvin againſt Baudouin, and to oppoſe the latter's Commentary upon the Laws de famoſis Libellis (concerning Libels.) Baudouin complains bitterly of this, and inveighs againſt this old friend, with whom he had ſtudied (3).

(3) See his 2d Anſwer to John Calvin, pag. 73, & ſeq. edit. Colon. 1562.

[C] He does not mention a Book, which has been often reprinted, and which Baudouin very much deſpiſes.] Creſpin diſplays a great zeal in it againſt Popery, and for the improvement of the Reformed. It is intitled, L'Eſtat de l'Egliſe, avec le Diſcours des tems depuis les Apoſtres juſques au préſent. i. e. "The State of the "Church, with an hiſtorical Account from the time "of the Apoſtles to this preſent time." I have quoted it ſometimes. The edition I make uſe of is that of Bergen-ap-Zoom 1605, 4to, reviſed and augmented by John Taffin, Miniſter of the French Church at Fleſſingen. The outrageons judgment, which Baudouin paſſed upon this work of Creſpin, is as follows. Si qua unquam fuit putida & inſulſa farrago vanitatis atque falſitatis, ſi qua impura ſentina fabularum, atque ἀνιστορησίας, illam profecto eſſe altiſſima voce profiteri cogimur (4). i. e. "If there be any diſagreeable and inſipid medley of idle and falſe ſtories, if any common ſink of fables and untruths, we are really forced to cry aloud, that it is this Book." Obſerve, that Baudouin ſpoke there as an enemy of the Author.

(4) Reſponſio pro Balduino ad Calvinum & Bezam, folio 98.

[D] You will find . . . ſome errors in Moreri of which I ſhall take notice below.] I. Creſpin did not retire to Geneva, with a deſign, to publiſh his works there, but to enjoy liberty of conſcience. It is true that he and Beza thought immediately of aſſociating together, in order to eſtabliſh a printing-houſe (5), and that Beza having met with another employment, Creſpin alone carried on the undertaking. But this does not excuſe Moreri; for his words do not in the leaſt acquaint the reader, with what he ought to have told them; they plainly ſignify, that Creſpin went to Geneva, in order to ſeek for ſome Bookſellers, who would print the Books, which he had either wrote himſelf, or collected together. II. It is not true, that before he went to Geneva, he had already publiſhed Heſiod; Nomenclatura actionum; Inſtitutionum Imperialium Lib. IV, &c. III. Nor that his poverty forced him to go to ſervice at Geneva in order to get a livelihood. IV. Nor that Balduin acquaints us with this. If we would know, whence all theſe blunders ſprung, we need only to look upon the following words of Valerius Andreas. Vixit dein in Galliis, profeſſione typographicæ ac literariæ exercitationis clarus; uſus annos multos amico Franc. Balduino, quocum a pueris educatus fuerat. Criſpinum tamen poſtea omnis humanitatis non minus quam juris oblitum fuiſſe, ex quo factus eſt ſervus Allobrox, ſcribit Bald. in Reſponſione ſua ad Joan. Calvinum, p. 89 (6). This is what made Moreri ſay, that Criſpin publiſhed ſome Books, before he went to Geneva, and that afterwards he was a ſervant. He did not in the leaſt underſtand the ſenſe of Baudouin's words. They ſignify, that Creſpin forgot all the duties of humanity and juſtice, ſince he ſubmitted to Calvin's yoke. I wonder Moreri did not think that Baudouin's meaning was, that Creſpin loſt all his knowledge in the Law ſince his apoſtaſy. There would have been ſomething wonderful in this; nor would it have been the firſt time, that it had been aſſerted, that a man's changing his Religion, made him loſe all his wit, ſtyle, learning &c.

(5) Melch. Adam, in Vita Bezæ, pag. 205.

(6) Val. Andreas, Bibl. Belg. pag. 487.

[E] I ſhall mention the errors that have been committed in the Hiſtory of Printing.] It is there ſaid (7), I. That John Creſpin having ſtudied five years at Lovain, came afterwards to France, to ſtudy the Law there with Francis Balduin, his intimate friend, under Gabriel Mudé and other Doctors of the Law. II. That he became there very famous by his ſkill in the Art of printing. III. That he printed there a very correct edition of the New Teſtament in Greek, in 1564, and Homer and Theocritus in 1570. IV. That he was obliged to retire to Geneva for the ſake of his Religion, and that he wrote and printed in that city Lexicon Criſpini, in folio, and in quarto. V. That Caſaubon was one of his Authors. Several errors have been here occaſioned by a miſtake of Valerius Andreas. He was in the wrong to ſay, that Creſpin gained a reputation in France by his ſkill in printing; for he did not apply himſelf to that trade but after he had left France. But other errors have been built upon this bad foundation of Valerius Andreas. It is ſuppoſed that Creſpin did not retire to Geneva till after the year 1570; it is aſſerted, that before that time he had printed ſeveral Books in France, and that his Lexicon was printed after the year 1570. All this falls to the ground, as ſoon as this truth is eſtabliſhed, namely, that he retired to Geneva about the year 1548, and that his Lexicon Græco-Latinum was publiſhed before the year 1562. Tu . . . . oblitus te aliquando Lugduni fuiſſe Sebaſtiani Gryphii mancipium, bono & honeſto, id eſt tui penitus diſſimili viro (Criſpino) vitio vertis, quod Lexicon Græco-Latinum, quale ante editum fuit, maximo tum ſumptu, tum labore, in publicum emiſerit (8). i. e. "You . . . have forgot that you was a ſervant to Sebaſtian Gryphius at Lyons, and you find fault with "that good and honeſt man, that is, who differs in"tirely from you, becauſe he publiſhed with a great "deal of coſt and pains a Greek and Latin Lexicon, "as it had been printed before." Thus Beza ſpoke in his anſwer to a work, which Baudouin had publiſhed in the year 1562. The other errors in the Hiſtory of Printing are ſuch, as are not owing to Valerius Andreas. He had ſaid as plainly as could be wiſhed, that Creſpin heard the Lectures of Gabriel Mudeus and of the other Profeſſors, at Lovain, and not in France (9). He does not ſay, that Creſpin went into France with Baudouin. It muſt be remembred, that Caſaubon was not yet fourteen years old, when John Creſpin died. How then could he be one of his Authors? This error is probably owing to this: Theocritus was reprinted after Creſpin's death, with Caſaubon's Notes (10), and Creſpin's Preface. This might make ſome perſons think, that it was he, who publiſhed this new Edition.

(7) La Caille, Hiſtoire de l'Imprimirie, pag. 148.

(8) Beza, Reſponſ. ad Franciſc. Balduin. pag. 216. tom. 2. Operum.

(9) Lovanium miſſus Gabrielem Mudæum, alioſque Anteceſſores quinquennium totum ANTE aditam Galliam audivit. Valer. Andr. Bibl. Belg. pag. 487.

[F] Conrad Badius printed ſome time for our Creſpin.] I have ſeen at the end of a little Book in 8vo theſe words. A Geneve, de l'Imprimerie de Jean Creſpin, par Conrad Badius, 1550. i. e. "At Geneva, from "John Creſpin's printing-houſe, by Conrad Badius, "1555." This little Book is a work of Calvin's, intitled, Traité très excellent de la vie Chreſtienne. i. e. "A very excellent Treatiſe of a Chriſtian Life."

(10) Theſe Notes are under the name of Iſaacus Hortus bonus: He made them at the requeſt of Euſtace Vignon, who reprinted Theocritus. They are dated in Auguſt 1584.

CRISPUS (JOHN BAPTIST) a good Divine and a good Poet lived in the ſeventeenth Century; he was born at Gallipoli in the Kingdom of Naples. His chief work is that which was printed at Rome in the year 1594 in folio, De Ethnicis Philoſophis Philoſophis caute legendis [A]. i. e. "That we muſt take care how we read the Heathen Philoſophers." See Toppi's Biblioteca Napoletana.

[A] His chief work is that . . . . De Ethnicis Philoſophis caute legendis.] Here follows, what Poſſevin ſaid of it. Vir vere Philoſophus, qui nimirum acri, & quali Chriſtianum decet judicio, Philoſophiam expendit, librum ſic grandem de Philoſophis caute legendis ita ſcripſit, ut quæcunque hæreſes a philoſophis minus cautis manârunt, eæ indicatæ ſunt, ut ſolidis rationibus confutatæ, ex divinis Scripturis & Patribus, ex Synodorum decretis, ex Scholaſticis, quibus cautionibus præmuniti Philoſophi, ſive publici Profeſſores inoffenſo pede curriculum hoc decurrent, tantamque ancillam recta adducent ad arcem (1). i. e. "This true Philoſopher, who with ſagacity and "with ſuch a judgment, as becomes a Chriſtian, explains Philoſophy, wrote a pretty large Book, to "ſhew, that the Philoſophers muſt be cautiouſly read; "he points out all the hereſies, which ſprung from "the imprudent reading of Philoſophers; he refutes "theſe hereſies, by the holy Scripture, the Fathers, "the Decrees of the Councils, and the Schoolmen, "that the Philoſophers or public Profeſſors being thus "forewarned, might go on in their courſes without "danger, and conduct ſo great an hand-maid to the "deſigned end." Father Merſenne has inſerted a long paſſage from Criſpus's work in one of his Books (2). It is a paſſage in which he confutes the myſtical Divines. The reaſon, why Father Merſenne tranſcribed that paſſage deſerves to be known. It is, ſays he, becauſe this Author, whoſe work is pretty ſcarce, has very elegantly confuted that ſort of Divines. Quod attinet ad ſecretiores illos Theologos, quos Venetus tam importune & tam frequenter inculcat, bene mihi philoſophatus videtur Joannes Baptiſta Criſpus, cujus hic ideo integram ſententiam libet attexere, præſertim cum Auctor ille rariſſimus eſſe videatur, & elegantiſſimo ſtylo ſecretiores illos Theologos configat (3).

(1) Poſſev. Apparat. Sacr. tom. 2. pag. 117.

(2) At the end of his Obſervationes & Emendationes in Problemata Georgii Venti in Geneſin.

(3) Marinus Merſennus, in Problem. Veneti, pag. 428.

Criſpus's other works are two Orations concerning the War againſt the Turcs, printed at Rome in 1594, in 4to. De Medici Laudibus, Oratio ad cives ſuos Gallipolitanos, printed at Rome in 1591, in 4to. The Life of Sannazarius, printed at Rome in the year 1583, and reprinted at Naples in the year 1633, in 8vo. A Draught of the city of Gallipoli, dedicated to Flaminio Caraccioli January the 11t, 1591 (4).

(4) Taken from Toppi, Biblioteca Napoletana.

(a) Κριτίας μὲν γὰρ τῶν ἐν τῇ ὀλιγαρχίᾳ πάντων πλοκτιώτατός τε καὶ βιαιότατος ἐγένετο. Critias enim, quum ad paucos perveniſſet civitatis ſtatus, unus ex illis factus longe omnium avariſſimus ac violentiſſimus fuit. Xenophon, de Factis & Dictis Socratis, lib. 1. pag. m. 415. See the Remark [A].

CRITIAS, one of Socrates's ſcholars, was ſo far from improving by the Lectures of that Philoſopher, that he became a very wicked man. He ſhewed it chiefly when Athens, his native city, being ſubdued by Lyſander, the General of the Lacedæmonians, was made ſubject to thirty Tyrants. He was one of the thirty, and the moſt unjuſt of them all (a). He not only deſigned to render the city of Athens extremely miſerable, but to turn all Attica into a deſart [A]. It is ſaid that his injuſtices did Socrates a prejudice in the opinion of the people [B]; their reſentment againſt the ſcholar reflecting on the maſter: but Xenophon has refuted thoſe who maliciouſly imputed to Socrates the licentious lives of ſome of his diſciples [C]. It is certain that Critias did not love Socrates, and [A] He deſigned . . . to make a deſart of all Attica.] His malice againſt his native country appeared from the time when he retired into Theſſaly, where he ceaſed not to ſpeak ill of the Athenians. He repreſented them as a people who had the moſt wicked cuſtoms in the world (1). Being returned to Athens, he there did infinite ſervice to the Lacedæmonians, he perſuaded Lyſander to demoliſh the walls, and he laid a deſign in concert with them to diſpeople all Attica, and turn it into paſture ground. Ἐπὶ λαμπρῶς μὲν ἐλακώνισε, πρῶτόν τε τὰ ἱερὰ, καθῄρει δὲ διὰ Λυσάνδρου τὰ τείχη, ὃς δ' ἤλαυνε τῶν Ἀθηναίων τὸ σῆναί σοι τῆς Ἑλλάδος ἀφῃρεῖτο, πόλεμον Λακωνικὸν εἰπὼν ἐς πάντας, εἴ τις τὸν Ἀθηναίων φεύγοντα δέξαιτο, ἀμότητί τε καὶ μιαιφονίᾳ τοὺς τριάκοντα ὑπερβάλλετο, βουλεύματός τε αὐτοῦ τοῖς Λακεδαιμονίοις ξυνελάμβανεν ὡς μηλόβοτος ἡ Ἀττικὴ ἀποφαντεῖν τῆς τῶν ἀνθρώπων ἀγέλης ἐκκενωθεῖσα, κάκιστος ἀνθρώπων ἐμοί γε φαίνεται ξυμπάντων, ὧν ἐπὶ κακίᾳ ὄνομα. Cum ille aperte Lacedæmoniis faveret, proderet ſacra, per Lyſandrum mœnia deſtrueret, quoſque Athenienſes expulerat quominus in ulla Græciæ parte conſiſterent, prohiberet, Laconicum edicens bellum omnibus imminere ſi quis exulantem Athenienſem exciperet, truculentia & cædibus triginta tyrannos ſuperaret, deteſtabileque conſilium cum Lacedæmoniis iniret ut Attica pecorum nutrix efficeretur, virorum armentis ſpoliata, his de cauſis mihi omnium hominum peſſimus fuiſſe videtur qui ob ſcelera fuerunt famoſi (2). i, e. "Since "he openly favoured the Lacedæmonians, revealed "the ſacred myſteries, razed the walls by Lyſander, "and would not ſuffer the Athenians whom he had "baniſhed to remain in any part of Greece, threatening all with the arms of Lacedæmon, if any one "ſhould receive an Athenian exile; ſince he exceeded "the whole thirty in cruelty and murders, and concerted a deteſtable deſign with the Lacedæmonians, "to diſpeople Attica and turn it into paſture for cattle; for theſe reaſons I take him to have been the "moſt wicked of all men who have been famed for "villany." He was the cauſe of the death of Alcibiades; for Lyſander did not engage the Perſians to make away with him, till he had been aſſured by Critias and the other Tyrants of Athens, that the order which he had eſtabliſhed in that City would ſoon be overturned, if that man was not diſpatched. Critias cæterique tyranni Athenienſium certos homines ad Lyſandrum in Aſiam miſerunt qui eum certiorem facerent niſi Alcibiadem ſuſtuliſſet, nihil earum rerum fore ratum quas ipſe Athenis conſtituiſſet. Quare ſi ſuas res geſtas manere vellet, illum perſequeretur (3).

(1) Διαβάλλων δ' Ἀθηναίους ὡς πλεῖστα ἀνθρώπων ἁμαρτάνοντας. Athenienſes vero perſtringens quod præ cæteris errarent maxime. Philoſtrat. in Vitis Sophiſtarum, pag. 505.

(2) Idem, pag. 504, 505.

(3) Cornel. Nepos, in Alcibiade, cap. 10, init.

[B] It is ſaid that his injuſtice did Socrates a prejudice in the opinion of the people.] The Orator Æſchines made no doubt of it, ſince in one of his Orations he ſpoke thus to the people of Athens: Ὑμεῖς, ὦ Ἀθηναῖοι, Σωκράτη μὲν τὸν σοφιστὴν ἀπεκτίνατε ὅτι Κριτίαν ἐφάνη πεπαιδευκὼς ἕνα τῶν τριάκοντα, τῶν τὸν δῆμον καταλυσάντων. Vos, Athenienſes, Socratem ſapientem illum occidiſtis quod Critiam inſtituiſſet unum XXX virorum qui populum oppreſſerunt (4). i. e. "You, O "Athenians, have put the wiſe Socrates to death, "becauſe he appeared to have inſtructed Critias, one "of the thirty deſtroyers of the people."

(4) Æſchines, Orat. in Timarchum, pag. mo 194, B.

[C] Xenophon has refuted thoſe who . . . imputed to Socrates the licentious lives of ſome of his diſciples.] The enemies of that Philoſopher laid to his charge all the evils which Critias and Alcibiades, two of his ſcholars, had brought on the Athenians. Xenophon ſhews this to have been very unjuſt. He ſays that theſe two Scholars of his attended Socrates only to learn the art of ſpeaking, which they deſign to make an ill uſe of to ſatisfy the inordinate ambition which conſumed them (5). He affirms that though they were ſo little inclined to imitate Socrates, that if God had given them their choice either of dying, or being obliged to live as that Philoſopher did, they would have accepted the firſt condition; they failed not however to behave themſelves with decency while they were under his direction (6). They did not give a looſe to their vicious inclinations, till they had left his School. Critias fled to Theſſaly, and was there corrupted by converſing with very wicked people (7). Others doubt whether he did not rather corrupt the Theſſalians, and they aſſert that he endeavoured to eſtabliſh tyranny among them (8). This was his humour; he loved innovations and diſturbances in a State. Xenophon obſerves that Socrates ſpared not to reprove this Scholar (9). "Having once perceived "that Critias was fallen in love with Euthydemus, "and did his utmoſt to obtain of him the laſt favours which are ſought by the voluptuous, he firſt "endeavoured to divert him from his deſign, telling "him it was unworthy a generous mind, and a man "of

(5) Xenoph. de Factis & Dictis Socratis, lib. 1, pag. m. 415.

(6) Καὶ Κριτίας δὲ καὶ Ἀλκιβιάδης ἕως μὲν Σωκράτει συνῆστην, ἐδυνάσθην ἐκείνου χρωμένω συμμάχω τῶν μὴ καλῶν ἐπιθυμίων κρατεῖν. Itaque Critias atque Alcibiades, dum Socratis conſuetudine utebantur, potuerunt illius ſubſidio pravas ſuperare cupiditates. Idem, ibid. pag. 416.

(7) Idem, ibid.

(8) Philoſtratus, in Vitis Sophiſtarum, p. 504, 505.

(9) Xenophon, de Factis & Dictis Socratis, pag. 417.

and that he forbade him to teach any perſon (b). One of the crimes which drew on him the greateſt hatred was his having been the moſt violent promoter of the death of Theramenes, and having endeavoured with all his might to prevent thoſe who had been expelled Athens by the faction of the thirty Tyrants, from finding any aſylum in Greece (c); for the cities which ſhould receive them were threatened with war (d). So many people had been baniſhed that they were able to form a little army, which reſolved to enter the city by force, and to reſtore it to liberty. They poſſeſſed themſelves of the Piræeus under the conduct of Thraſybulus, and though they were forced to abandon it, they did not loſe courage (e); but ſuſtained two attacks with a great deal of vigour, and in the laſt they killed Critias who fought valiantly (f). Such was the end of this man, who was valuable in other reſpects, on account of the nobleneſs of his birth [D], his eloquence [E], and

(b) Idem, pag. 417.

(c) Idem, lib. 2. de Geſtis Græcorum.

(d) Philoſtratus, in Vitis Sophiſtar. pag. 503.

(e) Xenoph. de Geſtis Græcor. lib. 2.

(f) Cornel. Nepos, in Thraſybulo, cap. 2.

" of honour, inceſſantly to importune the perſon " whoſe eſteem one is deſirous of gaining, and to " act the beggar, to obtain a diſhonourable thing " of him. And as Critias yielded not at the firſt " attack, it is ſaid that Socrates declared in the preſence of ſeveral perſons, and of Euthydemus himſelf, that Critias had the itch of a ſwine, and deſired to rub himſelf againſt Euthydemus, as ſwine " do againſt ſtones. After this, Critias always bore " him a grudge: and during the tyranny of the " thirty, of whom he was one, when he, together " with Charicles, had the care of the civil government, he was far from forgetting the affront; " and to revenge himſelf, he made a Law, whereby " he forbade the art of reaſoning to be taught in Athens." I ſet down this whole paſſage from the Tranſlation of Mr. Charpentier, of the French Academy. Here is a part of it according to the Greek: Λέγεται τὸν Σωκράτη, ἄλλων τε πολλῶν παρόντων καὶ τοῦ Εὐθυδήμου, εἰπεῖν ὅτι οἴκοι δοκοίη πάσχειν ὁ Κριτίας, ἐπιθυμῶν Εὐθυδήμου προσκνᾶσθαι ὥσπερ τὰ ὑδία τοῖς λίθοις. Socratem cum aliis multis præſentibus, tum etiam ipſo Euthydemo dixiſſe ferunt, Critiam in Euthydemum porcorum more, qui ſe ſaxis affricare ſolent, affici.

[D] He was valuable . . . . on account of the nobleneſs of his birth.] He was deſcended from Dropides the brother of Solon. This Dropides was the father of Critias, and he of Callæſchrus, who was the father of our Critias. It is ſaid that Solon was deſcended from Codrus King of Athens, and that going higher back Neleus and Neptune were found among his firſt anceſtors (10). By the way, I am ſurprized that Proclus, on a paſſage of Plato very ſufficient to refute thoſe who aſſure us that Dropides was the brother of Solon, ſhould make a Commentary wherein he declares in favour of that fraternal relation, without anſwering the objection which his Text might have ſuggeſted. Critias there ſays (11) that Solon had told Dropides a certain ſtory; for, adds he, Solon lived familiarly and in great friendſhip with Dropides, ἦν μὲν γὰρ οἰκείῳ καὶ σφόδρα φίλῳ. Would this reaſon be alledged in ſpeaking of two brothers?

(10) Diog. Laertius, in Platone, lib. 3. num. 1. See alſo Plato, in Charmide, pag. m. 463, C.

(11) In Platon. Timæo, pag. m. 1042, C.

[E] . . . . his Eloquence.] Here is what Cicero ſays of it: Huic ætati ſuppares Alcibiades, Critias, Theramenes, quibus temporibus quod dicendi genus viguerit, ex Thucydidis ſcriptis, qui ipſe tum fuit, intelligi maxime poteſt: grandes erant verbis, crebri ſententiis, compreſſione rerum breves, & ob eam ipſam cauſam interdum ſubobſcuri (12). i. e. " In this age flouriſhed Alcibiades, " Critias, and Theramenes, who were contemporaries; " and what ſort of eloquence was at that time in " vogue may be beſt learned from Thucydides, who " himſelf lived in thoſe days: they uſed lofty words, " and ſententious expreſſions, affecting great conciſeneſs, for which very reaſon they were ſometimes a " little obſcure." Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus has given an advantageous idea of the eloquence of Critias (13); but he makes it to be of a quite different character from that which Cicero has juſt given us. It is plain Cicero ſuppoſes that to know the eloquence of Critias we need only conſider the ſtyle of Thucydides. He ſuppoſes, no doubt, that the conciſe and ſententious manner of expreſſion, which reigns in that famous Hiſtorian, was in faſhion in thoſe times, and that Critias and the other Orators whom he names, followed no other method in their Orations. Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus, on the other hand, aſſures us that Thucydides had no imitators, and to prove it he refers his readers to Critias by name. Ad eos autem qui Thucydidis orationem ad veterem atque illis temporibus uſitatam dicendi rationem referunt, neque obſcuro neque prolixo mihi ſermone opus erit. Quibus illud dici poteſt; cum multi eſſent Athenis & Oratores, & Philoſophi, quo tempore bellum inter Peloponnenſes atque Athenienſes gerebatur, neminem tamen repertum eſſe, qui hunc dicendi modum uſurparit, neque Andocidem, neque Antiphontem, neque Lyſiam, qui Oratores erant: neque Critiam, neque Antiſthenem, neque Xenophontem, qui Socraticam philoſophandi rationem ſectabantur (14). i. e. " In anſwer to " thoſe who are of opinion that the language of Thucydides was the ancient way of ſpeaking, which was " at that time in uſe, I need be neither obſcure nor " prolix. It may be ſufficient to ſay, that tho' there " were many Orators and Philoſophers at Athens, during the war between the Peloponneſians and the Athenians, yet we know of none who imitated his " method, neither Andocides, Antiphon, or Lyſias, " who were Orators; nor Critias, Antiſthenes, or Xenophon, who followed the Socratic way of philoſophizing." Cicero, in another place, changes his note a little; he agrees that Critias was not ſo conciſe as Thucydides: I know not why he makes ſome difference as to time between Critias and Alcibiades; for, in the utmoſt rigour of expreſſion, they ought to be deemed contemporaries. I ſet down the words of Cicero; by which it will appear that ſome of Critias's writings were remaining in his time. Antiquiſſimi fere ſunt quorum quidem ſcripta conſtent, Pericles, atque Alcibiades, & eadem ætate Thucydides, ſubtiles, acuti, breves, ſententiis magis quam verbis abundantes. Non potuiſſet accidere, ut unum eſſet omnium genus, niſi aliquem ſibi proponerent ad imitandum. Conſequuti ſunt hos Critias, Theramenes, Lyſias. Multa Lyſiæ ſcripta ſunt, nonnulla Critiæ, de Theramene audivimus; omnes etiam tum retinebant illum Periclis ſuccum, ſed erant paulò uberiore filo (15). i. e. " The moſt ancient writers almoſt of whom we have any certain remains, Pericles, and Alcibiades, and Thucydides " their contemporary, were ſubtil, acute, conciſe, " abounding more in ſentences than words. It could " not poſſibly happen that the ſtyle of them all ſhould " be of the ſame kind, unleſs they had propoſed ſome " one for their imitation. Theſe were followed by " Critias, Theramenes, and Lyſias. We have many " pieces of Lyſias extant, and ſome of Critias; of " Theramenes we have only heard: they all even at " that time retained the pithy ſtyle of Pericles, but " were ſomewhat more copious." Father Cauſſin reckons Critias among the ancient Sophiſts, and praiſes him highly. Non obſcuri quoque nominis inter veteres Sophiſtas Critias qui in gravi genere dicendi exercitatiſſimus fuit. Nec tamen gravitatem verbis poeticis aut dithyrambicis metiebatur, ſed vocabulis maxime propriis, ut natura poſtulat, concinnabat orationem. Inſigni præterea brevitate & magna Atticiſmi temperie loquutus, nihil habet inſolens aut ineptum (16). i. e. " Critias alſo " was of no obſcure name among the old Sophiſts, " being perfectly well ſkilled in the grave manner of " ſpeaking. However he did not heighten the ma" jeſty of his diſcourſe by poetical or bombaſt expreſ" ſions, but made choice of the moſt proper terms, as " the nature of his ſubject required. Beſides, he " ſpoke with remarkable conciſeneſs, and a judicious " mixture of the Attic elegance, without any harſh" neſs or impropriety." He cites Hermogenes in his favour (17): but I ſhould rather chuſe to acquaint my readers that he was one of the thirty Tyrants of Athens, than ſimply to call him a Sophiſt. I agree however that Philoſtratus, giving too great a latitude to the word, has placed Critias among the old Sophiſts. We have ſeen that he makes him to have been a wicked villain; and we ſhall preſently ſee that he praiſes him

(12) Cicero, in Bruto, cap. 7.

(13) See his Opera Rhetorica & Critica, pag. 145, 228, 425, of the 8vo Edition, 1615.

(14) Ibid. pag. 425.

(15) Cicero, de Oratore, lib. 2. cap. 22.

(16) Cauſſin. de Eloquentia, lib. 1. pag. m. 18, 19.

(17) Ab Hermogene judicatur . . . . Ibid.

and the Verſes which he compoſed [F]. He has been praiſed more by Plato than by Proclus [G], Plato's Commentator. He has been reckoned in the number of thoſe who dogmatized againſt the exiſtence of God [H]. It would be no ſurprize him highly on account of his eloquence, nearly in the ſame words which Father Cauſſin has made uſe of. Τὴν δὲ ἰδίαν τῷ λόγῳ δογμαλίας ὁ Κριτίας ϗ πολυγνώμων, συμνολογῆσαί τι ἱκανόταλ⊙, ὃ τὴν ἀθυμοδόδη συμνολογίαν, ὐδὲ καλαφιύγσαν ἐς τὰ ἐκ ποιητικῆς ὀνόματα, ἀλλ' ἐκ τῶν κυριωτάτων συγκιμένη ϗ κατὰ φύσιν ἔχσαν, ὁρῶ τὸν ἄνδρα ϗ βραχυλογοῦντα ἱκανῶς ϗ διυῶς, καθαπλόμνον ἀπολογίας ἤθει, ἀτλικίζοηλά τι ὐκ ἀκραλῶς, ὐδὲ ἀκφαύλως. Genus vero orationis Critiæ fuit ſententiarum gravitate & judicio ornatum. Idem in gravi dicendi genere exercitatiſſimus fuit, quam quidem gravitatem non dithyrambis intonabat, neque ad poetica verba confugiebat, ſed vocabulis maxime propriis concinnabat & ut natura poſtulabat. Video namque hominem decenti brevitate loquentem, & in defenſione alios ſubtiliter carpentem; item neque male neque immoderate Attica lingua differentem (18). I omit the remaining part of his character given by Philoſtratus: he took delight in paradoxes, and to repreſent the ſame idea by ſeveral looſe ſtrokes (19). The wind of his eloquence often abated, but it was always ſofter and more agreeable than the zephyrs (20). We learn from a Letter of Philoſtratus, that Critias and Thucydides took Gorgias for their model, and that they were obliged to him for the elevation of their eloquence, accompanied by eaſe in the one, and ſtrength in the other. Κριτίας δὲ ϗ Θυκυδίδης ὐκ ἀγνοῦνλαι τὸ μιγαλόγνωμον ϗ τὴν ὀφρῦν παρ' αὐτῷ κικλημένοι· μεταποιῦνλις δὲ αὐτὸ ἐς τὸ οἰκεῖον, ὁ μὲν ὑπ' ἐνγλωττίας, ὁ δ' αὖ ὑπὸ ῥώμης. Critiam vero & Thucydidem non clam eſt magnitudinem animi & ſupercilium ab eo (Gorgia) accepiſſe. Tranſtulerunt autem ad propria, alter ad linguæ promptitudinem alter ad robur (21).

(18) Philoſtratus, in Vitis Sophiſtar. pag. 505.

(19) Καὶ τὸ ἀσυνδέτως δὲ χαρίεν προσβαλεῖν Κριτίου ἦρα. Critiæ quoque decor eſt ſcopis diſſolutis uni loco inhærere. Idem, ibid. This is exactly what may be ſaid of Seneca.

(20) Ibid.

(21) Philoſtrat. in Epiſt. ad Juliam Auguſtam, pag. 887.

[F] . . . and his Verſes.] Plutarch quotes a paſſage of Critias's Elegies, wherein the Author reminded Alcibiades that it was he who had cauſed him to be recalled, I mean, who propoſed the Law which recalled him to the Athenian people. It cannot be pretended that the Author of thoſe Elegies was another Critias, ſince Plutarch calls him the ſon of Callæſchrus (22), and citing the ſame work in another place, he attributes it to Critias, one of the thirty Tyrants (23). A fault has crept into Amiot's Tranſlation of the Life of Alcibiades: inſtead of Critias the ſon of Callæſchrus, we there read Callias the ſon of Callæſchrus. The ſame fault appears in Serranus's Plato, in the Dialogue intitled Protagoras. Κριτίας is in the Greek, and Callias in the Tranſlation. Plutarch is not the only Author who has quoted Critias's Elegies, of which you may find ſeveral fragments in Athenæus: look in Book X, page 432, and Book XV, page 666. This laſt paſſage informs us that what is quoted in the firſt Book, page 28, is taken from the ſame work of Critias. I doubt not but he compoſed other poetical pieces. It was not certainly known whether he was the Author of a Poem intitled Pirithoüs: ſome aſcribe it to him, and others to Euripides (54). We ſhall ſee below whether he ought to be diſtinguiſhed from the Author of the Book De Politia Lacedæmoniorum.

(22) Κριτίου τοῦ Καλλαίσχρου γράψαντος ὡς αὐτὸς ἐν ταῖς ἐλεγείαις σπουδάσας. Ex Critiæ Callæſchri filii rogatione, ut ipſe hiſce Elegiis cecinit. Plut. in Alcibiade, pag. 209. E.

(23) Κριτίας δὲ τῶν τριάκοντα γενόμενος ἐν ταῖς ἐλεγείαις εὔχεται. Critias ex triginta tyrannis optat in Elegiis. Idem, in Cimone, pag. 484, E.

[G] He has been praiſed more by Plato than by Proclus.] "No body in this city is ignorant that Critias is "maſter of all thoſe things which we are ſpeaking of." Κριτίαν δὲ που πάνλις οἱ τῇδε ἴσμεν ὐδενὸς ἰδιώτην ὄνλα ὧν λέγομεν. Critiam vero omnes utique hac in urbe, nullius eorum, quæ dicimus, eſſe imperitum ſcimus (25). This is the Elogy which Plato beſtows on him; having juſt before ſpoken of the advantages which are reaped from an excellent genius, and the ſtudy of true Philoſophy. Let us ſee what Monſr. Petit has obſerved on this paſſage. Proclus in commentario ad hunc locum: Ὁ Κριτίας ἦν μὲν γενναίας ϗ αὐθαδοῦς φύσως, ἤπτλο δὲ ϗ φιλοσόφων συνυσιῶν, ϗ ἐκαλεῖτο ἰδιώτης μὲν ἐν φιλοσόφοις, φιλόσοφ⊙ ϗ ἐν ἰδιώταις, ὡς ἡ ἱσωρία φησίν. Erat quidem Critias generoſa & vehementi indole, nec philoſophicarum expers diſceptationum; ſed ita tamen ut idiota inter philoſophos, philoſophus inter idiotas vocaretur; ut quidem hiſtoria teſtatur. Quod ſignificat hunc quidem non fuiſſe perfectum in philoſophia, ſed tamen ingenio aptum, & multæ eruditionis (26). i. e. "Proclus in his commentary on this place writes "thus: Critias indeed was of a noble and ſtrong genius; he had alſo frequented the aſſemblies of Philoſophers, yet ſo as to be reckoned a novice among Philoſophers, and a Philoſopher among novices; as is recorded in hiſtory. Which ſignifies that he was not "a perfect Philoſopher, but yet of an apt genius, and "great learning." Obſerve on theſe laſt words of Mr. Petit, that the expreſſions of Proclus do not ſeem to ſignify that Critias had much learning. A man may without that paſs for a Philoſopher among the ignorant. Inter cæcos regnat ſtrabus.

(24) Athen. lib. 11. pag. 496.

(25) Plato. in Timæo, pag. m. 1041, E.

(26) Petrus Petitus, Miſcellan. Obſervat. pag. 6.

[H] He has been reckoned in the number of thoſe who dogmatized againſt the exiſtence of God.] Sextus Empiricus expreſſes himſelf in very plain terms on this head. Θεὸς γάρ, ſays he (27), οἱ μὲν πολλοί φασιν εἶναι. τινὲς δ' ὐκ εἶναι· ὥσπερ οἱ περὶ Διαγόραν τὸν Μήλιον, ϗ Θεόδωρον, ϗ Κριτίαν τὸν Ἀθηναῖον. Moſt people believe there are Gods; but ſome, as Diagoras, Theodorus, and CRITIAS the Athenian, ſay there are none. He is more explicit in repreſenting this perſon's thoughts in another Book. Critias, one of the thirty Tyrants of Athens, ſays he (28), ſeems to have been in the number of Atheiſts. He pretends that the old Legiſlators, in order to prevent a man from doing an injury to his neighbour in private, feigned that there is a Providence, which takes notice whether men live well or ill, and puniſhes thoſe who do evil. According to this ſyſtem, there had been a time when mankind, living as diſorderly as brute beaſts, and neither rewarding good actions, nor puniſhing crimes, followed no other rule than the law of ſuperior ſtrength. Afterwards there were men who appointed puniſhments, and then juſtice exerciſed her authority over injuſtice, as a maſter does over his ſlave; and thoſe who did any evil were puniſhed. In proceſs of time, it being perceived that the Laws indeed reſtrained men from committing crimes in public, but not from doing an ill action in ſecret, a man of ſenſe aroſe who knew he ſhould render a very great ſervice to mankind if he could contrive it ſo that the wicked ſhould be afraid of being puniſhed, even when they ſhould ſin in private, or ſhould only have evil intentions. Wherefore he invented a God, that is to ſay, an immortal Nature who ſees and knows all things: he attributed to him the government of the world, the motion of the heavens, lightning, and thunder, and all things in general which mankind are afraid of: thus, concluded he, did an able man make the others believe the exiſtence of a Deity. Sextus Empiricus ſets down Critias's own words, without quoting the work from whence he takes them. We only know that he borrowed them from a Poem; for he cites ſome Iambic verſes. But what perplexes one is, that Plutarch aſcribes the ſame verſes to Euripides, and ſuppoſes that Poet, dreading the Areopagus, and for that reaſon not daring to publiſh his Atheiſm directly, put this wicked ſyſtem into the mouth of a perſon repreſented on the ſtage (29): Εὐριπίδης ὁ τραγῳδοποιὸς ἀποκαλύψαλ μὲν ὐκ ἠθέλησε, διδοικὼς τὸν Ἄρειον πάγον· ἐνέφηνε δὲ τοῦτον τὸν τρόπον· τὸν γὰρ Σίσυφον εἰσήγαγε προφάτην ταύτης τῆς δόξης, ϗ συνηγόρευσεν αὐτοῦ ταύτῃ τῇ γνώμῃ, Ἦν γὰρ χρόν⊙ (φησὶν) ὅτ' ἄτακλ⊙ ἦν ἀνθρώπων βί⊙, Καὶ θηριώδης, ἰσχύ⊙ θ' ὑπηρέτις. ἔπειλα φησὶ τὴν ἀνομίαν λυθῆναι νόμων εἰσαγωγῇ. ἐπεὶ γὰρ ὁ νόμ⊙ τὰ φανερὰ τῶν ἀδικημάτων εἴργειν ἐδύναλο, κρύφα τε ἠδίκει πολλοί, τότε τὶς σοφὸς ἀνὴρ ἐπέστησεν ὡς δεῖ ἀεὶ ψευδεῖ λόγῳ τυφλῶσαι τὴν ἀλήθειαν, ϗ πεῖσαι τοὺς ἀνθρώπους, Ὡς ἔστι δαίμων ἀφθίτῳ θάλλων βίῳ, Ὃς ταῦτ' ἀκούει ϗ βλέπει φρονεῖ τ' ἄγαν. Euripides tragicus poeta aperte quidem profiteri hanc ſententiam non eſt auſus, metuens Areopagiticum judicium: indicavit tamen hac ratione: Siſyphum introduxit, qui eam proferret, ipſeque ei patrocinatus eſt,

(27) Sext. Empir. Pyrrhon. Hypotypoſ. lib. 3. pag. 155.

(28) Idem, adverſus Mathematicos, pag. 318.

Incondita olim vita fuit mortalium,
Et belluina, viribuſque ſerviens.

Legibus deinde poſitis ait injuſtitiam fuiſſe repreſſam. Sed cum hæ aperta poſſent flagitia prohibere, multi autem occulte ſcelera perpetrarent, tum quendam callidum virum prodiiſſe, qui docuerit veritati tenebras mendacio offundendas, hominibuſque perſuadendum eſſe, (29) Plutarch. de Placitis Philoſophor. lib. 1. Quæſt. 7. pag. 880, E.

Quod

ſurprize to me, that Authors meanly verſed in the Ancients ſhould be ignorant of this certain

Quod ſit perenni vita aliquis vigens Deus, Qui cernat iſta, & audiat, atque intelligat.

i. e. "Euripides the tragic Poet durſt not openly profeſs this opinion, being afraid of the Tribunal of the Areopagus; however he publiſhed it in this manner: he introduced Siſyphus, as the broacher of this doctrine, and then patronized the opinion himſelf; ſaying,

"There was a time when mankind knew no order,
"But liv'd like ſavage beaſts, the ſlaves of power.

"Afterwards he ſays injuſtice was repreſſed by the introducing of Laws: but when theſe could only prevent open crimes, and many committed unjuſt actions in ſecret, a ſubtle man aroſe, who taught that truth ought always to be blinded by falſe reaſoning, and that men muſt be perſuaded

"That there's a God enjoying endleſs life,
"Who hears, and ſees, and knows thoſe ſecrets well."

It is evident that the Syſtem given by Sextus Empiricus, and that mentioned by Plutarch, are the very ſame. They differ only in that Plutarch does not cite ſo many verſes as Sextus Empiricus, and that he aſcribes to Euripides what the other attributes to Critias; but the verſes which Plutarch cites are exactly the ſame with ſome of thoſe which are quoted by Sextus Empiricus. Hereupon it might be aſked whether by a ſlip of memory too frequent among Authors both great and ſmall, what belongs to Euripides has not been aſcribed to Critias, or what belongs to the latter to Euripides; or whether there be any other way to ſolve the difficulty? Methinks a Phyſician of Paris has been pretty happy in conjectures.

He is of opinion there is an omiſſion in Sextus Empiricus, that is, that the tranſcribers have ſkipped ſome periods which contained what had been quoted from Critias, and the notice which had been taken that Euripides, being poſſeſſed by the ſame opinion, had explained it at length in a Tragedy. Mihi probabilius videtur mutilum eſſe Empirici librum quam Plutarchi, nec ea modo quæ ex Critia citabat ævo ſubſtracta, ſed etiam ipſius verba illa quibus Euripidem eorum verſuum auctorem laudabat antequam verſus ipſos poneret. Quo ſane factum putandum eſt ut iis qui lacunam non adverterent, iidem verſus Critiæ adſcribi, ac nomine ejus citari ab Empirico viderentur (30). Thoſe who know that ſome very ancient and tolerably good manuſcripts do not contain all that is to be found in others, and that notwithſtanding there is no blank ſpace left in them, will allow that it is very poſſible that the manuſcripts of Empiricus are mutilated in this paſſage, tho' the writing be continued. But tho' I acquieſce in Monſr. Petit's conjecture, I do not admit all his reaſons; and ſhall point out thoſe which I take to be falſe.

(30) Petrus Petitus, Obſervat. Miſcellan. lib. 1. cap. 1. pag. 7.

MONSIEUR PETIT's Reaſons examined.

I. He ſays that, according to Plutarch, the reaſon which obliged Euripides to vent his Syſtem under the perſon of Siſyphus, was his fear of the Areopagus; now, adds he, that fear is not likely in ſuch a man as Critias, a cruel and violent Tyrant, who laughed at all Laws both human and divine (31). This reaſon is of no force; for the tyranny of Critias did not begin till after the taking of Athens: before that, he was conſiderable only in proportion to his intrigues, and was as anſwerable for his conduct as another; ſo that if he had deſigned to write a Play, he would have been obliged to uſe caution as well as Euripides, in a greater or leſs degree. The people of Athens and the Courts of Juſtice could have brought him to reaſon, as eaſily as they did Alcibiades, under the pretence of impiety (32). It is very probable that if Critias had written Tragedies, it was not after he became one of the thirty Tyrants, but while he enjoyed more leiſure. At the worſt, it is very poſſible that he wrote them before he was a Tyrant; and this is ſufficient to refute the reaſon I am here arguing againſt.

(31) Non videtur is metus in tyrannum cadere qualis fuiſſe Critias dicitur, impotens, ſævus, juris humani oblitus, & Deorum contemptor. Petit. ibid. pag. 5.

(32) See Cornelius Nepos, in Vita Alcibiadis.

II. Here is another which is full as weak. Critias was not Poet good enough to have ſuch fine verſes attributed to him as thoſe which are cited by Empiricus. How is this to be reconciled with Athenæus, who quotes ſo many good verſes of Critias, and even compliments him with the epithet of excellent (33), and who moreover cites a piece which paſſed for a work either of Critias, or of Euripides? When the public doubts whether a Poem be the production of one of the firſt-rate Authors, whom they know, or of another, they muſt neceſſarily be perſuaded that that other is an excellent Poet.

(33) Ὁ χρήστος Κριτίας. Optimus Critias. Athen. lib. 13. pag. 600.

III. What Monſr. Petit adds, that ſince Plato (34) has reproached Euripides with flattering Tyrants too much and praiſing Tyranny, the dread of the Areopagus ſuits much better with that Poet than Critias (35), ſeems to me a bad argument. For, generally ſpeaking, there is no manner of connection between preferring Monarchy to a Republican government, and not daring directly to ſpeak one's thoughts concerning Religion. The praiſes of Tyranny, for which Euripides has been reproached, are only certain paſſages in his Tragedies, wherein he deſcribes the advantages of Monarchical government: and it is not at all ſtrange that in a city like Athens, where the Republican government was an inexhauſtible ſource of revolutions and confuſions, a man of ſenſe ſhould be ſtruck with maxims which favour Monarchy. But let us quit this point, it not being our buſineſs to defend the taſte of Euripides; the queſtion is, whether becauſe he has ſometimes ſpoken in commendation of Kingly government, it was neceſſary for him to have recourſe to the artifice which Plutarch aſcribes to him; which is, that not daring to expoſe himſelf to the Judges of the Areopagus, he would not broach his impious opinions himſelf, but put them in the mouth of Siſyphus in one of his Tragedies. It is not eaſy to perceive that one of theſe two things may be the conſequence of the other: but it is very evident that if he had declared againſt Monarchy, and in favour of a Commonwealth, prudence would nevertheleſs have dictated to him, that he ought to ſtand in fear of the Areopagus, and make uſe of an artifice in publiſhing an impious doctrine. I acknowledge that, after a certain effort of meditation, a man diſcovers that Euripides, by commending Kingly Government, might become diſagreeable to the Athenian Magiſtrates, and that he ought for the future to have thought himſelf obliged to be more wary than another, and not furniſh an occaſion for a proſecution. But at the bottom, the conjecture of Mr. Petit would be diſputable (36); at leaſt it cannot be denied but that his argument would be involved in too much obſcurity. See the margin (37).

(34) Lib. 8. de Republica.

(35) Magis profecto Euripidi convenit, quod ait Plutarchus, non auſum metu Areopagi aperire mentem ſuam de Diis; propterea Siſyphi perſonam ab eo inductum. NAM & Plato Euripidi objicit in octavo de Republica, quod tyrannis impenſius faveret, & tyrannidem laudaret. Petit. lib. 1. pag. 6 and 7.

(36) I ſpeak thus, becauſe it is certain that Monſieur Petit did not think of this.

IV. If Plato's reproach of Euripides had been alledged only as a principle of the concluſion which I am going to examine, I ſhould not have attacked Mr. Petit's Logic in the manner I have done: I ſhould eaſily have perceived ſome connection between the two things which he has concluded from one another. He argues thus (38): ſince Euripides has made an encomium on Tyranny, and has warmly maintained the cauſe of Tyrants, it is probable that he publiſhed on the Stage the Maxims which are imputed to him; for thoſe Maxims are greatly to the taſte of Tyrants. So far all goes well; that is to ſay, whoever admits the principle, will be forced to admit the conſequence; but, as ill luck will have it, there is a falſe propoſition in this argument. It is not true that it is doing a thing acceptable to Tyrants to teach Maxims which tend to raze the impreſſions of Religion out of men's minds. They who are ſo ignorant and unreaſonable as not to attribute the origin of Religion to the impreſſions which God himſelf has communicated to the mind of man, find no ſuppoſition more plauſible than to ſay that thoſe who are deſirous of ruling over others invented (37) To know the reaſon of the difference here between the 1ſt and the 2d Edition conſult page 1356 of the 1ſt Volume of the 1ſt Edition, of this Dictionary.

To ſpare the Readers that trouble, it may not be amiſs to ſet down the paſſage to which this Citation refers: and it is as follows. The perſon who made the Table to this Dictionary has juſt now informed me, that my Cenſure of Mr. Petit may be very falſe in this particular: for Euripides, by beſtowing commendations on Regal Government, might become diſagreeable to the Magiſtrates of Athens, and from thenceforwards he ought to have thought himſelf obliged to be more wary than another, and not furniſh an occaſion for a proſecution. This thought, I own, is ſolid; and I place it here as a corrective to my own: but at the bottom I am ſtill of opinion that Mr. Petit advances a very ſlight Conjecture; and at leaſt it cannot be denied but that his argument would be involved in too much obſcurity.

(38) Quidni igitur Euripides tyrannis amicus, & Archelao Macedonum regi haud ſane admodum laudato, in amoribus, hanc ſententiam in ea tragœdia tyrannorum moribus conſentaneam protulerit: utpote quibus religio nihil aliud ſit, niſi machina theatralis, qualem poëtæ habent in promptu, ad expediendum fabulæ quampiam nodum? Petit. Obſerv. Miſcell. lib. 1. pag. 7.

certain fact; but I think it a little ſtrange that the learned Mr. le Fevre did not know it [I]. The paſſage wherein Sextus Empiricus ſpeaks of it has given ſome exerciſe to one of our modern Critics (g). Moreri has had very little light with regard to this Article [K], and Voſſius could not ſerve him for a ſufficient guide [L].

(g) Mr. Petit, a Phyſician of Paris. See the Remark [H].

CRITO

invented Religion, in order the more eaſily to keep the people under the yoke. Hiſtory affords us a thouſand and a thouſand inſtances of the advantage which Princes have made of the ſuperſtitions of the people, whether the point was to encourage, or to intimidate them: an Oracle of Delphi, an anſwer of the Augurs, the explication of a prodigy, have been of ſingular uſe on a thouſand occaſions for the intereſt of the Sovereigns. Therefore, though by the very ſame machines the people may be induced to revolt (39), it is probable however that, as all the inconveniencies which may ariſe from an invention are not foreſeen, intelligent and able Sovereigns would have got a Religion forged, if they had not found one eſtabliſhed to their hands. What, therefore, does Mr. Petit mean by ſuppoſing that Euripides, to make his court to Tyrants, and in particular to Archelaüs King of Macedon, cauſed a long part to be ſpoken on the Stage with a view of deſtroying Religion? Is there any thing more likely to ruin it, than to make the people believe that it was only invented for a ſcarecrow, and that in reality it is a chimæra to imagine that lightening, hail, and ſtorms, are the chaſtiſements which God inflicts for wicked actions? Mr. Petit has ſo plainly refuted himſelf, that one cannot help being amazed at it: Tyrants, ſays he (40), laugh at Religion, and have no manner of regard for it; but yet they make uſe of all imaginable means to oblige their ſubjects to pay an exact obedience to Religious inſtitutions: and conſequently, ſhould he be anſwered, Euripides would have made his court to Tyrants very ill, had he publiſhed on the Stage ſo impious a Syſtem as that which Sextus Empiricus and Plutarch mention.

(39) See above the Remark [B] of the Article ABDAS.

(40) Cum enim neque religionis reſpectum habeant, id tamen modis omnibus ſtudent, ut quibus imperant populi, religioni maxime pareant. Petit. Obſervat. Miſcell. lib. 1. pag. 7.

Monſieur Petit has forgotten, methinks, one of the beſt reaſons which prove that it was Euripides, and not Critias, who dogmatized in that manner. He ought to have alledged that it is frequently the cuſtom of Euripides to bring perſons on the Stage who utter impieties. His Bellerophon inveighs in the boldeſt manner imaginable againſt Divine Providence, and concludes by denying it, by reaſon of the diſorders which are ſeen in the World, and the univerſal oppreſſion of innocence (41). I end this Remark by obſerving that Mr. Petit has cited a long paſſage of Seneca, which ſhews that Philoſopher looked on what the Ancients have ſaid concerning Jupiter's thunder as no other than a pious fraud. Quid tam imperitum eſt, quam credere fulmina è nubibus Jovem mittere... ut impunitis ſacrilegis, percuſſis ovibus, incenſis aris, pecudes innoxias feriat... Si quæris à me quid ſentiam, non exiſtimo tam hebetes fuiſſe, ut crederent Jovem, aut non æquæ voluntatis, aut certe minus paratum eſſe. Utrum enim cum emiſit ignes, quibus innoxia capita percuteret, ſcelerata tranſiret, aut noluit juſtius mittere, aut non ſucceſſit? Quid ergo ſecuti ſunt, cum hoc dicerent? ad coërcendos animos imperitorum ſapientiſſimi viri judicaverunt, inevitabilem metum, ut ſupra nos aliquid timeremus. Utile erat in tanta audacia ſcelerum, aliquid eſſe adverſum quod nemo ſibi ſatis potens videretur. Ad conterrendos itaque eos, quibus innocentia niſi metu non placet, poſuere ſuper caput vindicem & quidem armatum (42). i. e. "What can be more filly than to "believe that Jupiter hurls thunderbolts out of the "clouds,.. to ſtrike harmleſs cattle, kill ſheep, and "burn altars, letting ſacrilegious villains eſcape un-"puniſhed..... If you ask my opinion, I do not "imagine they were ſo ſtupid, as to believe that Ju-"piter was either not inclined to do juſtice, or unable "to execute it. For when he ſends forth his lighten-"ing, which ſtrikes the innocent, and paſſes over the "guilty, is he unwilling to direct it better, or does "he miſs his aim? What was their deſign therefore "in aſſerting this? To reſtrain the minds of the ig-"norant, the wiſeſt judged it neceſſary to introduce "a fear of inevitable puniſhment, and a dread of "ſomething above us. It was of uſe in an age when "wickedneſs was daring, that ſome power ſhould be "ſet up which none might think himſelf able to "withſtand. Wherefore to deter thoſe who are in-"nocent out of fear only, they placed over their "heads an armed avenger." Obſerve that Seneca denies not that Jupiter darts the thunder, if by Jupiter be underſtood the ſoul of the world, which has produced all things, which directs and governs all things, which may be called fate, providence, nature, world, and which properly ſpeaking is no other than the Univerſe itſelf. Ipſe enim eſt totum quod vides, totus ſuis partibus inditus, & ſe ſuſtinens vi ſua (43). This thought would eaſily go down with the Spinoziſts. When Seneca is aſked, why Jupiter ſtrikes what he ought to ſpare, and ſpares what he ought to ſtrike, he demands time to prepare an anſwer. At quare Jupiter aut ferienda tranſit, aut innoxia ferit? In majorem me quæſtionem vocas, cui ſuus locus, ſuus dies dandus eſt (44).

(41) See the Remark [AA] of the Article EURIPIDES. See alſo La Mothe le Vayer, tom. 12. Letter 135. pag. 220, and Athenagoras, in Legat. pro Chriſtian. pag. m. 28, & Clem. Alexandr. in Admonit. ad Gentes, pag. 50.

(42) Seneca, Natur. Quæſt. lib. 2. cap. 42.

(43) Idem, ibid. cap. 45.

(44) Idem, ibid. cap. 46.

[I] Monſieur le Fevre did not know it.] He has plainly ſhewn it in his Note on theſe words of Plutarch: How much better ſtill would it have been for thoſe of Carthage, to have had for their firſt Lawgivers a Critias and a Diagoras, who believed neither God nor Spirit, than to offer ſuch ſacrifices as they did to Saturn (45). Here follows his Note: "I know very well that Cri-"tias was a violent, furious, and unjuſt man, in a "word the moſt ſavage of the XXX Tyrants. But "the queſtion here is concerning a Philoſopher, and "not a Tyrant. For which reaſon I am of opinion "that inſtead of Critias we ſhould read Theodorus, "who was formerly one of the moſt famous Atheiſts "of Greece. I may be told that there is ſcarce any "reſemblance at all between theſe two words Κριτίας "and Θεόδωρος with regard to the Letters which com-"poſe them; but it muſt be conſidered that the Greek "Tranſcribers uſually abbreviate the words which "begin with θεο, ſo that they write Θδωρος with a "ſmall ſtroke over the Θ. However it be, Critias is "an error." Here is a deciſive ſentence, which would not have ſlipped from this Critic, if he had known what is to be found in Sextus Empiricus concerning Critias. One of the Fathers (46) has placed our Critias among the Atheiſts.

(45) I follow his Tranſlation. Here is the Greek: Τί δὲ Καρχηδονίοις οὐκ ἐλυσιτέλει Κριτίαν λαβοῦσιν ἢ Διαγόραν νομοθέτην ἀπ' ἀρχῆς, μήτε τινὰ θεῶν μήτε δαίμονα νομίζειν; ἢ τοιαῦτα θύειν οἷα τῷ Κρόνῳ ἔθυον. Nonne utilius erat Carthaginenſibus jam inde ab initio Critia vel Diagoræ ad condendas leges adhibito decernere nullum eſſe Deum, nullum genium: quam talia ſacra facere, qualibus illi Saturno operabantur? Plutarch. de Superſtit. ſub fin. pag. 171.

(46) Theophilus ad Autolycum, lib. 2. pag. m. 121.

[K] Moreri has had little light as to this Article.] I. He ought not to have ſpoken in the ſingular of an Elegy of Critias, ſince Plutarch and Athenæus have made uſe of the plural. II. He would not have ſaid that Sextus the Philoſopher quotes an excellent fragment of his, if he had known that that fragment contains an abominable doctrine, down-right Atheiſm. III. Critias the ſon of Callæſchrus ſhould not have made a ſeparate Article; he is the ſame Critias who was one of the XXX Tyrants. IV. There are no good reaſons to give us one Critias, a Greek Hiſtorian, different from the ſon of Callæſchrus; as will be ſeen in the ſubſequent Remark. V. The teſtimony produced by Clemens Alexandrinus is not very advantageous to this Author; for that Father only quotes (47) ſome words of Critias, to convict him of being a plagiary with reſpect to Euripides. What deceived Moreri was, that he did not underſtand the full force of theſe Latin words of Voſſius, Illuſtre hujus Scriptoris teſtimonium adducit Clemens (48). This ſignifies no more, than that Clemens Alexandrinus quotes Critias touching a remarkable ſubject: but this does not import that he praiſes or eſteems Critias. VI. No doubt ſhould have been made but that he who is cited by Plutarch in the Life of Lycurgus is the ſame perſon who wrote concerning the Republic of Sparta, and who is twice quoted by Athenæus. We ſhall ſee preſently that this is a certain truth.

(47) Stromat. lib. 6. pag. 620, D.

(48) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Græcis, pag. 348.

[L]..... and Voſſius could not ſerve him for a ſufficient guide.] He believed, without any foundation, that Critias the ſon of Callæſchrus was not the ſame perſon who compoſed Elegies, and was one of the XXX Tyrants (49). It is evident that we have here but one and the ſame Critias, and I am ſurprized that Voſſius did not perceive it: he has ſaid expreſly that Critias the Tyrant had addreſſed an Elegy to Alcibiades (50): now Plutarch quotes an Elegy of Critias the ſon of Callæſchrus, wherein the Author addreſſes himſelf to Alcibiades (51): is it not manifeſt there-

(49) Idem, de Poetis Græcis, pag. 44.

(50) Ibid.

(51) Plutarch. in Alcibiade, pag. 209, E.

CRITO. There have been ſeveral ancient Authors of that name; I ſhall not repeat what Moreri has ſaid of them; I ſhall only correct ſome of his blunders [A].

CRITON

fore that Critias the Tyrant, and the Elegiac Poet, and the ſon of Callæſchrus, are one and the ſame perſon? Voſſius was not always ignorant of this; for in his Greek Hiſtorians he is ſatisfied that the Critias from whom Plutarch quotes ſome verſes in the Life of Alcibiades is the ſon of Callæſchrus (52). We read alſo in Athenæus that Critias the ſon of Callæſchrus wrote ſome Elegies. As to Critias the Author of a Treatiſe concerning the Republic of Lacedæmon, Voſſius ought not to have thought (53), but known, that it is he whom Plutarch quotes in the Life of Lycurgus (54). To prove it, it is ſufficient to ſay that Athenæus, relating the ſame thing which Plutarch mentions, produces for his Voucher Critias, Author of the Treatiſe of the Republic of Lacedæmon. Voſſius aſſerts that this Critias is not the ſon of Callæſchrus; but gives no reaſons for it: wherefore as I would not be poſitive that he is in the wrong, neither would I warrant what he ſays to be true. It may be the ſame Critias, who was the Scholar of Socrates, and one of the XXX Tyrants, had a mind to demonſtrate to the public that he was at once a Poet, an Orator, and an Hiſtorian. He had left ſome Orations behind him, which Cicero and Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus had read; he had alſo left ſome Poems, which are cited by Plutarch and Athenæus (55): why may he not be the ſame perſon who compoſed a Treatiſe on the Republic of Lacedæmon? I obſerve that Athenæus quotes a paſſage of the Elegies of Critias, wherein he ſpeaks of the different ways of drinking at entertainments. Critias expatiates on the praiſes of the cuſtom obſerved at Lacedæmon in that reſpect. They drank no healths, neither did they drink round; they were guilty of no exceſs, but kept a certain medium which revived the warlike humour, and the gaiety of converſation, and which, in one word, was beneficial both to the body and the mind, rendring a man very fit for the functions of love, and provoking a ſound ſleep.

Οἱ Λακεδαιμονίων δὲ κόροι πίνωσι τοσοῦτον,
Ὥστε φρὴν εἰς ἱλαρὰν ἀσπίδα πᾶσ' ἀπάγειν,
Εἰς τε φιλοφροσύνην γλῶτταν μέτριόν τε γέλωτα.
Τοιαύτη δὲ πόσις σώματί τ' ἀφέλιμος,
Γνάμῃ τε, κλάσει τε καλᾶς εἰς ἔργ' Ἀφροδίτης,
Πρὸς θ' ὕπνον ἥρμοσαι, τὸν καμάτων λιμένα.

Lacedæmonii juvenes eouſque bibunt,
Ut ad capiendum ſcutum alacres totum animum vertant;
Linguam verò ad hilaritatem, modeſtumque riſum:
Ea nimirum potatio corpori utilis eſt,
Ac menti: juvatque multum ad Veneris opus,
Nec parum ad ſomnum confert, qui laborum portus eſt (56).

I obſerve alſo that the ſame Author cites Critias's Work concerning the Republic of Lacedæmon (57), to ſhew the different ways of drinking: and it happens that this Critias makes the ſame obſervation which I have already mentioned; that the Lacedæmonians drank no healths. This rather proves that here is but one Critias than that here are two. Take notice that Julius Pollux, who has cited Critias very frequently without ſpecifying any Book, has once named the Atalanta (58), and once the Treatiſe of the Republics (59).

[A] I ſhall only correct ſome of Moreri's blunders] I. Crito the Athenian lived indeed in the 94th Olympiad, but not in the year 150 ſince the building of Rome; it ſhould have been in the year 350. II. He was, I own, one of Socrates's diſciples, but it is not true, that Diogenes Laertius acquaints us with this; and yet he is the only author to whom Moreri refers. He ought to have quoted Xenophon (1). I ſhall clear this up in the cloſe of this Remark. III. Crito had not a ſon called Cheſippus; he ſhould have ſaid Cteſippus. IV. Crito the Phyſician did not teach an art of politeneſs, which Galen ſays muſt be excuſed, becauſe Crito practiſed Phyſick at court, and had Kings and Ladies for his patients. Would not this make one believe, that this Phyſician wrote Books, not upon the politeneſs, which becomes children, but upon that, which becomes full grown men, upon a politeneſs much more exalted than that of Monſignor della Caſa's Galatea? Would not one think, that he was the Chevalier de Meré of the Age; and that he publiſhed Treatiſes upon Delicacy, which deſerved the title much better than Father Bouheur's Defence againſt Cleanthe? And yet he did nothing of all this, and only taught that part of Phyſic, which is called Coſmetica. It is the art to cure uglineſs and other defects in the body, which are capable of creating in married people a diſguſt againſt one another. This is not the part of Phyſick, which is the moſt cultivated, but it is pretended, that it may be very uſeful, even with regard to the ſoul's ſalvation, ſince it may prevent adulteries. Ad medicinam etiam pertinet Coſmetice, quæ ars non debet reprehendi, ſi quis recte utatur. Nam & mariti quandoque levibus uxorum vitiis offenſi, amorem ad concubinas, vel etiam meretrices, imo & alienas uxores applicant. Quandoque & homines bene natos, inque honore conſtitutos pudet cum ejuſmodi vitiis in publicum prodire. Itaque nec Galenus dubitavit in Arte ſua tradere complura, quæ ad Artem κοσμητικὴν pertinent; ut de iis, quæ pulchrum vultus colorem concilient; quæ maculas, ſcabritiem, aut rugas tollant; quæ capillis colorem mutent; quæ dentes albos reddant (2). i. e. "The Art of beautifying is alſo a "part of Phyſic, which ought not to be condemned, "if it be properly applied. For huſbands, being "ſometimes diſpleaſed with ſome ſmall defects in their "wives, turn their affections to concubines, or lewd "women, or even to other men's wives. It happens "alſo ſometimes, that perſons of diſtinction, and who "enjoy ſome honourable poſt, are aſhamed to appear "in public with ſuch defects. Therefore Galen him-"ſelf did not ſcruple to give ſeveral directions con-"cerning that Art of beautifying; as, for inſtance, "what receipts are proper to give the face a beautiful "colour; or to take away freckles, pimples, or "wrinkles; or to alter the colour of the hair, or "to whiten the teeth." The Phyſicians uſe to diſtinguiſh this Art, from the ſhameful artifice, which teaches how to paint, and how to employ all the fine drugs, which Ovid had diſplayed in his Poem de Medicamine faciei (5) i. e. "of mending the face." They have endeavoured to correct this blunder in the edition of Moreri printed in Holland, but they did not ſucceed, becauſe they could not believe the blunder is ſo enormous as it really is. He taught his Art with politeneſs, which Galen ſays, muſt be excuſed, &c. Thus have they corrected the paſſage in Moreri; but it is certain the correction is ſtill wrong, but this is very pardonable; for ſince it is obſerved three lines lower, that Crito invented the Coſmetica or Art of beautifying, who would have imagined, that the Politeneſs and the Coſmetica are the ſame thing, and muſt not be diſtinguiſhed? Moreri's miſtake does not appear in its full light, but when one examines the Author, whom he tranſcribes. It is Voſſius: Now Voſſius's words are, Hic Crito docuit artem κοσμητικὴν ſive comptoriam vel exornatoriam: qua in re, ut Galenus ait, veniam meretur, quia apud Reges & Reginas medicinam faceret (4). That is, "This Crito taught the Art of beautifying or adorn-"ing, for which, Galen ſays, he deſerves to be ex-"cuſed, becauſe he practiſed Phyſick amongſt Kings "and Queens." It is evident from theſe words, that the pretended Art of Politeneſs, which Galen would have us excuſe, is nothing elſe but the Coſmetica or Art of beautifying. Moreri, no doubt, had read in ſome book, that Crito taught Artem poliendi cutem, the Art of making the ſkin ſmooth, to take away the freckles, &c. He did not take notice of the word cutem, the ſkin, and made of the reſt the pretended Art of Politeneſs. But could not Voſſius, whom he tranſcribed continually, and who was his perpetual Oracle, ſet him right here very eaſily? To aſſert, that Galen gave a liſt of Crito's works is not a good tranſlation of Voſſius (5): it would have been better to ſay, that he gave a ſummary of them. VI. To pretend, that theſe words of Voſſius, docuit artem κοσμητικὴν ſignify, that Crito was the firſt inventor of the Coſmetica, is a very ill-grounded pretenſion; there is a vaſt

(52) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Græc. pag. 348.

(53) Puto & eundem Critiam eſſe cujus Plutarchus mentionem fecit in Lycurgo. Idem, ibid.

(54) Pag. 45.

(55) Athen. lib. 11. pag. 463.

(56) Idem, lib. 10. cap. 9. pag. 432.

(57) Idem, lib. 11. cap. 3. pag. 463. Voſſius thought that Athenæus quotes this Book no more than twice. I find it quoted thrice. Harpocration quotes it under the word Ἀνακυργεῖς.

(58) Κριτίας δὲ ἐν Ἀταλάντῃ. Jul. Pollux, lib. 7. cap. 10.

(59) Παρὰ Κριτίᾳ ἐστὶν ἐν ταῖς πολιτείαις. Idem, ibid. cap. 13.

(1) Xenophon, de Fact. & Dict. Socratis, lib. 1. pag. m. 418. See alſo Suidas in Κρίτων.

(2) Voſſius, de Philoſophia, cap. 9, pag. 74.

(3) If he was really the Author of that Poem.

(4) Voſſius, de Philoſophia, cap. 11. pag. 86, 87.

(5) Ἀναχεφαλαίωσιν Librorum ejus exhibet Galenus, lib. 1. τῶν κατὰ τόπους. Voſſius, de Philoſoph. cap. 11. pag. 87.

CRITON (GEORGE) (a) a Scotſman, has been Profeſſor of the Greek Tongue in the Royal College at Paris. He was a very good Papiſt [A]. He had married the daughter of a Scotſman, who was Counſellor in the Preſidial of Poitiers: ſhe was afterwards married to Francis de la Mothe le Vayer [B], after ſhe had refuſed a brother of the Conſtable De Luines [C]. Criton died April the 11th, 1611 (b).

(a) Thus he is called in Father Du Breul's Antiquitez de Paris, pag. m. 564. F. Labbe, Bibliotheca Bibliothec. pag. m. 71. calls him William, He is named James in the Sorberiana. I think we ought to keep to F. Du Breul's opinion.

(b) Du Breul, pag. 564.

a vaſt difference between a Phyſician, who makes a particular part of Phyſick his chief ſtudy, and a Phyſician, who firſt invented that part. Crito being a Phyſician at Court, and finding that the Princes and Princeſſes do as much deſire to get rid of a pimple or freckle, and in general any deformity in the face, as they do, to be cured of a ſickneſs, applied himſelf entirely to the Coſmetick Art: but it does not follow, that it had never been treated of by any Phyſician before him. VII. Laſtly, Moreri gives a very bad definition of the Coſmetick Art. It is, ſays he, the Art of beautifying and adorning the body. According to this definition, the Coſmetica ſhould alſo teach how to dreſs the head, to chooſe a ſuit of cloaths, to ſort jewels right, and in general the whole induſtry and ſkill of thoſe women, who dreſs a Bride on her wedding-day.

Let us ſee now, whether I was right in my ſecond criticiſm. It has been objected to me (6), that Diogenes Laertius mentioning Crito's love for Socrates, and placing him in the number of Socrates's followers, hints thereby clearly enough, what Moreri aſcribes to him. I anſwer to this, that a Philoſopher's diſciples are not the only perſons, who can ſhew a great love for him: ſo that what Diogenes Laertius ſays of Crito's love for Socrates is no proof of Moreri's aſſertion. I add, that he places between Socrates and Crito ſome Philoſophers, who were neither Socrates's diſciples, nor his followers; conſequently, it cannot be inferred from the place he gives Crito in his ſecond Book, that he was a follower of Socrates. Farther, he obſerves expreſly, that Crito's ſons were Socrates's diſciples, οἱ παῖδες δὲ αὐτῦ ἐπήκουσαν Σωκράτες (7). And as he ſaid nothing like this concerning Crito, it is natural to think he did not pretend to tell us the circumſtance, for which he is quoted in Moreri. It muſt even be obſerved (8), that Plato makes Socrates ſay, that Crito was as old as he, and father of Critobulus, Socrates's diſciple. It had been very proper in that place, that the Philoſopher ſhould put the father as well as the ſon in the number of his diſciples, and yet he gives that title to the ſon only. Yet I own, that Plato hints clearly enough in other places (9), that Crito muſt be reckoned amongſt Socrates's diſciples.

(6) See the Moreri printed in Holland, tom. 2. pag. 293. edit. of 1698.

(7) Diog. Laert. lib. 2. num. 121.

(8) Plato, in Apologia Socratis, pag. m. 27.

(9) It is not in the Dialogue intitled Phædrus; it is chiefly in the Dialogue intitled Phædon.

[A] He was a very good Papiſt.] Here follows what Sieur Gillot wrote to Scaliger (1). "You muſt "know, that ſome days ago, Criton, Profeſſor of "polite Learning, intended to take his Degrees of "Doctor of Civil and Canon Law, and propoſed "Theſes upon both Laws to be held publickly. "Theſe having been ſeen by the King's Counſel *, "they found one amongſt them, which is very much "contrary to the ancient and ſound doctrine of France "and of the Sorbonne, as well as to truth. It was "this: Nec Hierarcha Romanus (ad quem ſolum αὐ-"θεντία τῆς ἀποστολικῆς διαδοχῆς Juriſdictio ſpiritualis"in Chriſtianos omnes, in patrimonio Eccleſiæ temporalis,"etiam poteſtas pertinet) nec Princeps ſolutus eſt legibus"tametſi uterque alios his ſolvere poſſit, & hic comitiis,"ille conciliis ſit ſuperior. i. e. "The Biſhop of "Rome (to whom alone belongs the power, by ſucceſſion from the Apoſtles, a ſpiritual juriſdiction over "all the Chriſtians, and an authority even over the "temporal eſtate of the Church) and the Prince are "both ſubject to the Laws, tho' they can both exempt "others from them, and tho' the latter be above the "Aſſembly of the State, and the former above the "Councils. And in another Theſis, ſpeaking of ex"communication, he ſays, quod nuda cogitatione non"nunquam incurritur, & ob unius noxam familiam omnem"& civitatem plerumque ferit, that thought alone may "make us fall under an excommunication, and that "for the fault of one perſon a whole family, and even "a whole city generally incurs it. The King's Coun"ſel complained of this to our Grand-Chambre; "their complaint was very well received, and it was "ordered, that Criton ſhould come immediately to "ſpeak to the Attorney General, and that the diſpu"tation ſhould be put off. After he had been heard "the next day, and the opinion of the Doctors of "Canon-Law had been taken, it was ordered, that "the parties ſhould have a hearing very ſoon, and "in the mean time Criton was forbidden to hold, "or to diſpute upon the ſaid Theſes. This was done "on the XVIIth and XVIIIth of this inſtant Janua"ry. We are in hopes to proceed further, and to "make a Decree, which will be read in the Sorbonne, "and by which all Doctors will be ſtrictly charged, "not to maintain ſuch propoſitions, which are con"trary to the doctrine of the Gallican Church."

(1) Lettres Françoiſes eſcrites à Scaliger, pag. 256.

* The Attorney and Sollicitor General.

[B] His widow married Francis de la Mothe le Vayer.] I confeſs, that I had not been acquainted with this, but by reading the Sorberiana, where I met with the following paſſage. "Franciſcus Motha Vahyerius, "of Mans (2), married the daughter of Adam Bla"cuodæus, Counſellor at Poitiers, and a learned "man: She was the widow of Jacobus Critonius, "Profeſſor of polite Learning at Paris. Le Vayer "got all his collections, of which he knew how to "make a very good uſe."

(2) He ſhould have ſaid of Paris; his father was of Mans.

[C] . . . . After ſhe had refuſed a brother of the Conſtable de Luines.] Do not think that ſhe was ſo nice, at the time when Mr. de Luines was in favour at Court, and High-Conſtable of France, if it be true that ſhe refuſed Monſieur Cadenet, it was before Mr. de Luines was raiſed at Court. I mention this with an if, becauſe I have no other authority, but a collection of pieces written againſt the Family of the Luines's. Now the Writers of ſuch kinds of Satyrs are not much to be depended upon. At all adventures, I ſhall tranſcribe, what I read in that Collection. Cadenet's arrogance was not leſs preſuming, when in the year 1618 he pretended to marry the Princeſs of Orange, ſiſter to the firſt Prince of the Blood, and the widow of a ſovereign Prince; Cadenet, I ſay, to whom the King's nurſe had refuſed her daughter, and whom the widow of Criton, Profeſſor of the Greek Tongue at Paris, would not marry; and ſoon after we ſee him ſo bold as to pretend to match into the Royal Family (3).

(3) This is taken from a Satyr or Libel intitled, Le Comtadin Provençal; it is inſerted in pag. 79, &c. of the Recueil des Piéces les plus curieuſes, qui ont été faites pendant le Regne du Connétable de Luynes, printed in the year 1625, 8vo. The paſſage which I have quoted is in pag. 103.

CRITON (JAMES) was born in Scotland in the ſixteenth Century; he was one of the moſt extraordinary prodigies for wit, that have ever been ſeen (a). There is a long Article of him in Moreri.

(a) See Aldus Manucius, ſon of Paul, in the Dedication of his Notes upon Tully's Paradoxes. dedicated to James Criton, in the year 1581.

Thus he ſhould have been quoted, and not as Moreri does, Ald. Manucius, in Præfat. Cicer. This Commentary of Aldus Manucius was

CRITON (a) (WILLIAM) was born in Scotland in the ſixteenth Century, and turned Jeſuit in France, in the Seminary of Rheims (b). He was Rector of the College of the Jeſuits at Lyons (c). He made himſelf very famous, not indeed by his works, for I do not believe he publiſhed any, but by conſpiracies, which if they had ſucceeded, had been infinitely more advantageous both to his Order, and to the whole Roman Catholic party, than an hundred volumes. He paſſed and repaſſed the Sea and the Alps very often with (a) His Scots name was Chreighton.

(b) De Larrey, Hiſt. d'Anglet. tom. 2. pag. 385.

(c) Paſquier, Catechiſme des Jeſuites, liv. 3. chap. 2. pag. m. 385.

with his head full of intrigues and plots, deſigned to reſtore the Roman Catholic Religion in Great Britain. Yet, if we may give credit to a letter which he wrote to Walſingham, he did not approve of wicked means to eſtabliſh the Kingdom of God [A], and he ſtrongly condemned the deſign of murthering of Queen Elizabeth, upon which William Parr aſked his advice. The privateers of Oſtend took him in the year 1585, on his return into Scotland to execute a great undertaking [B]. He was conducted by order of the Admiral of the States, to Queen Elizabeth, who was ſo well pleaſed with this preſent, that ſhe gave the Admiral in return, amongſt other rewards, a golden chain (d). He was impriſoned in the Tower of London, where he was kept a pretty while, but at laſt the Queen ſet him at liberty, after he had promiſed that he would never undertake any more the leaſt thing againſt England (e). Yet ſhe heard in 1593, that he had made ſeveral journies into the Low-Countries, and into Spain, to forward the deſign which the Catholics of Scotland had formed of calling in the Spaniards, in order to change the Religion, and to attack England (f). He attended the Biſhop of Dublin into Scotland, whither that Prelate was ſent by Pope Sixtus V, to offer the Infanta of Spain to the King (g). The conditions of this match were, that the King ſhould turn Papiſt, and join with the Pope and (d) Richeome, Plainte Apologetique, chap. 43. pag. 166.

(e) Camden, Annal. pag. m. 604. ad ann. 1592.

(f) Idem, ibid.

(g) Paſquier, Catechiſme des Jeſuites, liv. 3. chap. 2. pag. 335.

[A] If we may give credit to a Letter, he wrote to Walſingham, he did not approve of wicked means to eſtabliſh the Kingdom of God.] Here follows a paſſage from Monſieur de Larrey's account of William Parr's confeſſion. " Morgan told him, that the whole Ca- " tholick Church expected a great and bold action " from his courage; and this wicked wretch aſſured " him, that he was ready to ſtick a dagger into the " heart of the firſt Lord of the Kingdom. Why do " you not ſay, into the Queen's, replied Morgan? " And into the Queen's alſo, anſwered he, if it were " proved to me, that it is lawful: but the Jeſuit " Vattes (1) is not of that opinion. He added, that " Criton, a Scots Jeſuit, was not of that opinion, " and that in order to diſſuade him from it, he had " alledged this fundamental principle, that the law of " Nature, as well as the law of God, teaches all men, " that they ought not to commit a crime with a deſign " of ſerving God: That he had ſtrongly inſiſted upon " this doctrine, laying great ſtreſs upon a ſentence, of " which he made a kind of demonſtration, namely, " that God loved adverbs better than nouns, that is to " ſay, that he is better pleaſed with what is rightly and " lawfully done, than with what is good and lawful " (2)." This William Parr, being found guilty of the execrable deſign of murthering the Queen, was executed March the 2d, 1585 (3). His Trial was immediately printed at London in Engliſh. There is a French Tranſlation of it in the firſt volume of the Memoires de la Ligue. I have juſt now examined it; but I have not found in it, that Parr ever mentioned our Criton, either by word of mouth, or in writing; and I obſerve, that Camden giving an account of Parr's confeſſion, inſerts into it, by way of parentheſis (4), what relates to this Jeſuit's opinion. Thuanus alſo mentioned it, but not a thing contained in Parr's confeſſion, but as an incidental circumſtance, which came ſome other way to be known. It is nevertheleſs true, that the printed Trial acquaints us with the Jeſuit Criton's ſentiments; for it contains a Letter, which he wrote to Walſingham (5), in which he has very clearly explained them. He was a priſoner in the Tower of London, when Parr was tried, and having been aſked by Walſingham, whether Parr had ſaid ſomething to him, either in France or elſewhere, concerning the queſtion, whether it be lawful to murther her Majeſty, he anſwered that he did not remember it. But having thought of it afterwards, he wrote of his own accord to the Secretary (6) concerning this fact, all in his own hand, in the following manner. His Letter is inſerted after theſe words, in the Mémoires de la Ligue, Tom. I. page 42.

I wiſh his Trial had acquainted us, whether this Letter was ſhewed to William Parr. It ſhould indeed have been done; for it was not very ſafe to truſt to a Declaration made in the Tower of London. Criton would never have owned in ſuch a place, that he had approved Parr's deſign. In order therefore to know, whether he ſpoke the truth, his Letter ought to have been communicated to the criminal, or the latter ſhould have been aſked, what converſations they had had together upon that attempt. If Parr had owned, that the Jeſuit loudly condemned the deſign of killing the Queen, we ſhould have a certain proof of Criton's Orthodoxy in this reſpect; but the Trial affords us no other argument upon this ſubject, but the teſtimony, which Criton being a priſoner would give of himſelf. I believe however that William Parr was interrogated upon this, tho' it be not mentioned in the account of his Tryal; and that therefore Monſieur de Larrey's aſſertion is well grounded: for here follows a circumſtance, which Richeome relates. Parr was aſked, by the Queen's order, whether he did not know William Criton a Scots Jeſuit; he anſwered, yes, and that this Jeſuit diſſuaded him formerly from this attempt, when he aſked him his advice at Lyons. The Queen was ſurprized at this anſwer, which cleared the Jeſuit; and that ſhe might be better informed, ſhe commanded Francis Walſingham her Secretary, to aſk Criton, whether Parr communicated any thing of his deſign to him either in France or elſewhere. Walſingham went immediately to Criton, and aſked him, &c (7). Richeome adds, what has been related above (8), and gives us Criton's whole Letter, tranſcribed from the Mémoires de la Ligue, then he continues after this manner. " The Queen having heard " the contents of this Letter; How, ſaid ſhe? they " publiſh that the Jeſuits deſign to murther me in Eng- " land, and this man protects me in France? She gave " orders afterwards to ſet Criton at liberty, and to " publiſh his Letter, not ſo much for his ſake, as to " let the people know, that the Jeſuits did not teach " it was lawful to kill her (9)." There was more policy than ſincerity in theſe words of the Queen; for ſhe knew perfectly well, that Criton's innocence could not clear the two Jeſuits, whom Parr had charged with approving his attempt (10). Let us ſay therefore that Richeome drew too general a conſequence from Criton's Letter, when he ſaid, The members of our Society are ſo far from being the authors of that attempt (of Parr), that on the contrary, they have prevented it as much as lay in their power, according to the teſtimony even of our enemies. For the whole ſtory and the Letter have been inſerted in the collection of the memorable events, which happened during the League, publiſhed by thoſe of the pretended Reformed Religion, in the year 1588 (11). His Remark would have had more weight ſtill, had he obſerved, that that part of the collection was only a French Tranſlation of an account publiſhed in Engliſh at London.

[B] The Privateers of Oſtend took him in the year 1585, on his return into Scotland to execute a great undertaking.] " He had been ſo cautious as to throw all " his papers into the ſea, after he had torn them " into ſeveral pieces: but the wind ſupported them, " and blew them again into the ſhip, ſo that not " one bit was either loſt or ſpoiled; which Criton " could not look upon but as a miracle in favour " of Elizabeth. They were taken up, and carried to " Vaad, who joined them together ſo dexterouſly, " that one might read in them the whole account of " the undertaking, of which the Scots Jeſuit was car- " rying the project to the accomplices. They found " there that the Pope, the King of Spain and the Guiſes " prepared an Army and a Fleet to invade England, " and that their deſign would ſoon be executed. This " writing having been publiſhed, put the whole King- " dom in an uproar (12)." Thuanus was not rightly informed, when he ſaid, that whilſt Parr was in priſon, ſome perſons gave notice, that Criton was gone over into England in a diſguiſed habit, for which reaſon he was ſeized (13).

(1) Thuanus alſo ſtyles him a Jeſuit, lib. 79. towards the end. But in Parr's Tryal he is only called a Prieſt. See alſo Camden, Annal. pag. m. 393, ad ann. 1585.

(2) De Larrey, Hiſt. d'Angleterre, tom. 2. pag. 392.

(3) Thuanus, lib. 74. towards the end, ſays, 1584: but he did not remember, that the Engliſh, in all public deeds begin the year with the 25th of March.

(4) It is printed in a different letter, from what precedes and follows.

(5) See the Memoires de la Ligue, tom. 1. pag. m. 42, &c.

(6) That is to ſay, to Francis Walſingham.

(7) Richeome, Plainte Apologetique, pag. 166.

(8) Quotation (6).

(9) Richeome, Plainte Apologetique, pag. 168, 169.

(10) One was Beneditto Palmio (Parr had conſulted him at Venice): the other was Annibal a Codreto, to whom he had confeſſed at Paris.

(11) Richeome, Plainte Apologetique, pag. 169. See alſo Eudæmon Joannes, in the Apology for Garnet, pag. 154.

(12) Le Larrey, Hiſt. d'Anglet. tom. 2. pag. 385, 386. See alſo Camden, pag. m. 384. ad ann. 1584.

(13) Thuanus, lib. 79. circa finem.

and the Spaniards againſt the Engliſh. It was ſome time ſince the King of Scotland's mother had been beheaded. Sixtus V's Envoy miſcarried in this negotiation, and on his return he left Crito in Scotland, to favour the deſigns of Robert Bruce, whom the Duke of Parma had ſent thither, by the King of Spain's command. It is ſaid, that this Jeſuit endeavoured to perſuade Robert Bruce to kill John de Metelan, Chancellor of Scotland, who had made the Biſhop of Dublin's whole negotiation miſcarry, but that not being able to prevail upon him, he accuſed him before the Governor of the Low-Countries (b). All this is fully related in a work of Stephen Paſquier. I do not know what the Jeſuits anſwered to it. Criton was ſtill living in the year 1615, as I am informed from a book, in which it is aſſerted, that he had reaſons to complain of the Jeſuits [C].

(b) Ibid.

[C] He had reaſons to complain of the Jeſuits.] Father John Fourrier Rector of the Jeſuits at Avignon, (thus they ſpeak in the Collection of the Articles, propoſed by Theophilus Eugene to his Moſt Chriſtian Majeſty, for the Reformation of the Jeſuits in France (14), will not admit into his College Father Creton a Scotſman, that venerable old man, whom Queen Elizabeth of England delivered from priſon, becauſe he diſſuaded the parricide Parr from the attempt, upon which he was reſolved againſt her Royal Perſon. This ſincere Monk, who cannot mention F. Perſonius a Jeſuit, that reſtleſs ſpirit, who is always raiſing commotions in England, but he ſtiles him factious, enemy to his King, now King of Great Britain, becauſe he ſlandered him, and neglected to bring him over to the Church, to the great detriment of the two Kingdoms of England and Scotland. That old man, who laboured a great while in Spain to procure the peaceful converſion of his Prince, and who, tho' old and grey as he is, would rejoice to die in his own country. This good Father cannot be admitted into the College of Avignon; they fear leſt he ſhould procure alms for the poor Scots, who are baniſhed from their home for the ſake of the holy Catholick, Apoſtolick and Roman Faith. F. Fourrier cannot ſuffer to ſee at the gate of the College theſe poor Chriſtians reduced to want, for the quarrel of God. F. Creton, the Father of theſe perſecuted perſons, of theſe Confeſſors of our holy Faith, is ſent to Carpentras as being a charge too heavy for the covetouſneſs of F. Fourrier, the Rector. He is committed to F. Luce, an Italian, Rector of Carpentras, who is reſolved to make his life grievous to him, and to nouriſh him with anguiſh; he dies there daily under the unreaſonable government of F. Luce. F. Luce being exaſperated againſt F. Creton, who reproved him for his diſobliging behaviour towards the Lord Coponio his Biſhop, and towards the inhabitants of the city, will not be ſatisfied, till he drives this ſincere and bold old man out of his College; F. Luce's ill-treatment and ſurly pride force the good old man, decrepit as he is, to beg for admittance in another College; the charitable Rectors deſire to be excuſed. He can hardly meet with one Rector, who will admit him.

(14) Printed in the year 1614, in 8vo. See there pag. 64, 65.

CROI (JOHN DE) in Latin Croius, was one of the moſt learned Miniſters in France in the ſeventeenth Century. He was born at Uſez (a), and the ſon of a Miniſter [A]. He performed his paſtoral functions in the Church of Beziers, and afterwards in that of Uſez. He publiſhed ſeveral books of Controverſy in French [B], but his Latin Works gained him a much greater reputation [C], becauſe it appeared by them that (a) Colomies, Gall. Orient. pag. 184.

[A] He was the ſon of a Miniſter.] Whoſe name was Francis (1) de Croï. He had made himſelf known by ſome Books, according to Colomies (2). The only one I know, is that which he intitled, Les trois Conformitez, ſavoir l'Harmonie & Convenance de l'Egliſe Romaine avec le Paganiſme, Judaïſme, & les anciennes Hereſies, 1605, 8vo. i. e. "The three Conformities, namely, the Harmony and Reſemblance there "is between the Church of Rome, Paganiſm, Judaiſm, and the ancient Hereſies." I have been told, that he was deſcended from the ancient and illuſtrious Family of the De Croï's, but by a baſtard. The perſon who told me this, could not well ſay, whether Francis de Croï had been a Monk, he only aſſerted, that the Miniſter of Beziers was deſcended from a Monk, who turned Proteſtant, and who was a baſtard, or deſcended from a baſtard of the family of Croï. In the title of his Book of the three Conformities, he ſtyles himſelf, G. Arth. that is, Gentilhomme Artheſien, a Gentleman of the Province of Artois. He was Miniſter at Uſez.

(1) Colomies, Gall. Orient. pag. 184. calls him John.

(2) Joannis Scriptis quibuſdam clari filius. Ibid.

Obſerve, that a very honeſt man of that country let me know, that he wrote from Amſterdam to the ſon of our John de Croï (3), what I have here related upon an hear-ſay; and that he was anſwered, that the preſent De Croï's are deſcended from the Family of the De Croï's by lawful marriages, and that it could be proved in due form. I replied, that I would with all my heart inſert into my Dictionary the account that ſhould be communicated to me, as well of this ſubject, as of the life and writings of that able Miniſter, either printed, or to be printed. But I have not received any thing yet.

(3) He is a Lawyer at Uſez.

[B] He publiſhed ſeveral Books of controverſy in French.] He wrote one to prove the Truth of the Geneva Confeſſion of Faith * by the Scriptures, and dedicated it to our Lord Jeſus Chriſt. This Book was printed at Geneva in the year 1645, 8vo (4). The ſecond Edition of it was publiſhed in 1650, and contains ſeveral additions. The Author promiſed two other Treatiſes, the one, to confirm the ſame Confeſſion by the authority of the Fathers, and the other, to confirm it by the teſtimony of the adverſaries (5). In 1655, he publiſhed at Geneva a work intitled, Auguſtin ſuppoſé, ou Raiſons qui font voir que les quatre livres du Symbole, que l'on a mis dans le 9 tome des Oeuvres d'Auguſtin ne ſont pas de lui, mais de pluſieurs auteurs, qui en on pris le Nom, contre le P. Bernard Meynier Jeſuite. i. e. "Auguſtin ſuppoſititious; or, Arguments "to prove that the four Books on the Creed, which "are inſerted in the 9th Volume of Auguſtin's works, "were not written by him, but by ſeveral Authors, "who put them under his name, againſt F. Bernard "Meynier a Jeſuit." Colomiés obſerves, that there is alſo a work of Mr. de Croï, intitled, Semei convaincu (Shimæi convicted) printed at Geneva in ſeveral volumes, in 8vo (6). I do not believe that there are ſeveral volumes of this work, it is an Anſwer to a very captious Book, intitled, La Sainte Liberté des Enfans de Dieu; i. e. "The holy Liberty of the Children of "God." The Jeſuit Meynier, who is the Author of it (7), ſpeaks of it like a Reformed Miniſter, for which reaſon Monſieur Drelincourt intitled his Anſwer to that Book Le Faux Paſtor convaincu, (the Mock-Paſtor convicted,) it was printed in the year 1656. Here follows Monſieur Drelincourt's Obſervation at the end of his Preface to that Book. I hear that Monſieur de Croï, Paſtor of the Church of Uſez, anſwers or has already anſwered fully and exactly to all that our Mock-Paſtor has put in the laſt edition of his Libel. Therefore I leave the taſk to him with all my heart; for I know how great his learning and merit are, and that he does not want my aſſiſtance. I have heard of a Book, in which Monſr. De Croï pretends to prove, that St. Peter never was at Rome. See Monſieur Sarrau's CXXVIth Letter, p. 130 of the Utrecht Edition.

(5) Idem, ibid.

(6) Idem, ibid. pag. 184.

(7) See Nathaniel Southwell, in Biblioth. Script. Societat. Jeſu, pag. 122. where he ſays, that this book had been printed twenty times, and that the laſt edition was that of Nimes, in 1660.

* The Articles of belief.

(4) Colomiés, Gall. Orient. pag. 184.

[C] . . . His Latin Works gained him a much greater reputation.] In the year 1632 he publiſhed Specimen Conjecturarum & Obſervationum in quædam Origenis Irenæi & Tertulliani Loca. i. e. "An Eſſay of "Conjectures and Obſervations upon ſome paſſages in "Origen, Irenæus, and Tertullian." Twelve years after he publiſhed his Obſervationes Sacræ & Hiſtoricæ that he perfectly well underſtood the Languages, Criticks, Hebrew Learning, Eccleſiaſtical Antiquity, and all that is meant by the words Philology and Polymathy or extenſive learning. He pretended in ſome manner to be an univerſal man, and even undertook to cenſure Monſieur Balzac upon his mother-tongue [D]. When the controverſy concerning univerſal Grace was carried on with the greateſt heat, each party endeavoured to get him on their ſide. The aſſerters of particular grace were the moſt diligent, and prepoſſeſſed him againſt univerſal grace to ſuch a degree, that he went to the general Synod of Alençon in a terrible paſſion, and full of threatnings (b). Mr. Amyraut boaſted that he had appeaſed him in a converſation, which laſted ſome hours. Others pretend, that Croï, having perceived afterwards, that Amyraut had impoſed upon him, was very angry at it (c). He died Auguſt the 31ſt 1659.

(b) See the Preface of Mr. Amyraut's Specimen Animadverſionum.

(c) See And. Rivet. Ep. Apol. and Du Moulin, Præf. Judic. de Amyr. Libro contra Spanh.

in Novum Teſtamentum. i. e. "Sacred and Hiſtorical "Obſervations upon the New Teſtament:" in which Heinſius is terribly cenſured. In divers paſſages of theſe two works he promiſes ſeveral others, which in all likelihood will never be printed. It is a pity; for we might learn an infinite number of things in them. He did not abuſe Daniel Heinſius only, he alſo extended his proud and biting criticiſm upon Father Petavius, who had examined and cenſured (8) the Specimen Conjecturarum. This Jeſuit would not reply, becauſe, ſaid he, when we write againſt the Miniſters, it occaſions the raiſing of their ſalary (9).

(8) In Fine Syneſii Operum, Græcè & Latine editorum, 1640.

(9) Is reſponſurum ſe negat, ideo quod norit annua augeri Miniſtris contra quos ſcribitur. Grotius, apud Colomeſium, Gal. Orient. pag. 185.

His Obſervationes Sacræ appeared very learned to Monſieur Sarrau, and very proper to deſtroy Heinſius's reputation (10). He wrote to Salmaſius, that the Author had twenty five Books like that ready for the preſs (11). He alſo wrote to him, that Heinſius had endeavoured to prevent the printing of his adverſary's Book (12), and had even deſired him in a very civil Letter to uſe him handſomely (13).

(10) Sarrau, Epiſt. 102. pag. 103, 104.

(11) Idem, Epiſt. 103. pag. 105.

(12) Idem, Epiſt. 102. pag. 103. See alſo Epiſt. 94. pag. 94.

(13) Idem, Epiſt. 81. pag. 81.

[D] He undertook to cenſure Monſr. Balzac upon his mother-tongue.] This was not the real ſubject of his criticiſm, he made ſome obſervations upon the language only by the by, and occaſionally; his chief deſign was to anſwer the cenſure of the Herodes infanticida (14), which cenſure had been publiſhed by Balzac. This Anſwer was printed at Geneva in the year 1642, and contains 189 pages in 8vo. It was an anonymous piece, but the Author declares at the end, that it was not out of fear that he concealed his name. If Balzac will anſwer this, ſays he, I deſire him not to make uſe of any other name of his own, and not to hide himſelf under a borrowed one, that he might ſpeak of himſelf more freely. I have courage enough to diſcover mine when he ſhall deſire it, and ſtrength enough to enter the liſt, which he will open to me. What is moſt ſurprizing, is that he is as zealous for the intereſt and glory of Heinſius, as his beſt friend could be, and beſtows exorbitant praiſes upon him, and yet he was at that time preparing a volume of mortifying and diſdainful obſervations againſt Heinſius. They were publiſhed in the year 1644, as I have already obſerved. Monſieur Sarrau was amazed at this conduct, and expreſſes his wonder and conjectures in the following manner. Vidi tua indicina Croïi Reſponſionem ad Balſacium pro Heinſio. Plurima certe ſapiunt eruditionem altiſſimam; ſed linguam Gallicam & ſtylum quod attinet, fluit incultus, diſſipatus, inelaboratus, habebitque non pauca politiſſimi ingenii & vibrantis orationis adverſarius, etiam in ipſo argumento quæ regerat. Opus itaque laudo, non opificem, idem aliquando de Gariſſolii tui poemate dicturus. Sed an Croius ipſe autor eſt edendi? Vix credam. Scio enim & certò ſcio, habere eum præ manibus ſatis amplum volumen notarum in Exercitationes ſacras τῆς Φοινιξιδὸς Leydenſis. Ergo quum Gallicè, hoc eſt, quaſi intra privatas parietes opus hoc muſteum laudaverit, Latinè, id eſt per totum orbem terrarum in re non nauci, ſuggillabit. Explica quæſo mihi iſtud quicquid eſt ænigmatis. Niſi forſan Gronovius, quem iſtam Diatribam ad vos detuliſſe audio, voluit Heinſium, ad quem abituriebat, hac ſive arte, ſive officio demereri (15). i. e. "I have ſeen De Croï's anſwer to Balzac in behalf of "Heinſius. There are indeed a great many things in "it, which ſhew the deepeſt learning. But as to the "French language and the ſtyle, it is unpoliſhed, looſe, "and rough: ſo that his adverſary, who has the moſt "polite wit, and a lively ſtyle, will find a great many "things to object to, even in the ſubject itſelf. I "therefore commend the work and not the work-"man, and I ſhall ſay the ſame one day of your friend "Garriſolles's Poem. But did De Croï himſelf pub-"liſh that work? I can hardly believe it; for I know "poſitively, that he has by him a volume of Obſer-"vations upon the Exercitationes Sacræ of that little "Phœnix of Leiden. When therefore he wrote in "French, that is, as it were in a private houſe, he "commended that new work, the reputation of which "he will ſink in Latin, that is, before the whole "world, in a conſiderable book. Pray unfold that "riddle to me, whatever it be. Unleſs perhaps Gro-"novius, who I hear brought that Diſſertation to you, "would by this artifice or kindneſs, gain Heinſius's "good will, to whom he was ſoon to go."

(14) It is the Title of one of Heinſius's Tragedies.

(15) Sarravius, in Epiſtola ad Alex. Morum, Scripta Lutetiæ. Idem, Januar. 1642, pag. 39, 40. edit. Ultraj. 1697.

☞ CROMWELL (OLIVER) was born in the pariſh of St. John at Huntingdon April the 24th (a) or 25th (b) 1599, and deſcended of an antient and conſiderable family in that county [A]. His father Mr. Robert Cromwell, ſecond ſon of Sir Henry Cromwell, and younger brother of Sir Oliver, who at his houſe at Hinchingbrook made the nobleſt entertainment for King James I at his acceſſion to the Engliſh Crown, that had ever been offered by a private ſubject, had not above three hundred pounds per annum (c). He married Elizabeth ſiſter to Sir Thomas, ſon of Sir Richard Steward Knights (d). He took great care of his ſon's education, and ſent him to Sidney-College in Cambridge [B], where he was admitted April the 23d 1616, under the tuition of Mr. Richard

(a) Wood, Faſti Oxon. vol. 2. col. 88. 2d edit. London 1721.

(b) Life of Oliver Cromwell, Lord Protector of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland and Ireland. Impartially collected from the beſt Hiſtorians, and ſeveral original Manuſcripts, pag. 1. 2d edit. London 1725, in 8vo.

(c) Ibid. pag. 1, 2.

(d) Wood, ubi ſupra.

[A] Deſcended of an ancient and conſiderable Family in Huntingdonſhire.] The name of the family, from whence he was deſcended, was not originally Cromwell, but Williams. Morgan Williams, ſon and heir of William, of a very ancient family in Wales, married the ſiſter of Thomas Lord Cromwell, and Earl of Eſſex in the reign of Henry VIII. By her he had Richard, who was knighted by that King, and took the name of his uncle Cromwell, tho' he kept the arms of Williams. He married Frances, daughter and co-heir of Sir Thomas Murſyn; and upon the diſſolution of the Monaſteries, obtained all thoſe lands in Huntingtonſhire, which belonged to any of them in that County, and which amounted to a prodigious value. And this was the firſt ſettling of that Family in that County. He had a ſon, Sir Henry Cromwell, who was knighted by Queen Elizabeth in the 6th year of her reign, and married Joan daughter and heir of Sir Ralph Warren, and made his chief ſeat upon the ruins of an houſe of Nuns at Hinchingbrook. He had ſix ſons, Oliver, afterwards Sir Oliver; Robert, Henry, Richard, Philip, and Ralph. The ſecond ſon Robert, was father of Oliver the Protector (1).

(1) See Carrington's Hiſtory of the Life and Death of his moſt ſerene Highneſs, Oliver, late Lord Protector, pag. 3. edit. London 1659 in 12mo. and Appendix to the Life of Oliver Cromwell, pag. 409, 410. 2d edit. London 1725 in 8vo.

[B] Sent him to Sidney-College in Cambridge.] Carrington (2) tells us, that while he was a Student in this Univerſity, a public repreſentation being to be performed, he that was to repreſent the King's part falling ſick, this our Cromwell was ſaid to have taken the part upon

(2) Ubi ſupra, pag. 3, 4.

Richard Howlet (e), who then obſerved, that he was not ſo much addicted to ſpeculation, as to action (f). Whilſt he was there his father died, upon which he returned home, and led an extravagant kind of life (g), ſo that his mother was adviſed to ſend him up to Lincoln's-Inn, where he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of the Law. But not liking that ſedentary employment he ſoon returned to the country, and followed his former vicious courſes, to the waſting of a great part of his paternal eſtate. At laſt he became greatly reformed and religious [C]; and having an eſtate of four or five hundred pounds a year left him by Sir Robert Steward, his uncle by his mother's ſide, he married Elizabeth, daughter of Sir James Bouchier of Eſſex (h). In 1628 he was one of the Committee of Religion in King Charles the Iſt's third Parliament; and in 1637 the Puritans, to whom Mr. Cromwell adhered, being ſeverely treated by Archbiſhop Laud, he reſolved with ſeveral other Gentlemen to remove to New-England, but was prevented by a Proclamation forbidding the diſorderly tranſporting his Majeſty's ſubjects to the Plantations in America without a Royal Licence. In 1638 he oppoſed the draining of the Fens in Lincolnſhire and the Iſle of Ely, which gained him ſuch an intereſt, that he was elected Burgeſs for the Town of Cambridge in 1640 [D], to ſerve in the Long Parliament, in which he vigorouſly promoted the grand Remonſtrance (i). At the breaking out of the war, he was made Captain of a Troop of Horſe, and ſecured the Town of Cambridge, and took Sir Thomas Conneſby (k) High-Sheriff of Hertfordſhire, priſoner, at St. Albans. In 1643 he was made a Colonel, and by his own management raiſed a Regiment of a thouſand Horſe, with which he was very active for the Parliament. He was ſoon after appointed Lieutenant General to the Earl of Mancheſter, and routed the King's forces near Grantham, relieved Gainſborough, and in 1644 advanced to the ſiege of York, and gained the battle of Marſton-Moor [E]. The Earl of Eſſex, and the Scots Commiſſioners

(e) Deſiderata Curioſa. By Francis Peck, M. A. vol. 2. lib. 7. num. 21. B. 66. edit. London 1735 in fol.

(f) The Perfect Politician: Or a full View of the Life and Actions (Military and Civil) of O. Cromwell. Whereunto is added his Character, &c. pag. 2. edit. London 1660, in 24°.

(g) Wood, ubi ſupra; and Life of Cromwell, pag. 2.

(b) Wood, ubi ſupra, and Life of Cromwell, pag. 2.

(i) Life of Cromwell. pag. 4, 5.

(k) The Perfect Politician, pag. 3. S. Carrington in his Hiſtory of the Life and Death of his moſt ſerene Highneſs, Oliver late Lord Protector, pag. 6. edit. London 1659 in 12mo, calls him Sir Thomas Comet.

on himſelf, and ſo well employed the little time he had to get it by heart, as it ſeemed that it was infuſed into him, and whereby he repreſented a King with ſo much grace and majeſty, as if that eſtate had been natural unto him. The Author in the margin obſerves that this public Repreſentation was intitled, Lingua, the Combat of the Senſes. And Winſtanley (3) informs us, that this piece was written by Anthony Brewer, and "being once acted at Combridge, the late Uſurper "Cromwell had therein the part of Tactus, the ſub"ſtance of the Play being a contention among the "ſenſes for a Crown, which Lingua, who would "have made up a ſixth ſenſe, had laid for them to find, "having this Inſcription,

(3) Lives of the moſt famous Engliſh Poets, pag. 114, 115. edit. London 1687.

"Which of the five that doth deſerve it beſt,
"Shall have his temples with this coronet bleſt.

"This mock-contention for a Crown is ſaid to ſwell "his ambition ſo high, that afterwards he contended "for it in earneſt, heading ſuch a notable Rebellion, "as had almoſt ruined three flouriſhing Kingdoms." Gerard Langbaine (4) mentions this Play, and obſerves, that Winſtanley is miſtaken in aſcribing it to Brewer; and that it was printed at London in 4to. We have in our hands an Edition of it printed in 24to at London 1657, under the following title: Lingua: or the Combat of the Tongue and the Five Senſes for Superiority. A ſerious Comedy. Firſt acted at Trinity-College in Cambridge: after at the Free-School at Huntington. We ſhall give the reader a Soliloquy of Tactus, which part was acted by Cromwell, in the 6th Scene of the firſt Act.

(4) Account of the Engliſh Dramatick Poets, pag. 538. edit. Oxford 1691.

Tactus ſolus.

TACT. Tactus, thy ſneezing ſomewhat did portend.
Was ever man ſo fortunate as I?
To break his ſhinnes at ſuch a ſtumbling-block.
Roſes and baies pack hence. This crown and robe
My brows and body circles and inveſts.
How gallantly it fits me? ſure the ſlave
Meaſur'd my head, that wrought this coronet.
They lie, that ſay complexions cannot change:
My blood's ennobled, and I am transformed
Unto the ſacred temper of a King.
Methink I heare my noble paraſites
Styling me Cæſar, or great Alexander,
Licking my feet, and wond'ring where I got
This pretious oyntment. How my pace is mended,
How princely do I ſpeak, how ſharp I threaten!
Peaſants, I'll curb your head-ſtrong impudence,
And make you tremble when the Lion roars,
Ye earth-bred worms. O for a Loking-glaſſe:
Poets will write whole volumes of this change.
Where's my attendants? Come hither, Sirrah, quickly,
Or by the wings of Hermes. ——

[C] At laſt he became greatly reformed and religious.] After his reformation, he adhered for ſome time to the Church of England, very devoutly attending on the public ſervice; but at length he became a zealous friend to the Puritans, frequently entertaining their Miniſters at his houſe. At this time he is ſaid to have been ſo ſcrupulouſly juſt, that having ſome years before won thirty pounds of one Mr. Calton at play, he now paid it him back again, telling him that he had got it by indirect and unlawful means, and that it would be a ſin in him to keep it any longer (5). Mr. Wood (6) tells us, that he pretended to Saintſhip upon his removal to the Iſle of Ely, and more frequently and publicly owned himſelf a Teacher.

(5) Life of Oliver Cromwell, pag. 2, 3.

(6) Faſti Oxon. vol. 2. col. 88, 89. 2d edit. London 1721.

[D] Elected Burgeſs for the Town of Cambridge in 1640.] Mr. Wood (7) writes as follows: "In 1640 "he, by the endeavours of one Richard Tyms (after"wards Alderman of Cambridge) who had ſeveral "times heard him preach at Ely, was firſt made free "of the Corporation of Cambridge, then a Burgeſs "thereof to ſit in that unhappy Parliament, which "began at Weſtminſter 3d Nov. 1640."

(7) Ibid. col. 89.

[E] Gained the battle of Marſton-Moor.] Denzil Lord Holles (8) denies Cromwell to have had any ſhare in this victory, and affirms, that he acted a very cowardly part on this as well as other occaſions. His words are as follow: And however Lieutenant-General Cromwell had the impudence and boldneſs to aſſume much of the honour of it to himſelf, or rather, Herod-like, to ſuffer others to magnify him and adore him for it (for I can ſcarce believe he ſhould be ſo impudent to give it to himſelf, ſo conſcious as he muſt be of his own baſe cowardlineſs) thoſe who did the principal ſervice that day, were Major General Lesley, who commanded the Scots Horſe, Major General Crawford, who was Major General to the Earl of Mancheſter's Brigade, and Sir Thomas Fairfax, who under his father commanded the Northern Brigade. But my friend Cromwell had neither part nor lot in the buſineſs; for I have ſeveral times heard it from Crawford's own mouth (and I think I ſhall not be miſtaken if I ſay Cromwell himſelf has heard it from him, for he once ſaid it aloud in Weſtminſter-Hall, when Cromwell paſt by him, with a deſign he might hear him) that when the whole Army at Marſton-Moor was in a fair poſſibility to be utterly routed, and a great part of it running, he ſaw the Body of Horſe of that Brigade ſtanding ſtill, and to his ſeeming doubtful which way to charge, backward or forward, when he came up to them in a great paſſion, reviling them with the name of poltroons and cowards, and aſked them, if they would ſtand ſtill and ſee the day loſt? Whereupon Cromwell ſhewed himſelf, and in a pitiful voice ſaid, Major General, what ſhall I do? He (begging pardon for what he had ſaid, not knowing he was there, towards whom he knew his diſtance as to his ſuperiour Officer)

(8) Memoirs of Denzil Lord Holles, Baron of Ifield in Suſſex, from the year 1641 to 1648, pag. 15, &ſeqq. edit. London 1699, in 8vo.

sioners began now to grow jealous of him, and he grew very formidable to the King (l). In the second battle at Newbury he endangered his Majesty's person, if the Earl of Cleaveland had not interposed, and bore off the pursuit (m). But this battle occasioned an irreconcileable breach between Cromwell and the Earl of Manchester, whom he accused of cowardly betraying the Parliament (n). He promoted the Self-denying Ordinance, and in 1645 the Army being modelled, prosecuted the war with vast success, and being made Lieutenant-General of Horse, notwithstanding the Self-denying Ordinance, gained the battle at Naseby. This with his other successes soon put an end to the war; and the King being delivered up by the Scots into the hands of the Parliament's Commissioners, was conducted to Holmby-House in Northamptonshire; differences immediately arising between the Parliament and Army, the former grew jealous of Cromwell, and he of them (o); so that he promoted the Army's jealousies of the Parliament (p). After the King was seized by the Army's order at Holmby, Cromwell appears to have had a design of restoring him by means of the Independents (q); but the Agitators in the Army being jealous of his treating with the King, he was forced for his own safety to make his peace with them by abandoning the King's interest (r). For a few days after the King's departure from Hampton-Court to the Isle of Wight, he was present at a meeting of the General Officers of the Army at Windsor, in which it was resolved, that the King should be prosecuted for his life as a criminal person, which was at last done, and Cromwell had a considerable hand in the whole affair [F]. We shall give the reader several original papers and letters to him for some years subsequent to the King's death in the note [G]. A Commonwealth

(l) Life of Cromwell, pag. 13, 14, 15, 16.

(m) Wood, col. 89.

(n) Life of Cromwell, pag. 16.

(o) Ibid. pag. 37.

(p) Ibid. pag. 38.

(q) Ibid. pag. 48.

(r) See Memoirs of Sir John Berkeley, containing an Account of his Negotiation with Lieutenant General Cromwell &c. for restoring K. Charles the First to the Government of England, 2d edit. London 1702, in 8vo.

ficer) told him, Sir, if you charge not, all is lost. Cromwell answered, he was wounded, and was not able to charge, (his great wound being a little burn in the neck by the accidental going off behind him of one of his soldier's pistols.) Then Crawford desired him to go off the field, and sending one away with him (who very readily followed wholesome advice) led them on himself, which was the duty of his place, and as little for Cromwell's honour, as it proved to be much for the advancement of his and his party's pernicious designs. "This I "have but by relation, yet I easily believe it upon the "credit of the Reporter, who was a man of honour, "that was not afraid to publish it in all places. Be- "sides I have heard a parallel story of his valour "from another person (Colonel Dalbier) not inferiour, "neither in quality nor reputation to Major General "Crawford, who told me, that when Basing-House "was stormed, Cromwell instead of leading on his "men, stood a good distance off, out of gun-shot be- "hind a hedge. And something I can deliver of him "upon my own knowledge, which makes passage for "the easier belief of both these relations, and assures "me, that that man is as errant a coward, as he is noto- "riously perfidious, ambitious, and hypocritical. This "was his base keeping out of the field at Keinton Bat- "tle, where he with his Troop of Horse came not in, "impudently and ridiculously affirming the day after, "that he had been all that day seeking the army and "place of fight, tho' his quarters were but at a vil- "lage near hand, whence he could not find his way, "nor be directed by his ear, when the ordnance was "heard, as I have been credibly informed, twenty or "thirty miles off, so that certainly he is far from the "man he is taken for."

[F] Cromwell had a considerable hand in the whole affair.] The Author of the Life of Cromwell (9) is of opinion, that Ireton, his-son-in-law, was the person, who chiefly influenced in these proceedings, being a zealous Republican: which party was always averse to any Treaty with the King. And tho' he with Cromwell was in such a Treaty, yet Ludlow thinks, that he never really intended to close with the King, but only to lay his party asleep, whilst they were contesting with the Presbyterian interest in Parliament. But he says no such thing of Cromwell, whom he seems all along to be angry with for his design of making an agreement with the King, being himself utterly averse to it, and supposing Cromwell's main end was to gratify his own ambition; which is not unlikely, and yet he might have been in earnest in the Treaty, and also have designed the public good. Cromwell was certainly no Commonwealth's-man, tho' he was forced to humour, and in many things actually to comply with the party; and as the agitators and their offspring the levellers, who were no other than the Commonwealth's-men in the army, and whom it is likely Cromwell at first made use of to bring about some of of his designs, were the original contrivers and chief actors in the King's death; so whatever hand Cromwell had in it, says the Author of his Life (10), seems to be chiefly owing to their fury, and desperate resolutions, which made him apprehensive of the greatest danger, if he did not comply with their designs; tho' at the same time the contradictions, that appeared in the King's conduct, might the more easily incline him to join purposes with them. In short, what with the danger that threatned his person, if he had persisted to oppose the designs of the Levellers; what with the enthusiasm, that was so habitual to him; and what with the consideration of the King's past misgovernment, which had been the original cause of all the evils the Nation had suffered, and the fear of the like happening for the future, if he should be restored, he having discovered himself to be of a very inconstant and wavering, not to say equivocating temper; Cromwell was at length so wrought upon, as to think it necessary, and so lawful to take off the King; in which towards the last he seemed to be pretty active, tho' always in some doubt about it. Bishop Burnet likewise tells us (11), that Ireton was the person who drove on the King's trial and death, and that Cromwell was all the while in some suspence about it. "Ireton, says he, had "the principles and the temper of a Cassius in him. "He stuck at nothing, that might have turned Eng- "land to a Commonwealth; and he found out Cook "and Bradshaw, two bold Lawyers, as proper instru- "ments for managing it." And we are informed by others, that it was Ireton who wrought upon General Fairfax, and managed the affair of the Army's Remonstrance, and purging the Parliament, and brought it about.

(9) Pag. 109.

(10) Pag. 110.

(11) History of his own Time, vol. 1.

[G] We shall give the reader several original Papers and Letters to him for some years subsequent to the King's Death in the Note.] We have selected these out of a great number of original Papers relating to Cromwell's affairs, which formerly belonged to Milton, who was Latin Secretary to the Commonwealth and to the Protector, and were communicated to us by a very ingenious Gentleman (12). The first Paper is indorsed thus: Intelligence from Edinborough, received July 30th 1649: and is as follows, (12) Mr. John Nickolls.

Edin. July 24. 1649.

"The 18th instant a Letter sent by an Expres to "the Governor of Newcastle, desireing, acording to "his promise and Lieut. Generall Cromwell's, the "Cannon to be restored, which weare taken, uppon "surrender of the English Garrisons to Lieut. Generall "Crumwell immediately after the last engagament. "The same daye passed an Act of Parliament prohi- "biting any to goe into Ireland, except such as had "Passes from the Committees of the Countyes, from "whence they come. Letters from France saye the "King's servants baggage are gon for Ireland. The "Duke Longevyle hath 20000 gallant men ready for "service, which 'tis conceived may bee at the King's "command. The peace between the King and the "Parrisians said to bee of noe long contynuance: no- "thing less than liefe or banishment of the Cardinall, "who is suspected to be too familiar with the Queene "Regient

Commonwealth being ſet up, Cromwell in July 1649 (s) was ſent over to Ireland as Lord Governor both as to the civil and military affairs of that Kingdom for three years, and reduced almoſt the whole country in about nine months, and returned triumphant to England in May 1650 (t). The ſame year the Scots having raiſed an army for the ſupport

(s) He ſet out from London the 10th of that month. Whitelocke, pag. 413.

(t) He came to London on the 31ſt of that month. Idem pag. 457.

" Regient of France, will ſerve the Pariſians. Duke " Hamilton and Earle of Loutherdale have left the " Kinge, being much deſcontented that the Counſels " of Montroſs take to much with his Majeſtie. The " 19th the Lord Oglebey appeared before the Generall " Aſſembly, and it's thought his peace will bee made " between them and the Parliament. Mr. Robert " Bayly preacht before the Parliament on Sunday laſt, " where ſpeaking of the Kinge, he ſaid, that though " hee weare not affected to the Covenant, yet hee " was a man of maney ſweete and gracious endow- " ments. By an Expreſſion of a Petition to the Ge- " neral Aſſembly preſented by the Lord Provoſt, Lord " Warreſton, and others of the City, it would ſeeme " the King is expected, tho' noe preparation bee made " for him. It was right deſiring a Myniſter from " the Countrey, that he maye bee healpfull at the de- " ſired and expected arrival of his Majeſtie. An Act " or Declaration for receaving the late engagers toge- " ther with the oath to bee ſubſcribed by every one of " them or of thoſe, who weare in the buyſineſs of the " North, is omitted by the Aſſembly, and now prynt- " ing, declaring the unlawfullneſs of the engagement " and proceedings, and ſweare for the future to ad- " heare nor joyne in any courſe againſt the ſollemne " Leage and Covenant. The Parliament ſitt ſtill; the " Earles of Eglenton, Buckclugh, and Kyrkoodbright " keepe their former diſtance. Our hopes in the " Kinge is not altogether deſperate. Wee are aſſured " he will give all poſſible ſatisfaction, which is dayely " expected by Sir Will. Fleming. Yeaſterday our " news was, that Cromwell was gone towards Briſtoll " for Ireland; and this day, that he is come to Che- " ſter, intending, as ſome fear, for this Kingdom. " Wee are in a good poſture; 14000 on all occaſi- " ons, with thoſe already on foote will near compleate " 20000. Our horſe have orders to be in an hour's " readyneſs, and are to quarter hereabouts, or rather " ſouthwards."

The next is a Letter from Edinborough, addreſs'd For my very loving and much recepted Friend, Mr. William Crydan at the Horſe Showe in the Oyld Balla. It was intercepted, as appears from the Indorſement, February 25th, and is as follows:

" Deare Sir,

" Yours of the 12th with the pamphlets came ſafe. " Never more eagerneſſe to have our King among " us, and mighty workings in order to the treaty. " Thow all who are not malignant will acknow- " ledge great danger to be in his coming, if not " heart-changed, yet on the other ſide they ſay we " ſhall never be well till we have a King among us; " and the ill opinion we have of the Sectaryes and " their wayes, makes us the more vehemently de- " ſirous thereof; and we thinke if we had him out " of the hands of his evil Counſaylours, we could " modell him to our mind, and purpoſe. The dif- " ficulty is how to gett him out; and to receive him " with them, were fondly to betray ourſelves. The " Subcommittee have had ſeveral meetings and de- " bates, and laſt night late agreed to the propoſitions, " which are this afternoon to be preſented to the " Committee of Eſtates. As they are drawne up by " them, they are higher and ſtricter then thoſe which " were ſent by Libburton. The King is abſolutely " required to ſigne the Covenant. The Parliament " ſitts downe the week after the next. All will be " in readyneſſe ere that time. The Committee of " the Army make round work with the Malignants. " There hath been alſo this week much nibling at " ſome ſuſpected to be Sectaryes. Lieutenant Gif- " fith was accuſed; three Articles put in againſt him, " viz. that he left Dowſees Regiment in the Scots " Army, and went to the Sectary Army; that he is " not of the judgment of the Kirk of Scotland; that " he is a penſioner to the Sectaryes, and holds cor- " reſpondence with them, and is acceſſary to the " late King's death. One of them ſtood up, and " ſaid; Thow I could be willing to ſee him hanged; " yet I'le cleare him of the firſt Article, that his leavi- " ing the Regiment was in regard of its profaneneſs. " We heare nothing of Montroſſe, nor of the North of " Scotland farther than in my laſt of the landing of " ſome men there. From the North of Ireland it's " written to Argyle, that Ireton is dead, and Inche- " queene ſubmitted, and Limbricke ſurrender'd. Some " would have twelve, but moſt probable but ſix " Commiſſioners will go for the State; of which will " be Caſſiles, and thoſe who went laſt; and the Earle " of Lothian it's thought for the Lords will be added " to them. Mr. John Leviſton alſo and George " Huchiſon, and one Durham of Glaſgow are in no- " mination for the miniſters. The King muſt alſo " bring noan with him, that are under cenſures, if " he come. The Committee ſitting ſo extreame late, " I cannot give you the particulars ſo fully, as I " would. By the next (God willing) at large. I am

" Edin. Feb. 19th 49. Thyne humbly, endearedly, faithfully.

" The gratifying the Poſtmaſter (as I hinted " in my laſt) the 40 s. per annum, indeed " would do good; and it's but what his " Predeceſſour had."

The next is a Letter to Cromwell from Col. Thomas Harriſon, one of the King's Judges, who was executed at the Reſtoration. It is as follows:

" My Deare Lord,

" To ſpare your trouble I forbeare to give you my " excuſe for not waiting on you to Ware. I know " you love me; therefore are not apt to except, " though in this particular I had not failed, but that " orders from the Councell ſuperſeded mee. Conſi- " dering under how many and greate Burdens you " labour, I am afraid to ſaie anie more, that I maie " not add to them; but love and dutie makes me " preſume. The buſineſs yow goe upon is weightie, " as ever yett you undertooke; the iſſue plainly and " deeply concernes the life or death of the Lord's " people, his own name, and his ſon's. Nevertheles " maie you rejoyce in God, (whoſe affaire itt is) " who having heretofore given you numberleſſe ſig- " nall Teſtimonies to other parts of the Work will " in mercie proſper this, that he maie perfect what " he hath begun. And to omitt other arguments, " that in Deut. xxxii. 27. hath much force in my " hearte, eſpecially the laſt words, And the Lord hath " not done all this. I believe if the preſent enemy " ſhould prevaile, he would as certainly reproach " God and all that hitherto hath been done as afore- " ſaid, even as I now write. But the jealouſie of the " Lord of Hoſts for his greate Name will not admit " itt. My Lord, be careful for nothing, but praie " with thanksgiving, (to witt in faith) Phil. iv. 6, 7. " I doubt not your ſucceſſe, but I thinke faith and " praier muſt bee the cheife engines, as heretofore " the antient worthies through faith ſubdued King- " doms, out of weaknes were made ſtrong, waxed " valiant in fight, and turned to flight the armies of " the Aliens. Oh that a ſpirit of faith and ſuppli- " cation maie bee poured forth on you and your ar- " mie! There is more to bee had in this poore ſim- " ple waie then even moſt ſaints expect. My Lord, " let waiting upon Jehovah bee the greateſt and moſt " conſiderable buſineſs you have every daie; reckon " it ſo more than to eate, ſleep, or councell toge- " ther. Run aſide ſometimes from your companie, " and gett a word with the Lord. Why ſhould you " not have three or four pretious ſoules allwaies " ſtanding att your ellbow, with whom you might " now and then turne into a corner? I have found " refreſhment and mercie in ſuch a waie. Ah! the " Lord of compaſſion owne, pittie your burdens, care " for you, ſtand by and refreſh your hearte each mo- " ment. I would I could in any kind do yow good.

port of King Charles II, Cromwell adviſed to invade that Nation; and Fairfax laying down his Commiſſion, the former was made General in his room, and ſet out June the 29th for Scotland, where having routed the enemy at Dunbar September the 3d (t), he took Edinburgh, Leith, and other places, and purſued the King's army to England, and (t) Idem, pag. 470.

" My hearte is with yow, and my praiers to my " God for you. The almightie Father carry you in " his very boſome, and deliver you (if itt be his " will) from touching a very haire of anie, for whom " Jeſus hath bledd. I expect a very gracious retorne " in this particular. But I am ſorry to be thus tedi- " ous; pardon mee. Here is little newes; only " Charles Vane retorned from Portugall, who left our " Fleet indifferently, and that they had ſeiſed 9 of " the Portugals ſhippes. The Father of Mercies vi- " ſitt and keepe your ſoule cloſe to him continually, " protect, preſerve, and proſper yow, is the praier of, " my Lord,

" Whitehall 3d July 1650. Your Excellency's loving, ſervant whilſt I breath T. Harriſon.

We ſhall now preſent the reader with ſome letters from Sir Henry Vane, Peter Chamberlen, Serjeant Bradſhaw, and Walter Strickland.

" My Lord,

" I have receaved your Lordſhip's directed to the " Lord Chief Juſtice and Pickering; which laſt is " now in Northamptonſhire. We are all moſt truly " ſenſible of the wonted favour and loving kindneſs " of our good God and Father to the honeſt and diſ- " piſed Army, and in them to this whole Common- " wealth. I never knew any thing make a deeper " and more kindly impreſſion upon the Parliament, " who in the generall have good aymes, and are ca- " pable of improvement upon ſuch wonderfull deli- " verances as theſe vouchſafed to them. You may " be ſure we will not be wanting, through God's " goodneſs and aſſiſtance, to make the beſt uſe we can " for the good of thoſe that feare God in the land, " and in proſecution of theſe deſires recommended " by your Lordſhip we have ordered 5000 horſe and " foote to goe into Scotland, beſides the recruits to " make up compleate your firſt number you carried " into Scotland; and doe deſire to know whether you " approve of this number for to proſecute the warr " in Scotland, and what proviſions you doe expect " when once you ſhall be maſter of the country be- " tween Sterling and Barwecke. I am now in very " much haſte, and intend to write againe by the " meſſenger, that brings the Parliament's letter of " thankes to your Lordſhip, which is the cauſe I " ſhall only now adde, that never were your friends, " to whom you directed your Letter, more enlarged in " heart with thankfullneſs to God, and in love to " you and your army, then from the ſenſe of this " late inexpreſſible deliverance. I am moſt con- " ſtantly,

" Sept. the 10th 1650. Your moſt faithfull brother and ſervant, " H. Vane."

" My Lord,

" Were there the ſame integritie with us at home, " as with you abroad, ſurely the Lord would bleſs " us. But a ſecret envie divides us into jealouſies, " and nothing but a mutual guilt keepes us toge- " ther. Your counſels at this diſtance are ſoon for- " gotten. Every man ſeekes his own. And no won- " der; for what good without faith? And how can " men beleeve, who receive honour one of another, " and ſeek not (through obedience) the honour that " cometh from above? (Jo. v. 14.) What will the " end of theſe things bee? Ships taken, Trade de- " cay'd, Taxes increas'd, ſouldiers unpay'd, hated " abroad, not lov'd at home, truſting of enemies, " diſtruſting of friends. It will ſhortly bee a bad " choice, if extremities afford no other Councils but " either where it is not to bee had, or not to pay the " ſoldier the price of his blood. Might it not bee " accepted now if one poor deſpiſed man could ſave " the citye (Eccleſ. ix. 15.) Oh! (my Lord) there " are yet terrible things decreed againſt this Nation, " if we turne not unto them by unfained repentance " and a more entire obedience. Truly (my Lord) " the helps, which I (unworthy I) have offered, will " riſe up in judgement. This opportunity I have " now taken to ſee whether the many ſuggeſtions " againſt mee have not at laſt blotted me out of " your Excellencie's favour, and to find you at ſo " much leiſure in abſence to read theſe few lines, " whom I deſpair ever to ſpeak withal here, by rea- " ſon of the multitude of viſits and intruſions, that " will and did oppreſſe you. This meſſenger, who " hath once had the ſweet influence of an attendance " nigh your Lordſhip, hopes to bee reinſtated again " into the like favours. I am ſtill

" Your Excellencie's moſt humble " and moſt faithful ſervant, " Peter Chamberlein."

" Sir,

" The litle tyme allotted me for particular tranſ- " myſſion to any, I willingly confine to you, whoſe " Letter of the 16th inſtant was gladly received here, " the newes being good and acceptable of the corne's " ſevering from the chaffe in that hitherto undiſtin- " guiſhing ſoyle, the now acknowledged cauſe by moſt " of any worth amongſt them of this Nation's myſe- " rie. We are buſied here (inter alia) with preparing " the reception for Embaſſadors, one from Portugal " being upon his way from Southampton hither to this " place; the Parliament according to his deſire have " given him their ſafe-conduct; and Don. Alonzo " having now received his Credentials a la mode, and " his audience being appointed to be upon Thurſday " next. By a freſher Vote this night the returne of " Mr. Str. as Reſident into Holland is at preſent for- " borne. The incloſed will tell you the Votes upon " the account of that, and proceedings of the High " Court for triall of the King. The new High Court " of Juſtice, ſitting in Norwich began upon Friday, tried " and condemned upon Saturday, who were executed " in the market-place; and are proceeding vigorouſly " to the triall of the reſt that had a hand in that " miſtymed inſurrection of Norfolk. The terror of " the example may happily do good; and help to " prevent numerous miſchiefs ſtill plotting of that " kind, whereof we meete with ſome advertiſments, " and are dayly making uſe of as we may. Captain " Biſhop intends to give you ſome account hereof. " Buſy we ſeem to be about many things here; but " truth is, God's bleſſing upon the wiſe and faithfull " conduct of affaires where you are gives lyfe and " repute to all other actions and attempts on the Com- " monwealth's behalf. The Spaniard in his Creden- " tials ſayes, his Embaſſador ſhall give us a ſatisfacto- " rie account of the buſineſs of Aſcham. It might " happilie have done well, if this account had been " firſt given before any audience granted. But that is " now paſt. Some thought alſo, it would have been " fit to have known of the Portugall Miniſter whether " he had been furniſhed with power to have treated " touching ſatisfaction for damages and injuries done " to this Nation, and to have ſeene a copy of his " Credentialls before a ſafe conduct granted; and ſuch " opinion from hence was repreſented to the Houſe. " But they ordered him a ſafe-conduct without anie " ſuch previous demands. Verie hott manie are for " ownings and applications from foreign States plus " quam ſatis. God grant we may depend upon him, " and ſeek aright for his owning of us, and that we " may be independent enough as to all others. Onelie " doe all perſons and Nations juſtice, and cauſleſlie " provoke none, which would be the beſt way for " furtherence and eſtabliſhment, and teach other Na- " tions in tyme to value us aright, and to doe as they " would be done to. I fear our impotent haſte to in- " gratiate with neighbour Nations hath done us neither " honour nor profit; and it ſeems to me by the mur- " der and diſgrace of our Miniſters ſent abroad, that " God thought fit to give our forwardneſs that way a

(x) Idem, pag. 507.
(y) He came thither on the 12th of September. Idem, pag. 509.

and defeated it at Worceſter September the 3d 1651 (x), and returned to London (y), where the Parliament ſettled upon him four thouſand pounds a year out of the eſtates of the Duke of Buckingham and the Marquis of Worceſter, beſides two thouſand five hundred pounds per annum, formerly granted (z). Soon after this he held a conference with ſeveral

(z) Life of Cromwell, Part 2. ch. 5. pag. 219.

" check, and teach us where our ſtrength was, and " our applications ſhould be. But in theſe things I " have many diſſenting brethren, and I write to one " much abler to judge, and therefore forbeare. Our " ſecond year is drawing on apace to a concluſion. " God give us a good exit; and much good may it " doe them, that court to be our ſucceſſors; modo " ſalva ſit Reſpublica. Some of us ſhall intertaine our " diſmiſſions with much contentedneſs. Much talk " there is of things and perſons relating to the ſuc- " ceeding choice, wherein I may not be particular. " Hugh Peters hath arbitrated between me and Lieu- " tenant General Hammond, making me pay ſound- " lie for my coming into Hanworth at Annunciation " next. But I am well contented, becauſe if I live " ſo long, I hope thereby to atteine to ſome freſh " ayre, to recover health ſomewhat impaired, and " and prevent more waſts and ſpoils. Excuſe this " miſcellanie, and preſent my humble ſervice to " my Lord General, and my reſpects to our other " good friends, and eſteeme me what you ſhall ever " find me, viz. Your true and faithful Friend " 24th 10ber 1650." J. B.

" My Lord, I returne you my humble and heartie " thanks for your late noble and friendlie Letter, " whereby I have the comfort and aſſurance of your " Lordſhip's faire interpretation of my paſt, and (if I " dare call them) well-meant actions, which I ſhall not " deſyre to account for, or to juſtify to any man liv- " ing ſo ſoone as to yourſelf, of whom I ſhall ever " have that eſteem as becomes me to have of one, " who daylie approves himſelf religious and his Coun- " trey's beſt Friende, and who may juſtly challenge " a tribute of obſervance from all that ſincerely wiſh " them well, in which number I ſhall hope ever to be " found. My Lord, I have ('tis true) taken the bold- " neſs to wryte ſome few Letters to you ſince your late " departure hence, and I have ſatisfaction enough, " that they were received, and are not diſpleaſing to " you. Your application to the Gentleman named in " yours, who is of ſo knowne fytneſs and abylytie to " procure you effectual returnes, was an act in my o- " pinion ſavouring of your uſuall prudence, and tend- " ing to the advantage of the publick affaires commit- " ted to your truſt and care; neither can any wyſe " man juſtifie any charge of ſeeming neglect of others " in that reſpect. I am very ſorry, that your Lord- " ſhip hath been put to any expence of your pretyous " tyme for removing any ſuch doubts; but thoſe my " overcarefull Fryends, who have created your Lord- " ſhip this trouble, have I muſt confeſſe occaſyonally " contrybuted to my deſyred contentment, which is " and ever hath been ſynce I had the honour to be " knowne unto you, to underſtand myſelf to be re- " teyned and preſerved in your good opynion. And " if my faithfull endeavours for the publick and " reſpects unto your Lordſhip in every thing, where- " in I may ſerve you, may deſerve a contynuance " thereof, I may not doubt ſtill to find that hap- " pineſs. And this is all the trouble I ſhall give your " Lordſhip as to that matter. We are now beginning " with a new Councell another yeare. I might have " hoped, either for love or ſomething elſe, to have been " ſpared from the Chayre. But I could not obtaine " that favour, and I dare not but ſubmyt where it is " cleer to me, that God gives the call. He alſo will " I hope give his poore creature ſome power to act " according to his mynde, and to ſerve him in all up- " ryghtnes and ſinceritye in the way wherein he hath " placed me to walke. My Lord, I have no more but " to recommend you and all your great affaires to the " guydance, mercy, and goodneſs of our good God, " and to ſubſcrybe myſelf in all truth of affection, " Your Lordſhip's ever to be dyſpoſed of " Whytehall 18 Febr. 1650 Jo. Bradſhawe."

" The cuſtomer, who wronged Sir James L* " is ordered to reſtore and ſatisfie, and to " come up to anſwer his charge, which pro- " bably will fall heavy upon him."

The following is a Letter from Mr. Walter Strickland, with an account of ſome of the papers of Montreul, the French Reſident in Scotland. Indors'd by Serjeant Bradſhaw.

" May it pleaſe your Excellency,

" I was commanded to reade over certaine copies of " Letters written by Montreul the French Reſident in " Scotland, and to give your Excellency ſome account " of it. I knew not how to doe it better than by ex- " tracting ſome of the principall paſſages, by which " your Lordſhip may gueſſe at the reſt. I am bould " to ſay more unworthyneſs hath not yet bene offered, " to my underſtanding; thoſe, upon whom you look'd " as more exelent then thire fellows, will appeare to " be as baſe and meane as the worſt. In the bundle " of looſe papers are many Letters of the Cardinal " Mazarin's owne writing; but in none of them any " thinge of moment; and the greateſt part of the " Booke is ſpent in giving an account of two or three " regiments of Scots, which were to be raiſed and " ſent into France. The levying thoſe men and ſhip- " ping them occaſioned more diſpatches than your " Lordſhip would imagine. But in moſt of the Let- " ters to the Cardinal Mazarin and the Count de Bri- " enne was ſomthing about the affaires of the late " King: the principal paſſages I have gleaned out, " and doe referr it to your Lordſhip's judgment what " further uſe you will make of the reſt. Your Lord- " ſhip will ſee the French thire beſt friendes judgeth " them the worſt and meaneſt of men, if not much " leſs than what becomes men as men to be. Your " Lordſhip will give me leave to tel you, that though " it appears that theſe Letters were written when the " King was at Newcaſtell, Homby, and, I thinke, " Richmond, and at his being in the Iſle of Wight; " yet are there not above two Letters in all the greate " Booke dated, and they were both in Auguſt 1647. " The States Generall are now willing to receive any " from this Commonwealth in the ſame condition they " did thoſe ſent from the King, be they Embaſſadors, " Agents, or other; and now the great Aſſembly is " compleate. My Lord, all our ould friendes thire " wiſh ſome were ſent from hence whilſt theſe great " affaires are in agitation; for, my Lord, it will be " our intereſt to be faſt friendes with them; thires to " be ſoe with us; and that being, noe forraign enne- " mys could doe you harme. Noething ſeems to op- " poſe this but thire ſending firſt to you; which it " may be they will, but then the extraordinary meet- " ing of the Stats will be paſſed, which is the harveſt " for us to gather in our friendes, which will ne- " be ſo much conveniently done againe, and the " French will ſow tares, whilſt we ſleep. My " thoughts are that Jochimy's ſending away, and " thire declaring to acknowledge the Commonwealth " for the ſupreme Power, is a reparation in honor for " the delay received when I was thire. I am ſure it " is honorable to doe our buſineſs, and ſhut the doore " of the Scots Kingdom for all forraign hoopes; which " I am aſſured by as good handes as any in thoſe " parts may now be done. They have ſent to require " 28 ſhips taken from them at the Iſle of Sillie of the " Scots King. If it be refuſed, their Admiral Tromp " is to follow with eight more to compell them. My " Lord, I have noe endes but thoſe of God and this " Commonwealth; which makes me deſir to ſee thoſe " men you now have to doe with ſhut out of all hopes. " I am confident by the Grace of God we may doe it. " Your Excellency will pardon the boldneſs of him, " who is, my Lord, your Excellency's humble Ser- " vant, Walter Strickland. " London Jan. 14. 1650.

" He writes to the Cardinal Mazarin, that the En- " gliſh Preſbyterians ſhould give Arguyle forty five " thouſand pounds ſterling. P. 145.

" He writes to the Card. Maz. that he ſaw two Let- " ters written from London by Lawtherdell, by which " he writes that he who commandes the Parliament's " Fleet

(a) This conference was held in December 1651. See Whitelocke, pag. 516, 517.

ſeveral Members of Parliament and ſome of the principal Officers of the Army at the Speaker's houſe, to conſider of a ſettlement (aa). In 1652 his Commiſſion of Lord Lieutenant " Fleet had ſent to him to offer him to declare for the " Scots and Engliſh Preſbyterians with 22 ſhipps, if " the Scots would victuall them; which he ſaith the " Scots cannot doe, but France may. P. 183.

" He writes to Card. Maz. that ſome of the Scots " tould him, that the Independents did then ſtrive to " gaine the Scots, and that young Vane on the behalfe " of the Independents ſaid to Lawtherdell, that Scot- " land might have all it would demande of them, " provided that they would conſent to ruine the King " of G. B. But, ſaith he, they did not ſhew me the " Letters, and thought it very likely upon thoſe " conditions the Bargaine would have bene made. " P. 201.

" He writs to the Card. Maz. that he knowes from " very good handes, that Waller and Maſſie, who have " bene Generall Officers in the Parliament's army, " who have bene put out of the Parliament by the In- " dependents, have written two Letters within a few " days to the Marquiſſe of Arguyle to preſs him to " com into England with an Army, and to aſſure him, " that all the Weſt of England will joyne with them " as ſoone as they ſhould heare from him. The Mar- " quiſſe anſwered only in generall termes, that he did " diſpoſe the affaires as they deſired, and that the Scots " Army would com into England as ſoone as conve- " niently they could. P. 237.

" He writs to Cardinall Maz. that he found Scot- " land in thre factions; Arguyle's faction, which would " diſtroy the King and Monarchie, and make open " profeſſion of it; Hamilton's party, who make pro- " feſſion to maintaine both, but underhand ſtrongly " endeavour to deſtroy both. The third ſorte are " ſuch as would keep up both King and Monarchie, " but dare not appeare. P. 242.

" He writs to the Cardinall Maz. that the Scots " Commiſſioners had received ſome mony at London; " and that the Engliſh Commiſſioners then in Scotland " had authority to offer them a greater ſome in Scotland. " The knowledge that I have, ſaith he, that the Scots, " though otherwiſe valiant men, have great difficulty to " defend themſelves from armes of this nature, when " they are aſſaulted, makes me confident they will " agree with the Engliſh to the prejudice of thire " Prince, what declaration or reſolutions ſoever they " take to the contrary. P. 299.

" Lawtherdell ſaid, thire were fower thinges the " Engliſh loved not; the Covenant, Preſbyterie, Mo- " narchie, and the Name of a Scot.

" He writes to Card. Maz. that the Scots thought " with faire promiſes to draw the Prince of Wales to " them; that they may, as they find it moſt for thire " profit, either ſell him, as they did his father, or " keep him, that they might oppoſe him to the In- " dependents; for he ſaith, they love mony better than " thire Religion. P. 312, 313.

" He writs another Letter to the Card. Maz. that " the Scots deſir to have the Prince of Wales with " them, hopeing by him to eſtabliſh thire affaires, and " by him to git ammunition and armes from France; " and when they had deceived him, then to make an " agreement with the Engliſh more to thire owne ad- " vantage and contentment. P. 316.

" The greater French Booke, which was ſent from " Scotland, was copies of the Letters, which Mon- " treul Reſident to the French King writ to the Car- " dinal Mazarin, the Compt de Brienne Secretary of " State in France, and Monſr. Tellier and Bellieure " then Ambaſſadors for the French King in England. " A great part of the Booke is ſpent in giving an ac- " count of the Scots in order to the Kinge's Reſtitution, " he being then in thire handes at Nucaſtle. It ap- " pears throughout that he had an ill opinion of all " the Scots except Montroſe, that they never carried " themſelves ſincerely, but doublely with the King, " and the King with them. He makes Hamilton and " Arguyle the two leading men, which had both de- " ſignes to work thire owne endes; nither the King's. " Arguyle's intereſt was in the Army and Kirke; Ha- " milton's to ſuppreſs both, and ſet up another, as he " did. They were all ennimeys to the Independents, " under which they comprehende the Parliament of " England's Army, becauſe it was contrary to the " Scots Intereſt in England. The King was for ni- " ther Preſbyterian nor Independent, but was for either, " as he hoped to make them inſtrumentall to him to " deſtroy both, as will appeare by theſe particulars " following.

" Bellieure Ambaſſador in England writs to Mon- " treul to know whither the King were willing the " Independents ſhould know what had paſſed betwixt " him and the Scots or not. He anſwers the King " was once ſoe deſirus all ſhould be made publicke, " that he had much adoe to perſuade him not to put " all that had paſſed betwixt him and the Scots in " writing, and to content himſelfe that it remained " onely by worde of mouth til he had time to writ " into France to knowe the minde of the Queen of " G. B. and the Court of France. And of this mind " he continewed ſome dayes; but whither it were " that the Scots feared the publiſhing it would give " thire ennemys ſome advantage, and diſorder thire " affaires; or whither the Murrayes feared ſome harme " to thire particulars; or els that the King thought he " ought not to break with the Scots before he were " aſſured of the Independents; or whither it were his " fate to be carried to doe all to his moſt prejudice, " he tould me, I ſhould diſcover nothinge of all that " which had paſſed, nor reveale a word of it to any " perſonne, being of opinion nevertheleſs, that what " he had done blindly, and, it may be, to his preju- " dice, might be done by you at London to his great " advantage, and aſſured me what you did with the " Independents, he would approve. You may ſee by " what I have written, that the King will be very " glad, that you diſcover what he hath done with the " Scots, upon condition, that by doeing ſoe you can " gaine him the Independents. To Bellieure P. 7.

" My Lord of Lothian had promiſed to conveigh " Letters to the King at Homby, but afterward ex- " cuſeth it to Dunferling. Dunferling procures to be " ſent to London by the Parliament of Scotland, and " to be ſent by both Parliaments to wait on the King " at Homby; he is employed to conveigh Letters to the " King. Lawtherdell promiſeth the like, p. 34, 41. " p. 53, 54, 58, 64.

" Men ſay publickly, that Hamilton aſpires to Mo- " narchie. To the Card. Maz. p. 40.

" Traquire aſſures the Reſident, that if the King " will but ſigne that Covenant, that the Parliament " of England ſhall reſt ſatisfied as to the reſt with " what the King offered by Will. Morray. He writes " to the Ambaſſador Bellieure, that Dumferling was " ſent to ſerve the King by Argyle, and to diſpoſe the " King to ſigne the Covenant by making him afraid, " that he was to be poyſoned or aſſaſſinated within a " few dayes. He tould me likewiſe, that the Prince " of Wales was deſirous to returne into England, and " that Piercie and ould Goreing perſwaded him to it. " He tould me, if that ſhould be, the loſs of the King " was inevitable. I am ſure he will ſay the ſame thinges " to the King to increaſe his apprehenſion. All that " I will ſay of him (meaning Dumferling) is, that he " is a Scot, and a friend to Arguyle. 30. May. 1647.

" He writs to the Card. Maz. that Arguyle tould " him England and Scotland would becom but one " Kingdome; and that Arguyle toulde him the de- " ſigne of the Engliſhe was never to receive any of the " Royall Race for King; and that the Earle of " Northumberland had given him this reaſon for it, " that if new troubles ſhould ariſe in the Kingdom, " the cauſe, which now was publicke, would becum " particular, and ſoe they ſhould fight onely to change " thire maſter, not to preſerve their libertyes. Pag. " 68; 78.

" Hamilton is a ſuitor to have a penſion of the King " of France. His opinion is whither Hamilton make " himſelfe ſoveraign, or remain as he is, it will be " good to oblige him; though he ſaith Hamilton will " doe noething, neither for the King of G. B. nor " France, but for his own endes. His Councell " is, that the Card. Maz. ſhould gaine both him and " Lanaricke. P. 76, 77.

" He writs, the Scots deſire the Engliſh may thinke

" they

Lieutenant of Ireland expiring, he was made General of the Forces there; and in November that year had a remarkable converſation with Mr. Whitelocke, in which he diſcovered his thoughts of aſſuming the Government himſelf (bb). He began now with his

(bb) Idem, pag. 584, 549, 550.

" they are conſiderable to the French, that they may " ſell that eſteem to the Engliſh. P. 95.

" He writs to the Card. Maz. that the Scots were " minded to give him a preſent when he went away, " not ſoe much to oblige him, as that they, who " ſhould be ſent from the Parliament of Scotland, " might receive againe what they ſhould give me, " with uſury. P. 96.

" He writs to the Compt de Brienne, Secretary of " State, how he had acquainted Lanaricke with the " gift the French King ſent him; which he takes very " well. P. 105.

" He writs to the Card. Maz. that the Committee " of State were inclined to ſend a new Army into " England, becauſe they fared well in thire laſt jour- " ney, and becauſe the Preſbyterians would blindly " oppoſe the Independents, and ſoe raiſe a new warr, " and hinder the King from accommodating; which " if he did, the Independents would keep thire autho- " rity; which if they doe, the Scots ſee the ruin of " thire Religion and of thire eſtates, which the Scots " eſteem more by farr than thire Religion, P. 116.

" Hamilton and Argyle agree well enough when the " ruine of the King is in queſtion. To Card. Maz. " Lawtherdell offered the Preſbyterians at London great " aſſiſtance. P. 122.

" He writs to Card. Maz. that it contents him much " when he heares the Scots deplore the great fault " they committed, when they ſould thire King to the " Engliſh. P. 130.

" He writs to Card. Maz. that Morray preſſeth " much that the Prince ſhould cum into Scotland; " but your Emminence will judge, ſaith he, how un- " likly a thing it is to give the ſonne to them, who " uſed the father ſo ill. P. 134.

" Argyle's Faction doe principally endeavour to git " from the King a Declaration againſt the Procedinges " of the Independents, to the ende that they may " have a pretext to make warr againſt them, and a " meanes to hinder that Prince from agreeing with " them. P. 134.

" Argyle and his party have ever tould me, they " could not be ſafe in Scotland, if thire Religion were " not abſolutely ſetled in England. P. 144."

The following Letter of Sir Henry Vane is written without a date; but it appears from the Indorſement to be in the year 1651, and from the Letter itſelf to be written not long before Mr. Chriſtopher Love, the Preſbyterian Miniſter, was beheaded, which was on the 22d of Auguſt that year.

" My Lord,

" My laſt troubled you with a ſhort account of " Mr. Love, and our debates concerning him. I ſhall " only adde thus much, that I am dayly confirmed " in my opinion, that he and his brethren doe ſtill " retaine their old leaven, and are [not] ingenuous att " all towards us whatever they pretend; but have " dexterity enough to take us on our weake ſide, " thinking thereby to ſave themſelves entire in their " principles, and gaine ſome, while this diciſive " worke in Scotland be over; for it is plaine unto " me, that they doe not judge us a lawful Magiſtracy, " or eſteeme any thing treaſon, that is acted by them " to deſtroy us, in order to bring the King of Scots " as head of the Covenant. Yet whileſt ſuch, they " help up their party in the face of us, and for their " better encouragement meete with clemency and " favour from us; unto which you are much depend- " ed upon to caſt in alſo your influence, to ballance " your brother Heron, who is taken for a back-friend " to the Black Coates. I was exceeding glad to re- " ceive your Letter of the 11th inſtant from Glaſcoe, " whereby I perceive your Lordſhip's health conti- " nues and ability to diſcharge the place you are in " this criticall. The Lord make us thankfull for " this ſoe ſeaſonable mercy. We are much revived " to underſtand alſo of your affaires, and doe wayte " upon God to ſee him appeare in the midſt of you " againſt this numerous prophane generation of men, " that we judge God is ripening for their deſtructi- " on. Your thoughts in cipher I have conſidered, " and doe finde them very ſuitable to what Lieute- " nant Generall and my ſelf were not long ſince " propounding to our ſelves here. We thinke the " guarriſon of Newark which you have taken in, to " be of very great importance; and have had our " thoughts of ſupplyes from Ireland allready, and " have writt about them as my former hath acquaint- " ed you. Care will be taken in the proviſions you " deſire from Cheſter, Liver-Poole, Briſtoll &c. and " about a ſmall veſſel from Cheſter, if any be to be " had from that coaſt. Alſo concerning the traces " you write for, which will be ſpeeded unto you. " The Lord goe before you in this greate worke, and " ſanctify all his wondrous ſalvations unto us; for " we are like the children of Iſrael in former times, " rather hardned, and made worſe, for the moſt of " us, by God's appearances and deliverances, then " brought neerer to him; which if it continue with " us will be bitternes in the latter end. It is only " in God's hand to ſhorten the buſines you are up- " on; yet through God's bleſſing the way you pitch " upon is likely to put the ennemy to it, and ſatisfy " all the world that you have done your parts before " the winter come upon your backe, whatever they " doe to avoyd engaging. From Ireland we had " nothing ſince my laſt, but expect to hear that " worke to ſhorten apace. France ſeems to be much " out of frame, and Prince Condé is ſecuring himſelf " as well as he can there againſt the Maſariniſts and " the majority of the young King. Portugall 'tis " thought will be neceſſitated to comply with us. " 'Tis reported he hath refuſed Rupert his Ports, be- " ing lately att anchor before the mouth of the river " of Liſbone, and that an Ambaſſador of Portugall " will ſhortly be ſent to us. But theſe are only " Merchants thoughts, as farre as I can yet learne. " The Low-countrys are very uneaſy att this time, " whether conſidered in reference to their own inbred " diviſions, or as a new fire is kindling under " their noſe betweene the Elector of Brandeburg and " Duke of Newburge; which 'tis thought hath and " will have at laſt ſome ſcurvey aſpect towards them. " All your family are in good health. I am

" Your Lordſhip's moſt faythful
" brother and ſervant
" H. Vane."

" My wife expects not any returne of " letters till you are more att leiſure."

To this letter we ſhall ſubjoin one of Col. Robert Hammond in favour of Mr. Love.

" My deare Lord,

" I came to London [with full reſolution to have " waited on your Lordſhip, having taken leave of all " my friends and affaires in the countrie. And the " rather choſe this tyme, that if there weare anie " inclination in your Lordſhip to doe a merciful deed " for poor Mr. Love in his ſadd condition by inter- " ceding for him to the Parliament, I might accord- " ing to my weake meaſure adde ſome reaſones to " incite thoſe charitable affections, that I know have " ever beene in your Lordſhip to everie good man, " however failing, as this poore man hath miſerablie " beene even to the juſt deſerving of the ſadd ſen- " tence under which he now lies. My Lord, I be- " ſeech your Lordſhip to give me boldneſſe to offer " one or too of the chieſeſt to you. If the providence " of God ſoe diſpoſe your Lordſhip's hart, that you " ſhould become a mediator for the ſparing his life " (for probablie there ſeemes noe other way to effect " it) according to the frame and temper of men, who " have beene exceedingly averſe, are now in, it may " ſoe gaine upon them, that the victorie may bee " greater than winning a field. For certainly the " gaining of harts is the beſt, the ſureſt victorie; and " truly, my dear Lord, in my poore opinion, this is " more his Officers to complain of the Long Parliament, which on the 20th of April 1653 (cc) he

(cc) Idem, pag. 554.

" more then probable at this tyme. Beſides, my " Lord, when I had the honour to know you well, it " was your Lordſhip's way in your affaires, and " ſure it was the good way, the way of God, to " give a full ſummones before blood was ſhed. I " cannot ſay but this poore man might have avoyded " his offence from what was to bee knowne; but " ſuch an eminent warning as this, if not received, " will leave like offenders for ever altogether inex- " cuſable. But moſt of all the harts of manie, if " not, the moſt of good men here, of all parties, " are exceedingly ſett to ſave his life from this ground, " that it may bee a meanes to unite the hartes of all " good men, the bent of whoſe ſpiritts are ſett to " walke in the wayes of the Lord. For certainly " though ſome of them are under ſeverer bondage, " and doe not only want themſelves ſpirituall libertie, " but are at emmitie with thoſe that have it, from " their owne darke formes and principles, yet they " are to bee preferred farre before a generation, that " does much increaſe, who are turned aſide out of " the good way, and turne the grace of God into " wantonneſſe, and purſue iniquitie with greedineſs, " following the luſtes of their owne corrupted hartes " till they are caried to that exceſſe of wickedneſſe, " that is hardly to bee named amongſt Chriſtians. " Such as theſe and the irreconſilable generation of " Cavalleres doe eſpecially boſt and pleaſe themſelves " in their hopes of the deſtruction of this poore man. " My Lord, I know you have better reaſon than I " can offer, from thoſe, who are better able to give " it you; and that your Lordſhip is a better judge of " your owne affaires then either. I humblie ſubmitte " the matter to the will of God in what your Lord- " ſhip ſhall determine, and ſhall ſay no more in it, " than this, that as there is none ſoe highly concern- " ed in the conſequences of his crime as your Excel- " lencie and your Armie, ſo greater will bee your ho- " nour and goodneſs to paſſe by his offence; and " then moſt humblie begge your pardon, that I have " preſumed ſoe farre to trouble you. My Lord, I " was boald formerly to acquaint you with my wife's " condition; and truly, my Lord, I find by the " triall I have now made of taking my leave of her, " that it would not only bee exceeding prejuditiall, " but dangerouſe to her for me to leave her, which " makes mee, I dare not doe it; for truly weare it " not for this only cauſe, ſuch is my obligation and " affection to your Lordſhip, I ſhould not have turn- " ed backe now I am come as farre on my journey " as this place, to have waited on you. My deare " Lord, my hart is unfainedly with you, my prayers " are for you; if ever there be occaſion, I ſhall ſerve " you faithfully heare, or weare it not for the reaſon " I have given you, in anie other place in the world; " for I have cauſe not only to ſtile my ſelf, but to bee " ever moſt really,

" Your Excellencie's moſt
" London July obligded, moſt affectionate,
" 22, 1651. and moſt faithful ſervant,
" Ro. Hammond."

" My Lord,

" Your Lordſhip's letters to the counſell by this " laſt poſt have been conſidered, and the things you " write for will bee ſpeedily diſpatched unto you, " and ſome things you have not yet mentioned. For " conſidering the ſmall body of foote that is remain- " ing with your Excellency ſince you have divided " your army into two bodyes, it did ſeeme to all " unto us for to doe our utmoſt to ſupply you in that " particular, and becauſe we ourſelves were not able " to put any foote into the field upon any emergency, " either to ſupply you, or be of uſe to ourſelves as " we were, we have propounded it to the Parlia- " ment, and they have conſented to the ſame, to " give the Counſell liberty to take into pay for three " months 4000 foote beſides officers, the charge of " which will come to about 18 or 19000 l. and by " the meanes hereof we ſhall be able to ſend you by " ſea, and ſhip them as we hope next weeke, a thou- " ſand foote under Lieutenant Colonel Cobbet out of " Baxter's regiment, whom we ſupply again by o- " ther new companys for the preſent, and Gibbons his " whole regiment (all but one troope that went up " with Ingolſby) conſiſting of 1100 men, which we " have ordered to Leith, and we truſt will be ſpee- " dily with you, if the Lord favour them with wind " and weather; and have a third regiment of foote " for you to march out of Cheſhire, if your want of " them ſhall be found greater than ours. We deſi- " ring to have a foundation of a force in the mid- " land parts as well of foote as of horſe againſt all " events, att leaſt to diſpute paſſes in caſe of the " Scots army marching into England, and of your " following them with a body on this ſide the water; " for which purpoſe we could bring 4000 foote into " the field, and ſpare you a third thouſand to Cob- " bet's and Gibbons; but 2000 under Haynes are " deſigned another way as your Lordſhip well knowes, " and the Counſell unwilling to divert that deſigne, " wherein a great progreſs in preparations is allready " made, without a more viſible neceſſity then yet ap- " pears to them. So that if this 2000 be imployed " on that deſign, we ſhall then have but 2000 foote " beſides horſe for the midland parts, unleſs we de- " taine the third thouſand we intended you. For the " mony you write for, we had it in preparation be- " fore your letter came, and have this morning ſet- " tled it, which is two months pay more for your " army, whereof in cleare mony there will come " unto you four ſcoure thouſand pounds, and the re- " mainder imployed in proviſions; and the 80000 is " appointed to be ready to be ſhipt the 17th of this " inſtant Auguſt. There is likewiſe comming to you " two hundred tuns of cheeſe to be with you towards " the latter end of this month, beſides 100 tuns of " old Cheſhire cheeſe now upon the ſeas. And for " all the proviſions you write for from the office of " the Ordnance, this morning they were ordered " forthwith to be ſhipped for you, and the tents and " ſome of thoſe materialls went to you in the laſt " ſhips; all which being alone, and the pay and pro- " viſion for the army ſett in an orderly way till " Michaelmas, and the Houſe doing little but private " concernment, I could not thinke of a fitter ſeaſon " to goe downe for ſome time to my wife in Lincoln- " ſhire, than this vacation time; and when I truſt in " God affaires with you are growing into ſoe good " a poſture, that there will not require the conſtant " attendance, which hitherto I have not given way " to any relaxation in, though to the manifeſt preju- " dice of my health and family concernments. And " indeed, my Lord, it is not only neceſſary for my " own ſake, but concernment for others, who will " thereby have the more roome to carry on buſineſſes " in their owne way, and who without continual " conteſtation and brabling (which of all things is " moſt grievous to mee) will not ſuffer things to be " done, that are ſoe plaine as that they ought to doe " themſelves, Brother Fountaine can gueſs at his bro- " ther's meaning; which is not worth the trouble of " putting into cipher, noe more then many other " things, which are reſerved for your knowledge, " whenever it pleaſes God we meete; and till then " let me deſire you upon the ſcore of antient friend- " ſhip, that hath been between us, not to give ear " to the miſtakes, ſurmiſes, or jealouſyes of others " from what hand ſoever concerning your brother " Heron, but to be aſſured he anſwers your heart's de- " ſire in all things, except he be eſteemed even by " you in principles too high to fathom, which one " day I am perſuaded will not be ſoe thought by " you, when, by increaſing with the increaſings of " God, you ſhall be brought to that ſight and enjoy- " ment of God in Chriſt, which paſſes all know- " ledge, and into which the wonderful appearances of " God in theſe times doth directly lead and tend, as " to the end of all thoſe ſhakings and removalls of " things, that are made, which theſe late yeares have " produced. I have only one thing more to adde in " reference to the publike, which I had allmoſt " forgotten, and it is concerning Ireland; where by " reaſon of the late frowning of God's Providence on " a party of our forces that attempted the Iſland be- " fore Limbricke (the narrative whereof at large will he diſſolved by force [H], and two days after publiſhed a Declaration of his reaſons, ſigned by himſelf and his Council of Officers. July the 4th he called a Parliament, and by an Inſtrument conſtituted them the ſupreme Authority (dd). December the 13th following they reſigned their powers to him (ee), who conſulting with his Council of Officers, an Inſtrument of Government was drawn up, by which he was declared Lord Protector of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland; and December the 16th was inſtalled (ff). Upon this advancement he applied himſelf with great dexterity to manage the ſeveral parties, and made choice of the moſt active and leading men into his Council, by whoſe influence he had the guiding of all the reſt of each party. In April 1654 he concluded a peace with the Dutch (gg). He ſupplied the Benches of the Courts of Weſtminſter with the ableſt Lawyers, whom he had invited to the public ſervice (hh). He began likewiſe to be feared and courted by foreign Powers, and April the 12th 1654 makes an union of the three Nations (ii). September the third following his ſecond Parliament met, to whom he made a long ſpeech (kk); but they debating upon the Inſtrument of Government he was highly diſpleaſed, and made a ſecond ſpeech, and appointed a Teſt, which was ſubſcribed by ſeveral Members (ll). However this Parliament not being for his purpoſe, he diſſolved them on January the 31ſt 165$\frac{4}{5}$ (mm). This, as it increaſed the indignation of the Republicans, ſo it gave great encouragement to the Royaliſts to purſue the deſigns, which they had now on foot; ſo that both parties were in rage, and plots, and arms againſt him. But they were both ſuppreſſed; and the Protector dividing England, as it were, into ſo many Cantons, over each of them placed one Officer, called by the name of Major-General; which Major-Generals were in the nature

(dd) Idem, pag. 559.

(ee) Idem, pag. 570.

(ff) Idem, pag. 571-577.

(gg) Idem, pag. 584.

(hh) Life of Cromwell, pag. 274.

(ii) Ibid.

(kk) Whitelocke, pag. 599.

(ll) Idem, pag. 604, 605.

(mm) Idem, pag. 610.

" come to you by this poſte) I doubt the ſupplyes once " thought on from thence will not be ready ſoe ſoone " as elſe might have beene expected. Your family " are gone into Hampſhire, whether I ſent unto them " by an expreſſe the laſt good newes your Lordſhip " made knowne to the Parliament, that God gave " to your forces on Fife ſide, and underſtood by the " ſame meſſenger of their healths. My prayers are " with you, and my truſt in God is very great as to " the perfecting that worke his name is ſo highly in- " gaged in, againſt the ennemy you have to deal " with; but when that is over, I expect greater try- " alls and difficultys than ever, about the right way " of ſetling that which by ſuch a conſtant ſeries of " ſucceſſes hath been obtained; for which changes the " Lord fitt us, and continue your Lordſhip an inſtru- " ment in his hand to ſerve him in your generation " to the prayſe of his grace, and the good of his " people. I am,

" Your Lordſhip's moſt faithfull
" Auguſt 2. brother and ſervant,
" 1651. H. Vane.

[H] Which on the 20th of April 1653 he diſſolved by force.] April the 19th he held a conſultation with the chief of his friends in the Parliament and Army at his lodgings at Whitehall, to conſider of ſome expedient for the preſent carrying on of the government of the Commonwealth, and putting a period to the Parliament. The General and moſt of his Officers with ſeveral Members of the Houſe, delivered their opinion, that it was neceſſary to take ſome new meaſures, and that it was not fit the preſent Aſſembly of Parliament ſhould be permitted to prolong their own power. The conference laſted till late at night, when without coming to any concluſion, the meeting was adjourned to the next morning. Moſt of them being then again met, the point in debate was, " Whether " forty perſons or about that number of Parliament " Men and Officers of the Army ſhould be nomi- " nated for managing the affairs of the Common- " wealth, till a new Parliament ſhould meet, and ſo " the preſent Parliament be forthwith diſſolved." The Lord General being informed during this debate, that the Parliament was ſitting, and that it was hoped they would put a period to themſelves, which would be the moſt honourable diſſolution for them; he thereupon broke off the meeting, and the Members of Parliament that were with him, left him at his lodgings, and went to the Houſe, where, contrary to their expectation, inſtead of coming to any reſolution of diſſolving, they found them in debate of an Act, which would occaſion other meetings of them again, and prolong their ſitting. Colonel Ingoldſby came back to the General, and informed him what the Houſe was upon; at which Cromwell was ſo enraged, that he immediately commanded ſome of the Officers to fetch a party of ſoldiers, with which marching directly to Weſtminſter, he placed ſome of them at the door, ſome in the lobby, and others on the ſtairs. Himſelf going into the Houſe, firſt addreſſed himſelf to his friend Oliver St. John, the Chief Juſtice, and told him, that he then came to do that which grieved him to the very ſoul, and what he had earneſtly with tears prayed to God againſt. Nay that he had rather be torn in pieces than do it. But that there was a neceſſity laid upon him therein, in order to the glory of God, and the good of the Nation. Then he ſat down and heard the debates for ſome time; after which calling to Major General Harriſon, who was on the other ſide of the Houſe, to come to him, he told him, That he judged the Parliament ripe for a diſſolution, and this to be the time of doing it. Harriſon anſwered, as he afterwards told General Ludlow, Sir, the work is very great and dangerous, therefore I deſire you ſeriouſly to conſider of it before you engage in it. " You ſay " well," replied the General; and thereupon ſat ſtill for about a quarter of an hour; and then ſaid again to Harriſon, This is the time, I muſt do it. And ſo ſtanding up on a ſudden, he made a ſpeech, wherein he bade the Speaker leave the Chair, and told the Houſe, That they had ſat long enough, unleſs they had done more good; that ſome of them were Whoremaſters (looking then towards Harry Martin and Sir Peter Wentworth) that others of them were drunkards, and ſome corrupt and unjuſt men, and ſcandalous to the profeſſion of the Goſpel; and that it was not fit they ſhould ſit as a Parliament any longer; and therefore he muſt deſire them to go away. He charged them with " not having an heart to do " any thing for the public good, and eſpouſing the " intereſt of Preſbytery and the Lawyers, who were " the ſupporters of tyranny and oppreſſion;" and accuſed them of an intention to perpetuate themſelves in power. When ſome of the Members began to ſpeak he ſtepped into the midſt of the Houſe, and ſaid, Come, come, I will put an end to your prating. Then walking up and down the Houſe, he cried out, You are no Parliment, I ſay you are no Parliament; and ſtamping with his feet, he bad them for ſhame be gone, and give place to honeſter men. Upon this ſignal the ſoldiers entered the Houſe, and he bad one of them, Take away that fool's bauble, the mace; and Harriſon taking the Speaker by the arm, he came down. Then Cromwell addreſſing himſelf again to the Members of the Houſe, who were in number about eighty or an hundred, ſaid, 'Tis you that have forced me to this; for I have ſought the Lord night and day, that he would rather ſlay me, than put me upon the doing of this work. And then ſeizing on all their papers, he turned them all out of the Houſe, and having cauſed the doors to be locked up, went away to Whitehall.

nature of Prefects or Governors of Provinces, and acted with prodigious rigour (nn) [I]. About this time the Protector having laid ſome extraordinary tax upon the City of London, he met with oppoſition from Mr. George Cony, a Merchant, who refuſed to pay it [K]. In Nov. 1655 he appointed a Committee of Trade (oo), and join'd with France in oppoſition to Spain; and the year following ſhewed his power and zeal in the protection of the Proteſtants abroad [L]. September the 17th his third Parliament met (pp), to whom he made a ſpeech; but none were ſuffered to ſit in the Houſe, but ſuch as had a certificate from him [M], by which means near an hundred Members were excluded (qq). The Parliament had not ſat two months, when the exorbitant power of the Major-Generals came under conſideration, and accordingly was ſuppreſſed (rr). About four months after a debate came on in the Houſe about changing Cromwell's Title of Protector into that of King, and the Parliament voted him that title, and offered it him (ss); but upon a petition from ſeveral Officers of the Army he thought proper to refuſe it [N], on the 8th of May 1657. However he was immediately confirmed in his former title and authority (nn) Ludlow's Memoirs, vol. 2. pag. 519. Whitelocke, pag. 634, 635. and Life of Cromwell, pag. 325, 326.

(oo) Whitelocke, pag. 630.

(pp) Idem, pag. 650.

(qq) Life of Cromwell, pag. 343.

(rr) Ludlow, vol. 2. pag. 580, 581, 582.

(ss) Idem, ibid. pag. 584; and Whitelocke, pag. 655, 656.

[I] Which Major-Generals were in the nature of the Prefects or Governors of Provinces, and acted with prodigious rigour.] They had the inſpection and government of the inferior Commiſſions in every County, to commit to priſon all ſuch perſons as they ſuſpected, to levy all monies, which were ordered by the Protector and his Council to be collected for the Public, to ſequeſter all who did not pay their Decimation, and to put in execution ſuch farther directions as they ſhould receive; and there was no appeal from any of their Acts, but to the Protector himſelf. They carried things with a very high hand, decimating to extremity whom they pleaſed, interrupting the proceedings at Law upon petitions of thoſe, who thought themſelves aggrieved, and threatning ſuch as would not readily ſubmit to their orders with tranſportation to the Weſt-Indies.

[K] About this time the Protector having laid ſome extraordinary Tax upon the City of London, he met with oppoſition from Mr. George Cony, a Merchant, who refuſed to pay it.] Mr. Cony likewiſe diſſuaded others from complying with it. Upon this the Protector ſent for him, and put him in mind of the old friendſhip, which had been between them, telling him, That of all men he did not expect this oppoſition from him in a matter, that was ſo neceſſary for the good of the Commonwealth. Mr. Cony in return remembered him, how great an enemy he had expreſſed himſelf to ſuch grievances, and how he had declared, That all who ſubmitted to pay illegal Taxes, were greater enemies to their country than they who impoſed them; and that the tyranny of Princes could never be grievous, but by the tameneſs and ſtupidity of the people. When the Protector ſaw he could not bring him over, he told him, "That he had a will as ſtubborn as "his, and he would try which of them two ſhould be "maſter;" and thereupon committed him to priſon. As ſoon as the Term came on, the priſoner brought his Habeas Corpus in the King's Bench, then called the Upper Bench. Serjeant Maynard, Serjeant Twiſden, and Mr. Wadham Windham being of Council for him, demanded his liberty, both upon the Illegality of the Commitment, and of the Impoſition. The Judges could not defend either; and it appeared plainly what their ſentence would be; ſo that the Protector's Attorney required a farther day to anſwer what had been urged. But before that time the three, who were his Council, were committed to the Tower, and the Judges were ſent for and ſeverely reprimanded for ſuffering the liberty they had taken. And when they humbly alledged the Law and Magna Charta, the Protector told them Their Magna F—— ſhould not controle his actions, which he knew were for the ſafety of the Commonwealth; and aſked them, Who made them Judges? And whether they had any authority to ſit there but what he gave them? and therefore he adviſed them to be more tender of that, which only could preſerve them; and ſent them away with this caution, That they ſhould not ſuffer the Lawyers to prate what it would not become them to hear (14).

(14) Ludlow, vol. 2. pag. 527, 528. Life of Cromwell, pag. 327, 328.

[L] Shewed his power and zeal in the protection of the Proteſtants abroad.] The Duke of Savoy raiſed a new perſecution of the Vaudois, cruelly murdering and maſſacring many of them, and driving the reſt from their dwellings into the mountains. Upon this the Protector ſent to Cardinal Mazarine, deſiring him to put a ſtop to theſe proceedings, adding, that he knew well they had the Duke in their power, and could reſtrain him as they pleaſed; and if they did not he muſt preſently break with them. The Cardinal objected to this as unreaſonable; he promiſed to do good offices, but ſaid, he could not anſwer for the effects. However, nothing would ſatisfy the Protector, till they obliged the Duke of Savoy to reſtore all that he had unjuſtly taken from his Proteſtant Subjects, and to renew all their former privileges. The Protector likewiſe raiſed a great ſum of money for them, and ſent over Mr. Moreland, afterwards Sir Samuel Moreland, to ſettle all their affairs, and ſupply all their loſſes. Another inſtance of his care of the Proteſtants abroad was this: There happened a tumult at Niſmes, in which the Huguenots had committed ſome diſorder; who being apprehenſive of very ſevere proceedings upon it, ſent one over with great expedition to the Lord Protector, to deſire his interpoſition and protection. This Expreſs found ſo good a reception the firſt hour he came, that the Protector having received the whole account, bad him refreſh himſelf after ſo long a journey, and he would take ſuch care of his buſineſs, that by the time he came to Paris, he ſhould find it diſpatched. Accordingly, that night he ſent away another meſſenger with a very effectual Letter to his Embaſſador Lockhart, requiring him either to prevail that the matter might be paſſed over, or to come away immediately. The Cardinal complained of this way of proceeding; but the neceſſity of the affairs of France made him comply. Theſe things raiſed the Protector's character abroad, and cauſed him to be much depended on (15).

(15) Life of Cromwell, pag. 337, 338.

[M] None were ſuffered to ſit in the Houſe but ſuch as had a Certificate from him.] The Certificate was in this form: Theſe are to certify, that A. B. is returned by Indenture one of the Members to ſerve in this preſent Parliament for —— and approved by his Highneſs's Council.

[N] The Parliament voted him the title of King, and offered it to him; but upon a petition from ſeveral officers of the Army, he thought proper to refuſe it.] When the title was offered, and the Committee endeavoured to perſuade him to accept it, he gratefully acknowledged their kindneſs, but would not give a preſent anſwer, acquainting the Committee, that he would conſider of all they had ſaid, and ſeek to God for counſel; and then he would ſend for them, and declare his reſolution. He continued ſeveral days under great difficulties and diſtraction of mind without coming to a reſolution. Whilſt this buſineſs was in agitation, the Lord Broghill coming one day to him, and telling him he had been in the city, the Protector inquired of him, what news he heard there. The Lord Broghill told him, "that he had heard he was in treaty with the "King, who was to be reſtored, and to marry his "daughter." Cromwell ſhewing no diſpleaſure at this, Broghill ſaid, That in the State to which things were reduced, he could ſee no better expedient. They might bring him in on what terms they pleaſed; and his Highneſs might retain the ſame authority he then had, with leſs trouble. To this Cromwell anſwered, The King can never forgive his Father's Blood. The Lord Broghill replied, He was one of the many that were concerned in that, but he would be alone in the merit of reſtoring him. Upon this the Protector ſaid, He is ſo damnably debauched, he would undo us all; and ſo went off to other diſcourſe without any emotion, which made his Lordſhip conclude, that he had often thought of that expedient. The Protector in the mean time kept himſelf on ſuch a reſerve, that no man knew what anſwer he would give to the Parliament's offer; tho' thority by the Humble Petition and Advice of the Parliament, and was ſolemnly inaugurated on June the 26th following (tt). This year his arms had great ſucceſs both at land and ſea; and King Charles II is ſaid to have made a private offer to him, which he rejected [O]. A general inſurrection of the King's friends was likewiſe deſigned, and promoted by a bold paper, intitled, Killing no Murder [P]; but by his management prevented. He now ſent his writs of ſummons under the Great Seal to divers perſons to ſit as Members in the other Houſe; the form of which writs was the ſame with that which had been uſed to ſummon the Peers in Parliament; and the two Houſes met January the 20th $165\frac{7}{8}$, when he made a ſpeech to them (uu). But a diſcord ariſing between the two Houſes, the Protector diſſolved them on February the 4th (xx). Soon after there broke out a plot of the Fifth-Monarchy Men againſt him, and another of the Royaliſts, for which Sir Henry Slingſby and Dr. Hewet were beheaded on June the 8th 1658 (yy). Upon the ſurrender of Dunkirk on the 25th of that month, it was delivered up into the hands of the Engliſh by the French King and Cardinal Mazarine in perſon, purſuant to the treaty between that King and the Lord Protector [Q]. Towards the latter part of his life he grew much more apprehenſive of danger to his perſon than he uſed to be; and Biſhop Burnet tells us (zz), that it was generally believed, that his life and his arts were exhauſted at once, and that if he had lived much longer, he could not have held things together. He died September the 3d 1658 in the ſixtieth year of his age; and his funeral was magnificently ſolemnized on the 23d of November. But the real place of his burial is uncertain; and it is moſt probable that his body was buried in Naſeby-Field (aaa). Ludlow in his Memoirs treats him every where as a tyrant, an uſurper, and an hypocrite; and Colonel Algernoon Sidney ſtiles him a tyrant, and a violent one, and obſerves (bbb), that he called him ſo every day in Cromwell's life, and acted againſt him too. Mr. Waller the Poet who was related to him, and frequently waited on him, obſerved him to be very well read in the Greek and Roman Story; and often took notice, that in the midſt of their diſcourſe a ſervant has come in to tell him, that ſuch and ſuch attended; upon which (tt) Whitelocke, pag. 657-662.

(uu) Idem, pag. 666, & ſeqq.

(xx) Idem, pag. 673.

(yy) Idem, pag. 673.

(zz) Hiſtory of his own Time, vol. 1.

(aaa) See the Life of Cromwell, pag. 403, 404.

(bbb) See his Arraingment, Tryal, and Condemnation at the King's-Bench at Weſtminſter on the 7th, 21ſt, and 27th of November 1683, pag. 33. London 1684, in fol.

it was thought moſt probable, that he would accept of it. Ludlow informs us (16), that he endeavoured by all poſſible means to prevail with the Officers of the Army to approve his deſign; but ſeveral of them preſenting a Petition to the Houſe againſt making him King, he made a Speech to the Parliament, in which he declared, that he could not undertake this government with the title of King, (16) Vol. 2. pag. 586.

[O] King Charles II is ſaid to have made a private offer to him which he rejected.] This we are informed of by Mr. Echard (17), who tells us, that the ſtory came from the mouth of the Ducheſs of Lauderdale, who told the ſame to a perſon, of whoſe credit he would make no queſtion. The ſtory is this: that this Lady, afterwards Ducheſs of Lauderdale, being a particular friend and acquaintance of Cromwell's, was employed to make a private offer and propoſal to him, in ſubſtance as follows: That if he would reſtore, or permit the King to return to his Throne, he would ſend him a blank paper, for him to write his own terms and limitations, and ſettle what power and riches he pleaſed upon himſelf, family, and friends. This propoſal was firſt communicated to the Protector's Lady, who liked it very well, believing that beſides other advantages, it would bring abſolute indemnity and ſecurity to her huſband and the whole family. She therefore took an opportunity, when ſhe was in bed with him, to mention the offer to him, and endeavoured to perſuade him to accept of it, it being of the higheſt moment to the happineſs of himſelf and relations. But he, without minding her arguments and perſuaſions preſently told her, She was a fool; adding this ſhrewd ſentence, If Charles Stuart can forgive me all that I have done againſt him and his family, he does not deſerve to wear the Crown of England.

(17) Hiſtory of England, vol. 1.

[B] A bold Paper, intitled, Killing no Murder.] It was printed ſecretly in 1657 in 4to under the name of William Allen, tho' written by Mr. Silas Titus, afterwards Colonel of a Regiment, one of the Grooms of the Bedchamber to King Charles II, of the Privy Council to King James II, and Member of Parliament for Ludlow in Shropſhire in the reign of King William III. The ſecond Edition of this Pamphlet was printed at London in 1659 in two ſheets in 4to under the following title: Killing no Murder: with ſome Additions; briefly diſcourſed in three Queſtions; fit for the publick view; to deter ſingle perſons and Councils from uſurping ſupreme Powers. It was anſwered by Michael Hawke of the Middle Temple Gent. in a Pamphlet, intitled, Killing is Murder and no Murder: or an Exercitation concerning a ſcurrilous Pamphlet of one William Allen, a Jeſuitical Impoſtor, entitled, Killing no Murder, &c. London 1657 in eight ſheets in 4to.

[Q] Deliver'd up into the hands of the Engliſh by the French King and Cardinal Mazarine in perſon, purſuant to the Treaty between them and the Lord Protector.] Dr. James Welwood tells us (18), that when the French army being joined with the Engliſh auxiliaries was on its march to inveſt the town, Cromwell ſent one morning to the French Embaſſador to Whitehall, and upbraided him publicly for his Maſter's deſigned breach of promiſe, in giving ſecret orders to the French General to keep poſſeſſion of Dunkirk, in caſe it was taken, contrary to the Treaty between them. The Embaſſador proteſted he knew nothing of the matter, as indeed he did not, and begged leave to aſſure him, that there was no ſuch thing thought of. Upon which Cromwell pulling a paper out of his pocket, Here, ſays he, is a copy of the Cardinal's order: and I deſire you to diſpatch immediately an Expreſs to let him know, that I am not to be impoſed upon; and that if he deliver not up the keys of the town of Dunkirk to Lockhart within an hour after it ſhall be taken, I'll come in perſon, and demand them at the gates of Paris. There were but four perſons ſaid to be privy to this order, the Queen-Mother, the Cardinal, the Marſhal de Turenne, and a Secretary. The Cardinal for a long time blamed the Queen, as if ſhe might poſſibly have blabbed it out to ſome of her women. Whereas it was found after the Secretary's death, that he had kept a ſecret correſpondence with Cromwell for ſeveral years; and therefore it was not doubted but he had ſent him the copy of the order abovementioned. The meſſage had its effect; for Dunkirk was put in the poſſeſſion of the Engliſh; and to palliate the matter, the Duke and Marſhal of Crequi was diſpatched into England Embaſſador extraordinary to compliment Cromwell, attended with a numerous and ſplendid train of perſons of quality; among whom was a Prince of the Blood, and Mancini, Mazarine's nephew, who brought a Letter from his uncle to the Protector, full of the higheſt expreſſions of reſpect, and aſſuring his Highneſs, That being within view of the Engliſh ſhore, nothing but the King's indiſpoſition (who lay then ill of the ſmall-pox at Calais) could have hindered him from coming over to England, that he might enjoy the honour of waiting upon one of the greateſt men that ever was, and whom, next to his Maſter, his greateſt ambition was to ſerve. But being deprived of ſo great a happineſs, he had ſent the perſon that was neareſt to him in blood, to aſſure him of the profound veneration he had for his perſon, and how much he was reſolved to the utmoſt of his power, to cultivate a perpetual amity and friendſhip betwixt his maſter and him.

(18) Memoirs.

T

which Cromwell would riſe, and ſtop them, talking at the door, where Mr. Waller could overhear him ſay, The Lord will reveal, The Lord will help, and ſeveral ſuch expreſſions, which when he returned to Mr. Waller, he excuſed, ſaying, Couſin Waller, I muſt talk to theſe men after their own way; and would then go on where they left off. This created in Mr. Waller an opinion, that he ſecretly deſpiſed thoſe, whom he ſeemed to court (ccc).

(ccc) See An Account of the Life and Writings of Edmund Waller Eſq; pag. 34. prefixed to his Poems, 9th edit. London 1712.

☞CUDWORTH (RALPH), a very learned Divine in the ſeventeenth Century, was ſon of Dr. Ralph Cudworth, at firſt Fellow of Emanuel College in the Univerſity of Cambridge, and afterwards Miniſter of St. Andrew's Church in that town, and at laſt Rector of Aller in Somerſetſhire, and Chaplain to King James I (a). He died in Auguſt or September 1624 (b). Though he was a man of genius and learning, he publiſhed only a Supplement to Mr. William Perkins's Commentary upon St. Paul's Epiſtle to the Galatians, of which, as well as ſeveral other works of that Divine, he was Editor. Our Author's mother was of the family of Machell, and had been nurſe to Prince Henry, eldeſt ſon of King James I, and after her huſband's death married Dr. Stoughton (c). Our Author was born at Aller in the year 1617 (d), and educated with great care by his father-in-law Dr. Stoughton, and at thirteen years of age was admitted a Penſioner in Emanuel-College, the Doctor declaring, that he was as well grounded in ſchool-learning as any boy of his age that went to the Univerſity. July the 5th 1632 he was matriculated as a Student in the Univerſity, and applied himſelf to all parts of polite Literature and Philoſophy with ſuch vigour, that in 1639 he was created Maſter of Arts with great applauſe. Soon after he was choſen Fellow of his College, and became an eminent Tutor there, and had at one time eight and twenty pupils, an inſtance never known before even in the largeſt Colleges of the Univerſity. Among theſe was Mr. William Temple, afterwards famous for his Embaſſies and Writings. Not long after he was preſented to the Rectory of North-Cadbury in Somerſetſhire, worth three hundred pounds per ann. In 1642 he publiſhed a Diſcourſe concerning the true Notion of the Lord's-Supper [A], and a Treatiſe intitled, Chriſt and his Church in a Shadow [B]. He took the Degree of Bachelor of Divinity, probably about the year 1644 [C]; and the ſame year was choſen Maſter of Clare-Hall in Cambridge in the room of Dr. Paſke, who had been ejected. In 1645 Dr. Metcalf having reſigned the Regius Profeſſorſhip of the Hebrew Language, Mr. Cudworth was unanimouſly nominated on October the 15th by the ſeven Electors to ſucceed him. From this time he abandoned all the functions of a Miniſter, and applied himſelf only to his Academical employment and ſtudies, and eſpecially that of the Jewiſh Antiquities. He began his public Lectures, which he read every Wedneſday, explaining the ſtructure and plan of the Temple of Jeruſalem. When his affairs required his abſence from the Univerſity, he ſubſtituted in his room his learned friend Mr. John Worthington, afterwards Maſter of Jeſus College. In 1647 he publiſhed at Cambridge in 4to a Sermon upon 1 John ii. 3, 4. [D]. In 1651 he took the Degree of Doctor of Divinity. Though

(a) Bibliotheque Raiſonnée des Ouvrages des Savans de l'Europe, tom. 13. Part 1. pag. 7. edit. Amſterdam 1734, in 12mo.

(b) Wood, Faſti Oxon. vol. 1. col. 187. 2d edit. London 1721.

(c) Bibliotheque Raiſonnée, pag. 8.

(d) Ibid. pag. 7.

[A] In 1642 he publiſhed a Diſcourſe concerning the true Notion of the Lord's Supper.] It was printed at London in 4to with only the initial Letters of his name. It was reprinted ſeveral times in 12mo, and the third Edition was publiſhed at London 1676 in fol. to which are added two Sermons, the former on 1 John chap. ii. ver. 3, 4. and the latter on 1 Corinth. xv. 57. In this Diſcourſe he endeavours to prove, that the Lord's Supper is not a ſacrifice, but a feaſt upon a ſacrifice. Bochart, Spencer, Selden, and other eminent Writers quote this Treatiſe with great commendations.

[B] A Treatiſe, intitled, Chriſt and his Church in a Shadow.] It was printed at London 1642 in 4to. The Authors of the Bibliotheque raiſonnée (1) obſerve, that this Treatiſe is generally joined with the Diſcourſe concerning the true Notion of the Lord's Supper; and that Dr. Moſheim, who tranſlated our Author's Intellectual Syſtem into Latin, was informed by ſome Engliſh Gentlemen, that it conſiſted of two Sermons, which Mr. Cudworth had preached at his Church.

(1) Tom. 13. Part 1. Art. 1. pag. 17.

[C] He took the Degree of Bachelor of Divinity, probably about the year 1644.] We find, that at the Commencement that year, he maintained the two following Theſes; "That the Rationes of good and evil are "eternal and indiſpenſable; and that there are incor-"poreal ſubſtances immortal by their own nature." Hence it appears, that our Author even at that time was examining and revolving in his mind thoſe important ſubjects, which he ſo long afterwards cleared up with ſuch uncommon penetration in his Intellectual Syſtem, and other works ſtill preſerved in manuſcript (2).

(2) Bibliotheque Raiſonnée des Ouvrages des Savans de l'Europe, tom. 13. Part 1. pag. 10.

[D] March 31*ſt* 1647 he preached before the Houſe of Commons at Weſtminſter a Sermon upon 1 John ii. 3, 4.] This Sermon was printed at Cambridge 1647 in 4to pagg. 82, and reprinted at the end of his Intellectual Syſtem in 1676; but in this latter Edition the Dedication of it to the Houſe of Commons is omitted. Since the firſt Edition therefore is very difficult to be met with, we ſhall give ſome paſſages from that Dedication. He obſerves there, that the ſcope of this Sermon was not to contend for this or that opinion, but only to perſuade men to the Life of Chriſt, as the pith and kernel of all Religion; without which all the ſeveral Forms of Religion in the world, though we pleaſe our ſelves never ſo much in them, are but ſo many ſeveral dreams. And thoſe many opinions about Religion, that are every where ſo eagerly contended for on all ſides, where this doth not lie at the bottom, are but ſo many ſhadows fighting with one another. So that I may well ſay of the true Chriſtian, that is indeed poſſeſſed of the life of Chriſtianity, in oppoſition to all thoſe that are but lightly tinctured with the opinions of it, in the language of the Poet, Οἷσι πέπνυται, τοὶ δ' ὡς σκιαὶ ἀἴσσουσι.

Wherefore I could not think any thing elſe either more neceſſary for Chriſtians in generall, or ſeaſonable at this time, than to ſtirre them up to the reall eſtabliſhment of the Righteouſneſſe of God in their hearts, and that Participation of the divine Nature, which the Apoſtle ſpeaketh of; that ſo they might not content themſelves with mere phancies and conceits of Chriſt, without the Spirit of Chriſt really dwelling in them, and Chriſt himſelf inwardly formed in their hearts, nor ſatisfie themſelves with the mere holding of right and orthodox opinions, as they conceive, whileſt they are utterly devoid within of that Divine Life, which Chriſt came to kindle in men's ſouls, and therefore are ſo apt to ſpend all their zeal upon a violent obtruding of their own opinions and apprehenſions upon others, which cannot give entertainment to them. "Which, beſides its repugnancy to the doctrine "and example of Chriſt himſelf, is like to be the "bellows, that will blow a perpetual fire of diſcord "and contention in Chriſtian Commonwealths; whileſt "in the mean time thoſe hungry and ſtarved opinions

Though the places which he held in the Univerſity were very honourable, yet he found the revenue of them not ſufficient to ſupport him; for which reaſon he had thoughts of leaving Cambridge entirely, and he actually retired from it, though but for a ſhort time. For upon the deceaſe of Dr. Samuel Bolton, Maſter of Chriſt's College, in 1654, he was choſen to ſucceed him; and married the ſame year. In this ſtation he ſpent the reſt of his life, proving highly ſerviceable to the Univerſity and the whole Church of England. In January $165\frac{6}{7}$ he was one of the perſons nominated by a Committee of the Parliament, to be conſulted about the Engliſh Tranſlation of the Bible [E]. Irreligion began now to lift up its head; but the progreſs of it was oppoſed by no perſon with greater force and learning than by our Author. For this purpoſe in 1678 he publiſhed his True Intellectual Syſtem of the Univerſe [F]; which admirable work met with great oppoſition from ſome of

" devoure all the life and ſubſtance of Religion, as " the lean Kine in Pharaoh's Dream did eat up the " fat. Nor laſtly, pleaſe themſelves onely in the " violent oppoſing of other men's Superſtitions, accord- " ing to the genius of the preſent times, without ſub- " ſtituting in the room of them an inward Principle " of Spirit and Life in their own ſouls. For I fear " many of us that pull down idols in churches, may " ſet them up in our hearts; and whilſt we quarrel " with painted glaſſe, make no ſcruple at all of enter- " taining many foul luſts in our ſouls, and commit- " ting continual idolatry with them." He afterwards deſires the Houſe of Commons, that after their care for the advancement of Religion and the public good of the Commonwealth, they would think it worthy of them to promote ingenuous learning, and caſt a favour- able influence upon it. I mean not, ſays he, that onely, which furniſheth the pulpit, which you ſeem to be very regardfull of; but that, which is remote from ſuch po- pular uſe, in the ſeveral kinds of it, which yet are all of them both very ſubſervient to Religion, and uſefull to the Commonwealth. There is indeed a Ψευδωνυμία, as the Philoſopher tells us, a baſtardly kind of Literature, and a Ψευδώνυμος γνῶσις, as the Apoſtle inſtructeth us, a Knowledge falſely ſo called, which deſerves not to be pleaded for. But the noble and generous improvement of our underſtanding faculty in the true contemplation of the Wiſdome, Goodneſſe, and other Attributes of God, in that great fabrick of the univerſe, cannot eaſily be diſparaged without a blemiſh caſt upon the Maker of it. Doubtleſſe we may as well enjoy that which God hath communicated of himſelf to the creatures by this larger faculty of our underſtandings, as by thoſe narrow and low faculties of our ſenſes; and yet no body counts it to be unlawfull to hear a leſſon plaied upon the lute, or to ſmell a roſe. And theſe raiſed improvements of our natural underſtand- ings may be as well ſubſervient and ſubordinate to a divine Light in our minds, as the natural uſe of thoſe outward creatures here below to the life of God in our hearts. Nay all true knowledge doth of itſelf naturally tend to God, who is the Fountain of it; and would ever be raiſing of our ſouls up upon its wings thither, did not we κατέχειν ἐν ἀδικίᾳ, detain it, and hold it down in un- righteouſneſſe, as the Apoſtle ſpeaketh. " All Philo- " ſophy to a wiſe man, to a truly ſanctified mind, as " he in Plutarch ſpeaketh, is but ὕλη τῆς Θεολογίας, " matter for Divinity to work upon. Religion is the " Queen of all thoſe inward endowments of the ſoul, " and all pure naturall knowledge, all virgin and un- " deflowred arts and ſciences are her handmaids, that " riſe up and call her bleſſed. I need not tell you how " much the ſkill of tongues and languages, beſides " the excellent uſe of all Philology in generall, con- " duceth to the right underſtanding of the letter of " ſacred Writings, on which the ſpirituall notions muſt " be built; for can thoſe poſſibly be ignorant of that, " which have but once heard of a Tranſlation of the " Bible? The Apoſtle exhorteth private Chriſtians " to whatſoever things are lovely, whatſoever things " are of good report, if there be any virtue, if there be " any praiſe, to think on thoſe things; and therefore it " may well become you, (noble Gentlemen) in your pub- " lick ſphere, to encourage ſo noble a thing as know- " ledge is, which will reflect ſo much luſtre and ho- " nour back again upon your ſelves."

[E] One of the perſons nominated by a Committee of the Parliament, to be conſulted about the Engliſh Tranſ- lation of the Bible.] Whitelocke (3) tells us, that at the Grand Committee for Religion, January 16th $165\frac{6}{7}$, it was " ordered, that it be referred to a Sub- " Committee to ſend and adviſe with Dr. Walton, Mr. " Hughes, Mr. Caſtle, Mr. Clark, Mr. Poulk, Dr. " Cudworth, and ſuch others as they ſhall think fit, " and to conſider of the Tranſlations and Impreſſions " of the Bible, and to offer their opinions therein to " this Committee; and that it be eſpecially com- " mended to the Lord Commiſſioner Whitelocke to " take care of this buſineſs." This Committee, ſays that Writer, often met at my houſe, and had the moſt learned Men in the Oriental Tongues to conſult with in this great buſineſs, and divers excellent and learned Obſervations of ſome miſtakes in the Tranſlations of the Bible in Engliſh; which yet was agreed to be the beſt of any Tranſlation in the world. I took pains in it; but it became fruitleſs by the Parliament's diſſolution.

(3) Memorials of the Engliſh Affairs, pag. 654. edit. London 1732, in fol.

[F] In 1678 he publiſhed his True Intellectual Syſ- tem of the Univerſe.] It was printed at London 1678 in fol. under the following title: The true Intellectual Syſtem of the Univerſe. The firſt part; wherein all the Reaſon and Philoſophy of Atheiſm is confuted, and its Impoſſibility demonſtrated. By R. Cudworth D. D. It is dedicated to Heneage Lord Finch, Lord High Chan- cellor of England. The Imprimatur by Dr. Samuel Parker, Chaplain to Archbiſhop Sheldon, is dated May 29th 1671, ſeven years before the publication of this work. In the Preface Dr. Cudworth tells us, that when he engaged the Preſs, he intended only a diſ- courſe concerning Liberty and Neceſſity, or, to ſpeak out more plainly, againſt the fatal Neceſſity of all ac- tions and events; which, upon whatever grounds main- tained, will ſerve the deſign of Atheiſm, and under- mine Chriſtianity and all Religion, as taking away all guilt and blame, puniſhments and rewards. But afterwards he conſidered, that this, which is indeed a controverſy concerning the True and Intellectual Syſtem of the Univerſe, does in the full extent of it take in other things; the Neceſſity of all actions and events being maintained by ſeveral perſons upon very different grounds, according to the tripartite Fataliſm men- tioned in the beginning of the firſt chapter; the firſt of which, ſuppoſing the material Neceſſity of all things without a God, he tells us, is abſolute Atheiſm; the ſecond, Immoral Theiſm, or Religion without any Na- tural Juſtice and Morality, all juſt and unjuſt, according to this hypotheſis, being factitious, made by arbitrary will and command only; and the third, ſuch a Theiſm as acknowledges not only a God or omnipotent under- ſtanding Being, but alſo Natural Juſtice and Morality, founded in him, and derived from him; nevertheleſs no Liberty from Neceſſity any where, and therefore no diſtributive or retributive Juſtice in the world. " Where- " as theſe three things are the fundamentals or eſſen- " tials of true Religion. Firſt, that all things in the " world do not float without a Head or Governor; " but that there is a God, an omnipotent underſtand- " ing Being, preſiding over all. Secondly, that this " God being eſſentially good and juſt, there is φύσει " καλὸν καὶ δίκαιον, ſomething in its own nature im- " mutably and eternally juſt and unjuſt, and not by " arbitrary will, law, and command only. And laſtly, " that there is ſomething ἐφ' ἡμῖν, or, that we are " ſo far forth the principles or maſters of our own ac- " tions, as to be accountable to juſtice for them, or " to make us guilty and blame-worthy for what we " do amiſs, and to deſerve puniſhment accordingly." Theſe three things, as the Doctor obſerves, taken all together, make up the wholeneſs and entireneſs of that, which he calls, The True Intellectual Syſtem of the Uni- verſe, in ſuch a ſenſe as Atheiſm may be called a falſe Syſtem thereof; the word Intellectual being added to diſtinguiſh it from the other, vulgarly ſo called, Sy- ſtems of the World (that is, the viſible and corporeal World) the Ptolomaic, Tychonic, and Copernican; the two former of which are now commonly accounted falſe of the Courtiers of King Charles II, who endeavoured to deſtroy the reputation of it, when it was firſt publiſhed (e); nor has it eſcaped the reproaches of others ſince that time [G]. In 1678, he was inſtalled Prebendary of Glouceſter (f). He had ſeveral ſons, who falſe, the latter true. And thus our Author's proſpect being now enlarged into a threefold Fataliſm, or ſpurious and falſe Hypotheſis of the Intellectual Syſtem, making all things neceſſary upon ſeveral grounds, he accordingly deſigned the confutation of them all in three ſeveral Books. The firſt againſt Atheiſm, (which is the Democritic fate) wherein all the Reaſon and Philoſophy thereof is refelled, and the Exiſtence of a God demonſtrated, and ſo that ὑλικὴ ἀνάγκη or material Neceſſity of all things is overthrown. The ſecond, for ſuch a God as is not mere arbitrary Will omnipotent, decreeing, doing, and neceſſitating all actions, bad as well as good; but eſſentially moral, good, and juſt; and for a natural Diſcrimen honeſtorum & turpium, whereby another ground of the Neceſſity of all human actions will be removed. And the third and laſt, againſt Neceſſity intrinſecal and eſſential to all actions, and for ſuch a Liberty and Sui-Poteſtas in rational creatures, as may render them accountable, capable of rewards and puniſhments, and ſo objects of diſtributive or retributive Juſtice, by which the now only remaining ground of the fatal Neceſſity of all actions and events will be taken away. And all theſe three under that one general title of the True Intellectual Syſtem of the Univerſe; each Book having beſides, its own particular title. But the firſt of theſe Books only appeared under the title abovementioned; our Author informing the reader in his Preface, that tho' the other two Books were and ſtill are really intended by us, yet the compleat finiſhing and publication of them will notwithſtanding depend upon many contingencies, not only of our life and health, the latter of which, as well as the former, is to us very uncertain; but alſo of our leiſure or vacancy from other neceſſary employments. At the cloſe of the Preface he obſerves, that tho' ſome may think his work ſuperfluous, upon pretence, that an Atheiſt is a chimera, no where to be found in the world, yet ſuch perſons are both unſkilled in the monuments of antiquity, and unacquainted with the preſent age they live in, others having found too great an aſſurance from their own perſonal converſe of the reality of them. "Nevertheleſs, continues he, this labour of ours is not intended only for the converſion of downright and profeſſed Atheiſts (of which there is but little hope, they being ſunk into ſo great a degree of ſottiſhneſs,) but for the confirmation of weak, ſtaggering, and ſceptical Theiſts. And unleſs thoſe exploders of Atheiſts will affirm alſo, that all men have conſtantly an unſhaken faith and belief of the Exiſtence of God without the leaſt mixture of doubtful diſtruſt or heſitancy, (which if it were ſo, the world could not poſſibly be ſo bad as now it is,) they muſt needs grant, ſuch endeavours as theſe for the confirming and eſtabliſhing of men's minds in the belief of a God by philoſophic reaſons, in an age ſo philoſophical, not to be ſuperfluous and uſeleſs." In 1706 there was publiſhed an Abridgment of this work under the following title: A Confutation of the Reaſon and Philoſophy of Atheiſm: being in a great meaſure either an Abridgment or an Improvement of what Dr. Cudworth offered to that purpoſe in his True Intellectual Syſtem of the Univerſe. Together with an Introduction, in which, among accounts of other matters relating to this Treatiſe, there is an impartial examination of what that learned perſon advanced touching the Chriſtian Doctrine of a Trinity in Unity, and the Reſurrection of the Body. In two volumes. By Tho. Wiſe, B. D. Fellow of Exeter-College in Oxford, and Chaplain to his Grace the D. of Ormond. London 1706 in 4to. in 2 vol. Mr. Wiſe in his Introduction remarks, that Dr. Cudworth's Book, which is the vaſteſt magazine of reaſoning and learning, that ever ſingly appeared againſt Atheiſm, is ſwelled with frequent repetitions, circumlocutions, and digreſſions, and the ſeries and thread of it much interrupted by Greek and Latin quotations, ſo that hardly any writing will better admit of an Abridgment; upon which account Mr. Wiſe undertook his work. He then proceeds to obſerve, that Dr. Cudworth, having laid down a general propoſition, that the Heathens univerſally held but one unmade independent God, comes to ſhew that the Platoniſts in particular maintained an Unity of the Godhead in their three divine Hypoſtaſes, viz. Monad or Good, Mind, and Soul; notwithſtanding that they owned theſe three Hypoſtaſes to be numerically diſtinct, or to have diſtinct ſingular Eſſences of their own. To vindicate the Platoniſts in this point, he tells us, that the ancient orthodox Fathers of the Chriſtian Church were generally of no other perſuaſion than this, that that Eſſence or Subſtance of the Godhead, which all the three Perſons or Hypoſtaſes agree in, as each of them is God, was not ſingular or individual, but only one common or univerſal Eſſence or Subſtance. This and other aſſertions of the like nature in Dr. Cudworth's Intellectual Syſtem, have made ſo much noiſe in the world, that there was ſcarce a Pamphlet or Book written for many years concerning the Trinity, eſpecially in England, and in the heterodox way, which did not bring in the Doctor's authority; while on the other hand the orthodox treat his notion with the utmoſt ſeverity. Mr. Wiſe therefore endeavours, as much as poſſible, to clear up and juſtify our Author's doctrine. He afterwards proceeds to conſider Dr. Cudworth's opinion about the Reſurrection, who, as appears from ſeveral paſſages of his Intellectual Syſtem thought, that the Reſurrection-Body will not conſiſt of the ſame ſubſtance with that, which was buried; and that it will not be a body of fleſh, but an ætherial one; and that the preſent body is only a ſeed of the Reſurrection. However Mr. Wiſe ſhews from ſome other paſſages in his works, that he has plainly aſſerted the Reſurrection of the ſame numerical Body, as in ſome places he denied it. In the year 1703 &c. Mr. Le Clerc gave long Extracts of the Intellectual Syſtem in his Bibliothoque Choiſie (4); which engaged him in a diſpute with Mr. Bayle (5). Mr. le Clerc expreſſed his wiſhes, that ſome man of learning would tranſlate this work into Latin; but this deſign, though reſolved upon and attempted by ſeveral perſons in Germany (6) was never executed till the year 1733, when Dr. Moſheim publiſhed his Tranſlation of it under the following title: RADULPHI CUDWORTH Theologiæ Doctoris, & in Academiâ Cantabrigienſi Profeſſoris, Syſtema Intellectuale hujus Univerſi, ſeu de veris Naturæ rerum originibus Commentarii; quibus omnis eorum Philoſophia, qui Deum eſſe negant, funditus evertitur. Accedunt reliqua ejus opuſcula. Joannes Laurentius Moſhemius, Theolog. Doctor, Sereniſſimi Ducis Brunſvicenſis a Conſiliis rerum ſanctiorum, Abbas Cœnobiorum Vallis S. Mariæ & Lapidis S. Michaelis, omnia ex Anglico Latinè vertit, recenſuit, variiſque Obſervationibus & Diſſertationibus illuſtravit & auxit. Jena, 2 voll. fol. 1733. Dr. Moſheim in his Preface repreſents the difficulties of tranſlating this work to be very great; and obſerves ſome miſtakes, which Mr. le Clerc has committed with regard to the ſenſe of our Author in his Extracts in the Bibliotheque Choiſie.

(e) Joannis Clerici Vita & Opera ad ann. 1711. pag. 129. edit. Amſtelod. 1711 in 8vo.

(f) Survey of the Cathedral of York &c. By Browne Willis Eſq; pag. 743. edit. London 1727 in 4to.

(4) Tom. 1, 2, 3, 5, 7, 8, 9.

(5) See the Article of LE CLERC (John), Note [M].

(6) See Biblitetheque Raiſonnée, pag. 23, 24. ubi ſupra.

[G] Nor has it eſcaped the reproaches of others, ſince that time.] The Reverend Mr. John Turner in the Dedication (7) of his Diſcourſe of the Meſſiah treats our Author with great ſeverity on account of his Intellectual Syſtem, and tells us (8), that we muſt conclude him to be himſelf a Tritheiſtick, a Sect, for which, I believe, he may have a kindneſs, becauſe he loves hard words; or ſomething elſe without either ſtick or trick, which I will not name, becauſe his Book pretends to be written againſt it. And in another place he ſays (9), that the moſt that charity itſelf can allow the Doctor, if it were to ſtep forth, and ſpeak his moſt favourable character to the world, is, that he is an Arian, a Socinian, or a Deiſt. Mr. Dryden (10) tells us, that our Author "has raiſed ſuch ſtrong objections againſt the Being "of a God and Providence, that many think he has "not anſwered them." The Earl of Shaftſbury in his Moraliſts, a Rhapſody (11) has the following paſſage with relation to our Author. "You know the com"mon fate of thoſe, who dare to appear fair Authors. "What was that pious and learned man's caſe, who "wrote the Intellectual Syſtem of the Univerſe? I con"feſs it was pleaſant enough to conſider, that though "the whole world were no leſs ſatisfied with his ca"pacity and learning, than with his ſincerity in the "cauſe of the Deity; yet was he accuſed of giving "the upper hand to the Atheiſts for having only ſtat"ed their reaſons, and thoſe of their adverſaries, "fairly together."

(7) Pag. 16, 17, 19, 162. edit. London 1685 in 8vo.

(8) Ibid. pag. 17.

(9) Ibid. pag. 19.

(10) Dedication of his Tranſlation of Virgil's Æneid. Works of Virgil tranſlated into Engliſh Verſe by Mr. Dryden, vol. 2. pag. 378. London 1730, in 12mo.

(11) Part 2. Sect. 3. Characteriſtics, vol. 2. pag. 262. edit. 1714 in 8vo.

who probably died young; but he left a daughter Damaris, who was diſtinguiſhed for her uncommon learning and piety [H], and was ſecond wife to Sir Francis Maſham Bart. by whom ſhe had a ſon, the late Francis Cudworth Maſham Eſq; one of the Maſters in Chancery, and Accountant-General of the ſame Court. Our author died at Cambridge [I] June 26, 1688, in the 71ſt year of his age, and was interred at Chriſt's College there [K]. Beſides the works abovementioned he publiſhed a Sermon on 1 Cor. xv. 57. [L], and a Treatiſe intitled, Deus Juſtificatus [M]. He left ſeveral poſthumous Works [N]. He was a man of very extenſive Learning, excellently ſkilled in the learned [H] Left a daughter Damaris, who was diſtinguiſhed for her uncommon learning and piety.] This Lady had a great friendſhip with Mr. Locke, who died at her houſe at Oates in Eſſex, where he had reſided for ſeveral years before. In 1696 ſhe publiſhed at London in 12mo, without her name, a Diſcourſe concerning the Love of God (12). She begins with obſerving, that "whatever reproaches have been made by the Romaniſts on the one hand of the want of books of "devotion in the Church of England; or by the Diſſenters on the other, of a dead and lifeleſs way of "preaching; it may be affirmed, that there cannot "any where be found ſo good a collection of diſcourſes "upon Moral Subjects, as might be made of Engliſh "Sermons and other Treatiſes of that nature written "by the Divines of our Church; which Books are "certainly in themſelves of the greateſt and moſt ge-"neral uſe of any, and do moſt conduce to that, "which is the chief aim of Chriſtianity, a good "life." She then animadverts upon thoſe, who undervalue Morality (13), and others, who ſtrain the duties of it to an impracticable pitch, and pretend to aſcend by it to ſomething beyond or above it (14); and afterwards proceeds to conſider the conduct of thoſe, who build their practical and devotional Diſcourſes upon principles, which not only will not bear the teſt, but which oblige them to lay down ſuch aſſertions of Morality, as ſober and well diſpoſed Chriſtians cannot underſtand to be practicable (15). And here ſhe applies herſelf to the Examination of Mr. John Norris's (16) Scheme in his Practical Diſcourſes and other Treatiſes, wherein he maintains, that "mankind are obliged "ſtrictly, as their duty, to love with deſire nothing "but God only, every degree of deſire of any crea-"ture whatſoever, being ſinful." Which aſſertion Mr. Norris defends upon this ground, that God, not the Creature, is the immediate efficient cauſe of our ſenſations; for whatſoever gives us pleaſure has a right to our love; but God only gives us pleaſure; therefore he only has a right to our love. This Hypotheſis is conſidered with great accuracy and ingenuity by Lady Maſham, and the bad conſequences of it repreſented in a ſtrong light. This Diſcourſe was tranſlated into French by Mr. Coſte in 1705.

(12) It contains 126 pages beſides the Preface.

(13) Pag. 2, 3.

(14) Pag. 3, 4, 5, 6.

(15) Pag. 7.

(16) This Divine borrowed his Hypotheſis from Father Mallebranche.

[I] Our Author died at Cambridge.] The Writer of the Preſent State of the Republick of Letters for January 1736 (17) having obſerved, that it has been inſinuated by ſome, who perhaps only envied the luſtre of ſo great a name, as if Dr. Cudworth's Intellectual Syſtem was a diſguiſed plea for Atheiſm, inſtead of being a confutation of it; proceeds thus: "And a certain "Baronet of this Kingdom, whoſe veracity I can ſafe-"ly depend on, and who has not, I believe, the leaſt "prejudice againſt the Doctor's reputation, told me a "few days ago, that he was aſſured by a Clergyman of "great piety and worth, (who expreſſed himſelf there-"upon with the utmoſt ſorrow and concern) that viſiting "the Doctor upon his death-bed, he heard him declare, "he believed not any thing at all of Deiſm; from whence "he inferred that he died a very infidel. But for my "part, I am apt to conclude juſt the contrary, ſuppoſ-"ing a miſtake to ariſe from ſome inadvertency of this "reverend Gentleman, who might imperfectly hear "Dr. Cudworth profeſſing his ſtedfaſt attachment to "Chriſtianity in oppoſition to Deiſm in the uſually re-"ceived ſenſe of it. And this the rather, becauſe, "as the Doctor could not but know that he had been "ſuſpected and calumniated on this ſcore by ſeveral, "who impeached him as a Deiſt in maſquerade; ſo "nothing could be properer to clear his character of "that aſperſion, and juſtify his unfeigned regard for "Revelation, than ſuch a declaration as I am ſuppoſ-"ing, when he was upon the very brink of eternity. "However the fact may indeed be, this at leaſt muſt "be owned, that what I am here imagining can be "charged with no great improbability; whereas the "Clergyman's report is undeniably inconſiſtent with "the moſt ſpecious appearances."

(17) Vol. 17. Artic. 2. pag. 29. edit. London 1736, in 8vo.

[K] Interred at Chriſt's-College there.] His Epitaph there is as follows (18): Here lyeth the Body of Dr. Ralph Cudworth, late Maſter of Chriſt-College, about 34 years Hebrew Profeſſor, and Prebendary of Glouceſter. He died June the 26*th* 1688, in the 71*ſt year of his age.*

(18) See The Survey of the Cathedrals of York &c. By Browne Willis Eſq; pag. 743. edit. London 1727 in 4to.

[L] He publiſhed a Sermon on 1 Cor. xv. 57.] The third edition of it was printed at London 1676 in fol. and ſubjoined to his Intellectual Syſtem. Dr. Moſheim never ſaw this or the other Sermon upon 1 John ii. 3, 4.

[M] A Treatiſe intitled, Deus Juſtificatus.] This Treatiſe is mentioned by Mr. Fancourt (19) under the title of Deus Juſtificatus: Or the Divine Goodneſs vindicated and cleared againſt the Aſſertions of abſolute and inconditionate Reprobation. Mr. Fancourt cites a long paſſage out of this Treatiſe, wherein that great man, as Mr. Fancourt ſtiles him (20), maintains, that the Liberty of man's will is taken away by aſſerting of inconditionate decrees, and that both the predeſtinations of the good to life, and of reprobates to deſtruction neceſſarily pervades and caſts a fatal influence upon their whole lives. I mean, ſays the Doctor, that that decree invincibly orders and diſpoſes the actions of men to their reſpective ends; ſo that he who is pre-ordained to happineſs ſhall certainly and neceſſarily be good, and the other, who is deſtined to perdition, ſhall enevitably be wicked and vitious. A caſt of which doctrine we have delivered to us by Zanchy in theſe words: Non dubitamus itaque confiteri ex immutabili Reprobatione neceſſitatem peccandi & quidem ſine reſipiſcentia ad mortem uſque peccandi, eoque & æternas pœnas dandi, reprobis incumbere. (Vide De Nat. Dei, cap. 2. in Reſponſ. ad Sophiſm.) i. e. "We doubt not to pro-"feſs, that from the immutable decree of Reproba-"tion there lies upon reprobates a neceſſity of ſinning, "and that without repentance even unto death, and "conſequently of ſuffering eternal puniſhment." Piſcator likewiſe will aver the ſame, and more if you deſire it: In ſumma ſe tueri fatetur, Deum abſolute decreviſſe ab æterno & efficaciter, ne quiſpiam hominum plus boni faciat, quam reipſa facit, aut plus mali omittat quam reipſa omittit. i. e. "That he "defends this concluſion, that God hath efficaciouſly "from all eternity, ſo predetermined the will of man to "every individual action, that none can do any more "good than he really doth, or omit any more evil "than ipſo facto he omitteth." (Vid. Ad amic. dupl. Vorſt. pag. 175.) To theſe I ſhall add Szydlovius as the worſt of the three. Fateor & ipſe ad communem ſentiendi conſuetudinem crudum nimis hoc videri, Deum poſſe Blaſphemiam, Perjurium, Mendacium, &c. imperare: .... quod tamen veriſſimum eſt in ſe, &c. i. e. "I confeſs that according to common ſenſe it "ſeems very crude to aſſert, that God can command "Blaſphemy, Perjury, Lying, &c. which yet is moſt "true in itſelf." Now following theſe principles, continues Dr. Cudworth, it is impoſſible there ſhould be any ſuch thing as virtue and vice exiſting in the world; for all our actions, whether good or evil, are the neceſſary effects of an eternal principle acting and over-ruling our wills, and we are but the inſtruments, which that invincible power makes uſe of for the doing ſuch and ſuch actions, and can no more withſtand it, than the Sun ceaſe to make day and night &c. (21).

(19) Preface to his Free Agency of Accountable Creatures examined with Candour and defended in ſeveral Letters &c. pag. 16, 17, edit. London 1733, in 8vo.

(20) Ibid. pag. 14.

(21) See Dr. Cudworth's Deus Juſtificatus, pag. 184-188.

[N] He left ſeveral poſthumous works.] I. A Treatiſe concerning Moral Good and Evil; in ſeveral volumes in fol. containing above a thouſand pages. It conſiſts of two books. The Author begins with repreſenting the ſentiments of thoſe amongſt the Anti-learned Languages and Antiquity, a good Mathematician, a ſubtle Philoſopher, and a profound Metaphyſician. He embraced the Mechanical or Corpuſcular Philoſophy; but with regard to the Deity, Intelligences, Genii, Ideas, and in ſhort, the Principles of Human Knowledge, he followed Plato and even the later Platoniſts (g). A great number of Writers commend his piety and modeſty; and Biſhop Burnet tells us (h), that "he was a man of great conduct and prudence; upon which his enemies did very falſly "accuſe him of craft and diſſimulation." The late Earl of Shafteſbury (i) ſtiles him an excellent and learned Divine, of higheſt authority at home, and fame abroad.

(g) Biblioth. Raiſonn. pag. 13, 14.

(h) Hiſtory of his own Time, vol. 1. pag. 187.

(i) Characteriſticks, vol. 3. chap. 2. pag. 64. edit. 1714, in 8vo.

ents, who denied Natural Juſtice. He anſwers their objections one after another; and ſhews that this opinion is directly contrary to the good of ſociety. He proves, that juſt and right is not eſtabliſhed by the arbitrary will of the Deity. He examines whether the ſovereign Good conſiſts in pleaſure; and after having at large refuted the Philoſophy of Epicurus, he gives us the true idea of Happineſs, which he places in a divine life. The queſtion concerning human liberty is diſcuſſed here, and the objections againſt it anſwered. From thence he proceeds to the moral and political Philoſophy of Hobbes; and it appears that Dr. Cudworth had applied himſelf to the entire deſtruction of that ſcheme. II. A Treatiſe of Liberty and Neceſſity, in which the Philoſophical foundations of Atheiſm are deſtroyed, and the certainty of Morality defended, and the Nature of it explained. This work contains a thouſand pages in folio. He refutes here the notion of the neceſſity of human actions, by anſwering the objections not only of the Stoics, and the antient Atheiſts, but likewiſe the modern Chriſtians, who maintain that opinion. III. A Commentary upon the Prophecy of Daniel concerning the Seventy Weeks; in which all the explications of the Jews, as well as of ſome learned Chriſtians, are examined and confuted. In two volumes in folio. IV. Of the Truth of the Chriſtian Religion againſt the Jews. The Author mentions this work among his Manuſcripts; but it cannot yet be found. V. Δίκαιον φυσικὸν ἢ ἀϊδιον: Or A Treatiſe concerning Eternal and Immutable Morality. This was printed at London 1731 in 8vo, with a Preface by Dr. Edward Chandler Lord Biſhop of Durham, who obſerves (21), that in this book our Author "proves the falſeneſs of the conſequences with reſpect "to natural juſtice and morality in God, which are "deducible from the principles of thoſe that maintain the ſecond ſort of fate, denominated by him "Theologick. And thus it may be reckoned to be a "ſequel in part of his firſt book againſt Material "Fate. Had it come abroad as early as it was written, it had ſerved for a proper antidote to the poiſon in ſome of Mr. Hobbes's and others Writings, "who revived in that age the exploded opinions of "Protagoras, and other antient Greeks, and took away the eſſential and eternal diſcriminations of moral "good and evil, of juſt and unjuſt, and made them "all arbitrary productions of divine or human will." Againſt the antient and modern patrons of this "doctrine no one hath writ better than Dr. Cudworth. "His book is indeed a demonſtration of the truth of "the contrary opinion, and is drawn up with that "beauty, clearneſs, and ſtrength, as muſt delight as "well as convince the reader, if I may judge of the "affection of others, from the effect it had on me. "It will certainly give a juſt idea of the Writer's "good ſenſe, as well as vaſt learning. We are not "certain that this Treatiſe is quoted ſo perfect as the "Author deſigned it; but it appears from the MS. "that he tranſcribed the beſt part of it with his own "hand, as if it was ſpeedily to have been ſent to the "preſs." VI. A Treatiſe of the Creation of the World, and the Immortality of the Soul. A volume in 8vo. VII. Of the Learning of the Hebrews. VIII. An Explication of the Notion of Hobbes concerning the Nature of God, and the Extenſion of Spirits. T

(21) Preface, pag. 9, 10, 11.

☞CUMBERLAND (RICHARD), a very learned Engliſh Divine and Biſhop in the latter end of the ſeventeenth and beginning of the eighteenth Century, was ſon of a Citizen of London (a). He was born in that City July the 15th 1632 *. His education was firſt in St. Paul's School in London, and afterwards in Magdalen College in Cambridge, where he contracted an intimate friendſhip with Dr. Hezekiah Burton, Dr. Hollings, Sir Samuel Moreland, Mr. Pepys, afterwards Secretary to the Admiralty, and Sir Orlando Bridgman, afterwards Lord Keeper of the Great Seal (b). He diſtinguiſhed himſelf while he was Fellow of the College by the performance of his Academical Exerciſes. July the 14th 1657 he was incorporated Maſter of Arts in the Univerſity of Oxford (c). He went out Bachelor of Divinity at a public commencement; and though it was hardly known that the ſame perſon performed thoſe great exerciſes twice, yet ſuch was the expectation he had raiſed, that he was afterwards ſollicited to keep the Act at another public Commencement for his Doctor's Degree (d). His firſt preferment, for which he quitted an Univerſity life, was the Rectory of Brampton in Northamptonſhire, given him by Sir John Norwich. In this rural retirement he minded little elſe than the duties of his function and his ſtudies; and his relaxations from thoſe were very few beſides his journies to Cambridge, which he made frequently to preſerve a correſpondence with his learned acquaintance in that place (e). His friend Sir Orlando Bridgman being made Lord Keeper in 1667, appointed him his Chaplain, and beſtowed on him the Living of All-hallows in Stamford (f), where he performed the duties of his function in the moſt exemplary manner [A]. In 1672 he publiſhed his excellent Treatiſe of the Laws of Nature [B]; and in 1680 at the ſollicitation of the Univerſity, he took upon him the weighty

(a) Life of Biſhop Cumberland, by S. Payne, A. M. pag. 3. prefixed to Sanchoniatho's Phœnician Hiſtory, tranſlated from the firſt Book of Euſebius de Præparatione Evangelica &c. By the Right Reverend R. Cumberland, D. D. late Biſhop of Peterborough, edit. London 1720, in 8vo.

* Survey of the Cathedrals of Lincoln, Ely, Oxford, and Peterborough. By Browne Willis Eſq; pag. 510. edit. London 1730 in 4to. This Gentleman tells us, that our Author was born in the Pariſh of St. Anne Aldgate: but Mr. Payne, ubi ſupra, writes that he was born in Fleet-ſtreet.

(b) Life of Cumberland, pag. 4, 5, 6.

(c) Wood, Faſti Oxon. vol. 2. col. 118. 2d edit. London 1721.

(d) Life of Biſhop Cumberland, p. 6.

(e) Ibid. pag. 7, 8.

(f) Ibid. pag. 8.

[A] Performed the duties of his function in the moſt exemplary manner.] Beſides the duty incumbent on him as Miniſter, he accepted of the weekly Lecture; and by this means was obliged to preach three times every week in the ſame Church. This difficult province he went through conſtantly and aſſiduouſly. This, which alone would have been a burthen too heavy for an ordinary man, he diſcharged with ſo much eaſe, that he carried on at the ſame time great deſigns in his Philoſophical, Mathematical, and Philological Studies (1).

(1) Life of Biſhop Cumberland, by S. Payne, A. M. pag. 9. prefixed to Sanchoniatho's Phœnician Hiſtory, &c.

[B] In 1672 he publiſhed his excellent Treatiſe of the Laws of Nature.] It was printed at London in 4to, under the following title; De Legibus Naturæ Diſquiſitio Philoſophica, in quâ earum forma, ſumma Capita, Ordo, Promulgatio, & Obligatio è rerum naturâ inveſtigantur; quinetiam Elementa Philoſophiæ Hobbianæ, tum moralis tum civilis, conſiderantur & refutantur. Mr. Payne tells us (2), that it is in one of the firſt Diſquiſitions "written in the demonſtrative way "upon a moral ſubject: I may add too, ſays he, the "perfecteſt; for I believe all good judges allow it to "be a demonſtration. He was not near the preſs "while it was working off: by this means it came "into weighty exerciſe of reſponding at the public commencement [C]. The melancholy proſpect of affairs in the reign of King James II, as it made deep impreſſions on every one who wiſhed well to our Conſtitution in Church and State, ſo it made a deeper than ordinary on Dr. Cumberland, and contributed to the bringing on him a dangerous fit of ſickneſs, one of the ſevereſt fevers, from which ever man recovered (g). In 1686 he publiſhed An Eſſay toward the Jewiſh Weights and Meaſures [D]. After the Revolution he was nominated by King William III to the Biſhoprick of Peterborough, without the leaſt ſollicitation on his part; and the firſt account he had of his promotion was from the public Newspaper, which he was reading at the Coffee-houſe in Stamford (h). He was conſecrated to that See in the room of Dr. Thomas White, (who had been deprived for refuſing the oaths,) July the 5th 1691 (i). He was very diligent and careful in his Dioceſe, and on all occaſions treated his Clergy with ſingular regard and indulgence. He was remarkable for humility of mind, benevolence of temper, and innocence of life. He purſued his ſtudies to the very laſt; and the world is obliged to him for clearing up ſeveral difficulties in Philoſophy, Hiſtory, and Chronology (k). After the age of eighty three he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of the Coptic Language, which he made himſelf Maſter of (l). He died of the Palſy at Peterborough in the eighty ſeventh year of his age October the 9th 1718, and was interred in his Cathedral there (m). He left ſeveral works behind him, two of which have been publiſhed [E].

(2) Ibid. pag. 26.

(g) Ibid. pag. 11.

(h) Ibid. pag. 12, 13.

(i) Willis, ubi ſupra, pag. 510.

(k) Life of Dr. John Colet, Dean of St. Paul's. By Samuel Knight, D. D. pag. 426. edit. London 1726 in 8vo.

(l) Life of Biſhop Cumberland, pag. 25.

(m) Willis, ubi ſupra.

CURIO

" into the world very incorrectly printed. This may " have been ſome diſcouragement to the reading of " it, though the difficulty of the ſubject and the " cloſeneſs of the reaſoning has been a greater. " Hardly any men hitherto have made themſelves " acquainted with the argument of it, but ſuch as " are in the uppermoſt form of learning. I have " ſometimes wiſhed that his Lordſhip would have been " pleaſed to have reviſed it, and tried to make it more ea- " ſy and intelligible; but it had lain ſo long out of his " hands, that he did not care to take it up again. " He gave me leave to attempt any thing of that " kind, if I would; and as a help he gave me his " own interleaved book, which has here and there a " little addition. I read his book over and over di- " ligently with this view, but never found where I " could well alter any thing, where I could leave " out, or where I could add. All I can think on to " give a little advantage to common readers, is to print " the book correctly, to give an analyſis of the ar- " gumentation, to add contents to each paragraph, " and to divide them oftner. This I may perhaps " find leiſure to do." In 1692 James Tyrrel Eſq; grandſon of Archbiſhop Uſher, publiſhed at London in 8vo, A brief Diſquiſition of the Law of Nature, according to the Principles and Method laid down in the Reverend Dr. Cumberland's (now Lord Biſhop of Peterborough) Latin Treatiſe on that ſubject; as alſo his Confutations of Mr. Hobbes's Principles, put into another method, with the Author's approbation.

[C] In 1680 at the ſollicitation of the Univerſity, he took upon him the weighty exerciſe of reſponding at the public Commencement.] The Theſes maintained by him were, I. Sancto Petro nulla data eſt juriſdictio in cæteros Apoſtolos; i. e. " St. Peter had no juriſdiction granted " him over the reſt of the Apoſtles." II. Separatio ab Eccleſiâ Anglicanâ eſt ſchiſmatica; i. e. " The Se- " paration from the Church of England is ſchiſmati- " cal." The fame of Dr. Cumberland's performance was many years after freſh among the Members of the Univerſity (3).

(3) Idem, ibid. pag. 9, 10.

[D] In 1686 he publiſhed an Eſſay toward the Jewiſh Meaſures and Weights.] It was printed at London in 8vo under the following title; An Eſſay toward the Recovery of the Jewiſh Meaſures and Weights, comprehending their moneys, by help of an ancient ſtandard compared with ours of England, uſeful alſo to ſtate many of thoſe of the Greeks, and Romans, and Eaſtern Nations. The Author of the Animadverſions on the Reflections upon Dr. Burnet's Travels (4) ſtiles this a moſt learned and ingenious Diſcourſe. There is a long Extract of this Eſſay in Mr. Le Clerc's Bibliotheque Univerſelle (5). Dr. Bernard in his Book de Menſuris & Ponderibus antiquis (6) thought fit to contradict ſome of our Author's aſſertions without quoting him; upon which Dr. Cumberland wrote ſome ſheets to juſtify his calculations: but his averſeneſs to any thing like wrangling made him lay them by, and leave his Book to ſhift for itſelf (7).

(4) Pag. 27. edit. 1688.

(5) Tom. 5.

(6) Printed at Oxford 1688 in 8vo.

(7) Life of Cumberland, pag. 27.

[E] He left ſeveral works behind him, two of which have been publiſhed.] The Reverend Mr. Squire Payne, M. A. his ſon-in-law and domeſtic Chaplain, publiſhed at London 1720 in 8vo the following poſthumous work of the Biſhop: Sanchoniatho's Phœnician Hiſtory, tranſlated from the firſt Book of Euſebius de Præparatione Evangelicâ. With a Continuation of Sanchoniatho's Hiſtory by Eratoſthenes Cyrenæus's Canon, which Dicæarchus connects with the firſt Olympiad. Theſe Authors are illuſtrated with many hiſtorical and chronological Remarks, proving them to contain a Series of Phœnician and Egyptian Chronology, from the firſt Man to the firſt Olympiad, agreeable to the Scripture Accounts. By the Right Reverend R. Cumberland, D. D. late Biſhop of Peterborough. With a Preface giving a brief Account of the Life, Character and Writings of the Author. By S. Payne A. M. Rector of Barnack in Northamptonſhire, his Lordſhip's domeſtick Chaplain. Mr. Payne obſerves (8), that our Author had a quicker ſenſe than many other men of the advances Popery was making upon us; and was affected with the apprehenſions of it to the laſt degree. This made him turn his thoughts to the enquiry by what ſteps and methods idolatry got ground in the world. The oldeſt account of this he believed he found in Sanchoniatho's Fragment. This he ſaw was a profeſſed apology for idolatry, and owned openly, what other Heathens would have made a ſecret of, that the Gods of the Gentile World had been all mortal men. He ſtudied this Fragment with no other view than as it led to the diſcovery of the original of Idolatry. He ſpent ſome time upon it before ever he had a thought of extracting from it Footſteps of the Hiſtory of the World preceding the Flood. While other Divines of the Church of England were engaged in the controverſy with the Papiſts, in which they gained over them ſo complete a victory, our Author was endeavouring to ſtrike at the root of their idolatrous Religion. His firſt deſign he finiſhed about the time of the Revolution, and would then have printed it, but his Bookſeller was ſo cautious, that he did not care to undertake it. Upon this diſcouragement he laid aſide the thoughts of making it public; but he was enter'd on a ſubject, which he did not know how to leave. Having made what he thought a great diſcovery, theſe ſearches into the oldeſt times became more engaging to him; and he went on with them rather for his own entertainment, than with any deſign to make the world acquainted with them. We ſhall give an account of his Scheme, as it is repreſented by Mr. Payne (9); who obſerves, that the firſt hint given our Author was from this paſſage:

(8) Ibid. pag. 27, 28, 33, 34. The pages in this Preface are miſnumbered after pag. 32.

(9) Pag. 28, & ſeqq.

Ἶσιρις ἀδελφὸς Χνᾶ τῦ πρώτυ Φοίνικος.

" Iſiris the brother of Chnaa the firſt Phœnician."

The firſt Phœnician was indiſputably Canaan, whoſe poſterity peopled that country. His name in the Hebrew is often written Chanaan. That the Egyptian King called by the Greeks Iſiris, was brother to him, was ſomething new. The next ſtep was to find that Miſor in Sanchoniatho was Mizraim in Moſes. Mizraim was

CURIO (COELIUS SECUNDUS) a learned man of Piedmont, retired into Switzerland, after he had ſuffered a very heavy perſecution in Italy, becauſe he was ſuſpected to be a Proteſtant. He was very kindly received in the Canton of Bern, and was made Maſter of the College of Lauſanne (a); he went afterwards to Baſil, where they gave him the chair of Profeſſor of Eloquence: he filled that Poſt with great reputation. He publiſhed was the name of a people, like Ludim, Philiſtim, Caphtorim, &c. The ſingular number, and the proper name of the man was Miſor. In this there is not much difficulty, nor that Miſor (from whence comes Miſraim) was the brother of Canaan. It is a greater difficulty to make Miſor the ſame man with Iſiris, tho' it is done without much force. M in Hebrew is a ſervile letter often omitted: leave it out, the name is Iſor; add to this a Greek termination, which Greek authors always do to Eaſtern Names, it is Iſoris, and by the ſmall change of a vowel, Iſiris. The next obſervation was, that Miſor or Iſiris is placed by Sanchoniatho about the diſtance of twelve generations from Protogonus, the firſt produced man, and Mizraim is undoubtedly in the twelfth generation from Adam. Our Author then proceeded to collect, that Protogonus was Adam. What name Sanchoniatho called him by, we know not; it was probably by ſome Eaſtern Name, ſignifying the firſt created Man, which Philo Biblius tranſlates Protogonus by a Greek word of the ſame import. Æon and Protogonus are the two firſt mortals. Æon our Author conjectures to have ſome affinity to the name Eve. Æon, adds Sanchoniatho, firſt gathered food from trees. What can this be but an alluſion to Eve's eating the forbidden fruit? From Protogonus and Æon, ſays Sanchoniatho, deſcended Genus. You cannot well make any other Greek name of the Hebrew Cain than Γένος. Hence our Author concludes, that Sanchoniatho preſerved the Hiſtory of the idolatrous line of Cain, as Moſes did that of Seth, who were the worſhippers of the true God. Who the men were, whoſe names are preſerved by Sanchoniatho in the ſucceeding generations, we know not; their memory periſhed with the Flood. But in the twelfth generation from Æon and Protogonus, we find Miſor; and Mizraim is in the ſame diſtance from Adam and Eve. Here again we are got within our knowledge. But we have not in Sanchoniatho one word about the Deluge. What wonder is it we ſhould not? Sanchoniatho was an idolater; he writes avowedly a Defence or Apology for Idolatry. The deluge was a judgment on the idolatrous world, and ſwept it away. The worſhippers of the true God gloried in this, and reproached the Heathens with it: no wonder then that they were deſirous to conceal ſuch a matter of ſhame to themſelves. Cronus, who makes the great figure in this Hiſtory, our Author ſuppoſes to be Ham, and brings good vouchers for his opinion from antiquity. Conſequently therefore Ouranus, the father of Cronus, muſt be Noah. Ham, among the ſons of Noah, was the man of ambition, and the reſtorer of idolatry after the flood. How long he lived we know not. We are aſſured by Moſes, that his brother Shem lived 502 years after the Flood. Ham in all probability lived long, tho' perhaps not ſo long as that religious and peaceable man Shem. He deſired to make his ſons great; therefore beſides Canaan, who peopled Syria, two other of his ſons, Cuſh and Mizraim, were the founders of two great Empires, the Aſſyrian and the Egyptian. Sanchoniatho repreſents him as a ſort of univerſal Monarch travelling over the world to plant Colonies. He intimates that he outlived Miſor [Mizraim], and ſettled the ſon of Miſor, Thoth, the great Hermes of the Egyptians, in the Kingdom of Egypt. From the Records left by this Thoth, Sanchoniatho collected his Hiſtory, and with him this Fragment ends. Where Sanchoniatho ends Eratoſthenes begins. The two firſt Kings in his Catalogue are Menes and Athothes. That Menes was the firſt King in Egypt, and the ſame man with Mizraim, is allowed on all hands. Athothes is plainly the ſame name with Thoth. A is arbitrarily prefixed, or omitted. He is called indifferently Thoth or Athoth. Es is only the Greek termination. Eratoſthenes was the moſt learned man of his time, a native of Cyrene bordering upon Egypt, Librarian to Ptolomæus Euergetes, had greater opportunities and helps for ſearching the Egyptian Records than any other man. The Prieſts of Egypt had ever been in a combination to relate extravagant and incredible accounts of their Kings, thinking thereby to aggrandize their Monarchy. Eratoſthenes went with a deſire to find out the truth. The names of the firſt thirty eight of his Catalogue of the Kings of Thebes in Egypt are preſerved; they are a ſucceſſion for the ſpace of 1055 years. Nilus, the laſt King but one in this liſt, is ſuppoſed to have lived about the time of the Siege of Troy. Dicæarchus, a learned Hiſtorian, contemporary with Ariſtotle, ſays, that from this Nilus to the beginning of the Olympiads were 436 years. This account has an air of probability; it places Menes about 1400 years before the Olympiads, near 2000 years after the Flood, and it agrees well with the Moſaic Hiſtory. We have by this means a ſeries of profane Hiſtory from the firſt Man to the firſt Olympiad, agreeing with the Scripture. Sanchoniatho begins his Hiſtory with Protogonus [Adam], and brings it down to Thoth, the ſecond King of Egypt. Eratoſthenes begins his Catalogue with Menes [Miſor], as Athothes [Thoth], which is connected with the Olympiads. The Authors of the Univerſal Hiſtory (9) have made Animadverſions upon this Scheme of Biſhop Cumberland; and Monſr. Fourmont in his Reflexions Critiques ſur les Hiſtoires des anciens Peuples, Chaldéens, Hébreux, Phéniciens, Egyptiens, Grecs, &c. juſqu' au tems de Cyrus; en trois Livres (10) ſpeaks of this work of our Author with great approbation, tho' he diſſents from him in ſeveral particulars. In 1724 Mr. Payne publiſhed at London in 8vo another poſthumous Treatiſe of the Biſhop, intitled, Origines Gentium antiquiſſimæ: Or, Attempts for diſcovering the Times of the firſt planting of Nations. In ſeveral Tracts. By the Right Reverend R. Cumberland, D. D. late Biſhop of Peterborough. Publiſhed from his Lordſhip's Manuſcript by S. Payne, A. M. Rector of Barnack in Northamptonſhire. This work conſiſts of the following Tracts. I. A Diſcourſe on Gen. xxxvi. concerning the Settlement of Eſau's Family, from Mount Seir to Elparan, the antient ſeat of the Horites: and of the Government of that Land before and after their ſettlement: with an Enquiry about the times thereof. II. A Diſcourſe on Deut. ii. 23. The Avim which dwelt in Hazarim, even unto Azzah; the Caphtorim, which came forth out of Caphtor, deſtroyed them, and dwelt in their ſtead. III. Notes on the Synchroniſms of Canaan and Egypt. IV. Concerning the Poſſibility of a ſufficient Increaſe of Men from the three ſons of Noah, to a number large enough to found all the Nations mentioned in the oldeſt credible Hiſtories; and that in the times aſſigned to their foundation, agreeably with the Hebrew accounts. With ſome ſuggeſtions about the Diſperſion of Men to plant in ſeveral parts of the earth; particularly the building of Nineveh, the Metropolis of the Aſſyrian Monarchy. V. An Appendix to the preceding chapter, in an Eſſay towards the better ſtating of the interval between the founding of Niniveh, and the fall of Sardanapalus, which broke from the ancient Aſſyrian Empire two Monarchies: 1. that of the Babylonians, beginning with Nabonaſſar: 2. that of the Medes, begun in Dejoces, yet left to Tighlath-Pilezer and his ſucceſſors, an Aſſyrian Empire, which recovered good ſtrength, ſo as to conquer Syria, and to captivate the ten Tribes of Iſrael. VI. Proofs from Scripture and from Heathens of the Aſſyrian Empire before Nabonaſſar. VII. A Diſcourſe endeavouring to connect the Greek and Roman Antiquities with thoſe of the eldeſt Eaſtern Monarchies in Aſia and Egypt, and conſequently with the diſperſion from Babel, which came near the great Flood. In two chapters, 1. Concerning Greece, eſpecially the Pelaſgi. 2. Concerning Italy, particularly the Tyrrheni, or as the elder Greeks call them, the Tyrſeni; theſe, beſides the Egyptians, being Colonies from the Aſſyrian Empire, and the beginning of the Greek and Roman Empires. VIII. Appendix de Cabiris, addenda Diſquiſitioni de Pelaſgis. IX. Appendicula de Legibus, quibus tenebantur Patriarchæ, tam ante quam poſt diluvium, uſque ad tempus quo ſolemniter ſancitum eſt Fœdus Moſaicum: quod leges continet præcipuas, quibus tenebatur populus Judaicus poſt Exodum ex Ægypto. H.

(a) See the Dedication of his Paſquillus Extaticus, printed at Geneva, in 1544.

(9) Vol. 1. B. 1. cap. 2. edit. London 1730, in fol.

(10) Printed at Paris 1735, in two volumes in 4to.

publiſhed ſome books [A], and one, amongſt others, in which he endeavours to prove, that the number of the Elect exceeds that of the Reprobates [B]. He died in the year 1569, aged ſixty ſeven years (b). He had buried not long before a very illuſtrious ſon, named AUGUSTINUS SECUNDUS CURIO [C]. Their Library, which was very fine, was bought by the Duke of Lunenburg (c), and is now part of that of Wolfenbuttel. You will find in Hoffman's Lexicon, and in Monſieur Teiſſier's Additions to Thuanus's Elogies, ſeveral things relating to our Curio.

(b) Hoffman, in Lexico, tom. 1. pag. 509.

(c) See Coringius in his Treatiſe of Libraries.

[A] He publiſhed ſeveral books.] You will find a Catalogue of them in Monſieur Teiſſier's Elogies taken from Thuanus (1). But obſerve, that the Hiſtoria Sarracenica; i. e. "The Hiſtory of the Sarracens," was not written by Cœlius, but by his ſon Auguſtin Curio. As to the War of Maltha, printed with this Hiſtory of the Sarracens, Konig (2) ſhould not have aſcribed it to Auguſtin; it is a work of Cœlius.

(1) Tom. 1. pag. 358.

(2) Biblioth. Vet. & Nov. pag. 228.

[B] . . . And one amongſt others, in which he endeavours to prove, that the number of the Elect exceeds that of the Reprobates.] We may wonder, that he dared to aſſert ſuch a doctrine amongſt the Swiſs, for it is very ſuſpicious to the true Reformed, and I do not believe, that any Profeſſor could maintain it at preſent in Holland with impunity. However it be, his book was intitled, De Amplitudine beati Regni Dei; i. e. "Of the extent of God's happy Kingdom." He dedicated it to Sigiſmund Auguſtus, King of Poland. He ſays, in pag. 131 (3), that he never better underſtood, how extenſive God's mercy is, than when his ſon Horace (4) tranſlated out of Italian a Diſcourſe upon that ſubject, written by Maſile Andreaſi, a native of Mantua. See the Sorberiana (5), where this book of Curio is mentioned with great contempt, whilſt the Author's intention is commended.

(3) Of the edition of Gouda 1614. The firſt edition was of Baſil 1554.

(4) Ramus, Oratione de Baſilea, pag. 57. ſays, that Cœlius Horace Curio publiſhed at Baſil at the age of 15 a book de Amplitudine divinæ Miſericordiæ, and ſome Declamations.

(5) Pag. 56.

[C] He had . . . a very illuſtrious ſon named AUGUSTINUS SECUNDUS CURIO.] He had been Profeſſor of Eloquence in the Univerſity of Baſil, and though he lived but twenty eight years, yet he has given public proofs of his learning; he publiſhed three Books of the Hiſtory of the Saracens, one of the Kingdom of Morocco, and one upon the life and death of his four ſiſters (6). One of them was a learned maid. Cujus Sororem Angelam præter cætera virginis ornamenta, non ſolum Germanicè, Italicè, Gallicè, ſed & Latinè locutam (quod ipſius manuſcriptæ declarant Epiſtolæ) equidem etiam ad Patris eximias laudes aggrego. i. e. "I muſt alſo obſerve, in commendation of the "Father, that Auguſtinus's ſiſter Angela, beſides the "other ornaments of a maiden, underſtood, not only "German, Italian, and French, but even Latin, as "it appears from her manuſcript letters." Theſe are Peter Ramus's words (7).

(6) Taken from Petrus Ramus in Oratione de Baſilea, pag. m. 53.

(7) Ibid. pag. 57

CURTIUS (QUINTUS), the Writer of Alexander's Hiſtory. See QUINTUS CURTIUS.

CYRIL, Deacon of the Church of Heliopolis near Mount Libanus, was a great Iconoclaſt, or Image-breaker, under the Empire of Conſtantine; for finding himſelf enflamed with the ardours of divine love (a), he demoliſhed ſeveral ſtatues worſhipped by the Heathens. Theſe remembered it when their Religion got the upper hand under the Empire of Julian; and they revenged themſelves with great fury; ſince they not only killed him, but tore his bowels out, and eat his liver. All who ſhared in this crime were puniſhed in a moſt aſtoniſhing manner; they firſt loſing all their teeth, afterwards their tongues, and at laſt their eyes (b). Alcyonius aſſures us that Cyril, before he had exerted himſelf in this manner againſt idols, had been baniſhed to the iſland of Naxos; and that Julian himſelf gave orders for his being put to death [A], and for his courtiers to eat the bowels of that holy man. But I have not found theſe particulars in Theodoret.

(a) Ζῆλῳ πυρπολούμενος θείῳ. Theodoretus, Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 3. cap. 7.

(b) Extracted from Theodoret, ibid.

[A] Alcyonius aſſures us that Cyril . . . had been baniſhed . . . and that Julian himſelf gave orders for his being put to death.] Here follows his words: Cyrillus quoque ſempiterna laude videtur decorandus qui leviſſime ſuum in Naxo inſula exſilium toleravit, idque principatu Magni Conſtantini, apud quem poſtea tanta gratia & auctoritate valuit, ut cum bona ejus venia complura veterum Deorum ſimulacra ſubverterit, quo defuncto cum poteſtas rerum omnium penes Julianum eſſet, illius juſſu diſſectus eſt, mandavitque inſuper crudeliſſimus tyrannus, ut Purpurati ſui viſcera ſanctiſſimi & innocentiſſimi hominis epularentur (1). i. e. "Cyril alſo ſeems worthy of "everlaſting honour, who bore his baniſhment to the "iſland of Naxos with the utmoſt patience and reſignation, and that too, under the reign of Conſtantine the Great, who afterwards indulged him "ſo great a ſhare of his favour, and gave him ſuch "authority, that, by this Prince's leave, he demoliſhed many ſtatues of the antient Gods. Conſtantine dying, and Julian ſucceeding to his throne, "Cyril was butchered by his command; but this not "ſatisfying the barbarous tyrant, he ordered his Courtiers to eat the entrails of this moſt holy and "moſt innocent man." It is probable that ſome flouriſhes were added on this occaſion; but if his intent was to defame expreſly this apoſtate Prince, and to add, for that purpoſe, certain probable particulars, why were not ſome alſo ſuppreſſed? for this the laws of Rhetoric allowed; why was notice taken of the ſtatues of the Gods demoliſhed by Cyril? This circumſtance leſſens prodigiouſly the cruelty of the Heathens. The Roman Catholics may judge of this from themſelves. No circumſtance removed more effectually the Duke of Alba's ſcruples, when he put to death ſuch multitudes of Proteſtants in the Low Countries, than his calling to mind, that they had been Image-breakers. It muſt be owned, that Martyrs win a brighter crown, when they cannot be reproached with having demoliſhed ſtatues devoted to a religious uſe &c.

(1) Petrus Alcyonius, in Medice Legato priore, folio c. iiij.

CYRUS, ſon of Darius Nothus King of Perſia, became illuſtrious by his noble qualities; but nothing has made him ſo much ſpoken of as the War which he undertook againſt his brother Artaxerxes. Darius, their common father, finding himſelf extremely ill and his end approaching, recalled him from the Province of which he had given him the government. Cyrus brought with him Tiſſaphernes, in whom he placed entire confidence; but that man deceived him; for he perſuaded Artaxerxes, who had ſucceeded Darius, that Cyrus was plotting ſomething againſt him. This falſe information ſo highly provoked the King of Perſia that he would have put Cyrus to death, if Paryſatis their mother had not prevented the blow. She not only ſaved his life, but got him continued in the government of the Province which he had obtained of King Darius. As ſoon as Cyrus was returned thither, he employed his whole thoughts in forming ſchemes of ambition and revenge; and made all neceſſary preparations to revenge the ill treatment he had received from his brother, and to get poſſeſſion of the Crown.

He

He made ſure of ſome good Greek Captains, who had fled from their native country: he gave them orders to raiſe troops; and concealed his real deſign under divers pretexts during his march. His money ſoon fell ſhort; however he was not diſcouraged, but was fortunate enough to meet with a Queen, who was not contented to bring him money [A]: nevertheleſs he had a hundred difficulties to rub through with thoſe mercenary troops, which hindred not his paſſing the Euphrates, and promiſing himſelf a deciſive victory. Artaxerxes, in the mean while, having received timely information from Tiſſaphernes of Cyrus's preparations, had neglected nothing to put himſelf in a condition to oppoſe him, and marched to meet him with a fine army. The battle was fought near Babylon; and there is no doubt but Cyrus would have gained it, if he had not been killed, fighting with too much eagerneſs and too little caution (a) [B]. ASPASIA, his concubine, fell into the hands of Artaxerxes, and was looked on as one of the moſt conſiderable parts of the booty. We ſhall give an Abridgment of her Hiſtory in the Remark [C]. She was a woman who made no ill uſe of Cyrus's complaiſance, and behaved

(a) Extracted from the 1ſt Book of Xenophon's Hiſtory of the Expedition of Cyrus the younger. The battle between the two brothers, wherein Cyrus was killed, was fought the 3d year of the 95th Olympiad, which anſwers to the year of Rome 353, according to Calviſius.

[A] He met with a Queen, who was not contented to bring him money.] Her name was Epyaxa: ſhe was wife to Syenneſis King of Cilicia. She came to Cyrus very opportunely; for he owed his troops almoſt four months pay, and was beſieged every day at his door by a crowd of ſoldiers who demanded their arrears. It was not his cuſtom to ſend them away when he had money: he was therefore in great anxiety; for ſince he uſed to pay well when he was able, he had reaſon to fear they would conclude his treaſures were already exhauſted. Such a notion was enough to fruſtrate all his deſigns. Epyaxa delivered him from theſe diſquiets; for upon her arrival he diſtributed to his army four months pay; and whether it was by way of acknowledgment, or whether the Queen would not beſtow her favours on him by halves, he lay bravely and gallantly with her: at leaſt this was the common opinion (1). To pleaſe her he reviewed his troops in her preſence, and made them perform their exerciſes; and when the Greeks, making a ſhew of charging the barbarians, put them to flight; the Queen took part in the fright, and fled alſo. Cyrus gave her a good convoy when ſhe returned to Cilicia. She arrived at Tarſus five days before Cyrus. That city was the capital of Syenneſis's Kingdom: it was pillaged notwithſtanding the ſervices and civilities of every kind which the Queen had rendred to Cyrus; and what is very ſtrange, Syenneſis would not truſt himſelf with that Prince, tho' he had truſted his wife with him. He was at length perſuaded by her to pay Cyrus a viſit: he received ſome preſents from him, but they coſt him dear; for he was obliged to diſburſe large ſums of money for the ſubſiſtence of Cyrus's troops, and to preſerve his dominions from being plundered (2).

(1) Ἐλέγετο δὲ Κῦρον καὶ συγλέγεσθαι τῇ Κιλίσσῃ. Vulgo quidem ferebatur cum Cyro eam congreſſam. Xenophon, de Cyri Expedit. lib. 1. pag. m. 146.

(2) Extracted from Xenophon's firſt Book of the Expedition of Cyrus the Younger, pag. m. 146, 147.

[B] He was killed, fighting with too much eagerneſs and too little caution.] The Greeks in his pay had handled the Perſians who were oppoſed to them ſo roughly, that Cyrus tranſported with joy was ſaluted King by thoſe who were about him. However he kept himſelf in reſerve in the midſt of ſix hundred men who ſurrounded him during the action, waiting to ſee what Artaxerxes's main body would do; and he no ſooner ſaw them in motion, than he fell upon them with his Brigade: he broke thro' the firſt ranks, routed ſix thouſand men of the regiment of guards, and killed their leader; then perceiving the King his brother, he ſpurred his horſe up to him, and wounded him with his lance (3). The action was bloody; and Cyrus, attended by a few of his men, was overborne there and ſlain (4).

(3) Cteſias, who was in the army of Artaxerxes, affirmed in his Hiſtory that he had dreſſed this wound. Xenophon, de Cyri Expeditione, lib. 1. pag. 157.

(4) Extracted from Xenophon, ibid. See alſo Plutarch, in the Life of Artaxerxes.

[C] We ſhall give . . . an Abridgment of the Hiſtory of ASPASIA.] This woman was a native of Phocæa (5), and daughter of Hermotimus. According to the deſcription which Ælian has left us of her, ſhe muſt have been a moſt accompliſhed perſon, as well with reſpect to her body as her mind. She was called Milto before ſhe belonged to Cyrus; but that Prince made her change her name, and gave her that of the celebrated Miſtreſs of Pericles (6). Hermotimus, whoſe wife died in child-bed of our Aſpaſia, gave his daughter an education ſuitable to the ſmallneſs of his fortune. This girl had a great affliction during her infancy. She was the moſt beautiful child that could be ſeen, but there aroſe a ſwelling on her chin which diſfigured her horribly. The Phyſician, to whom her father brought her, had the hard-heartedneſs to refuſe to cure her, becauſe Hermotimus was not able to pay him his price. She returned very diſconſolate, and did nothing but entertain her grief by viewing herſelf in the glaſs. Ἀπιλθοῦσα ἔξω ἴκλαιεν ἔχουσα ἐν τοῖς γόνασι κάτοπτρον καὶ ὁρῶσα ἑαυτὴν ἐν αὐτῷ σφόδρα ἤλγει. A medico digreſſa in acerbiſſimo luctu verſata eſt, & ſpeculum in genibus tenens, ſeſeque in ipſo contemplata vehementer doluit (7). She learned the remedy which cured her in a dream; after which ſhe became the moſt beautiful woman of her time. Her hair was fair and curling, ſhe had large eyes, a noſe ſomewhat riſing, ſmall ears, a fine ſkin, and a complexion of lilies and roſes; her lips were of an admirable red, her teeth whither than ſnow, her legs and feet ſhaped in perfection, and a voice ſo ſweet that when ſhe ſpoke one would have thought he heard the Sirens. She was indebted to nature alone for the ſuperiority of her beauty; for neither her own humour, nor her father's poverty, allowed her to ſet off her charms by borrowed ornaments. The perſon who commanded in thoſe quarters under Cyrus, the King of Perſia's ſon, took her againſt the will both of her and her father, and brought her with ſome other very beautiful young women to Cyrus. When ſhe was preſented to that Prince, he was juſt riſen from table, and was entertaining himſelf with drinking according to the cuſtom of the country. There were three other Greek girls with her, who were not of her humour: they ſuffered themſelves to be painted and dreſt out without reſiſtance, retaining admirably well the leſſons which their nurſes had taught them with regard to their behaviour when Cyrus ſhould approach them, when he ſhould careſs them, touch them, or take a fancy to kiſs them. Ἦσαν δ' αἱ ὑπὸ τῶν τροφίων διδιδαγμέναι, ὅπως τε ὑποδρομεῖν χρὴ τὸν Κῦρον, καὶ τίνα τρόπον θωπεῦσαι, καὶ προσιόντα μὴ ἀποσοβῆναι, καὶ ἁπτόμενον μὴ δυσχεράναι, καὶ φιλοῦντι ὑπομεῖναι, ἰταμικὰ δὲ μαλακὰ μαθήματα, καὶ διδάγματα γυναικῶν καπηλικῶς τῷ καλλει χρωμένων ἔργα. Et a nutricibus acceperant documenta, quemadmodum erga Cyrum ſe gerere deberent: quomodo inſinuare ſe illi & adblandiri, & non refugere, ſi accederet, neque ſi tangeret, ægre ferre, & oſculum admittere eas oporteret, omnibus denique præceptis & inſtitutis amatoriis, quibus uti mulieres, quibus ſua venalis eſt forma, ſolent, inſtructæ (8). They ſtrove who ſhould pleaſe him moſt; but Milto ſhewed ſo much averſion to the uſe for which ſhe was deſtined, that they could not oblige her without blows to ſuffer the cloaths to be put on her, which were given to young women on ſuch occaſions: and while her companions ogled to admiration, and diſcovered by their ſmiles the deſire they had to charm the Prince, ſhe did nothing but weep, and durſt not lift up her eyes, ſo great was the ſhame which her natural modeſty raiſed in her to ſee her ſelf in that condition. When Cyrus bid them come and ſit near him, the others waited not to be bidden twice; but they were obliged to force our Aſpaſia: the others ſuffered Cyrus to touch them as much as he pleaſed; Aſpaſia alone would not allow of thoſe liberties, and threatened Cyrus if he but offered to touch her with his finger's end. However he put his hand into her boſom, which made her riſe up, and endeavour to get away. Cyrus did her juſtice; he declared that of all thoſe who had been brought to him, ſhe alone was really unpractiſed, and he conceived a greater love for her than for all the other women he had ever enjoyed. Ἅμα γὰρ τῇ χειρὶ μόνον τοῦ Κύρου προσαψαμένου, ἐξεβόησέ τε καὶ ἔφατο αὐτὸν αἰκίζεσθαι τοιαῦτα δρῶντα, ὑπερήσθη τούτοις ὁ Κῦρος, ἐπαινεσαμένης τε αὐτῆς καὶ πιφωμένης

(5) Φωκαΐς. Plut. in Pericle, pag. 165. Amiot has ill tranſlated this, native de la Phocide.

(6) Plutarch. ibid. Ælianus, Var. Hiſt. lib. 12. cap. 1.

(7) Ælianus, ibid.

(8) Ælianus, Var. Hiſt. lib. 12. cap. 1. pag. m. 543, 544.

haved her ſelf ſo prudently that ſhe gained the love of Paryſatis [D]. As ſhe believed his favour was a preſent from heaven, ſhe gave many public marks of her gratitude to the Goddeſs Venus [E]. If all that has been ſaid of her be true, her beauty muſt have laſted a prodigious while [F]. Cyrus's Letter to the Lacedæmonians ought by no means to μένης φεύγειν, ἐπεὶ κ᾽ τῶν μαζῶν προσήψαλο, ἀλλ᾽ ἐνλαῦθα μὲν ὑπεφηγάσθη τὴν εὐγένειαν οὐ Περσικῶς ὁ τῦ Δαρείν, ἀλλὰ κ᾽ ἀποβλέψας πρὸς τὸν ἀγοραςήν· ταύτην μόνην ἴφη, ἐλευθέραν κ᾽ ἀδιάφθορον ἤγαγες. αἱ δὲ λοιπαὶ καπηλικῶς ἔχυσι κ᾽ τῦ εἴδυς ἔτι, κ᾽ τῦ τρόπυ μᾶλλον, ἐκ δὲ τούτων ὁ Κῦρ@· πλέον ταύτην ἠγάπησεν, αἷς ὠμίλησέ ποτε ἀνθρώποις. Si enim extrema manu ſaltem Cyrus attingeret, exclamabat, dicebatque eum non impune laturum, quod talia feciſſet. Ea re ſupra modum delectatus eſt Cyrus, & quum attrectante mamillas, illa ſurgeret, & ſe in pedes conjiceret, contra Perſarum conſuetudinem ardente amore Cyrus erga ingenuitatem ejus flagrare cœpit, reſpicienſque ad emptorem: Hanc, inquit, ſolam ingenuam & incorruptam adduxiſti: reliquæ vero tum facie tum magis etiam moribus fucatæ ſunt. Quamobrem Cyrus eam plus amavit omnibus cum quibus unquam conſuetudinem habuiſſet (9). Plutarch ſays almoſt the ſame thing. It is true he does not ſay that Aſpaſia threatned Cyrus, but thoſe only who would oblige her to approach near him. Βελομένων δὲ προσάγειν τῶν καλλιναικῶν, οἰμώξεται μέντοι τύτων (εἶπεν) ὃς ἂν ἐμοὶ προσαγάγῃ τὰς χεῖρας. Parantibus adducere ipſam cubiculariis, væ ei, inquit, mihi qui admoverit manus (10).

(9) Idem, ibid. pag. 545.

(10) Plutarchus, in Artaxerxe, pag. 1024, 1025.

She was of uſe to Cyrus, not only for the pleaſures of love, but alſo for counſel. He conſulted her in his moſt difficult affairs, and never repented following her advice. It may be ſaid, therefore, that ſhe had no leſs capacity than beauty, With theſe qualifications a Prince's miſtreſs uſually goes a great way; and if ſhe enjoys not the ſubſtantial part of the government, and ſovereign power, it wants but little of it. Cyrus treated Aſpaſia with reſpect to rank and dignity almoſt as a lawful wife; and it is even thought that after he knew her, he had no more to do with other women. We need not therefore be aſtoniſhed if ſo great an elevation of the daughter of an ordinary Greek made ſome noiſe even at the Court of the great King (11). This reputation was of great ſervice to Aſpaſia; for after Cyrus was ſlain, ſhe was carefully ſought for by order of Artaxerxes. They found her in great affliction: however in ſpite of her reſiſtance they put on her the cloaths which the King ſent her; and he found her ſo beautiful in that dreſs, that he became deſperately in love with her, and it was a point of honour with him to make her forget his brother; but it was a conſiderable time before he could ſucceed. She alone was able to comfort him for the loſs of Teridates, the moſt beautiful of his Eunuchs (12).

(11) This was the Title which they gave the King of Perſia. See above the Remark [A] of the Article ARTABANUS IV.

(12) Extracted from Ælian, lib. 12. cap. 1.

Xenophon relates a thing which is not very conſiſtent with what has been ſaid above, that Cyrus contented himſelf with Aſpaſia. He mentions two of that Prince's concubines, one of whom was of Phocæa, and the other of Miletus. The latter was younger than the other, and eſcaped the hands of the Perſians on the day that Cyrus loſt his life. The Phocæan fell into the enemy's power; and the Hiſtorian ſays ſhe paſſed for a woman of beauty and ſenſe (13). This was our Aſpaſia. There is no likelihood that Cyrus brought two concubines with him, to leave the youngeſt without employment. If he had brought a regiment of them, we might ſay the greater part ſerved only for ſhew; but we ought to think the contrary ſeeing them reduced to two. Beſides, does not Xenophon ſay it was believed that Cyrus lay with the Queen of Cilicia? This confutes the tradition of Ælian; for Aſpaſia had at that time been long with Cyrus. Obſerve that Xenophon has made uſe of the term σοφὴν wiſe in a different manner from Plutarch: the latter has uſed it in a way which does more honour to Aſpaſia; he does not ſay, as Xenophon does, that it was reported Aſpaſia was wiſe, but that Cyrus ſurnamed her the wiſe (14).

(13) Βασιλεὺς δὲ καὶ οἱ σὺν αὐτῷ τά τε ἄλλα πολλὰ διαρπάζουσι καὶ τὴν φοκαίδα τὴν Κύρυ παλλακίδα τὴν σοφὴν καὶ καλὴν λεγομένην εἶναι, λαμβάνει· ἡ δὲ Μιλησία ἡ νεωτέρα λειφθεῖσα ὑπὸ τῶν ἀμφὶ Βασιλέα ἐκρεύγει γυμνὴ πρὸς τῶν Ἑλλήνων. Rex interim cum ſuis caſtra diripit ac Cyri ipſius pallacam Phocaicam eximia ſpecie ac prudentia etiam (uti fama ferebatur) mulierem abducit. Namque altera natu minor Mileſia à regia coborte capta nuda effugit. Xenophon, lib. 1. Exped. Cyri, ſub fin.

(14) Plutarchus, in Artaxerxe, pag. 1025.

[D] She gained the love of Paryſatis.] A very fine necklace being one day ſent to Cyrus, he ſhewed it to Aſpaſia; and told her it was fit either for the daughter or the mother of a King. She was of the ſame opinion, whereupon he bid her take it and wear it; but ſhe artfully excuſed her ſelf from accepting it for this reaſon, becauſe it was a preſent fitter for the Queen mother, and adviſed him to ſend it to her; for, added ſhe, you ſhall think my neck beautiful enough without this ornament. Cyrus ſent his mother the necklace, and wrote her an account of the whole converſation. Paryſatis was as much rejoiced at the contents of the Letter as at the preſent; being exceedingly pleaſed to ſee that Aſpaſia deſired not to have a greater ſhare in the affection of Cyrus than herſelf. She ſent her very magnificent preſents; but Aſpaſia gave them to Cyrus, telling him he had more occaſion for them than ſhe. This conduct is very commendable, few women uſing their good fortune with ſuch moderation. Ἀσπασία μὲν οὖν μεγαλοφρονῶς, κ᾽ ὑπὲρ τὰς γυναῖκας βασιλικῶς τὰ ἐναντία ἔδρασεν ἢπερ εἰώθασι γυναῖκες ὁρᾶν. φιλόκοσμοι γάρ εἰσι θεινῶς. Aſpaſia itaque animi magnitudine præſtans, contrarium reliquis regum uxoribus faciens, eas longe ſuperavit. Sunt enim illæ rerum ad ornatum mundumque pertinentium plus æquo ſtudioſæ (15). i. e. "Aſpaſia therefore, acting with a greatneſs of mind "ſuperior to her ſex, did the contrary of what other "women are accuſtomed to do: for they are too fond "of dreſs and ornament." Aſpaſia contented herſelf with the heart of Cyrus, and made no other uſe of his favour than to enrich her father Hermotimus (16), which required no great ſums, and to teſtify her gratitude to Venus, as we ſhall ſee immediately.

(15) Ælian. Var. Hiſt. lib. 12. cap. 1. pag. 548.

(16) Idem, pag. 547.

[E] She gave many public marks of her gratitude to the Goddeſs Venus.] She often dreamed during her childhood that ſhe ſhould one day enjoy an exalted fortune (17). After the Phyſician had refuſed to cure her, ſhe dreamed ſhe ſaw a pigeon which, changing herſelf into a woman, acquainted her that the true remedy for her complaint was to take noſegays of roſes conſecrated to Venus, and to lay them to the ſwelling when dry. She did ſo, and diſſipated the humour (18). Seeing herſelf all-powerful with Cyrus, ſhe believed that Venus had for a long time honoured her with her protection. For which reaſon ſhe offered ſacrifices to that Goddeſs, ſhe conſecrated a ſtatue of fine gold to her, and placed near it a pigeon glittering with precious ſtones; and to this idol ſhe recommended herſelf every day by oblations and prayers (19).

(17) Idem, pag. 540.

(18) Idem, pag. 541.

(19) Idem, pag. 547.

[F] If all that has been ſaid of her be true, her beauty muſt have laſted a prodigious while.] Artaxerxes lived fourſcore and fourteen years, and reigned ſixty two (20). A few years before his death he had made choice of his ſon Darius for his ſucceſſor (21). Darius was then fifty years old. There was a Law among the Perſians, that he who was deſigned King ſhould aſk a preſent, and that he who had nominated him King, ſhould grant it him, if poſſible. Darius aſked Aſpaſia: the King his father was very much troubled at this demand, tho' beſides his wife he had 360 very beautiful concubines. He anſwered that Aſpaſia was free, and if ſhe would give herſelf to Darius, ſhe might; but that he would not have any violence offered her. Aſpaſia was ſent for to know her reſolution, and declared that ſhe was contented to be Darius's: ſhe was therefore delivered to him; but Artaxerxes, when he had granted his ſon this preſent, deprived him of it by a ſtratagem. He appointed Aſpaſia Prieſteſs of Diana, which neceſſarily engaged her to continence and celibacy. Darius was ſo exaſperated at it, that he conſpired againſt his father and ruined himſelf irreparably. This is what Plutarch acquaints us with (22). Juſtin relates the ſame thing in ſubſtance; only he does not ſay, as Plutarch does, that Aſpaſia was made Prieſteſs of Diana Anitis, who was worſhipped at Ecbatana; he ſays that ſhe was created Prieſteſs of the Sun, and that for that reaſon ſhe was injoined continence (23). This is very ſurprizing; for Aſpaſia, as Plutarch obſerves, had been the favourite concubine of Cyrus, before ſhe was entertained in the ſame ſtation by Artaxerxes. All the Hiſtorians agree that Cyrus's expedition falls on the firſt years of the reign of Artaxerxes. Let us ſuppoſe, with Calviſius, that the battle in which Cyrus loſt his life was fought the third year of his reign; let us ſuppoſe

(20) Plutarchus, in Artaxerxe, ſub fin.

(21) Idem, ibid. pag. 1024.

(22) Ibid. pag. 1024, & ſeq.

(23) Hanc patrem cedere ſibi ſicuti regnum Darius poſtulaverat: qui pro indulgentia ſua in liberos primo facturum ſe dixerat: mox pœnitentia ductus, ut honeſte negaret quod temere promiſerat, ſolis eam ſacerdotio præfecit, quo perpetua illi ab omnibus viris pudicitia imperabatur. Juſt. lib. 10. cap. 2.

to perſuade us that he omitted to make the uſual proteſtations when occaſion required [G].

poſe that Artaxerxes made choice of Darius for his ſucceſſor the 58th year of his reign: it does not appear by Plutarch's account, that that Prince lived above two or three years after the Election of Darius to the throne. It was then fifty five years that Aſpaſia had been the Concubine of Artaxerxes; and we cannot allow her to be leſs than twenty years old at the death of Cyrus: conſequently ſhe muſt be ſeventy five when a new King demanded her as a particular favour, and when a King to whom ſhe had belonged five and fifty years could not prevail on himſelf to part with her; it follows therefore that at that age ſhe muſt ſtill have had a great many charms. Is not this extraordinary? Can one imagine, without laughing, that a woman near fourſcore ſhould be made a Prieſteſs on purpoſe that no man might enjoy her? Has a woman need at that age to be obliged to continence by a religious vow? Is not ſuch an age a ſhelter and a rampart of much greater efficacy againſt the deſires and ſollicitations of men, than the venerable quality of Prieſteſs? I do not remember to have read that any Critic propoſes theſe difficulties againſt Plutarch, or that he ſays this Lady muſt have preſerved her beauty a long time; but I meet with this remark in a Book written by a Courtier. Il ſe lit, ſays he (24), qu' Artaxerxes entre toutes les femmes qu'il eut, celle qu'il aima le plus fut Aſpaſia, qui eſtoit fort âgée, & toutesfois très-belle, qui avoit eſté putain de ſon feu frere. Darius ſon fils en devint ſi fort amoureux, tant elle eſtoit belle, nonobſtant l'âge, qu'il la demanda à ſon pere en partage, auſſi bien que la part du Royaume. Le pere, pour la jalouſie qu'il en eut, & qu'il participât avec lui de ce bon boucon, la fit Prêtreſſe du Soleil; d'autant qu'en Perſe celles qui ont tel eſtat, ſe vouënt du tout a la chaſteté. i. e. "We "read that of all the women which Artaxerxes had, "he loved Aſpaſia the beſt, who was very much ad- "vanced in years, and yet very handſome, and had "been his late brother's concubine. Darius his ſon "became ſo deeply in love with her by reaſon of her "great beauty, notwithſtanding her age, that he de- "manded her to be aſſigned him by his father, as "well as part of the Kingdom. The father, out "of jealouſy thereat, and that Darius might not partake "with him of ſo delicious a morſel, made her Prieſteſs "of the Sun; becauſe in Perſia thoſe who are inveſted "with that dignity dedicate themſelves wholly to cha- "ſtity." It was not Brantome's intereſt to criticize Plutarch, on the contrary it was of advantage to him to find in that Author the Chronology which I have ſet out. You muſt know Brantome names ſeveral Ladies who had been very handſome in their autumn, and even in the midſt of their winter, till the age of threeſcore and ten. This is what he ſays of the Dutcheſs de Valentinois, We have ſeen above (25) that he names one more. However, the admirable wiſdom for which Aſpaſia has been celebrated does not appear in the choice which ſhe deſigned to make of Darius. She likes the ſon better than the father, preferring the riſing ſun to the ſetting, and forgetting the conſtant friendſhip which Artaxerxes had had for her during ſo great a number of years. This makes one think the Spaniſh maxim was verified in her, Que ningunas damas lindas, o à lo menos pocas, ſe hazen viejas de la cinta haſta à baxo, that is, that no beautiful Ladies, or at leaſt very few, are old from the girdle downwards. Brantome ſays (26) that having heard this maxim laid down by a Lady, he aſked her "how ſhe underſtood it, whether the meaning "was that the beauty of the body from the girdle "downwards was not diminiſhed by old age, or that "the carnal deſire and appetite was never extinguiſh- "ed or cooled in the lower parts? She anſwered, ſhe "underſtood it of both; for as to the luſt of the fleſh, "ſaid ſhe, we muſt not think it wholly cured till "death, tho' age does it beſt to reſiſt it." Brantome's French is as follows. Je lui demandai comment elle l'entendoit, ſi c'étoit au regard de la beauté du corps depuis cette ceinture juſques en bas, qu'elle n'en diminuât par la vieilleſſe, ou pour l'envie & l'appetit de la concupiſcence, qui ne vinſſent à ne s'éteindre, ni à ſe refroidir aucunement par le bas? Elle répondit, qu'elle l'entendoit & pour l'un & pour l'autre; car, pour ce qui eſt de la piqueure de la chair, diſoit-elle, ne faut pas penſer qu'on s'en guériſſe juſques à la mort, quoi que l'âge y vueille repugner.

(24) Brantome, Dames Galantes, tom. 2. pag. 227.

(26) Dames Galantes, tom. 2. pag. 198, 199.

[G] Cyrus's Letter to the Lacedæmonians ought by no means to perſuade us that he omitted to make the uſual proteſtations when occaſion required.] He wrote to them to demand ſome troops. His Letter promiſed ſo many advantages to all who ſhould come and join him, that every one had reaſon to flatter himſelf with having his fortune made by entring into that Prince's ſervice. The pay ſhall not be counted, ſaid Cyrus, it ſhall be meaſured (27). He made no ſecret of his deſign, but boaſted he was more worthy of the throne than his brother: I have more courage than he, ſays he (28), I am a better Philoſopher, and underſtand the Magian Religion better; I can drink more wine and bear it better than he (29). He is an effeminate, cowardly fellow, who never gets on horſeback even when he hunts, and dares not ſo much as ſit on the throne in time of danger. Cyrus's frankneſs is very ſingular: he conceals not from the Lacedæmonians his deſign of dethroning Artaxerxes; he does not tell them, as is the method in all civil wars, that he has no deſign upon the crown, that his intention is only to remove from about the Prince the evil Counſellors who abuſe his name to oppreſs the ſubjects and to aboliſh the laws. He knew very well that thoſe of Lacedæmon would be highly pleaſed to ſee the Crown of Perſia on the head of a Prince who would have great obligations to them. This was the reaſon why he did not conceal his deſign from them. There is no doubt but he made the uſual proteſtations, where and when his intereſt required it: and I believe that at this day no ſcruple would be made of truſting a ſecret of the ſame kind with the neighbouring Princes who might expect ſome advantage by the change.

(27) Μισθοῦ τοὺς στρατευομένους οὐκ ἀριθμὸν ἀλλὰ μέτρον ἔσεσθαι. Stipendium militibus non annumeraturum ſed admenſurum. Plutarchus, in Artaxerxe, pag. 1013, F.

(28) Idem, ibid.

(29) Οἶνον δὲ πλείονα πίνειν καὶ φέρειν. Vinum potare & ferre largius. Idem, pag. 1014, A.

(25) In the Article of Joan of ARAGON, Remark [G].

DACIER

D.

DACIER (ANDREW) was born at Caſtres in Upper Languedoc April the 6th 1651. His father, who was an Advocate in the Chamber of the Edict, and profeſſed the Proteſtant Religion, in which he had been educated, took all poſſible care to bring him up in the ſame Religion, and ſent him to the College of Caſtres; but when by a decree of the Council Nov. the 17th 1664 the direction of that College was given to the Jeſuits alone, he ſent him to the Univerſity of Puylaurens, and afterwards to that of Saumur, in order that he might perfect himſelf in the ſtudy of polite Literature under Tannegui le Fevre. Monſieur Dacier, who had a great genius and inclination for learning, fully anſwered the pains of ſo excellent a maſter; and Monſieur le Fevre was ſo highly pleaſed with the progreſs which he made, that having diſmiſſed all his pupils above a year before his death, he kept Monſieur Dacier alone in his houſe. That learned man was then entirely engaged in the inſtruction of his daughter, who proved afterwards the honour of her ſex. Monſieur Dacier could not ſee the riſing merit of that amiable Lady without being ſeized with an affection for her; and ſhe contracted no leſs a regard for her fellow-ſtudent; and this was the riſe of that mutual tenderneſs, which a marriage of almoſt forty years could never weaken in them. The death of Monſieur le Fevre on Sept. 12, 1672 obliged Monſ. Dacier to return to his father; and having ſtaid ſome time with him he went to Paris with a view to procure ſome ſettlement there ſuitable to him, and to form a perſonal acquaintance with thoſe who were then moſt eminent in the Republic of Letters. One of theſe advantages was much eaſier attainable than the other, and the knowledge in polite Literature, which he had made himſelf maſter of in the famous ſchool of Saumur, ſoon gained him the eſteem of the men of learning. But as the road of fortune is not very acceſſible to men of letters, and as he ſaw no probability of ſettling there to his advantage, he returned to his father's houſe. However this ill ſucceſs did not deter him from taking a ſecond journey to Paris, which proved more fortunate to him. His friends repreſented his merit and abilities to the Duke of Montauſier, who being highly pleaſed to find a perſon, whom he could employ, put him in the liſts of the Commentators for the uſe of the Dauphin, and engaged him in an edition of Pompeius Feſtus, which he publiſhed in 1681 [A]. In 1683 he married Madamoiſelle le Fevre, and in September 1685 with his Lady publickly abjured the Proteſtant Religion. His edition of Horace with a French Tranſlation printed at Paris in ten volumes in 12° [B], and

[A] An edition of Pompeius Feſtus, which he publiſhed in 1681.] The title is as follows: Sexti Pompeii Feſti & Marci Verrii Flacci de Verborum ſignificatione Libri XX, cum Notis & Emendationibus in uſum Delphini: i. e. "Twenty Books of Pompeius Feſtus "and Marcus Verrius Flaccus concerning the ſignifi- "cation of words, with Notes and Emendations for "the uſe of the Dauphin." Paris 1681 in 4to. Amſterdam 1699 in 4to. There are few works, which have paſſed through ſo many and ſo learned hands as this. M. Verrius Flaccus, who lived under the Emperor Auguſtus, was the firſt Author. Sextus Pompeius Feſtus made an Abridgment of it under the Chriſtian Emperors. Paulus Diaconus endeavoured to do the ſame with regard to Feſtus in the time of Charlemagne, but diſfigured it in ſuch a manner, that the labours of Aldus Manutius, Anthony Auguſtinus, Fulvius Urſinus, Joſeph Scaliger, and ſeveral others could never reſtore it to its original beauty. Monſieur Dacier after the example of thoſe great men applied himſelf to give as correct an edition of it as poſſible, and added ſeveral good emendations and conſiderable ſupplements. The Notes are fully to the purpoſe without a vain ſhew of uſeleſs learning, and written with a noble ſimplicity. The edition of Amſterdam is preferable to that of Paris, becauſe there are added to it the entire Notes of Joſeph Scaliger, Fulvius Urſinus, and Anthony Auguſtinus, and the new Fragments of Feſtus.

[B] His edition of Horace with a French Tranſlation printed at Paris in ten volumes.] It is intitled, Oeuvres d'Horace en Latin & en François avec des Remarques Critiques & Hiſtoriques: i. e. "The works of Ho- "race in Latin and French, with Notes critical and "hiſtorical." Paris 1681, 1689. ten volumes in 12°. This edition was at firſt reprinted at Lyons, and afterwards in ſeveral other places; but that which Monſieur Dacier publiſhed himſelf at Paris 1709 in ten volumes in 12° is preferable to all the former, on account of the corrections and additions, which he has given in it; but has been eclipſed by that of Amſterdam 1726 in ten volumes in 12°. This laſt edition contains a great number of important additions and corrections, communicated by Monſieur Dacier to Wetſteins the Bookſellers, who printed it. There are different judgments paſſed upon this work of our Author. Some perſons extol the accuracy and elegance of the Tranſlation, and the learned diſquiſitions and judicious vein of criticiſm exhibited in the Notes. Others on the contrary repreſent Monſieur Dacier as a mere Compiler without judgment, who has preferred the ridiculous vanity of diſplaying a great deal of dry Literature, to the ſolid pleaſure of ſaying nothing but what was neceſſary for the explication of the obſcure paſſages of the Author, whom he had undertaken to interpret. Others embrace a middle opinion between theſe two; and affirm, that Monſieur Dacier has explained a great many paſſages of Horace, but that in general he has not been ſucceſsful in clearing the ſenſe of the Poet. The Authors of the Bibliotheque Françoiſe (1) obſerve, that it is a point univerſally agreed upon, that it were to be wiſhed he had quoted with more exactneſs than he has done the Authors, from whence he has taken ſome ſtories, of which we ſee no trace any where except in his writings. We ſhould particularly be very curious to know what antient Writer has ſupplied him with the names of the Members of the Academy at Rome under Auguſtus, which he ſpeaks of with as much confidence, as if he had had the Regiſters of it in his hands (2). Mr. John Maſſon made ſeveral Animadverſions upon Monſieur Dacier's Notes on Horace in his Life of that Poet printed at Leyden 1708 in 8vo, pagg. 374. under the following title; Q. Horatii Flacci Vita, ordine Chronologico ſic delineata, ut vice ſit Commentarii Hiſtorico-Critici in plurima Poetæ Carmina, quæ veris reddantur and his other works, of which we ſhall give a Catalogue in the Note [C], raiſed him a very great reputation. In 1695 he ſucceeded Monſieur Felibien in the Academy of Inſcriptions, and Monſieur Francis de Harlay, Archbiſhop of Paris, in the French Academy. The Academy of Inſcriptions being new modelled in 1701, Monſieur Dacier loſt nothing by the alteration, but was continued a Penſionary. When the impreſſion of the Hiſtory of Lewis XIV by Medals was finiſhed, he was choſen to preſent it to his Majeſty, who being informed of the pains which Monſieur Dacier had taken in it, and of the ſhare which he had in the hiſtorical explications which accompanied the Medals, ſettled upon him a penſion of two thouſand livres; and about the ſame time appointed him Keeper of the Books of the King's Cloſet in the Louvre, which place had been vacant ever ſince the year 1694 by the death of the Abbé Lavau. His conſtant attendance upon the duntur Annis, novâ donata Luce, à pravâ vendicantur interpretatione celeberrimorum Commentatorum, imprimis Tanaquilli Fabri, Andreæ Dacerii, &c. Studio Joannis Maſſon. This occaſioned Monſieur Dacier to publiſh Nouveaux Eclairciſſemens ſur les Oeuvres d'Horace; avec la Réponſe à la Critique de M. Maſſon, Miniſtre refugié en Angleterre: i. e. "New Explications of the works "of Horace, with an Anſwer to the Criticiſms of "Monſieur Maſſon, a Refugee Miniſter in England." Paris 1708 in 12mo pagg. 169. He treats Mr. Maſſon's book with great contempt; and ſpeaking of Criticiſm, ſtiles it after a great Rhetorician, the laſt effort of reflection and judgment. He both defends himſelf, and attacks his antagoniſt. He aſſerts, that what is true and ſound in Mr. Maſſon's book, is taken from his Commentaries on Horace; and that the method, of which Mr. Maſſon boaſts ſo much, as if he had been the firſt, who ſhewed the uſe of Chronology in Criticiſm, is exactly the ſame with that, which Monſieur le Fevre and himſelf had followed long before Mr. Maſſon ſet up for a Critic; and in which they both laboured with ſucceſs to place the Poems of Horace according to the order of time in which they were written. And it is ſufficiently known what light is given by this method to the works of the Antients in order to exhibit their full ſenſe, and diſcover all their beauties. In this piece Monſieur Dacier has too much imitated the haughty and contemptuous manner in which his antagoniſt had treated him, which drew upon him a reply written with all the ſeverity of ſtyle imaginable.

(1) Tom. 1. Part. 1. Art. 1. pag. 20, 21.

(2) See tom. 10. in the Notes upon Horace's Art of Poetry.

[C] His other works, of which we ſhall give a catalogue in the Note.] I. S. Anaſtaſii Sinaitæ Anagogicarum Contemplationum in Hexaemeron Liber XII hactenus deſideratum. Cum Notis & Interpretatione Latinâ. i. e. "The twelfth book of the Anagogical "Contemplations of St. Anaſtaſius Monk of Mount "Sinai upon the creation of the world, now firſt publiſhed, together with Notes and a Latin Tranſlation." London 1682 in 4to. II. Reflexions Morales de l'Empereur Marc-Antonin avec des Remarques: i. e. "The Moral Reflections of the Emperor Marcus Antoninus, with Notes." Paris 1691, 2 vol. in 12mo. Madam Dacier had a ſhare in this work. III. La Poetique d'Ariſtote contenant les Regles les plus exactes pour juger du Poëme Heroique & des pieces de Théatre, la Tragedie, & la Comedie, traduite en François avec Remarques Critiques ſur tout l'Ouvrage. i. e. "Ariſtotle's Poetics, containing the moſt exact rules "of judging of an Heroic Poem, and Theatrical "Writings, as Tragedy and Comedy, tranſlated into "French with critical Notes upon the whole work." Paris 1692 in 4to and 12°. It was reprinted in Holland in 12°. Several learned men have aſſerted that this work was Monſr. Dacier's maſter-piece; and it is true, that it is difficult to enter into his Author's ſenſe with more ſucceſs than he has done. However it was not this, that procured him all the applauſes which he met with; but the Notes, in which he has explained the text of Ariſtotle, which tho' faithfully tranſlated, is obſcure in many places; and this was not ſo much occaſioned by the conciſeneſs, with which he affected to expreſs himſelf, as by the difficulty of the ſubject, of which he treated. Monſr. Dacier's Preface is likewiſe excellent. IV. L'Oedipe & l'Electre de Sophocle, Tragedies Greques traduites en François avec des Remarques. i. e. "The Oedipus and Electra, Tragedies of "Sophocles, tranſlated from the Greek into French, "with Notes." Paris 1693 in 12mo. Monſr. Dacier having laid down the principles, which thoſe, who deſign to apply themſelves to Poetry, ought to follow, was willing to ſupply them with proper models for their imitation; and this engaged him in a Tranſlation of theſe two Tragedies of Sophocles. But it is more difficult to tranſlate into proſe ſublime images, and ſuch as owe a great part of their beauty to the poetical turn of them, than a Syſtem of Rules, which it is ſufficient to deliver with propriety and perſpicuity. It was this undoubtedly, which was the occaſion of the ſucceſs of Monſr. Dacier's Tranſlations of Works in Proſe, a ſucceſs, which did not attend his Verſions of the ancient Poets. V. Vies des Hommes Illuſtres de Plutarque traduites en François avec des Remarques. i. e. "Plutarch's Lives of illuſtrious Men "tranſlated into French, with Notes." Tom. I. Paris 1694 in 8vo. This Eſſay, which contains only five Lives, is the beginning of a work, which he afterwards finiſhed. VI. Les Oeuvres d'Hippocrate traduites en François avec des remarques, & conferées ſur les Manuſcrits de la Bibliotheque du Roi. That is, "The Works of Hippocrates tranſlated into French, "with Notes, and compared with the Manuſcripts "in the King's Library." Paris 1697, two volumes, in 12mo. Monſr. Dacier has tranſlated the text in a very accurate manner, and equalled the brevity of his Author, without falling into obſcurity. This is the judgment of the Journal des Savans upon that verſion. VII. Les Oeuvres de Platon traduites en François avec des Remarques, & la Vie de ce Philoſophe avec l'Expoſition des principaux Dogmes de la Philoſophie. That is, "The works of Plato tranſlated into French with "Notes, and the Life of that Philoſopher, with an "Account of the principal doctrines of his Philoſophy." Paris 1699 two volumes in 12. Tho' the title of this Book ſeems to promiſe an entire verſion of the works of Plato, yet we have here only ſome of his Dialogues. VIII. La Vie de Pythagore, ſes Symboles, ſes Vers dorez, la Vie d'Hierocles & ſon Commentaire ſur les Vers dorez. i. e. "The Life of Pythagoras, his Symbols, and golden Verſes, the Life "of Hierocles, and his Commentary upon the golden "Verſes." Paris 1706 two volumes in 12°. The Public owes this new work to the new regulation made in 1701 in the Academy of Inſcriptions, by which every member was obliged to undertake ſome uſeful work ſuitable to his genius and courſe of ſtudies. Monſr. Dacier in conformity to this regulation made this Tranſlation and that of Epictetus, which followed ſoon after. We find in this Book an exact and clear account of the Opinions and Life of Pythagoras. IX. Le Manuel d'Epictete, avec cinque Traitez de Simplicius ſur des Sujets importans pour les Mœurs & la Religion traduits en François avec des Remarques. i. e. "The Manual of "Epictetus, with five Treatiſes of Simplicius upon "important ſubjects with relation to Morality and Religion tranſlated into French with Notes." Paris 1715 two volumes in 12mo. To this Tranſlation are prefixed a Life of Epictetus very well written, and a Preface, which is excellent, as every piece of Monſr. Dacier in that kind is. There is a long digreſſion in it to confute what the Abbe Terraſſon has ſaid in favour of Opera's in his Diſſertation upon Homer. X. Réponſe de M. Dacier aux Critiques que l'on a inſerees dans l'Europe Savante ſur la Traduction des Vies de Plutarque. i. e. "Monſr. Dacier's Anſwer to the "Criticiſms upon the Tranſlation of Plutarch's Lives, "inſerted in the Europe Savante." This Anſwer is printed in the Journal des Savans of the 25th of June and the 11th of July 1718. The Authors of the Europe Savante of January 1718, giving an account of the Plan of the new Edition of Plutarch's Lives of illuſtrious Men tranſlated by Monſr. Dacier, pretended the French Academy procured him the place of perpetual Secretary upon the death of the Abbé Regnier des Marais in 1713. He obtained about the end of the year 1717 a grant in reverſion of ten thouſand crowns upon his place of Keeper of the Books of the King's Cloſet; and when by an Arret of Auguſt 1720 that poſt was united to that of Library-Keeper to the King, he was not only continued in the privileges of his place during life, but the ſurvivance of it was granted to his wife; a favour, of which there never had been an inſtance before. But the death of Madam Dacier on Auguſt the 17th 1720 rendered this grant, which was ſo honourable to her, ineffectual. It is eaſy to conceive how great a regret he was ſenſible of upon the loſs of that Lady, in whom he found an amiable perſon, whom her cloſe ſtudies did not divert from the proper care of her domeſtic affairs, and a faithful friend, whom he conſulted in all his doubts, and never in vain. However he was about marrying a ſecond time, when he was prevented by death. He died September the 18th 1722, of an ulcer in the throat, which he did not think at all dangerous, ſince that very evening he was preſent at the Academy. He was ſeventy one years of age. He was ſhort of ſtature, and his viſage was long and meagre. His converſation was dry and languid, eſpecially in the latter part of his life; and he never ſhewed any ſpirit or vivacity, except when he had occaſion to defend the Antients, and inſpire the youth with the love of virtue and learning; for he was inexhauſtible upon thoſe ſubjects. He was a man of great humanity and modeſty, a zealous friend, patient of labour, and ſupplying by his application what he wanted in readineſs. In ſhort his manners, his ſentiments, and his whole conduct exhibited a compleat model of that antient Philoſophy, which he was ſo extremely fond of, and which he improved by the rules and principles of Chriſtianity (a). Some perſons have accuſed him, as well as his illuſtrious Lady, of too great a prepoſſeſſion in favour of the Antients [D]. But Monſieur that there were ſome perſons, who were not ſatisfied with the ſpecimen, which he had given of his Tranſlation in that Plan, and who found ſeveral things to object to in the ſtyle and notes. In anſwer to this Criticiſm Monſr. Dacier publiſhed the piece abovementioned in the Journal des Savans; but it did not ſatisfy the Authors of the Europe Savante, who printed in that Journal of Auguſt 1718 a Reply, in juſtification of what they had advanced againſt his Tranſlation. XI. Vies des Hommes Illuſtres de Plutarque revûës ſur les Manuſcrits, & traduites en François avec des Remarques Hiſtoriques & Critiques & le Supplement des Comparaiſons, qui ont éte perduës. On y a joint les têtes, que l'on a pû trouver, & une table generale des Matieres. i. e. "Plutarch's Lives of illuſtrious Men "reviſed by the Manuſcripts, and tranſlated into "French, with Notes Hiſtorical and Critical, and the "Supplement of thoſe Compariſons, which are loſt. "To which are added thoſe heads, which could be "found, and a general Index of the matters con"tained in the work." Paris 1721, eight volumes in 4to. Amſterdam 1723, nine volumes in 8vo. This work was received by the Public with applauſe, as well on account of the elegance and accuracy of the Tranſlation, as of the Notes, and the Compariſons, which Monſr. Dacier has ſupplied. Theſe Compariſons gave occaſion to the Writers of the Journal des Savans to ſay, that Monſr. Dacier had ſo well entered into the genius and character of his Author, and had ſo ſucceſsfully imitated his arrangement, turn, and expreſſions, that Plutarch would have done himſelf an honour in adopting ſuch Supplements. However the Authors of the Bibliotheque Francoiſe tells us, "that notwithſtanding "theſe elogiums it is doubtful whether Monſr. Dacier's "Tranſlation will make the world ſo ſoon forget that "of Amiot: whether it is juſtice, or prejudice, yet "we find in the latter, however antique it is, and a"mongſt a great number of errors and obſolete ex"preſſions, a certain turn like an original, a nume"rouſneſs of periods, and a ſprightly air, which we in "vain ſeek for in moſt modern Books." XII. Diſcours prononcé à l'Academie Françoiſe, lorſqu'il y fut reçû à la place de M. Harlay. i. e. "A Speech made in the "French Academie, when he was admitted into it in "the room of Monſr. Harlay." Printed at Paris 1695 in 4to in the Collections of the French Academy. XII. Anſwers, which he made as Director of the Academy to the Speech of Monſr. Couſin in 1697, and to that of Monſr. de Boze in 1715. Inſerted in the Collections of the French Academy. XIV. Diſſertation ſur l'Origine de la Satyre; i. e. "A Diſſertation "upon the Origin of Satyr." Inſerted in the ſecond volume of the Memoirs of the Academy of Belles Lettres in 1717. XV. Notes ſur Longin. i. e. "Notes upon "Longinus." Boileau in the Preface to his Tranſlation of Longinus ſtiles theſe Notes very learned, and ſays that the Author of them is not only a man of very extenſive learning and an excellent Critic, but likewiſe a Gentleman of ſingular politeneſs, which is ſo much the more valuable as it ſeldom attends great learning. Boileau has added them to his own Notes upon Longinus, and they are printed in all the Editions of his works. XVI. He had a ſhare in the Hiſtorical Explications, which are publiſhed in the Hiſtory of Lewis XIV by medals. He wrote alſo a Commentary upon Theocritus, which he mentions in his Notes upon Horace Ode 29. L. III. and a ſhort Treatiſe upon Religion, which contained the ſubſtance of his reflections upon that ſubject, and which ſerved to bring him over to the Church of Rome. But theſe two works were never printed.

(a) See Journal des Savans 1722, and Bibliotheque Françoiſe, tom. 1. Part. 1. Art. 1.

[D] Some perſons have accuſed him, as well as his illuſtrious Lady, of too great a prepoſſeſſion in favour of the Antients.] The Author of the Mélanges d'Hiſtoire & de Literature, publiſhed under the name of M. De Vigneul-Marville tells us †, that they had both ſo great a zeal for the honour of the Antients, and eſpecially thoſe, whoſe works they had tranſlated or written Notes upon, that they could not bear the leaſt reproach caſt upon them; and that they were highly exaſperated againſt any perſon, who did not eſteem them as much as themſelves. That Author is perſuaded, that they would have born with more patience any reflections upon themſelves than upon Homer, Socrates, or Plato. We find in ſeveral of his works to what exceſs of reſentment they were carried by Monſr. de  and the Abbé . But what paſſed at their houſe on occaſion of the Satyr againſt Equivocation, which Monſr. Boileau came to read to them, is one of thoſe ſingular facts, which prove what has been ſaid above concerning the force of their prejudice in favour of the Antients, much more than all the vehemence, which they have ſhewn againſt the Partiſans of the Moderns. The beginning of that Satyr was applauded; the two auditors ſeemed charmed with it; but when Monſr. Boileau came to that line, which relates to Socrates;

† Vol. 3. pag. 289, 290. edit. de Paris 1725.

Très-équivoque Ami du jeune Alcibiade;

Monſr. and Madam Dacier began to object. They thought it very wrong, that the Author ſhould have given the world the leaſt ſuſpicion concerning the virtue of that Philoſopher; they made an Apology for him, and defended him by all the arguments, which Plato had made uſe of to ſhew, that the friendſhip of that great man for the young Athenian was founded upon his virtue; and they were very importunate with Monſr. Boileau to alter that verſe; but as he would not agree to this, nor make them any promiſe upon that ſubject, the converſation ended, and the reading of the Satyr ſtop'd there. T.

ſieur Dacier always deſpiſed the railleries which he was expoſed to upon that account, and never receded from his firſt ſentiments. If he cannot be entirely approved, with regard to that point, and if ſeveral excellent Divines have declared againſt that Conformity, which his prejudice for Antiquity made him diſcover between the Platonic Philoſophy and the Doctrine of the primitive Fathers of the Church, and between the Heathen Morality and that of the Goſpel; yet he is to be excuſed, becauſe he had made a particular ſtudy of thoſe writers among the Pagans, who had applied themſelves with moſt ſucceſs to the knowledge and regulation of the human mind; in which reſpect our Author cannot be too highly eſteemed. He choſe none but uſeful ſubjects; he conſecrated his pen to works only of importance; he enriched the French Language with thoſe remains of wiſe Antiquity, which are of the greateſt advantage to the morals of mankind. And we ſhall find, if we will do him juſtice, that when he meets in the Authors, whom he tranſlates, any maxims not entirely conformable to the genuine precepts of our Religion, he corrects them, and ſhews the defect of them in inſtructive remarks (b).

(b) Bibl. Franç. pag. 25, 26.

☞DACIER (ANNE) was daughter of Tanneguy le Fevre Profeſſor of Greek at Saumur in France, by Mary Olivier, and born in that City about the latter end of the year 1651. The great reputation which ſhe afterwards raiſed to herſelf by her learning, is ſaid to have been then foretold by a friend of her father, who calculated her nativity [A]. She was about eleven years of age when her father formed a deſign of giving her a learned education upon this occaſion. While he was teaching one of his ſons the Rudiments of Grammar in the ſame room, where Madamoiſelle le Fevre was employed at her needle, ſhe, as a perſon wholly unconcerned, now and then ſupplied her brother with proper anſwers to the moſt intricate grammatical queſtions propoſed to him by the father, when ſhe found that he could not help himſelf. The father took the hint, and reſolved to make her a ſcholar. She was extremely ſorry that ſhe had ſpoken ſo much, ſince from that moment ſhe was obliged to a regular courſe of leſſons. However in a ſhort time ſhe made ſo great a progreſs, that her father charm'd with the force and vivacity of her genius, applied himſelf entirely to the cultivation of it [B]. He dying in 1672 ſhe went the year following to Paris, whither her reputation had reached before. She was then engaged in preparing an edition of Callimachus, which ſhe publiſhed in 1674 [C]. Having ſhewn ſome ſheets of that work to Monſieur Huet Preceptor to the Dauphin, and to ſeveral other men of learning at the Court, the work was ſo highly admired, that the Duke of Montauſier made a propoſal to her of publiſhing ſeveral Latin Authors for the uſe of the Dauphin. She rejected this propoſal at firſt as a taſk to which ſhe was not equal. But the Duke having made her a viſit, and being charmed with her converſation, inſiſted upon it ſo vigorouſly, that at laſt he gained her conſent; upon which ſhe undertook an edition of Florus, which was publiſhed in 1674 [D]. Her reputation being now ſpread over all Europe, Chriſtina Queen of Sweden ordered Count Conigſmark to make her a compliment in her name; upon which Madamoiſelle le Fevre ſent

[A] The great reputation, which ſhe afterwards raiſed to herſelf by her learning, is ſaid to have been then foretold by a friend of her father, who calculated her nativity.] This Gentleman, who was eminent for his ſkill in Aſtronomy, was likewiſe poſſeſſed with a ſtrong belief in judiciary Aſtrology, which he conſidered as a ſcience, which was eſtabliſhed upon very ſolid foundations. He had erected ſeveral horoſcopes, in which he ſometimes happened to ſucceed. On the day when Anne le Fevre was born, her father deſired this friend of his to calculate her nativity, and gave him the exact time of her birth. The Aſtrologer having conſidered the ſcheme a long while, told Monſr. le Fevre, that he had deceived him in his information with regard to the hour of the child's birth, ſince he diſcovered in the ſcheme ſuch a turn of fortune, and ſo great an Eclat, as were by no means ſuitable to one of her ſex. Madam Dacier always made uſe of this ſtory to ſhew the vanity and uncertainty of that art, which had found ſuch great things in the horoſcope of a woman, who had no fortune, and who had lived a kind of recluſe life. But others on the contrary took advantage of this prediction to confirm and authorize that art, by referring thoſe great promiſes of fortune and Eclat, to the reputation, which ſhe had gained by her works.

[B] Her father charm'd with the force and vivacity of her genius applied himſelf entirely to the cultivation of it.] When ſhe had learned Latin enough to read Phædrus and Terence, he began to inſtruct her in the Greek Tongue, which ſhe was ſo prodigiouſly pleaſed with, that in a ſhort time ſhe was capable of reading Anacreon, Callimachus, Homer, and the Greek Tragic Poets. As ſhe read them, ſhe ſhewed ſo exquiſite a taſte of the beauties of thoſe admirable Writers, that all the fatigue of her father in his Profeſſorſhip was ſoftened by the pleaſure, which he found in teaching her. To divert her in her more ſerious ſtudies he taught her the Italian Language, and read over with her ſeveral Poets of that Nation, and particularly Taſſo, in the peruſal of whom ſhe admirably well remarked the difference between that Poet and Virgil and Homer. She often took the liberty of diſputing with her Father. One of their moſt remarkable diſputes was with relation to Monſr. de Vaugelas's Tranſlation of Quintus Curtius. Her father ordered it to be read, and was charmed with that Tranſlation, which in reality has its beauties, conſidering the time when it was made. But Madamoiſelle le Fevre ventured to point out to him ſome things, which did not pleaſe her, as inſtances of negligence of ſtyle, errors in language, and paſſages ill tranſlated; and he was frequently obliged to own himſelf of the ſame opinion with her. Theſe little conteſts gave him the greateſt ſatisfaction imaginable, and he was extremely ſurprized to find ſo delicate a taſte, and ſo uncommon a penetration in ſo young a perſon.

[C] An Edition of Callimachus, which ſhe publiſhed in 1674.] It was printed at Paris in 4to under the following title: Callimachi Hymni, Epigrammata, & Fragmenta, Græcè & Latinè, necnon ejuſdem Poematium de Comâ Berenices à Catullo verſum: edente cum notis & indice Anna Tanaquilli Fabri filia, i. e. "The Hymns, "Epigrams, and Fragments of Callimachus, in Greek "and Latin, with his Poem upon Berenice's Hair "tranſlated by Catullus; publiſhed with Notes and "an Index by Anne the daughter of Tanaquil Faber."

[D] An Edition of Florus, which was publiſhed in 1674.] It was printed at Paris in 4to. There was another edition of it at Oxford 1692 in 8vo, and another at Venice 1714 in 4to.

ſent the Queen a Latin Letter with her edition of Florus, and her Majeſty wrote a very obliging anſwer; and not long after ſent her another Letter to perſuade her to abandon the Proteſtant Religion, and made her conſiderable offers to ſettle at her Court. In the beginning of the year 1683 ſhe married Monſieur Dacier [E], with whom ſhe had been brought up from her earlieſt years; and ſoon after her marriage declared to the Duke of Montauſier, who had always zealouſly eſpouſed her intereſts [F], and the Biſhop of Meaux her deſign of reconciling her ſelf to the Church of Rome, which ſhe had entertained for ſome time; but as Monſieur Dacier was not yet convinced of the reaſonableneſs of ſuch a change, they thought proper to retire to Caſtres [G] in the beginning of the year 1684, where they had a ſmall eſtate, in order to examine the points of controverſy between [E] In the beginning of the year 1683 ſhe married Monſr. Dacier.] Some Writers aſſure us, that ſhe had been married before; and we are informed in the Bibliotheque Germanique †, that her firſt huſband was a Bookſeller of Saumur, whoſe name was John Leſnier, who for about twelve years had been engaged in printing ſeveral of the works of Tanneguy le Fevre, her father. The ill treatment, which ſhe met with from this huſband, is ſaid to have obliged her to return home to her father, at whoſe houſe ſhe reſumed her ſtudies in polite Literature, which ſhe had abandoned during her marriage. A certain Writer alludes to this ſtory in his Dialogues of the Dead in the Elyſian Fields (1), where he has the following paſſage. "Are you acquainted with the Greek Poets? ſays Charon to the Shade, who ſpoke to him (Monſr. Dacier). I know them, anſwers the learned Shade; they have almoſt all of them been at my houſe to learn the French Language; my wife and I have ſpent our whole life, in introducing them to the acquaintance of our Nation. How! replies the Ferry-man; was that your wife, whom I carried over ſome time ago? She had no ſooner ſet her foot aſhore, but Homer gave her his hand to conduct her to Pluto. A certain Bookſeller would have challenged her, declaring, that ſhe was his wife; that ſhe had left him in the other world; and ſince he had found her now, he would claim her again. Homer caſting a terrible look upon him, bid him retire, not without firſt giving him the epithet of Dog's Face. . . . The learned Shade was raviſhed to find, that his wife was ſo kindly received by Homer; and flattered himſelf that Horace, Plato, and Plutarch would come to meet him in the ſame manner. But his hopes were vain; no perſon waited for him, &c." But there has been inſerted in the firſt volume of the Bibliotheque Françoiſe (2) a Memoire, which aſſigns a much leſs honourable cauſe of her abandoning her huſband. The Writer of that Paper obſerves, that the Author of the Elogium upon her printed in the Journal des Sçavans (3), who aſſerts that ſhe was married in the year 1683 to Monſr. Dacier, would perhaps find it very difficult to juſtify that date; at leaſt that it is certain, that he has made a conſiderable omiſſion in the Life of that learned Lady, by making her quit the name of le Fevre for that of Dacier, without taking any notice of John Leſnier, the Bookſeller, her firſt huſband. It is true, ſays the Writer of the Memoire, the latter would have made but a bad figure in an elogium, ſince he could not have been introduced there without the mention of a very ſcandalous circumſtance in the conduct of his wife, who had abandoned him to follow Monſr. Dacier, in whom ſcandal ſaid ſhe found a certain merit, which ſhe loved, and accuſed the other of wanting. This occaſioned ſome perſons, who were acquainted with the fact, of which we are ſpeaking, to ſay, that Madam Dacier was not ſo zealous in the juſtification of the conduct of Helena without reaſon, ſince by that apology ſhe formed a palliative remedy to be applied to herſelf.

† Tom. 3. pag. 155, 156.

(1) See Entretiens des Ombres aux Champs Elyſées. Oct. 1722, pag. 307, 308.

(2) Artic. 2. pag. 31, &c.

(3) For January 1721, pag. 29. edit. d'Amſterdam.

[F] The Duke of Montauſier, who had always zealouſly eſpouſed her intereſts.] We are informed (4), that in 1682 this Lady having dedicated a Book to the King of France, ſhe could not find any perſon at Court, who would venture to introduce her to his Majeſty, in order to preſent her Book, becauſe ſhe was at that time a Proteſtant. The Duke of Montauſier, Governor to the Dauphin, being informed of this, offered his ſervice to introduce her to the King, and taking her in his coach, preſented her and her Book to his Majeſty; who told him with an air of reſentment, that he acted wrong in ſupporting perſons of that Lady's Religion; and that for his part he would forbid his name to be prefixed to any Book written by Huguenots; for which purpoſe he would give orders to ſeize all the copies of Madamoiſelle le Fevre's Book. The Duke anſwered with that freedom, with which he always ſpoke to the King, and which no perſon elſe would preſume to follow him in, Is it thus, Sir, that you favour polite Literature? I declare to you frankly, a King ought not to be a bigot. He added then, that he would thank the Lady in his Majeſty's name, and make her a preſent of an hundred piſtoles; and that he would leave it to the King to pay him, or not pay him; and he did as he had ſaid.

(4) See the Hiſtory of the Times during the Reigns of Charles II and James II, Kings of England, printed firſt at London, and afterwards at Amſterdam 1691 in 12mo.

[G] They thought proper to retire to Caſtres . . . in order to examine the points of controverſy between the Proteſtants and Roman Catholics.] Their friends endeavoured to diſſuade them from that journey, and Monſr. de Charleval, a Gentleman diſtinguiſhed for the delicacy of his genius, imagining, that it was the preſſure of their circumſtances, which obliged them to leave Paris, brought them ten thouſand livres in gold inſiſting upon their acceptance of them. They ſaw with pleaſure this inſtance of uncommon generoſity, but abſolutely refuſed to receive it. The pretence, which they made uſe of to conceal the true motive of their journey was, that Madam Dacier was deſirous of being acquainted with her huſband's family. During their ſtay at Caſtres, they applied themſelves entirely to the reading of the Scriptures and Fathers with relation to the points in diſpute, and at laſt determined on the ſide of the Church of Rome †. Mr. Bayle in his Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (5) obſerves, that they did not defer the inſtructing themſelves in the doctrine of that Church till the Miſſionaries and Dragoons put them upon it; but abjured the Proteſtant Religion without waiting for the troops, and without making any difficulty about it, and even exhorted every body about them at Caſtres to return to the boſom of the Church. Thoſe, continues he, who are lovers of polite Learning in both the Popiſh and Proteſtant Churches, were very apprehenſive, leſt Monſr. and Madam Dacier ſhould ſuffer themſelves to be prevailed upon by the advice of their Confeſſor, and the Gentlemen of the Miſſion, to write ſome controverſial Tracts. It would, ſay they, be a great loſs to the Public, if they ſhould amuſe themſelves with ſuch a taſk; there are but too many already, who have engaged in it; and it would be much better, that an Author, who can write well upon other ſubjects, ſhould not invade the province of the Miſſionaries, but leave it entirely to thoſe, who are capable of nothing elſe. But when people argue thus, they do not conſider that every one has his particular reaſon, and that Monſr. Peliſſon, who has apologized ſo well for thoſe, who write nothing but Madrigals, has juſtified beforehand thoſe, who quit every other ſubject upon certain occaſions, to write tracts upon Religion. The writer of the Memoire cited in the Note [E], aſſigns the following reaſon of their converſion to the Church of Rome. He tells us (6), that in January 1682 the Court of France publiſhed a Declaration, importing, that all children, which were illegitimate, ſhould be educated in the Romiſh Religion, and be conſidered as born Roman Catholics, though their fathers or mothers were Proteſtants. The Proteſtants were likewiſe prohibited to admit into their Churches any perſon who had changed his Religion, or even their children, or any Roman Catholic of whatever age, ſex, or condition, under the penalty of being deprived of the exerciſe of their Religion, and their Miniſters to ſuffer the amende honorable, with baniſhment and confiſcation of their goods, &c. Monſieur and Madam Dacier had a little daughter, whom they carried with them to Church; but the Conſiſtory at Caſtres having ſome well-grounded ſuſpicions that † Bibl. Franç. tom. 1. Part. 1. Art. 1. pag. 8, 9.

(5) For March 1686. Article 1.

(6) Biblioth. Françoiſe, ubi ſupra, pag. 33.

between the Proteſtants and Roman Catholics; and at laſt determined in favour of the latter, and made their public abjuration in September 1685. They laboured likewiſe to draw over other Proteſtants to the Church of Rome, who had been touched by their example. The Biſhop of Meaux and the Duke of Montauſier repreſented her merit and her huſband's in ſuch a light to the King, who waited only for their converſion to ſhew them marks of his generoſity, that he gave Monſieur Dacier a penſion of fifteen hundred livres, and another of five hundred livres to his Lady. The patent was expedited in November, and upon the advice, which they received of it, they returned to Paris, where they were received by his Majeſty with a peculiar civility, and afterwards both of them reſumed their ſtudies, and Madam Dacier in particular obliged the world with ſeveral valuable works [H]. Upon the death of Monſieur Dacier's Father in 1692, ſhe went to Caſtres alone, in order to ſettle their private affairs there; and upon her return in 1693, ſhe had been only what is called a marriage of conſcience between them, deputed ſome of their Members to repreſent to Monſieur Dacier, that as he knew the King's orders, they deſired him for their ſatisfaction to ſhew them a certificate of his marriage with Madam Liſnier, or elſe not to bring their daughter to Church. Monſieur Dacier refuſed to ſatisfy them in either of theſe reſpects; upon which one of the Deputies of the Conſiſtory told him, that if he had Religion at heart, he would make no difficulty of ſatisfying their Church in the firſt point; but that if he was in the contrary diſpoſition, their Church would have no loſs of him; that they might diſpenſe with coming again to the Church, ſince they would both be refuſed admittance till they had given the proofs required of them. This is what occaſioned thoſe moſt ſerious Reflections, which the Abbé Raguet ſpeaks of in the Journal des Savans. Some perſons doubt upon good grounds, whether there had been a marriage in form between them, and ſuſpect that this occaſioned their refuſal to give the proper proofs of it. Others think on the contrary, that there had been a lawful marriage between them, but that it was ſolemnized privately in the Romiſh Church, for the ſake of the penſions, which were then given to thoſe who changed their Religion. "However the "caſe may be, ſays the Writer above quoted, with re- "gard to theſe two opinions, upon which we do not "determine for want of proofs, it is eaſy to conclude "that with regard to their ſincerity, the Church, "which loſt them, was no great ſufferer by it; and on "the other hand, that which gained them, had no "mighty occaſion to boaſt of its acquiſition. We "may add to this that the Journaliſts of Trevoux, in "their Elogium upon Madam Dacier in January "1721, do not ſet down the time of her marriage with "Monſieur Dacier. They were too prudent to do "this. But the Journaliſts of Paris fix it, as we "have ſeen before, in the year 1683. Let us ſup- "poſe this date to be right, and ſee what follows. "Madam Dacier, ſay the Jeſuits of Trevoux, pag. "101. thought the moſt important and neceſſary employ- "ment for her, was to proceed, as ſhe had begun, in the "education of the daughter and ſon, whom God had given "them. To follow this order, that daughter muſt "have been the elder, and in fact ſhe was ſo. The "Journaliſts took care not to mention her age; but "that of the ſon, who was younger, has eſcaped theſe "good Fathers. He died, ſay they, in 1694, aged "ten years. We ſee there was no time loſt, if he was "born in lawful marriage; and even for this it is "neceſſary to ſuppoſe, that Monſieur and Madam "Dacier were married in the beginning of 1683; "that their ſon was born in the very beginning of "1684; and that he died at the end of 1694, to "make up the age of ten years, in which he was "when he died. But when was the daughter born, "who ſome years after became a Nun in the Abbey "of Longchamps? The Conſiſtory of Caſtres had "therefore good grounds to ſuſpect her legitimacy." But Father Niceron (7) mentioning this Memoire, obſerves, that it is very common, when a perſon abandons any party, to be expoſed to the diſadvantageous judgments and even calumnies of thoſe whom they have quitted; and that we ought to regard this Memoire in that light..

(7) Mémoires pour ſervir à l'Hiſtoire des Hommes Illuſtres, tom. 3. pag. 132 edit. Paris 1727.

[H] Obliged the world with ſeveral valuable works.] Beſides thoſe abovementioned ſhe publiſhed the following: I. Dictys Cretenſis & Dares Phrygius, ad uſum Delphini. Paris 1684 in 4to. It. Editio auctior notis Variorum &c. Amſterdam 1702 8vo. II. Sexti Aurelii Victoris Hiſtoriæ Romanæ Compendium cum Interpretatione & Notis, ad uſum Delphini. Paris 1681 in 4to. We find in her Notes upon this Author a great many points of Antiquity explained with prodigious perſpicuity and learning. III. Les Poeſies d'Anacreon & de Sapho traduites du Grec en François avec des Remarques: i. e. "The Poems of Anacreon and "Sappho tranſlated into French with Remarks." Paris 1681 in 8vo; another edition at Amſterdam 1699 in 12mo, which has been ſeveral times reprinted; and another with the Latin Notes of Tanaquil Faber, and Monſieur de la Foſſe's Tranſlation into French, printed at Amſterdam 1716 in 8vo. This work had great ſucceſs. Madamoiſelle le Fevre's Tranſlation was highly eſteemed on account of its noble ſimplicity and great purity and elegance of ſtyle. Monſieur Boileau gave it this compliment, that it ought to deter any perſon from attempting to tranſlate thoſe Poems into verſe. But Monſ. Tourmont tells us, that ſhe has only tranſlated into French her Father's Latin Verſion of that Author. IV. Eutropii Hiſtoriæ Romanæ Breviarium ab urbe conditâ uſquè ad Valentinianum & Valentem, Auguſtos, cum Notis & Emendationibus, ad uſum Delphini. Paris 1683 in 4to. Oxford 1696 in 8vo. V. L'Amphytrion, l'Epidicus, & le Rudens, Comédies de Plaute traduites en François, avec des Remarques & un examen ſelon les Regles du Théatre; i. e. "The Amphytrio, Epidicus, and Ru- "dens, Comedies of Plautus, tranſlated into French, "with Notes, and an examen of them according to "the Rules of the Theatre." Paris 1683 in 12mo, 3 volumes; and in the edition which Mr. de Limiers has publiſhed of Plautus at Amſterdam in 1718. VI. Le Plutus & les Nuées d'Ariſtophane, Comédies Greques traduites en François avec des Remarques & un Examen de chaque piece ſelon les Regles du Théatre. i. e. "The Plutus and Clouds of Ariſtophanes, Greek "Comedies tranſlated into French, with Notes, and "an Examen of each play according to the Rules of "the Theatre." Paris 1684 in 12mo. Madam Dacier was ſo highly charmed with the Clouds of Ariſtophanes; that ſhe aſſures us, that ſhe had read over that Comedy with pleaſure two hundred times. But perhaps ſome perſons will conſider this rather as an inſtance of her prejudice in favour of the works of the Antients, than as a proof of the excellence of that Play. VII. Les Comédies de Terence traduites en François avec des Remarques: i. e. "Terence's Comedies "tranſlated into French with Notes." Paris 1688, 3 vol. in 12mo. Amſterdam 1691, 3 vol. in 12mo. Zittaw 1705 in 12mo. Amſterdam 1706, 3 vol. in 12mo. Rotterdam 1717, 3 vol. in 8vo, avec des figures à chaque Acte, tirées des anciens Manuſcrits, où l'on voit les Maſques & l'Action des perſonnages de chaque Comédie. When Madam Dacier firſt undertook this Verſion of Terence, ſeveral of her friends endeavoured to diſſuade her from the deſign by repreſenting to her, that the Terence of Port-Royal was ſo highly eſteemed, that though her Tranſlation ſhould prove better, the prejudice founded upon the reputation of thoſe Gentlemen would be a diſadvantage to her, and that ſhe would have the diſſatisfaction of failing in her deſign. But this oppoſition was ſo far from deterring her, that it raiſed an emulation in her, and ſhe took an incredible deal of pains in order to ſurmount that prejudice. She roſe at five a clock in the morning, during a very ſharp winter, and diſpatched four Comedies. But ſome months after when he had read over her work again, and compared it with the original, ſhe found, that her great elaborateneſs had injured it, ſhe applied herſelf to the education of her ſon and daughter, who made a prodigious progreſs under her care. The ſon died in 1694, and the daughter became a Nun in the Abbey of Longchamp. She had afterwards another daughter, whom ſhe educated with the utmoſt care, and who had united in her all the virtues and accompliſhments which can adorn the ſex, but died at eighteen years of age, and her mother has immortaliſed her memory in the preface to her Tranſlation of the Iliad. Madam Dacier was in a very infirm ſtate of health the two laſt years of her life, and died after a very painful ſickneſs Auguſt the 17th 1720, being ſixty nine years of age. The accompliſhments of her genius, how conſpicuous ſoever, were inferior to the virtues of her mind. She was remarkable for her firmneſs, generoſity, equality of temper, and piety. Her modeſty was ſo great, that ſhe never ſpoke of ſubjects of Literature, or her own performances, nor affected to ſhew her ſuperiority in that reſpect over thoſe with whom ſhe converſed. Even her moſt intimate friends could ſcarce engage her to diſcourſe upon points of learning. She always put herſelf upon a level with thoſe about her, and thoſe who did not know her, ſaw nothing in her above the ordinary turn of her ſex, and diſcovered only a Lady, who knew how to preſerve the decorum of it [I]. She was often ſollicited to publiſh a Tranſlation of ſome of the books of Scripture, with remarks upon them; but ſhe always anſwered it, ſince it ſmelt of the lamp, and was very far from having reached thoſe graces and that noble ſimplicity, which diſtinguiſh the Author himſelf. Being extremely afflicted at the ill ſucceſs of this attempt, and diſpleaſed with her performance ſhe had the courage to throw thoſe four Comedies into the fire, and to begin the Tranſlation again. As ſhe proceeded in it with more moderation, ſhe ſucceeded much better, and at laſt brought her work to ſuch a degree of perfection, that it was admired even by thoſe who had moſt oppoſed her deſign. It was a circumſtance which was very remarkable and greatly to her honour, that having taken the liberty to change the Scenes and Acts, her conjectures were afterwards found to be confirmed by an excellent Manuſcript in the Library of the King of France. The edition of 1717 is much preferable to all the former. Madam Dacier has made in it ſeveral alterations in the Tranſlation, which render it better, and more elegant, and ſometimes more literal. The Notes, which are enlarged, are conciſe and well choſen. The figures, which are curious, were engraven under the direction of Monſieur Picart. VIII. Reflexions Morales de l'Empereur Marc-Antonin, avec des Remarques: i. e. "The Moral Reflections of Marcus Antoninus the Philoſopher, with "Notes." Paris 1691, 2 volumes in 12mo. Monſieur and Madam Dacier had hitherto wrote ſeparately, and not publiſhed any work in conjunction. The firſt Preſident Harlay propoſed to them this as one, which deſerved their pains; and in order that they might not be interrupted in the execution of it, he let them have the uſe of his houſe of Meſnil-Montant near Paris, whither he went twice a week to ſee how far the work was advanced. It was this that induced them to dedicate their Tranſlation to him, which is as elegant as it is faithful; and the Notes are enriched with an exact and curious vein of Literature. IX. Monſieur Dacier having undertaken a Tranſlation of Plutarch's Lives of Illuſtrious Men, Madam Dacier propoſed to divide it with him, and diſpatched two lives; but the work being interrupted by Monſieur Dacier's other employments, ſhe turned her thoughts another way; and as ſhe had a long time been deſirous of publiſhing a Tranſlation of Homer. She left Monſieur Dacier to finiſh that of Plutarch alone. X. L'Iliade d'Homere traduite en François avec des Remarques. i. e. "The Iliad of Homer tranſlated "into French, with Notes." Paris 1711, 3 volumes in 12mo; and 1720 3 volumes in 12mo. This Tranſlation is elegant and faithful; however it had not contributed to change the opinion of thoſe, who were not ſufficiently prejudiced in favour of Homer. XI. Des Cauſes de la Corruption du Goute: i. e. "Of "the Cauſes of the Corruption of Taſte." Paris 1714 in 12mo, and Amſterdam 1715 in 8vo. This Treatiſe is written againſt Monſieur de la Mothe, who in the Preface to his Iliad had declared but very little eſteem for that Poem. Madam Dacier being ſhocked with this liberty which he had taken, immediately began a defence of her favourite Author. But it muſt be owned that her love for him has made her forget the regard due to a valuable Writer, and that politeneſs and civility, which ſo well becomes all perſons, and eſpecially thoſe of her ſex. This was the beginning of a Literary War, which produced a great number of books in the courſe of it. XII. Homere défendu contre l'Apologie du R. P. Hardouin, ou ſuite des Cauſes de la Corruption du Gout: i. e. "A Defence of Homer againſt the Apology of "Father Hardouin, or a Sequel of the Cauſes of the "Corruption of Taſte." Paris 1716 in 12mo, Amſterdam 1717 in 12mo. Madam Dacier's deſign in this Treatiſe is to ſhew, that Father Hardouin, in endeavouring to apologize for Homer, has done him a greater injury than he ever received from his moſt declared enemies. This injury is reducible to two heads; the firſt of which is, that he is not well ſatisfied with what the defenders of that Poet have written in his favour, and attempts to correct them, which, according to Madam Dacier, is exactly the ſame thing with being diſſatisfied with every thing, which ſhews the beauties of Homer. The ſecond head is, that he has deprived the Poet of all his grand, noble, and real views, in order to give him falſe ones, and ſuch as can only make him contemptible. Beſides the two laſt mentioned pieces Madam Dacier wrote a Reply to Monſieur de la Mothe, but ſuppreſſed it, after Monſieur de Vallincourt had procured a reconciliation between them. XIII. L'Odyſſée d'Homere traduite en François avec des Remarques. i. e. "The Odyſſey of "Homer tranſlated into French, with Notes." Paris 1716, 3 volumes in 12mo. This Tranſlation is not at all inferior to that of the Iliad. It has been reprinted at Amſterdam 1717, in 3 volumes in 8vo. In this edition the Notes are placed under the text, whereas in that of Paris they are put at the end.

[I] Diſcovered only a Lady, who knew how to preſerve the decorum of her ſex.] We have a remarkable inſtance of this. It is the common cuſtom of learned men of the northern parts of Europe, who travel, to viſit in every country thoſe perſons, who are moſt eminent for their learning, and they carry with them a book, in which they deſire ſuch perſons to write their names with ſome ſentence or other. A German Gentleman of great learning paid a viſit to Madam Dacier, and requeſted her to write her name and ſentence in his Album. She ſeeing in that book the names of the greateſt ſcholars of Europe, told him, that ſhe ſhould be aſhamed to put her name among thoſe of ſo many illuſtrious perſons, and that ſuch a preſumption would by no means become her. The Gentleman ſtill inſiſted upon it, and the more ſhe refuſed, the more importunate he was, till at laſt overcome by his entreaties ſhe took her pen, and wrote her name together with this verſe of Sophocles, Γυναιξὶν ἡ σιγὴ φέρει κόσμον.

That is,
"Silence is the ornament of the female ſex.

The German upon reading that ſentence was ſtruck with admiration of ſo much modeſty joined to ſuch extenſive and exquiſite learning. T swered upon theſe occaſions, that a woman ought to read, and meditate upon the Scriptures, and regulate her whole conduct by them, and to keep ſilence, agreeably to the command of St. Paul. The Academy of Ricovrati at Padua choſe her one of their Body in 1684 (a).

(a) See Memoires de Trevoux, Janvier 1721, &c. Journal des Savans, Janvier 1721.

DAILLE' (JOHN) in Latin Dallæus [A], Miniſter of the Church of Paris, was one of the moſt learned Divines of the ſeventeenth Century [B], and was the moſt eſteemed by the Catholics of all the Controverſial Writers among the Proteſtants. He was born at Chatelleraut the ſixth of January 1594. He began but late to ſtudy Latin, becauſe his father deſigned him for buſineſs, propoſing to leave him his office (a); but there was a neceſſity of yielding to the great inclination which Nature had given him for Learning; . . . . ſo that at eleven years of age he was ſent to S. Maixent in Poitou to learn the firſt rudiments (b). He continued his Studies at Poitiers, Chatelleraut, and Saumur; and having finiſhed his Claſſical learning in the laſt of thoſe Towns, he entred on Logic at Poitiers, at the age of ſixteen, and finiſhed his courſe of Philoſophy at Saumur under the celebrated Duncan. He began his Theological Studies at Saumur in the year 1612; and in the month of October, the ſame year, he went into the family of the illuſtrious Monſieur du Pleſſis Mornai, to be Tutor to two of his grandſons. He had the happineſs to pleaſe him; and he made very great progreſs by enjoying the converſation of that learned man, who frequently did him the honour to read with him, and concealed nothing from him of whatever he knew. Mr. Daillé, having lived ſeven years with ſo excellent a maſter, travelled into Italy with his two pupils (c). He ſaw himſelf in a ſtrange perplexity when one of them fell ſick at Mantua: he was obliged to get him conveyed with all ſpeed to Padua, where thoſe of the Proteſtant Religion have a little more liberty; and as he died ſoon after, great addreſs and intereſt was neceſſary to avoid the traverſes of the Inquiſitors, and to get him carried to France to the burial place of his anceſtors. The Governor of the deceaſed ſurmounted all theſe difficulties, not without the aſſiſtance of Father Paul, and continued to travel with his other pupil. They ſaw Switzerland, Germany, Flanders, Holland, and England; and returned to France towards the end of the year 1621. Mr. Daillé had ſo ſmall an opinion of the uſefulneſs of travelling, that he regretted all his life long the two years which he had ſpent therein [C]; and he would have regretted them more, had he not conſidered the advantage he had enjoyed at Venice of being familiarly acquainted with Father Paul [D]. He was received Miniſter in the year 1623, and firſt exerciſed his office in the family of Mr. du Pleſſis Mornai (d): but this did not laſt long, for that Lord fell ſick a little after, and died in the month of November, the ſame year, in the arms of the new Paſtor. The Memoirs of that great man employed Mr. Daillé the following year. In 1625 he was appointed Miniſter of the Church of Saumur, and in 1626 he was removed to that of Paris (e). He ſpent all the reſt of his life in the ſervice of this laſt Church, and from thence diffuſed great light over the whole Body, as well

(a) It was that of Receiver of the Confignations, which he bore at Poitiers. Abrégé de la Vie de Mr. Daillé, pag. 2.

(b) Ibid. pag. 3, 4.

(c) They left Saumur the beginning of Autumn 1619.

(d) At the Caſtle of la Forêt on the Saivre, in lower Poitou.

(e) He ſucceeded Mr. Durant.

[A] Daillé . . . . in Latin Dallæus.] So long as a man has not publiſhed his name in print, it is excuſable to be ignorant of the true way of writing it; but this ignorance is unpardonable in thoſe who have ſeen the name in print; and therefore great negligence may be imputed to Mr. le Chaumont, who always writes the Sieur D'Aillé, in a work wherein he is anſwering a Letter of that Miniſter. This Letter was printed in the year 1634, and has in the title the name Daillé. The Author had already prefixed it to the Apology for the Reformed Churches, which obliged Mr. de Chaumont to publiſh a Writing to which the ſaid Letter ſerved for an Anſwer. Where were Mr. de Chaumont's eyes, when he was reading the works he undertook to refute? I have already animadverted on Father Southwel's latinizing Mr. Daillé's name ill (1). The learned Grotius has not latinized it a whit better by Dalieus (2). The Abbot de la Roque would not have written Dallié (3), if he had been better acquainted with that Miniſter's Works. Balzac generally writes Daillé, as he ſhould do, but I have ſeen D'Aillé in the XXXVII Letter of the IX Book (4).

(1) He calls him D. Allius. See above the Remark [I] of the Article ADAM (John).

(2) Grot. Epiſt. 350. Part. 2. pag. 854.

(3) In the Journal des Savans of the 2d of January 1675.

(4) Edition in folio.

[B] . . . . was one of the moſt learned Divines of the XVII Century.] The Proteſtants uſed to ſay in France, that they had had no better Writer ſince Calvin than Mr. Daillé, "A Gentleman of that Religion told me that "ſince Calvin they never had ſo great a man as Mon"ſieur Daillé; and I know him: the Jews ſaid of "their Rabbi Moſes Maimonides, that a Moſe antiquo "ad Moſem noſtrum non ſurrexit major Moſe, i. e. "from the ancient Moſes to our Moſes there hath ariſen "none greater than Moſes: I therefore freely grant it "(5)." Patin, from whom I borrow this paſſage, ſpeaks thus in another place. They are now printing at Geneva a new Book of Monſieur Daillé, Miniſter of Charenton, whom the Huguenots affirm to be the greateſt man they have had ſince Calvin (6). What he ſays in the CCCCXVIII Letter deſerves to be ſet down. He is ſpeaking to a Huguenot. As for Law-Books I have no occaſion for them; but I like thoſe which concern your Religion: for there is ſomething to be learned in them, eſpecially when they have the merit of Mr. Daillé's (7). I have quoted above (8) a paſſage of Monſr. Arnauld to which I refer my reader. Here is a very conſiderable one of Mr. Colomiés: Going to ſee Mr. de Valois (Valeſius) the elder, ſays he (9), at Paris, he told me, among other things, that a great many people pretended to write Books, but he knew but few who wrote ſo well as Mr. Daillé.

(5) It is Patin who ſpeaks, Letter 405, pag. 202 of the 3d Volume, of the Geneva Edition. See alſo Letter 527.

(6) Letter 501, pag. 46 of the 3d Volume.

(7) Lettres de Patin, tom. 3, pag. 241, 242. See alſo pag. 464 of the ſame Volume.

(8) Citation (10) of the Article AUBERTIN.

[C] He had ſo ſmall an opinion of the uſefulneſs of travelling, that he regretted all his life long the two years which he had ſpent therein.] "We have often "heard the perſon, whoſe Hiſtory we are writing, re"gret thoſe two years, which he reckoned as it were "loſt, becauſe he could have ſpent them to better pur"poſe in his cloſet." It is his ſon who ſays this in his Abridgment of the Life of Mr. Daillé (10).

(9) Colom. Opuſcul. pag. 95.

(10) Abregé de la Vie de Mr. Daillé, pag. 8.

[D] He had the advantage of being familiarly acquainted with father Paul.] Let us continue to hear his ſon: The only fruit which he ſaid he had reaped from that journey, was the acquaintance and converſation of Father Paul. . . . Mr. du Pleſſis, with whom he correſponded by Letters, had recommended to him in a very particular manner both his grandſons and their Governor, ſo that he was immediately admitted into his confidence, and not a day paſſed but he viſited him, and had ſome hours diſcourſe with him. The good Father even conceived ſuch an affection for him, that he uſed his utmoſt endeavours with a French Phyſician of our Religion, and one of his intimate friends, named Aſſelineau, to prevail with him to ſtay at Venice (11). He employed his favour and intereſt to procure him the neceſſary ſafe-conduct and paſſports from the Republic with regard to the corps which was to be ſent to France (12). The Controverſial Writers have perhaps already made uſe of this circumſtance of Mr. Daillé's Life, to prove that Fra Paolo concealed, under the habit of a Monk, a mind wholly devoted to Proteſtantiſm.

(11) Ibid. pag. 9.

(12) Ibid. pag. 8.

well by his Sermons [E], as by his Books of Controverſy (f). As he lived long, and almoſt always enjoyed very good health, and beſides was not burthened with a large family [F], it may eaſily be conceived that a man ſo laborious as he [G], and endowed with the qualifications of a Writer in an eminent degree, compoſed ſeveral Works. With ſubmiſſion

(f) Extracted from the Abridgment of Mr. Daillé's Life, publiſhed in the year 1670.

[E] His Sermons.] He had publiſhed XIX volumes of them, and a little before his death he ſent to Geneva the laſt Sermons which he had preached on the 12th chapter of the Epiſtle to the Hebrews. They make the XX Volume. The learning in theſe Sermons is not profound, as in thoſe of Meſtrezat; but they are more clear, both with regard to the expreſſion, and the diſpoſition of the ſubject. He has been reproached with ſtealing ſeveral things from Dr. Davenant, in his Expoſition of the Epiſtle to the Coloſſians. See what he ſays on this head in anſwer to the Sieur Cottiby (13), who moreover reproached him with a great number of repetitions.

(13) Daillé, Replique à Adam & à Cottiby, Part. 3. chap. 5. pag. m. 172.

[F] He was not burthened with a large Family.] He married in the lower Poitou, in the month of May 1625 (14). His wife died the 31ſt of May 1631 (15), and left him only one ſon, of whom ſhe lay in at the houſe of the Dutch Embaſſador (16) the 31ſt of October 1628 (17). She had taken refuge there, becauſe the Proteſtants were afraid leſt the news of the taking of Rochelle might raiſe popular tumults againſt them. This only ſon, whoſe name was HADRIAN DAILLE, was received a Miniſter in the year 1653. He had continued his Theological Studies with his father for ſeveral years, when the Conſiſtory of Rochelle invited him thither (18). The father and the ſon were both beholden to the affection and obliging care of Meſſieurs Drelincourt, father and ſon (19), for ſo honourable an invitation. They embraced it with joy, and ſet out together in the month of April, 1654, the father not being willing to leave his Candidate till he had himſelf inſtalled him in that holy office, to which he had conſecrated him from his moſt tender years. In this journey he renewed his acquaintance with his old friends in Touraine, Anjou, and Poitou; and the Church of Chatelleraut, where he was born, as well as thoſe of Saumur and la Foreſt, which had enjoyed the firſt fruits of his miniſtry, had the ſatisfaction of hearing him edify their Congregations once more. He alſo preached ſeveral times at Rochelle and la Rochefoucault, whither he was obliged to go to preſent his ſon to the Synod which was held there on the utmoſt border of the Province; and the Aſſembly having admitted him after the neceſſary examinations, they returned to Rochelle; where that numerous Flock having heard the new Miniſter's Probation Sermons with ſatisfaction, his father laid hands on him, on Sunday the 6th of July. A fortnight after he took leave of the Church by a farewel Sermon, and a Collection was made of all the Sermons preached by him during this journey, which has born two impreſſions, one at Saumur and the other at Geneva. He then departed from Rochelle, to return to Paris (20). He had the ſatisfaction five years after to have his ſon for his Collegue. Hadrian Daillé was in the year 1658 choſen a Miniſter of Paris, in the room of Mr. Meſtrezat. Mr. Cottibi relates a pleaſant ſtory about the invitations of Rochelle and Paris ſucceſſively addreſſed to Mr. Daillé's ſon (21): Your reflecting thus on my prayers (he ſpeaks to the father) puts me in mind of yours in a journey I took with you from Paris to Chatelleraut: without lying, they were prayers well cooked up: under pretext of conducting this your dear and only ſon to be Miniſter at Rochelle, did it not mightily become you to compare your ſelf to the Patriarch Abraham, and him to Iſaac, whom you was going to ſacrifice, becauſe you removed him to a diſtance from Paris (22)? There wanted no more to make the Allegory compleat, but an Angel to come and ſtay your arm, and prevent the blow, obliging you to return back again, and bring home the young victim ſafe and ſound. But you have provided for this ſince; the Angel being one of the King's Secretaries, whoſe name I have forgot (23): he went poſt from Paris to ſurprize the Rochellers; and in ſpite of all the proteſtations which you had made to thoſe poor people, to conſecrate your ſon to them without reſerve, and never to demand him back; and this in oppoſition to Mr. Drelincourt, who, it is ſaid, ſeemed to have a mind to recall his own ſon; againſt all thoſe vows by which you had deſtined his Miniſtry to thoſe Gentlemen, and which being more ſolemn than thoſe which, by your relation, had engaged mine to the Proteſtants of Poitiers, ought conſequently to have been more inviolable; notwithſtanding all theſe engagements, I ſay, the aforeſaid Angel, whom one would have taken for a very intereſted man, addreſſes himſelf to the Miniſters of the Synod of Xaintonge, already prepoſſeſſed by Letters, and without giving the parties an opportunity of defending their right, he takes away this Iſaac from them, giving them ample foundation for eternally complaining both of the fidelity of the father, and of the loſs of the ſon, if he deſerved ſuch laſting regret. Monſr. Daillé calls this a Romance, and a fabulous Narration (24).

(14) Abrégé de ſa Vie, pag. 12.

(15) Ibid. pag. 27.

(16) It was the Baron of Languerack.

(17) Ibid. pag. 25.

(18) Ibid. pag. 29.

(19) He was Miniſter of Rochelle.

(20) Abrégé de la Vie de Mr. Daillé, pag. 30.

(21) Cottiby, Replique à Mr. Daillé, pag. 20.

(22) Without ſuppoſing this to be true, I obſerve that it is the common diſeaſe of the Pariſians to look on living in the Provinces as a deplorable exile.

(23) In the Life of Mr. Daillé, pag. 31, the Elder of the Conſiſtory of Charenton, who was deputed to Rochelle to demand Mr. Daillé's ſon, is named Monſieur Turpin.

His ſon was ſtill alive at the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes; but on account of his bodily infirmities he was excuſed from exerciſing the functions of his Miniſtry. He retired to Switzerland, and died at Zurich about the month of May 1690. All his Manuſcripts, among which there were ſeveral Works of his father's, were carried to the public Library. He was an admirable good judge of books; for he not only knew whether they were good or not, but even whether they ſold well; and I have heard that the Bookſellers were not over and above pleaſed with the latter part of his knowledge. Mr. Baillet mentions him in the firſt Volume of his Anti, and juſtly cenſures thoſe who pretend he had a ſon who became a convert to the Romiſh Communion. I ſet down his words in the margin: they are taken from a paſſage in his Work, wherein he gives the titles of ſeveral Books which he ſuppoſes were deſigned (25). Take notice that Mr. Daillé the father, becoming a Widower at thirty ſeven, never married again.

(24) Replique à Adam, & à Cottiby, Part. 3. chap. 3. pag. m. 152.

(25) A General Conſpiracy of the Proteſtants, and other Heretics of the North and Weſt, againſt the Catholic Church, concerted in purſuance of the Viſions and Inſpirations of the Prophet of Rotterdam, with the Hiſtory of the Viſionaries of both Sexes, whom the Proteſtants have had hitherto. By the Sieur John Daillé, R. B. T. ſon of Hadrian, and grandſon of John. I am miſtaken, ſaid Mr. de Brillat, if this Author's name be not forged. It is true Mr. Daillé, who is now retired to Zurich, is named Hadrian, and his father was named John; but I never heard that he left a ſon in France who was converted. Baillet, tom. 1. des Anti, pag. 294.

Monſr. Pictet, Divinity Profeſſor at Geneva, having read what I have ſaid above, that Mr. Daillé's ſon's Manuſcripts were carried to the public Library of Zurich (26), had the goodneſs to inform me that the Manuſcripts of Mr. Daillé the father were at Geneva, in the hands of a private perſon who had bought them. They are the explication of the IX firſt Chapters of the Epiſtle of S. Paul to the Romans: the Explication of the Iſt Epiſtle of S. Peter: ſeveral other Sermons: the Refutation of the Expoſition of the Biſhop of Condom: and a Treatiſe of the Euchariſt, like that by Aubertin.

(26) I had read this in a Letter written from Zurich a little after the death of Mr. Daillé the ſon.

[G] A man ſo laborious as he.] I aſſure my ſelf the Reader will be glad to find here what I am going to tranſcribe from the Life of Mr. Daillé. "His Books "and his Studies were his chief recreation, and his "greateſt delight. In his cloſet he refreſhed himſelf "after labour, with pleaſure and profit at the ſame "time; and thither he came to reſt after the moſt "painful duties of his office, even thoſe which con"ſiſt in ſtudying. For then he diverted himſelf by "changing the ſubject, and when he found his mind "fatigued with reading or ſtudying matters of high "ſpeculation, or which demanded ſtrong attention, he "took up ſome Author which required leſs applica"tion, and yielded him agreeable entertainment: thus "he intermixed the ſerious and the delightful, that he "might always as it were keep up his appetite by this "variety of diet. I believe alſo we may, without "flattery, give him the praiſe of having been one of "the greateſt readers of his time, and that of the moſt "various kinds of Books, not only of thoſe belong"ing to his own profeſſion, but of thoſe which ſeem "to be the moſt foreign to it. It would be no difficult "matter to be convinced of this, if we conſider that "he lived to a great age, and huſbanded well every "moment of his long life. He was extremely labo"rious, and riſing very early, as was his daily cuſ"tom, he had by that means about five or ſix hours free "from the ordinary hurry of life, which he could aſ"ſuredly ſpend in his cloſet. No wonder therefore if "he had the leiſure to lay up ſuch a ſtock of learning "in ſo many years time; for he was a man who made "his advantage of every thing, and read no Book, "how deſpicable ſoever, without taking Extracts from "it (27), for which he never failed to find ſome place "or other, and he knew very well how to make uſe of "them on proper occaſions (28)."

(27) Pliny did the ſame. Nihil unquam legit, quod non excerpere, dicere etiam ſolebat nullum eſſe librum tam malum, ut non aliqua ex parte prodeſſet. Plin. Epiſt. 5. lib. 3.

(28) Abrégé de la Vie de Daillé pag. 66, 67.

submiſſion to certain Critics, his firſt eſſay was a Maſter-piece [H]; and I do not know whether it ſhould not be ſaid to be his Maſter-piece. I peak of his Book of the Uſe of the Fathers, which was printed in the year 1631 (g). It is a very ſtrong chain of arguments, which form a moral demonſtration againſt thoſe who would have Religious Diſputes decided by the authority of the Fathers. The Author did not begin with this, becauſe he knew the Fathers of the firſt ages favoured the Roman Catholics; for he has ſhewn in ſeveral Works that he deſired no better than to reduce Controverſies to this point: Every doctrine which is not conformable to the three firſt Centuries ought to be rejected as a human innovation. He would not have conteſted with the Biſhop of Meaux the principle of the Hiſtory of the Variations [I]. Never was any Miniſter more exactly acquainted than he with the Hiſtory and Doctrine of the Fathers. It is impoſſible at this time of day to write in finer Latin than he has done on the ſubjects which he has treated. As to his French Style, it cannot be ſaid that he was arrived at the height of perfection: but there was no man of his age, among thoſe of his cloth, who ſpoke French ſo well as he; which muſt be attributed to the intimate acquaintance he had, during his long ſtay at Paris, with the celebrated Monſieur Conrart (b). He preſided in the laſt National Synod held in France, which was that of Loudun, in the year 1659. He had this advantage, that his mind did not decay with his age; for there is no leſs fire and ſtrength in his Reply to Father Adam (i), and in the two Volumes de Objecto Cultus religioſi (k), than in his

(g) The Bookſeller, according to cuſtom, put the following year in the Title page.

(b) See the Remark [N].

(i) See the Remark [I] of the Article ADAM (John).

(k) He was 70 years old when he publiſhed the firſt.

[H] With ſubmiſſion to certain Critics, his firſt Eſſay was a Maſter-piece.] Here is what we find in a Book of Mr. Colomiés (29). Opinions are pretty much divided concerning this Work de Uſu Patrum. The Preſbyterians eſteem it highly; but thoſe of the Church of England make no great account of it. Speaking one day of this Book to a learned man (who is now in Epiſcopal Orders) he told me that in his opinion it was the leaſt of Mr. Daillé's Works, and that he wondred that having read the Fathers pretty much, he ſhould make uſe of that reading to darken the merit of the primitive Church. Mr. Scrivener, an Engliſh Divine, is of the ſame ſentiment, in his Apology for the Fathers againſt the ſame Mr. Daillé. Take particular notice that this Cenſure is principally founded on the wrong which that Work may do Antiquity: this would not be ſaid of an indifferent Book; ſo that thoſe who cenſure this Work are in reality its Panegyriſts. I know very well that the Divine of the Church of England (30), who wrote againſt that Work, pretends Mr. Daillé's arguments are not ſtrong: but he maintains his aſſertion ſo ill, that nothing would be more eaſy than to refute his Criticiſm. But not to enter into the merits of the diſpute, let us only obſerve, that by the confeſſion of that Divine (31), the Book de Uſu Patrum has been the admiration of the Preſbyterian party. This was the Work which a learned Miniſter of Picardy eſteemed above any that Mr. Daillé had written. He ſpeaks of it in the following words, addreſſing himſelf to the Author. Licet quicquid operum hactenus edidiſti, vir Reverende, mihi plurimùm placuerit, tuaque omnia, tùm Latinè tum Gallicè ſcripta, æquali plauſu ab eruditis, atque adeò à piis omnibus, excepta ſint, diffiteri tamen non poſſum, laborum tuorum primitias, Tractatum nempe tuum de Patrum in decidendis de Religione Controverſiis Uſu, me plurimùm ſemper cepiſſe. Non ſolùm enim Opus iſtud mirâ rerum lectu & ſcitu jucundiſſimarum digniſſimarumque varietate refertum eſt, verùm etiam eloquentia orationiſque nitor cum rebus ipſis certant, tantâque eruditione & facundiâ argumentum illud pertractaſti, ut vix quicquam magis elaboratum erudito hoc ſeculo prodiiſſe videatur (32). i. e. "Though I have been very much "pleaſed with whatever Works you have hitherto "publiſhed, and all your Writings, as well in Latin "as in French, have been received with equal applauſe "by the learned, and by all religious men, yet I "cannot but confeſs that the firſt fruits of your labours, "I mean your Treatiſe of the Uſe of the Fathers in de"ciding controverſies of Religion, always took me the "moſt. For that work is not only ſtored with an "admirable variety of things extremely entertaining "and worthy to be read and known, but the elegance "and purity of the language vie with the matters "themſelves; and you have treated that argument "with ſuch learning and eloquence, that, in my judg"ment, a more elaborate performance has ſcarce ap"peared in this learned age." Theſe are the words of Mr. Mettayer, who was Miniſter of St. Quintin; his Latin Tranſlation of this Work of Mr. Daillé was printed at Geneva in the year 1656. It is aſſerted in the Life of Mr. Daillé (33), that a learned Engliſhman, named Thomas Smith, tranſlated the ſame Book into his mother-tongue: Mr. Mettayer ſays the ſame thing; but Mr. Scrivener affirms (34) that he knows this fact to be falſe from very good hands, and has heard Mr. Smith ſay it was one of Oxford, and not himſelf, who had done that Tranſlation; and that he (Mr. Smith) would have refuted the work, if he had thought it worth his while (35). One thing which cannot be denied is, that there is a Preface, under the name of Mr. Smith, prefixed to the Engliſh Tranſlation printed in the year 1651. Mr. Cottiby (36) made a Remark againſt the Book of the Uſe of the Fathers, which the Author did not vouchſafe to examine. See Mr. Daillé's Reply, in the XI chapter of the III part (37).

Here is more than enough to prove that the firſt Book which Mr. Daillé preſented the Public with was reckoned a very good Book, and one of his beſt Books. And this puts me in mind of a maxim which a grave Author advanced ſome years ago, to prove that the Avis aux Refugiez, or Advice to the Refugees, was the Work of a Writer who had already compoſed ſeveral good Books. His Proof reduced to a Maxim amounts to this: Every Book which is well written, and with a good turn, is at leaſt the third or fourth production of its Author. This Maxim is falſe; but when a man endeavours to convert it into a proof of a Crime of State, he deſerves to be turned to ridicule yet more than the Author, of whom I am ſpeaking, was in the Cabale chimerique. Mr. Daillé, and his Book de Uſu Patrum, were there cited, among other inſtances, to prove that the firſt Book which a man publiſhes is ſometimes a finiſhed piece.

[I] He would not have conteſted with the Biſhop of Meaux the principle of the Hiſtory of the Variations.] The principle I am ſpeaking of is this: The Catholic Truth proceeding from God receives its perfection immediately; but Hereſy, the weak production of human wit, cannot be made up of any other than ill-matched pieces. The Author of the Paſtoral Letters pretends (38) that this is arguing like a Heathen, as the greateſt enemy of the Chriſtian Religion would do, and that it is ſuppoſing of facts which cannot be advanced but by the moſt ignorant of all men: ſo that one is tempted to believe the Biſhop of Meaux never caſt his eyes on the Writings of the Fathers of the four firſt Centuries, ſince it is impoſſible that a learned man could ſhew ſuch profound ignorance. There appeared a Writing (39) towards the end of the year 1688, wherein it is obſerved (40) that theſe abuſes fall no leſs on Mr. Daillé than on the Biſhop of Meaux, who ſeems to have copied his Maxim from the firſt lines of one of the beſt of Mr. Daillé's Works. And indeed, that Miniſter, in the very beginning of his Reply to Father Adam, lays down the principle of the Biſhop of Meaux. See the Anſwer of the faithful who are captives in Babylon to the Paſtoral Letter of the firſt of November 1694: you will find there (41) the words of Mr. Daillé, and the declaration which thoſe faithful make, that they ſtick to that principle, notwithſtanding the invectives of the Author of the Paſtoral Letters. This Anſwer is dated from Orleans the 15th of January 1695.

(29) Biblioth. Choiſie, pag. 2.

(30) Matthew Scrivener, in Apologia pro S. Eccleſiæ Patribus adverſus Jo. Dallæum, printed at London, 1672.

(31) See his Preface.

(32) Jo. Mettayer, Epiſt. Dedicat. Tractatus de Uſu Patrum.

(33) Pag. 14.

(34) Scriven. in præfat.

(35) Sibi aliquando fuiſſe in animo contrario ſcripto Dallæum refellere, ſed re maturius expenſa nihil in Dallæano opere ſua dignum opera repertum. Idem, ibid.

(36) Cottiby, Replique à Mr. Daillé, pag. 245.

(37) Pag. m. 209.

(38) See the Paſtoral Letter of the 15th of Nov. 1688.

(39) Intitled, Réponſe d'un nouveau Converti à la Lettre d'un Refugié pour ſervir d'Addition au Livre de Dom Denys de Ste. Marthe.

(40) Pag. 9.

(41) Pag. 5.

his other Works. He declared ſtrenuouſly for Univerſal Grace, and wrote againſt a Profeſſor of Leyden, the Antagoniſt of Mr. Amyraut (l). He intitled his Book, An Apology for the Synods of Alençon and Charenton (m). This Work rekindled the War among the Proteſtant Divines. Mr. Daillé endeavoured to clear himſelf, by ſaying that his Writing had been publiſhed without his knowledge; but notwithſtanding he anſwered a Profeſſor of Groningen, who had written againſt him, with all the ſharpneſs imaginable. The Profeſſor (n) failed not to reply; and though the conſequences of this quarrel did not laſt long [K], yet they produced what conſtantly happens in like caſes, I mean that the public thereby came to the knowledge of ſeveral little adventures which injure Mr. Daillé's memory [L], whether they be true or falſe: for there are but too many Readers who, finding how difficult it is to diſtinguiſh truth from falſhood, chuſe rather to believe what they find in the Book of a famous man. It were to be wiſhed that the Diſputes concerning Univerſaliſm and Particulariſm had been looked upon in thoſe days as

(l) Frederic Spanheim.

(m) It is a Latin Work, and was printed at Amſterdam, in 1655.

(n) It was Samuel des Marêts (Mareſius).

[K] The conſequence of this quarrel between him and Des Marets did not laſt long.] "The diſpute between "Mr. Des Marets and the Author of the Apology "was ſoon extinguiſhed. And as they had till that "time lived in good friendſhip, there was no great "difficulty in reconciling them: the agreement was "afterwards confirmed by an interview at the Hôtel "de Turenne, where they embraced as brothers; and "they viſited each other during Mr. Des Marets ſtay "in Paris, whither his occaſions had called him (42)."

(42) Vie de Mr. Daillé, pag. 26.

[L] The Public thereby came to the knowledge of ſeveral little adventures which injury the memory of Mr. Daillé.] Read the Prolegomena of Mr. Des Marets, and you will there find a long ſeries of artifices imployed by Mr. Daillé to excuſe his printing of his Book. The Walloon Synod made a great noiſe againſt that Book, and wrote their complaints concerning it to the Synod of the Iſle of France. They alledged that the title of that Work had been fraudulently ſuppreſſed till after its publication; that that Title was injurious and ſcandalous; that the Walloon Churches had been extremely offended at it; that they thought the Churches of France had yet more reaſon to be offended; and that Mr. Daillé's honour viſibly ſuffered by it, ſince that Title had been put to his Book contrary to his intention. This ſhewed that Mr. Daillé had written, or cauſed ſome other to write, to Holland, that the Title of his Book was none of his, and that he diſapproved it: and yet the anſwer which the Synod of the Iſle of France returned to the Walloon Synod declares, that excepting the name of Mr. Spanheim, the reſt of the Title was that of Mr. Daillé's Original, and that Mr. Daillé had fully ſatisfied the Aſſembly by explaining himſelf to them concerning thoſe matters (43). This was plainly to impoſe both on the Walloon Synod, and on the Synod of the Iſle of France; for the ground of the offence was not the inſerting Mr. Spanheim's name in the Title, but the intitling of the Work, An Apology for the Synods of Alençon and Charenton. This very plainly appears from the Walloon Synod's Letter. As Mr. Daillé, therefore, preſided in the Synod of the Iſle of France, and cauſed their Anſwer to be drawn up according to his own fancy (44), it was he who impoſed on the two Synods. Dallæum hac in parte ſuæ Synodo impoſuiſſe, idque parum & prudenter & pudenter luce meridianâ clarius poſſim demonſtrare; non adoptando priorem partem tituli alteram omnino ſuam facit: qui enim, &c. If Mr. Daillé, therefore, made uſe of falſe evaſions to clear himſelf with regard to the Title, he made uſe of them in a yet more extraordinary manner to excuſe himſelf with regard to the impreſſion. Mr. Des Marets clearly proves that Mr. Daillé's excuſes, and thoſe of Blondel, and the reſt, compared together, mutually deſtroy one another; and, in a word, that to cover the firſt lie, there was a neceſſity of forging ſeveral others. I aſſert that this does wrong to a great man's memory: for a great number of people, eſpecially in the remote parts of the kingdom, know theſe Gentlemen of Charenton no otherwiſe than by their Books of devotion and controverſy. They imagine them to be the lively images of the Apoſtles, who would not for all the world make uſe of any artifices or diſſimulation. Therefore when they are ſhewed a Monſr. Daillé who deceives two Synods at the ſame time, who gets Letters drawn up as he thinks fit in a Synod of which he is Moderator, who accumulates ſubterfuge on ſubterfuge to elude the complaints brought againſt his conduct, they muſt neceſſarily loſe a great part of the reſpect and veneration which they had conceived for him; and if this is not the conſequence, it is rather becauſe one meets with ſtupid ſouls, than becauſe the thing is in itſelf incapable of producing that effect. It is certain that diſputes wherein a Writer unravels, as Mr. Des Marets does here, the artifices of thoſe who have great credit in Aſſemblies, their artifice, I ſay, in getting what they deſire inſerted in the Letters and Acts of thoſe Aſſemblies, are a ſort of reading which muſt needs give great ſcandal. But this is not all. You will find in the ſame Prolegomena, that when Mr. Daillé ſaw the Cenſure of this Work, he fell into a violent paſſion againſt Monſr. Des Marets; that he ſpread his thundering menaces in all places, and entred into a confederacy with Curcellæus, an Arminian Profeſſor, whereby that Profeſſor engaged to fall on Monſr. Des Marets on one ſide, while Monſr. Daillé attacked him on the other. Dallæus inſtar Tigrorum, qui dicuntur in rabiem agi ad pulſum tympanorum, ita efferbuit ad iſtius Opuſculi conſpectum, ac ſi tres illæ Exercitationes in tres Furias abiiſſent, quæ verbere ſurdo ipſum interdiu noctuque exagitarent; nam illicò cæpit dira quæque mihi minitari, & hinc inde ad amicos ſcriptitando, in me evomere quicquid ipſi ſplendida ſua bilis ſuggerebat, reſponſionem eam minatus quâ me pro merito depecteret . . . . primum ex æſtu politico pactus eſt cum Curcellæo, publico hoſte Eccleſiarum reformatarum, ut arma ſua conjungerent, & me communi impetu adorirentur (45). i. e. "Daillé, like "Tigers which are ſaid to run mad at the beating of "drums, was as highly enraged at the ſight of this "little piece, as if thoſe three Exercitations had been "converted into three Furies, and had ſecretly laſhed "him day and night: for he immediately began to "threaten me with every thing that was terrible, and "to write circular Letters to his friends, wherein he "loaded me with all the abuſes his malice could in-"vent, menacing me with an Anſwer in which I "ſhould be handled as I deſerved. . . . He firſt politi-"cally leagued himſelf with Curcellæus, the profeſ-"ſed enemy of the Reformed Churches, to join their "forces and attack me at once." This wrath has been attributed to the preſumption which he had entertained, on ſeeing himſelf Miniſter of the capital City; as if a Paſtor of that Church ought to enjoy the privilege of a little Popedom. Iniquius fert ſibi contradici & pro celebritate Eccleſiæ cui ſervit, διὰ τὸ βασιλεύειν τὴν πόλιν ἐκείνην, ut de veteri Roma loquuntur Patres Concilii Chalcedonenſis Can. penult. Non ſolum τὰ πρωτεῖα ſibi deberi putat, ſed etiam τὸ πρωτεῖον; ac ſubinde Archiepiſcopaturit vel Papaturit (46). He cites againſt him a paſſage in a Caſe which the Sieur de Fauquemberge, Miniſter of the Church of Senlis, had publiſhed againſt him; a paſſage which contains a fact full of inſupportable pride (47): it is aſſerted that ſeveral of his brethren complained of his haughtineſs, and in concluſion, that it is common for thoſe who ſee themſelves in a diſtinguiſhed poſt and applauded by flatterers, (43) Vos ſcitis, Domini honoratiſſimique fratres, id factum abſque ejus conſenſu ipſoque inſcio, & præter id quod ipſi præſcribitis in veſtra ad nos Epiſtola, ita ſe explicavit in hoc tœtu, ut plene nobis ſatisfactum fuerit, Mareſ. Prolegom. Epiciſ. Theolog. edit. 1658, in 12mo.

(44) In nuperis literis ſuæ Synodi Provincialis, cui præfuit, quas curavit fabricari pro ſuo lubitu. Ibid.

(45) Idem, ibid.

(46) Idem, ibid.

(47) Nolim omnibus iis credere, quæ de ipſo publice ſcripſit unus ex ſuis in eadem Provincia ſymmyſtis, Fauquembergius; aut illum eo feritatis proceſſiſſe, ut cùm ſibi narraretur hunc pro concione liberiùs notaſſe quendam ex Eccleſiæ ſuæ membris, qui dicebatur falſo modo uſus fuiſſe, ſtatim eum inauditum damnaverit, nec ſolum cenſurâ dignum pronunciaverit, ſed etiam in hanc tyrannicam vocem proruperit, Il lui faut bailler les eſtrivieres, du haut en bas: quo atrocius & contumelioſius, ut norunt qui Gallicè norunt, (ſic enim agitur demum cum vilſſimis mancipiis,) nihil à Verbi Divino Miniſtro, de ſuo fratre in eadem dignitate conſtituto, dici poteſt. Idem ibid. i. e. "I would not give credit to all that Fauquemberge, one "of his own fraternity in the ſame Province has publiſhed of him; or believe he ar-"rived at ſuch a pitch of inſolence, that when he was told that the aforeſaid Miniſter "had in his Sermon a little too freely cenſured one of the members of his Church, "who was reported to have uſed falſe meaſures, he ſhould immediately condemn him "unheard, and not only pronounce him worthy of cenſure, but break out into this "tyrannical expreſſion, He ſhould have the Baſtinado from head to foot: than which "nothing more barbarous or contumelious could be ſpoken by a Miniſter of God's "Word of a Brother of his own Order; for thus are the vileſt Slaves treated."

as they are at preſent [M]. Mr. Daillé had a great ſhare in the eſteem of Balzac [N]: he died at Paris the 15th of April 1670, leaving a ſon of whom I ſhall ſpeak in the Remarks (o). One cannot ſufficiently admire the knavery of the Miſſionaries, with regard to a paſſage of Mr. Daillé concerning the taking away the Cup from the Laity [O].

(o) In the Remark [F].

terers, to have their heads turned. They cannot bear to be contradicted in ſuch a ſtation. Ut dudum eſt quod φιλοπρωτεύει, nec priſtinæ ferulæ memoriam penitus depoſuit; ita afflatus typho ſæculi paulatim aſſuevit καταξιοῦν τῶν κλήρων, ut multi ſint ejuſdem ſecum ordinis in Gallia, qui majorem moderationem, & nimis ſublimium ſpirituum aliquam repreſſionem, in ipſo deſiderent. Verùm id ſolet iis evenire qui in loco celſiore conſiſtunt, ut facile tententur vertigine, & aliorum blandimentis delinîti, ſibi quid ſumant de Phariſæorum ſupercilio, quod poſtea tonſoris novaculam non vult admittere (48). i. e. "As he has for ſome time aſpired to primacy, and "has not yet quite forgotten his having been a pe- "dagogue, he is ſo puffed up with worldly arrogance, "and has accuſtomed himſelf to lord it over the Clergy "in ſuch a manner, that many of his own order in "France wiſh he had more moderation, and that he "would curb his high ſpirit a little. But it frequent- "ly happens to thoſe who are placed in a high ſtati- "on, that they eaſily grow dizzy, and being elated "with the applauſe of others, contract ſomething of "the Phariſaical pride, which will not bear humilia- "tion."

(48) Idem, ibid.

It is certain theſe things are enough to leſſen the eſteem which the people had conceived for Mr. Daillé. In moſt of the provinces of France he was no otherwiſe known than by a great number of Sermons, full of excellent morality, and edifying piety, and by ſome Books of Controverſy, wherein zeal for the truth, moderation, and judgment ſhine no leſs than learning. When people are acquainted only with the bright ſide of a man's character, they have the higheſt veneration for him, becauſe they are prepoſſeſſed by this favourable opinion, that his life does not give the lie to his doctrine; and conſequently great abatements are to be made, if we hear that a perſon who preaches up humility, and the forgiving of injuries to others, is himſelf puffed up with pride, cannot bear to be refuted, and horribly abuſes his Cenſurers. It is doubtleſs a great misfortune for ſuch men as Mr. Daillé, to engage in perſonal diſputes: it ſeems as if their evil Genius laid wait for them there with his moſt dangerous ſnares. They grow hot, and in their paſſion diſcover more of their defects in a month, than they had been able to conceal in twenty years. The worſt is, that their adverſary reveals whatever may tend to diſhonour them, and publiſhes a hundred things which would have otherwiſe remained unknown. Let the reader remember the clauſe which I have inſerted in the Text of this Article, whether they be true or falſe. I decide nothing here as to the fact: nor do I advance any thing but what is to be found in a public Work.

[M] It were to be wiſhed that the Diſputes concerning Univerſaliſm and Particulariſm had been looked upon in thoſe days as they are at preſent.] We have ſeen that the Walloon Synod mightily beſtirred themſelves againſt Mr. Daillé's Book, and made heavy complaints of it to the Synod of the Iſle of France. They found matter of great ſcandal in the very Title; An Apology for the Synods of Alençon and Charenton. Whence comes it that the Walloon Synod, who drew up a form of ſubſcription in the year 1686, for the Miniſters who came from France, did not inform themſelves whether they were for univerſal or particular Grace? Had this doctrine changed its nature ſince the printing of Mr. Daillé's Book? This is no very difficult queſtion. There needs no more to ſolve it than to call to mind that all thoſe who had been at the head of parties, either in France, or in Holland, had been dead a long time. If Peter du Moulin, Andrew Rivet, Frederic Spanheim, Samuel Des Marets, or Moſes Amyraut, had been alive in the year 1686, the Diſputes concerning Univerſal Grace would have been reckoned very important; but, as they had been for a long time unable to communicate to others the ſpirit which animated them, the waters which had overflowed were returned into their channel, flowing in a gentle and quiet ſtream, and people then judged better of the nature of things. How many fewer ſins and ſcandals would there have been in the world, if thoſe waters had never overflowed their banks (49)?

(49) See the Remark [E] of the Article AMYRAULT.

[N] He had a great ſhare in the eſteem of Balzac.] It was Monſr. Conrart who procured Mr. Daillé this acquaintance. So early as the year 1639 they wrote Letters to one another. We find among the ſelect Letters of Balzac an Anſwer which he ſent to Mr. Daillé the 24th of December 1639 (50). Mr. Daillé is frequently mentioned in Mr. de Balzac's Letters to Mr. Conrart (51), and almoſt always with ſtudied encomiums. See the X Letter of the III Book, wherein a Sermon of Mr. Daillé's is praiſed to the ſky. In the XVI Letter of the IV Book, Balzac ſpeaks of a viſit he had received from him, and complains in the moſt obliging manner that it had laſted but two hours. This is an encomium on our Miniſter which does him a great deal of honour. Mr. Daillé went to ſee Mr. de Balzac in 1653, during the journey which I have ſpoken of above (52). This appears from the date of the XVI Letter of the IV Book. Here follows ſomething which teſtifies the friendſhip there was between Meſſrs. Daillé and Conrart. "The Friday after this "his laſt Sermon (53), he only went abroad to pay "a viſit in the neighbourhood to the illuſtrious Mr. "Conrart his intimate friend, who was a man per- "fectly after his own heart, whoſe charming conver- "ſation made one of the chief delights of his life, "and in whoſe affection he might juſtly glory; there "never having been a more ſtrict or more indiſſoluble "friendſhip than that which always continued between "them from their firſt acquaintance. He ſeemed to "have a deſire to take leave of this dear friend; and, "as if he had ſome ſore knowledge that this would "be their laſt farewel, his viſit was longer than uſual, "and he did not retire till after a converſation of "two hours, which was the moſt agreeable in the "world (54)."

(50) It is the 13th of the 1ſt Book of the 2d part.

(51) See the 1ſt Letter of the 1ſt Book, pag. 26, of the Dutch Edition of 1659; and alſo the 8th Letter of the 2d Book, pag. 107. See likewiſe pag. 249.

(52) In the Remark [F].

(53) That is, the Sermon which he preached on Thurſday the 10th of April 1670. It has been printed with the Abridgment of his Life.

(54) Abrégé de la Vie de Mr. Daillé, pag. 47.

[O] One cannot ſufficiently admire the knavery of the Miſſionaries, with regard to a paſſage of Mr. Daillé concerning the taking away the Cup from the Laity.] They have ſaid, and repeated it a hundred times, that Mr. Daillé had acknowledged (55) that the taking away the Cup was of little or no importance: they have repeated it, I ſay, on all occaſions, tho' they have been perpetually anſwered that Mr. Daillé ſpoke not of the taking away the Cup, but of the reaſons which had induced the Church of Rome to take it away. See the Letter (56) which he wrote to Mr. de Langle, Miniſter of Roan, who had very well expoſed this equivocation in a printed Sermon.

(55) In his Apology for the Reformed Churches.

(56) It is dated the 1ſt of March 1655, and printed with two Sermons of Mr. de Langle on the 1ſt Epiſtle to the Corinthians, chap. x. ver. 32.

DALMATIN (GEORGE) a Lutheran Miniſter at Laubech in Carniola in the ſixteenth Century, tranſlated the whole Bible into the Sclavonian tongue, and publiſhed his Verſion at Wittemberg (a). This Edition had not been long publiſhed, when the Epiſtle Dedicatory which informs me of this fact was dated; and it bears date the 28th of March 1586. Calviſius (b) ſays this Verſion of the Bible was printed in the year 1584 (c), and that Adam Bochoritz was concerned in it with Dalmatin. The latter had ſtudied at Tubingen, in the College where the Duke of Wirtembergh maintained a certain number of ſcholars (d).

(a) Philipp. Hailbrunnerus, Epiſt. Dedic. Comment. in Jeremiam.

(b) Ad ann. 1584.

(c) It muſt therefore be diſtinguiſhed from that which, according to the Oxford Catalogue, at the word Biblia, was printed Oſtrobiæ, in the year 1581.

(d) Hailbrunn. Epiſt. Ded. Com. in Jerem.

(a) This Article was communicated by Mr. DE BRESLER.

DALMATIN (a) (GEORGE) Maſter of Arts, a Lutheran Miniſter in upper Carniola, was an able, expeditious, active, and learned man. In the year 1568 he tranſlated Luther's

Luther's German Bible into the Sclavonian or Carniolic tongue: and as that tongue is ſpoken in divers places, as in Styria, Carinthia, and Carniola, the States of thoſe Countries concluded that the aforeſaid Bible ſhould be printed in that language. Wherefore a calculation was made of the expence with a Printer of Laybach (b) [A]. But the Archduke Charles of Auſtria, being informed of it, in the year 1580 forbad the ſaid Printer to print the aforementioned Bible. However, the States of the Country, reſolving to get it printed elſewhere, ſent George Dalmatin for that purpoſe to Gratz, there to take upon him the Correction and Reviſal of this Bible. But it was found proper to have it reviſed at Laybach, which was done accordingly [B]. And as it might be eaſily concluded that the Impreſſion of this Bible would not be permitted in the Dominions of Auſtria, on the 10th of April 1583 they ſent the ſaid Dalmatin and Adam Bohoritſch [C] to Wittembergh, with a recommendation to the Elector of Saxony, where the Impreſſion was begun [D] on the 28th of May 1583, and finiſhed in ſix months; ſo that the whole Work was compleated by New-year's day 1584 [E]. Dalmatin dedicated it to the States of Styria, Carinthia, and Carniola, and returned thence to his own country with his companion and his printed Copies, after having been at Dreſden to thank the Elector for his protection. This Tranſlation is ſtill uſed in Carniola among the Eccleſiaſtics, who have a permiſſion to read it, that they may properly pronounce the paſſages of Holy Scripture according to the Carniolic Tongue, becauſe there is no other Sclavonic Verſion [F]; for as much as the Work of Primus Truber [G] is likewiſe the production of a Lutheran, and has not, as it is ſaid, been ſo much as publiſhed for the public good. Dalmatin was afterwards

(b) Valvaſor, la Glorie du Duché de Carniole, lib. 6. chap. 11. num. 11. pag. 348.

[A] With a Printer &c.] This Printer's name was John Manlius; and he had been brought into that country by Primus Truber, about the year 1561. He was the firſt who ſet up a Printing-houſe at Laybach, and began to print the Sclavonian tongue in Latin Letters, which the ſaid Primus Truber had invented, whereas before they wrote in Glaguelitic or Cyrillic characters (1).

(1) Valvaſor, Glorie du Duché de Carniole, pag. 340.

[B] Was done accordingly.] On the 24th of Auguſt in the year 1581, the following Divines aſſembled for this purpoſe at Laybach, who were well verſed in the Hebrew, Greek, Latin, and Sclavonian tongues, and were deputed, each from his reſpective country, to reviſe this Work, viz. Jeremiah Hamburger, Doctor of Divinity, Paſtor and Superintendant of the Lutheran Churches of Gratz, in Styria; Bernard Steiner, Paſtor at Clagenfurt, in Carinthia; and George Dalmatin the Tranſlator, with Chriſtopher Spindler, Paſtor and Superintendant of the Church of Laybach, Adam Bohoritſch, John Schweiger, and Felician Truber of Carniola (2).

(2) Ibid. pag. 348.

[C] Adam Bohoritſch] As it is uſually written in German, or Bohorizh according to the Orthography of his own country. He was a native of Carniola, and Evangelic Rector at Laybach. While he reſided at Wittembergh, he publiſhed a Book under the Title of Arcticæ Horulæ ſucceſſivæ de Latino-Carniolana Literatura, ad Latinæ Linguæ analogiam accommodata, unde Moſchoviticæ, Ruthenicæ, Polonicæ, Boëmicæ, Luſaticæ Linguæ cum Dalmatica & Croatica cognatio facile deprehenditur. Witembergæ 1584. This Book which ſerves for a Grammar, was compoſed with great application, and an Epiſtle Dedicatory was prefixed to it ad Illuſtrium Styriæ, Carinthiæ, & Carniolæ Procerum filios, univerſi equeſtris ordinis ingenuam juventutem. Witem. Cal. Jan. 1584 (3).

(3) Ibid.

[D] The Impreſſion was begun.] They had agreed with Samuel Seelfiſch, Bookſeller at Wittembergh, that he ſhould print fifteen hundred Copies of it, each Copy to contain two hundred and eighty ſheets of the largeſt paper, on a fine character, with wooden cuts. For which the States of Carniola were to pay after the rate of twenty florins for every bale of five hundred ſheets. The expences of the impreſſion of this Bible amounted to about eight thouſand florins: towards which the States of Styria gave a thouſand florins, thoſe of Carinthia nine hundred, and the Evangelic States of Carniola ſix thouſand one hundred (4).

(4) Ibid.

[E] In 1584.] Under the Title of Biblia tu je uſe ſuetu piſmu, ſtariga inu noviga Teſtamenta Slovenſki, tolmazhena Skuſi Juria Dalmatina &c. i. e. "The "Bible, or the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New "Teſtament, tranſlated into the Sclavonian tongue, "by George Dalmatin," printed at Wittembergh in the Electorate of Saxony, by the heirs of John Krafft 1584 (5).

(5) Ibid.

[F] Sclavonian Verſion.] Stephen Gerlach (6) indeed mentions, that in the month of June 1578 there was found at Vedreno, a village of Bulgaria on the frontiers of Thrace, the Bible in the Sclavonian or Illyrian tongue, at the houſe of an Eccleſiaſtic of that place; but in all likelihood it is neither printed in Latin Characters, nor agrees in Dialect with that which I have ſpoken of above.

(6) In the Relation of his Journey to Turky.

[G] Primus Truber.] Primus Truber deſerves to have a more ample account given of him. He was firſt a Canon of Laybach, and began in the year 1531 to preach publickly in the Cathedral of that City Luther's doctrine concerning the two kinds in the Euchariſt, and to approve the marriage of Prieſts; ſo that he embraced Luther's party, and left Carniola to retire into the Empire, where the town of Kempſon choſe him for their Paſtor. He preached there for fourteen years, and deſerved well of his country by his Tranſlations. For he tranſlated into the Carniolan tongue, in Latin Characters, not only, 1, The Goſpels, according to the Verſion of Luther, 2, with his Catechiſm, but alſo 3, the whole New Teſtament, and 4, the Pſalms of David in the year 1553. At length the States of Carniola recalled him home. He tranſlated alſo into his mother tongue the Confeſſion of Augſburgh, and Luther's German Sermons, whoſe laſt Treatiſe was printed at Tubingen. Herman Fabricius Moſemannus (7) ſpeaks of Truber's Tranſlation, with the addition of ſome other circumſtances, as follows. "John Ungnad Baron of Sonneck (8) in "Croatia, at the time of the Augſburgh Confeſſion, "cauſed the Bible to be tranſlated into the Sclavonian "language at Aurach in the Dutchy of Wirtembergh. "In this tranſlation he employed three learned Sclavonians; the firſt was named Primus Truber, the "ſecond Anthony Dalmata, and the third Stephen "Conſul. But theſe Books were ſeized on the road, "and are ſtill ſhut up in Caſks at Newſtad in Auſtria. "The Character is altogether ſingular, almoſt reſembling an Aſiatic or Syriac Character, with pretty "large and ſquare letters. A Copy of this Bible may "be ſeen in the Library of the Landgrave of Heſſe. "There are alſo ſome copies of it to be met with "in Sclavonia." Thus far Fabricius. Theſe Bibles are without doubt printed in Cyrillic Characters. But as to Truber, he was baniſhed Carniola a ſecond time, and died in the year 1586, according to Martin Zeiler (9). The ſame year he ſubſcribed himſelf as follows, in a Letter he wrote to the Deputies of Carniola, which Subſcription contains his whole life. "Primus Truber, formerly Canon in ordinary, cal-"led, and confirmed at Laybach, Paſtor at Lack, "at Tuffer near Ratſchach, and at St. Bartholomew's "field, Chaplain at S. Maximilian of Cilly, Scla-"vonian Preacher at Trieſte, and after the firſt per-"ſecution Preacher at Roſemburgh on the Tauber, "Paſtor at Kempten and at Aurais, afterwards "Preacher to the States of Carniola, and at Rubia "in the County of Goergh, and after the ſecond "Perſecution Paſtor at Cauffen, and now at Deredin-"gen near Tubingen (10)."

(7) In the Abridgment of the Hiſtory of the World.

(8) He was the Emperor's Governor in Styria, and General of the three Provinces of Styria, Carinthia, and Carniola, and died in the year 1564, on the 27th of December, aged 71. Valvaſor, la Glorie du Duché de Carniole, liv. 12. chap. 9. pag. 523 & liv. 15. chap. 20. p. 467. Mat. Dreſſerus: he wrote a Hiſtory of the Family of Ungnad, and principally of this John of Ungnad, Leipſic 1602, in 4to.

(9) In his Epiſtles.

(10) Valvaſor, Glorie du Duché de Carniole, pag. 348.

afterwards put in poſſeſſion of the Cure of St. Khaziam [H] by Chriſtopher Baron of Aurſpergh in the year 1585. And though the Catholics had given him an ignominious name [I], and had baniſhed him in 1598, the Baron of Aurſpergh nevertheleſs kept him concealed [K] in his houſe.

[H] Of S. Khaziam,] Or S. Catiani near Aurſpergh, in the Dioceſe of the Patriarch of Aquileia. The Patriarch Gregory, in the year 1620, gave the right of preſentation with all the dependencies of that Benefice to Gebhard of Aurſpergh (11).

(11) Ibid. lib. 8. pag. 729.

[I] Given him an ignominious name.] They called him Jure Kobila, that is, George Mare. But this was done by miſtake, becauſe another Lutheran Miniſter, named George Tereſchith, was nick-named Jure Kobila, on account of a Mare which had been given him: for Jure in the Carniolan tongue ſignifies George, and Kobila a Mare. Thence it has happened that ſeveral Proteſtants have called our Dalmatin Jure Kobila through ignorance (12).

(12) Ibid. pag. 349.

[K] Concealed in his houſe,] That is, in a vault under the Stable, before the Caſtle; for which reaſon this private vault is to this day called the Hole of the Preacher Jure Kobila (13).

(13) Ibid. pag. 349, & 729.

DAMASCENUS (JOHN), one of the moſt illuſtrious Fathers of the lower Empire, flouriſhed in the eighth Century [A]. He was born at Damaſcus, where his father, tho' a good Chriſtian † [B], had the place of Counſellor of State to the Saracen Chalif. He was a very rich and a very charitable man, and principally delighted in redeeming of Captives. He one day redeemed a very able man named Coſmas, who had been taken at Sea, and made him Tutor to his only ſon. The child made a great progreſs under this excellent Tutor, as well in the ſciences as in zeal for Religion. He became extremely zealous for Images, and diſperſed Letters through the Empire, which wonderfully ſupported the cauſe againſt the efforts of the Emperor Leo Iſauricus, a great enemy to Images. They ſay that this Prince, burning with deſire to revenge himſelf on John Damaſcenus, who then filled the poſt of Counſellor of State to the Chalif, which his father had held before him, made uſe of a forged Letter [C] with ſuch ſucceſs, that it occaſioned the Chalif to order his Counſellor's hand to be ſtruck off. It is ſaid that John Damaſcenus, having recommended himſelf to the prayers of the bleſſed Virgin, recovered his hand, and publickly demonſtrated his innocence. The Miniſter who anſwered Father Maimbourg's Hiſtory of Calviniſm, rejected this ſtory with contempt as an impertinent fable; and not contented with that, made uſe of an argument which, properly ſpeaking, is blaſphemy [D]. The imagination of Bzovius is a very pleaſant one: he has

[† His name was Mansûr, and he is ſuppoſed to be the perſon who betrayed Damaſcus to the Saracens. See Aſſeman. Bibl. Orient. tom. 2. pag. 97. Eutych. Annal. tom. 2. pag. 272, &c. ADD. REM.]

[A] He flouriſhed in the eighth Century.] Alphonſus de Caſtro deſerves cenſure for two reaſons; ſince he has aſſerted (1) that according to Trithemius our John Damaſcenus ſhould be placed under the Empire of Theodoſius the younger, about the year 450. It is not true that Trithemius has ſaid this: he has copied Sigebertus, who ſpoke of the diſputes of John Damaſcenus againſt the Emperor Leo; this belongs to the year 730 (2). But tho' it were true that Trithemius was of that opinion, Alphonſus de Caſtro would not be acquitted; for he ought to have corrected him, and not have adopted his pretended ignorance. We ſhall preſently ſee ſuch another Anachroniſm.

(1) In Libris adverſus Hæreſes, apud Philippum Labbe, de Script. Eccleſ. tom. 1. pag. 557.

(2) It is 830 in F. Labbe, ibid.

[B] His father was a good Chriſtian.] John, Patriarch of Jeruſalem, having cauſed ſome inquiries to be made concerning the family of John Damaſcenus, found that his father and mother were Chriſtians, and that they had brought him up in the Chriſtian Faith. Whence it may be concluded that this Father of the Church was never converted from Judaiſm to Chriſtianity: for that could not have been without his having firſt renounced his Baptiſm and the Goſpel. But thoſe who have written his life ſay nothing like it, and it appears that he had always a very great attachment for the Goſpel, as it was then taught by the devout and the zealous; I principally mean the Monks, who were exceſſively fond of images. Wherefore an Author named Peter Galiſſard (3) has committed a double blunder, in ſaying that in the year 470 John Damaſcenus abjured Judaiſm, and embraced the Goſpel. The firſt blunder relates to his pretended converſion; the ſecond conſiſts in the time: for if this perſon was converted, or perverted, it could not be in the year 470, ſince he lived in the VIII Century.

(3) In Chronographia, apud Theophilum Raynaudum, Hoploth. Sect. 2. Serie 1, cap. 3, pag. m. 53.

(4) Maimbourg, Hiſt. des Iconoclaſtes, lib, 2. pag. m. 116.

[C] Leo Iſauricus . . . made uſe of a forged Letter to ruin him.] Some of the Letters which John Damaſcenus had written againſt the Iconoclaſts fell into the hands of Leo, who cauſed the hand writing of them to be ſo well ſtudied by a Pen-man exceedingly well ſkilled in the art of counterfeiting and falſifying of hands, that it was impoſſible to diſtinguiſh the true from the falſe (4). Thereupon he cauſed a Letter (5) to be written, wherein he pretended that John Damaſcenus exhorted him to cauſe ſome troops to advance towards Damaſcus, and promiſed him, as Governor of the place, to diſpoſe all things in ſuch a manner that the taking of it ſhould be infallible. He ſent this Letter to the Prince of the Saracens; and gloried very much in refuſing to take advantage of a traitor's perfidy, and having the generoſity to diſcover to the Chalif the treaſon of one of his ſubjects. The Chalif, without hearing the proteſtations of innocence which John Damaſcenus made, and without ſuffering him to diſcover Leo's artifice, commanded that hand with which he ſuppoſed he had written ſo treaſonable a Letter, to be immediately ſtruck off, and ordered it to be publickly expoſed on a gibbet to the ſight of the whole city (6). Damaſcenus, being retired to his houſe, petitioned the Chalif that his hand might be given him again; which was granted: he then proſtrated himſelf before an image of the Virgin, and having applied his hand to the place where naturally it ſhould have been, he beſought the Holy Virgin to uſe her powerful interceſſion with her Son, that he would pleaſe to reſtore it, that he might continue to maintain the cauſe which he had hitherto ſo happily defended againſt the Iconoclaſts (7). As he prayed he fell aſleep, and in a dream thought he ſaw the Holy Virgin, who aſſured him that his prayer was heard. Whereupon awaking ſuddenly, he found his hand ſo perfectly reſtored that he had the free uſe of it as before, with a ſmall circle round his wriſt, which marked the place where he received the blow which had ſevered it from his arm, that it might not be ſaid that another, who had voluntarily ſubſtituted himſelf in his room, had undergone the puniſhment for him. The whole City . . . run the next morning to ſee this ſight. The Chalif, being acquainted with ſo ſurprizing a wonder, . . . would needs ſee him, and be convinced by his own eyes . . . he acknowledged his injuſtice and precipitation, and deteſted the infamous treachery of the Emperor (8), and would have re-eſtabliſhed Damaſcenus in all his dignities; but he found him too firmly reſolved to become a ſolitary.

(5) You will find it at length with that of Leo in Father Maimbourg's Hiſtory of the Iconoclaſts, ibid. He quotes the Life of John Damaſcenus compoſed by John, Patriarch of Jeruſalem.

(6) Maimbourg, Hiſt. des Iconoclaſtes, liv. 2. pag. 122.

(7) Ibid. pag. 123.

(8) Ibid. pag. 124, 125.

[D] A Miniſter . . . made uſe of an argument which, properly ſpeaking, is blaſphemy.] It would be wrong to think it ſtrange that the Proteſtants ſhould not give credit to the miracle I have juſt related; for it is certain that a great number of Catholics do not believe it; and in the way the Writers on behalf of Images have compoſed their Hiſtories, they are only fit to render even what they truly relate, ſuſpected. Wherefore Monſr. Jurieu would have done nothing but what was reaſonable, if he had only rejected the cutting off and has reckoned Damaſcenus among the Phyſicians who have been illuſtrious on account of their ſanctity [E]. There is more foundation to ſay, that he was the firſt, among the Greeks, who began to treat a ſubject according to the Scholaſtic method [F]. This appears principally in his four Books of the Orthodox Faith. He left the Court of the Saracen Prince after the miracle which I have mentioned, and ſhut himſelf up in the Monaſtery of S. Sabas at Jeruſalem, where the Monk who was choſen for his ſpiritual director reſtoring of John Damaſcenus's hand, as a Monkiſh tale. His reflection on the lightneſs of the puniſhment is a very good one; a Prince would not be ſatisfied with cutting off the hand of a Governor who had promiſed to deliver a place to his enemy. But when that Miniſter adds, that ſince the Saracens were not converted at the ſight of ſuch a miracle, and ſince the City of Damaſcus did not renounce Mahometiſm, it muſt be concluded that what has been ſaid of John Damaſcenus is falſe, he muſt give me leave to tell him that he advances an impiety. The Saracens of thoſe days were very hard of belief, ſays he (9); for I am perſuaded that if a like miracle were wrought in Mecca, the inhabitants would immediately become Chriſtians. Is not this furniſhing the Infidels with weapons to refute all the miracles of Moſes and Jeſus Chriſt? The Egyptians and the Jews of thoſe days were very hard of belief, might one ſay; if ſuch miracles had been wrought in Athens or in Rome, the inhabitants would immediately have become Jews, and afterwards Chriſtians. It is a little ſurprizing, that a Divine ſhould ſuffer himſelf to be dazzled by a reaſon which is full as ſtrong againſt the truth of the Goſpel, as againſt the fables of the monks: but when one reflects on the power which is uſurped over people of a lively imagination by the firſt thoughts which come into their head, it is no great wonder that the Miniſter I am ſpeaking of has argued in the manner he has done. This however is very aſtoniſhing, that there ſhould be but one man who appears to have taken notice of this dangerous doctrine; and it is remarkable that nobody ſeems to have perceived that the public had been made acquainted with it. It is alſo very remarkable that Mr. Jurieu, who might eaſily have ſaved his orthodoxy, by declaring that he had advanced this unwarily, and without foreſeeing the conſequences of it; but that being become ſenſible of its venom, ſince he had been cenſured on that account, he diſavows this pernicious maxim; it is, I ſay, very remarkable that that Writer has neglected this ſhort and eaſy way of making his innocence appear, and has rather choſen, by ſaying nothing, to furniſh the world with a lawful pretext to accuſe him of perſiſting in the ſame perſuaſion, viz. that if at this day a hand which had been cut off ſhould be reſtored at Mecca, that City would immediately become Chriſtian. Nothing more impious can be advanced, they are the words of the perſon who has informed againſt ſome of Mr. Jurieu's errors (10): for it is plainly to declare in the face of heaven and earth, that he is perſuaded that all the miracles of Moſes, of Jeſus Chriſt, and of his Apoſtles, are fables, and conſequently that the Scripture of the Old and New Teſtament is no more than a Romance and a Legend. Who can hear this without horror? And would not Judaiſm and Chriſtianity be utterly overthrown by ſuch an argument? If Father Maimbourg's miracle is falſe, becauſe the whole city of Damaſcus was not converted, it thence follows, will Infidels ſay, that Moſes did no miracles in Egypt, that Jeſus Chriſt did none in Judæa, and that St. Peter did not make the cripple walk who aſked alms of him in the midſt of Jeruſalem; for neither the Egyptians nor the Jews were converted. Note that this cripple was carried every day to the gate of the Temple, and that afterwards all the people ſaw him walk, and knew him to be the ſame man who had been lame (11), and that he was acknowledged to be the ſame by the Magiſtrates (12); and yet Jeruſalem continued in the Jewiſh Religion. The Miracle of John Damaſcenus, as it is related, had nothing more ſignal than that of the lame man, and was not followed, as this was, by a pathetic exhortation.

(9) Apologie pour les Reformat. tom. 1. pag. 20.

(10) See the little Book intitled Declaration de Mr. Bayle touchant un petit Ecrit qui vient de paroître ſous le Titre de Courte Revue des Maximes de Morale, &c. pag. 15. It was printed in the year 1691.

(11) Acts iii. 9, 10, and 11.

(12) Acts iv. 14.

[E] Bzovius has reckoned him among the Phyſicians who have been illuſtrious on account of their Sanctity.] Bzovius, in the little Book which he has written concerning the Phyſicians who have been holy men, aſſerts Damaſcenus to be one of the number. The conformity there is between Manſur and Meſue was, as ſome think, the occaſion of this miſtake (13). John Damaſcenus was called Manſur, that is, redeemed. Conſtantine Copronymus, who hated him, called him Manſer, that is, baſtard (14). Bzovius might confound Manſur or Manſer with Meſue, and imagine John Manſur of Damaſcus to be the ſame with John Meſue, alſo of Damaſcus; and that, ſince the latter was a Phyſician, the other muſt neceſſarily have been ſo likewiſe. But this fault might eaſily have been avoided, if he had recollected that John Damaſcenus lived in the VIII Century, and that Meſue lived after the year 1140. William du Val (15) has adopted Bzovius's miſtake, as Bzovius adopted that of ſome other Authors. Take particular notice of what Geſner ſays: for having ſpoken of one John Damaſcenus a Monk and a Prieſt, Author of the IV Books of the Orthodox Faith, he cites a paſſage of Symphorian Champier, which imports that he was a learned Phyſician; vir fuit in Medicinis doctus; and one who for his learning and purity of life, was choſen Superior of a Monaſtery in Conſtantinople. Geſner afterwards ſpeaks of one John Damaſcenus ſurnamed Manſur, who, among other Works, wrote divers Parallels on the Scripture. He refutes thoſe who take this John Damaſcenus for Meſue, or ſuppoſe thoſe two perſons to have been contemporaries; he refutes them, I ſay, by a chronological argument: for Meſue, ſays he, is more modern than the other by ſeveral Centuries, having lived in the reign of Frederic Barbaroſſa, about the year 1163. He gives the Titles of the Books of John Meſue, and ſays they had been publiſhed not long before at Baſil, under the name of Janus Damaſcenus. He then ſpeaks of one John Damaſcenus Author of the Books of the Orthodox Faith, and of the Parallels. Any one may perceive that this is confounding and multiplying Authors in a ſtrange manner. Tiraquellus has perplexed himſelf a little; for he places (16) one John Damaſcenus Manſur in the Catalogue of noble Phyſicians. The word Manſur proves his miſtake; becauſe it prevents one from ſaying that he intended to ſpeak only of John Meſue, whoſe Phyſical Works were printed at Baſil under the name of Janus Damaſcenus..

(13) See Theophilus Raynaud, de malis ac bonis Libris, Partit. 1, Erotemate X, num. 214. pagm. 137.

(14) Idem, Hoplotheca, pag. 53.

(15) In Hiſtoria Monogrammæ Sti Medicorum, apud Th. Raynaud. de malis ac bonis Libris, pag. 138.

(16) In Opere de Nobilitate, apud Theophil. Raynaud. Hoplath. pag. 53.

[There were ſeveral Phyſical Writers named John Meſue, the eldeſt of whom was nearly contemporary with John Damaſcenus as will be obſerved elſewhere ‡. ADD. REM.]

‡ In the Article MESUE.

[F] He was the firſt, among the Greeks, who began to treat a ſubject according to the ſcholaſtic method.] Mr. Arnauld obſerves, that St. John of Damaſcus was as it were the St. Thomas of the Greeks, that they regulated their opinions more by his judgment, than by that of any other Father (17). It is ſo certain, adds he, that St. John of Damaſcus has always been the rule of their Doctrine concerning the Euchariſt, that Euthymius, to repreſent the Doctrine of the Greek Church with reſpect to that myſtery againſt the hereſy of the Paulicians, only quotes the famous paſſage of St. Gregory Nyſſen in his Catecheſis, and a paſſage of S. John of Damaſcus where that error of the Stercoraniſts is formally rejected. Monſr. Claude, in his Anſwer to Mr. Arnauld, grants him this principle: It is certain, ſays he (18), that to judge well of the opinion of the modern Greeks, we muſt go back ſo far as to John Damaſcenus. Some pages after (19), he explains that Author's opinion; which is not at all conformable to that of the Reformed, neither does it admit Tranſubſtantiation. It is an incomprehenſible piece of Jargon, and ſuch will eternally be the lot of thoſe who ſeek to explain the manner of Myſteries too particularly. The ſureſt way would be to keep to the moſt general expreſſions. There are ſome things the explication whereof ſerves only to increaſe their obſcurity: the greateſt Divines deſerve to be put in mind of the ſaying, Ne ſutor ultra crepidam, i. e. Let not a Shoemaker go beyond his laſt, conſidering the ſublimeneſs of certain doctrines.

(17) Arnauld, Perpétuité défendue, tom. 1. liv. 2. chap. 6. pag. 229. of the Bruſſels Edition, in 12mo.

(18) Claude, Réponſe à la Perpétuité défendue, liv. 2. chap. 13. pag. m. 497.

(19) Ibid. pag. 515, & ſeq.

afterwards put in poſſeſſion of the Cure of St. Khaziam [H] by Chriſtopher Baron of Aurſpergh in the year 1585. And though the Catholics had given him an ignominious name [I], and had baniſhed him in 1598, the Baron of Aurſpergh nevertheleſs kept him concealed [K] in his houſe.

[H] Of S. Khaziam,] Or S. Catiani near Aurſpergh, in the Dioceſe of the Patriarch of Aquileia. The Patriarch Gregory, in the year 1620, gave the right of preſentation with all the dependencies of that Benefice to Gebhard of Aurſpergh (11).

(11) Ibid. lib. 8. pag. 729.

[I] Given him an ignominious name.] They called him Jure Kobila, that is, George Mare. But this was done by miſtake, becauſe another Lutheran Miniſter, named George Tereſchith, was nick-named Jure Kobila, on account of a Mare which had been given him: for Jure in the Carniolan tongue ſignifies George, and Kobila a Mare. Thence it has happened that ſeveral Proteſtants have called our Dalmatin Jure Kobila through ignorance (12).

(12) Ibid. pag. 349.

[K] Concealed in his houſe,] That is, in a vault under the Stable, before the Caſtle; for which reaſon this private vault is to this day called the Hole of the Preacher Jure Kobila (13).

(13) Ibid. pag. 349, & 729.

DAMASCENUS (JOHN), one of the moſt illuſtrious Fathers of the lower Empire, flouriſhed in the eighth Century [A]. He was born at Damaſcus, where his father, tho' a good Chriſtian † [B], had the place of Counſellor of State to the Saracen Chalif. He was a very rich and a very charitable man, and principally delighted in redeeming of Captives. He one day redeemed a very able man named Coſmas, who had been taken at Sea, and made him Tutor to his only ſon. The child made a great progreſs under this excellent Tutor, as well in the ſciences as in zeal for Religion. He became extremely zealous for Images, and diſperſed Letters through the Empire, which wonderfully ſupported the cauſe againſt the efforts of the Emperor Leo Iſauricus, a great enemy to Images. They ſay that this Prince, burning with deſire to revenge himſelf on John Damaſcenus, who then filled the poſt of Counſellor of State to the Chalif, which his father had held before him, made uſe of a forged Letter [C] with ſuch ſucceſs, that it occaſioned the Chalif to order his Counſellor's hand to be ſtruck off. It is ſaid that John Damaſcenus, having recommended himſelf to the prayers of the bleſſed Virgin, recovered his hand, and publickly demonſtrated his innocence. The Miniſter who anſwered Father Maimbourg's Hiſtory of Calviniſm, rejected this ſtory with contempt as an impertinent fable; and not contented with that, made uſe of an argument which, properly ſpeaking, is blaſphemy [D]. The imagination of Bzovius is a very pleaſant one: he has

[† His name was Mansûr, and he is ſuppoſed to be the perſon who betrayed Damaſcus to the Saracens. See Aſſeman. Bibl. Orient. tom. 2. pag. 97. Eutych. Annal. tom. 2. pag. 272, &c. ADD. REM.]

[A] He flouriſhed in the eighth Century.] Alphonſus de Caſtro deſerves cenſure for two reaſons; ſince he has aſſerted (1) that according to Trithemius our John Damaſcenus ſhould be placed under the Empire of Theodoſius the younger, about the year 450. It is not true that Trithemius has ſaid this: he has copied Sigebertus, who ſpoke of the diſputes of John Damaſcenus againſt the Emperor Leo; this belongs to the year 730 (2). But tho' it were true that Trithemius was of that opinion, Alphonſus de Caſtro would not be acquitted; for he ought to have corrected him, and not have adopted his pretended ignorance. We ſhall preſently ſee ſuch another Anachroniſm.

(1) In Libris adverſus Hæreſes, apud Philippum Labbe, de Script. Eccleſ. tom. 1. pag. 557.

(2) It is 830 in F. Labbe, ibid.

[B] His father was a good Chriſtian.] John, Patriarch of Jeruſalem, having cauſed ſome inquiries to be made concerning the family of John Damaſcenus, found that his father and mother were Chriſtians, and that they had brought him up in the Chriſtian Faith. Whence it may be concluded that this Father of the Church was never converted from Judaiſm to Chriſtianity: for that could not have been without his having firſt renounced his Baptiſm and the Goſpel. But thoſe who have written his life ſay nothing like it, and it appears that he had always a very great attachment for the Goſpel, as it was then taught by the devout and the zealous; I principally mean the Monks, who were exceſſively fond of images. Wherefore an Author named Peter Galiſſard (3) has committed a double blunder, in ſaying that in the year 470 John Damaſcenus abjured Judaiſm, and embraced the Goſpel. The firſt blunder relates to his pretended converſion; the ſecond conſiſts in the time: for if this perſon was converted, or perverted, it could not be in the year 470, ſince he lived in the VIII Century.

(3) In Chronographia, apud Theophilum Raynaudum, Hoploth. Sect. 2. Serie 1, cap. 3, pag. m. 53.

(4) Maimbourg, Hiſt. des Iconoclaſtes, lib, 2. pag. m. 116.

(5) You will find it at length with that of Leo in Father Maimbourg's Hiſtory of the Iconoclaſts, ibid. He quotes the Life of John Damaſcenus compoſed by John, Patriarch of Jeruſalem.

[C] Leo Iſauricus . . . made uſe of a forged Letter to ruin him.] Some of the Letters which John Damaſcenus had written againſt the Iconoclaſts fell into the hands of Leo, who cauſed the hand writing of them to be ſo well ſtudied by a Pen-man exceedingly well ſkilled in the art of counterfeiting and falſifying of hands, that it was impoſſible to diſtinguiſh the true from the falſe (4). Thereupon he cauſed a Letter (5) to be written, wherein he pretended that John Damaſcenus exhorted him to cauſe ſome troops to advance towards Damaſcus, and promiſed him, as Governor of the place, to diſpoſe all things in ſuch a manner that the taking of it ſhould be infallible. He ſent this Letter to the Prince of the Saracens; and gloried very much in refuſing to take advantage of a traitor's perfidy, and having the generoſity to diſcover to the Chalif the treaſon of one of his ſubjects. The Chalif, without hearing the proteſtations of innocence which John Damaſcenus made, and without ſuffering him to diſcover Leo's artifice, commanded that hand with which he ſuppoſed he had written ſo treaſonable a Letter, to be immediately ſtruck off, and ordered it to be publickly expoſed on a gibbet to the ſight of the whole city (6). Damaſcenus, being retired to his houſe, petitioned the Chalif that his hand might be given him again; which was granted: he then proſtrated himſelf before an image of the Virgin, and having applied his hand to the place where naturally it ſhould have been, he beſought the Holy Virgin to uſe her powerful interceſſion with her Son, that he would pleaſe to reſtore it, that he might continue to maintain the cauſe which he had hitherto ſo happily defended againſt the Iconoclaſts (7). As he prayed he fell aſleep, and in a dream thought he ſaw the Holy Virgin, who aſſured him that his prayer was heard. Whereupon awaking ſuddenly, he found his hand ſo perfectly reſtored that he had the free uſe of it as before, with a ſmall circle round his wriſt, which marked the place where he received the blow which had ſevered it from his arm, that it might not be ſaid that another, who had voluntarily ſubſtituted himſelf in his room, had undergone the puniſhment for him. The whole City . . . run the next morning to ſee this ſight. The Chalif, being acquainted with ſo ſurprizing a wonder, . . . would needs ſee him, and be convinced by his own eyes . . . he acknowledged his injuſtice and precipitation, and deteſted the infamous treachery of the Emperor (8), and would have re-eſtabliſhed Damaſcenus in all his dignities; but he found him too firmly reſolved to become a ſolitary.

(6) Maimbourg, Hiſt. des Iconoclaſtes, liv. 2. pag. 122.

(7) Ibid. pag. 123.

(8) Ibid. pag. 124, 125.

[D] A Miniſter . . . made uſe of an argument which, properly ſpeaking, is blaſphemy.] It would be wrong to think it ſtrange that the Proteſtants ſhould not give credit to the miracle I have juſt related; for it is certain that a great number of Catholics do not believe it; and in the way the Writers on behalf of Images have compoſed their Hiſtories, they are only fit to render even what they truly relate, ſuſpected. Wherefore Monſr. Jurieu would have done nothing but what was reaſonable, if he had only rejected the cutting off and has reckoned Damaſcenus among the Phyſicians who have been illuſtrious on account of their ſanctity [E]. There is more foundation to ſay, that he was the firſt, among the Greeks, who began to treat a ſubject according to the Scholaſtic method [F]. This appears principally in his four Books of the Orthodox Faith. He left the Court of the Saracen Prince after the miracle which I have mentioned, and ſhut himſelf up in the Monaſtery of S. Sabas at Jeruſalem, where the Monk who was choſen for his ſpiritual director reſtoring of John Damaſcenus's hand, as a Monkiſh tale. His reflection on the lightneſs of the puniſhment is a very good one; a Prince would not be ſatisfied with cutting off the hand of a Governor who had promiſed to deliver a place to his enemy. But when that Miniſter adds, that ſince the Saracens were not converted at the ſight of ſuch a miracle, and ſince the City of Damaſcus did not renounce Mahometiſm, it muſt be concluded that what has been ſaid of John Damaſcenus is falſe, he muſt give me leave to tell him that he advances an impiety. The Saracens of thoſe days were very hard of belief, ſays he (9); for I am perſuaded that if a like miracle were wrought in Mecca, the inhabitants would immediately become Chriſtians. Is not this furniſhing the Infidels with weapons to refute all the miracles of Moſes and Jeſus Chriſt? The Egyptians and the Jews of thoſe days were very hard of belief, might one ſay; if ſuch miracles had been wrought in Athens or in Rome, the inhabitants would immediately have become Jews, and afterwards Chriſtians. It is a little ſurprizing, that a Divine ſhould ſuffer himſelf to be dazzled by a reaſon which is full as ſtrong againſt the truth of the Goſpel, as againſt the fables of the monks: but when one reflects on the power which is uſurped over people of a lively imagination by the firſt thoughts which come into their head, it is no great wonder that the Miniſter I am ſpeaking of has argued in the manner he has done. This however is very aſtoniſhing, that there ſhould be but one man who appears to have taken notice of this dangerous doctrine; and it is remarkable that nobody ſeems to have perceived that the public had been made acquainted with it. It is alſo very remarkable that Mr. Jurieu, who might eaſily have ſaved his orthodoxy, by declaring that he had advanced this unwarily, and without foreſeeing the conſequences of it; but that being become ſenſible of its venom, ſince he had been cenſured on that account, he diſavows this pernicious maxim; it is, I ſay, very remarkable that that Writer has neglected this ſhort and eaſy way of making his innocence appear, and has rather choſen, by ſaying nothing, to furniſh the world with a lawful pretext to accuſe him of perſiſting in the ſame perſuaſion, viz. that if at this day a hand which had been cut off ſhould be reſtored at Mecca, that City would immediately become Chriſtian. Nothing more impious can be advanced, they are the words of the perſon who has informed againſt ſome of Mr. Jurieu's errors (10): for it is plainly to declare in the face of heaven and earth, that he is perſuaded that all the miracles of Moſes, of Jeſus Chriſt, and of his Apoſtles, are fables, and conſequently that the Scripture of the Old and New Teſtament is no more than a Romance and a Legend. Who can hear this without horror? And would not Judaiſm and Chriſtianity be utterly overthrown by ſuch an argument? If Father Maimbourg's miracle is falſe, becauſe the whole city of Damaſcus was not converted, it thence follows, will Infidels ſay, that Moſes did no miracles in Egypt, that Jeſus Chriſt did none in Judæa, and that St. Peter did not make the cripple walk who aſked alms of him in the midſt of Jeruſalem; for neither the Egyptians nor the Jews were converted. Note that this cripple was carried every day to the gate of the Temple, and that afterwards all the people ſaw him walk, and knew him to be the ſame man who had been lame (11), and that he was acknowledged to be the ſame by the Magiſtrates (12); and yet Jeruſalem continued in the Jewiſh Religion. The Miracle of John Damaſcenus, as it is related, had nothing more ſignal than that of the lame man, and was not followed, as this was, by a pathetic exhortation.

(9) Apologie pour les Reformat. tom. 1. pag. 20.

(10) See the little Book intitled Declaration de Mr. Bayle touchant un petit Ecrit qui vient de paroitre ſous le Titre de Courte Revue des Maximes de Morale, &c. pag. 15. It was printed in the year 1691.

(11) Acts iii. 9, 10, and 11.

(12) Acts iv. 14.

[E] Bzovius has reckoned him among the Phyſicians who have been illuſtrious on account of their Sanctity.] Bzovius, in the little Book which he has written concerning the Phyſicians who have been holy men, aſſerts Damaſcenus to be one of the number. The conformity there is between Manſur and Meſue was, as ſome think, the occaſion of this miſtake (13). John Damaſcenus was called Manſur, that is, redeemed: Conſtantine Copronymus, who hated him, called him Manſer, that is, baſtard (14). Bzovius might confound Manſur or Manſer with Meſue, and imagine John Manſur of Damaſcus to be the ſame with John Meſue, alſo of Damaſcus; and that, ſince the latter was a Phyſician, the other muſt neceſſarily have been ſo likewiſe. But this fault might eaſily have been avoided, if he had recollected that John Damaſcenus lived in the VIII Century, and that Meſue lived after the year 1140. William du Val (15) has adopted Bzovius's miſtake, as Bzovius adopted that of ſome other Authors. Take particular notice of what Geſner ſays: for having ſpoken of one John Damaſcenus a Monk and a Prieſt, Author of the IV Books of the Orthodox Faith, he cites a paſſage of Symphorian Champier, which imports that he was a learned Phyſician; vir fuit in Medicinis doctus; and one who for his learning and purity of life, was choſen Superior of a Monaſtery in Conſtantinople. Geſner afterwards ſpeaks of one John Damaſcenus ſurnamed Manſur, who, among other Works, wrote divers Parallels on the Scripture. He refutes thoſe who take this John Damaſcenus for Meſue, or ſuppoſe thoſe two perſons to have been contemporaries; he refutes them, I ſay, by a chronological argument: for Meſue, ſays he, is more modern than the other by ſeveral Centuries, having lived in the reign of Frederic Barbaroſſa, about the year 1163. He gives the Titles of the Books of John Meſue, and ſays they had been publiſhed not long before at Baſil, under the name of Janus Damaſcenus. He then ſpeaks of one John Damaſcenus Author of the Books of the Orthodox Faith, and of the Parallels. Any one may perceive that this is confounding and multiplying Authors in a ſtrange manner. Tiraquellus has perplexed himſelf a little; for he places (16) one John Damaſcenus Manſur in the Catalogue of noble Phyſicians. The word Manſur proves his miſtake; becauſe it prevents one from ſaying that he intended to ſpeak only of John Meſue, whoſe Phyſical Works were printed at Baſil under the name of Janus Damaſcenus..

(13) See Theophilus Raynaud, de malis ac bonis Libris, Partit. 1, Erotemate X, num. 214. pag. m. 137.

(14) Idem, Hoplotheca, pag. 53.

(15) In Hiſtoria Monogrammæ SS. Medicorum, apud Th. Raynaud. de malis ac bonis Libris, pag. 138.

(16) In Opere de Nobilitate, apud Theophil. Raynaud. Hoplath. pag. 53.

[There were ſeveral Phyſical Writers named John Meſue, the eldeſt of whom was nearly contemporary with John Damaſcenus as will be obſerved elſewhere ‡. ADD. REM.]

‡ In the Article MESUE.

[F] He was the firſt, among the Greeks, who began to treat a ſubject according to the ſcholaſtic method.] Mr. Arnauld obſerves, that St. John of Damaſcus was as it were the St. Thomas of the Greeks, that they regulated their opinions more by his judgment, than by that of any other Father (17). It is ſo certain, adds he, that St. John of Damaſcus has always been the rule of their Doctrine concerning the Euchariſt, that Euthymius, to repreſent the Doctrine of the Greek Church with reſpect to that myſtery againſt the hereſy of the Paulicians, only quotes the famous paſſage of St. Gregory Nyſſen in his Catecheſis, and a paſſage of S. John of Damaſcus where that error of the Stercoraniſts is formally rejected. Monſr. Claude, in his Anſwer to Mr. Arnauld, grants him this principle: It is certain, ſays he (18), that to judge well of the opinion of the modern Greeks, we muſt go back ſo far as to John Damaſcenus. Some pages after (19), he explains that Author's opinion; which is not at all conformable to that of the Reformed, neither does it admit Tranſubſtantiation. It is an incomprehenſible piece of Jargon, and ſuch will eternally be the lot of thoſe who ſeek to explain the manner of Myſteries too particularly. The ſureſt way would be to keep to the moſt general expreſſions. There are ſome things the explication whereof ſerves only to increaſe their obſcurity: the greateſt Divines deſerve to be put in mind of the ſaying, Ne ſutor ultra crepidam, i. e. Let not a Shoemaker go beyond his laſt, conſidering the ſublimeneſs of certain doctrines.

(17) Arnauld, Perpétuité défendue, tom. 1. liv. 2. chap. 6. pag. 229. of the Bruſſels Edition, in 12mo.

(18) Claude, Réponſe à la Perpétuité défendue, liv. 2. chap. 13. pag. m. 497.

(19) Ibid. pag. 515, & ſeq.

rector injoined him perpetual silence. This Monk was so severe, that because his Disciple did not observe the said prohibition, he turned him out of his cell, and ordered him for penance to empty the filth of the Monastery; but seeing him ready to obey, he dispensed with his doing it, and embraced him. John Damascenus was ordained Priest towards the latter end of his life by the Patriarch of Jerusalem, and returned immediately to his Monastery. He died about the year 750. James de Billi published this Father's Works in the year 1577; which Edition was reprinted in 1619. There are wanting in it several Tracts which Leo Allatius communicated to Mr. Aubert, who had some design of publishing a new Edition of John Damascenus (a). Father Labbe had also promised one (b).

(a) Extracted from the Bibliotheque des Auteurs Ecclesiastiques, composed by Mr. du Pin, tom. 6. pag. 101, &c. of the Dutch Edition.

(b) See the Writing which he published in 1652 intitled, Conspectus novæ Editionis omnium S. Joannis Damasceni Operum in quatuor partes tributorum, where he speaks of the precedent Editions.

DAMIAN (PETER) Cardinal and Bishop of Ostia, flourished in the eleventh Century. He had been a Benedictin, and it is thought he would always have preferred solitude to the dignities of the Church, if he had not been forced, as it were, to accept them. He publickly condemned the liberty which the Popes took to oppose the enterprizes of the Emperors by temporal arms [A]. He described in a very lively manner the enormous vices of his age in several of his works. That which he intitled Gomorrhæus is most commonly quoted. The Controversial Writers speak much of it [B]: Pope Alexander II suppressed it; but it has been nevertheless preserved (a). The Author of les Prejugez legitimes contre le Papisme would find it difficult to answer the Writer who criticised him, with respect to that Book [C]. It appears from a Letter of Peter Damian (b), that there were some Ecclesiastics who taught that Priests might marry. He deserves commendation

(a) See the Remark [C].

(b) It is the 13th of the 5th Book.

[A] He . . . . condemned the liberty which the Popes took to oppose the enterprizes of the Emperors by temporal Arms.] His doctrine on this head is very orthodox, and he confirms it by the practice of the primitive Church (1). "He maintains that the offices of Emperor and Pope are distinct, and that the Emperors ought not to meddle with what belongs to the office of the Popes, nor the Popes with what belongs to the office of the Emperors, as to handle arms, to make war, &c. As the Son of God, says he, surmounted all the obstacles of worldly power; not by the severity of vengeance, but by the lively majesty of an invincible patience: so has he taught us rather to bear the fury of the world with constancy, than to take up arms against those who offend us, especially since between the Royalty and the Priesthood there is such a distinction of offices, that it belongs to the King to use secular arms, and to the Priest to gird on the sword of the spirit, which is the word of God, &c. . . . Do we read that St. Gregory ever did or wrote this: he, who suffered so many outrages from the Lombards? Or did St. Ambrose take arms against the Arians, who traversed him and cruelly tormented his Church? Will it be found that any of the Holy Pontifs ever handled arms? Let Ecclesiastical causes then be decided by the Laws of justice, or by the Determinations of a Council of Bishops, lest what ought to be done before a tribunal of Judges, or in an Assembly of Prelates, be ended, to our shame, by a martial conflict." What can be more reasonable? and yet Baronius makes no scruple to say that this dogm of Peter Damian is erroneous, and even the spawn of a Doctrine of Julian the Apostate. We cannot therefore, says he (2), neither ought we to excuse him from having fallen into an error which the Church has condemned. After Tertullian, Julian the Apostate is acknowledged to be the original Author of the error from which that of Damian is descended. This is wretched; since the apostate Prince did no more than call back the Christians to the evident maxims which their master had left them.

(1) Coeffeteau, Réponse au Mystere d'iniquité, pag. 667.

(2) Ibidem, pag. 669. He cites Baronius, ad ann. 1053. Here are that Cardinal's words, Errore lapsus convincitur Petrus, quem communi totius Ecclesiæ Catholicæ consensu constat esse damnatum. Post Tertullianum Julianus Apostata fuisse convincitur originarius fator erroris, ex quo iste noscitur propagatus.

[B] He intitled one of his works Gomorrhæus. The controversial Writers speak much of it.] "By reason of these Laws of Celibacy Sodomy is so prevalent among the Roman Clergy, that Peter Damian, who was then retired to his Hermitage, was obliged to write a Book concerning it, intitled Gomorrhæus, wherein he lays open the several species of that sin; and he dedicated it to Leo IX, adjuring him to provide against it. And Baronius himself acknowledges it in these words: *Briars and nettles had overrun the Housholder's field: all flesh had corrupted his way, and there was need not only of a deluge to wash, but of fire from heaven to consume us as at Gomorrah. Whereupon Leo made some regulations, and ordained some punishments; but soon after he lost the favour of Leo; and Alexander II then being advanced to the Papal chair, tricked him out of his Book under colour of giving it to the Abbot of S. Saviour to transcribe, pretending that he had spoken too immodestly, as if such ordures could be stirred without raising a stink: of which action the good man bitterly complains, in one of his Epistles to the Cardinals Hildebrand and Stephen, telling them, with an evident irony, that it was a true mark of sacerdotal cleanness, or rather an argument of the Papal purity (3)." That my Reader may be assured this passage contains no falsities (4), I shall insert here Coeffeteau's Answer (5). That in those days the Ecclesiastical Laws were not the occasion of the scandal which Damian laments . . . . is sufficiently demonstrated by the Letter which Pope Leo IX wrote to him after he had received his Book, which he praises highly. The Ecclesiastics, says he (a), of whose most filthy life thou hast discoursed in lamentable words, but full of reason, doubtless do not belong to the lot of the Lord's inheritance, from which they separate themselves by those debaucheries. But if their conversation was chaste, they would not only be called the Temple of God, but even the Sanctuary, where the Lamb, whose whiteness surpasses that of snow, and who takes away the sins of the world, is offered up, &c . . . . (e). As to Alexander the Second's, making use of an artifice to suppress Peter Damian's Book, wherein those horrid crimes were expressed a little too freely, no man who loves mere civil decency, will ever condemn it: for without an irony, it is a testimony of great purity, to be offended even at the words which represent any immodest action, tho' it be with detestation. And the Pope was not the only person who was offended at it, but the liberty therein taken universally displeased all good men, it being impossible to stir such ordures without their leaving an ill smell behind them. Wherefore the Pope's artifice was commendable, to chastise the guilty, and to suppress the motions of those horrid impurities: but as we sometimes love our own Works inconsiderately (i), Peter Damian could not bear that this fruit of his brain, which he said he had brought forth with extreme labour, should be stifled; for which reason he spoke of it with great passion. Yet after having taken the liberty to speak against the Pope, at the end of his Epistle he corrects himself, and acknowledges there is some presumption in his behaviour, that he has gone too far, and that the pride of his lips deserves chastisement.

(3) Du Plessis, Mystere d'Iniquité, pag. 228.

(4) That is, as to the Facts.

(5) Coeffeteau, Réponse au Mystere d'Iniquité, pag. 648.

(a) Epist. Leon. ad Damian. præfixa Gomorrhæo; extat apud Baron. ad ann. 1049.

(e) Du Plessis, pag. 228, lign. 34.

(i) Petr. Damian. Epist. ad Stephanum & Hildebrand. Card.

[C] . . . . This Book has been preserved. The Author of the Préjugez contre le Papisme would find it difficult to answer the Writer who criticised him on that head.] Here are the words of the Author of the Préjugez (6): It is from Cardinal Baronius that we know that Peter Damian, Cardinal of the Roman Church at that time, wrote a Book intitled Gomorrhæus, which he addressed to Leo IX, in which Work he described the manners of the Age, and particularly of the Clergy; and we may guess what it was by the Title: Sodom and Gomorrah were brought into the description of those horrid impurities. Baronius says that besides the crimes of simony, the the Lord's field was overrun with thorns, and those nettles which shamefully spring up from the putrifaction of the flesh by the dunghil of corruption. For all flesh

(6) Jurieu, Préjugez legitimes contre le Papisme, tom. 1. pag. 319.

* Baron. Vol. 11. a. 1049, art. 10, & seq. Petri Damiani Lib. qui inscribitur Gomorrhæus, cui præfixa Epist. Leonis IX.

tion for the great zeal which he teſtifies for the re-eſtabliſhment of good diſcipline, which might ſtem the diſorders to which the Monks and Clergy abandoned themſelves; but the credulity with which he has compiled a great many examples of apparitions of Biſhops, or other perſons condemned to Hell-torments, or to thoſe of Purgatory (c), is not to be excuſed. He had a great devotion for the bleſſed Virgin. You will find the place of his birth, the time of his death, and ſome other circumſtances of his life in Moreri's Dictionary.

(c) See the 19th and 20th of his Opuſcula.

fleſh had corrupted his way, ſo that a deluge ſeemed not ſufficient to waſh away its filth. Theſe horrible ſins called for the fire of Gomorrah, which had conſumed the territory of the five Cities. For which reaſon Peter Damian, then a Hermit of Mount Avellano in Umbria, though himſelf obliged to inform the new Pope of all theſe things, by writing him a Book intitled Gomorrhæus, wherein he repreſented, in the modeſteſt manner he was able, the four ſpecies of carnal ſins which prevailed in the Church, praying him to pierce thoſe infamous men with the ſword of Phineas, and to reſtore the Church to her purity. That evil had already continued 150 years, that is, from the beginning of the tenth Century to the middle of the eleventh: were there no more than this, would it not be a ſtrong prejudice againſt the Latin Church and againſt Popery? Could it be poſſible that God would have permitted the true Church, without ceaſing to be the ſpouſe of Jeſus Chriſt, to become a Sodom and a Gomorrah, to be plunged in the four moſt enormous ſins of the fleſh, and to continue under that deluge near two hundred years? This Miniſter had already ſaid in another Book (7): " We produce for example Peter Damian, who in " the XIth Century wrote a Book intitled Gomorrhæi, " in which he undertakes to convict the Clergy of that " time of the horrible ſin which occaſioned the burning of Sodom. The Book is loſt; but we have " monuments of it in the Annals of their great Baronius, who ſays that the ſaid Peter Damian, in that " Book (*), Quadripertita vitia carnis quibus Eccleſia obrueretur, ut decuit, quam potuit honeſte inſinuaſſe, " had hinted in the moſt decent manner he could, at " the four vices of the fleſh with which the Church " was overrun."

(7) Jurieu, Apologie pour les Reformat. tom. I. chap. 9. pag. 152.

(*) Anno 1049, num. 10.

We ſhall immediately ſee a Cenſure, which ſtrikes Baronius no leſs than Monſr. Jurieu: for the Abbot Richard (†) aſſerts that Peter Damian has ſpoken of thoſe diſorders not as an evil which had overflowed the Church, but as the corruption of ſome particular people. But it is very remarkable that the Abbot, inſtead of inſulting Mr. Jurieu, excuſes him as much as he can. Mr. Jurieu, ſays he (8), honeſtly confeſſes he never read this work. . . . . Wherefore we need not be ſurprized, if he has been miſtaken in the idea which he formed to himſelf of a work he never ſaw, and which he thinks is loſt. It is no wonder, if judging of it only by the Title, and by what Baronius reports of it in general, he imagined &c. After this he ſhews him, 1, that the Book is not loſt; 2, that it does not treat of the manners of the age, or of the Clergy in general; and that it does not repreſent the Latin Church as a Sodom or a Gomorrah; 3, that according to the teſtimony of the ſame Peter Damian, there were ſeveral great men in that age. I ſhall not produce the proofs of the third point; but ſhall content myſelf with tranſcribing in part thoſe which relate to the two other. Here follow the words of the Abbot Richard (9). " As to the firſt, It is ſo " far from being true that the work in queſtion is loſt, " that I have it among my own Books, and that it " was printed with the other Works of that Saint, " the beginning of the preſent Century. The perſon " who took care to publiſh them, moreover dedicated " them to Pope Paul V, who granted the privilege " for printing that Edition in the year 1606. If Mr. " Jurieu had been more exact in examining the truth " of the proof which he produces, and to ſee it in the " original; and if he had taken any pains to enquire " after the Book from whence it is taken; the Book- " ſellers of Paris would have furniſhed him with as " many copies of it as he pleaſed, and would have " informed him that the Gomorrhæus of Peter Damian " is ſo far from being loſt, that it is not much above " twenty years ſince it was reprinted with all the other " Works of that Cardinal. As to the 2, If Mr. Jurieu had been more careful to ſearch at the Spring-" head for the truth of what he advances; and if he " had read the Book which Peter Damian intitled the " Gomorrhæan; he would have there found, that the " Cardinal does by no means undertake to convict the " Clergy of that time of the horrible ſin which drew " down fire from heaven on the city of Gomorrah, " and that he does not there deſcribe the manners of " the age, nor yet of the Clergy in general: and in " fine, that it is not true that he repreſents the Latin " Church as a Sodom and a Gomorrah. For he would " have found that in that Book Peter Damian only in-" forms Pope Leo IX of the uncleanneſſes which were " committed by certain Eccleſiaſtics of his quarters; " that is, in the neighbourhood of Mount Apennine, " whither he had retired, and where he lived with " ſome Hermits. A certain horrible and infamous vice " is much ſpread IN OUR QUARTERS, ſays he to that " Pope, when he acquaints him with the reaſon which " had obliged him to compoſe that work, in the whole " ſequel whereof we do not find he extends that diſor-" der and corruption any farther. Can one with any " ſhew of reaſon ſay, that a vice which had crept in " among ſome Eccleſiaſtics about Mount Apennine, " was the univerſal vice of the age, and of the Clergy? And can one with any juſtice accuſe the whole " Latin Church of a ſin which ſome Eccleſiaſtics of " one particular Province fell into? With what truth " and with what equity, therefore, could Mr. Jurieu " ſay that Peter Damian has undertaken in his Go-" morrhianus (10) to convict the Clergy of that time " of the moſt horrid of all ſins; to deſcribe therein " the manners of the age and of the Clergy, and to " repreſent the Latin Church as a Sodom and a Go-" morrah; if he had known that in this whole Book " Peter Damian only lays before the Pope the impu-" rities of certain Eccleſiaſtics of a particular Pro-" vince? Mr. Jurieu, therefore, as well as Baronius, " has alledged the teſtimony of this Book, which ſays " nothing of what he imputes to it, only becauſe he " had never read it, and believed the work was loſt."

(†) [It is Father Gerberon who concealed himſelf under this name. CRIT. REM.]

(8) L'Abbé Richard, Examen des Prejugez de Mr. Jurieu, chap. 28. pag. 238.

(9) Ibid. pag. 239, 240.

(10) This is not the Title which Mr. Jurieu had given. We have in this Remark [C] an example of the negligence which I ſhall ſpeak of in the Remark [B] of the Article DEMETRIUS.

Let us learn from hence how much an Author is to be pitied when his Library is not furniſhed with all ſorts of Books; and how much he is to be blamed, when, notwithſtanding this, he boldly affirms that ſuch and ſuch Books are not extant. Let us learn alſo with what reſerve we ought to ſpeak of a Work which we know only by the report of another. Who would have thought Baronius a man capable of deceiving the Proteſtants with regard to the idea of Peter Damian's Gomorrhæus; to deceive them, I ſay, to the diſadvantage of his own Communion? But it may be aſked, is it a convincing proof of Baronius's error, to ſay that the Abbot Richard maintains the contrary? No, it is only a ſtrong preſumption, which comes very near a good proof; ſince the Author of the Préjugez has not offered to maintain what he had advanced. It is preſumed he would not have eaſily digeſted ſuch an Affront, if he had been able to make his Apology. After all, do we not ſee that the Abbot Richard directs us to the Spring-head? He mentions an Edition of the Works of Peter Damian printed at Paris in the year 1663. If any one is incredulous, he need only read the piece in queſtion. Mr. du Pin ſpeaks of it very ſuccinctly, and obſerves that it is the VII of Peter Damian's Opuſcula, in the III Tome of his Works (11).

(11) Du Pin, Biblioth. des Auteurs Eccleſiaſtiques du XI Siecle, pag. m. 94.

DANAE, the daughter of Leontium. See the Remark [D] of the Article LEONTIUM.

DANDINI (JEROME) an Italian Jeſuit, born at Ceſena in the Eccleſiaſtical State, is the firſt of his Order who taught Philoſophy at Paris: he bore ſeveral honourable offices fices in the Society; for beſides teaching Divinity at Padua [A], he was Rector of the ſeveral Colleges at Ferrara, Forli, Bologna, Parma, and Milan; Viſitor in the Provinces of Venice, Toulouſe, and Guienne; and Provincial in Poland, and in the Milaneze. Clement VIII ſent him to the Maronites of Mount Libanus. He died very aged [B] at Forli, the 29th of November 1634. His Commentary on the three Books of Ariſtotle de Anima was printed at Paris in 1611, in folio; and after his death they publiſhed his Ethics. They make a folio which was printed at Ceſena in the year 1651, under the Title of Ethica ſacra, hoc eſt, de Virtutibus & Vitijs (a). This is all that is ſaid of him by the Hiſtorians of the Jeſuits (b): we ſhall have no reaſon to accuſe them of having flattered their Brother, or of having taken over much pains to ſet him out to advantage, when we know what Father Simon ſays of him. He ſays that Dandini was of a noble family in Italy, of which there are at this day ſome Counts who bear that name, and who live at Ceſena; that he was a man "who had a penetrating wit, a ſolid judgment, and "great experience . . . . that beſides the School Divinity, which he underſtood perfectly, "he was maſter of the Theology of the Fathers, and above all of Moral Philoſophy, "of which he has compoſed an excellent Treatiſe. . . . . So that the Pope could not make "choice of a man better qualified to treat with the Maronites; that it is true, he wanted "ſkill in the Oriental Languages, but he eaſily ſupplied that deficiency by means of the "Interpreters whom he made uſe of (c)." I omit the other elogies which he beſtows upon him [C]. It would be wrong to make theſe praiſes paſs for ſuſpected, under pretext that thoſe who tranſlate, or comment on, a Book, are extremely prejudiced in favour of the Author, and declare themſelves the perpetual Protectors, or even the Panegyriſts of their ſentiments; for it is impoſſible to take more liberty with an Author than Father Simon has done with Father Dandini [D]: he criticiſes him, he ſtrongly refutes him on a thouſand occaſions, in the Remarks which he has added to his Tranſlation of the Journey to Mount Libanus. This Book was unknown to Father Southwel. It was printed at Ceſena, in 1656 (d), under the Title of Miſſione Apoſtolica al Patriarcha e Maroniti del Monte Libano. It contains the Relation of this Jeſuit's Journey to the Maronites and to Jeruſalem. Father Dandini taught Philoſophy at Perugia in 1596 (e), when he was pitched upon by Clement VIII for the Nunciature of Mount Libanus. He embarked at Venice the 14th of July 1596, and returned to Rome in the month of Auguſt the year following. He departed thence ſoon after to go and diſcharge the Office of Provincial in Poland. The French Tranſlation which was made of his Travels by Father Simon, was printed at Paris in the year 1675, and reprinted at the Hague in 1685. It does not contain the Journey to Jeruſalem [E].

(a) It is a miſtake in the Acta Eruditorum of 1685, pag. 284. to ſay that the Author publiſhed this Book at Paris.

(b) Alegambe and Southwell.

(c) Simon, Preface to the Journey to Mount Libanus, which he tranſlated from the Italian of this Jeſuit into French.

(d) See his Relation.

(e) In the Dutch Edition it is falſly printed 1599.

[A] He taught Divinity at Padua.] I durſt not ſay he was the firſt Jeſuit who taught that Science at Padua; and yet it would be the beſt courſe a Tranſlator could take, if they who write in Latin preſcribed to themſelves as rigorous a Law as that of our French Grammarians: but the great liberty which is taken in Latin not to remove all equivocal expreſſions, cauſes a Tranſlator, who ſticks to the moſt natural and exact ſenſe, to depart ſometimes from Truth. However it be, here are the words of Alegambe: Hanc (Philoſophiam) etiam profeſſus eſt primus è Noſtris Lutetiæ Pariſiorum; Theologiam verò Patavii (1). Father Southwel has made no alteration in this paſſage. My Reader may do as he pleaſes; and may underſtand it to mean that no Jeſuit had taught Divinity at Padua before Father Dandini.

(1) Alegambe, Bibliotheca Script. Societ. Jeſu, pag. 182.

[B] He died very aged.] Father Alegambe had made him fourſcore years old. Obiit demum Forlivii octogenarius die 29 Novembris anno ſalutis 1634 (2). Father Southwel has made no alteration in theſe words: yet he ought not to have left them as he found them; for here is what he adds to his predeceſſor's text: Cooptatus in ſocietatem anno ſalutis 1569, ætatis 18, vota quatuor ſolemnia nuncupavit (3). i. e. "He was "admitted into the Society in the year 1569, in the "18th year of his age, and made the four ſolemn "vows." To ſay after this that he died at the age of fourſcore, the 29th of November 1634, is not the part of an Hiſtorian who writes with any exactneſs.

(2) Idem, ibid.

(3) Sotuel, de Script. Societ. Jeſu, pag. 338.

[C] I omit the other Elogies which F. Simon beſtows upon him.] Father Dandini, ſays he (4), "endeavoured "to diveſt himſelf of all the prejudices which he "attributes to thoſe who had been at Mount Libanus "before him. He did not wholly rely on the Popes "Bulls, which however made the beſt part of his inſtructions, becauſe he did not think them infallible "as to the facts in queſtion. But he heard with a "great deal of patience the Patriarch and the principal Maronites, who complained of ſome Jeſuits who "had preceded him in the ſame employ; all which "precautions are convincing proofs of his prudent conduct. Wherefore he ſeemed to have nothing elſe in "view, than to diſcover the true belief of the Maronites. Yet, as will be ſeen in the Remarks which "I have ſubjoined to my Tranſlation, all the penetration of his mind, and all the efforts of his prudence "could not prevent his being impoſed on.

(4) Simon, Preface to the French Tranſlation of the Journey to M. Libanus.

[D] It is impoſſible to take more liberty with an Author than Father Simon has done with Father Dandini.] The laſt words of the foregoing quotation are a proof of it. Let us produce the judgment which he has paſſed on this Jeſuit's ſtyle. His Style, ſays he (5), is ſometimes ſo negligent, and ſo full of ſuperfluous words, uſeleſs epithets, and exaggerations, that I have thought it proper to repreſent his ſenſe rather than his words, though I ſtill preſerve ſomething of his character almoſt throughout. Wherefore, to write with more perſpicuity, I have been frequently obliged to make two or three periods of one of his.

(5) Idem, ibid.

[E] Father Simon's Tranſlation . . . . does not contain the Journey to Jeruſalem.] The reaſon which the Tranſlator gives for this is, that as we have a great number of the like Relations, he thought he might be excuſed from preſenting the public with this, becauſe it contains ſcarce any thing which has not been already obſerved by other travellers.

DANTE, one of the firſt Poets of Italy, was born at Florence the 27th of May (a) 1265 (b). He was of a good family [A], and was inſtructed in polite Learning with great

(a) Reuſner. in Diario, pag. 81.

(b) Volaterranus, Commentar. Urbanor. lib. 21. pag. m. 770.

[A] He was of a good family.] They ſay Cacciaguida his great great grandfather (1) was the ſon or grandſon (2) of Eliſha Frangipani, and that he married a Ferrareſe Lady of the family of Aligheri. They add, that the ſon of Cacciaguida by that Lady took the name and arms of his mother, and thence it came to

(1) He calls himſelf the father of Dante's great grandfather in the 15th Canto of that Poet's Paradiſe, pag. m. 331.

(2) Vel nepos vel filius. Papyr. Maſſo, in Elog. tom. 2. pag. 16. Bullart, Académie des Scienc. tom. 2. pag. 106, ſhould not have ſaid Nephew.

great care (c). He had among other maſters the famous Brunetti (d), who was one of the moſt able men of that time. He ſoon diſcovered the inclination which Nature had given him for Poetry (e); and as he fell in love as early as his age permitted him [B], he compoſed a great many Verſes in his youth. It was to Love-Poetry that he conſecrated the firſt fruits of his Muſe (f); but afterwards he undertook a more ſerious Work. He began it in Latin Verſe, and finiſhed it in Italian. The cauſe of this change was, that he felt too much ſlowneſs in the motions of his poetic vein when he made uſe of the language of ancient Rome. He did well to apply himſelf to his mother-tongue, ſince he excelled in Tuſcan Poetry (g). He would have been more happy, had he never meddled with any thing elſe; for being ambitious, and having attained ſome of the moſt conſiderable poſts in the Commonwealth, he was cruſhed by the ruins of the faction which he embraced. The city of Florence being divided into two Factions, one named the White, and the other the Black, found itſelf reduced to ſo tumultuous a ſtate, that Pope Boniface VIII ſent Charles of Valois (h) thither in the year 1301, to re-eſtabliſh the public tranquillity. No better way was found to pacify the city, than to expel thence the faction of the White. This was the reaſon why our Dante, who had favoured that faction, was ſent into baniſhment [C]. I have elſewhere (i) obſerved that this was the reaſon why he publiſhed

(c) Idem, ibid.

(d) Michael Pocciant. de Scriptor. Florentinis, pag. 33, & 44. See the Remark [K].

(e) Volaterranus, Comment. lib. 21. pag. 771.

(f) Papyr. Maſſo, Elogior. tom. 2. pag. 28.

(g) Idem, ibid.

(h) Brother to Philip the Fair, King of France.

(i) In the Article CAPET.

to paſs that the family of Dante had the ſurname of Alighieri (3). Note that Cacciaguida was born at Florence in the year 1160 (4). The anceſtors of Dante being ſtrongly attached to the party of the Guelphs (5), were twice driven from Florence by the Ghibelins. Some are of opinion he ſhould be called Dante d'Alighieri del Bello, and that Alighieri was the name of his father, and Bello the name of his family. See the proofs which Vincent Buonanni gives of it (6). However, our Poet's name was Durantes, of which by abbreviation they made Dantes, while he was a child (7). Grangier is viſibly miſtaken in the paſſage I am going to cite. It ſerves for a Commentary on ſome Verſes wherein Cacciaguida declares (8) that he had better ſay nothing of his anceſtors, or of the place which they quitted to retire to Florence, than to ſpeak of either. This he ſays out of modeſty, they are the words of Grangier (9), rather than for that he knew not any other more ancient original of his anceſtors, or that beyond Cacciaguida their family was of ſmall account, obſcure, and ignoble. For Dante ſeems to intimate in his Hell that his anceſtors were deſcended from the old Romans, who built Florence, after they had quitted the Colony of Fiezola. In the 15th Canto, lamenting his exile, and the wrong which the Florentines did him, he makes Ser Brunetto Latini to ſpeak thus.

(3) See Dante's Paradiſe, Canto 16. pag. m. 339.

(4) Dante's Paradiſe, Canto 16. pag. m. 350.

(5) Idem, in the 10th Canto of Hell.

(6) In his Diſcorſo ſopra l'Inferno de Dante, pag. 2, 3, & 184.

(7) Volaterranus, lib. 21. pag. 770.

(8) In the 16th Canto of Paradiſe.

(9) Grangier, Commentaire ſur le Paradis de Dante, pag. 351, 352.

Faccian le beſtie Fiezolane ſtrame
Di lor medeſme, & non tocchin la pianta
S'alcuna ſurge ancor nel lor lettame,
In cui riviva la ſementa ſanta
Di quei Roman, che vi rimaſer quando
Fu fatto il nido di malitia tanta.

. . . . . Let the beaſts of Fiezola
Make fodder of themſelves, nor touch the plant,
If any yet ſpring from amidſt their dung,
Wherein the ancient ſacred ſeed revives
Of Romans, who remained there, when ſhe
Was made the neſt of ſo much wickedneſs.

It is certain Dante deſigns to ſay nothing here in praiſe of his own anceſtors in particular, and only takes notice that there were ſome families in Florence which were deſcended from the ancient Romans. How many cities are there among thoſe which have been Roman Colonies, where ſimple artiſans, ſprung from perſons of the dregs of the people for twenty generations, would tell no lie if they ſaid, at a venture, that they are deſcended from the ancient Romans? What uſe would this be of to prove their Family to be illuſtrious, and of diſtinguiſhed nobility?

[B] He fell in love as early as his age permitted him.] Thus I think I may tranſlate the following words of Volaterranus, amavit in adoleſcentia Beatricem (10). This Beatrix was the daughter of Folco Portinari (11): ſome aſſert, that our Poet loved her honourably, but that when ſhe was dead he grew very debauched, giving himſelf up to laſcivious amours (12). Others ſay that the chaſt love which he bore her was the reaſon why after her death he turned the real truth into a poetical fancy, feigning Beatrix to be Theology (13). They who have read this Poem know that Beatrix moraliſes very much therein, and that ſhe appears in the character of a grave Doctor. Read what follows; you will there find moreover that ſhe was but his ſecond miſtreſs; however depend not on that. "It is obſerved that he had "two miſtreſſes in his youth; one named Gentucca, "with whom he fell in love when he was in the city "of Lucca, the other Beatrix Portinaria, daughter of "Folco Portinaria, whom he loved with an ardent, "but chaſt affection. As this love frequently inter-"mixed itſelf with the ſublime conceptions of his "mind, he reſolved to eternize it in his Verſe by "vailing Theology under the fine name of Beatrix: "and deſiring to follow the ſteps of Virgil in the deſ-"cent of his Æneas to Hell, he introduces this daugh-"ter of the Empyreum, who comes to preſent that "Prince of the Latin Poets to him for his conductor "in ſo obſcure and difficult ways (14)." It is certain that this Gentucca was not Dante's firſt miſtreſs: he fell not in love with her till he had been exiled, becoming enamoured of her during the ſtay he made at Lucca after his baniſhment (15). Take notice that the names of his miſtreſſes have been better preſerved than thoſe of his three wives. Papyrius Maſſo acknowledges that he knows not the names of thoſe three wives. Uxores tres habuiſſe dicitur, quarum incertum eſt nomen & mihi prorſus obſcurum (16). He adds that Dante left a ſon who was an Advocate, and ſettled at Verona, and that his poſterity was illuſtrious. He takes notice, among his deſcendants, of one PETER DANTE, to whom Philelphus is ſaid to have dedicated the life of our Poet; and a Dante the third of the name, who was exhorted by the Florentines to return to Florence in the year 1495, and rejected their exhortation. He ſays alſo that they all left the name Aligheri, and took only that of Dante; thereby teſtifying that the glory of their family proceeded wholly from that great Poet (17). He ſeems not to have known what Pierius Valerianus acquaints us with concerning this third DANTE, which is, that he died in the utmoſt poverty. He was learned, and could make good Latin Verſes. When he began to put his compoſitions in order, with an intent to publiſh them as a viaticum of his immortality (18), the enemies which Julius II had raiſed up againſt the Venetians took Verona (19). Dante, who had fled to Mantua with his wife and children, found himſelf reduced there to indigence; and as old age rendred him leſs fit to reſiſt the hardſhips of ſo melancholy a condition, he fell ſick, and died miſerably in that exile, after ſuffering tedious pains (20). Gyraldi mentions a Dante, who was reckoned the fifth: Fuere ex eadem familia, ſays he (21), & alii, in quibus Veronæ natus Danthis & ipſe nomine qui, ut audivi, quintus ab illo eſt, & latina & vernacula lingua non ſine laude verſus ſcribit. i. e. "There were others alſo "of the ſame family, among whom was one Dante "born at Verona, who, as I have heard, is the fifth "from him, and writes Verſes both in Latin and in "Italian which are much commended."

(10) Volaterr. Comm. Urban. lib. 21. pag. 771.

(11) Grangier, ſur le Chant 30. du Purgat. de Dante, pag. 520.

(12) Vincenzio Buonanni, Diſcorſo ſopra l'Inferno ne Dante, pag. 17.

(13) Grangier, ſur le Chant 30. du Purgatoire, pag. 520.

(14) Bullart, Académie des Scienc. tom. 2. pag. 308.

(15) See his Purgat. Canto 24. pag. m. 416.

(16) Papyr. Maſſo, Elogior. tom. 2. pag. 27.

(17) Idem, ibid.

(18) Scripta ſua cæperat in claſſes inſtruere, & immortalitati ſuæ viaticum comparare. Pierius Valerianus, de Literat. Infelicitate, pag. 37.

(19) It was the native city of the third Dante.

(20) Ex Pierio Valeriano, de Litterator. infelicit. pag. 37.

(21) Lilius Gyrald. de Poët. Hiſt. Dial. V, pag. 308.

[C] Our Dante . . . was ſent into baniſhment.] The preſence of Charles of Valois was ſo far from quieting the troubles with which the city was agitated, that it ſerved only to increaſe them. The faction of the Black, finding themſelves favoured by that Prince, committed publiſhed a ridiculous falſhood concerning the extraction of Hugh Capet. He did not ſupport his misfortune with conſtancy: his reſentment was exceſſive; he endeavoured to revenge himſelf at the expence of his country, and did all he could to expoſe it to a bloody war [D]. All the efforts he made to get himſelf recalled were vain: he could never return thither any more; and he died in his exile, in the month of July 1321. He had the ſtrength of mind to compoſe his own Epitaph in Latin Verſe a little before he expired [E]. Let us remember that he applied himſelf diligently to ſtudy during his baniſhment, and wrote ſome Books wherein he ſhewed more fire and ſpirit than he would have done had he enjoyed a more quiet ſtate of life [F]. It is thought that indignation againſt his country gave new vigour to his pen and to his imagination. Some doubt a little the truth of what is aſſerted, that after his baniſhment he went to ſtudy at Paris (k). The committed a thouſand violences; they expelled thoſe of the contrary faction, and burned or pulled down their houſes; and this was not done without murdering a great many perſons. Our Dante who was then of the Council of eight (22), and one of the chief magiſtrates of the city called Priors, had been deputed by the Pope to negotiate a peace. In his abſence, he was condemned to baniſhment, his houſe was demoliſhed, and all his lands pillaged (23).

(k) See the Remark [K].

(22) Octovirali ſupremæ poteſtatis magiſtratu inſignem. Paulus Jovius, Elogior. cap. 4. pag. m. 19.

(23) See Spondanus, Annal. Eccleſ. ad ann. 1501, num. 3, & 4. He cites Villani, lib. 8. cap. 48.

[D] He did all he could to expoſe his country to a bloody war.] He incited Can della Scala, Prince of Verona, to make war on the Florentines (24), and he led the Emperor to the ſiege of Florence (25). They ſpeak of a Letter which he wrote to that Prince during the ſiege of Breſcia (26). I imagine he therein made a paſſionate deſcription of the injuſtices which he had ſuffered in his own country, and exhorted the Emperor to chaſtiſe it.

(24) Volaterr. Comm. Urban. lib. 21. pag. 771.

(25) It is thus that Volaterranus expreſſes himſelf: Etiam Henricum ſextum ad Florentiæ obſidionem DUCENDO. Idem, ibid. He ſhould have ſaid ſeptimum, and not ſextum.

[E] He died in his Exile . . . He had the ſtrength of mind to compoſe his own Epitaph . . . . a little before he expired.] He died at Ravenna; and it is thought that grief was the cauſe of his death. He enjoyed an honourable retreat in the Court of Guy Polentano, Prince of Ravenna, when the Republic of Venice prepared to make war on that Prince (27), who diſpatched him to Venice to negotiate a peace there. The Venetians behaved with arrogance; they would neither receive Dante nor hear him: ſo that he returned to Ravenna, his journey proving fruitleſs, and he fell ſoon after into the ſickneſs of which he died, and which was ſuppoſed to be occaſioned by grief. Revertens itaque Ravennam rebus infectis paulò poſt morbo contracto uti exiſtimatur ex animi dolore extinctus eſt (28). Papyrius Maſſo has ſpoken of this Embaſſy, without ſaying any thing of the ill ſucceſs of it: he inſinuates, on the contrary, that Dante was well received; for he pretends they ſhewed him the Arſenal, and that Dante himſelf relates it (29). Nothing is more falſe than this laſt aſſertion, and perhaps the other is not a whit more true. As to the Epitaph, here is my Author (30). Obiit, adeo mentis compos quod ſex verſus in extremo vitæ ſuæ edidit poſtmodum in proprio tumulo inciſos: & ſunt hi,

(26) See Pocciani, de Scriptor. Florent. pag. 45. and Papyr. Maſſo, Elogior. tom. 2. pag. 19.

(27) Volaterran. Comment. Urban. lib. 21. pag. 771.

(28) Idem, ibid.

(29) Luſtravitque navalem apparatum urbis & armamentarium ſumptu atque opere viſendum, ut primis ſtatim verbis Cantici vigeſimi primi inferorum indicat. Papyr. Maſſo, Elogior, tom. 2. pag. 21.

Jura Monarchiæ, Superos, Phlegetonta, Lacuſque
Luſtrando cecini, voluerunt fata quouſque:
Sed quia pars ceſſit melioribus hoſpita caſtris,
Auctoremque ſuum petiit, felicior aſtris
Hic claudor Danthes patriis extorris ab oris,
Quem genuit parvi Florentia mater amoris.

That is, "He died, ſo perfectly maſter of his underſtanding that in the laſt moments of his life he compoſed ſix verſes, which were afterwards cut on his tomb; and are theſe,

"Of Monarch's rights, of Heaven's bleſt abodes,
"Of Phlegethon, and Hell's infernal lakes,
"I ſung, while fate allow'd: but ſince my ſoul
"To better climes, and her great Author's fled,
"Here Dante lies; fair Florence gave me birth,
"But, baniſh'd thence, a diſtant land a grave."

(30) Pocciantius, de Script. Florent. pag. 45, 46. See alſo Paul Jovius, cap. 4. pag. 9. I correct the faults of the preſs in the Verſes of the Epitaph in Poccianti.

Moreri ought not to have omitted the circumſtance of the time, when he ſaid Dante had compoſed this Epitaph himſelf. He adds, that at the beginning of the XVIth Century, Bernard Bembo cauſed the Tomb to be repaired. This agrees not with Poccianti, who takes notice that this reparation was made in the year 1433 (31); but there are ſo many errors of the preſs in that Italian's Book, that I dare not warrant that date to be exact.

(31) Poccianti, ibid. pag. 46.

[F] He ſhewed more fire and ſpirit in ſome of his Books, than he would have done had he enjoyed a more quiet ſtate of life.] This is an Obſervation of Paul Jovius. Sed exilium, ſays he (32), vel toto Etruriæ principatu ei majus, & glorioſius fuit, quum illam ſub amara cogitatione excitatam, occulti, divinique ingenii vim exacuerit, & inflammârit. Enata ſiquidem eſt in exilio comœdia triplex Platonicæ eruditionis lumine perilluſtris, ut abdicata patria totius Italiæ civitate donaretur. i. e. "But his exile was greater and more glorious for him "than the Sovereignty of all Tuſcany, when he pointed "and inflamed the force of his concealed and divine ge-"nius, which was excited by bitter reflections. For in his "baniſhment was produced a threefold Comedy ſhining "with the light of Platonic learning, that ſince he was "exiled from his native country, he might become a "Denizen of all Italy." Latomus diſplays the ſame thought in the ſix verſes he made on Dante, which you may find in Paul Jovius (33). The queſtion is whether the remembrance of his baniſhment did not too much excite his anger; for it often happens that thoſe who write in that condition carry the Satire too far. Let us tranſcribe the paraphraſe of Mr. Bullart (34): He determined to take that ſignal vengeance on the authors of his exile, which burſt forth in his triple Poem of Paradiſe, Purgatory, and Hell. He dipped his pen as much in the gall of his anger, as in the living ſprings of Helicon: he joined the bitterneſs of his ſoul to the ſweetneſs of his Poetry: he was at the ſame time animated by his learned Muſe, and by his reſentment. The partialities of the Great, with the corruption of manners, furniſhing his wit with all the matter he could deſire for ſuch a ſubject, he diſplayed before the eyes of all Italy that admirable Satire, which ſending its pointed darts even to the thrones of the Popes, Emperors, and Kings of the earth, diſcovers their private actions with a liberty which ſeems to fear neither their power nor their indignation. He particularly blackens the reputation of Pope Boniface VIII, becauſe he had ſupported the party of his perſecutors. He diſhonours by his verſes the memory and race of Charles of Valois, the chief inſtrument of his baniſhment; ſaying that Hugh Capet was the ſon of a Butcher . . . . Dante, in his Poem, alſo vents his indignation againſt the City of Florence, comparing it to a den of robbers, and to a proſtitute; becauſe ſhe ſet all public Offices to ſale, and was continually changing her Magiſtrates, her coin, and her cuſtoms, the more eaſily to ſupport the inconveniencies of her government. Mr. Bullart ſhould have added that he decries Florence as a City where the women abandoned themſelves to lewdneſs. He introduces Foreſe (35), who wonders in Purgatory that his widow lives chaſtly in the midſt of ſo many immodeſt women. I ſet down his words, according to Grangier's Tranſlation:

(32) Jovius, Elogior. cap. 4. pag. 19.

(33) Ibid. pag. 20.

(34) Bullart, Academie des Sciences, tom. 2. pag. 307.

(35) He was paternal Uncle to the Civilian Francis Accurſius. Grangier, Comment. ſur le Purgatoire de Dante, pag. 401.

A Dieu tant plus eſt chere, & tant plus agréable
Ma vefve, que beaucoup au monde j'ay aymé,
Que plus ſeule à bien faire elle eſt par trop loüable.
Pour ce que le pays de Sardaigne eſtimé
Barbare, eſt bien plus chaſte en ce qui eſt des femmes,
Que là où je la laiſſe au milieu des infames.
O frere bon & doux, que veux tu que je dye?
Desjà le temps futur m'eſt au devant des yeux
Qui ſuivra non de loing l'heure qui nous manie.
Lors l'on interdira pour adviſer au mieux
En la chaire publicque aux Dames Florentines
De monſtrer leurs tetins, & leurs molles poitrines (36).

(36) Dante, Canto 23 of Purgatory, pag. m. 396.

"The widow'd charmer, who my bed did ſhare,
"Merits by virtue Heav'ns peculiar care;
"Who chaſtly lives amidſt a wanton race,
"Lewder than thoſe Sardinia's coaſts embrace.

The moſt conſiderable of his Works is the Poem intitled, The Comedy of Hell, Purgatory, and Paradiſe. It has ſerved ſome Commentators for a Text [G], and has furniſhed matter for a war between ſeveral Critics [H]. It contains certain things which do not pleaſe

" What ſhall I ſay? Hope riſes in my breaſt,
" And to my ſight the future ſtands confeſt:
" I ſee reform'd the Ladies of the town,
" And pulpits preach each wanton faſhion down."

Let us add the Tranſlator's Paraphraſe (37): " The time " will ſoon come (ſays he) when the wrath of God will " overflow in ſuch a manner to the great calamity of the " Republic of Florence, for the immodeſties and lewd- " neſs of the Florentine Ladies; that if they be deſirous to " appeaſe his wrath, the Preachers will be obliged pub- " licly to forbid them going with their necks and " breaſts uncovered. This is what he means by Nel " qual ſarà in Pergamo (ſo he calls the pulpit of truth) " interdetto A le ſfaciate donne Fiorentine, properly " ſhameleſs, L'andar moſtrando con le poppe il petto, " that is, to walk through the city with their neck " bare, to ſhew their large breaſts, and high cheſts." A French Writer of the XVIth Century has more ſtrongly expreſſed this ſort of nudity, for which he blames the French Ladies. As to our women, ſays he (38), they have learned the manner of the ſoldiers of theſe times, who take a pride in ſhewing their gilt and ſhining breaſt-plates, when they march to their reviews; for whether they go to maſs to obtain pardons, or walk abroad to viſit the orchards, or gardens, or other private places, which it is not decent to name, and that for a very good reaſon, they expoſe their naked breaſts to view, ſhewing their waiſtes, diaphragms, heart, lungs, and other pectoral parts, endued with a perpetual motion; which theſe good Ladies make to keep time, or meaſure, like a clock, or rather like a Smith's bellows, which kindle the fire for their forge: in the ſame manner do theſe gentlewomen go, kindling a fire in the heart of the Heliogabaliſts of our Court, who are already but too effeminate, and heated in their luſts; yet to inflame them the better, or abſolutely to burn them, our Court Medeas invent all the artifices which nature has produced to aſſiſt mankind for good purpoſes, to turn them into laſcivious, and filthy things. The abuſe was not ſo great ſome years after (39).

The Proteſtants have made good advantage of Dante's invectives againſt the abuſes of the Court of Rome (40). See below the Remark [I].

[G] His Poem of Hell, &c. has ſerved ſome Commentators for a Text.] See the Edition of his Italian Poems publiſhed at Venice in the year 1564, in folio, by the Care of Francis Sanſovino (41): you will there find the Notes of Chriſtopher Landino, and thoſe of Alexander Vellutelli. Thoſe of Vincenzo Buonanni on this Poet's Hell fell into my hands very lately: they were printed at Florence, in 4to, in the year 1572, and dedicated to Francis of Medicis, Prince of Tuſcany (42). The Author promiſed a like Commentary on Dante's Purgatory and Paradiſe: I do not know whether he kept his Word; but I know that Bernardino Daniello has written a Comment on all the three Poems, and that long before him Benevenuto d'Imola had done the ſame thing with a great deal of wit and learning. Benevenutus ſummus Philoſophus & Poëta Comœdiarum Dantis interpres, qua in re cum excellenti ingenio doctrinam quoque ſummam oſtendit (43). Grangier, Counſellor and Almoner to the King, and Abbot of St. Bartholomew at Noyon, has turned them into French rhime, and written a Commentary on them. His work was printed at Paris in the year 1597, in three volumes in 12°. Monſr. Baillet (44) will inform you of the judgment which the Critics have paſſed on theſe three Poems. He ſays, that in the opinion of Caſtelvetro, they ought to be conſidered as an Epic Poem, tho' the Italians have given them the title of a Comedy. It muſt be obſerved that the Author himſelf gave them the ſame title (45). Thoſe who to prove he wrote part of this work before his baniſhment, ſhould come and tell us that the XXI Canto of Hell was compoſed in the year 1300, would produce but a very weak proof; for he has plaid with dates according to his own fancy. Does he not introduce people who foretell him what had already befallen him (46)? He tranſports himſelf therefore to a time anterior to that wherein he wrote his Poem.

[H] . . . . And has furniſhed matter for a war between ſeveral Critics.] Some have cenſured Dante, and others have written his Apology. James Mazzoni is reckoned one of his moſt learned Defenders. He publiſhed two volumes againſt one Caſtravilla, who had criticiſed Dante (47). A learned man of Siena, named Beliſarius Bulgarini, wrote Notes againſt this Work of Mazzoni, at the requeſt of Horatio Capponi Biſhop of Carpentras. Somebody ſtole them from him, and publiſhed them under his own name, and under the title of Brevis atque ingenioſa contra Dantis opus Diſputatio. He was ſo plainly convicted of his theft, that he was obliged to make a Recantation, which he publiſhed together with a Work wherein he anſwered Bulgarini's Objections againſt Dante. A learned man of Bologna, named Jerom Zobbius, took part in this quarrel, and publiſhed a work in the year 1583, which he intitled, Dantes & Petrarcha ab Hieronymo Zobbio defenſi: Bulgarini made uſe of this opportunity to expoſe the fraud of his plagiary the more ſenſibly, and printed a new Book wherein he refuted what Capponi had objected againſt the four firſt parts of his Remarks againſt Mazzoni. He alſo publiſhed two others, one againſt that of Zobbius, and the other againſt the Palinody and Apology of the plagiary. Here are already four Works of Bulgarini. He publiſhed another in Italian, in which he refuted what Zobbius had written in defence of Dante concerning the poetical particles. His ſixth work is intitled: Beliſarii Bulgarini, Aperti, Academici Inthronati, Notæ ad primam Dantis defenſi partem Jacobi Mazzoni. Laſtly, he printed a Book againſt a Manuſcript which was falſly attributed to Speron Sperone, and which maintained the cauſe of Dante (48). It is affirmed that he came off victorious from this long diſpute, and that the force of his reaſons made it plainly appear that the Comedy of Dante belonged to no one ſpecies of Poetry, ſince it was far from being conformable to the precepts of Ariſtotle. Ne multis morer, finis fuit ejuſmodi, ut Bulgarinus certaminis victor diſcederet, cum, certiſſimis validiſſimiſque rationibus, adverſariorum copias, pro Dante propugnantes, profligaſſet, obtinuiſſetque, illius comœdiam veram poëmatis cujuſpiam rationem non habere, quod ab Ariſtotelis præceptis longiſſime aberraret (49). Ugurgieri informs us that the Comedy of Dante raiſed one of the moſt memorable Wars among the literati and the virtuoſi of Italy that has been ſeen of the kind (50). He adds that Mazzoni's Work threw oil into the fire, and that the piece which was ſtollen from Bulgarini, and which the plagiary publiſhed under his own name, was the ſtumbling block. Bulgarini laid claim to his property by publiſhing that piece, and putting his own name to it: he was refuted by the plagiary; but he returned to the charge, and took advantage of the confeſſion of the theft. His Reply was printed at Siena, in the year 1588: I ſet down the title of it, that the plagiary's name may be known, which has not yet appeared in the Liſt of this ſort of Thieves. Il Bolgarino avvantaggioſi nella cauſa per la confeſſione del furto riſpoſe all' Avverſario con un libro ſtampato per Luca Bonetti in Siena l'anno 1588 che fu intitolato; Diſeſe in riſpoſta dell' Apologia e Palinodia di Monſignor Aleſſandro Cariero Padovano in propoſito della Commedia di Dante (51). Lilius Gyraldus ſpeaks of an Auguſtin Monk, who was from his youth greatly prepoſſeſſed in favour of Dante, and refuted thoſe who criticiſed that Poet, on all occaſions. Certe in eo (Danthe) poeticam diſpoſitionem majoremque diligentiam pleroſque deſiderare video, ejuſque linguæ nitorem: quos Joannes Stephanus eremita, & amicus chariſſimus, & municeps noſter, qua eſt eruditione, & quo à teneris erga Danthem fuit ſtudio, mirabiliter ſolitus eſt refellere (52). i. e. " It is certain that moſt people find " Dante deficient in poetical diſpoſition, care, and puri- " ty of language: whom John Stephanus the Hermit, my " dear friend and fellow citizen, uſed to refute admirably " and with great learning, out of the affection he bore to " Dante from his childhood." I do not find this John Stephanus in the Apparato de gli Huomini illuſtri della Città di Ferrara, publiſhed in the year 1620 by Agoſtino Superbi da Ferrara, Theologo e predicatore de' Minori

(37) Grangier, Commentaire ſur le Purgatoire de Dante, pag. 404.

(38) Nicolas de Montand, Miroir des François, liv. 1. pag. 17, 18. Edition of 1581.

(39) See in the Remark [B] of the Article DEMPSTER, the ſcandal given to the inhabitants of Paris.

(40) See among others Flacius Illyricus, in Catalogo Teſtium Veritatis, and Wolfius, in the 1ſt Volume Lectionum memorabilium, & reconditarum, pag. m. 612.

(41) I have ſeen an Edition of Venice printed (I believe) from this, in 1578, in folio, dedicated the 10th of June 1578, by Gio. Ant. Rampazetto, to William of Gonzaga, Duke of Mantua.

(42) And not to the Great Duke Coſmo, as Michael Poccianti, de Script. Florentin. pag. 169, aſſerts.

(43) Leand. Albert. in Deſcript. Ital. pag. 493.

(44) At the beginning of the 3d part of Jugemens ſur les Poetes.

(45) See the 16th, and 21ſt Canto's of Hell.

(46) See below Citation (76).

(47) Nicius Erythræus, Pinacoth. 1. pag. 68.

(48) Extracted from Nicius Erythræus, Pinac. 2. pag. 72, 73.

(49) Idem, ibid. pag. 73.

(50) Ugurgieri, nelle Pompe Saneſi, apud Lorenzo Craſſo, Iſtoria de Poëti Greci, pag. 85, 86.

(51) Idem, ibid. apud eundem Craſſo, pag. 86.

(52) Lilius Gyraldus, Hiſt. Poëtar. Dial. 5. ſub fin. pag. m. 308.

pleaſe the Pope's friends, and which ſeem to ſignify that Rome is the ſeat of Antichriſt (l). Another Book of Dante has much diſpleaſed the Court of Rome, and has made him paſs for a Heretic [I]. We muſt not forget that this great Poet met with ſome illuſtrious patrons

(l) See the Remark [I].

(53) Idem, ibid.

(54) Raphael Volaterranus, lib. 21. pag. 771.

(55) Moreri wrongly quotes Bartoli, lib. 1. de iniquit. reis. Here are three faults: 1, A Reader would think himſelf referred, not to Bartolus the Civilian, but to the Jeſuit Bartoli; 2, He ſhould have quoted lege 2, and not libro 1. The 3d fault is his ſaying iniquit. reis, inſtead of inquir. reis. [Or rather de requirendis reis, as it is quoted after Bartolus by John Nevisan, Foret nuptiale, lib. 1. n. 132. It is the 17th Title of the 48th Book of the Digeſt, where it is expreſſed thus: De requirendis, vel abſentibus damnandis. De inquirendis reis is properly the 40th Title of the 9th Book of the Code. CRIT. REM.]

(56) Spondanus, ad ann. 1321, num. 7. He cites the 1ſt Book of Volaterranus's Anthropology. This quotation, copied by Moreri, is good for nothing; for the Anthropology is not divided into particular Books; it reaches from the 13th Book of the Author's Commentaries inclusively to the 24th excluſively. What Spondanus quotes is in the 21ſt Book.

(*) Anton. Tit. 21. cap. 5. § 2.

(57) Spondan. ad ann. 1321, num. 7.

(58) Poccianti us, de Script. Florent. pag. m. 45.

(59) Idem, ibid.

(60) Idem, ibid.

(61) Du Pleſſis, Myſtere d'Iniquité, pag. 419, 420.

nori Conventuali. Gyraldus adds, that the Olivetan Monks preſerved the Latin Verſion of Dante's Poems, which one of them made in Latin Hexameters, as a kind of ſacred treaſure. Vidi qui Latinum Danthem fecerat carmine hexametro, ex Olivetanis videlicet ſodalibus Piſtorienſem quendam eorum temporum: quem librum (prob ſumme optime Deus, quanta cuſtodia aſſervatum in Olivetano cœnobio) ipſi non ſine ambitione mihi, tanquam rem ſacram aliquam oſtenderant (53).

[I] . . . . Another Book . . . . has made him paſs for a Heretic.] It is that de Monarchia; wherein he maintains that the authority of the Emperors ought not to depend on that of the Popes. This was his Hereſy (54): Scripſit præter hæc Opuſculum de Monarchia, ubi ejus fuit opinio quod imperium ab eccleſia minime dependeret. Cujus rei gratia tanquam hereticus poſt ejus exitum damnatus eſt, cum aliorum, tum Bartoli juriſperiti ſententia ſuper lege 1. c. præſules. lib. digeſtorum de inquirendis reis (55). Spondanus, a French Biſhop, has on this occaſion ſhewn himſelf a perfect Ultramontane; for he quotes this Remark of Volaterranus without the addition of any corrective (56). He takes the ſame courſe in citing St. Antoninus, who, as he ſays, has amply refuted the moſt capital error that he found in the Writings of this Poet, which is his leſſening the power of the Popes over the temporalities of Kings. Quem (Dantem) egregias animi dotes ac ſcientiæ laudem & præclara ſcripta, tum aliis erroribus maculaſſe obſervavit ſanctus Antoninus (*): tum eo maximè, quo tertiâ parte tractatus ſui de Monarchiâ conatus eſt deprimere auctoritatem Romani Pontificis ſupra Imperatores ſeu Reges Romanorum in temporalibus, quem idem Antoninus pluribus confutat (57). A true diſciple of the Sorbonne, and a true ſon of the Gallican Church, would not have ſpoken in ſuch a manner. Take notice that this Analiſt dares not ſpecify the other errors which St. Antoninus obſerved in our Poet. Poccianti has not been ſo diſcreet: for he tells us that S. Antoninus cenſured Dante for having omitted the Limbo of infants, and for having looked on the voluntary abdication of Pope Cæleſtin as a meanneſs of ſoul (58). He adds, that in this particular, and on account of his doctrine of the independence of the Emperors, this great Poet deſerves blame. In his culpandus venit vates iſte perglorioſiſſimus (59). He is ſilly enough to aſſert that both divine and human Writings do every where teach how erroneous the opinion of independency is; for, ſays he, as the Moon is inlightened by the Sun, ſo is the temporal power illuminated by the ſpiritual. Here are his words; it is proper to quote them, leſt the Reader might ſuſpect me to be guilty of fraud. Cæterum in tertia parte Monarchiæ affirmat Romanos Imperatores nullam dependentiam habere à Papa, ſed à ſolo Deo, niſi in ſpectantibus ad forum animarum, non autem in rebus temporalibus; quod quam erroneum ſit, ubique locorum in humanis & divinis literis explicatur: ſicut namque luna illuminatur à ſole, ita poteſtas temporalis à ſpirituali (60).

Mr. du Pleſſis Mornai alledges ſeveral opinions of Dante, which are not very conformable to Popery (61): "He wrote a Treatiſe intitled De Monarchia, "in which he proves that the Pope is not ſuperior to "the Emperor, and has no manner of authority over "the Empire; directly againſt the Clementine Paſtoralis, which aſſerts both the one and the other: he "even goes ſo far as to ſay, in his Purgatory:

"Di hoggi mai che la Chieſa di Roma
"Per confonder in ſe due reggimenti
"Cade nel fango & ſe bruta & la ſoma.
"Di maintenant que l'Egliſe de Rome,
"Qui fond en un les deux gouvernemens,
"Tombe en la fange, & ſe gaſte, & la ſomme.

"Say now, the Church of Rome, thro' wild ambition,
"Confounding the two Governments in one,
"Falls in the mire, and fouls herſelf and burthen;

"Deſtroys herſelf and the charge committed to her.
"He alſo confutes the Donation of Conſtantine, which "he maintains to be a fiction; and of ſmall authority, "ſuppoſing it real; for which reaſon he was by ſome "condemned as a Heretic. That the Decretiſts, men "utterly unacquainted with all ſound Divinity and Philoſophy, aſſert that the traditions of the Church are "the foundation of faith; an execrable thing, ſince it "cannot be doubted but that thoſe who before the traditions of the Church believed in Chriſt the Son of "God, either to come, or already come to ſuffer for us, "and hoping have been fervent in charity, are coheirs with him in eternal life. In his Italian Poem "of Paradiſe, he complains that the Pope of a Shepherd is become a Wolf, and has led the ſheep "aſtray; That for this reaſon the Goſpel and the "Doctors of the Church are neglected, and the Decretals only are ſtudied; That the Pope and his "Cardinals are wholly attentive on this; Their "thoughts go not to Nazareth, where the angel Gabriel opened his wings, but to the Vatican and "other choſen places of Rome, which have been the "Burying-places of the Soldiers who followed St. "Peter, whoſe doctrine they have really buried at "Rome; That heretofore war was made on the "Church with the ſword, but now it is done by taking from her the bread which God gives her, and "which he denies to none, to wit, the preaching of "his word, But thou, ſays he, addreſſing himſelf to "the Pope, who writeſt only to blot out, or by a Chancellor, thinkeſt that Peter and Paul, who died for the "Lord's vineyard which thou ſpoileſt, are yet alive; "but thou knoweſt neither the one nor the other. In "another place, he ſays, That it is a ſhame the holy "Scripture ſhould be wholly caſt aſide, or elſe forced "or wreſted; That they do not conſider how much "blood it coſt to publiſh to the world; and how "agreeable it is to him who approaches it with humility; That, on the contrary, every one endeavours to make himſelf conſiderable by his own inventions, and the Goſpel is ſilent; Vain Queſtions "and fables eccho from the pulpit all the year long, "and the poor ſheep come back fed with wind: And "ſeveral other paſſages might be produced out of the "ſame Work againſt the Pope's pardons and indulgences, and the other abuſes of the Church of "Rome, which he paints in ſuch colours, that it is "eaſy to ſee he had marked well the Whore in the "Revelations (a)." Coeffeteau, in his Anſwer to this paſſage (62), obſerves I, That Dante was a Ghibelin (63), and full of reſentment for the ill treatment he had received from the contrary faction. II, That Dante owns both the Donation and the cauſe which is alledged for it, to wit, the cure of Conſtantine's Leproſy. It is true that in this Book de Monarchia (e), he endeavours to prove that Conſtantine could not make ſuch a Donation, becauſe it was to diſmember the Empire: but a Poet is not a judge of this matter of State. III, That as to what he ſays concerning traditions, there is no harm in it, provided it be rightly underſtood. IV, That he blames only the Popes of his time, whom he treats as enemies, and perſecutors of his faction. V, That when he ſpeaks of thoſe Pontifs, he proteſts that he reverences their dignity, though he blames their perſons. VI, That he has condemned none but impoſtors, who preached falſe indulgences, or made a ſordid traffick of true ones. Here are ſome Verſes of Dante quoted by Coeffeteau as a proof of his Orthodoxy with regard to the ſubmiſſion which is due to the Pope.

(a) Dante, del Paradiſo, cant. 9, & 29, & del Purgatorio, cant. 32.

(62) Coeffeteau, Réponſe au Myſtere d'Iniquité, pag. 1032, 1033.

(63) The Ghibelins were the Faction which oppoſed the Popes.

(e) Dantes Alig. lib. 3. de Monarch. c. ultim.

Siate Chriſtiani à movervi piu tardi (64),
Non ſiate come penne ad ogni vento,
Et non crediate ch' ogni acqua vi lavi,
Havete il vechio, e'l novo teſtamento,
El paſtor de la chieſa, che vi guida:
Queſto vi baſti à voſtro ſalvamento (i).

"Ye Chriſtians, learn more conſtancy to know,
"Nor turn, like feathers, with all winds that blow;
"Think not in every common ſtream you may
"Waſh the infectious ſtains of guilt away.
"You have the ſacred Scriptures for your guide,
"The Paſtor of the Church you have beſide:
"And theſe for your ſalvation will ſuffice.

(64) Grangier tranſlates this 1ſt Verſe thus: Pour les Vœux, ô Chreſtiens, ſoyez d'un cœur plus grave. The Poet had been ſpeaking of raſh Vows.

(i) Cant. 5. del Paradiſo.

patrons in his misfortune, but could not always preſerve their affection [K]; for though he was

To this Rivet anſwers (65) that the Author of the little Italian Book, intitled Aviſo piacevole dato à la bella Italia, had collected the principal pieces, from which Bellarmin had ſupplied Coeffeteau with defenſive arguments; that it is neceſſary therefore for the Reader, who would enter into an examination of theſe things, to compare Bellarmin with the Animadverſions of the learned Junius, wherein he will find ſolid confirmations againſt all theſe illuſions and ſubterfuges, and will plainly perceive, that this man ſaw Antichriſt in a ſeat reſpected by him, but the profanation of which he lamented, in a word, the man of ſin whom he deteſted, in the Temple of God which he revered: Rivet exhorts the Adverſaries to obſerve theſe Verſes of Dante:

(65) Rivet, Remarques ſur la Réponſe au Myſtere d'Iniquité, Part. 2. pag. 494, &c.

De voi Paſtor s'accorſe l'Uvangeliſta,
Quando colei che ſiede ſopra l'acque
Puttaneggiar co' i Regi à lui fu viſta;
Quella che con le ſette teſte nacque,
Et da le dieci corna hebbe argumento
Fin che virtute al ſuo marito piacque (*).

(*) Canto 19. del Ieſerno.

" 'Twas you, O Pope, th' Evangeliſt foreſaw,
" When he beheld the Harlot on the floods
" Whore with the Kings and Monarchs of the earth:
" Her who beſtrode the ſeven-headed beaſt,
" From the ten horns receiving power, till God
" Exert his juſtice, and his word fulfil.

(66) Rivet, Remarques ſur la Rép. au Myſtere d'Iniquité, Part. 2. pag. 495.

There certainly, proceeds that Miniſter (66), he acknowledges that St. John, in the 17th Chapter of the Revelations, ſpoke of the Pope, under the name of the whore ſitting on the waters, and of the beaſt with ſeven heads and ten horns, whatever he may elſewhere ſay of the ſeat and of the power of the keys. Nobody denies that thoſe things, conſidered in themſelves, are to be reſpected in every Church: but if they are uſurped by a Tyrant, nothing hinders but he may be deſcribed ſuch as he is.... As to Conſtantine's Donation, whoever conſiders the matter well will find, that he has ſet down the common and received opinion in his time (67) by way of conceſſion, not as his own belief, which never aſſented to ſuch an abſurdity. As to the ſix Verſes quoted by Coeffeteau, his Antagoniſt tranſlates them in this manner. Be ye, O Chriſtians, more ſlow to be moved: be not as feathers to every wind, and believe not that all water will waſh you; you have the Old and New Teſtament; the Paſtor of the Church who guides you. This is ſufficient for your Salvation. After which he ſpeaks thus: " Would Coeffeteau really adviſe all " Chriſtians, in order to confirm themſelves againſt " lightneſs of belief, to take the Old and New Teſ- " tament? He would take care not to do that. But " he is not aſhamed to aſſert of the Pope, that he is " the Paſtor who is ſufficient for our Salvation; and " would fain make Dante to have blaſphemed thus, " who without doubt ſpoke of the true Saviour who " guides us by the Old and New Teſtament." We have here a ſignal inſtance of the illuſions into which a man may fall, when he ſticks to the firſt ſenſe which a Writer's expreſſions offer to his mind. They who read theſe ſix Verſes of Dante, and take them in ſenſu obvio quem ipſamet propoſitionum verba præ ſe ferunt (68); i. e. in the obvious ſenſe which the very words of the propoſitions offer; they who underſtand them, I ſay, as Innocent XII would have the five propoſitions of Janſenius underſtood, believe the Poet meant that in order to be ſaved, we need only conform ourſelves to the Old and New Teſtament, and follow the way which the Pope as Paſtor of the Church ſhews us. But perhaps this is not the true ſenſe of Dante; it may be he meant what Rivet imputes to him. Let us learn from hence that an Author, who would prevent future ages from conſtruing what he has ſaid in divers contrary ways, wiſhes a thing almoſt impoſſible. If a man was able to foreſee the controverſies which will ariſe three or four hundred years hence, he would expreſs himſelf in a more preciſe manner; but I do not know whether Languages would afford terms ſufficient to take away all equivocations, and to obviate all cavils.

(67) See the 19th Canto of Hell, pag. m. 236.

(68) Theſe words are taken from a Brief of Innocent XII to the Biſhops of Flanders, dated the 6th of Feb. 1694.

Take notice of one thing, that Dante furniſhes proofs, both to thoſe who ſay he was a good Catholic, and to thoſe who ſay he was not. The Author of l'Aviſo à la bella Italia has collected the latter: Bellarmin has collected the former; and beſides he has eluded, in the beſt manner he could, all the paſſages produced in the Aviſo. Gretſer refers us to that Cardinal; and it is almoſt the only anſwer he gives to the paſſage of Mr. du Pleſſis. In Dante, ſays he (69), luculentiſſima teſtimonia pro Pontificis Romani auctoritate, proque omnibus illis capitibus, quæ Pleſſæus & Illyricus attingunt, inveniuntur. Qua de re operæ pretium erit legere Bellarminum in libello proprio contra Italum quendam calumniatorem, qui ex Dante potiſſimum, Romani Pontificis majeſtatem labefactare nitebatur: Ad omnia enim profani hominis objecta reſpondit Illuſtriſſimus Bellarminus: Et cap. 19. plurima loca ex Dante producit, quæ cum Pleſſæi & Illyrici delirationibus non magis conſonant, quàm dies cum nocte, æther cum Tartaro. i. e. " In Dante we find the cleareſt proofs for the author- " rity of the Roman Pontif, and for all thoſe points " which du Pleſſis and Illyricus touch upon. Con- " cerning which it would be worth while to read Bel- " larmin's Anſwer to a certain Italian Libeller, who " endeavoured to weaken the Pope's authority chiefly " from Dante: for the illuſtrious Bellarmin has an- " ſwered all that profane fellow's objections: and in " the 19th chapter produces ſeveral paſſages out of " Dante, which agree no more with the wild notions " of du Pleſſis and Illyricus, than day with night, or " heaven with hell."

(69) Gretſerus, Exam. Myſterij Pleſſæani, pag. 463.

[K] He met with ſome illuſtrious Patrons in his misfortune, but could not always preſerve their affection.] I find ſome diſorder in the accounts which have been given of his travels after his exile. Some Authors ſay, that ſeeing himſelf baniſhed, he felt a more ardent thirſt after learning ariſe in his ſoul, and that he went firſt to Bologna, there to apply himſelf to the more ſublime Sciences, and afterwards to Paris. Exulem ubi ſe vidit, tum verò magis incenſus eſt ſtudio liberalium Artium, ac Bononiæ primùm dedit operam gravioribus ſcientiis, indéque Lutetiam Pariſiorum profectus eſt. This is what Papyrius Maſſo ſays (70): Mr. Bullart aſſerts that he went from Bologna to Paris, to learn Philoſophy and the principles of Divinity (71). Naudé tells us (72) that Boccace has left in writing that Dante, being expelled Florence by the violence of the Black and White factions (73), retired to Paris, and much frequented the Univerſity, diſputing pro and con in all faculties (*), ubi ſæpiſſimè adverſus quoſcumque circa quamcumque facultatem volentes reſponſionibus aut poſitionibus objicere diſputans intravit Gymnaſium: and himſelf in the tenth Canto of his Paradiſe expreſſes a great eſteem for one Seguter, an excellent Philoſopher and Logician, who read Lectures in his time in the great Schools of la rue aux Fouerres, whoſe learning, he ſays, was not unenvied.

(70) Papyr. Maſſo, Elogior. tom. 2. pag. 18.

(71) Bullart, Académie des Sciences, tom. 2. pag. 307.

(72) Naudé, Addit. a l'Hiſt. de Louïs XI, pag. 175, 176.

(73) He was expelled only by the Faction of the Black.

(*) Lib. 15. Genealog. cap. 6.

Queſti, ond' à me ritorna il tu' rigardo
E' il lume d'uno ſpirto che'n penſieri
Gravi à morire, gli parv' eſſer tardo.
Eſſa è la luce eterna di Siggieri,
Che leggendo nel vico de li ſtrami
Sillogizzò invidioſi veri.

That is,

" He on the left, where now you turn your eyes,
" Is the great Siggieri, learn'd and wiſe,
" Who ſick of Life, and the World's empty ſhow,
" Chid tardy death, and thought he mov'd too ſlow.
" In Lectures he deliver'd from the chair
" Such wond'rous truths, as envy pin'd to hear.

To know whether the Words of Boccace invincibly prove that our Poet ſtudied at Paris after his exile, it is neceſſary to ſee what goes before. Boccace had been ſaying, Fuit inter cives ſuos egregia nobilitate verendus: & quantumcunque tenues eſſent illi ſubſtantiæ, & à cura familiari, & poſtremo à longo exilio angeretur, ſemper tamen Phyſicis atque Theologicis imbutus vacavit ſtudiis, & adhuc Julia fatetur Pariſiis, in eadem ſæpiſſimè adverſus quoſcunque, &c (74). i. e. " He claimed " reſpect of his fellow citizens on account of the no- " bleneſs of his birth; and how ſlender ſoever his " means was a man of few words, he gave his tongue a little too much liberty on some occasions (m). He left some children (n). A very singular instance is given of his attention in reading [L].

(74) Boccatius, de Geneal. Deorum, lib. 15. cap. 6. apud Papyr. Maſſon. Elogior. tom. 2. pag. 21

(m) Erat morosissimus & Philosophorum instar, ut qui tristitiam præ se ferre videretur, nec facile loqui & brevissime conceptiones animi exprimere solebat. Papyr. Masso, Elogiorum tom. 2. pag. 28.

(n) See the Remark [B].

" means were, and tho' he was distressed by the care " of his family, and at last by a long banishment, yet " he always found time to cultivate the Study of Na- " tural Philosophy and Divinity, in which he was well " skilled, as Paris can testify where he frequently &c." It is clear from this passage that Dante when banished often disputed with great vigour in the Colleges of Paris. Nevertheless I know some think Boccace mistaken as to the time: they cannot persuade themselves that Dante, who had been one of the chief Governors of the Florentines, and was animated with an extreme desire of restoring his Faction, amused himself with wrangling in the Colleges at above thirty five years of age (75). They are of opinion therefore that he only shewed this humour for disputation in the Schools of Paris when he was a young Scholar, and before his promotion to the Council of Eight. They say he was a pupil of Brunetto at Paris, and that Brunetto died before Dante was banished: and this they prove from the Xth Canto of Hell (76). It is certain we there find that Dante had been the Scholar of the deceased Brunetto Latini.

Se fosse tutto pieno il mio domando,
Rispos' io lui, voi non sareste anchora
Dell' humana natura posto in bando,
Che'n la mente m'è fitta, & hor m'accora
La cara, buona imagine paterna
Di voi, quando nel mondo ad hora ad hora
Mi mostravate, come l'huom s' eterna,
Et quant'io l'habbia in grado mentre vivo,
Convien che nella mia lingua si scerna (77).

" Oh! had the Gods, in pity, I reply'd,
" Heard Dante's ardent wish, you had not dy'd:
" The world had still enjoy'd its wonder and its pride.
" Paternal likeness I beheld in you,
" And all your father rises to my view.
" Fix'd in my Mem'ry lives your pious care,
" Which taught me first immortal fame to share:
" His gratitude let Dante's pen declare."

But we do not find there in what City it was that he had him for his Master. However it be, I shall produce Grangier's Note on these words of Dante, Siete voi qui Ser Brunetto. " Ser Brunetto Latini was of " Florence, and a Notary or Secretary of great es- " teem and well skilled in his business, but a man of " very little conscience; for which reason being ac- " cused of several forgeries, he went to live at Paris, " where reading public Lectures in Natural Philosophy, " he became Dante's Master, and as a Mathematician " or Astrologer foretold him, that he would be one of " the most learned men of his time. Our Poet feigns " that he finds him damned in this place with the So- " domites, for the same vice (78)." Add to this that Dante supposes (79) the Professor Seguier was dead. It is probable therefore that he had heard and known him before the time he feigns him to be conducted to paradise; and that time was prior to his banishment. To conclude, it may be observed that several Authors, who speak of what he did after his misfortunes, only mention the retreats which he went to seek in the Courts of some Princes of Italy.

According to Volaterranus (80) he first retired with those of his faction to Martello de Malespina: he went afterwards to Verona, to Can della Scala; and at length to Ravenna, to Guy Polentano, four years after his banishment. Neither the order nor the time has been well observed in this Relation. We learn from Dante himself, that he retired first to Verona, to a Lord of the family della Scala (81):

Il primo tuo rifuggio, e'l primo hostello
Sara la cortesia del gran Lombardo,
Che'n su la scala porta il santo uccello:
C'haura in te si benigno riguardo:
Che del far & del chieder tra voi due
Fia prima quel, che tra gli altri è piu tardo (82);

" For refuge to the Lombard Prince repair,
" Whose arms an eagle on a ladder are:
" This Lord shall first your wand'ring steps receive,
" And favours, faster than you ask them, give;"

and that he had been banished near six years (83) when he took refuge with the Marquess de Malespina. Frehe- rus says he went first to Paris, and that he departed thence to wait on the King of Aragon who had invited him, and loaded him with favours: and that he after- wards accepted the invitation of Can della Scala, who took great delight in conversing with learned men, and gave him signal marks of his liberality (84). This account is no better than that of Volaterranus. I own Boccace observes that Dante was greatly beloved by Frederic of Aragon, King of Sicily (85).

To finish my Commentary, I have this more to say, that Dante had not the good fortune to please his Patron of Verona long. He was plainly given to understand that they were weary of him: the great Can della Scala said to him one day, It is a strange thing that such a one who is a madman should please us all, and gain the love of every body, which you who pass for a wise man are not able to do. There is nothing strange in that, answered Dante; you would not wonder at it, if you knew how much the conformity of people's minds con- ciliates friendship. Every body sees the Answer was too shocking not to put our Poet absolutely out of fa- vour with the Prince of Verona. You are going to read this fact in Latin, and a little more at large. Dantes Aligherius, they are the words of Petrarch (86), & ipse conciviis nuper meus, vir vulgari eloquio clarissi- mus fuit, sed moribus parumper contumacior, & ora- tione liberior quàm delicatis ac studiosis ætatis nostræ prin- cipum auribus atque oculis acceptum foret. Is igitur exul patria, cùm apud Canem magnum, commune tunc afflic- torum solamen ac profugium versaretur, primo quidem in honore habitus, deinde pedetentim retrocedere cœperat, minúsque in dies domino placere. Erant in eodem con- victu histriones ac nebulones omnis generis, ut mos est, quorum unus procacissimus obscœnis verbis ac gestibus, multùm apud omnes loci ac gratiæ tenebat. Quod molestè ferre Dantem suspicatus Canis, producto illo in medium, & magnis laudibus concelebrato, versus in Dantem: Mi- ror, inquit, quid causæ subsit, cur hic cùm sit demens, nobis tamen omnibus placere novit, & ab omnibus diligi- tur, quod tu qui sapiens diceris non potes? Ille autem: Minimè, inquit, mirareris, si nosses quòd morum paritas & similitudo animorum amicitiæ causa est.

[L]. A very singular instance is given of his attention in reading.] He went one day into a Bookseller's shop, which looked into the great square of the city. His intention was to see some public games which were to be celebrated; but having met with a Book which he had a mind to consult, he read it with such appli- cation that, as he returned home, he protested with an oath that he had neither seen nor heard any thing that had passed, or had been said, during the celebration of the games. Dantem Florentinum ferunt ad spectacula ductum apud Bibliopolam, quòd ex ejus taberna in forum prospectus esset, consedisse, librumque, cujus fuisset cupi- dus, invenisse; quem tam avide attenteque legerit, ut domum rediens juramento testatus sit, nihil se vidisse aut audisse ex iis, quæ in foro dicta factaque essent, quemad- modum de eo scribit Æneas Sylvius (87).

(75) According to Buonanni, who places his birth in the year 1260, he would have been above 41. See his Discourse on the 21st Can- to of Hell, pag. 137.

(76) Dante sup- poses that he found him in Hell: now he supposes his Jour- ney to Hell was made in the year 1300, and he was not banished till 1301.

(77) Dante, Canto 15 del In- ferno, pag. m. 116.

(78) Grangier, *sur le XV Chant de l'*Enfer de Dante, pag. 166, 167.

(79) In the 10th Canto of Para- dise, pag. m. 230.

(80) Volaterran. Comment. Urban. lib. 21. pag. 771.

(81) Grangier, on this passage of Dante, calls him Albouin, and makes him the Elder Brother of Can the Great.

(82) Dante, Canto 17 del Paradiso, pag. m. 445.

(83) See the 8th Canto of Purga- tory, pag. 138.

(84) Paulus Fre- her. in Theatro, pag. 1422. He cites the 50 Lives of Boissard.

(85) Boccat. Ge- nealog. Deorum, lib. 14. cap. 11. apud Papyr. Masson. Elogior. tom. 2. pag. 214.

(86) Petrarcha, Rerum Memoran- darum, lib. 4. apud Papyr. Masson. ibid. pag. 22, 23.

(87) Philippus Carolus, Ani- madv. in Aulum Gellium, pag. 592.

DANTE (PETER VINCENT) was of Perugia, and of the Family of the Rainaldi. He was a man of much wit: he understood polite Literature, the Mathema- tics, and Architecture; and composed such fine Verses in imitation of Dante, that it was thought the sublimeness of that great Genius was in some sort revived in him. They even gave him the surname of Dante, which pleased the Family so well, that his descendants quitted the name of Rainaldi, and ſubſtituted that of Dante in its room. Our Peter Vincent invented ſome machines which were admired by the ſkilful, and wrote a Commentary in Italian on the Sphere of John de Sacroboſco (a). He died very old, in the year 1512, leaving a ſon and a daughter (b) [A], of whom I ſhall ſpeak in the Remark.

(a) It was printed at Perugia, in the year 1544: it was reprinted there in 1574, with the addition of a Letter from the Author to Alphanus his Maſter. Oldoïni, Athen. Auguſt. pag. 283.

(b) Extracted from the Athenæum Auguſtum of Auguſtin Oldoïni, a Jeſuit, pag. 283.

[A] He left a ſon and a daughter.] JULIUS DANTE his ſon was well ſkilled in Architecture and in Mathematics. He wrote a Book de Alluvione Tyberis, and Notes in Ornamenta Architecturæ. He died in the year 1575. I ſhall make a ſeparate Article for Ignatius Dante, his ſon, wherein I ſhall alſo ſpeak of Vincent Dante, another of his ſons. THEODORA DANTE, his ſiſter, having retired into the country in the year 1497, to fly the plague which afflicted the city of Perugia, was ſo well inſtructed in the Mathematics by her father, that ſhe deſerved an honourable rank among the moſt famous Mathematicians of the age. She compoſed Books in that Science, and taught it her nephew Ignatius with great ſucceſs (1). The Abbot de la Roque is in the wrong to ſay ſhe flouriſhed towards the end of the XVI Century. See his Journal des Savans of the 12th of December 1678, page 460 of the Dutch Edition.

(1) Extracted from the Athen. Auguſtum of Auguſtin Oldoïni, pag. 198, 313, 314.

DANTE (IGNATIUS), grandſon of the preceding, was born at Perugia, and took the habit of a Dominican Monk. He became ſkilful in Philoſophy and Divinity, and yet more ſo in the Mathematics. He was invited to Florence by the Great Duke Coſmo I, and explained to him the Sphere, and the Books of Ptolemy. He read public Lectures on the ſame ſubject, and had a great many Auditors in the Univerſity of Bologna, when he explained Geography and Coſmography there. Being returned to Perugia, he made a fine Map of that City, and of its whole territory. The reputation of his Learning cauſed him to be invited to Rome by Gregory XIII, who employed him in making Geographical Maps and Plans. He acquitted himſelf ſo well therein, that the Pope thought himſelf obliged to raiſe him to the dignity of a Biſhop; wherefore he gave him the Biſhopric of Alatri near Rome. The new Prelate failed not to go and reſide in his Dioceſe; but Sixtus V, who ſucceeded Gregory XIII, would have him near his perſon, and ordered him to return to Rome. Dante was preparing for that journey, when death conſtrained him to take a longer, the 19th of October 1586 (a). He is the Author of ſome Books [A]. I ſhall ſpeak of his Brother in a Remark [B].

(a) Extracted from Oldoïni, Athen. Auguſt. pag. 161, 162.

[A] He is the Author of ſome Books.] He publiſhed at Florence, in 1569, a Treatiſe of the Conſtruction and Uſe of the Aſtrolabe. He alſo wrote Notes on the Sphere of Sacroboſco, on the Aſtrolabe, and on the Univerſal Planiſphere. He made a Sphere of the World in five Tables. Add hereto his Optics of Euclid and Heliodorus of Lariſſa, and his Commentary on the two rules of James Barozzi. The two laſt Works are in Italian (1). Voſſius did not know this Author. In the Oxford Catalogue we only find the Commentario alle regole delle proſpettiva di Jac. Barozzi, printed at Rome, 1583.

(1) Extracted from Oldoïni, Athenæum Auguſt. pag. 162.

[B] I ſhall ſpeak of his Brother in the Remark.] That is to ſay, of VINCENT DANTE, the ſon of Julius, and grandſon of Peter Vincent, and nephew of the learned Theodora. He applied himſelf to the ſtudies of the family, and ſucceeded therein extremely well; for he was a good Architect, and a good Mathematician. Beſides, he was very well ſkilled in ſculpture and painting. He made a ſtatue of Julius III at Perugia. Philip II King of Spain had a mind to employ him in finiſhing the Eſcurial, and offered him very large penſions; but Dante did not enjoy health ſufficient to undertake that voyage. He ſtayed in his native city (2), and he applied himſelf to Poetry and the Mathematics. He compoſed ſeveral Works, and among others the Lives of thoſe who had excelled in Statuary. Monumenta plura reliquit, inter quæ connumerantur Vitæ Italico idiomate cælatorum ſtatuarum illuſtrium (3). He died at Perugia in the year 1576, at the age of forty ſix (4).

(2) That is, at Perugia.

(3) Oldoïni, Athen. Auguſt. pag. 329.

(4) Extracted from Oldoïni, ibid.

DANTE (JOHN BAPTIST) a native of Perugia, was an excellent Mathematician. One of his moſt ſubtle inventions was to make a pair of wings ſo exactly proportioned to the weight of his body, that he made uſe of them to fly with. He made the experiment of it ſeveral times [A], over the lake of Traſimenus, and with ſuch ſucceſs that it inſpired him with the boldneſs to divert the whole city of Perugia with the ſight. The time he pitched upon was the ſolemnity of the marriage of Bartholomew d'Alviano with the ſiſter of John Paul Baglioni. When the crowd of ſpectators was aſſembled in the great ſquare, behold, our Dante at once ſhooting from the higheſt place of the city appeared all covered with feathers, and moving two large Wings in the midſt of the air. He directed his flight over the ſquare, and ſtruck the people with admiration. Unfortunately, the iron with which he managed one of his wings broke; and then, not being able to balance the weight of his body, he fell on the Church of our Lady, and broke his thigh. It was ſet by the Chirurgeons; and he was afterwards invited to profeſs the Mathematics at Venice. He died of ſickneſs before he was forty years old (a). There is no need to ſay why he was ſurnamed Dædalus. I make no doubt but he was related to the other Dantes of Perugia whom I have mentioned; and am ſurprized that Oldoini, who furniſhes me with this Article, ſays nothing either of his family, or of the age (b) wherein this Dædalus lived.

(a) Extracted from Oldoïni, Athenæum Auguſt. pag. 168, 169.

(b) By the circumſtance of the marriage of Bartholomew d'Alviano it may be known that he flouriſhed towards the end of the 15th Century.

[A] He made himſelf wings ſo exactly proportioned to his body, that he made uſe of them to fly with. He made the experiment of it ſeveral times.] I fancy ſeveral of my Readers will believe nothing of it: yet it is a thing, as is ſaid, which has been practiſed at other places. See the laſt Journal des Savans of the year 1678.

DARIUS, firſt of the name, King of Perſia, was the ſon of Hyſtaſpes (a), and one of the ſeven Lords who aboliſhed the Tyranny of the Magi; and it was he who ſlew ſlew the pretended Smerdis (b) [A]. That I may not repeat what is to be found in Moreri's Dictionary, I ſhall only ſay that the Epitaph of this King of Perſia contained a very remarkable ſingularity [B]. Darius had more wives than Moreri gives him [C]. That Author has very ill reckoned up this Prince's expeditions [D].

(a) He was Governor of Perſia. Herodot. lib. 3, cap. 70.

(b) Herod. lib. 3. cap. 78.

[A] It was he who ſlew the pretended Smerdis.] I do not comprehend what Moreri means by telling us, that the deſign which the ſeven great Lords formed to dethrone Smerdis, was happily executed by Cambiſes, who died very ſoon after. For, in the firſt place, it was not Smerdis who uſurped the crown. Smerdis the ſon of Cyrus had been put to death by the order of his brother Cambyſes. The uſurper was a Magus, who paſſed for Smerdis the ſon of Cyrus. In the ſecond place, the ſame Lords, who formed the deſign of dethroning that uſurper, were thoſe who executed it: and therefore the whole glory of the execution ought not to be attributed to one Cambiſes. This is the more unpardonable in Moreri, becauſe he has not ſaid whether his pretended Cambiſes was one of thoſe Lords. In the third place, there was no Cambyſes concerned, either in the deſign of expelling the Magi, or in the execution of that enterprize. IV. Laſtly, none of thoſe who executed it died very ſoon after, or before they proceeded to the election of a new Monarch.

[B] This King's Epitaph contained a very remarkable ſingularity.] Darius in his Epitaph boaſts of having been a great drinker; Titulo res digna ſepulchri; a circumſtance worthy to be inſcribed on a tomb-ſtone. Ἠδυνάμην καὶ οἶνον πίνειν πολὺν, καὶ τοῦτον φόρειν καλῶς (1): I could both drink a great deal of wine, and carry it well. It cannot be denied but that, phyſically ſpeaking, the quality which Darius here glories in is a good one; for certainly it is a ſtrength, a power, and the effect of a robuſt conſtitution: but, beſides its being a quality almoſt conſtantly attended with a moral irregularity, I do not ſee why the faculty of drinking much ſhould be more valued than that of eating much. Now it is certain that one feels a ſort of natural averſion to great eaters. Demoſthenes was much in the right, when he told thoſe who praiſed Philip King of Macedon for being a ſtout drinker (2), that it was not a kingly quality, but the property of a ſponge (3). But as every Nation has its peculiar taſte, that of the Perſians was to eſteem thoſe who could bear a great deal of wine. The younger Cyrus valued himſelf on this qualification, as a thing which rendred him more worthy of the ſceptre than his elder brother (4).

(1) Athen. lib. 10. cap. 9. pag. m. 434.

(2) Νὴ Δία συμπόταν ἱκανώτατον, ſtrenuum profecto compotatorem. Plut. in Demoſth. pag. 853.

(3) Idem, ibid.

(4) Above, Citation (29) of the Article CYRUS.

[C] He had more wives than Moreri gives him.] "According to the opinion of Herodotus he had two "wives Atoſſa and Ariſtona." This is what Moreri ſays: but if he had taken the pains to turn over Herodotus, he would have found there that Darius had three or four wives, beſides thoſe two. That Prince's firſt wife was the daughter of Gobryas: he married her before his advancement to the throne, and had three ſons by her, the eldeſt of whom, Artabazanes, was excluded from the ſucceſſion in favour of Xerxes, who was the eldeſt by the ſecond wife. As the mother of Xerxes was the daughter of Cyrus, and as he was born after his father was King, he was preferred to Artabazanes whoſe mother was not a Princeſs, and who was born before Darius came to the Crown. This is what we find in the firſt chapters of the VII Book of Herodotus; and here are already two wives of Darius: the daughter of Gobryas, whoſe name I know not, and Atoſſa the daughter of Cyrus, and mother of Xerxes. This daughter of Cyrus had already been wife to her brother Cambyſes (5), and afterwards to the Magus who uſurped the crown under the falſe name of Smerdis. She had a ſiſter yet a maid named Artyſtona, whom Darius eſpouſed likewiſe (6). He alſo married the Princeſs Parmys, the daughter of Smerdis the ſon of Cyrus; and Phædima the daughter of Otanes, one of the ſeven Lords who deſtroyed the falſe Smerdis (7). This Phædima had belonged to Cambyſes, and was one part of the ſucceſſion which fell to the pretended Smerdis; for he did not forget to poſſeſs himſelf of all the wives of Cambyſes. The laſt, by the advice of her father, when ſhe lay with the uſurper, diſcovered that he had no ears, which fully detected the impoſture (8). Darius moreover took to wife Phratagune, the ſole daughter and heireſs of Atarnes his brother (9). So that here are fairly ſix wives of this Monarch mentioned by Herodotus. They give him a ſeventh, named Pantapla, who had alſo belonged to the falſe Smerdis (10).

(5) Herod. lib. 3. cap. 88.

(6) Idem, ibid.

(7) Idem, ibid.

(8) Herod. lib. 3. cap. 68, 69.

(9) Idem, lib. 7. cap. 224.

(10) Hieronymus, in cap. 11. Danielis, apud Chriſtianum Matthiæ, in Theatro quatuor Monarch. pag. m. 207.

[D] Moreri has very ill reckoned up this Prince's expeditions.] The foundation of my preſent criticiſm is not his ſaying that Darius made five conſiderable expeditions; but his having, after ſuch a ſetting out, taken notice only of three, thoſe of Samos, Babylon, and Scythia. They who would diſcover and unravel the two others, will be obliged to reckon for the fourth that which is but a branch or ſequel of the third, and to tack to it the campain of Marathon. After which they muſt take the chaſtiſing of the revolted Egyptians for the fifth. Thus, by gueſſing at a man's meaning, and extracting it from the chaos of a very confuſed Narration, we ſhall arrive at the promiſed number, I mean five expeditions; but at the ſame time we ſhall diſcover a great many blunders. Here are the words of Moreri. Darius returning from Scythia, left his General Megabyzus with eighty thouſand men to conquer Europe. It (11) is memorable for the defeat of the Perſians in the battle of Marathon . . . his army compoſed of above five hundred thouſand men was defeated by twelve thouſand Athenians. Megabyzus being left in Europe with a detachment (12) of Darius's army, is no more than a ſequel of the Scythian expedition. To reduce the exploits of Megabyzus and the battle of Marathon to one expedition is to confound things prodigiouſly. There was an interval of twenty years between the expedition of Scythia and the Battle of Marathon. It is in this interval that Writers uſually place Darius's fourth expedition (13), the War of Ionia (14), during which the Athenians aſſiſted the rebel Ariſtagoras, and helped him to burn the City of Sardis. And it was to revenge this affront that Darius cauſed a formidable army to paſs into Greece, which was overthrown in the plain of Marathon. This is reckoned for Darius's fifth expedition. As to the revolt of the Egyptians, he died while he was making preparations to puniſh it (15). Therefore he employed no troops againſt them, as Moreri aſſerts.

(11) This word can refer to nothing that goes before.

(12) We may give this name to a Body of 80 thouſand men, conſidering Darius's whole army.

(13) See the Theatre of Chriſtianus Matthias, pag. m. 205.

(14) Moreri ſays nothing of it.

(15) Herod. lib. 7. cap. 4.

DASSOUCI, or D'ASSOUCI (CHARLES COYPEAU, SIEUR) a French Muſician and Poet in the ſeventeenth Century. He publiſhed his own Adventures, which are very odd, in a ſtyle bordering on buffoonry. He relates that he was born at Paris (a); that his father Gregory Coypeau Sieur d'Aſſouci, an Advocate in the Parliament (b), the ſon of a Cavalier of Cremona named d'Agnanis, an excellent maker of violins (c), was of Sens in Burgundy (d); that his mother was of Lorrain (e), a very little woman, and very choleric; and that there was ſo little concord between her and her huſband [A], that,

(a) D'Aſſouci, in the 2d tome of his Adventures, pag. 55.

(b) Ibid. pag. 57.

(c) Ibid. pag. 56.

(d) Ibid. pag. 54. [Sens is not in Burgundy but in Champagne. CRIT. REM.]

(e) Ibid.

[A] His mother was . . . . a very little woman, and very choleric; and there was . . . little concord between her and her huſband.] We are going to ſee an inſtance of the diſorders of the pen to which they expoſe themſelves who ſet up for Jokers and burleſque Writers. They find themſelves obliged to divert the public at their own expence, and to level their buffoonry at themſelves, and whatever they ought to ſpare the moſt. Here is the way in which our d'Aſſouci ſpeaks of his mother.: "She was a little bit of an Amazon, haſty "and choleric, who to repair the defects of her dimi- "nutive ſize, wore ſuch high pattins, that whoever "would have taken the pains to ſplit the cork of "them, might have eaſily made very good ſchool fagthat, having divided their children and their ſubſtance, they parted by mutual conſent (f); that he lived with his father at Paris, and was treated ſo ill by the maid-ſervant, that it occaſioned his playing ſeveral wild pranks (g); and that at nine years of age (h) he took his flight as far as Calais (i), where he made people believe he underſtood Aſtrology, and was ſon to that great and renowned Calculator of Nativities (k) named Cæſar (l); that having by a little artifice cured a perſon who conceited himſelf ſick, he paſſed for a famous Magician (m), though he was yet but nine years old; that thoſe who had received him into their houſe, having ſome intimation that the fooliſh mob were for throwing him into the ſea, . . . , ſent him privately out of Calais (n). I have not found the ſequel of his adventures till the time that the Duke de St. Simon got Lewis XIII to hear him at St. Germain (o) [B]. He hit that Prince's humour (p) by a drinking Song he made, and which every body ſung at Court. The King liſtened to his Songs ever after, and granted him free admittance into his cloſet; and they called d'Aſſouci Phœbus garderobin, becauſe he had his lutes always in the King's wardrobe (q). He continued this game under the minority of Lewis XIV. That young Prince read our Poet's Verſes in bed before he went to ſleep, ana always laughed, and that very properly, at the jeſt which ſeveral Courtiers, who laughed unſeaſonably, could not take (r). He diſdained not to give ear to his ſongs, and to ſing them himſelf.

(f) D'Aſſouci, ibid. pag. 62.

(g) Ibid. pag. 64.

(h) Ibid. pag. 69.

(i) Ibid. pag. 68.

(k) Ibid. pag. 73.

(l) See the Article RUGGERI, Remark [E] at the beginning.

(m) D'Aſſouci, Avantures, tom. 2. pag. 89.

(n) Ibid. pag. 90.

(o) Ibid. pag. 47.

(p) Ibid. pag. 48.

(q) Ibid. pag. 47.

(r) Ibid. in the Epiſtle Dedicatory to the King.

" gots of them; ſo that ſhe never put them off, without " loſing juſt one half of her illuſtrious perſon. For which " reaſon my father, who was not ſo ſubtil a Wit as to " be wholly detached from matter, uſed to ſay my " mother was ſo little that ſhe was loſt in the bed, " and not finding her between the ſheets, he complain- " ed that ſhe had no body, but was all ſpirit. But, to " make amends, beſides the qualification ſhe had of ſing- " ing like an Angel, and playing divinely on the lute, " ſhe was endued with ſuch a marvellous ſpirit of con- " tradiction, and ſo imperious a temper, that in forty " years time, having never agreed with my father the " Advocate in any one thing, the poor Gentleman " durſt ſcarce open his mouth, for fear of having an " affront put on his underſtanding. And tho' I was " very young then, I remember that my father one " day ſpeaking of the Laws, and my mother hav- " ing a mind to talk of them too, they had ſo furi- " ous a diſpute about a paſſage of Juſtinian, that they " both took ſword in hand, and fought a duel for " the explication of the Law Frater à fratre (1)." A little lower he makes no ſcruple to declare, that his father had made his ſervant maid his concubine. Being ſubject to the caprices of a ſervant, I began to taſte the bitters of life before I had taſted the ſweets of it. For this ſervant, or rather this miſtreſs, with whom my father took libertis which I may permit you to gueſs at, but not to read, bearing as great a hatred to me, as I bore to her, there was not an hour in the day but we were at daggers drawing (2).

(1) D'Aſſouci, Avantures, tom. 2. pag. 58, &c.

(2) Ibid. pag. 62, 63.

A man of his humour no doubt had read the Writings of Father Garaſſe, and I imagine he took from thence what he ſays about his mother's pattins; for here is a paſſage of that Jeſuit's Doctrine curieuſe. " Saint Vincent Ferrier tells us in one of his Sermons, " that a Gentleman in his time having married " a woman by proxy, whom perhaps he had never " ſeen but in a picture, of a good ſize and tolerable " height in appearance, found himſelf ſtrangely de- " ceived when he ſaw her in the chamber without pat- " tins, for ſhe was diminiſhed and ſhortened by one " half, which frighted him ſo that he aſked her ſome- " what angrily, Ubi poſuiſti reliquum perſonæ tuæ? " Where have you left the reſt of your perſon? The " matter was, ſhe had put off her pattins, which made " her appear twice as tall as ſhe really was (3)." Had d'Aſſouci read Brantome's Memoirs, he would very probably have added to what he ſays about his mother's pattins ſome alluſion to Hercules's club, tho' it had been only to diſguiſe his theft. Read the following paſſage; " I remember that once at Court, a very hand- " ſome tall Lady was looking at a fine and magnifi- " cent hunting piece of tapeſtry, in which Diana and " all her retinue of Virgin huntreſſes were naturally " repreſented, and tho' they were all dreſſed, ſhewed " their beautiful feet and fine legs; ſhe had one of her " companions near her, a woman of very low ſtature " and ſmall ſize, who was alſo amuſing herſelf with " looking at the tapeſtry, and ſaid to her: Ha, little " one, if we all dreſt in this manner, you would be a " great loſer by the bargain; for your great pat- " tins would diſcover you, and you would not have " ſo good a grace in walking, and ſhewing your legs, " as we who are tall; ſo that you would be obliged " to hide your ſelf, and appear abroad but ſeldom: " therefore thank the faſhion, and the long gowns " we wear, which favour you very much, by conceal- " ing your legs ſo cleverly that with your monſtrous " pattins of a foot high, they are more like clubs " than legs; for if a man was in diſtreſs for a wea- " pon, he need only cut off one of your legs, and " take it by the upper end, and with your foot ſhod " and grafted into your great pattins he might do " wonders (4)." Julius Cæſar Scaliger obſerves that the women of Italy wore very high pattins, and that his father uſed to ſay, that men who had ſuch wives found but half of them in bed, the other half remaining in their pattins. Soccus humilis eſt. Italas mulieres altiſſimis uſas vidimus, quamvis diminutiva voce dicant Socculos. Patris mei perfacetum dictum memini, Ejuſmodi uxorum dimidio tantum in lectis frui maritos, altero dimidio in ſoccis depoſito (5). One of theſe huſbands complained very pleaſantly that he had married a wife compoſed of two moieties, being half wood and half fleſh (6). Scioppius fancies he has found in Juvenal that in certain women the two parts of this diviſion were not equal, and that the human body ought to be conſidered as the appendix only. The paſſage is thus in the printed Editions:

(3) Garaſſe, Doctrine Curieuſe, pag. 323.

(4) Brantôme, Dames Galantes, tom. 1. pag. 340, 341.

(5) Jul. Cæſ. Scaliger, Poet. lib. 1. cap. 13. pag. m. 48.

(6) Unde etiam cujuſdam querela, qui ſe uxorem ſemilignean duxiſſe dicebat, Comment. in Alciati Emblem. pag. m. 589.

Si breve parvi
Sortita eſt lateris ſpatium, breviorque videtur
Virgine Pygmæa, nullis adjuta cothurnis,
Et levis trectâ conſurgit ad oſcula plantâ (7).

(7) Juven. Sat. 6. ver. 502.

That is,

——— " Look behind,
" And then ſhe dwindles to the Pygmy kind:
" Duck-legg'd, ſhort-waiſted, ſuch a Dwarf ſhe is,
" That ſhe muſt riſe on tip-toes for a kiſs."

Dryden.

But Scioppius, inſtead of adjuta would have us read adjuncta, and confirms his conjecture by an example. Parvam puellæ ſtaturam exprimit, dum eam cothurnis adjunctam ait, ſicut Cicero de genero ſuo, quis meum generum alligavit gladio (8)? i. e. " He expreſſes the girl's low " ſtature, by ſaying ſhe was joined to her buſkins, as " Cicero ſaid of his ſon-in-law, Who has tied my ſon- " in-law to a ſword?"

(8) Scioppius, Verifimil. lib. 4. cap. 10. pag. m. 148, 149.

[B] The Duke de S. Simon got Lewis XIII to hear him at St. Germain.] If we ſtick to the Author's Relation, this advantage was procured him about the year 1640; for he ſuppoſes that in 1655 one of the King's footmen told him, I have known you above theſe fifteen years; it was I who went to fetch you when the Duke de S. Simon got the King to hear you at S. Germain (9). This ſhews that the Sieur d'Aſſouci had not before that time been admitted into that Prince's preſence. Why, therefore, does he tell us in another place (10) that he diverted King Lewis XIII twenty years together? This is not the firſt time I have obſerved that Authors are not good Chronologers in their own Hiſtory. Take notice our ſpark acquaints us (4) that he had been in the ſervice of the Duke d' Angoulême, natural ſon of Charles IX, and that he triumphed over all the endeavours which were uſed to get him turned out.

(9) D'Aſſouci, tom. 1. pag. 47.

(10) Ibid. tom. 2. pag. 14.

(11) Ibid. pag. 10.

himſelf (s). D'Aſſouci, having a mind to return to Turin to their Royal Highneſſes Court (t), left Paris about the year 1655, with ſo much precipitation, that he had ſcarce time to pay ſome of his debts (u). He was accompanied by two Muſic-Pages (x); he arrived at Lyons, after having met with ſeveral vexatious accidents, and made an acquaintance with a man who has appeared in a corner of Monſieur Boileau's Satires, and who for that reaſon deſerves a place in my Commentary [C]. He found many charms at Lyons: he there entertained with his Muſic all the Convents of ſinging Nuns, and there was not one of thoſe devout virgins who had not already a copy of his Ovid in a merry humour (y). This was the Title of a Work, wherein he tranſlated part of Ovid's Metamorphoſes into burleſque Verſe. He ſtaid three months at Lyons in the midſt of diverſions, plays, and entertainments (z), being highly careſſed by Moliere, and the Bejars (aa); after which he went to Avignon with Moliere (bb), and then to Pezenas where the Aſſembly of the States of Languedoc was held (cc). He was maintained by thoſe Players a whole winter (dd), and he received conſiderable preſents from the Prince of Conti, Monſieur de Guilleragues, and ſeveral perſons of that Court (ee). He had loſt one of his Muſic-boys, and as he found himſelf in that Province of France which produces the fineſt voices as well as the fineſt fruits, he would not return thence into Piedmont without trying to fill up the vacancy. He followed Moliere as far as Narbonne (ff); and afterwards went to Montpellier, where he ran the riſque of his life. This accident is become very famous by the Relation of the Journey of Meſſieurs de Bachaumont and la Chapelle [D]. I ſhall ſpeak of it in the Remarks. He continued three months longer at Montpellier after he had been diſcharged out of priſon (gg), and compoſed there

(s) D'Aſſouci, Avantures, tom. 2. pag. 12.

(t) He ſays in the 3d Volume of his Relations, pag. 153. that the Count d'Harcourt had formerly given him to the Dutcheſs of Savoy.

(u) D'Aſſouci, tom. 1. pag. 2.

(x) Ibid. pag. 3.

(y) Ibid. pag. 296.

(z) Ibid.

(aa) They were Players belonging to Moliere's Company.

(bb) D'Aſſouci, tom. 1. pag. 309.

(cc) Ibid. pag. 315.

(dd) Ibid. pag. 316.

(ee) Ibid. pag. 318.

(ff) Ibid. pag. 319.

(gg) D'Aſſouci, tom. 2. pag. 164.

[C] He had made an acquaintance with a man who has appeared in a corner of Monſr. Boileau's Satires, and who for that reaſon deſerves a place in my Commentary.] D'Aſſouci, in the Relation of his Journey from Chalons on the Saone to Lyons, tells us that having made his muſic-boys ſing ſeveral moving and paſſionate ſongs (12), he drew an Auditor who was blind, and who had on each ſide of his mandibles at leaſt a quarter of a yard of ears, ſo fine and ſo crimſon, that tho' his noſe was full as high coloured, it was difficult to decide which bore the bell, either the purple of his noſe, or the cinnabar of his ears (13). Being aſked who he was, he anſwered (14): "I am . . . . "one of the deſcendants of Homer, and I dare ven- "ture to ſay I have even ſome advantage over that di- "vine perſon; for though he was blind as I am, and "ſung his verſes publickly from door to door as I "do mine, he had only his legs hairy, whereas I am "all over as rough as a bear. . . . I am a famous "Poet and Singer, but a Singer bleſt with ſo power- "ful an Organ, and ſo ſtrong and clear a voice, "that provided I drink but one dram of brandy, if "I were to ſing on the Auguſtins Key, the King "might hear me from the windows of his Louvre. "He had no ſooner ſaid this than, without being "aſked, he drew a little Book covered with blue paper "out of his pocket, and having given it to a young "lad who led him, they united their two voices, and "ſetting their hats on one ſide, they ſung theſe "agreeable ſongs:

"Helas, mon amy doux &c.

"Alas, ſweet friend &c."

"And this other, which Gautier-Garguille ſung formerly;

"Baiſez-moy Julienne.
"Jean Julien je ne puis.

"Kiſs me, Juliana.
"John Julian, that I cannot."

"After this, he ſung one of his own compoſition, "ſpick and ſpan new, the title of which was: A pi- "tiful and diverting ſong on the death of a Shoe- "maker, who cut his throat with his paring knife, "to revenge himſelf on the infidelity of his wife." D'Aſſouci had a mind to know his name, and the place where he held his Parnaſſus. My name, ſays he, is Philippot at your ſervice, otherwiſe the Savoyard; and if ever you paſs over the Pont-neuf, on the ſteps of that bridge you will find my Parnaſſus; the brazen horſe is my Pegaſus, and the Samaritaine the fountain of my Helicon (15). He gave d'Aſſouci one of his Books of ſongs (16). My late father, added he (17), God reſt his ſoul, has ſung the ſongs of Guedron, and the late Boeſſet a thouſand times.

(12) Ibid. tom. 1. pag. 247.

(13) Ibid. pag. 249.

(14) Ibid. pag. 251.

(15) Ibid. pag. 257.

(16) Ibid. pag. 259.

(17) Ibid. pag. 261.

If Notes be not written on Boileau's Satires within theſe hundred years, there will be ſome paſſages in them leſs intelligible than the moſt obſcure which are to be found in the Confeſſion of Sanci and the Catholicon. And I am perſuaded that a Commentator on thoſe Satires in the XIXth Century would be overjoyed to meet with this ſcrap of the Hiſtory of a famous Singer on the Pont-neuf, and would willingly inſert it as an ornament in his Notes on this paſſage:

Le bel honneur pour vous, en voiant vos Ouvrages
Occuper le loiſir des Laquais & des Pages,
Et ſouvent dans un coin renvoiez à l'écart
Servir de ſecond tome aux Airs du Savoiard (18).

(18) Des-Preaux, Satire 9. ver. 75.

"What envy'd honour, that your Works engage
"Th' attention of each Footman, and each Page;
"Or in ſome place remote, at Wakes and Fairs,
"Furniſh a ſecond Tome to the Savoyard's airs!"

[D] He ran the riſque of his life at Montpellier. This accident is become very famous by the Relation of the Journey of Meſſieurs de Bachaumont and la Chapelle †.] As this Relation is in every body's hands, I ſhall only take out of it the chief particulars which concern our Muſician. Meſſieurs de Bachaumont and la Chapelle tell us they arrived at Montpellier the day that d'Aſſouci was to be burnt there for a crime which is abominated by the women. They very pleaſantly deſcribe the indignation of the fair ſex; they ſay that a man of quality had procured the wretch's eſcape, and that the women raiſed an inſurrection in the city on that account, and had already torn two or three people to pieces, only for being ſuſpected of being acquainted with d'Aſſouci; that they were afraid of being likewiſe taken for his friends, and left the town with precipitation: that they met him with a pretty page who followed him; that he gave them an account in few words of all the diſaſters which had befallen him; that having ſeen ſeveral towns in Provence, they went to Avignon, and one evening, as they were taking the air on the banks of the Rhone in a clear moon ſhine, they met the Sieur d'Aſſouci; and aſked him maliciouſly:

Ce petit garçon qui vous ſuit,
Et qui derriere vous ſe gliſſe,
Que ſçait il? en quel exercice,
En quel art, l'avez-vous inſtruit?
Il ſçait tout, dit-il; s'il vous duit,
Il eſt bien à vôtre ſervice.

"The youth who after you comes trudging,
"(He's an apt Scholar, we imagine)

† [This perſon's name ſhould be written ſimply Chappelle. CRIT. REM.]

"What

there a Relation of that tragi-comical Adventure; but he did not print it, though the Chief Juſtice, who had ſeen it, had given him leave (bb). He afterwards ſaw ſeveral Towns of Provence; he went to wait on the Prince of Morgues at Monaco, who gave him thirty Piſtoles; he paſſed the Col de Tende &c. (ii). Being arrived at Turin, he had ſome trouble to confute by his preſence the falſe report of his execution which had been read in the burleſque Gazette. He uſed all imaginable endeavours to procure himſelf a fixed ſettlement in that Court (kk), and he ſuppoſes he ſhould have ſucceeded therein,

(bb) Ibid. pag. 163.

(ii) D'Aſſouci, Avantures d'Italie, pag. 74.

(kk) See the Remark [E].

" What has he learn'd, ſince here you brought him?
" What exerciſes have you taught him?
" O Gentlemen, the Spark reply'd,
" The Boy's a knowing Boy, and try'd;
" Yet I can part with him with eaſe:
" He's at your Service, if you pleaſe."

We then thanked him very civilly, as you would have done, and made him no other anſwer than

Adieu, bon ſoir, & bonne nuit:
De vôtre Page qui vous ſuit,
Et qui derriere vous ſe gliſſe,
Et de tout ce quil ſçait auſſi,
Grandmerci Monſieur d'Aſſoucy;
D'un ſi bel offre de ſervice,
Monſieur d'Aſſoucy grandmercy (10).

(19) Voyage de Bachaumont & la Chapelle, pag. m. 75.

" Adieu, good Monſr. D'Aſſoucy,
" Thank you for your civility:
" But keep your page, and all he knows:
" Once more, Monſieur, a good repoſe!"

Few Books of Wit have been ſo much read and admired as the Relation of theſe two Gentlemen's Journey; and they have thereby contributed more than any body to make d'Aſſouci's name odious, contemptible, and abominable. It has been reported, that his enemies, to ruin him, ſhewed that Relation to Pope Clement IX (20). This was a tickliſh affair; for it contains a pretty malicious paſſage, and very likely to diſpleaſe the Court of Rome. It is that wherein it is ſuppoſed that d'Aſſouci, having eſcaped the flames at Montpellier, judges himſelf out of danger, ſince he is got to Avignon:

(20) D'Aſſouci, Avantures, tom. 2. pag. 271.

Mais enfin me voila ſauvé;
CAR je ſuis en terre Papale (21).

(21) Voyage de Bachaumont, pag. 75.

" At length a ſafe Retreat I've found;
" FOR now I ſtand on Papal Ground."

The unfortunate d'Aſſouci experienced but too dearly the prejudice which the Relation of Meſſieurs Bachaumont and la Chapelle did him (22): he wrote againſt the latter, and abuſed him very much: and as he pretended to have been the perſon who taught him to make verſes, and that ſome pieces of Poetry had been publiſhed in his praiſe of Mr. Chapelle's compoſition, he called him to an account for his ingratitude and inconſtancy (23). He maintained it was a falſhood to aſſert that he had been met by thoſe travellers, either near Montpellier or at Avignon (24): he affirms that he did not leave Montpellier till three months after his enlargement, ſo that they advanced a notorious falſity, in ſaying they found him out of that city the very day he was ſet at liberty (25). He aſſerts they did not go to Montpellier till two years after his adventure; whence he concludes that they have made uſe of a very malicious fiction to aſperſe him (26). The miſchief is, that tho' he convicts them of having taken the ſame liberties in their repreſentation of this affair, as are taken by Writers of Romances, he cannot deny the main matter; for he owns he was put into a dungeon at Montpellier, and accuſed of an infamous commerce. Inſtead, ſays he (27), of attributing to the merit of my art the pains I was at in ſeeking out a ſinging-boy for the ſervice of the Dutcheſs of Savoy, the people ſaid it was to make a traffick of him with the Princes of Italy, or that under pretence of muſic (28), I travelled the world over in this manner, looking out for boys, not to teach them to ſing, but to ſell them to the Chirurgeons of Montpellier to make anatomies of them . . . (29). What ſhall I ſay more? the Catholics, who are called in that country Catholiques a gros grain, or coarſe-ſpun Catholics, called me Parpaillot (30); and the Parpaillots called me an Atheiſt: but the fine Ladies, who loved their intereſt better, and were more ſpeculative, ſetting God aſide, called me Heretic, not in point of Religion, but in point of Love; and without remembring the many ſerenades I had given them, and the many marks of affection I had ſhewn them, when, in my younger years, while I ſtaid at Montpellier, I taught them to play on the Lute, and ſhewed them the fingering of that inſtrument, they unjuſtly accuſed me of the inſenſibility which Orpheus of old had for the Bacchants, and all this without any other foundation than their chimerical imagination already prepoſſeſſed by the report they had heard of my long acquaintance with C. the late D. B. and the late C. and fomented by the malice of thoſe irritated minds. Take notice that he aſſigns for the cauſe of all this perſecution, the anger of a Lady who was adored by all Montpellier (31), and who failed not to ſet her whole wit to work, and employ all her engines, to deſtroy him (32). Several preciſe dames took the part of this irritated woman, and ſwore by their patches and by their paint-pot, never to plaiſter their faces till they had cauſed his aſhes to be ſcattered in the wind (33). He was ſo imprudent as to affront them in a Poem which he diſperſed under the Title of Articles de Paix aux Précieuſes de Montpellier; Articles of Peace to the preciſe Ladies of Montpellier. Theſe verſes were very ſhocking and ſatirical. They were, no doubt, the more offended at them, becauſe he therein freely declared the true reaſon why, as he ſaid, they perſecuted him, and required that he ſhould be puniſhed for an example. He promiſed them to be more gallant for the future, and made them an offer of his abilities, though a little extenuated by age.

(30) That is, Huguenot.

(31) D'Aſſouci, Avantures, tom. 2. pag. 100.

(32) Ibid. pag. 102.

(33) Ibid. pag. 118.

Mais r'aſſurez vos cœurs jaloux,
Eſclave des charmes plus doux,
J'adore par tout la nature,
Sans m'appliquer à la torture,
Que la plus belle d'entre vous
Vienne un peu tenter l'avanture.
Je veux mourir ſous l'impoſture,
Si je n'appaiſe ſon courroux.
Sec & paſſé comme je ſuis,
Et non du tout ſi beau qu'un Ange,
Je fais pourtant ce que je puis,
Je ne ſuis pas un maſle étrange,
Garçon loyal & bon Chrêtien,
J'aime plus que voſtre entretien.
Pourquoy donc, ſexe au teint de roze,
Quand la charité vous impoſe
La loy d'aimer voſtre prochain,
Me pouvez-vous hair ſans cauſe,
Moy qui ne vous fis jamais rien?
Ha! pour mon honneur je voy bien
Qu'il vous faut faire quelque choſe (34).

(34) Ibid. pag. 122.

(55) Ibid. pag. 268.

" This jealous rage, ye fair, give o'er;
" Your charms, I ſwear, I ſtill adore!
" Let but the faireſt try my Love,
" If to her wiſh I fail to prove,
" May future ages, to my ſhame,
" Brand me with an Impoſtor's name.
" 'Tis true, the verge of age I touch,
" Nor can I brag of beauty much:
" Yet I do, Ladies, what I can,
" And who does more, is more than man.
" The fair, I vow, I never baulk,
" And can do ſomething more than talk.
" Why then this cauſeleſs hate to me,
" Who ne'er did aught? Ha! now I ſee
" 'Tis that's my crime (and I repent me);
" I muſt DO ſomething to content ye."

(36) Here is a paſſage of Chapelle's Relation:
L'on auroit dit à voir ainſi
Ces Bacchantes échevelées,
Qu'au moins ce Monſieur d'Aſſoucy
Les auroit toutes violées; i. e.
One wou'd have fancy'd, thus to ſee
Theſe Bacchants with diſhevell'd hair,
This rampant Monſieur d'Aſſouci
Had raviſh'd every woman there;
And yet he had never done any thing to them.

Moreover, he accuſes la Chapelle of having ſtollen this thought from him (35). See the margin (36), and regard not the reflections of ſome cenſorious people.

therein, if he had not amuſed himſelf with making Verſes, if he had not thought it ſufficient to make his court to the principal Deities, and if he had not raiſed the jealouſy of the Muſicians of that country (ll). He pretends that the beauty of his Poetry expoſed him to the indignation of a Poet of Auvergne, who ſet up for a notable fellow at Turin, and affected to criticize and perſecute him (mm). He adds, that having neglected the Favourites, becauſe he impolitickly fancied it was enough for him to make his court to their Royal Highneſſes [E], he expoſed himſelf to the ill offices of ſeveral people; and this did him great injury. He perceived they grew cold towards him, and the worſt was, that having requeſted either to be diſmiſſed or to have ſettled a penſion (nn), he obtained the former to his great regret (oo). I cannot give the ſequel of his adventures, having at hand only the three firſt parts of the Hiſtory which he has written of them. I recollect that about the year 1674 he publiſhed two ſmall volumes which he had compoſed in the priſon of the Chatelet at Paris; he was ſtill confined there at that time, and I am not acquainted with the particulars of his enlargement. There is no need to conſult the Satires of his enemies, to form a very bad opinion of him: what he owns, or relates himſelf, is ſufficient for that purpoſe. I do not know whether at preſent (pp) a Licence could be obtained at Paris for the printing of ſuch a Work as the Relations of our burleſque Poet; for they are ſown thick with profane expreſſions. Note alſo that, among other things, he was accuſed of impiety: yet he boaſts of having taken pen in hand in defence of the Church of Rome [F]. He complains of Monſieur Boileau, who notwithſtanding had ſaid (mm) Ibid. pag. 283.

(ll) D'Aſſouci, Avantures d'Italie, pag. 330, &c.

(nn) Ibid. pag. 338.

(oo) Ibid. pag. 342.

(pp) This was written in October 1699.

They ſay that incontinence being the ſtrongeſt pillar of the Empire of Gallantry, it would be in vain to aſk, in a ſtate of diſgrace, but what have I done? what crime can I be accuſed of? I am not conſcious of any ill attempt; I have kept my ſelf quiet; I have done nothing. This would be a very bad way of juſtifying one's ſelf; for it is principally by quietiſm, or inaction, that one becomes culpable in the eyes of thoſe who govern that Empire. Lazy people are looked on there as very bad ſubjects: idleneſs is the greateſt rebellion that can be committed; it is high treaſon in the firſt degree: the ſins of commiſſion in that country are infinitely more ſlight than the ſins of omiſſion; the latter are never venial, but are faults not to be forgiven. In a political ſtate Tyrants would be ſooner depoſed than Princes who do nothing: but in this other world of which we are ſpeaking, the juſteſt cauſe for depoſing, baniſhing, &c. is that which the French alledged againſt their Kings of the firſt race; and it would be better to commit many violences, than deſerve the epithet which was given to a certain Prince (37). Theſe are the ſcandalous reflections which I adviſe you not to give ear to; have more regard to the reflections which may be made on a Remark I ſhall mention elſewhere (38).

(37) Ludovicus nihil fecit. i. e. Lewis did-nothing." He was the laſt King of France of the 2d Race.

(38) In the Remark [C] of the Article of HENRY III.

(39) Mr. de la Bruyere.

(40) D'Aſſouci, Avantures d'Italie, pag. 332, &c.

[E] He very impolitickly fancied it was enough for him to make his court to their Royal Highneſſes.] What he ſays on this head is very judicious, and equals, not as to the phraſes, but as to the thoughts, any of the moſt ſolid paſſages of our modern Theophraſtus (39). As I had no other view, ſays he (40), than to pleaſe their Royal Highneſſes, becauſe, according to my poor ambition, it ſeemed ſufficient for obtaining the little advantage I was purſuing, to merit their eſteem, inſtead of making my Court to thoſe who might aſſiſt me, and yet more to thoſe who could not hurt me. I only omitted viſiting the Marchioneſs de Lans, and Madam Servien my principal protectreſs; but I alſo neglected all who were in favour, and the Favourite himſelf: a great piece of madneſs indeed, and well deſerving the chaſtiſement I received for it, and which all thoſe muſt expect, who, like me, are ſo audacious as to attempt to ſcale heaven, and enter Paradiſe in ſpite of the Saints: a great piece of madneſs to truſt one's fortune to one's merit with Princes; and ſo much the greater as moſt Princes who think themſelves free (becauſe they command others) ſeeing but very little, and that with the eyes of other people, and ſcarce ever commanding any thing but what they are ordered to command, are generally the ſlaves of their ſlaves, and conſequently the greateſt ſlaves of all mankind: I experienced it in this Court to my coſt, when inſtead of cringing to thoſe in favour, kiſſing my Poets hands and feet, admiring his wit and verſes, and printing them in letters of gold, I, poor Myrmidon, fighting againſt a giant of favour, fought againſt my ſelf, ſince every victory I gained over his pen, was a trophy which I erected to his glory, and a precipice which I dug for my own fortune; I, poor fool, a greater fool than John des Vignes, inſtead of forbearing to make Verſes, or making ſuch as my Curate did, who diſpleaſed no body, would meaſure my pen with a Poet who wore a ſword, and who was as noble as the King, and as valiant as Cæſar .... Princes, who, as I have already ſaid, ſeeing for the moſt part only with others eyes, and conſidering perſons no otherwiſe than as they are beloved by thoſe whom they love. If I did not ſee my ſelf quite forſaken, at leaſt I ſaw my ſelf neglected as much as I had neglected others. The preſents which uſed to come every week, came now but once a month, and among the uſual bounties of thoſe benign conſtellations, obſerving a certain coldneſs which did by no means agree with the hopes I had entertained of obtaining a ſettlement . . . I made &c. (41). A good Courtier does not imitate the Huguenots, who invoke none but God: he imitates the devotees of the Romiſh Communion, who are much more aſſiduous in the worſhip of the Saints, than in that of God. D'Aſſouci conformed his devotions to the ideas of the Proteſtants, and did not find his account in it. Let us ſee a little of the deſcription he has given of his zeal for the Ducheſs Royal. During fourteen months that I lived in that Court, it is incredible what pains I took to obtain a penſion: for I let ſlip no opportunity of making my ſelf neceſſary. Tho' for Church Muſic I am no Orlando de Laſſus, and tho' I had already but too much employment for the ſervice of that Princeſs's chamber, yet having often heard that one cannot go to Paradiſe without the good will of the Saints, in order to render them propitious, I undertook likewiſe to compoſe Muſic for her Chappel. Whether ſhe heard Maſs in her chamber, or at the Church of the Holy Handkerchief, or at any other Church, I followed her every where like a ſhock dog, my lute and my boy Pierrotin were always to be ſeen attending her; by which means I became in a ſhort time the moſt devout perſon in the world. For it muſt not be ſuppoſed that this pious Princeſs, who uſually wept at the altars, would have thought ſhe had ſatisfied her devotion by aſſiſting at a ſingle Maſs; ſhe muſt always hear two at the leaſt, and moſt commonly three, during which I was performing a very long and very devout piece of Muſic, and always on both knees. Judge, Reader, whether I ſhould not be wholly God's; and yet, I aſſure you, to importune him with my prayers was the leaſt of my thoughts. Apollo, who held me every where faſt by the collar, gave me yet leſs reſpit in that holy place; I had my imagination always filled with the idea of ſome fine Motet; and tho' the words, which I muttered between my teeth, were all holy and ſacred, it was not ſo much for the glory of God that I was deſirous of uniting them to my compoſitions, as for the ſatisfaction of that mortal Goddeſs; whom, at that time, wretched I would have preferred before the Deity himſelf (42). See the Margin (43).

(41) Ibid. pag. 337.

(42) Ibid. pag. 168, &c.

(43) My zeal was ſo great towards theſe benign powers, ſays he, pag. 176, that if I had had as much towards God, I doubt not but he would have already rewarded me with Paradiſe.

[F] He boaſts of having taken pen in hand in defence of the Church of Rome.) One of the extravagancies with which he reproaches his enemies, is their accuſing him of irreligion. You have been ſo malicious and fooliſh, ſays he to them (44), as to repreſent him . . . as an impious perſon, whom God has expoſed to your perſecutions only in order to perfect him in the exerciſe of piety; and to make him paſs for a Writer at enmity with holy things, who has in his writings defended

(44) D'Aſſouci, tom. 2. pag. 20.

(qq) D'Aſſouci, Avantures d'Italie, pag. 273, &c.

ſaid nothing but what was very juſt againſt Burleſque [G]. The paſſage wherein he ſpeaks of four mad Poets (qq) is diverting: I ſhall only tranſcribe what concerns the perſon whom he names, and who is an Author in print [H]. He had for his enemies, among others, Cyrano de Bergerac (rr), and Loret. The latter abuſed him on all occaſions

(rr) The Pieces againſt Soutidas, which are to be found in his Works, are againſt D'Aſſouci.

Rome againſt the attacks of the enemy of her glory, and of her altars, and who has employed all his ink, and ſpent all his incenſe, in favour of her holy Miniſters and ſacred Prelates. He ought not to have made a merit of having undertaken ſuch a Work. Had devotion any ſhare in it? Was it not rather to obtain ſome recompence? That is the Pole-ſtar of ſuch Writers as he: they paſs from a profane ſubject to one altogether heavenly, the moment the hopes of gain appear on that ſide (45):

(45) Si doloſi ſpes affulſerit ummi. Perſius, in Prologo. See the conduct of Aretin, above in the Remark [I] of the Article ARETIN (Peter.)

Græculus eſuriens in cœlum, juſſeris, ibit (46).

" All things the hungry Greek exactly knows:
" And bid him go to heav'n, to heav'n he goes."
Dryden.

(46) Juven. Sat. 3. ver. 78.

[G] He complains of Mr. Boileau, who notwithſtanding had ſaid nothing but what was very juſt againſt Burleſque.] D'Aſſouci refutes in the beſt manner he is able (47) theſe words of Boileau,

(47) D'Aſſouci, Avantures d'Italie, pag. 241.

Qu'enfin la Cour deſabuſée
Mepriſa de ces vers l'extravagance aiſée.

" The Court, at length, being undeceived, deſpis'd
" The eaſy nonſenſe of this Poetry."

(48) Ibid. pag. 252.

It is very eaſy, ſays he (48), to affect a fellow who laughs at every thing; but it is very hard to move a coſtive Stoic who laughs at nothing: for which reaſon, whatever is ſaid of Heroic poetry, it is far from being ſo difficult of acceſs as the fine Burleſque, which is the utmoſt effort of the imagination, and the touch-ſtone of wit. Nor is every wit capable of it: for to ſucceed therein it is not ſufficient to have an ordinary ſhare of wit, but a man muſt be endued with a peculiar genius, which is ſo rare, eſpecially in our climate, that excepting two perſons, of whom France will have me to be one, every body knows that whoever has meddled with this kind of Burleſque has only waſted paper . . . . . If I be aſked why this Burleſque which has ſo many excellent parts, and agreeable turns, after having ſo long diverted France, has ceaſed to divert our Court; it is becauſe Scarron has ceaſed to live, and I have ceaſed to write: and if I had a mind to continue my Ovid in a merry humour, the ſame Court, which is to this day diverted with the Verſes I preſent it, would be diverted with it as much as formerly, and my Bookſellers, who have ſo often reprinted that Work, would again publiſh as many more Editions of it (49). A man who ſo frankly declares the high opinion he has conceived of his own poetry, may, if you will, be a witneſs of ſmall credit with regard to the praiſes he beſtows on himſelf; but when he declares that he was very ſenſible of the affront contained in theſe words of Mr. Boileau,

(49) Ibid. pag. 261.

Et juſqu'à d'Aſſoucy tout trouva des Lecteurs;

" And even d'Aſſouci could readers find;"

he ought to paſs for a very ſincere witneſs. " Ah! " dear Reader, if thou didſt but know how this " even d'Aſſouci ſticks to my heart, thou wouldeſt pity " my fate: I am inconſolable for it, and cannot re- " cover from my ſwoon, eſpecially when I reflect that " in prejudice to my Titles, I am in this verſe, which " to me ſeems as deciſive as a Decree of the Court of " Parliament, deprived of all my honours, and that " Charles d'Aſſoucy, of Emperor, as he once was, of " the Burleſque, the firſt of the name, is now become, " if he is to be believed, the vileſt reptile of Parnaſ- " ſus, and the Scullion of the Muſes. What is to be " done, Reader, in this extremity? After the excom- " munication which he has pronounced on this poor " diſgraced Burleſque, who will ever vouchſafe to " read it, or even to look upon it, on pain of his " malediction (50)? "He comforts himſelf with the thought that jealouſy was the occaſion of this thundering cenſure (51): See, dear Reader, what I have gotten by making good burleſque Verſes; for if I had made as bad ones as my Poet (52), he (53) would have ſuffered me to live as well as the Author of Ovid turned buffoon; but it is no new thing to ſee jealous people condemn things which are excellent, and blame what exceeds their capacity. Let us add here the judgment he has made of the moſt ſupremely impertinent of all ſorts of Poetry. It makes one laugh, ſays he (54), ... but it is not ſufficient to meet with that impertinence in its higheſt degree, which is ſo neceſſary in this ſort of verſe; it muſt be alſo accompanied with a certain ſimplicity which the beſt wits cannot comprehend, and which the more a man excells be can the leſs imitate; as clearly appears in the Great Bible of Chriſtmas Carols; for though ſeveral great wits have ſtrove to imitate, in their Carols, thoſe precious Carols of Antiquity, none has found, nor ever will find the ſecret; and the old Carols, being on all occaſions preferred before the new ones, will be always the more honoured and eſteemed in all ages, the more ſilly they are, and more excellently filled with this admirable ſort of impertinence and ſimplicity: for, in fine, is there any man of ſenſe, who knows at what and when to laugh, that does not laugh heartily when he reads theſe Verſes, which I have taken out of a Book which was ſold at an auction for twenty piſtoles, intitled, Les pois pilez? It was Chriſt taking leave of S. Matthew in theſe words:

(50) Ibid. pag. 263.

(51) Ibid. pag. 265.

(52) That is, a Poet of Auvergne, who was at Turin.

(53) That is, Monſieur Boileau.

(54) D'Aſſouci, Avantures d'Italie, pag. 320.

D I A L O G U E.

C. Adieu Matthieu.
M. Adieu, Dieu.
C. Prens ta lance & ton épieu,
Et t'en vas en Galilée.
M. Prendray-je auſſi mon épée?
C. Et quoy donc?
M. Adieu donc.

C. Adieu, Matthew.
M. Adieu, God.
C. Take thy lance and thy javelin,
And go hence to Galilee.
M. Shall I take my ſword too?
C. And why not?
M. Adieu then.

Can any thing be more ſilly or impertinent than to make theſe celeſtial perſons ſpeak thus? Yet, can any thing be more comical, or more natural? And will you not allow that theſe Verſes which would make S. Matthew laugh, and even our Saviour himſelf, if he were ſtill on earth, are better worth than all thoſe indifferent Verſes which are in the world, and have no manner of reliſh?

[H] I ſhall tranſcribe what concerns a mad Poet, . . . who is an Author in print.] " But who can better au- " thorize this authentic madneſs than the poor deceaſed " Ragueneau? Ragueneau, known to all Parnaſſus; " Ragueneau, beloved by all the Poets, and cheriſhed " by all the Players. In a word, this famous Paſtry- " cook Ragueneau, who working inceſſantly with ſix " journey-men in his ſhop, by a continual fire, at a " well-accuſtomed oven, cared not a fig for all the " Paſtry-cooks in Paris; that famous Paſtry-cook Ra- " gueneau, who made it rain nothing but ſavoury pies " on Parnaſſus. That nurſing-father of the Muſes, " after having well fed thoſe ungrateful girls, alas! " what is become of him? It is you, Beïs, whom I " aſk this queſtion, and who inſpired him with the " madneſs of making verſes; you, Beïs, who have " deprived us of the beſt Paſtry-cook in Paris, to make " of him the worſt Poet in the Univerſe. It is you, " barbarous man, who muſt one day anſwer in the " valley of Jehoſaphat, not only for all the ink and " paper which he has waſted in this lower world, but " alſo for all the pies which (without including thoſe " Parnaſſus has cheated him of) you have devoured " for him at the oven's mouth. Yes, Beïs, you muſt " one day account for that harmleſs wretch: for, in " fine, he was the beſt natured man in the world; " he caſions in his Gazette burleſque, and was ſo ready at ſpreading diſadvantageous news of d'Aſſouci [I], that he ſeveral times publiſhed an account of his death, and always falſely.

" he truſted all Parnaſſus, and when one had no mo" ney, he was over paid, was too well ſatisfied, and " contented, if one vouchſafed to applaud his Works
" were it only by the wink of an eye. I remember " that for having only had the patience to hear one
" of his Pindaric Odes, he gave me above three " months credit, and never aſked me for a farthing . .
(55) Ibid. pag. 283, &c. " . . (55). Being paid by no body, and his Credi" tors reſolving to be paid, poor Ragueneau remain" ed quite buried under the ruins of his oven. It was " on a day moſt inauſpicious for the Poets, who at " peep of day were met in the ſtreet wiping their " mouths, after they had taken their laſt breakfaſt
" with him, that a file of hungry Bailiffs, under the " very beard of Apollo, yet dropping with the fat of " ſo many ſavoury pies, had the boldneſs to take his
" dear and well beloved Ragueneau by the collar,
" and conduct him, without any reſpect either to his " Verſes, or his Muſes, into a priſon, whence (after
" a year's captivity) getting diſcharged in order to " preſent the public with his excellent works, which
" (in imitation of Theophile) he had compoſed
" there, but finding no Poet in Paris who would " maintain him in his turn, or even hear one
" of his verſes, nor any Paſtry-cook who would
" truſt him with ſo much as a ſingle pye on
" the credit of one of his Sonnets; curſing the age,
" and deteſting the ignorance of the times, he left the " town with his wife and children, himſelf making
" the fifth, reckoning a little aſs loaded with Epi-
" grams, to go ſeek his fortune in Languedoc, where " having met with a company of Players who wanted
" a man to act a Swiſs, he entred himſelf among " them as an Underſtrapper; but tho' his part never
" conſiſted of above four verſes at moſt, he performed
" it ſo well, that before he had followed the trade a
" year, he acquired the reputation of the worſt Actor
" in the world; ſo that the Players, not knowing
" what to employ him in, would have made him their
" candle-ſnuffer; but he would not accept that offer,
" judging it repugnant to the honour and dignity of a " Poet. Afterwards, not being able to reſiſt the force
" of his deſtiny, I ſaw him ſnuff the candles very " dextrouſly in the ſervice of another company: be-
" hold the fate of mad-men when they turn Poets,
" and the fate of Poets when they become mad-
(56) Ibid. pag. 283, &c. " men (56)!"

[I] Loret . . . was . . . . ready at publiſhing diſadvantageous news of d'Aſſouci.] The moment I was ar-
" reſted, my enemies . . . . immediately ſent to Paris
" the news of my death, which being by no means
" diſagreeable to the late Loret, without waiting the " confirmation, inſpired him with thoſe fine Verſes
" which he compoſed in great haſte to my praiſe,
" and which have ſince, to his confuſion, galloped a" bout in his Gazette. This ſcurvy Poet is now gone
" to lie in the other world, and for my part I am ſtill (57) D'Aſſouci, tom. 2. pag. 155. " in this (57)." Hereto let us add the following paſſage: Theſe are the ſame Blockheads who, ſerving for eccho's to hearſay, have ſo often killed me in their Gazettes, and who after they had drowned me at Ferrara and at Venice, before I had ſet a foot there, have taken me out of the ſea and all its rivers, to come and fry me at Montpellier, and at length, having thrown me out of the frying-pan into the fire, bowelled me, ſtewed me, and minced me as ſmall as meat for a pye, have reſtored me to my firſt condition to fricaſſy me over again at Avignon, from whence, of their great favour, they have once more removed me without any hurt or ſolution of continuity, to confine me for the reſt of my days in the priſons of the Inquiſition, from whence, notwithſtanding, I am come forth as brilliant and as ſound as ever I was born, without loſing a hair of my head by time in all the travels which theſe fools have made me to take (58). He took the utmoſt revenge he was able on Loret, and accuſed him of a notorious fraud. Theſe are his words: (58) Ibid. pag. 23, &c.

" What had I done to this Billingſgate Rimer, ſo ſau-
" cily to inſult the honour of my Muſes, more intel" ligent and chaſte than his? Though his trade of " cheating at Play might well excuſe him from mak" ing ſuch ſorry verſes, did I call him Sharper? did
" I call him Billingſgate Poet? did I not always call " him Loret? When I plaid againſt him at the late
" Marſhall de Chombert's, did he not rob me of money
" enough by his falſe cards, without robbing me be-
" ſides of my honour and fortune by his falſe rimes?
" could my Ovid in a merry humour have vexed him to " that degree that he muſt revenge himſelf on my Ver-
" ſes to the prejudice of my reputation? Yet this bar-
" barous Rimer has cruelly revenged himſelf; ſeeing it is
" on this baſis that the fooliſh mob, yet more barbarous
" than he, have ſince founded their calumnies with " which they perſecute me thro' the whole earth, as " well as ſo many honeſt people, who would believe,
" till the day of judgment, that I had been broiled
" by the Savages of Montpellier, if my Writings, at
" leaſt as durable as his, did not verify the contrary.
" Yes, this Scoundrel has cruelly revenged himſelf;
" ſince it is he who has furniſhed all my enviers with
" a pretext to ſlander me, who has ruined my fortune,
" and deſtroyed my hopes, made my beſt friend my " perſecutor, and who, in a word, has expoſed me to " ſo many perils and mortal diſgraces. Good God!
" can one ſee ſuch aſſaſſinations without horror? and " can France ſuffer ſuch aſſaſſins without ſhame (59)?" (59) D'Aſſouci, Avantures d'Italie, pag. 87, &c.

I think they alſo gave out that he had been hanged in effigie; for he complains that they repreſented him as a man whoſe picture had ſerved for a Scare-crow in a Hemp-field, and a public terror to the wicked; but he maintains that this picture was never ſeen but at the Bookſellers ſhops in the Hall, that his portraiture may yet be ſeen ſhining in the front of all his Works, and that the moſt curious Painters ſeek after it at this day as an Original worthy their copying (60). I do not believe they do it in order to have a fine face to draw by; for d'Aſſouci's is far from being handſome. I have not found in the Relation of Monſr. Bachaumont and la Chapelle, that they make him the Therſites of our age (61). He complains of this (62), and oppoſes to ſo injurious an affront the Verſes which were made on his picture: (60) D'Aſſouci, tom. 2. pag. 21. (61) Ibid. pag. 259. (62) Ibid. pag. 257.

On vous avertit que voicy
Le portrait du grand d'Aſſoucy,
Cette merveille de noſtre âge.
Contemplez-le donc bien; & ſi
A peu près aux traits du viſage
Vous croyez qu'un tel perſonnage
Ne peut qu'avoir bien réüſſi,
Achetez viſte ſon Ouvrage,
Et vous verrez qu'il eſt ainſi. CHAPELLE.

" You are inform'd that here you ſee
" The Portrait of great D'Aſſouci;
" View him, and if his Looks proclaim
" He muſt have gain'd immortal fame,
" Purchaſe his Work, and you will ſee
" That it is juſt as I tell ye."

DATI (CARLO) Profeſſor of polite Learning at Florence his native Country, became very famous, as well on account of his Works, as of the Elogies which a great number of Writers have beſtowed on him [A]. He was very courteous and obliging to all

[A] He became very famous, as well by his Works, as by the Elogies which a great number of Writers have beſtowed on him.] You will find in the 3d Volume of Signor Leti's Italia regnante all the Commentary which this Text requires: I ſhall tranſcribe but a ſmall part of it. Signor Leti (1) obſerves that the Book intitled Lettera di Timauro Antiate à Filaleti, della vera ſtoria della cicloide, e della famoſiſſima eſperienza dell' argento vivo, is a Compoſition of Carlo Dati: he refers us to the 149th page of Placcius de Scriptis & Scriptoribus Anonymis atque Pſeudonymis. This reference is a good one; for we find in the page quoted that the pretended all the learned travellers who paſſed through the city of Florence; and ſeveral of them have teſtified their gratitude in their Writings (a). He was a Member of the Academy della Cruſca, and in that quality took the ſurname of Smarrito. He wrote a Panegyric on Lewis XIV in Italian, and publiſhed it at Florence in the year 1669 (b). The French Tranſlation which another perſon made of it was printed at Rome the year following. He had already publiſhed ſome Italian Poems in praiſe of the ſame Prince (c). You may thereby know in what time he flouriſhed.

(1) Leti, Italia regnante, Parte 3. pag. 363, 364.

(a) See Leti's Italia regnante, Parte 3. p. 169, &c. Konig refers us to page 170 of this Work of Signor Leti, wherein he commits two faults; in not ſetting down the Volume, and in quoting the page wrong.

(b) Leti, Italia regnante, Parte 3. pag. 367.

(c) Ibid. pag. 363, 367.

pretended Timauro Antiate is Carlo Dati, and that this appears manifeſtly from the 26th page of the Letter. We alſo find there that this Piece was printed at Florence in the year 1663, and that the Author proves two things; one, that Father Merſenne is not the inventor of the Cycloïd, as has been aſſerted in the Hiſtory of that curve; but that the glory of this invention belongs to Galilei: the other, that Torricellius is not guilty of the Plagiariſm imputed to him, with regard to the Hypotheſis which explains the ſuſpenſion of the quickſilver by the preſſure of the air. He was the firſt Author of that Hypotheſis, if we believe Carlo Dati. It is very probable that Monconys confounds things when he ſays: Signor Carlo Dati gave me his printed Letter to prove that Torricellius had firſt found out the Cycloid (2). The principal Work to which our Dati applied himſelf was that della Pittura antica. He publiſhed an Eſſay or Part of it in the year 1667. I ſhall cite it below (3). The elogy which Chimentelli has given this Writer is the only one which I ſhall copy among ſeveral others quoted by Signor Leti. Nec ſecus inter rariſſimos numerandus, qui Librum utendum permiſit, Clariſſimus & amiciſſimus D. Carolus Datus, noſtræ flos illibatus Urbis, ſuadæque Etruſcæ medulla, quam omni literarum paratu quotidie auget, atque illuſtrat. Parum enim mereri putat, qui per ſe tam egregiè meretur, niſi ad benè merendum de Republica Literaria alios omni ope, & conſilio adjuvet. Nihil ut minus ſuum habeat, quam quod in uſum & gloriam eruditionis impendi poſſit; penè ipſum ſe ſibi ſubtrahens, nedum temporis, aut operæ parcus (4). i. e. "Nor is he to "be mentioned without the higheſt commendation, "who lent me the Book, the learned and obliging "Carlo Dati; the unſullied flower of our city, and "the marrow of Tuſcan eloquence, which he daily "improves and adorns with new acquiſitions from "every part of learning. For he who deſerves ſo extreamly well on his own account, thinks his merit "but ſmall, unleſs he aſſiſts others alſo with his whole "power and counſel to deſerve well of the Republic "of Learning. So that he accounts nothing leſs his "own, than what may be parted with for the advantage "and glory of learning; almoſt wholly neglectful of "himſelf, ſparing neither time nor labour."

(2) Monconys, Voyages, Part. 2. pag. 483. at the year 1664.

(3) In the Remark [L] of the Article ZEUXIS.

(4) Chimentelli-us, de Honore Bi-ſellij, pag. 86. apud Leti, Italia regnante, tom. 3. pag. 373.

☞DAVENANT, or D'AVENANT (WILLIAM), an eminent Poet in the ſeventeenth Century, was born in the Pariſh of St. Martin in the City of Oxford about the latter end of February $160\frac{5}{6}$, and baptized March the 3d following. His father, John Davenant, was a Vintner, and kept a Tavern, in Mr. Wood's time (a) known by the name of the Crown, and was Mayor of that City in the year 1621; and was remarkably of a very grave melancholic diſpoſition, ſo that he was ſcarce ever ſeen to laugh (b). His mother was a woman of great beauty and wit (c). Our Author was educated in Grammar under Mr. Edward Sylveſter (d), who taught a private ſchool in All-Saints Pariſh in Oxford (e), and in Academical Learning in Lincoln College under the tuition of Mr. Daniel Hough, Fellow of that College, about the year 1620 or 1621 (f). He made ſome progreſs in Logic and Natural Philoſophy (g); but his genius, which was always oppoſite to thoſe ſtudies, "led him into the pleaſant paths of Poetry, ſo that "though he wanted much of Univerſity Learning, yet he made as high and noble "flights in the Poetical Faculty, as fancy could advance without it (h)." Having made but a ſhort ſtay in the College, he entered into the ſervice of Frances, the firſt Ducheſs of Richmond, and afterwards of Fulke Grevil, Lord Brooke, who having an excellent taſte for Poetry, was greatly charmed with him (i). After his death in the year 1628 he applied himſelf to the writing of Poetry and Plays [A] with ſuch ſucceſs, that he procured himſelf the friendſhip of Mr. Endymion Porter, and Henry Jermyn, afterwards Earl of

(a) Wood, Hiſt. & Antiquitat. Univerſit. Oxon. lib. 2. pag. 168. edit. Oxon. 1674 in fol.

(b) Idem, ibid.

(c) Idem, Athen. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 411. 2d edit. London 1721.

(d) Idem, ibid.

(e) Idem, col. 40 and 505.

(f) Idem, col. 411.

(g) Idem, Hiſt. & Antiq. pag. 168.

(h) Idem, ibid. and Athen. Oxon. col. 411.

(i) Idem, Athen. Oxon. col. 411.

[A] Applied himſelf to the writing of Plays.] We ſhall give a catalogue of all his Dramatic Writings. I. Albovine King of the Lombards his Tragedy. London 1629 in 4to; dedicated to the Duke of Somerſet. This Play is recommended by eight copies of Verſes (1). II. Juſt Italian; a Tragi-Comedy. London 1630 in 4to. (2), and dedicated to the Earl of Dorſet, and commended by the Verſes of his Friends, Mr. William Hopkins and Mr. Thomas Carew (3). III. Cruel Brother; a Tragedy. London 1630 in 4to. (4). Dedicated to the Lord High Treaſurer Weſton. IV. Cælum Britannicum; a Maſque at Whitehall, the 18*th Feb.* 1633. Mr. Wood tells us (5), that "this is attributed "to Davenant, but Thomas Carew and Inigo Jones "drew it up;" and it is omitted by Mr. Langbaine. V. Triumphs of Prince D'Amour; a Maſque preſented by his Highneſs at his Palace in the Middle-Temple the 24*th of February* 1635. London 1635 in 4to. This Maſque, at the requeſt of the Honourable Society of the Middle-Temple, was invented and written by our Author in three days; and was preſented by the Members thereof as an entertainment to the Prince Elector. The muſic of the Songs and Symphonies was compoſed by Mr. Henry and Mr. William Lawes, his Majeſty's Servants (6). VI. Platonick Lovers; a Tragi-Comedy. London 1636 &c. (7). VII. The Wits; a Comedy. London 1636 &c. (8). It is dedicated to the chiefly beloved of all, that ingenious and noble Endymion Porter, of his Majeſty's Bed-Chamber. It was often acted with applauſe (9). VIII. Britannia Triumphans: A Maſque preſented at Whitehall by the King's Majeſty and his Lords on Sunday after Twelfth Night, an. 1637. London 1637 in 4to. In this Maſque he was aſſiſted by Inigo Jones, Surveyor of his Majeſty's Works (10). IX. Temple of Love; preſented by the Queen's Majeſty, and her Ladies at Whitehall. "This Maſque for the new-"neſs of the invention, variety of ſcenes, apparitions, "and richneſs of habits, was generally approved to "be one of the moſt magnificent, that hath been done "in England (11)." X. Salmacida Spolia: A Maſque preſented to the King and Queen at Whitehall the 21*ſt Jan.* 1639. London 1639 in 4to. The ſubject was ſet down by our Author and Inigo Jones; the invention, ornament, ſcenes, &c. by the latter; and what was ſpoken or ſung was written by Davenant then her Majeſty's Servant; and the Muſic compoſed by Lewis Richard, Maſter of her Majeſty's Muſic (12). XI. Unfortunate Lovers; a Tragedy. London 1643, and 1649 in 4to. XII. Love and Honour; a Tragi-Comedy. London 1649 in 4to. It was ſeveral times acted with good applauſe (13). XIII. The firſt day's entertainment at Rutland-Houſe, by Declamations and Muſick, after the manner of the Antients. London 1657 in 8vo. It was publiſhed in September 1656 (14). This ſubject of the former of thoſe declamations is concerning public entertainment by moral repreſentations,

(1) Account of the Engliſh Dramatick Poets. By Gerard Langbaine, pag. 107. edit. London 1691. Wood, Athen. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 413. 2d edit. London 1721.

(2) Wood, ibid.

(3) Langbaine, pag. 108.

(4) Wood, ubi ſupra.

(5) Ubi ſupra.

(6) Langbaine, pag. 111.

(7) Wood, ubi ſupra.

(8) Idem, ibid.

(9) Langbaine, pag. 111.

(10) Wood, ubi ſupra.

(11) See Langbaine, pag. 111.

(12) Wood, col. 413.

(13) Idem, and Langbaine, pag. 109.

(14) Wood, col. 413.

of St. Albans, and all the wits of that time, and particularly of Sir John Suckling, who mentions him in his Seſſion of Poets [B]. Upon the death of Ben Johnſon in 1637 (k) he was created Poet Laureat (l). In May 1641, being accuſed with ſeveral other perſons of an attempt to engage the Army againſt the Parliament, he abſconded, but upon the iſſuing out of a Proclamation againſt him and his confederates, he was apprehended at Feverſham in Kent, and committed to the cuſtody of the Serjeant at Arms. However being bailed in July following, he retired to France; but in his way thither was ſeized by the Mayor of Canterbury, and ſtrictly examined; upon which Sir John Mennes has a pleaſant Poem. After he had ſpent ſome time in France he returned, and was entertained by William Marquis of Newcaſtle, and by him made Lieutenant General of his Ordnance. In Sept. 1643 (m) he received the honour of Knighthood from his Majeſty near Glouceſter, during the ſiege of that city. Upon the declining of the King's cauſe he retired again into France, and changed his Religion for that of Rome. About 1646 he was ſent over to England by the Queen to perſuade his Majeſty to grant the conceſſions inſiſted on by the Parliament with regard to the Church [C]; but returning without (k) He died Auguſt the 16th that year.

(l) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 412.

(m) See Thomas Walkley's New Catalogue of the Dukes, Marqueſſes, Earls, Viſcounts, Barons of England, &c. alſo Baronets, Knights, &c. London 1658 in 8vo, pag. 163.

tions, the diſputants being Diogenes the Cynic, and Ariſtophanes the Poet. The latter diſpute is between a Pariſian and a Londoner, who declaim concerning the pre-eminence of Paris and London. The vocal and inſtrumental muſic was compoſed by Dr. Charles Coleman, Capt. Henry Cook, Mr. Henry Lawes, and Mr. George Hudſon (15). XIV. Play-Houſe to be let; containing the Hiſtory of Sir Francis Drake, and the cruelty of the Spaniards at Perue. Mr. Wood (16) ſtiles this a Comedy; but Mr. Langbaine tells us (17), that he does not know under what ſpecies to place this Play, "it conſiſting of ſeveral Pieces of different kinds "handſomely tacked together, ſeveral of which the "Author wrote in the times of Oliver, and were "acted ſeparately by ſtealth; as the Hiſtory of Sir "Francis Drake expreſſed by inſtrumental and vocal "Muſic, and by art of perſpective in Scenes, &c. "The cruelty of the Spaniards in Peru. Theſe two "Pieces were firſt printed in 4to. They make the "third and fourth acts of this Play. The ſecond act "conſiſts of a French Farce, tranſlated from Mo-"liere's Sganarelle, ou le Cocu imaginaire, and pur-"poſely by our Author put into a ſort of jargon com-"mon to Frenchmen newly come over. The fifth "act conſiſts of Tragedie traveſtie, or the actions of "Cæſar, Anthony, and Cleopatra in Verſe burleſque." XV. News from Plymouth; a Comedy. XVI. Law againſt Lovers; a Comedy, according to Mr. Wood; or a Tragi-Comedy, according to Mr. Langbaine (18), who tells us, that it is formed from two Plays written by Shakeſpeare, viz. Meaſure for Meaſure, and Much Ado about Nothing; and that "tho' not only the cha-"racters, but the language of the whole Play almoſt, "borrowed from Shakeſpeare, yet where the lan-"guage is rough or obſolete, our Author has taken "care to poliſh it." XVII. The Diſtreſſes, a Tragi-Comedy. XVIII. The Siege; a Comedy or Tragi-Comedy (19). XIX. Fair Favourite; a Tragi-Comedy. XX. The Siege of Rhodes; a Tragi-Comedy in two parts. London 1663 in 4to (20). Mr. Langbaine obſerves (21), that theſe Plays were in the times of the Civil War acted in ſtilo recitativo, and printed in quarto, but afterwards enlarged by the Author, and acted with applauſe at the Duke of York's Theatre in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields. XXI. Man's the Maſter; a Comedy. London 1669 in 4to. XXII. He aſſiſted Mr. Dryden likewiſe in the Tempeſt, or the Enchanted Iſland; printed at London 1676 in 4to. This Play is altered from Shakeſpeare's Tempeſt. Mr. Dryden in the Preface to it dated December the 1ſt, 1669, tells us, that "Sir William Davenant, as he was a man "of quick and piercing imagination, ſoon found that "ſomewhat might be added to the deſign of Shake-"ſpear, of which neither Fletcher (22) nor Suckling (23) "had ever thought. And therefore to put the laſt "hand to it, he deſigned the counterpart to Shake-"ſpear's plot, namely, that of a man, who had ne-"ver ſeen a woman; that by this means thoſe two "characters of innocence and love might the more "illuſtrate and commend each other. This excellent "contrivance he was pleaſed to communicate to me, "and to deſire my aſſiſtance in it. I confeſs, that "from the very firſt moment it ſo pleaſed me, that "I never writ any thing with more delight. I "might likewiſe do him that juſtice to acknowledge, "that my writing received daily his amendments; "and that is the reaſon why it is not ſo faulty, as the "reſt which I have done without the help or correc-"tion of ſo judicious a friend. The comical parts "of the Sailors were alſo of his invention, and for "the moſt part his writing, as you will eaſily diſcover "by the Stile."

(15) Langbaine, pag. 108.

(16) Col. 413.

(17) Pag. 109.

(18) Pag. 108.

(19) Wood, ubi ſupra, and Langbaine, pag. 110.

(20) Wood, col. 414.

(21) Pag. 110.

(22) In his Sea-Voyage, which Mr. Wood, col. 414 erroneouſly ſuppoſes to be written by Shakeſpear.

(23) In his Goblins.

[B] Sir John Suckling, who mentions him in his Seſſion of Poets.] He has the following lines relating to him (24).

William Davenant aſham'd of a fooliſh miſchance,
That he had got lately travelling in France,
Modeſtly hoped the handſomneſs of's Muſe
Might any deformity about him excuſe.

(24) Fragmenta aurea. A Collection of all the incomparable Pieces written by Sir John Suckling &c. pag. 8. London 1648.

And afterwards;

Surely the company would have been content,
If they could have found any preſident;
But in all their Records either in Verſe or Proſe,
There was not one Laureat without a Noſe (25).

(25) See Wood, col. 412.

[C] About 1646 he was ſent over to England by the Queen to perſuade his Majeſty to grant the Conceſſions inſiſted on by the Parliament with regard to the Church.] The Earl of Clarendon gives us an account of this (26), and tells us that the French Embaſſador having by an Expreſs informed Cardinal Mazarine, that the King was too reſerved in giving the Parliament ſatisfaction, and therefore wiſhed that ſome perſon might be ſent over, who was like to have ſo much credit with his Majeſty as to perſuade him to what was neceſſary for his ſervice; the Queen, who was never adviſed by thoſe, who either underſtood or valued her true intereſt, conſulted with thoſe about her, and ſent Sir William D'Avenant, an honeſt man and a witty, but in all reſpects inferior to ſuch a truſt, with a Letter of Credit to the King, (who knew the perſon well enough under another character than was like to give him much credit in the argument, in which he was intruſted) although her Majeſty had likewiſe other ways declared her opinion to his Majeſty, that he ſhould part with the Church for his peace and ſecurity. Sir Will. D'Avenant had by the countenance of the French Embaſſador eaſy admiſſion to the King, who heard him patiently all he had to ſay, and anſwered him in that manner, that made it evident he was not pleaſed with the advice. When he found his Majeſty unſatisfied, and that he was not like to conſent to what was ſo earneſtly deſired by them, by whoſe advice he was ſent, who undervalued all thoſe ſcruples of conſcience, which his Majeſty himſelf was ſtrongly poſſeſſed with, he took upon himſelf the confidence to offer ſome reaſons to the King, to induce him to yield to what was propoſed; and among other things ſaid, "It was the advice and opinion "of all his friends." His Majeſty aſking, "What "friends?" and he anſwering, that it was the opinion of the Lord Jermyn; the King ſaid, that "the Lord "Jermyn did not underſtand any thing of the Church." Sir William ſaid, "the Lord Colepepper was of the "ſame mind." The King ſaid, "Colepepper had "no Religion;" and aſked, "Whether the Chancel-"lor of the Exchequer was of that mind." To which he anſwered, "He did not know; for that he was not "there, and had deſerted the Prince;" and thereupon ſaid ſomewhat from the Queen of the diſpleaſure ſhe had out ſucceſs to Paris, where Charles Prince of Wales then was, began to write his Poem intitled Gondibert [D]. He afterwards formed a deſign for carrying over a conſiderable number of Artificers, eſpecially Weavers, from France to Virginia, by the encouragement of Henrietta Maria, the Queen-mother of England, who obtained leave for him of the King of France. This ſcheme he effected ſo far, that he and his company had had conceived againſt the Chancellor; to which the King ſaid, "The Chancellor was an honeſt man, and "would never deſert him nor the Prince, nor the "Church; and that he was ſorry he was not with his ſon, "but that his wife was miſtaken." D'Avenant then offering ſome reaſons of his own, in which he mentioned the Church ſlightingly, as if it were not of importance enough to weigh down the benefit that would attend the conceſſion; his Majeſty was tranſported with ſo much indignation, that he gave him a ſharper reprehenſion than was uſual for him to give any other man, and forbid him to preſume to come again into his preſence. Whereupon, ſays Lord Clarendon (27), the poor man, who had in truth very good affections, was exceedingly dejected and afflicted, and returned into France, to give an account of his ill ſucceſs to thoſe, who ſent him.

(26) Hiſtory of the Rebellion, B. 10. pag. 495. edit. Oxon. 1732, in fol.

(27) Ibid.

[D] His Poem intitled, Gondibert.] The firſt two Books were finiſhed before his voyage to America, and the third Book was written during his impriſonment in Cowes-Caſtle in the Iſle of Wight in the year 1650 (28). He publiſhed at Paris 1650 in 12mo a Diſcourſe upon this Poem by way of Preface to it in a Letter to Mr. Thomas Hobbes, dated from the Louvre at Paris January 2d, 1650, with the Anſwer of Mr. Hobbes, dated at Paris January 10th the ſame year. Mr. Waller and Mr. Cowley wrote commendatory Verſes on the firſt two Books of this Poem. The three firſt Books of it were printed under the following title; Gondibert, an Heroic Poem, written by Sir William D'Avenant. London 1651 in 4to and 12mo. The ſeventh and laſt Canto of the third Book was printed at London in 8vo 1685 (29). Mr. Hobbes in his Letter abovementioned affirms (30), that he never yet ſaw a Poem, that had ſo much ſhape of art, health of morality, and vigour and beauty of expreſſion as this of our Author. But that Gentleman obſerves in his Letter to the Honourable Edward Howard on his intended Impreſſion of his Poem of the Britiſh Princes, dated at Chatſworth Novemb. 6th, 1668, that his "judgment in Poetry hath been "once already cenſured by very good Wits for com-"mending Gondibert. But yet they have not, I "think, continues he, diſabled my teſtimony. For "what authority is there in wit? A Jeſter may have "it; a man in drink may have it, and be fluent over "night, and wiſe and dry in the morning. What is "it? Or who can tell whether it be better to have it, "or be without it, eſpecially if it be a pointed wit? "I will take my liberty to praiſe what I like, as well "as they do to reprehend what they do not like." Mr. Langbaine tells us (31), that it was deſigned by him to be an imitation of an Engliſh Drama, it being to be divided into five Books, as the other is into five Acts; the Canto's to be the parallel of the Scenes, with this difference, that this is delivered narratively, the other dialogue-wiſe. The honourable Edward Howard Eſq; (32) tells us, that in this Poem "there are "many remote and excellent thoughts, with apt and "perſpicuous expreſſions, the eſſential dignities of the "Muſes, whoſe chiefeſt beauties flow from the ornaments of words, and delightful variety of imagination, from which choice productions of nature the "Muſes are moſt deſirous to adopt their children, and "in no ſmall degree are juſtly acknowledged to the "honour of his pen. Notwithſtanding which his "Heroic Poem of Gondibert (coming into the world "in a capricious time of cenſure) perhaps did not "meet with a deſerved reception, though the ſevereſt "judges, I doubt not, are forced to grant, that there "is in that work more to be praiſed than pardoned." Mr. Thomas Rymer (33) obſerves, that our Author's wit is well known, and that in the Preface to this Poem there appear ſome ſtrokes of an extraordinary judgment; that he is for unbeaten tracks, and new ways of thinking; but that certainly in his untried ſeas he is no great diſcoverer. One deſign of the Epic Poets before him, was to adorn their own country, there finding their heroes and patterns of virtue, whoſe example, as they thought, would have the greateſt influence and power over poſterity. "But this Poet, ſays Mr. Ry-"mer, ſteers a different courſe. His Heroes are all "foreigners: he cultivates a country, that is nothing "akin to him; it is Lombardy that reaps the honour "of all. Other Poets chooſe ſome action or heroe ſo "illuſtrious, that the name of the Poem prepared "the reader, and made way for its reception. But "in this Poem, none can divine what great action "he intended to celebrate; nor is the reader ob-"liged to know whether the Heroe be Turk or Chri-"ſtian. Nor do the firſt lines give any light or pro-"ſpect into his deſign. Methinks tho' his Religion "could not diſpenſe with an Invocation, he needed "not have ſcrupled at the propoſition. Yet he rather "chooſes to enter in at the top of the houſe, becauſe "the mortals of mean and ſatisfied minds go in at "the door. And I believe, the reader is not well "pleaſed to find his Poem begin with the Praiſes of "Aribert, when the title has promiſed a Gondibert. "But before he falls on any other buſineſs, he preſents "the reader with a deſcription of each particular He-"roe, not truſting their actions to ſpeak for them, as "former Poets have done. Their practice was fine "and artificial, his (he tells us) is a new way. Many "of his characters have but little of the heroick in "them; Dalga is a jilt, proper only for Comedy; "Birtha for a Paſtoral; and Aſtragon, in the manner "here deſcribed, yields no very great ornament to "an Heroic Poem: nor are his battles leſs liable to "cenſure, than theſe of Homer. He dares not, as "other Heroic Poets, heighten the action, by making "Heaven and Hell intereſſed, for fear of offending "againſt probability; and yet he tells of

(28) This appears from a marginal note upon the title of the third Book, pag. 237. edit. London 1651 in 4to.

(29) Wood, col. 413.

(30) Pag. 86.

(31) Pag. 112.

(32) Preface to his Britiſh Princes, an Heroick Poem, edit. London 1669, in 8vo.

(33) Preface to his Tranſlation of Rapin's Reflexions on Ariſtotle's Treatiſe of Poetry.

"....Threads by patient Parcæ ſlowly ſpun.

"And for being dead, his phraſe is,

"Heaven call'd him where peacefully he rules a Star.

"And the Emerald he gives to Birtha has a ſtronger "tang of the old woman, and is a greater improbabili-"ty, than all the enchantments in Taſſo. A juſt medium "reconciles the fartheſt extreams, and one preparation "may give credit to the moſt unlikely fiction. In "Marino, Adonis is preſented with a diamond ring, "where indeed the ſtone is much-what of the ſame "nature; but this preſent is made by Venus; and "from a Goddeſs could not be expected a gift of ordi-"nary virtue." Mr. Rymer then remarks, that although a Poet is obliged to know all arts and ſciences, yet he ought diſcreetly to manage this knowledge. He muſt have judgment to ſelect what is noble or beautiful and proper for his occaſion. He muſt by a particular Chymiſtry extract the eſſence of things, without ſoiling his wit with the groſs and trumpery. But ſome Poets labour to appear ſkilful with that wretched affectation; they dote on the very terms and jargon; expoſing themſelves rather to be laught at by the Apprentices, than to be admired by Philoſophers. But whether D'Avenant be one of thoſe, I leave others to examine. The ſame Critic afterwards tells us, that the ſort of Verſe, of which Sir William makes choice, might contribute much to the vitiating of his ſtyle: for thereby he obliges himſelf to ſtretch every period to the end of four lines. Thus the ſenſe is broken perpetually with parentheſes, the words jumbled in confuſion, and a darkneſs ſpread over all; ſo that the ſenſe is either not diſcerned, or found not ſufficient for one juſt verſe, which is ſprinkled on the whole Tetraſtich. In the Italian and Spaniſh where all the rhymes are diſſyllable, and the percuſſion ſtronger, this kind of verſe may be neceſſary; and yet to temper that grave march, they repeat the ſame rhyme over again, and then they cloſe the ſtanza with a couplet, farther to ſweeten had ſailed into the main Ocean, when being ſeized by ſome of the Parliament's Ships, he was carried priſoner, firſt to the Iſle of Wight in 1650 [E], and afterwards to the Tower of London, in order to be tried for his life by the High Court of Juſtice the year following; but by the mediation of Milton and others he had his liberty allowed him as a priſoner at large [F]. At that time Tragedies and Comedies being prohibited, "he "contrived a way to ſet up an Italian Opera to be performed by Declamations and "Muſic; and that they might be performed with all decency, ſeemlineſs, and without "rudeneſs and profaneneſs, John Maynard Serjeant at Law, and ſeveral ſufficient Citi-"zens were engagers (o)." This Italian Opera began in Rutland-Houſe in Charter-Houſe-Yard, May the 23d 1656, and was afterwards removed to the Cock-pit in Drury-Lane, and was much frequented for many years. So that having laid the foundation of the Engliſh Stage by this Muſical Drama, after the Reſtoration he revived and improved it by painted ſcenes (p) [G], and erected a new Company of Actors under the Patronage of James Duke of York, who acted ſeveral years at the Tennis-Court in Little Lincoln's-Inn-Fields. In 1648 there had been printed his Madagaſcar with other Poems. The ſecond Edition; London, in 24mo. To which are prefixed commendatory verſes by Endymion Porter, Sir John Suckling, Thomas Carew, and William Habington. And his Works were publiſhed together in fol. in 1673. He died at his houſe in Little Lincoln's-Inn-Fields April the 7th 1668, aged ſixty three, and was interred two days after in ſweeten the ſeverity. But in French and Engliſh, where we rhime generally with only one ſyllable, the ſtanza is not allowed, much leſs the alternate rhyme in long Verſe; for the ſound of the monoſyllable rhyme is either loſt before we come to its correſpondent, or we are in pain by the ſo long expectation and ſuſpence. "This alternate rhyme, and the down-"right morality throughout whole Canto's together, "ſays Rymer, ſhew D'Avenant better acquainted with "the Quatrains of Pybrach, which he ſpeaks of, than "with any true models of Epic Poeſie. After all, D'A-"venant is ſaid to have a particular talent for the Man-"ners; his thoughts are great; and there appears "ſomething roughly noble throughout this Fragment, "which had he been pleaſed to finiſh it, would doubt-"leſs not have been left ſo open to the attack of cri-"ticks." Mr. Thomas Blackwell, Profeſſor of Greek in the Univerſity of Aberdeen, has the following paſſage with regard to this Poem (*) ; It was indeed a very extraordinary project of our ingenious countryman, to write an Epic Poem, without making fables, or allowing the ſmalleſt fiction throughout the compoſure. It was like lopping off a man's limb, and then putting him upon running races; tho' it muſt be owned that the performance ſhews with what ability he would have acquitted himſelf, had he been ſound and entire. This Poem was rallied by ſeveral of the Wits of that time, particularly Sir John Denham, John Donne, LL. D. ſon of Dr. John Donne Dean of St. Paul's, Sir Allen Broderick, &c. who publiſhed at London 1653 in one ſheet and an half in 8vo Certain Verſes written by ſeveral of the Author's friends to be reprinted with the ſecond Edition of Gondibert. Upon which Sir William Davenant wrote an Anſwer to them, intitled, The incomparable Poem Gondibert vindicated from the Wit-Cabals of four Eſquires, Clinias, Dametas, Sancho, and Jack-pudding. London 1653, one ſheet in 8vo. This, tho' pretended to be written by a friend of Sir William's, was actually his own performance.

(o) Idem, Athen. Oxon. col. 412.

(p) Theatrum Poetarum: or a Compleat Collection of the Poets, eſpecially the moſt eminent of all Ages. By Edward Phillips. Modern Poets, pag. 191. edit. London 1675.

(*) An Enquiry into the Life and Writings of Homer, pag. 141. edit. London 1735.

[E] Carried priſoner, firſt to the Iſle of Wight in 1650.] On the 9th of July 1650 an Act paſſed the Parliament for the Trial of him and ſeveral others by an High Court of Juſtice (35). In the Poſtſcript to the Reader at the end of his Gondibert, dated at Cowes-Caſtle in that Iſle. Oct. 22, 1650, he has the following paſſage in the Poſtſcript to Gondibert, which ſhews he was then under ſtrong apprehenſions of ſuffering death: "I "am here arrived at the middle of the 3d Book, which "makes an equal half of the Poem; and I was now by "degrees to preſent you (as I promis'd in the Preface) "the ſeveral keys of the main building; which ſhould "convey you through ſuch ſhort walks as give an ea-"ſy view of the whole frame. But it is high time "to ſtrike ſail, and caſt Anchor (though I have run "but half my courſe) when at the helme I am threatned "with death; who, though he can viſit us but once, "ſeems troubleſome; and even in the innocent may "beget ſuch gravity, as diverts the Muſick of Verſe. "And I beſeech thee (if thou art ſo civil as to be "pleaſed with what is written) not to take it ill, that "I run not on to my laſt gaſp. For though I intend-"ed in this Poem to ſtrip nature naked, and clothe her "again in the perfect ſhape of virtue; yet even in "ſo worthy a deſigne I ſhall aſke leave to deſiſt, when "I am interrupted by ſo great an experiment as dy-"ing; and it is an experiment to the moſt experienc-"ed; for no man (though his mortifications may be "much greater than mine) can ſay, He has already "dy'd."

(35) Whitelocke, Memorials of the Engliſh Affairs, pag. 464. edit. London 1732, in fol.

[F] But by the mediation of Milton and others he had his liberty allowed him as priſoner at large.] This we are aſſured of by Mr. Wood (36), who likewiſe tells us, that he was particularly aſſiſted in this exigence by "two godly Aldermen of York, to whom he had ſhew-"ed great civility, when they had been taken pri-"ſoners in the North by ſome of the forces under "William Duke of Newcaſtle." Mr. Richardſon likewiſe in his Life of Milton (37) tells us, that Sir William Davenant obtained that Poet's Remiſſion at the Reſtoration, in return for his own Life procured by Milton's intereſt, when himſelf was under condemnation, Anno 1650. A Life was owing to Milton (Davenant's) and it was paid nobly, Milton's for Davenant's, at Davenant's interceſſion. Mr. Richardſon informs us, (38) that he had this ſtory from Mr. Pope, who had it from Mr. Betterton the Actor. "Sir William was his Pa-"tron. . . . . Betterton was 'Prentice to a Bookſeller, "John Holden (39), the ſame who printed Davenant's "Gondibert. There Sir William ſaw him, and per-"ſuading his maſter to part with him, brought him "firſt on the ſtage. Betterton then may well be al-"lowed to know this tranſaction from the fountain-"head." Oct. 9, 1652 he wrote the following Letter from the Tower to Whitelocke, one of the Lords Commiſſioners of the Great Seal (40). "My Lord, I am in "ſuſpence whither I ſhould preſent my thankfulneſs "to your Lordſhip for my liberty of the Tower; be-"cauſe when I conſider how much of your time be-"longs to the publick, I conceive that to make a re-"queſt to you, and to thank you afterwards for the "ſucceſs of it, is to give you no more than a ſucceſſion "of trouble, unleſs you are reſolved to be continually "patient and courteous to afflicted men, and agree in "your judgment with the late wiſe Cardinal, who "was wont to ſay, If he had not ſpent as much time in "civilities as in buſineſs, he had undone his maſter. But "whilſt I endeavour to excuſe this preſent of thank-"fulneſs, I ſhould rather aſk your pardon for going "about to make a preſent to you of myſelf, for it "may argue me to be incorrigible, that after ſo many "afflictions, I have yet ſo much ambition as to deſire "to be at liberty, that I may have more opportunity "to obey your Lordſhip's commands, and ſhew the "world how much I am &c."

(36) Col. 412.

(37) Pag. 89. prefixed to Explanatory Notes and Remarks on Milton's Paradiſe Loſt. By J. Richardſon, Father and Son. London 1734 in 8vo.

(38) Ibid. pag. 90.

(39) Mr. Gildon in his Life of Mr. Thomas Betterton, pag. 5. tells us, that Mr. Betterton was Apprentice to Mr. Rhodes a Bookſeller.

(40) See Whitelocke's Memorials, pag. 546, 547.

[G] Having laid the foundation of the Engliſh Stage by this muſical Drama, after the Reſtoration he revived and improved it by painted Scenes.] Mr. Dryden tells us (41), that with regard to Heroic Plays, "the firſt "light we had of them on the Engliſh Theatre, was "from the late Sir Will. D'Avenant. It being forbid-"den him in the rebellious times to act Tragedies and "Comedies, becauſe they contained ſome matter of in the South Croſs Iſle or South Tranſcept of Weſtminſter-Abby (q). We ſhall give his character in the note [H]. He had ſeveral ſons. His fourth ſon, WILLIAM, was educated at Magdalen Hall in the Univerſity of Oxford, where he took the Degree of Bachelor of Arts July the 19th 1677 (r), and July the 5th 1680 that of Maſter of Arts (s); and entering into Holy Orders about the ſame time, was preſented to a Living in Surrey by Robert Wymondſol of Putney Eſq; with whom travelling into France in quality of a Tutor, he was drowned in the Summer time in the preſence of his Pupil, as he was diverting himſelf in ſwimming in a river near Paris, in the year 1681 (t). He tranſlated from French into Engliſh with ſome Additions, Notitia Hiſtoricorum ſelectorum; or Animadverſions upon the famous Greek and Latin Hiſtorians, written by La Mothe le Vayer; Oxford 1678 in 8vo.

(41) Eſſay of Heroick Plays.

(q) Wood, Ath. Oxon. col. 415.

(r) Idem, Faſti Oxon. vol. 2. col. 205.

(s) Idem, ibid. col. 213.

(t) Idem, ibid.

" ſcandal to thoſe good people, who could more eaſily " diſpoſſeſs their lawful Sovereign, than endure a wan- " ton jeſt; he was forced to turn his thoughts ano- " ther way, and to introduce the examples of moral " virtue, writ in Verſe, and performed in recitative " Muſick. The original of this Muſick, and of the " Scenes, which adorned his work, he had from the " Italian Opera's; but he heightened his characters " (as I may probably imagine) from the examples of " Corneille and ſome French Poets. In this condition " did this part of Poetry remain at his Majeſty's re- " turn; when growing bolder, as now being owned " by a public authority, Davenant review'd his Siege " of Rhodes, and cauſed it to be acted as a juſt Drama. " But as few men have the happineſs to begin and fi- " niſh any new project, ſo neither did he live to make " his deſign perfect. There wanted the fullneſs of a " plot, and the variety of characters to form it as it " ought. And perhaps ſomewhat might have been " added to the beauty of the ſtile; all which he would " have performed with more exactneſs, had he pleaſed " to have given us another work of the ſame nature. " For my ſelf and others who come after him, we are " bound with all veneration to his memory, to ac- " knowledge what advantage we received from that " excellent ground-work, which he laid; and ſince " it is an eaſy thing to add to what already is invent- " ed, we ought all of us, without envy to him or " partiality to our ſelves, to yield him the precedence " in it."

" priſing; and thoſe firſt thoughts of his, contrary to " the old Latin proverb, were not always the leaſt " happy. And as his fancy was quick, ſo likewiſe " were the products of it remote and new. He bor- " rowed not of any other; and his imaginations " were ſuch as could not eaſily enter into any other " man. His corrections were ſober and judicious; " and he corrected his own writings much more ſe- " verely than thoſe of another man, beſtowing twice " the time and labour in poliſhing, which he uſed in " invention." In the Seſſion of the Poets printed in the Miſcellany Poems publiſhed by Mr. Dryden (43), he is mentioned in theſe lines;

(43) Part 2. pag. 90, & ſeqq. 4th ed. London 1716.

Apollo concerned to ſee the tranſgreſſions
Our paltry Poets do daily commit,
Gave order once more to ſummon a Seſſions,
Severely to puniſh the abuſes of wit.

Will D'avenant would fain have been Steward o' th'
Court,
To have fin'd and amerc'd each man at his will;
But Apollo, it ſeems, had heard a report,
That his choice of new Plays did ſhew h'ad no ſkill.

Beſides ſome critics had ow'd him a ſpite,
And a little before had made the God fret,
By letting him know the Laureat did write
That damnable farce, The houſe to be let.

And afterwards (44):

(44) Pag. 95.

Damn'd Holden with's dull German Princeſs appear'd,
Whom if D'avenant begot, as ſome do ſuppoſe,
Apollo ſaid, the Pillory ſhould crop off his ears,
And make them more ſuitable unto his noſe.

T.

[H] We ſhall give his character in the Note.] Mr. Dryden tells us (42), that in the time he wrote with him, he had the opportunity to obſerve ſomewhat more nearly of him, than he had formerly done, when he had only a bare acquaintance with him: " I found " him, ſays he, of ſo quick a fancy, that nothing " was propoſed to him, on which he could not ſud- " denly produce a thought extreamly pleaſant and ſur-

(42) Preface to the Tempeſt.

☞DAVENANT (CHARLES), an eminent Civilian and Writer, and eldeſt ſon of the preceding, was born in London or Weſtminſter in 1656, and educated in Grammar Learning at Cheame in Surrey under Mr. George Aldrich of Cambridge. He became Fellow Commoner of Baliol College in Oxford in Midſummer-Term 1671; but left that Univerſity without taking a Degree (a). However he afterwards obtained the Degree of Doctor of the Civil Law at Cambridge or Dublin, and applied himſelf to that profeſſion (b). In 1677 his Tragedy of Circe [A] was acted at the Duke of York's Theatre. In 1685 he was elected Burgeſs for St. Ives in Cornwall to ſit in the Parliament, which met at Weſtminſter May the 19th the ſame year (c); and about the ſame time was jointly impowered with the Maſter of the Revels to inſpect the Plays deſigned for the Stage, that no immoralities might be preſented (d). He wrote ſeveral political Tracts [B]. He died in the year 1712.

(a) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 945. and Faſti Oxon. vol. 2. col. 213. 2d edit. London 1721.

(b) Idem, Ath. Oxon. ubi ſupra.

(c) Idem, ibid.

(d) Idem, ibid. and Account of the Engliſh Dramatick Poets. By Gerard Langbaine, pag. 116. edit. Oxford 1691 in 8vo.

[A] His Tragedy of Circe.] The Prologue was written by Mr. Dryden; and the Epilogue by the Earl of Rocheſter. Mr. Gerard Langbaine tells us (1), that he had ſeen this Play acted with good applauſe: and that the Scenes and Machines may give it a title to that ſpecies of Dramatic Poetry called an Opera.

(1) Account of the Engliſh Dramatick Poets, pag. 116.

[B] He wrote ſeveral political tracts.] I. An Eſſay upon ways and means of ſupplying the war. London 1695 in 8vo. II. Diſcourſes on the public revenues and trade of England. London 1698, 2 Volumes in 8vo. The firſt Part is intitled, Diſcourſes on the publick Revenues, and on the trade of England. In two parts. viz. 1. Of the uſe of Political Arithmetick in all conſiderations about the Revenues and Trade. 2. On credit, and the means and methods, by which it may be reſtored. 3. On the management of the King's Revenues. 4. Whether to farm the Revenues may not, in this juncture, be moſt for the publick Service? 5. On the publick Debts and Engagements. The ſecond part is intitled, Diſcourſes on the Publick Revenues, and on the Trade of England; which more immediately treat of the forcign Traffick of this Kingdom, viz. 1. That the foreign Trade is beneficial to England. 2. On the Protection and care of Trade. 3. On the Plantation Trade. 4. On the Eaſt-India Trade. Part II. To which is added the late Eſſay on the Eaſt-India Trade. This was animadverted upon in A Vindication of ſome aſſertions relating to Coin and Trade from the Reflections of Dr. Davenant in his Diſcourſes on the Publick Revenues. London 1699 in 8vo. The tranſlation of Xenophon's Diſcourſe

DAVID, King of the Jews, was one of the greateſt men in the World, though we ſhould not conſider him as a Royal Prophet, who was a man after God's own heart. The firſt time the Scripture makes him appear on the ſtage (a), is to acquaint us that Samuel appointed him King, and performed the ceremony of anointing him. David was then but a ſimple ſhepherd. He was the youngeſt of the eight ſons of Jeſſe the Bethlehemite [A]. After this the Scripture informs us that he was ſent to King Saul (b), to

(a) 1 Samuel, chap. xvi. ver. 13.

(b) Ibid. ver. 20.

Diſcourſe upon improving the Revenue of the State of Athens, annexed to our Author's Diſcourſes, was done by Walter Moyle Eſq; who in the dedication of it, obſerves, that "the great Trade to the Eaſt-Indies, "with ſome few regulations, might be eſtabliſhed "upon a bottom more conſiſtent with the manufactures "of England. But in all appearance, ſays he, this "is not to be compaſſed, unleſs ſome public ſpirited "man with a maſterly genius be placed at the head "of our affairs in India; and tho' we who are his "friends are loth to loſe him, it were to be wiſhed, "for the good of the Kingdom, that the Gentleman (2), "whom common fame, and the voice of the world "have pointed out as the ableſt man for ſuch a "ſtation, would employ his excellent judgment and "talents that way, in the execution of ſo uſeful a "deſign. The general intereſt of a nation ought to "be the care of particular men, the main bent of "their ſtudies, and the chief purſuit of their enquiries. "Every man ought to ſet his helping hand to ſuch a "work; and your own generous labours upon this "ſubject have ſet an excellent pattern to the reſt of "the world." III. An Eſſay upon the probable methods of making a people gainers in the Ballance of Trade. Treating of theſe Heads, viz. Of the People of England. Of the Land of England and its Product. Of our Payments to the Publick, and in what manner the Ballance of Trade may be thereby affected. That a country cannot increaſe in Wealth and Power but by private Men doing their Duty to the public, and but by a ſteady Courſe of Honeſty and Wiſdom in ſuch as are truſted with the Adminiſtration of Affairs. By the Author of The Eſſay on Ways and Means. London 1699 in 8vo. IV. A Diſcourſe upon Grants and Reſumptions. Shewing how our Anceſtors have proceeded with ſuch Miniſters as have procured to themſelves Grants of the Crown-Revenue; and that the Forfeited Eſtates ought to be applied towards the payment of the publick Debts. By the Author of The Eſſay on Ways and Means. London 1700 in 8vo. In the Introduction (3) he obſerves, that "he has conſtantly "endeavoured to make his ſtudies tend to the ſervice "of the public; and his aim has been to incite in "young Gentlemen a deſire of being acquainted with "the buſineſs of the Nation; and this knowledge ly-"ing under abundance of rubbiſh, his ſcope has been "to remove this rubbiſh, and to dreſs up crabbed "matters as agreeably as he can, and to give, as it "were, ſhort maps of things, which others will not "take the pains to travel through themſelves. In or-"der to which he has devoted his hours of leiſure to "inquiries into the Trade and Revenues of this "Kingdom; and not ſerving his country in an ac-"tive life, he hopes to make his ſolitude and con-"templation of ſome uſe, ſo as to ſhew himſelf not "altogether an unprofitable member of the common-"wealth." There have been ſeveral Editions of this Book. V. Eſſays upon, I. The Ballance of Power. II. The Right of making War, Peace, and Alliances. III. Univerſal Monarchy. To which is added an Appendix, containing the Records referred to in the ſecond Eſſay. London 1701 in 8vo. In anſwer to this was publiſhed Animadverſions on a late Factious Book, intitled, Eſſays upon, I. The Ballance of Power; &c. With a Letter containing a cenſure upon the ſaid Book: wherein the King, the Miniſtry, and the Church of England are cleared from the malicious aſperſions caſt upon them by the enemies of this Government. London 1701 in 8vo. pagg. 72. The Author of this Pamphlet tells us (4), that Dr. Davenant "made himſelf conſpicuous, "and ſecured a great party in the nation by his early "Quarrel to the Government, upon account of the "male-adminiſtration of affairs; which he would per-"ſuade the world to be the reſult of his Love to his "Country; when we all know, his ſpleen has no "other cauſe than his having no more a ſhare in the "management of one of the branches of the Reve-"nue." VI. Eſſays upon Peace at home, and War abroad. In two Parts. By Charles D'Avenant, LL. D. London 1704 in 8vo. In the Introduction to the firſt Part (5) he obſerves, that part of theſe Diſcourſes had been written ſome time, and were deſigned to be made public againſt the meeting of that Parliament, which was to ſit the 13th of November 1701, and which, "to the infinite grief and ſurprize of many, who "loved and conſulted their country's quiet, was diſ-"ſolved upon the 11th of the ſame month. But the "Author not being able to judge what kind of fer-"ment this ſudden diſſolution might produce, and "apprehending in general from divers ſymptoms, "that on both ſides the paſſions were ſo enflamed, as "not to be capable at that ſeaſon of liſtening to "terms of moderation; he reſolved that for the pre-"ſent theſe Tracts of his ſhould not be publiſhed." Dr. D'Avenant is ſaid likewiſe to have been the Author of A Picture of a modern Whig; in two Parts, 8vo. London 1701, 1702. and Reflections upon the Conſtitution and Management of the Trade to Africa: in three Parts. fol. London 1709. T.

(2) Dr. D'Avenant.

(3) Pag. 41.

(4) Pag. 5.

(5) Pag. 16.

[A] He was the youngeſt of the Sons of Jeſſe.] Jeſſe was deſcended in a right line from Judah, one of the twelve Sons of Jacob, and dwelt at Bethlehem, a ſmall city of the tribe of Judah. Some modern Rabbins ſay that when David's mother conceived him, Jeſſe did not think he enjoyed his wife, but his maid-ſervant; and hereby they explain the 5th Verſe of the LIſt Pſalm, wherein David declares, that he was ſhapen in iniquity, and that his mother conceived him in ſin. This, ſay they, ſignifies that Jeſſe his father committed an adultery when he begot him, becauſe tho' he begot him on his wife, he thought he begot him on a maid-ſervant, whoſe chaſtity he had tried to corrupt (1). This explication is not very conformable to the doctrine of Original Sin; for which reaſon Father Bartolocci (2), having reported this opinion of the modern Rabbins, has thought himſelf obliged occaſionally to examine, whether the ancient Jews acknowledged the truth of that Doctrine. If the Suppoſition of theſe Rabbins be true, they would be much in the right to ſay that Jeſſe had committed adultery; but, on the other hand, it muſt be owned, that he would not have ſinned, if he had gotten his maid with child, when he really believed he was enjoying his wife. This Rabbinical ſuppoſition is repugnant to the Tradition which St. Jerom mentions. He ſays it was believed that Jeſſe, the father of David, never committed any actual ſin, and that there was no ſpot in him but what he brought from his mother's womb. Mirum eſt quod de Iſaï patre Davidis refert Hieronymus, illum nunquam aliud peccatum commiſiſſe quam quod ex origine contraxit. Quo enim loco legimus: Amaſa † ingreſſus eſt ad Abigail filiam Naas ſororem Sarviæ; ſic Hieronymus ‡, Naas interpretatur coluber, quia eum nullum admiſiſſe mortiferum perhibent peccatum, niſi quod originaliter de ſerpente antiquo contraxit. Eſt autem Naas qui & Iſaï pater David. Eamdem traditionem refert Abulenſis ‡, & monet Naas eundem eſſe qui & Jeſſe ſive Iſaï patrem Davidis, quod quidem & antea Liranus * docuerat (3). i. e. "It is a wonderful thing which St. "Jerom relates of Jeſſe the father of David, that he "was never guilty of any other ſin than what he had "contracted originally. For the paſſage wherein we "read, that Amaſa went in to Abigail the daughter "of Nahaſh, ſiſter to Zeruiah, is thus expounded by "St. Jerom: Nahaſh ſignifies a ſerpent; for they ſay "he was guilty of no deadly ſin, but what he origi-"nally contracted from the old ſerpent. Now Nahaſh "is the ſame with Jeſſe the father of David. Abu-"lenſis mentions the ſame tradition, and obſerves "that Nahaſh is the ſame with Jeſſe or Iſaï the father "of David; which de Lyra had likewiſe taught be-"fore." They who admit the impertinence of theſe Rabbins concerning the conception of David, might eaſily proceed to another impertinence, and rank David among the illuſtrious baſtards. The phyſical rea-

(1) See the Journal des Savans of the 14th of July 1692, pag. 465 of the Dutch Edition.

(2) In Bibliotheca magna Rabbinica, Part. 2. pag. 4. quoted in the Journal des Savans, ibid.

† Lib. 2 Reg. 17, 25.

‡ Hieron Trad. Hebr. in Lib. 2 Reg. cap. 17.

‡ Toſtat. 2 Reg. 17. Quæſt. 27.

* Liran. ibid.

(3) Theſe words with the Citations which accompany them, are Father Camart's, pag. 126, 127, de Rebus geſtis Eliæ.

to cure him of his fits of frenzy, by the ſound of Muſical Inſtruments. A ſervice of ſuch importance made him ſo much beloved by Saul, that that Prince retained him in his houſe, and made him his Armour-bearer (c). The Scripture ſays afterwards (d), that he returned from time to time to his father's houſe to take care of the flocks, and that one day his father ſent him to Saul's camp with ſome proviſions, which he deſigned for his three ſons who were in the army. David, in performing that order, heard the challenge which a Philiſtine named Goliath, proud of his ſtrength and gigantic ſtature, came every day to offer the Iſraelites, but which not one of them dared to accept. He diſcovered an earneſt deſire to go and fight that giant; whereupon he was brought to the King, and aſſured him that he ſhould triumph over the Philiſtine. Saul gave him his armour; but as David found it cumberſome, he put it off, and reſolved to make uſe only of his ſling; which he did with ſuch ſucceſs, that he felled the boaſter with a ſtone (e), and then killed him with his own ſword, and cut off his head, which he preſented to Saul [B]. That Prince had aſked his General, when he ſaw David march againſt Goliath, whoſe ſon is this youth (f) [C]? The General anſwered that he did not know, and received orders from Saul to enquire whoſe ſon he was; but Saul himſelf learned it from the young man's mouth; for when he was brought to him after the victory, he aſked him, Whoſe ſon art thou? and David anſwered, that he was the ſon of Jeſſe (g). Then Saul retained him in his ſervice, without permitting him to return home to his father any more (h). But as the Songs which were ſung through all the cities on the defeat of the Philiſtines, aſcribed ten times more glory to David than to Saul (i), the King conceived a violent jealouſy, which increaſed more and more, becauſe the employments which he gave to David in order to remove him from Court, ſerved only to render the young man's merit the more illuſtrious, and to gain him the affection and admiration of the people. By a falſe piece of policy he would needs have him for his ſon-in-law: he hoped that the condition on which he deſigned to give him his ſecond daughter would deliver him from that object of averſion; but he was confounded by his own artifice. He demanded for his daughter's dowry a hundred fore-ſkins of the Philiſtines: David brought him two hundred fairly told (k); ſo that inſtead of periſhing in that enterprize, as Saul hoped, he returned with a new acceſſion of glory. He married Saul's daughter, and thereby became but the more formidable to the King (l): all his expeditions againſt the Philiſtines were very ſucceſsful; his name grew famous; and he was in high eſteem (m); ſo that Saul, who was much leſs acquainted with the virtue of his ſon-in-law, than the diſpoſition of the people, thought nothing could prevent his being depoſed, but the death of David. He therefore reſolved to get rid of him once for all; and truſted his eldeſt ſon with the deſign, who, far from entring into his father's jealouſy, gave David notice of the black contrivance (n). David fled, and was purſued from place to place, till he had given inconteſtable proofs of his probity, and of his fidelity to his father-in-law, to whom he did not the leaſt harm on two favourable opportunities (o) which he had of killing him, if he had pleaſed. This made Saul reſolve to leave him at reſt. But as David apprehended that Prince might reſume his ill deſigns, he remitted nothing of his former precautions; on the contrary, he provided himſelf a ſafer refuge than before in the land of the Philiſtines (p). He aſked of the King of Gath a City to dwell in, from whence he made frequent incurſions into the neighbouring countries [D]; and (c) Ibid. ver. 21.

(d) Ibid. chap. xvii. ver. 15.

(e) Ibid. ver. 49, 50.

(f) Ibid. ver. 55.

(g) Ibid. ver. 58.

(h) Ibid. chap. xviii. ver. 2.

(i) The women anſwered one another as they played and ſaid, Saul hath ſlain his thouſands and David his ten thouſands. 1 Sam. chap. xviii. ver. 7.

(k) Ibid. ver. 27.

(l) Ibid. ver. 29.

(m) Ibid. ver. 30.

(n) Ibid. chap. xix. ver. 1 & 2.

(o) Ibid. chap. xxiv and xxvi.

(p) Ibid. chap. xxvii.

ſon which is given why baſtards are ſo frequently born with ſuch extraordinary natural talents might be properly alledged here with regard to the father.

[B] He ſlew Goliath with his own ſword, and cut off his head, which he preſented to Saul.] The arms of Goliath were preſerved as a monument of the Iſraelites glory. David carried them firſt to his tent (4), but probably they were afterwards put in a holy place; for we read (5) that David having aſked the Prieſt Ahimelech, if he could not furniſh him with a ſpear or ſword, the Prieſt anſwered him that the ſword of Goliath was there, wrapped in a cloth behind the Ephod, and that he might take it: whereupon David cauſed it to be delivered him. As to Goliath's head, it was carried to Jeruſalem (6), when David had made choice of that city for the capital of his Kingdom. Joſephus ſays poſitively that it was David himſelf who conſecrated Goliath's Sword to God (7).

(4) 1 Sam. chap. xvii. ver. 54.

(5) Ibid. chap. xxi. ver. 8 & 9.

(6) Ibid. chap. xvii. ver. 54.

(7) Joſeph. Antiq. lib. vi. cap. xi & xiv.

[C] Saul had aſked his General . . . whoſe ſon is this youth?] It is a little ſtrange that Saul did not know David that day, ſince the young man had ſeveral times played on inſtruments of muſic in his preſence, to calm the diſmal vapours which diſturbed him. If ſuch a relation were found in Thucydides or Livy, all the critics would unanimouſly conclude that the tranſcribers had tranſpoſed the pages, forgotten ſomething in one place, repeated ſomething in another, or inſerted additional paſſages in the Author's Work. But we muſt not entertain ſuch ſuſpicions with regard to the Bible. Notwithſtanding, ſome have been ſo bold as to pretend that all the Chapters, or all the Verſes of the firſt Book of Samuel are not placed in their original order. The Abbot de Choiſi, in my opinion, removes the difficulty a better way. David, ſays he (8), was brought to Saul, who did not know him again at firſt, tho' he had ſeen him frequently when he uſed to ſend for him to play on the harp: but as this was ſeveral years ago, and as David was then very young, and came to Court in quality of a Muſician, and then appeared in the habit of a Shepherd, it is no wonder that a King overwhelmed with buſineſs, and whoſe mind was diſordered, ſhould forget the features of a young man's face, who had nothing extraordinary in him. I only wiſh he had not ſaid: 1, that it was ſeveral years ſince Saul had ſeen David: 2, that David was very young when he came to Saul's Court in quality of a Muſician. There is no likelihood that he was much older when he killed Goliath, than when he came the firſt time to Saul's Court; for at the time of his firſt journey thither he was a mighty man, and a man of war, and prudent in matters (9); he was but thirty years old when he was elected King after Saul's death; and there muſt neceſſarily have been an interval of ſeveral years between the death of Goliath, and that of Saul. See the Remark wherein we criticiſe Moreri, and the Remark [L].

(8) Hiſt. de la Vie de David, pag. 8, 9. of the Amſterdam Edition, 1692.

(9) 1 Sam. chap. xvi. ver. 18.

[D] He aſked of the King of Gath a city . . . . from whence he made frequent incurſions into the neighbouring and it was not his fault that he did not fight againſt the Iſraelites [E] under the banner of that Philiſtine Prince, in the unhappy war wherein Saul periſhed. He returned to Judæa after the death of Saul, and was there declared King by the tribe of Judah (q). However the other Tribes ſubmitted to Iſh-boſheth the ſon of Saul; which was the effect of the fidelity of Abner (r). This man, who had been General of the Army under King Saul, placed Iſh-boſheth on the throne, and maintained him on it againſt all the efforts of David; but not bearing to be cenſured by Iſh-boſheth for having taken one of Saul's concubines (s), he treated with David to put him in poſſeſſion of Iſh-boſheth's kingdom. The negotiation had been ſoon concluded to the ſatisfaction of David, if Joab (t), to revenge a private quarrel, had not killed Abner, whoſe death only haſtened the ruin of the unfortunate Iſh-boſheth. Two of his chief Captains ſlew him, and brought his head to David, who, far from rewarding them as they expected, commanded them to be put to death (u). Iſh-boſheth's ſubjects quickly made a voluntary ſubmiſſion to David. That Prince had reigned ſeven years and an half over the tribe of Judah; and he afterwards reigned about thirty three years over all Iſrael (x). This long reign was remarkable for great ſucceſſes, and glorious conqueſts: it was ſcarce diſturbed by any other means than the criminal attempts of the Prince's own children [F]. Theſe are uſually the enemies which (q) 2 Samuel, chap. ii. ver. 4.

(r) Ibid. ver. 8.

(s) Ibid. ch. iii.

(t) He was the General of David's Army.

(u) 2 Sam. chap. iv.

(x) Ibid. chap. v. ver. 5.

ing countries.] David, having ſtaid ſome time in the Capital of King Achiſh, with his little band of 600 bold Adventurers, was afraid of being burthenſome to that Prince, and begged he would aſſign him another habitation. Achiſh appointed him the City of Ziklag. David removed thither with his followers, and did not ſuffer their ſwords to ruſt in their ſcabbards. He often led them out on parties, and killed man and woman without mercy: he left only the cattle alive, which was all the booty he returned with: he was afraid leſt the priſoners ſhould diſcover the whole myſtery to King Achiſh; for which reaſon he carried none with him, but put both ſexes to the ſword. The myſtery which he would not have diſcovered, was that theſe ravages were committed, not on the lands of the Iſraelites, as he made the King of Gath believe, but on the lands of the ancient inhabitants of Paleſtine (10). To ſay the truth, this conduct was very unjuſtifiable: to cover one fault, he committed a greater. He deceived a King to whom he had obligations; and to conceal this deceit, he exerciſed extreme cruelty. If David had been aſked, By what authority doſt thou theſe things? what could he have anſwered? Has a private man, as he was, a fugitive, who finds ſhelter in the territories of a neighbouring Prince, a right to commit hoſtilities for his own account, and without a commiſſion from the Sovereign of the country? Had David any ſuch commiſſion? On the contrary, did he not act in oppoſition to the intentions and intereſts of the King of Gath? It is certain that if a private perſon, let his birth be ever ſo great, ſhould behave at this day as David did on this occaſion, he would unavoidably have no very honourable names given him. I know very well that the moſt illuſtrious Heroes, and the moſt famous Prophets of the Old Teſtament, have ſometimes approved the deſtroying all things which had life with the edge of the ſword; and therefore I ſhould be far from calling what David did inhumanity, if he had been authorized by the orders of any Prophet, or if God had himſelf by inſpiration commanded him to act as he did: but it plainly appears from the ſilence of the ſcripture, that he did all this of his own head.

(10) Ibid. chap. xxvii.

A REFLECTION on David's conduct towards Nabal.

I ſhall add a word concerning what he had determined to do with Nabal. While that man, who was very rich, was ſhearing his ſheep, David ſent to aſk him very civilly for ſome gratification: his meſſengers failed not to repreſent that Nabal's Shepherds had never received any damage from David's people. As Nabal was very churliſh, he aſked in a rude manner who David was, and reproached him with having thrown off his maſter's yoke: in a word, he declared that he was not ſuch a fool as to give what he had provided for his domeſtics to ſtrangers and vagabonds. David, enraged at this anſwer, armed 400 of his Soldiers, and put himſelf at their head; fully reſolved not to ſuffer one ſoul to eſcape the edge of the ſword. He even bound himſelf to it by an oath; and if he did not execute this bloody purpoſe, it was becauſe Abigail came to appeaſe him by fair ſpeeches and preſents (11). Abigail was Nabal's wife, and a woman of great merit, beautiful, and witty, and pleaſed David ſo well, that he married her ſo ſoon as ſhe became a Widow (12). Let us ſpeak ſincerely: is it not inconteſtable that David was going to commit a very criminal action? He had no right to Nabal's goods, nor any authority to puniſh him for his incivility. He ranged up and down with a band of truſty friends: he might indeed be allowed to aſk ſome gratification of people who were at their eaſe; but if they refuſed, he ought to have taken it patiently, nor could he compel them to it by military execution, without plunging the world again into the terrible confuſion which is called the ſtate of nature, wherein no other Law is acknowledged but that of the ſtrongeſt. What ſhould we ſay at this day of a Prince of the blood royal of France, who being diſgraced at Court, ſhould take refuge where he could with ſuch friends as ſhould be willing to follow his fortune? What judgment, I ſay, ſhould we make of him, if he ſhould take it into his head to raiſe contributions in the countries where he ſhould canton himſelf, and to put all to the ſword in the villages which ſhould refuſe to pay his taxes? What ſhould we ſay if this Prince ſhould fit out veſſels, and cruize at ſea to take all the Merchant ſhips he could light on? Sincerely ſpeaking, had David a better authority to exact contributions from Nabal, and to maſſacre all the men and women in the country of the Amalekites &c, and to take all the cattle he found there? I agree it may be anſwered me, that we are at this day better acquainted with the Law of Nations, the Jus belli & pacis, of which ſuch fine ſyſtems have been written; and therefore ſuch behaviour was more excuſable in thoſe times than it would be now. But the profound reſpect which we ought to entertain for this great King, this great Prophet, ought not to hinder us from diſapproving the blemiſhes which are to be found in his life; otherwiſe we ſhould give occaſion to the profane to reproach us, and to ſay it is ſufficient to make an action juſt that it be done by certain perſons whom we reverence; than which nothing would be more fatal to Chriſtian Morality. It is of great concern to true Religion, that the lives of the Orthodox be judged by the general ideas of right and order.

(11) 1 Sam. chap. xxv.

(12) Ibid. ver. 42.

[E] It was not his fault that he did not fight againſt the Iſraelites.] While David with his little flying camp was exterminating all the infidel countries whereever he could penetrate, the Philiſtines were making preparations in their dominions for war againſt the Iſraelites. They aſſembled all their forces; and David and his bold Adventurers joined the army of Achiſh, and would have fought like Lions againſt their brethren, if the diſtruſtful Philiſtines had not conſtrained Achiſh to diſmiſs them. It was feared leſt in the heat of the battle they ſhould fall on the Philiſtines, in order to make their peace with Saul. When David was informed that by reaſon of theſe ſuſpicions he muſt be obliged to quit the army, he was concerned at it (13). He had reſolved, therefore, to contribute with all his might to the victory of the uncircumciſed Philiſtines over his own brethren, the people of God, and the Profeſſors of the true Religion. I leave nice Caſuiſts to judge whether theſe were ſentiments worthy of a true Iſraelite.

(13) And David ſaid unto Achiſh, But what have I done? and what haſt thou found in thy Servant, ſo long as I have been with thee unto this day, that I may not go to fight againſt the enemies of my Lord the King? 1 Sam. chap. xxix. ver. 8.

[F] His right . . . . was only diſturbed by the criminal attempts of his own children.] The moſt conſiderable of their attempts was the revolt of Abſalom, who which Sovereigns have moſt to fear. David was very near being forced to return to the mean condition in which Samuel found him. Humanly ſpeaking, this reverſe of fortune would have been inevitable [G], had he not found ſome perſons to act a Traitor's part towards Abſalom his ſon (y). David's piety is ſo conſpicuous in his Pſalms, and in ſeveral of his actions, that it cannot be ſufficiently admired. There is one thing which is no leſs admirable in his conduct; to wit, that he could ſo happily reconcile ſo much piety with the looſe maxims of the art of reigning. It is commonly believed that his adultery with Bath-ſheba, the murder of Uriah, and the numbring of the people, are the only faults with which he can be charged: but this is a great miſtake; for there are many other things in his life which deſerve cenſure [H]. He is a Sun of holineſs in the Church, who forced this great Prince to fly from Jeruſalem in a mournful condition, with his head covered, his feet bare, melting into tears, and having his ears ſaluted by nothing but the groans of his faithful ſubjects (14). Abſalom entered Jeruſalem as it were in triumph: and that the zeal of his adherents might not grow cool, on an imagination that this quarrel between the father and the ſon might be made up, he did a thing very proper to perſuade them that he would never be reconciled to David. He lay with the ten concubines of that Prince in the ſight of all the world (15). It is very probable that this crime would have been forgiven him: the extreme affliction into which his death threw David is a proof of it. He was the beſt father that ever was; his indulgence to his children was exceſſive, and he himſelf was the firſt who ſuffered by it. For if he had puniſhed the infamous action of his Son Amnon (16), as the thing deſerved, he would not have had the ſhame and diſpleaſure to ſee another revenge the injury done to Tamar; and if he had chaſtiſed him who revenged that injury, as he ought to have done, he would not have run the riſque of being abſolutely dethroned. David's deſtiny was the ſame with that of moſt great Princes; he was unhappy in his family. His eldeſt ſon violated his own ſiſter, and was killed by one of his brothers on account of that inceſt: the author of that fratricide lay with David's concubines. What a ſcandal muſt it be to pious ſouls, to ſee ſo many infamous actions committed in the family of this King?

(y) Ibid. chap. xv. ver. 34, &c.

(14) 2 Sam. chap. xv.

(15) Ibid. chap. xvi.

(16) He raviſhed Tamar, and was for that crime ſlain by the order of Abſalom, Tamar's brother both by father and mother. Ibid. chap. xiii.

[G] He was very near being obliged to return to the .... condition in which Samuel found him.... This reverſe of fortune was inevitable.] It may be ſeen by this example that there is no depending on the fidelity of the people; for, in ſhort, David was both a good, and a great King. He had made himſelf beloved, and eſteemed, and he had all imaginable zeal for the religion of the country. His ſubjects, therefore, had reaſon to be contented, and if they had been to chooſe a Prince, could they have wiſhed him to be better qualified? Yet they are ſo unſteady in their duty to David, that his ſon Abſalom, to get himſelf declared King, has no more to do than to make himſelf popular for ſome time, and to keep ſome emiſſaries in each Tribe. We may apply this maxim to the people, Caſta eſt quam nemo rogavit. i. e. She is chaſte who has never been aſked the queſtion. If we do not ſee more Kings dethroned, it is becauſe the people have not been ſollicited to revolt by intrigues properly conducted. There is nothing wanting but that: if the Prince is not a bad one, it is eaſy to make him paſs for ſuch, or for a ſlave to ill Councels.

[H] It is commonly believed that his adultery &c. are the only faults he can be charged with ... there are many other things in his life which deſerve cenſure.] We have already taken notice of ſome which relate to the time when he was a private man; here are others; which refer to the time when he was on the throne.

I. His polygamy cannot well be excuſed; for tho' God tolerated the practiſe in thoſe days, we muſt not think it might be carried very far, without looſing the reins too much to ſenſuality. Michal, Saul's ſecond daughter, was David's firſt wife; ſhe was taken from him during his diſgrace (17): he ſucceſſively married ſeveral others (18), and yet demanded the firſt again: to reſtore her to him, they were obliged to force her from a huſband who loved her greatly, and who followed her as far as he could, weeping like a child (19). David made no ſcruple to ally himſelf with the daughter of an uncircumciſed perſon (20); and tho' he had children by ſeveral wives, he took concubines at Jeruſalem. He choſe, without doubt, the handſomeſt he could meet with; ſo that it cannot be ſaid that he took much pains to mortify nature, with reſpect to the pleaſures of love.

(17) 1 Sam. chap. xxv. ver. 44.

(18) 2 Sam. chap. iii, & v.

(19) Ibid. chap. iii. ver. 16.

(20) Talmai King of Geſhur. Ibid. ver. 3.

II. So ſoon as he heard of Saul's death, he ſet himſelf, without loſs of time, to ſecure the ſucceſſion. He went to Hebron, and immediately on his arrival there, the whole Tribe of Judah, of which he had GAINED THE PRINCIPAL MEN BY PRESENTS, acknowledged him for King (21). If Abner had not preſerved the reſt of the ſucceſſion for Saul's ſon, there is no doubt but by the ſame method, I mean by gaining the principal men by preſents, David would have become King of all Iſrael. But what happened after Abner's fidelity had preſerved eleven whole Tribes for Iſh-boſheth? The ſame which would have happened between two infidel and moſt ambitious Princes. David and Iſh-boſheth made inceſſant war on one another (22), to try which of the two could get the others ſhare, in order to enjoy the whole kingdom without diviſion. What I am going to ſay is a great deal worſe. Abner, being diſcontented with the King his maſter, reſolves to diſpoſſeſs him of his dominions, and to deliver them up to David: he acquaints David with his intentions; and goes to him himſelf, to concert meaſures for putting them in execution. David gives ear to the traitor, and is willing to gain a Kingdom by intrigues of this nature (23). Can it be ſaid that theſe are the actions of a Saint? I own there is nothing in all this but what is agreeable to the precepts of Policy, and the methods of human prudence; but I ſhall never be perſuaded that the ſtrict laws of equity, the ſevere morals of a good ſervant of God, can approve ſuch conduct. Take notice that David did not pretend that Saul's ſon reigned by uſurpation: he allowed him to be a righteous man (24), and conſequently a lawful King.

(21) Hiſt. de la Vie de David, par l'Abbé de Choiſi, pag. 47.

(22) 2 Sam. chap. iii. ver. 1.

(23) Ibid. chap. iii.

(24) Ibid. chap. iv. ver. 11.

III. I paſs the ſame judgment on the ſtratagem which David made uſe of during Abſalom's revolt. He would not permit Huſhai one of his beſt friends to follow him, but ordered him to go over to Abſalom's party, that he might give ill counſel to that rebellious ſon, and be able to inform David of all the deſigns of the new King (25). This ſtratagem, without doubt, is very commendable, if we judge of things according to human prudence, and the policy of Sovereigns. It ſaved David, and from that age to our own incluſively, has produced an infinite number of adventures, uſeful to ſome, and pernicious to others; but a rigid Caſuiſt will never take this ſtratagem for an action worthy of a Prophet, a Saint, or an honeſt man. An honeſt man, as ſuch, would rather loſe a crown, than be the cauſe of his friend's damnation: and it is to damn our friend as much as in us lies, to puſh him on to commit a crime; and it is a crime to feign to embrace a man's party with zeal; to feign it, I ſay, in order to ruin that man by giving him evil counſel, and revealing all the ſecrets of his cabinet. Can there be a more treacherous piece of villany than this of Huſhai? So ſoon as he perceives Abſalom, he cries out, God ſave the King, God ſave the King; and when he is aſked the reaſon of his ingratitude in not following his intimate friend, he gives himſelf airs of devotion, and alledges reaſons of conſcience, I will be his whom the Lord hath choſen (26).

(25) Ibid. chap. xv.

(26) Ibid. chap. xvi. ver. 18.

IV. When David, by reaſon of his great age, could not get heat under all the cloaths they covered him with, it came into their heads to ſeek for a young girl to nurſe him, and to lie with him. He ſuffered them to bring to him for that purpoſe the moſt beautiful maiden that could be found (27). Can this be ſaid to be the action of a very chaſte man? Will a man who is filled with the ideas of purity, and perfectly reſolved

(27) 1 Kings, chap. i.

Church, through which, by his Writings, he diffuſes a light full of conſolation and piety, which we cannot enough admire; but he had his ſpots: and even in his laſt words we find reſolved to do what decency, and ſtrict morality require of him, ever conſent to theſe remedies? Can a man conſent to them, unleſs he prefers the inſtincts of nature, and the intereſts of the fleſh, before thoſe of God's Spirit?

V. David has long been blamed for having committed a crying injuſtice againſt Mephibosheth, the ſon of his intimate friend Jonathan. The fact is, David ſtanding no more in fear of Saul's faction, was well pleaſed to ſhew himſelf liberal to all thoſe who might yet remain of that family. He was informed that there was left a poor cripple, named Mephibosheth, the ſon of Jonathan. He ſent for him, and gave him all the lands which had belonged to King Saul, and ordered Ziba, an old ſervant of that family, to improve thoſe lands for his benefit, and for the maintenance of Mephibosheth's ſon; for as to Mephibosheth, he was to eat at King David's table as long as he lived (28). When that Prince fled from Jeruſalem, for fear of falling into the hands of Abſalom, he met Ziba, who brought him ſome refreſhments, and told him in a few words that Mephibosheth ſtaid at Jeruſalem, in hopes that among thoſe revolutions he might recover the kingdom. Whereupon David gave him all that belonged to Mephibosheth (29). After the death of Abſalom, he found that Ziba had been a falſe accuſer, and yet he only took from him the half of what he had given him; and reſtored to Mephibosheth but one half of his eſtate. Some Writers pretend that this injuſtice, which was the greater becauſe David had the utmoſt obligations to Jonathan, was the reaſon why God permitted Jeroboam to divide the Kingdom of Iſrael in two (30). But it is certain that the ſins of Solomon were the true cauſe why God permitted that diviſion (31). All the Interpreters have not forborn to apologize for David. Some of them maintain that Ziba's accuſation was not unjuſt, or at leaſt that it was founded on ſo many probabilities, that it might be credited without paſſing a raſh judgment (32). But there are but few people who are of their opinion. Moſt of the Fathers, and of the Moderns, believe Ziba was a calumniator, and that David ſuffered himſelf to be impoſed on. Mark well the thought of Pope Gregory: he owns that Mephibosheth was ſlandered, and yet he inſiſts that the ſentence which ſtripped him of all his eſtate was juſt. He inſiſts on it for two reaſons: 1, becauſe David pronounced it; 2, becauſe a ſecret judgment of God intervened. Non me latet, præter Interpretes in contrarium ſupra adductos, S. Gregorium contra Davidem ſtare l. 1. dialo. c. 4. Quamvis enim ait, latam à Davide contra innocentem Jonathæ filium ſententiam, quia per Davidem lata eſt, & occulto Dei judicio pronunciata, juſtam credi, tamen diſerte agnoſcit Miphiboſethum fuiſſe innocentem. Ex quo aperte ſequitur, ſententiam Davidis non fuiſſe juſtam. In quo cogimur S. Gregorio non adhærere, cum compertiſſima ſit Davidis ſanctitas; nec eum poſtea ſarciſſe hujuſmodi diſpendium aliunde conſtet (33). The Author whom I quote takes another way: ſince the holineſs of David, ſays he, is well known to us, and ſince he never ordered any reparation of the wrong which he had done to Mephibosheth, we are to conclude that the ſentence was juſt. This is to eſtabliſh a very dangerous principle; we muſt no longer examine the actions of the old Prophets by the ideas of Morality, ſo as to condemn thoſe which ſhould be conformable thereto; and conſequently Libertines might accuſe our Caſuiſts of approving certain actions which are viſibly unjuſt; to approve them, I ſay, in favour of certain people, and by accepting of perſons. Let us act in a better manner, and apply to the Saints what has been ſaid of great Wits, Nullum ſine venia placuit ingenium. The greateſt Saints have need of pardon in ſome reſpects.

VI. I ſay nothing of the reproach which was made David by Michal one of his wives, on account of the garb he put himſelf into when he danced in public. If he had diſcovered his nakedneſs, his action might be deemed ill, morally ſpeaking: but if he did no more than make himſelf contemptible by his poſtures, and by not keeping up the majeſty of his character, it was but an imprudence at moſt and not a crime. It ought to be well conſidered on what occaſion it was that he danced: it was when the Ark was carried to Jeruſalem (34); and conſequently the exceſs of his joy, and of his leaping, teſtified his attachment and ſenſibility for holy things. A modern Author has endeavoured to juſtify the nakedneſs of S. Francis of Aſſiſi by that of David: Michal David's wife, ſays he (35), having, from a window, ſeen her huſband, tranſported with a holy fervour, dancing and leaping before the Ark of the Lord, deſpiſed him in her heart, and . . . ſaid to him by way of raillery, How glorious was the King of Iſrael to day, who uncovered himſelf to day in the eyes of the handmaids of his ſervants, as one of the vain fellows ſhameleſly uncovereth himſelf! Theſe laſt words of the ſacred text ſeem to ſhew that David ſtripped himſelf ſtark naked; yet, as the ſame text (v. 14), ſpeaking of David's dancing before the ark, ſays he was girded with a linnen Ephod, I do not think he ſtripped himſelf naked. But he ſtripped himſelf ſo far as to appear as it were naked, and to make his behaviour judged unworthy the gravity and majeſty of a King: and the more ſo, for that the thing was done publickly, and before a great multitude. The action of David, attended with all theſe circumſtances, is not more favourable than that of St. Francis, which had a very few ſpectators (36): ſo that if the action of the latter deſerves cenſure, that of the former cannot be excuſed; and accordingly we read that Michal ridiculed it. But let us ſee whether the Holy Ghoſt has ridiculed it; and we ſhall thereby ſee whether we ought to ridicule the action of S. Francis. He ſets down, after this, what David anſwered to Michal, and what the Scripture obſerves concerning that woman's ſterility. A great many Ladies would deſerve to become barren, if nothing more were wanting than to be of Michal's taſte. It would be thought very ſtrange in any part of Europe, if on a day of proceſſion of the Holy Sacrament the Kings ſhould dance in the ſtreets with nothing but a ſmall girdle on their bodies.

VII. The conqueſts of David ſhall be the ſubject of my laſt obſervation. There are ſome rigid Caſuiſts, who do not think that a Chriſtian Prince can lawfully engage in a War, merely out of a deſire to aggrandize himſelf. Theſe Caſuiſts approve of none but defenſive Wars, or in general thoſe which only tend to get every man reſtored to the poſſeſſions which belong to him. On the foot of this Maxim, David would frequently have undertaken unjuſt Wars; for, beſides that the Scripture often repreſents him as the aggreſſor, we find that he extended the bounds of his empire from Egypt to the Euphrates (37). That we may not therefore condemn David, we had better ſay, that conqueſts may ſometimes be permitted; and that conſequently care ſhould be taken leſt, in declaiming againſt modern Princes, our cenſures fall unawares on that great Prophet.

But if, generally ſpeaking, the conqueſts of that holy Monarch have raiſed his glory without prejudice to his juſtice, it will be difficult to admit this propoſition when we enter into particulars. Let us not, by our conjectures, pry into ſecrets which Hiſtory has not revealed to us: let us not conclude that, ſince David was willing to take advantage of the treaſon of Abner and of Huſhai, he therefore ſtuck not to make uſe of ſtratagems of almoſt every kind againſt the infidel Kings whom he ſubdued. Let us confine our ſelves to what the ſacred Hiſtory has told us of the manner wherein he treated the vanquiſhed, He alſo brought forth the people that were in Rabbah (38), and put them under ſaws, and under harrows of iron, and under axes of iron, and made them paſs through the brick-kiln: and thus did he unto all the cities of the children of Ammon (39). The Geneva Bible obſerves in the Margin of this Verſe, that theſe were different ways of putting people to death which were anciently practiſed. Let us ſee how he treated the Moabites: He meaſured them with a line, caſting them down to the ground; even with two lines meaſured he to put to death, and with one full line to keep alive (40). That is to ſay, he determined to put to death preciſely two thirds of them neither more nor leſs (41). Edom received yet a harſher treatment: he there ſlew all the males; Six months did Joab remain there with all Iſrael, until he had cut off every male in Edom (42). Can this method of making war be denied (28) 2 Sam. chap. ix.

(29) Ibid. chap. xvi.

(30) Id gravis peccati injuſtitiæ erga innoxium Mephibosethum, damnant Abulenſis 2 Reg. 16. q. 6. & c. 19. q. 29. & Rickelius ac Cajetanus, ibi: nec non Salianus anno mundi 3010, à num. 21. & alii plerique anteriores, ut Lyranus, Hugo, Rabanus, alique: quibus ob hanc injuſtitiam in Mephibosethum, nexa cum infidelitate magna & ingratitudine in Jonathan ejus patrem, viſum eſt ſciſſum eſſe ſub Roboano, Davidis regnum. Et ita videtur aſſeri apud Hieronymum in Tradit. Hebr. ad l. 2. Reg. c. 19. Th. Raynaudus, Hoplolth. Sect. 2. Serie 2. cap. 10. pag. m. 231.

(31) 1 Kings, chap. xi. ver. 11.

(32) Vide Petrum Joannem Olivi, apud Theoph. Raynaud. Hoplolth. Sect. 4. cap. 3. pag. 523, & ipſum Raynaud. pag. 232.

(33) Th. Raynaud. pag. 232.

(34) 2 Sam. chap. vi.

(35) Ferrand, Réponſe à l'Apologie pour la Reformation, pag. 364, 365.

(36) Francis of Aſſiſi being brought by his father to the Biſhop, that he might make a renunciation, in the Biſhop's preſence, of all his paternal eſtate, returned his father his very cloaths, and ſtripped himſelf ſtark naked in the preſence of the Aſſiſtants. The Biſhop roſe from his ſeat, and covered him with his cloak. Bonaventure, Vie de S. François, quoted by Ferrand, Réponſe à l'Apologie pour la Reformation, pag. 363, 364.

(37) The Abbot de Choiſi, Hiſt. de la Vie de David, pag. 64.

(38) It was the chief City of the Ammonites.

(39) 2 Sam. chap. xii. ver. 31.

(40) Ibid. chap. viii. ver. 2.

(41) See the Note of the Geneva Bible.

(42) 1 Kings, chap. xi. ver. 15.

(z) See the Remark [I] at the end.

find the indirect dealings of policy [I]. The holy Scripture relates them only hiſtorically; for which reaſon every one is at liberty to judge of them (z). Let us conclude with nied to be blame-worthy? Have not the Turks and Tartars a little more humanity? And if a vaſt number of Pamphlets daily complain of the military executions of our own time, which are really cruel and highly to be blamed, tho' mild in compariſon of David's, what would not the Authors of thoſe Pamphlets ſay at this day, had they ſuch uſage to cenſure as the ſaws, the harrows, and the brick-kilns of David, and the general ſlaughter of all the males, both old and young?

[I] Even in his laſt Words we find the indirect dealings of Policy.] Underſtand me right: I do not mean that David when in thoſe circumſtances did not ſpeak his real thoughts; but that the frank and plain manner in which he opened his heart, is a demonſtration that he had formerly in two remarkable inſtances ſacrificed juſtice to utility. He well knew that Joab deſerved death, and that the ſuffering the aſſaſſinations with which that man's hands were polluted to go unpuniſhed, was a flagrant injury done to the laws, and to juſtice. Joab nevertheleſs had kept his places, his intereſt, and his authority. He was brave, he ſerved the King his maſter faithfully and to good purpoſe; and dangerous diſcontents might be apprehended if he attempted to puniſh him. Theſe were the political reaſons which made the Law give place to Utility. But when David had no further uſe for that General, he gave orders that he ſhould be put to death; this was one of the clauſes of his Will (43). Solomon, his Succeſſor, was charged with a like execution againſt Shimei. This man, when he heard that David was flying from Jeruſalem in great diſorder, becauſe of Abſalom's revolt, came to inſult him by the way, and loaded him with reproaches even harder than the ſtones he caſt at him (44). David bore this injury very patiently: he therein acknowledged and adored the hand of God, with marks of ſingular piety; and when his affairs were ſettled again, he pardoned Shimei, who was one of the firſt to ſubmit, and to implore his mercy (45). David ſwore that he would not put him to death, and was as good as his word till he came to dye; but ſeeing himſelf on his death-bed, he charged his ſon to put that man to death (46); an evident proof that he had only let him live, firſt to gain the glory of being a merciful Prince, and afterwards to avoid being reproached to his face with having broke his word. I would fain know whether, ſtrictly ſpeaking, a man who promiſes his enemy his life, acquits himſelf of that promiſe, when he orders him to be put to death by his Will?

(43) 1 Kings, chap. ii. ver. 6.

(44) 2 Sam. chap. xvi. ver. 5, &c.

(45) Ibid. chap. xix. ver. 19, &c.

(46) 1 Kings, chap. ii. ver. 9.

* [To the objections, which Mr. Bayle makes here, it may be added, that, as this Verſe is tranſlated, David commends his ſon Solomon for his Wiſdom, and yet by expreſly ordering him to ſlay Shimei leaves him no room for the exerciſe of this wiſdom in the caſe: and, what is more, Solomon did not in any proper ſenſe comply with his father's dying requeſt; for if Shimei had not gone out of Jeruſalem, his hoary head, (according to the ſtory) would not have been brought down to the grave with blood. But all theſe difficulties are at an end, if we tranſlate the Verſe in the following manner. Now therefore do not hold him guiltleſs, (for thou art a wiſe man, and knoweſt what thou oughteſt to do unto him) but do not bring down his hoary head with blood to the grave. By putting the middle words into a Parentheſis, the laſt ſentence of the verſe is connected to the firſt; and then the negative particle al, which is in the firſt, may be borrowed to ſupply the ſenſe in the laſt. This is done by our Engliſh Tranſlators in Deut. xxxiii. 6. Levit. x. 6. Pſ. ix. 19. and cxliii. 7. and in ſome other places of the Old Teſtament; and therefore it might as well have been done here. If this Tranſlation be right, then David's direction to his ſon Solomon will be, that he ſhould not put Shimei to death for his former crime of curſing David, becauſe of the oath, which David had ſworn to him: but at the ſame time, that he ſhould not hold him guiltleſs, leaving it to the Wiſdom of Solomon to inflict a proper puniſhment upon him, provided it were not a capital one. And in this Solomon ſtrictly obeyed his father's command, by only confining Shimei to Jeruſalem, and puniſhing him afterwards with death only for his ſecond tranſgreſſion, when he went out of the bounds of his impriſonment without the King's leave and in direct diſobedience to his command. CRIT. REM.]

From all that has been ſaid in the precedent Remarks, and in this, it may be eaſily inferred, that if the people of Syria had been as great Writers of Libels, as the Europeans are at this day, they would have ſtrangely diſfigured David's glory. With what infamous names and titles would they not have loaded that troop of Adventurers who went to join him, after he had retired from Saul's Court? The Scripture informs us that all thoſe who were perſecuted by their Creditors, all the diſcontented, and all who were in bad circumſtances, repaired to him, and that he became their Captain (47). Nothing is capable of being more maliciouſly miſrepreſented than a thing of this kind. Thoſe who have written the Hiſtory of Catiline, and of Cæſar, would furniſh a ſatyrical Painter with a great many colours. Hiſtory has preſerved a ſmall ſpecimen of the abuſes to which David was expoſed among the friends of Saul. This ſpecimen ſhews that they accuſed him of being a man of blood, and looked on the rebellion of Abſalom as a juſt puniſhment for the miſchiefs which they ſaid David had done to Saul, and his whole family. I ſet down the words of the Scripture in the margin (48); and here are thoſe of Joſephus (49): Δαβίδῃ δὲ γενομένῳ κατὰ χώραμον ἥτω καλουμένον τόπον ἐπέρχεται τῶ Σαούλε συγγενὴς ὄνομα Σεμεεί . . . . καὶ λίθοις τε ἔβαλεν αὐτὸν καὶ ἐκαπηγόρει. φίλων καὶ σκιπόνλων ἔτι μᾶλλον, βλασφημῶν διετέλει, μιαιφόνον καὶ πολλῶν ἀρχηγὸν κακῶν ἀποκαλῶν· ἐκέλευε δὲ καὶ τῆς γῆς, ὡς ἐναγῆ καὶ ἐπάραλον, ἐξιέναι, καὶ τῷ Θεῷ χάριν ἔχειν ὁμολογεῖ τῆς βασιλείας αὐτὸν ἀφιλομένῳ, καὶ διὰ παιδὸς ἰδίε τὴν ὑπὲρ ὧν ἥμαρτεν εἰς αὐτὸ δεσπότην δίκην αὐτῷ εἰσπραξαμένῳ. i. e. "But when David came "near a place called Bachora, there came a kinſman of "Saul's, named Semei . . . . who threw ſtones at "him and reviled him; and when his friends protected him, he abuſed him yet worſe, calling him a "bloody man, and the author of many miſchiefs; "and bidding him leave the land, as an impure and "execrable perſon: and he gave God thanks that he "had deprived him of the kingdom, and puniſhed him "by means of his own ſon for what he had committed againſt his maſter." They carried things too far: it is true, that by the teſtimony of God himſelf David was a man of blood; for which reaſon God would not permit him to build the Temple (50). It is true alſo that to appeaſe the Gibeonites he delivered up to them two ſons and five grandſons of Saul, who were all ſeven hanged (51). But it is falſe that he ever made any attempt either on the life or the crown of Saul.

(47) Convenerunt ad eum omnes qui erant in anguſtia conſtituti, & oppreſſi ære alieno, & amaro animo, & factus eſt eorum princeps. 1 lib. Samuel. cap. xxii. ver. 2.

(48) The words of Shimei, according to the Scripture, are theſe: Come out, come out, thou bloody man, and thou man of Belial: the Lord hath returned upon thee all the blood of the houſe of Saul, in whoſe ſtead thou haſt reigned, and the Lord hath delivered the Kingdom into the hand of Abſalom thy ſon: and behold, thou art taken in thy miſchief, becauſe thou art a bloody man. 2 Sam. chap. xvi. ver. 7, 8.

(49) Antiq. lib. 7. cap. 8. pag. 230.

(50) 1 Chron. chap. xxii. ver. 8. and chap. xxviii. ver. 3.

(51) 2 Sam. chap. xxi.

They who may think it ſtrange that I ſhould ſpeak my opinion of certain Actions of David, compared with natural Morality, are deſired to conſider three things. I. That they are themſelves obliged to confeſs that this Prince's behaviour to Uriah is one of the greateſt crimes that can be committed. There is therefore no other difference between us, than with regard to the number of his faults: for I acknowledge as well as they, that the failings of this Prophet are no argument againſt his having been a man full of piety, and extraordinary zeal for the glory of the Lord. He was ſubject to the alternatives of paſſions and grace: a fatality adhering to our nature ever ſince the ſin of Adam. The grace of God guided him often; but in ſeveral inſtances his paſſions got the upper hand; and Policy ſilenced Religion. II. That it is very allowable for private perſons, ſuch as my ſelf, to judge of facts contained in Scripture, when they are not expreſly qualified by the Holy Ghoſt. If the Scripture in relating an action blames or commends it, it is no longer allowed to appeal from that judgment; but every one ought to regulate his approbation or his diſapprobation by the model of the Scripture. I have not acted contrary to this duty: the facts, on which I have delivered my poor opinion, are related in the ſacred Hiſtory, without any character of approbation (52). III. That great injury would be done to the eternal Laws, and by conſequence

AN important Advertiſement with relation to what has been ſaid above.

(52) I obſerve the Scripture acquaints us that David conſulted and followed the orders of God, when Aggreſſors were to be repulſed, 2 Samuel, chap. xxiii, and xxx; but that he did not conſult God when he had a mind to ruin Nabal, nor when he went to exterminate the neighbours of Achiſh, and made him believe that he ravaged the dominions of Saul. It is a ſign God did not approve ſuch actions.

with saying that the History of King David may encourage several crowned heads against the alarms which severe Casuists might give them, by maintaining that it is scarce possible for a King to be saved. The Life of this great Prince published by the Abbot de Choisi is a very good book; it would have been much better if he had taken the pains to set down in the margin the years of every action, and the passages of the Bible or of Josephus which supplied him with what he advances. A Reader is not pleased to be left ignorant whether what he reads comes from a sacred source, or from a profane one. I shall not take notice of many faults of Moreri [K]. The Article of David, which I have lately read in the Dictionary of the Bible, will furnish me with matter for a Remark [L]. I have consequence to true Religion, if a handle was given to libertines to object to us, that so soon as a man has a share in the inspirations of God, we look on his conduct as the rule of manners; so that we dare not condemn those actions which are diametrically opposite to the notions of equity, when it is he who has committed them. There is no medium; either these are unworthy actions, or actions like these are not wicked: now, as we must necessarily chuse the one or the other of these two propositions, is it not better to consult the interest of Morality, rather than the glory of a particular person? Otherwise, should we not declare that we had rather prejudice the honour of God, than that of a mortal man?

[K] I shall not take notice of many faults of Moreri.] Only five.

I. David was two and twenty years old, when Samuel anointed him with the oil appointed for the consecreation of Kings. This is inconsistent with what follows, and with what goes before. He had just said that David was born in the year of the world 2950, and a little after he tells us that David vanquished Goliath in the year of the world 2971. It is manifest that the victory over Goliath was posterior to David's being anointed; whereas, according to Moreri, the ceremony of anointing him was not performed till a year after that victory. To correct this fault it should be said that David was anointed at the age of twenty (53). The rest wants no correction; for it is true that David overcame Goliath the year after he was anointed.

(53) He was born, according to Calvisius, in the year of the World 2860, and was anointed by Samuel in the year of the World 2880, and killed Goliath the year after.

II. It is not true that Saul renewed the persecution against David, after the latter had twice forborne to do him the least harm, tho' he had the most favourable opportunity in the world. It is a little surprizing that the Scripture, to aggravate Saul's crime, should not take notice that he quickly repented of his reconciliation with David, and rendred himself guilty of black ingratitude. In the XXIVth Chapter of the Ist Book of Samuel, he is informed that David, having it in his power to kill him in a cave, would not do him any hurt: he admires this generosity; he prays God to reward it; he owns that the crown is destined for David; he recommends his family to him; and returns home. In the XXVIth Chapter of the same Book, he is informed that David having it in his power to kill him by night in his tent, retires without touching him: he admires this generosity; he gives David his blessing; he foretels him all sorts of prosperity; and returns to his house. Moreri supposes that these two actions, so very like one another, happened the same year. I repeat it: it is a little surprizing that the Scripture does not make use of the first of these two facts, to make Saul's obstinacy in persecuting his Son-in-Law more odious. Two or three lines might have produced a considerable effect: a Reader would have been struck to see that Saul, being obliged to his son-in-law for his life, praises him, admires him, wishes him a thousand blessings, and yet in a little time takes the field again to destroy him. The laws of History require, without doubt, that in speaking of this new pursuit, it should be observed that it was an infraction of that solemn agreement which had followed the adventure of the cave: and yet you will not find one tittle in the Scripture concerning this circumstance. Here is further matter of surprize. David representing to Saul that he had not deserved the persecution which he suffered, and that he could easily have killed him in his tent, does not put him in mind that it was the second time he had had the King's life in his power, and that the King had soon forgotten the adventure of the cave. Saul, on his part, owns himself in the wrong, and speaks to David with the utmost civility, and yet takes no notice that it was the second time he owed his life to him.

OBSERVATIONS on a Narrative contained in the Books of Samuel.

It must be confessed that such circumstances are not to be forgotten. Besides, we see that on the first of these two occasions, David and Saul make use of nearly the same words as they do on the second. If I saw two accounts of this nature in Ælian, or in Valerius Maximus, I should make no difficulty to believe that they were but one action, which having been related two different ways, served for the subject of two articles, or of two chapters. The fact would be, that David having the life of Saul, his cruel persecutor, in his hands, religiously preserved it. The two ways of relating the affair would be, 1, that Saul, being obliged to step aside from his men on a private occasion, entered into a cave where David was; 2, that David by night slipped thro' the camp as far as Saul's tent, while the guards were fast asleep. I leave Father Simon and the Critics of his size to examine whether the Historical Books of the Old Testament might not possibly relate the same thing twice. It seems to me that the action of the Ziphites, related in the 23d chapter of the 1st Book of Samuel, is not different from that which is related in the 26th chapter of the same Book. Whoever will take the pains to compare those two Relations, will doubtless be of my mind. But what is very certain is, that Saul did not persecute David after the second reconciliation. This is Moreri's second fault.

The IIId consists in his asserting that David was so well received by Achish King of Gath, that the sudden favour shewn him was very near causing the great men to revolt. There is not a word of truth in all this; and I see nothing that could have produced such a falsehood, except the suspicions which were formed against David, when they saw him with his troops in the rear-guard of Achish's army. The chiefs of the Philistines would absolutely have David return back to the city which had been given him (54). These Chiefs were very different from the great men of the King of Gath's Court.

(54) 1 Sam. chap. xxix.

IV. The supposed discontent of the great men did not oblige David to retire from that Court. He retired from thence out of respect; he was apprehensive lest he and his people might incommode the Prince by their abode in the Capital: he therefore begged of Achish to assign him some other habitation; which was granted him. This happened before the Chiefs of the Philistines demanded that David should quit their camp.

V. It should not have been said that David returned to Ziklag, since no notice had been taken that he had dwelt there before.

[L] The Article of David . . . . in the Dictionary of the Bible will furnish me with matter for a Remark.] The Printers were got thus far when I was shewn a Dictionary (55), which I immediately consulted in the Article of the Prophet David. I have found some passages in it which have given me occasion to make a few Observations. I. It is not true that David came into the world 110 years before the birth of Jesus Christ: there were above a thousand years (56) between the birth of the one and that of the other. II. The Author ought not to have suppressed the inroad made by David on the allies of his Patron, nor the lie he made use of to persuade Achish that he made them on the lands of the Israelites. Neither ought he to have suppressed the unfair War which he made on those people: he put both men and women to the sword. It is not allowable in a Dictionary to imitate the Panegyrists, who only touch on the bright circumstances: a Writer of such a Work should act like an Historian, and tell both the good and the bad; and this is what the Scripture has done. III. We cannot therefore approve the affectation which appears here of saying nothing of David's stratagems, as well against Ishbosheth, (55) It is the Dictionary of the Bible composed by Mr. Simon, Priest, Doctor of Divinity, and printed at Lyons, 1693, in folio.

(56) There were 1090, according to Calvisius.

I have forgot to obſerve that it would be unreaſonable to blame David for excluding his eldeſt ſon from the ſucceſſion [M].

as againſt Abſalom; and to ſpeak only of the Wars for which David had provocation. Should not ſomething have been ſaid of thoſe wherein the Scripture repreſents him as the Aggreſſor, and of the aſtoniſhing ſeverity with which he treated the vanquiſhed? IV. The Author does worſe than ſuppreſs, he ſuppoſes, without any foundation in Scripture, that the Syrians, the Ammonites, the Moabites, and the other neighbouring nations attacked David. The Sacred Hiſtory plainly inſinuates that they only endeavoured to defend themſelves, in which they were far from ſucceeding (57). V. He ſuppoſes alſo, without any foundation in Scripture, that that Prince married the young girl whom they brought him to try to warm him. I might excuſe this, without prejudice to what I have ſaid concerning that extraordinary method of reviving natural heat. I do not think that the moſt indulgent of our modern Caſuiſts would conſent that an old man wholly incapable of conſummating the marriage, ſhould marry a young girl with no other view than to warm his hands and feet by her. They would conclude, no doubt, that he would ſin, and would be the occaſion of his companion's ſinning alſo. VI. The Author endeavours to remove the difficulty which ſtares every Reader in the face, when he conſiders that Saul did not know David on the day that Goliath was killed: he endeavours, I ſay, to remove it, and perplexes himſelf more that he needs; for he ſays in one place (58), that David, at the age of ſeventeen, went to play on the harp to Saul, and in another (59) he makes him to be but fourteen or fifteen, and a very little boy. Preſently after, deſigning to refute thoſe who ſay that his combat againſt Goliath was prior to his playing on the harp, he forms a ſpecious objection to himſelf, drawn from the commendation which was given David of being a valiant man, and a good warrior (60) by thoſe who propoſed him to Saul as a proper perſon to drive away by Muſic the evil ſpirit which troubled Saul. To this I anſwer, ſays he, that we are not to conclude from theſe two words Fortiſſimum & Bellicoſum, that the combate was before the playing on the harp, becauſe the epithet of ſtrong may be given to any one, provided he be really ſo with reſpect to his age. Is not he very ſtrong who can run down Lions and Bears, fight with them, and ſtrangle them? Here is an anſwer which ſuppoſes that David being yet very little, and a young lad of fourteen or fifteen years old, had fought with Lions, had run them down, had ſtrangled them, and might be called a ſtrong man, a Warrior, and a man prudent in matters. This difficulty is conſiderable enough to deſerve to be obviated: whence comes it then that our Author does not ſo much as ſeem to perceive it? His ſilence will not prevent Readers, who have any penetration, from ſeeing very plainly that ſince David fought Goliath at the age of one and twenty (61), he muſt be near twenty years old the firſt time he went to Saul's Court. And ſo the reaſon which our Author advances as the beſt why Saul did not know David the day of the combate againſt Goliath, is good for nothing (62). This reaſon is, becauſe a little boy alters his features ſo much in ſeven years time, that thoſe who do not ſee him again till after an abſence of ſeven years do not know him. This is not David's caſe; therefore recourſe muſt be had to other reaſons. The Author mentions thoſe which ſeveral Commentators have deviſed. If they do not fully ſatisfy thoſe who are not difficult to be pleaſed, the fault muſt be laid on the nature of the queſtion. VII. The Author forgets the ſtrongeſt proof that can be alledged againſt thoſe who will have it that David was not ſent for to drive away Saul's evil ſpirit, till after the combate with Goliath. He does not alledge that thoſe people reverſe the order in which the Scripture relates the events; he does not alledge that Saul's ſervant who praiſed David for being robuſt, a warriour, eloquent, and beautiful, ſaid nothing of the victory over Goliath. Now it is impoſſible to comprehend that they who were deſirous of recommending him to the King after that combate ſhould be ſo ſtupid as not to tell the Prince at once, The ſame young man who ſlew Goliath plays well on muſical inſtruments: and he will cure you.

The fear of being too prolix prevents my examining whether the Author has failed in exactneſs in the remainder of the Article. He has avoided the inconvenience which I have remarked in the Abbot de Choiſi; having ſet down the years wherein David did ſuch and ſuch a thing.

[M] It would be unreaſonable to blame David for excluding his eldeſt ſon from the ſucceſſion.] David left his kingdom to Solomon, in prejudice of the right of primogeniture; a right which in hereditary crowns ought to be inviolably maintained, unleſs one wou'd open a door to a thouſand civil wars. Nevertheleſs David had very juſt reaſons to contravene that right, becauſe Adonijah his eldeſt ſon had been ſo impatient to reign, that he aſcended the throne before David was dead (63). This indulgent father durſt not ſhew his reſentment of an impatience which in reality differed not from uſurpation; he had been always very tender to his children: and his almoſt decrepid age was not very fit to correct the ſoftneſs which attends tender hearts: but Solomon's mother, ſtirred up and directed by a Prophet (64) whom Adonijah had not invited to the royal feaſt (65), warded off the blow; ſhe and the Prophet obliged David to declare in favour of Solomon, and to give the neceſſary orders for the inſtallment of that young Prince. Adonijah gave himſelf for loſt, and took refuge at the foot of the altar: but Solomon ſent to aſſure him that he would do him no hurt provided he behaved well and prudently for the future (66). Notwithſtanding he cauſed him to be ſlain for a reaſon which ſeems pretty ſlight; I mean becauſe Adonijah had aſked in marriage the Shunamite who had ſerved to warm David (67). This confirms what I have ſaid above, that the Royal Prophet was unhappy in children. They had no natural affection, either for him or for one another. Here is the wiſeſt of them all, who ſheds the blood of his eldeſt brother for a trifle; for it muſt not be imagined that he put him to death on the account of the irregularity of Adonijah's love. All the ſons of David ought to look on the Shunamite as forbidden fruit. Her virginity had belonged to their father; and he would have actually taken poſſeſſion of it, had his ſtrength permitted. Adonijah therefore was to blame for caſting his eyes on that girl; but it was not for this reaſon that his brother killed him: it was becauſe his petition awakened Solomon's jealouſies, and made him fear leſt, if he was accuſtomed to aſk favours, he might, in a ſhort time think of inſiſting on his right of primogeniture (68), A policy in ſome reſpects like that of the Ottomans occaſioned his deſtruction.

(57) See the 2d Book of Samuel, chap. viii.

(58) Pag. 249.

(59) Pag. 259.

(60) Et reſpondens unus de pueris ait, ecce vidi filium Iſai Bethlemitem ſcientem pſallere, & fortiſſimum robore, virum bellicoſum, &c. Ibid. pag. 259. See 1 Sam. chap. xvi. ver. 18.

(61) It is the ſuppoſition of the Author of the Dictionary of the Bible, pag. 249.

(62) He cites the Author of the Hiſtory of the Bible, who puts eight years between the 1ſt time that Saul ſaw David, and the 2d, and who ſuppoſes David was but fifteen the 1ſt time.

(63) 1 Kings, chap. i.

(64) By the Prophet Nathan.

(65) 1 Kings, chap. i. ver. 10, and 26.

(66) Ibid. ver. 51, 52.

(67) Ibid. ch. ii.

(68) Ibid. ver. 22.

THIS is the Article as it was reformed by Mr. Bayle, on ſome Complaints againſt the preceding.

DAVID, King of the Jews, was one of the greateſt men in the World, though we ſhould not conſider him as a Royal Prophet, and a man after God's own heart. The firſt time the Scripture makes him appear on the ſtage (a), is to acquaint us that Samuel appointed him King, and performed the ceremony of anointing him. David was then but a ſimple ſhepherd. He was the youngeſt of the eight ſons of Jeſſe the Bethlehemite [A]. After (a) 1 Samuel, chap. xv. ver. 13.

[A] He was the youngeſt of the Sons of Jeſſe the Bethlehemite.] Jeſſe was deſcended in a right line from Judah, one of the twelve ſons of Jacob, and dwelt at Bethlehem, a ſmall city of the Tribe of Judah. Some modern Rabbins ſay, that when David was conceived. Jeſſe his father did not think he enjoyed his Wife, but his maid-ſervant; and hereby they explain the 7th Verſe of the LIſt Pſalm, where David declares that he was ſhapen in iniquity, and that his mother conceived him in ſin. This, ſay they, ſignifies that Jeſſe his father committed an Adultery when he begot him, becauſe tho' he begot him on his wife, he thought he begot him on

(b) Ibid. ver. 20. After this, the Scripture informs us that he was ſent to King Saul (b), to cure him of his fits of frenzy, by the ſound of Muſical Inſtruments [B]. A ſervice of ſuch importance made him ſo much beloved by Saul, that that Prince retained him in his family, and made (c) Ibid. ver. 21. him his Armour-bearer (c). The Scripture proceeds to tell us (d) that David from time (d) Ibid. chap. xvii. ver. 15. to time returned home to his father's, to take care of the flocks, and that one day his father ſent him to Saul's camp with ſome proviſions, which he deſigned for three other of his ſons who were in the army. David, in executing this order, heard the challenge which a Philiſtine named Goliath, proud of his ſtrength and gigantic ſtature, came every day to offer the Iſraelites, without any one of them daring to accept it. He ſhewed a great deſire to go and fight this giant; whereupon he was brought to the King, and aſſured him that he ſhould triumph over the Philiſtine. Saul gave him his armour; but as David found it cumberſome, he put it off, and reſolved to make uſe only of his ſling; (e) Ibid. ver. 49, 50. which he did with ſuch ſucceſs that he felled the boaſter with a ſtone (e), and then killed him with his own ſword, and cut off his head, which he preſented to Saul [C]. That Prince had aſked his General, when he ſaw David march againſt Goliath, Whoſe ſon is (f) Ibid. ver. 55. this youth (f) [D]? The General anſwered that he did not know, and received orders from

(1) See the Journal des Savans of the 14th of July 1692, pag. 465 of the Dutch Edition.

(2) In Bibliotheca magna Rabbinica, Part. 2. pag. 4. quoted in the Journal des Savans, ibid.

(†) Lib. 2 Reg. 17. 25.

(‡) Hieron. Trad. Hebr. in Lib. 2 Reg. cap. 17.

(‡) Toſtat. 2 Reg. 17. Quæſt. 27.

(*) Liran. ibid.

(3) Theſe words are Father Camart's, pag. 126, 127, de Rebus geſtis Eliæ.

(a) 2 Sam. chap. xvii. ver. 25.

(4) This Book is intitled, Precetti da eſſer imparati dalle Donne Ebree. i. e. "Precepts to be "learned by the "Hebrew Wo- "men." See above the Remark [A] of the Article ARODON.

(5) Precetti da eſſer imparati &c. cap. C. pag. 67.

(6) Ancora che Iſaï non lo faceſſe con buona voluntà, dubitando che ſi publicaſſe ſua vergogna. Ibid. pag. 68.

(7) Precetti da eſſer imparati &c. pag. 69.

(8) 1 Samuel, chap. xvii. ver. 54.

(9) Ibid. chap. xxi. ver. 8, 9.

(10) Ibid. chap. xvii. ver. 54.

(11) Joſeph. Antiq. lib. 6. cap. 11, and 14.

on no other than a maid-ſervant, whoſe chaſtity he had tried to corrupt (1). This explication is not very conformable to the doctrine of original ſin; for which reaſon Father Bartolocci (2), having reported this opinion of the modern Rabbins, has thought himſelf obliged occaſionally to examine, whether the ancient Jews acknowledged the truth of this Doctrine. If the ſuppoſition of thoſe Rabbins be true, they would be much in the right to ſay that Jeſſe had committed adultery; but on the other hand, it muſt be owned that he would not have ſinned, if he had gotten his maid with child, when he really believed he was enjoying his wife. This Rabbinical ſuppoſition is very repugnant to the Tradition which St. Jerom mentions. He ſays it was believed that Jeſſe the father of David never committed any actual ſin, and that there was no ſpot in him but what he brought from his mother's womb. Mirum eſt quod de Iſai patre Davidis refert Hieronymus, illum nunquam aliud peccatum commiſiſſe quam quod ex origine contraxit. Quo enim loco legimus: Amaſa (†) ingreſſus eſt ad Abigail filiam Naas ſororem Sarviæ; ſic Hieronymus (‡), Naas interpretatur coluber, quia eum nullum admiſiſſe mortiferum perhibent peccatum, niſi quod originaliter de ſerpente antiquo contraxit. Eſt autem Naas qui & Iſaï pater David. Eamdem traditionem refert Abulenſis (‡), & monet Naas eundem eſſe qui & Jeſſe ſive Iſaï patrem Davidis, quod quidem & antea Liranus (*) docuerat (3). i. e. "It is "a wonderful thing which St. Jerom relates of Jeſſe "the father of David, that he was never guilty of any "other ſin than what he contracted originally. For "the paſſage wherein we read that Amaſa (a) went "in to Abigail the daughter of Nahaſh, ſiſter to Zeru- "iah, is thus expounded by St. Jerom: Nahaſh "ſignifies a ſerpent; for they ſay he was guilty of no "deadly ſin, but what he originally contracted from the "old ſerpent. Now Nahaſh is the ſame with Jeſſe, "the father of David. Abulenſis mentions the ſame "tradition, and obſerves that Nahaſh is the ſame with "Jeſſe or Iſai the father of David; which de Lyra had "likewiſe taught before." They who admit the impertinence of theſe Rabbins concerning the conception of David, might eaſily proceed to another impertinence, and rank David among the illuſtrious baſtards. The Phyſical reaſon which is given why baſtards are ſo frequently born with ſuch extraordinary natural talents, might be properly alledged here with regard to the father.

I have juſt read an Italian Book (4), wherein this Story of the Rabbins is told us in the following manner. David's father was in love with a maid-ſervant, and after frequent applications, he told her at laſt that ſhe ſhould prepare herſelf to lie with him that night. She being no leſs virtuous than beautiful, complained to her miſtreſs, that ſhe could not be at reſt for Jeſſe's ſollicitations. Che non poteva haver ripoſo, riſpetto che il patrone continuamente la tentava per farla giacere una notte con lui (5). Promiſe to content him to night, anſwered her miſtreſs, and I will go and put myſelf in thy place. The project was put in execution two or three nights together. When Jeſſe found that his Wife, with whom he had not lain for a long time, was notwithſtanding with child, he accuſed her of adultery, and would not give credit to what ſhe told him of the bargain ſhe had made with the ſervant. Neither he nor his ſons would ſee the child which ſhe brought into the world, but conſidered him as a baſtard: he treated her with the utmoſt contempt, and cauſed the child to be brought up in the country among the Shepherds. He did not acquaint his neighbours with this ſecret; but concealed his domeſtic ſhame for the ſake of his children. Matters remained in this ſtate till the Prophet Samuel came to ſeek a King in Jeſſe's family. His choice not fixing on any of the ſons which he ſhewed him, David was forced to be fetched: they ſent for him with repugnance, becauſe they were afraid of diſcovering a ſhameful ſecret (6); but when they ſaw that this ſuppoſed baſtard was the perſon whom the Prophet ſought, they ſoon changed their minds; nothing was heard but fine hymns. David began with a Te Deum: he praiſed God who had heard his prayers and delivered him from the mark of baſtardy. Jeſſe continued and ſaid, The ſtone which the builders refuſed, is become the head-ſtone of the corner, which ſhall ſupport the whole houſe. His other ſons, Samuel, &c. alſo ſpoke ſentences. The Rabbin adds that Jeſſe's intention was good; his Wife was old, his maid was young, and he had a deſire to get more children. Il penſiero d'Iſaï era buono, perche eſſendo la patrona vecchia, e la maſſera giovane, havea deſiderio di haver altri figlivoli (7). What a rare Apology is this! if ſuch excuſes ſhould be received, what a multitude of lewd people might be ſheltered from cenſure? Were there ever any doctrines concerning the direction of the intention more commodious than this?

[B] He was ſent to King Saul, to cure him of his fits of frenzy, by the ſound of muſical Inſtruments.] I might produce a great many Collections on this ſubject; but I forbear, and refer you to thoſe of Caſpar Lœſcherus, Profeſſor of Divinity at Wittemberg. Conſult his Diſſertatio Hiſtorico-Theologica de Saule per Muſicam curato. It was printed at Wittembergh in the year 1688.

[C] He ſlew Goliath with his own ſword, and cut off his head, which he came and preſented to Saul.] The arms of Goliath were preſerved as a monument of the Iſraelites glory. David carried them firſt to his tent (8), but probably they were afterwards put in a holy place; for we read (9) that David having aſked the Prieſt Abimelec, if he could not furniſh him with a Spear or Sword, the Prieſt anſwered him: the Sword of Goliath is here, wrapped in a cloth behind the Ephod; if thou wilt take that, take it: and thereupon David had it delivered to him. As to Goliath's head, it was carried to Jeruſalem (10), when David had made choice of that city for the capital of his Kingdom. Joſephus ſays poſitively that it was David himſelf who conſecrated Goliath's Sword to God (11).

[D] Saul had aſked his General. . . . Whoſe ſon is this youth?] It is a little ſtrange that Saul did not know David that day, ſince the young man had ſeveral times played on inſtruments of muſic in his preſence to calm the diſmal vapours which diſturbed him. If ſuch a relation were found in Thucydides or Livy, all the Critics would unanimouſly conclude that the Tranſcribers had tranſpoſed the pages, forgotten ſomething in one place, repeated ſomething in another, or inſerted additional paſſages in the Author's Work. But we muſt not entertain ſuch ſuſpicions with regard from Saul to enquire whoſe ſon he was: but Saul himſelf learned it from the young man's mouth; for when he was brought to him after the Victory, he aſked him, Whoſe ſon art thou? and David anſwered him he was the ſon of Jeſſe (g). Then Saul retained him in his ſervice, without letting him go home to his father any more (h). But as the ſongs which were ſung through all the cities on the defeat of the Philiſtines, aſcribed ten times more glory to David than to Saul (i), the King conceived a violent jealouſy, which increaſed more and more, becauſe the employments which he gave to David in order to remove him from Court, ſerved only to render the young man's merit the more illuſtrious, and to gain him the affection and admiration of the people. By a falſe piece of policy, he would needs have him for his ſon-in-law: he hoped that the condition on which he deſigned to give him his ſecond daughter would deliver him from that object of averſion; but he was confounded by his own artifice. He demanded for his daughter's dowry a hundred fore-ſkins of the Philiſtines. David brought him two hundred fairly told (k); ſo that inſtead of periſhing in that enterprize, as Saul hoped, he returned with a new acceſſion of glory. He married Saul's daughter, and thereby became but the more formidable to the King (l): all his expeditions againſt the Philiſtines were very ſucceſsful; his name grew famous; and he was in high eſteem (m): ſo that Saul, who was much leſs acquainted with the virtue of his ſon-in-law, than the diſpoſition of the people, thought nothing could prevent his being depoſed, but the death of David. He therefore reſolved to get rid of him once for all. He truſted his eldeſt ſon with the deſign, who, far from entring into his father's jealouſy, gave David notice of the black contrivance (n). David fled, and was purſued from place to place, till he had given inconteſtable proofs of his probity, and of his fidelity to his father-in-law, to whom he did not the leaſt hurt on two favourable opportunities (o) which he had of killing him if he had pleaſed. This made Saul reſolve to leave him at reſt. But as David apprehended that Prince might reſume his ill deſigns, he remitted nothing of his former precautions; on the contrary, he provided himſelf a ſafer refuge than before in the land of the Philiſtines (p). He aſked of the King of Gath a City to dwell in, from whence he made frequent inroads into the neighbouring countries (q). He returned to Judæa after Saul's death, and was there declared King by the Tribe of Judah (r). However, the other Tribes ſubmitted to Iſh-boſheth the ſon of Saul; which was the effect of the fidelity of Abner (s). This man, who had been General of the Army under King Saul, placed Iſh-boſheth on the throne, and maintained him on it againſt the efforts of David; but not bearing to be cenſured by Iſh-boſheth for having taken one of Saul's concubines (t), he treated with David to put him in poſſeſſion of Iſh-boſheth's kingdom. The negotiation would have ſoon been concluded to the ſatisfaction of David, if Joab (u), to revenge a private quarrel, had not killed Abner, whoſe death only haſtened the ruin of the unfortunate Iſh-boſheth. Two of his chief Captains ſlew him, and brought his head to David, who, far from rewarding them as they expected, commanded them to be put to death (x). Iſh-boſheth's ſubjects quickly made a voluntary ſubmiſſion to David. That Prince had reigned ſeven years and an half over the Tribe of Judah; and he afterwards reigned about thirty three years over all Iſrael (y). This long reign was remarkable for great ſucceſſes, and glorious conqueſts: it was ſcarce diſturbed by any other means than the criminal attempts of the Prince's own children [E]. Theſe are uſually the enemies which Sovereigns have the moſt to fear. David was very near being reduced to the mean condition

(g) Ibid. ver. 58.

(h) Ibid. chap. xviii. ver. 2.

(i) The women anſwered one another as they played and ſaid, Saul hath ſlain his thouſands and David his ten thouſands. 1 Sam. chap. xviii. ver. 7.

(k) Ibid. ver. 27.

(l) Ibid. ver. 29.

(m) Ibid. ver. 30.

(n) Ibid. chap. xix. ver. 1 & 2.

(o) Ibid. chap. xxiv and xxvi.

(p) Ibid. chap. xxviii.

(q) Ibid.

(r) 2 Samuel, chap. ii. ver. 4.

(s) Ibid. ver. 8.

(t) Ibid. ch. iii.

(u) He was the General of David's Army.

(x) 2 Sam. chap. iv.

(y) Ibid. chap. v. ver. 5.

to the Bible. Notwithſtanding ſome have been ſo bold as to pretend that all the Chapters, or all the Verſes of the firſt Book of Samuel are not placed in their original Order. The Abbot de Choiſi, in my opinion, removes the difficulty a better way. David, ſays he (12), was brought to Saul, who did not know him again at firſt, tho' he had ſeen him frequently when he uſed to ſend for him to play on the harp: but as this was ſeveral years ago, and as David was then very young, and came to Court in quality of a Muſician, and then appeared in the habit of a ſhepherd, it is no wonder that a King, overwhelmed with buſineſs, and whoſe mind was diſordered, ſhould forget the features of a young man's face, in whom there was nothing extraordinary. I only wiſh he had not ſaid: 1, that it was ſeveral years ſince Saul had ſeen David: 2, that David was very young when he came to Saul's Court in quality of a Muſician. There is no likelihood that he was much older when he killed Goliath, than when he came the firſt time to Saul's Court; for at the time of his firſt going thither he was a mighty man and a man of war, and prudent in matters (13); he was but thirty years old when he was elected King after Saul's death; and there muſt neceſſarily have been an interval of ſeveral years between the death of Goliath, and that of Saul. See the Remark wherein we criticize Moreri, and the Remark [I].

(12) Hiſt. de la Vie de David, pag. 8, 9. of the Amſterdam Edition, 1692.

(13) 1 Sam. ch. xvi. ver. 18.

[E] His reign . . . . was only diſturbed by the criminal attempts of his own children.] The moſt conſiderable of their attempts was the revolt of Abſalom, who forced this great Prince to fly from Jeruſalem in a mournful condition, with his head covered, his feet bare, melting into tears, and having his ears ſaluted by nothing but the groans of his faithful ſubjects (14). Abſalom entred Jeruſalem as it were in triumph: and that the zeal of his adherents might not grow cool on an imagination, that this quarrel between the father and the ſon might be made up, he did a thing very proper to perſuade them that he would never be reconciled to David. He lay with the ten concubines of that Prince in the ſight of all the World (15). It is very probable that this crime would have been forgiven him: the extreme ſorrow into which his death threw David is a proof of it. He was the beſt father that was ever ſeen; his indulgence to his children was exceſſive, and he himſelf was the firſt who ſuffered by it. For if he had puniſhed the infamous action of his ſon Amnon (16), as the thing deſerved, he would not have had the ſhame and diſpleaſure to ſee another revenge the injury done to Tamar; and if he had chaſtiſed him who revenged that injury, as he ought to have done, he would not have run the riſque of being abſolutely dethroned. David's deſtiny was the ſame with that of moſt great Princes: he was unhappy in his family. His eldeſt ſon violated his own ſiſter, and was killed by one of his brothers on account of that inceſt: the author of that fratricide lay with David's concubines.

(14) 2 Sam. chap. xv.

(15) Ibid. chap. xvi.

(16) He raviſhed Tamar, and was for that crime ſlain by the order of Abſalom, Tamar's brother both by father and mother. Ibid. chap. xiii.

condition in which Samuel found him. Humanly ſpeaking, this reverſe of fortune would have been inevitable [F], had he not found ſome perſons to act a Traitor's part towards Abſalom his ſon (z). David's piety is ſo conſpicuous in his Pſalms, and in ſeveral of his actions, that it cannot be ſufficiently admired. He is a Sun of holineſs in the Church, through which by his writings he diffuſes a light full of conſolation and piety; but he had his ſpots [G]. The Life of this great Prince publiſhed by the Abbot de Choiſi is a good Book, and would have been much better, if he had taken the pains to ſet down in the margin the years of every action, and the paſſage of the Bible or of Joſephus which ſupplied him with what he advances. A Reader is not pleaſed to be left ignorant whether what he reads comes from a ſacred, or a profane ſource. I ſhall not take notice of many faults of Moreri [H]. The Article of David, which I have lately read in the

(z) Ibid. chap. xv. ver. 34, &c.

[F] He was very near being reduced to the condition . . . . in which Samuel found him . . . . This reverſe of fortune was inevitable.] It may be ſeen by this example that there is no depending on the fidelity of the people; for, in ſhort, David was both a good, and a great King. He had made himſelf beloved, and eſteemed, and he had all imaginable zeal for the Religion of the country. His ſubjects therefore had reaſon to be contented, and if they had been to chooſe a Prince, would they have wiſhed him better qualified? Yet they are ſo unſteady in their duty to David, that his ſon Abſalom, to get himſelf declared King, has no more to do than to make himſelf popular for ſome time, and to keep ſome emiſſaries in each Tribe. We may apply this Maxim to the people, Caſta eſt quam nemo rogavit; i. e. She is chaſte who has never been aſked the queſtion. If we do not ſee more Kings dethroned, it is becauſe the people have not been ſollicited to revolt by intrigues properly conducted. There is nothing wanting but that: if the Prince is not a bad one, it is eaſy to make him paſs for ſuch, or for a ſlave to evil Councils. Pretences are never wanting; and provided they are dextrouſly ſupported, they paſs for a lawful reaſon, how weak ſoever they may be at the bottom.

[G] He had his ſpots.] The numbring of the people was a thing which God looked on as a great ſin (17). His amour with the wife of Uriah, and the orders he gave to deſtroy her huſband (18), are two moſt enormous crimes; but he was ſo grieved for them, and expiated them by ſo admirable a repentance, that this is not the paſſage of his life wherein he contributes the leaſt to the inſtruction and edification of faithful ſouls. We therein learn the frailty of the Saints; and it is a precept of vigilance: we therein learn in what manner we ought to lament our ſins; and it is an excellent model. As to the Remarks, which certain Critics diſplay in order to ſhew that in ſome other actions of his Life he deſerved to be highly blamed, I ſuppreſs them in this Edition, and the more willingly for that perſons much more intelligent than my ſelf in ſuch matters, have aſſured me that all theſe clouds of Objections are eaſily diſperſed, if it be but conſidered, I, That he was King de jure during the life of Saul; II, That he had with him the High Prieſt, who conſulted God to know what ought to be done; III, That the command given to Joſhua to exterminate the infidels of Paleſtine was ſtill in force; IV, That ſeveral other circumſtances taken from Scripture may convince us of David's innocence in a conduct, which conſidered in general appears wicked, and which would be ſo at this day.

(17) 2 Sam. chap. xxiv.

(18) Ibid. chap. xi.

[H] I ſhall not take notice of many faults of Moreri.] Five only.

I. David was two and twenty years old, when Samuel anointed him with the oil appointed for the conſecration of Kings. This is inconſiſtent with what follows, and with what goes before. Our Author had juſt ſaid that David was born in the year of the world 2950, and a little after he tells us that David vanquiſhed Goliath in the year of the world 2971. It is manifeſt that the victory over Goliath was poſterior to David's being anointed; whereas, according to Moreri, the ceremony of anointing him was not performed till a year after that victory. To correct this fault, it ſhould be ſaid that David was anointed at the age of twenty (59). The reſt needs no correction; for it is true that David overcame Goliath the year after he was anointed.

(19) He was born, according to Calviſius, in the year of the World 2860, and was anointed by Samuel in the year of the World 2880, and killed Goliath the year after.

II. It is not true that Saul renewed the perſecution againſt David, after the latter had twice forborn to do him the leaſt harm, tho' he had the moſt favourable opportunity in the world. It is a little ſurprizing that the Scripture, to aggravate Saul's crime, ſhould not take notice that he quickly repented of his reconciliation with David, and rendred himſelf guilty of black ingratitude. In the XXIVth Chapter of the firſt Book of Samuel, he is informed that David, having it in his power to kill him in a cave, would not do him any hurt: he admires this generoſity; he prays God to reward it; he owns that the crown is deſtinated for David; he recommends his family to him; and returns home. In the XXVIth Chapter of the ſame Book, he is informed that David, having it in his power to kill him by night in his tent, retires without touching him: he admires this generoſity; he gives David his bleſſing; he foretells him all ſorts of proſperity; and returns to his houſe. Moreri ſuppoſes that theſe two actions, ſo very like one another, happened the ſame year. I repeat it: it is a little ſurprizing that the Scripture does not make uſe of the firſt of theſe two facts, to make Saul's obſtinacy in perſecuting his ſon-in-law more odious. Two or three times might have produced a conſiderable effect: a Reader would have been ſtruck to ſee that Saul, being obliged to his Son in Law for his Life, praiſes him, admires him, wiſhes him a thouſand bleſſings, and yet in a little time takes the field again to deſtroy him. The laws of Hiſtory require, without doubt, that in the ſpeaking of this new purſuit, it ſhould be obſerved that it was an infraction of that ſolemn agreement which had followed the adventure of the cave: and yet you will not find one tittle in the Scripture concerning this circumſtance. Here is further matter of ſurprize. David repreſenting to Saul that he had not deſerved the perſecution which he ſuffered, and that he could eaſily have killed him in his tent, does not put him in mind that it was the ſecond time he had had the King's life in his power, and that the King had ſoon forgotten the adventure of the cave. Saul, on his part, owns himſelf in the wrong, and ſpeaks to David with the utmoſt civility, and yet takes no notice that it was the ſecond time he owed his life to him. It muſt be confeſſed that ſuch circumſtances are not to be forgotten. Beſides, we ſee that on the firſt of theſe two occaſions, David and Saul make uſe of nearly the ſame words as they do on the ſecond. If I ſaw two accounts of this nature in Ælian or in Valerius Maximus, I ſhould make no difficulty to believe that they were but one Action, which having been related two different ways, ſerved for the ſubject of two articles, or of two chapters. The fact would be, that David having the life of Saul, his cruel perſecutor, in his hands, religiouſly preſerved it. The two ways of relating the affair would be, 1, that Saul, being obliged to ſtep aſide from his men on a private occaſion, entred into a cave where David was; 2, that David by night ſlipped thro' the camp as far as Saul's tent, while the guards were faſt aſleep. I leave Father Simon and the Critics of his ſize to examine whether the Hiſtorical Books of the old Teſtament might not poſſibly relate the ſame thing twice. It ſeems to me that the action of the Ziphites, related in the XXIII Chapter of the I Book of Samuel is not different from that which is related in the XXVI Chapter of the ſame Book. Whoever will take the pains to compare theſe two Relations, will doubtleſs be of my mind. But what is very certain is, that Saul did not perſecute David after the ſecond reconciliation. This is Moreri's ſecond fault.

Observations on a Narrative contained in the Books of Samuel.

The III conſiſts in his aſſerting that David was ſo well received by Achiſh King of Gath, that the ſudden favour ſhewn him was very near cauſing the great men to revolt. There is not a word of truth in all this; and the Dictionary of the Bible will furniſh me with matter for a Remark [I].

and I ſee nothing that could have produced ſuch a falſhood, except the ſuſpicions which were formed againſt David, when they ſaw him with his troops in the rear-guard of Achiſh's army. The chiefs of the Philiſtines would abſolutely have David return back to the city which had been given him (20). Theſe Chiefs were very different from the great Men of the King of Gath's Court.

(20) 1 Sam. chap. xxix.

IV. The ſuppoſed diſcontent of the Great Men did not oblige David to retire from that Court. He retired thence out of reſpect: he was apprehenſive leſt he and his people ſhould incommode the Prince by their abode in the capital: he therefore deſired Achiſh to aſſign him ſome other habitation; which was granted him. This happened before the Chiefs of the Philiſtines demanded that David ſhould quit their camp.

V. It ſhould not have been ſaid that David returned to Ziklag, ſince no notice had been taken that he had dwelt there before.

[I] The Article of David .... in the Dictionary of the Bible will furniſh me with matter for a Remark.] The Printers were got thus far when I was ſhewn a Dictionary (21), which I immediately conſulted in the Article of the Prophet David. I have found ſome paſſages in it, which have given me occaſion to make a few Obſervations. I. It is not true that David came into the world 110 years before the birth of Jeſus Chriſt: there were above a thouſand years (22) between the birth of the one and that of the other. II. The Author endeavours to remove the difficulty which ſtares every Reader in the face, when he conſiders that Saul did not know David on the day that Goliath was killed: he ſtrives, I ſay, to remove it, and perplexes himſelf more than he needs; for he ſays in one place (23) that David, at the age of ſeventeen went to play on the harp to Saul, and in another (24) he makes him to be but fourteen or fifteen, and a very little boy. Preſently after, deſigning to refute thoſe who ſay that his combate againſt Goliath was prior to his playing on the harp, he forms a ſpecious Objection to himſelf drawn from the commendation which was given David, of his being a valiant man and a good warrior (25). To this I anſwer, ſays he, that we are not to conclude from theſe two words, Fortiſſimum & Bellicoſum, that the combate was before the playing on the harp, becauſe the epithet of ſtrong may be given to any one, provided he be really ſo with reſpect to his age. Is not he very ſtrong who can run down Lions and Bears, fight with them, and ſtrangle them? Here is an Anſwer which ſuppoſes that David being yet very little, and a young lad of fourteen or fifteen years old, had fought with lions, had run them down, had ſtrangled them, and might be called a ſtrong man, a warriour, and a man prudent in matters. This difficulty is conſiderable enough to deſerve to be obviated: whence comes it then that our Author does not ſo much as ſeem to perceive it? His ſilence will not prevent Readers, who have any penetration, from ſeeing very plainly that ſince David fought Goliath at the age of one and twenty (26), he muſt be near twenty years old the firſt time he went to Saul's Court. And ſo the reaſon which our Author advances as the beſt why Saul did not know David the day of the combate againſt Goliath, is good for nothing (27): The reaſon is, becauſe a little boy alters his features ſo much in ſeven years time, that thoſe who do not ſee him again till after an abſence of ſeven years, do not know him. This is not David's caſe: therefore recourſe muſt be had to other reaſons. The Author mentions thoſe which ſeveral Commentators have deviſed. If they do not fully ſatisfy thoſe who are not difficult to be pleaſed, the fault muſt be laid on the nature of the queſtion. III. The Author forgets the ſtrongeſt proof that can be alledged againſt thoſe who will have it that David was not ſent for to drive away Saul's evil ſpirit, till after the combate with Goliath. He does not alledge that thoſe people reverſe the order in which the Scripture relates the events; he does not alledge that Saul's ſervant, who praiſed David for being robuſt, a warrior, eloquent, and beautiful, ſaid nothing of the Victory over Goliath. Nor is it impoſſible to comprehend that they who were deſirous of recommending him to the King after that combate ſhould be ſo ſtupid as not to tell the Prince at once, The ſame young man, who ſlew Goliath, plays well on muſical Inſtruments, and he will cure you.

(21) It is the Dictionary of the Bible compoſed by Mr. Simon, Prieſt, Doctor of Divinity, and printed at Lyons, 1693, in folio.

(22) There were 1090, according to Calviſius.

(23) Pag. 249.

(24) Pag. 259.

(25) Et reſpondent unus de pueris ait, ecce vidi filium Iſai Bethlemitem ſcientem pſallere, & fortiſſimum robore, virum bellicoſum, &c. Ibid. pag. 259.] See 1 Sam. chap. xvi. ver. 18.

(26) It is the ſuppoſition of the Author of the Dictionary of the Bible, pag. 249.

(27) He cites the Author of the Hiſtory of the Bible, who puts eight years between the 1ſt time that Saul ſaw David, and the 2d, and who ſuppoſes David was but fifteen the 1ſt time.

The fear of being too prolix prevents my examining whether the Author has failed in exactneſs in the remainder of the Article. He has avoided the inconvenience which I have remarked in the the Abbot de Choiſi; having ſet down the years wherein David did ſuch and ſuch a thing.

(a) He is alſo called Aurat, d'Aurat, Dorat.

(b) Papyr. Maſſo, in Elog. Jo. Aurati.

DAURAT (a) (JOHN) in Latin Auratus, a learned Philoſopher and excellent Poet, was a Limoſin [A], and of an ancient family, whoſe name, they ſay, he quitted [B], to take another which has been a fruitful ſource of a great many witticiſms [C]. Going to the capital of the Kingdom (b) to finiſh his ſtudies, he there made an extraordinary progreſs, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf in ſuch a manner by his ſkill in Greek, and his talent at [A] He was a Limoſin.] Thuanus, La Croix du Maine, Du Verdier, Mr. Menage, and ſeveral others, make him a native of Limoges. It may be queſtioned whether they have juſt grounds for it, conſidering that Papyrius Maſſo ſays he was born near the head of the Vienne (1). Had he been born in the Capital of the Limoſin, I do not think his friends, when they were writing his Elogy, would have aſſigned for his birth-place a village which they do not ſo much as name.

(1) Pap. Maſſo, in Elogio Jo. Aurati.

(2) La Croix du Maine, Biblioth. pag. 201.

(3) Menage, Remarques ſur la Vie d'Ayrault, pag. 186. Baillet, Auteurs déguiſez, pag. 155.

(4) The cuſtom of dining too early.

(5) Coulon, Rivieres de France, Part. 1. pag. 323.

(6) Menage, Remarques ſur la Vie d'Ayrault, pag. 186, 499.

(7) Naud. Præf. in Opuſc. Niphi.

[B] .... and of an ancient family, the name of which they ſay he quitted.] He was of the family of Dinemandi and Bremondais (2). It is ſaid (3) that the name of Dinemandi, ſignifying in the language of the country One who dines in the morning, and thereby intimating ſomething mean (4), did not pleaſe him, and that he changed it into that of Daurat, which ſignifies in Gaſcon the ſame as the French word Doré, i. e. Gilt, and which had been formerly given to one of his anceſtors on account of his fair hair. Others aſſert that our Poet took this new name becauſe his birth-place was ſituate on the little River Aurance (5). Monſr. Menage informs me that Daurat's mother was of the family of Bermondet (6): wherefore the name ſhould be ſo corrected in La Croix du Maine, and Bremondais ſtruck out. Naudé does not forget our Daurat, when he ſpeaks (7) of thoſe who have changed the name of their family. Illud .... pro Joanne Manepranſo, Auratum .... exhibet. Mr. Menage has introduced Daurat under the name of Orthrophagus, in his Metamorphoſis of Gargilius Macro. See below the Remark [D] of the Article Goulu (Nicholas).

[C] .... To take another which has been a fruitful ſource of a great many witticiſms.] They could not miſs of this, in an age wherein puns, clenches, and low jeſts were current coin; but now they are cried down, and will not paſs. Du Verdier Vau-Privas (8) has preſerved us a ſonnet full of gilding, or alluſions to gold, in honour of John Dorat. The learned Francis Hottoman doubtleſs thought it a lucky hit when he made this diſtich againſt him:

(8) Biblioth. pag. 685, 686.

Ex ſolido eſſe prius vulgus quem credidit auro,
Extrorſum auratus, plumbeus intus erat (9).
That is,
"He who the vulgar fancied heretofore
"Was ſolid gold, proves lead juſt gilded o're."

(9) Matagonis de Matagonibus, ad Italogalliam Matharelli, pag. m. 248.

Neither Daurat nor his diſciple Ronſard got any thing by exerciſing their Muſes againſt the Proteſtants; it was attacking too rough antagoniſts. The former, adopting a very low idea or metaphor, wrote againſt the frogs of the great lake of Geneva, and compared them to the frogs in the Revelations. It was very proper indeed, to talk to them of the Revelations. In this anſwer they feigned among other things, that their frogs inſtead of croaking, cried AU at Poetry, that he became one of the Profeſſors of the Univerſity of Paris. In the year 1560, as it is ſaid, he ſucceeded John Stracellus in the poſt of the King's Reader and Profeſſor of the Greek Tongue (c); but before this he had been Principal of the College of Coqueret (d), after having been Tutor to John Anthony de Baïf, in the houſe of Lazarus de Baïf, his father, Maſter of Requeſts. He had continued to inſtruct this young pupil in the College of Coqueret, and he had alſo the famous Ronſard (e) for his ſcholar there, during the ſpace of ſeven years. One of the moſt obſervable and moſt glorious elogies of Daurat is, that his ſchool produced a great number of able men (f). He had an excellent method of teaching, and his aſpect which was ſomewhat clowniſh and diſagreeable [D], was no obſtacle to the ſucceſs of his Lectures. He was acceſſible to every body, he loved to cut jokes, and ſometimes even made great entertainments, appearing on all occaſions very far from being avaricious [E]; which, with the ſtars or fatality attending his profeſſion, might well be the cauſe of the poverty to which he found himſelf

(c) Du Breul, Antiq. de Paris, pag. m. 565.

(d) Dinet, Vie de Ronſard.

(e) Ronſard's entrance into this College falls about the year 1545, ſince he was then above 20 years old.

(f) Docuit diu ſumma cum gloria & diſcipulos habuit omnes fere præſtantiores Galliæ viros, vicinarumque gentium lectiſſimos. Papyr. Maſſo, in Elog. Jo. Aurati. See alſo Thuan. lib. 89. Sammarth. Elog. lib. 3. pag. m. 55.

RAT AU RAT † de Limouſin, and complained of the RONSES ‡ de Vandomois (10). They even returned him the abuſe in kind, for they called him the Limoſin frog (11). Hottoman called him Radiſh-eater (α §). Vidi multos, ſays he (12), qui dicebant quod illa carmina melius valebant aureum quam omnia poëtaſtrorum epigrammata in fine tui libri poſita duos denarios, etiam ſine excipiendo ſuum vicinum Lemovicem raphanophagum Joh. Auratum. i. e. "I have ſeen ſeveral who "ſaid thoſe verſes were better worth a piſtole than all "thoſe Poetaſters epigrams placed at the end of your "book were worth two pence, even not excepting "your neighbour John Daurat the Limoſin radiſh-"eater." I do not know whether Daurat ever turned into verſe the anſwer he made uſe of againſt a Miniſter of Geneva, who had told him that the ſign of the Croſs, which the Catholics make on their perſons, ſeems deſigned to drive away the flies. Du Verdier Vauprivas, who mentions (13) this anſwer (14) with great marks of approbation, pretends that Daurat paſſing thro' Geneva, in his return from Italy, was ſollicited to embrace Calviniſm, and that he was promiſed a good Salary, but he could not accuſtom himſelf to that doctrine. It was after this journey, doubtleſs, that he wrote the Poem which drew on him a ſhower of alluſions.

† Alluding to Auratus.

‡ Or Thorns, in alluſion to Ronſard.

(10) See Garaſſe, Doctrine Cur. pag. 127.

(11) Le Labour. Addit. a Caſteln. tom. 2. pag. 674.

(12) Matagonis de Matagonibus, ad Italogalliam Matharelli, pag. 247.

(13) Proſopographie, tom. 3. pag. 2575.

(14) It turns upon Beelzebub's ſignifying the Lord of flies.

[§ α] The word Raphanophagus uſed by Francis Hottoman, ſhould be rendered by mâche-rabe, or Turnip-eater, which is the nick-name of the Limoſins, and particularly of the Peaſants, ſuch as Daurat, to judge of the man by his clowniſh outſide. The devil take this turnip-eater (maſche-rabe), he ſtinks ſo, ſays Pantagruel in Rabelais †, ſpeaking of the Limoſin School-boy who had befouled himſelf while that Giant held him by the throat. Beſides, we know the Magnificat of the Peaſants of the Limoſin: Monſieur Saint Marſau noſtre bon fondature, Prega per nous noſtre Seignour, qu'il nous veuille bien garda noſtra raba, noſtra caſtagna, noſtra fama. Alleluia. i. e. "Monſr. St. "Marſaw, our good founder, pray for us to our "Lord, that he will be pleaſed to preſerve our tur-"nips, our cheſnuts, and our honour. Alleluia." As the perſons of the Limoſin are very poor, and for want of corn, fill their bellies with a ſort of rapes or large round turnips, which they do not take even the time to boil; from thence came this nick-name, which reproaches theſe poor people both with their poverty, and the unſavoury blaſts one is expoſed to when near them. John de la Bruiere-Champier, in his Treatiſe de re cibaria * where he ſpeaks of ſeveral ſpecies of this ſort of rapes, ſays: Subaudis ac Lemovicis palma tribuitur, ut olim apud Romanos Nurſinis. Vulgus Gallicum Sabaudis atque Lemovicis rediiſſe ad reſtim clamat, ubi rapa gelu exuſta fuerint, aut aliqua injuria ſoli cælive perierint. . . . Inflationes crudiora minuſque cocta facere creduntur. Unde crepitus Ventris ingentes veſcentibus fiunt. i. e. Thoſe of Savoy "and the Limoſin are eſteemed the beſt, as were thoſe "of Nurſia among the Romans. The common peo-"ple of France ſay the Savoyards and Limoſins may "hang themſelves when their rapes are ſpoiled by the "froſt, or deſtroyed by any injury of the ſoil or wea-"ther. . . . When raw or not enough boiled they are "thought to cauſe wind: for which reaſon thoſe who "feed on them are ſubject to rouſing exploſions." Moreover Rabelais, where he ſpeaks of thoſe thick and ſhort perſons whom the French call Nabottes ‡, and compares them to this ſort of turnips, might have furniſhed Mr. Menage with an authority to put to the Etymology he gives of that word. CRIT. REM.]

† Book 2. chap. 6.

* Lib. ix. cap. 2.

‡ Rabel. lib. II. chap. 27.

§ [D] His aſpect was ſomewhat clowniſh and diſagreeable.] Moreri has overſtrained theſe Words of Maſſo, tametſi vultu ſubruſtico & inſuavi erat, by tranſlating them thus; they who writ his Elogy confeſs that he was the ugliest man in the world, and had the appearance of a clown. This is a ſignal falſification to the prejudice of this famous Poet Laureat. The Latin we have juſt read differs but by one half from what has been ſaid of Voiture; viz. that he had a countenance ſomewhat ſilly, but yet agreeable (15). I am willing to believe that Daurat fell infinitely ſhort of the politeneſs which ſhone in Voiture: but I cannot imagine he was deſtitute of that knowledge of the world, and thoſe graces of converſation, which men of learning ought to poſſeſs in order to be eſteemed in a Court; for we ſhall ſee below that Charles IX took exceeding great pleaſure in hearing him, and admired his diverting ſtories, and his jeſts: and we learn from Brantôme that Daurat viſited people of the beſt quality. The firſt time, ſays he (16), that I heard the ſtory of the Epheſian Matron, Monſr. d'Aurat told it to the brave Monſr. du Gua, and to ſome company who dined with him. He adds that Mr. d'Aurat ſaid he had it from Lampridius; but Petronius is the Author from whom he had it, and I ſhould rather impute this little ſlip of memory to Brantôme than to our Poet. Du Verdier obſerves that Daurat was a little man of a mean aſpect, but of great wit (17).

(15) Hiſt. de l'Acad. Françoiſe, pag. m. 301.

(16) Dames Galantes, tom. 2. pag. 140.

(17) Du Verdier, Proſopographie, tom. 3. pag. 2575.

[E] He was very far from being avaricious.] This commendation and the foregoing directly contradict the calumnies of Scaliger; for here is what he ſays (18) under the word Auratus: Il eſt fort fantaſque & ſordidus comme Moncaud, ſed non tam. Il coupoit toutes les marges de ſon Barthole & eſcrivoit là. Il a peu de livres. i. e. "He was very fantaſtical and almoſt as "ſordid as Moncaud. He uſed to cut off all the mar-"gins of his Bartolus, and to write on them. He "has but few Books." How can this be reconciled with Papyrius Maſſo, who maintains that our Poet valued money no more than dirt, and judged thoſe unworthy of the name of a Poet who were too good huſbands? Add to this the teſtimony of Thuanus, which I quote in the following remark. When we conſider that Scaliger has highly praiſed Daurat with regard to Poetry, and critical learning, we cannot believe that he was prejudiced againſt him; and yet what dependence is there on what he ſays? Does he not aſſert that Daurat had a ſalary of 1200 crowns at Padua or at Piſa? and yet who dares believe that Daurat ever had a Profeſſorſhip in either of thoſe two cities? Does not Scaliger ſpeak as if Daurat was yet alive? but is this conſiſtent with a thouſand other things which are in the Scaligerana, and which muſt neceſſarily have been ſaid ten or twelve years after Scaliger was ſettled at Leyden, where he arrived in 1593, five years after the death of Daurat? To remove theſe difficulties, muſt we not ſuppoſe a thing which is falſe, viz. that the two nephews of Peter Pithœus, who collected the Scaligerana, lived fifteen or twenty years with Scaliger? One of theſe two things muſt have happened, either that Scaliger's memory frequently failed him in the converſations he had with thoſe young men, or elſe that they confounded what they heard from him. However, it cannot be denied but that he had ſeen Daurat: he acquaints us (19) that they went together to pay a viſit to the Sieur de la Croix du Maine, and that Daurat, who could not pronounce the Letter B, ſaid to him as they were coming away, Oſcura diligentia; which was the judgment he paſſed on the labours of the perſon, whom they

(18) In the 2d Scaligerana.

(19) Scaligerana, pag. m. 148.

himſelf reduced [F], and which has given him a place in the Liſt of learned men who have been very near ſtarving (g). However, Charles IX had honoured him with the title of his Poet, and had taken great delight in converſing with him [G]. It was not in his reign, but in the reign of Henry II (h), that Daurat was Preceptor to the King's pages for a year [H]: I know not whether the vexations, which obliged him to quit that poſt, proceeded, either wholly, or in part, from the malapertneſs of thoſe lads. Conſidering the age in which he lived, we ought to forgive him the taſte he had for Anagrams, of which he was the firſt reſtorer (i): it is pretended that he found the Model of them in Lycophron. He brought them ſo much into vogue, that every body would needs try at them. He paſſed for a geat conjurer in that way, and ſeveral illuſtrious perſons gave him their names to anagrammatize. He undertook alſo to explain the Centuries of Noſtradamus, which he did with ſuch ſucceſs [I], if ſome perſons ſay true, that he ſeemed to be inveſted with the character of his Interpreter, or Sub-prophet. But theſe are not the ſhining parts of his life (§ β). It is better ſtill to ſee him married again, in his extreme old age, to a young girl of nineteen [K], and to hear him ſay for his excuſe, that it

(g) See Maturin. Simonius, de Literis pereuntibus, apud Barthium in Stat. pag. 447.

(h) About the year 1554. See Thuan. lib. 13. towards the end, pag. m. 278. See alſo the Article LORRAINE, Remark [N].

(i) Papyr. Maſſo, Elog. Jo. Auratı. Claudius Verderius, Cenſur. in Auctor. pag. 45. Dinet, Vie de Ronſard.

they had been to viſit. I had forgotten a very ſtrong Objection, which is alone ſufficient to convince us that one man is here taken for another. Can it be ſaid of Daurat, a man who minded nothing but Greek, and Poetry, that Bartolus was a book of his? It belongs to a Profeſſor of Law to ſignalize his ſordid avarice by writing on the parings of his Bartolus.

[F] . . . . Which . . . . might be the cauſe of the poverty to which he found himſelf reduced.] Thuanus, owning, on the one hand, that Daurat enjoyed to the time of his death the penſion which had been continued to him when he ſurrendred his place, acknowledges, on the other, that he had always neglected his private intereſt, and had been for a long time reduced to deplorable indigence. Vir ad aliorum ſtudia ac commoda promovenda natus, qui rem familiarem tota vita neglexerat, deploranda jam pridem egeſtate premeretur (20). Papyrius Maſſo allows he left no riches, tho' he had in his old age taſted of the bounty of King Charles IX. Exceſſit è vita dives opibus, iis præſertim quas virtus parit, non quibus mortalium genus avidum expleri nequit (21). i. e. "He died rich indeed in "thoſe treaſures which are procured by virtue, but "not in thoſe of which greedy mortals are ſo in-"ſatiably covetous." This invincibly refutes the pretended niggardlineſs of which the Scaligerana accuſes him; nor can the policy which Charles IX made uſe of with regard to Poets be an objection of any weight. Brantôme (22) tells us that Prince was a great lover of poetry, and recompenſed thoſe who preſented him with verſes, not at once, but by little and little, that they might be continually forced to do well; ſaying that Poets were like horſes, which ſhould be fed, but not pampered and made fat; becauſe then they are good for nothing. This would be a weak Objection; for with whatever reſerve that Monarch had gratified his Poet, he would at leaſt have put a man who was ſordidly covetous in ſuch a condition as to be above poverty.

(20) Thuan. lib. 89. pag. 175.

(21) Papyr. Maſſo, Elog. tom. 2. pag. 290.

(22) Vie de Charles IX.

[G] Charles IX . . . . took great delight in converſing with him.] I am going to ſet down the whole paſſage of Papyrius Maſſo; which furniſhes matter for criticiſm. Carolo nono, ſays he (23), Regi Chriſtianiſſimo chariſſimus atque acceptiſſimus fuit (Auratus). Is enim in decrepita ætate facetias hominis & argutias mirabatur, honeſtabatque præmiis poëtæ ſui venerabilem ſenectam. i. e. Daurat was much beloved and careſſed by the "moſt Chriſtian King Charles IX; for he admired "the man's pleaſantry and wit in a decrepit age, and "honoured his venerable Poet with rewards." Methinks this Writer is much in the wrong to repreſent our Poet as a decrepit old man in the reign of Charles IX: it is not a proper way of ſpeaking of a man who is but ſixty or ſixty five, who lives to above fourſcore with little or no ſickneſs, and who gets children but a few years before his death. Now this may be ſaid of Daurat, according to Papyrius Maſſo, whoſe words follow (24): Prope octogenarius aliquot jam pridem procreatis liberis, amiſſaque priori conjuge adoleſcentulam duxit, ex eaque Polycarpum, ſeniles delicias, filiolum incredibili gaudio ſuſcepit, blandiuſculè cum eo colludens, & inſtar ſimiæ manibus efferens . . . (25) deceſſit proſpera fere ſemper uſus valetudine . . . anno Domini 1588 . . . major octuagenario. i. e. "Being near fourſcore, and "long ago father of ſeveral children, having loſt his "firſt wife, he married a young girl, and by her, to "his great joy, had a ſon named Polycarp, the de-"light of his old age, whom he uſed fondly to play "with, and to dandle in his arms like an ape . . . . "After a life of almoſt perpetual good health he died ". . . in the year 1588 . . . at the age of above four-"ſcore." On the other hand it is notorious that the reign of Charles IX reaches but from 1561 to 1574. To conclude, Lorenzo Craſſo, who thought it was King Henry III who conferred the title of Poeta Regius (26) on Daurat, did not know that honour was of more ancient date. You ſee Papyrius Maſſo ſays that Charles IX called Daurat his Poet.

(23) Payyr. Maſſo, Elog. tom. 2. pag. 290.

(24) Idem, ibid. pag. 289.

(25) Idem, ibid. pag. 290.

(26) Iſtor. de Poëti, pag. 265.

[H] He was Preceptor to the King's Pages for the ſpace of a year.] Thuanus does not ſay how long this employment laſted; he only ſays that Daurat exerciſed it before he was Profeſſor: Primum pueris regiis erudiendis admotus, dein . . . . in regio gymnaſio diu Profeſſor: in which paſſage the French Tranſlator has been guilty of a blunder; for he has rendred it, he was firſt employed in inſtructing the King's ſons (27): but Mr. Menage quotes (28) ſome Verſes of Daurat, which prove that he held this poſt but a year, and that it had given him a great deal of vexation:

(27) See Teiſſier, Elog. tom. 2. pag. 138.

(28) Rem. ſur Ayrault, pag. 187.

Aulica jam paſſus faſtidia mille per annum;
Hunc tandem in portum, ventis jactatus & undis,
Nauſeam ut evomerem tanti maris, alter Ulyſſes Evaſi.

That is,

"Twelve months I bore the toſſings of a Court,
"Till, wind and weather beat, I made this Port,
"Where, like a ſecond Ithacus, I ſhou'd
"Diſcharge my ſea-ſick ſtomach of its load."

Mr. Menage adds that Papyrius Maſſo ſpeaks of this Preceptorſhip: but I have not found any ſuch thing in the Elogies of that Writer.

[I] He undertook to explain the Centuries of Noſtradamus, . . . with ſucceſs.] Mr. Teiſſier (29) quotes for this Papyrius Maſſo and Sammarthanus, who ſay nothing of it: he ſhould have quoted la Croix du Maine (30) and Du Verdier Vau-Privas. The words of the latter are remarkable: Dorat, ſays he (31), ſet up for an Interpreter of Dreams: he valued the Centuries of Noſtradamus, containing certain prophecies of which he gave interpretations confirmed by ſeveral events, and uſed to ſay an Angel dictated them to Michael Noſtradamus (32) when he wrote them.

(29) Elog. tom. 2. pag. 110.

(30) Biblioth. pag. 330.

(31) Proſopogrophie, tom. 3. pag. 2575.

(§ β) [The Memoirs of the State of France †, after having ſpoken of the Maſſacre of the Admiral de Châtillon, and the manner in which the body of that Nobleman had been ſerved by the mob, ſays that John Dorat the Poet wrote ſome Latin Verſes, in which he derides the Admiral, blazoning each member of his mutilated body. I doubt whether this paſſage of Daurat's Life be more to his honour than others with which he has been reproached. CRIT. REM.]

(32) The French Edition has, & diſoit Michel que Noſtre Dame, which is plainly a fault of the preſs.

† Tom. 1. fol. 278, verſo.

[K] He was married again . . . . to a girl of nineteen.] So we ſhould tranſlate theſe words of Sammarthanus, undeviginti annorum puella. Moreri, Teiſſier (33), and Bullart (34), who make this girl two and twenty, would doubtleſs be very hard put to it to produce a contemporary Writer to warrant their aſſertion, who deſerves equal credit with him whom I oppoſe to them. Mr. Menage ſays ſhe was but eighteen (35).

(33) Eloges, tom. 2. pag. 110.

(34) Bullart, Acad. des Scienc. vol. 2. pag. 360.

(35) Remarq. ſur la Vie d'Ayrault, pag. 187.

it was a poetic licence (k); and that being to die by the thruſt of a ſword, he choſe rather to perform the execution with a bright ſword, than a ruſty one (l). This new marriage proved fruitful, and made him father of a ſon, for whom he ſhewed his fondneſs by a thouſand ridiculous actions (m). If Thuanus and his Tranſlator had conſidered this, they would doubtleſs have weighed their expreſſions better for the honour of the young married woman [L]. Daurat had by his firſt wife, among other children, a ſon who was the Author of ſome French Verſes which have been printed (n), and a daughter whom he married to a learned man named Nicholas Goulu (o), in whoſe favour he reſigned his place of Regius Profeſſor of the Greek Tongue [M]. He made a great many Verſes [N], in Latin, Greek, and even in French: and indeed it was his diſeaſe to make too many; for no Book was printed, nor did any perſon of conſequence die, but Daurat made ſome Verſes on the ſubject, as if he had been Poet in ordinary of the Kingdom, or (k) Sammarth. in ejus Elogio.

(l) Papyr. Maſſo, in Elog. Jo. Aurati. I quote his words in the Remark [G].

(m) Idem, ibid.

(n) They are in the Collection of his Father's Poems, and if the Title ſays true, they were made by the Author at ten years of age. Menage, Remarq. ſur la Vie d'Ayrault, pag. 187. The daughter alſo was learned, as we ſhall obſerve under the Article of GOULU (Nicholas).

(o) Sammarth. in ejus Elogio. La Croix du Maine, pag. 201.

[L] For the honour of the young married woman.] Thuanus has actually ſaid, that what leſſened the regret for Daurat's death, was that old age had rendred him incapable of all the functions of his office (36). Who would not believe him unable to get a child? Who would believe that a good old man who had not ſtrength to explain a Verſe of Homer to his Scholars, ſhould have preſerved vigour enough to conſummate his marriage with a young girl? So that we cannot literally believe Thuanus's relation, without entertaining violent ſuſpicions againſt our Poet's young ſpouſe, as if ſhe had put in practice the maxim, that a woman of ſenſe never wants heirs, or as if her huſband might with great reaſon have applied to himſelf this old ſentence;

Qu'autant vieillard à la barbe fleurie,
Pour ſes voiſins que pour lui ſe marie.

"That an old Grey-beard takes a wife no leſs
"To ſerve his neighbours, than himſelf to bleſs."

(36) So theſe Latin words have been tranſlated, Ob ſenium inutilis ejus opera eſſe cœpiſſet.

Thus Amiot tranſlates the following Greek words, ſpoken by a man advanced in years: Γαμῶ γέρων, ἐν οἴδα, κὴ τοῖς γείτοσι. Duco uxorem, probe ſcio, vicinis quoque (37). In reality, nothing would appear more contradictory to thoſe who pay the ſalaries of Profeſſors and Miniſters, than to ſee that in order to get a man declared Emeritus, whoſe wife ſhould be with child, it ſhould be alledged that age had rendred him utterly incapable of mounting the chair.

(37) Plutarch. an ſeni ſit gerenda Reſpub. pag. 789.

Take notice ſome people (38) ſay that a little before he died he had married a young ſervant-maid, tho' he was fourſcore years old . . . and that it is not ſaid that he had any children by her (39), as he had by a very virtuous Lady who was his firſt wife. Here is a man, therefore, proper to be put into the Catalogue which Mr. Menage mentions (40).

(38) Pierre de S. Romuald, Journal Chronol. & Hiſtor. at the 6th of October, pag. m. 396. He places Ronſard's death on that day 1589.

(39) This is falſe. See the Remark [G], Citation (24).

(40) See the Article BRISEIS, Citation (15).

[M] He married a daughter . . . to . . . N. Goulu, in whoſe favour he reſigned his Poſt of Regius Profeſſor of the Greek tongue.] Sammarthanus, without ſetting down the time, ſays that Daurat having been made Poeta Regius, reſigned his poſt of Profeſſor to Goulu his ſon-in-law. Thuanus ſpeaks of the thing in a manner yet more uncertain: he contents himſelf with ſaying (41) that after Daurat had for a long time diſcharged the office of Profeſſor in the College Royal, he became Emeritus, gave over the functions of that employment, and enjoyed a penſion which was paid him to his death. But du Breul acquaints us with the time; for he ſays that Nicholas Goulu was promoted to d'Aurat's place by the King's Warrant of the 8th of November 1567 (42). I ſhall make two Remarks on the whole; one, that Thuanus ſhould not have ſaid that Daurat's death was the leſs regretted becauſe old age, and the civil war which had driven all the youth from Paris, had began to render his labour uſeleſs. This ſignifies that he might have ſtill done ſervice if there had been any ſcholars at Paris, and that he had actually been ſerviceable till he ſunk under the infirmities of old age. He had not therefore given over the functions of the Profeſſorſhip ſo early as the year 1567, when he was ſucceeded in the place by his ſon-in-law; for if he had given them over then, the two reaſons alledged by Thuanus why the loſs of this Profeſſor was the leſs regretted, would be moſt falſe: it ſeems therefore that this great Hiſtorian has contradicted himſelf with regard to Daurat. He ſays ſomewhere that our Profeſſor reſigned his office before the death of Turnebus (43), and retired to the Fauxbourg de S. Victor, where he (Thuanus) had ſeen him often, and inquired of him concerning Budæus, Brixius, and Tuſanus. Jam Joannes Auratus profeſſioni renunciaverat, & in Sanvictorianum ſuburbium conceſſerat; quo frequens itabat Thuanus ex ejuſque colloquiis ſemper inſtructior redibat, de Budæo quem ille puer viderat, Germano Brixio, Jacobo Tuſano ſedulo eum percontatus (44). My ſecond Remark is, that la Croix du Maine declares in 1584, that Aurat continues to read the ordinary Lectures of his Profeſſorſhip every day at Paris; ſo greatly does he delight in ſerving the public, and in making of ſcholars. Some body muſt needs be miſtaken here, on one ſide or other. What ſeems moſt probable to me is, that our Profeſſor having obtained leave to reſign his poſt to his ſon-in-law, continued notwithſtanding to teach as before, at leaſt in private.

(41) Lib. 89, ſub fin.

(42) Du Breul, Antiquitez de Paris, pag. 565.

(43) That is, before 1572.

(44) Thuan. de Vita ſua, lib. 1.

[N] He made a great many Verſes.] Du Verdier Vau-Privas tells us an unlikely ſtory when he ſays (45) that the Odes, Epigrams, Hymns, and other Poems in Greek and Latin compoſed by Dorat amount to above fifty thouſand verſes: but make what abatement you pleaſe, it will ſtill be certain that he compoſed a great number of Poems in thoſe two languages, to which we muſt add thoſe which he wrote in French; for the ſame du Verdier obſerves, that though he applied himſelf wholly to Greek and Latin Poetry, he did not however omit to make verſes in French, of which very few have been publiſhed. He gives the Titles of two French Poems; and Monſr. Teiſſier gives the Titles of the Latin ones. Conſult the margin (46). Moreover Mr. Menage was not in the right to ſay that Daurat made no French Verſes, and thereupon to maintain that Monſr. Baillet was in the wrong to affirm that the Pleias or Conſtellation invented by Ronſard was compoſed only of French Poets (47). If Mr. Menage's aſſertion were true, viz. that Daurat the chief of that Conſtellation made no French Verſes, Mr. Baillet would have been juſtly criticized: but this aſſertion is falſe; for beſides what has been juſt now quoted from Du Verdier Vau-Privas, we find in la Croix du Maine, that D'Aurat wrote ſeveral very learned Poems as well in Greek and Latin as in French. And elſewhere (48) we find that Ronſard gave the name of the Pleias to John Anthony de Baïf, Joachim du Bellai, Pontus de Tyard, Stephen Jodelle, Remi Belleau, Dorat, and himſelf, becauſe they were the firſt and moſt excellent perſons by whoſe diligence the FRENCH Poetry had riſen to the higheſt pitch of glory. Conformably hereto Mr. Menage himſelf had ſaid in his Remarks on Malherbe, that in imitation of the Pleias or Conſtellation of Greek Poets, Ronſard made one of the French Poets who were in his time . . . . and that theſe FRENCH Poets were Ronſard, du Bellai, Pontus de Tyard, Jodelle, Belleau, Baïf, and Dorat. And in the 186 page of his Remarks on the Life of Peter Ayrault we find theſe words; Dorat is the firſt Poet of the Pleias; for all who have ſpoken of thoſe Poets name them in this order, Daurat, Ronſard, Du Bellai, Belleau, Anthony de Baïf, Pontus de Tyard, and Jodelle. I will not make uſe of the Authority of Thuanus, who ſays (49) that Ronſard and Daurat made the Verſes which were ſung by the Queen's maids, in the famous Interlude which was repreſented for the entertainment of the Ambaſſadors of Poland in the year 1573; for it is very poſſible that, on ſuch an occaſion, Verſes ſung by Ladies might be in Latin; and ſome Authors expreſly ſay that d'Aurat made the Latin Verſes which were repeated in the Interlude repreſented at the Thuilleries in the year 1573, when the Duke of Anjou was declared King of Poland (50). But tho' it be certain that Daurat made ſome Verſes in his mother-tongue, it muſt be acknowledged that his merit

(45) Bibliotheq. pag. 685.

(46) See the Judgment which Thuanus has paſſed on the Collection of Latin Poems, and Mr. Baillet, Jugem. ſur les Poetes, num. 1337. Thuanus ſays the Booksellers inſerted therein ſome Verſes which were not Daurat's; his Tranſlator has omitted this, apud Teiſſier.

(47) Anti-Baillet, tom. 2. pag. 28.

(48) In the Life of Ronſard.

(49) Lib. 57.

(50) Du Breul, Antiq. de Paris, pag. 565.

or his Muſe had been a hired mourner. From hence it came to paſs, that if his vein was not exhauſted to the very lees, it was at leaſt reduced to the condition of a low pierced veſſel [O], from which the wine, being deprived of the beſt part of its ſpirit, flows but faintly. He was ſo good a Critic, that Scaliger knew none but him and Cujacius who had abilities ſufficient to reſtore ancient Authors (p); but he has preſented the public with very little of that kind [P]. According to Scaliger, He began to grow mean-

(p) Scaligerana I. pag. m. 18. See Guil. Canterus in Lycophr. ver. 308.

merit was not ſo conſpicuous in French as in Latin Poetry. It is alſo in the quality of a Latin Poet that he has been famous in the Republic of Letters, notwithſtanding the groſs faults which ſometimes eſcaped him againſt the rules of quantity. Barthius reproaches him with this by the by, in the 1659th page of his Commentary on Statius, and adds a thing concerning him which deſerves to be related (51); which is, that he was ſo great an Admirer of this Epigram of Auſonius, (Epigr. 105,)

(51) He had related it before, pag. 94.

Dum dubitat natura, marem faceretve puellam,
Factus es, ô pulcher, pene puella puer,

" Nature, in doubt which ſex ſhe ſhould employ,
" Made thee almoſt a girl, thou lovely boy,"

that he maintained a Dæmon was the Author of it.

[We find in the 339 page of a Book intitled Veneres Blyenburgiæ, ſive Amorum Hortus &c. Opera Damaſi Blyenburgij Batavi. Dordraci 1600, in 8vo, the following Verſes of a Poet named Evangeliſta, which are an imitation of thoſe of Auſonius:

Dum dubitat, faceretne Deam, faceretne puellam
Juppiter, ecce Dea es facta, puella ſimul.
Sed Dea dum fieres, dubitat, Venus, anne Minerva,
Virgo, fores; ſubito es facta Minerva, Venus &c.

Theſe Verſes are addreſſed ad Helenam Vendraminam, Virginem Venetam. i. e. " To Helena Vendra-
" mina, a young Lady of Venice. CRIT. REM.]

[O] His vein was reduced .... to the condition of a low pierced Veſſel.] Let us quote Sammarthanus. Nullus novus liber in lucem exibat, quin ſibi commendatricem Aurati Muſam pro Mercurio itineris duce & auſpice depoſceret. Nullus in tota Gallia paulo nobilior è vivis excedebat, quin ab Aurati lugubribus Camœnis tanquam Præficis ſolemnes funeri queſtus & lachrymæ ſufficerentur: quo fiebat ut in tanta ſimilium argumentorum multitudine beata illa quondam uberioris ingenii vena non areſceret quidem, ſed fundo propior languidius negligentiuſque flueret ac ſe traheret (25). i. e. " No
" new Book came into the world but it demanded
" the commendatory Muſe of Daurat, for its Mercury
" to uſher it in. No perſon of conſiderable note died
" in all France, but ſolemn funeral lamentations and " tears were ſupplied by Daurat's mournful Muſes, as " if they had been hired mourners: by which means
" it came to paſs that in ſuch a multitude of ſimilar
" ſubjects that happy vein of a once more copious
" wit was not indeed quite dried up, but growing
" nearer the bottom flowed more languidly and more
" ſlowly." I have ſaid in the Remark [B] of the Article AFER (Domitius), that Poets ſhould quit Apollo's ſervice in good time. I add that if they felt the return of a poetical fit, they ſhould take it to be a temptation of ſome evil Genius, and put up the ſame prayer to the Goddeſſes of Parnaſſus, as one of their fraternity did to the Goddeſs of Love:

(52) Sammarth. Elogior. lib. 3. pag. m. 55, 56.

Parce, precor, precor,
Non ſum qualis eram bonæ
Sub regno Cynaræ. Deſine, dulcium
Mater ſæva Cupidinum,
Circa luſtra decem flectere mollibus
Jam durum imperiis: abi
Quo blandæ juvenum te revocant preces (53).

(53) Horat. Od. 3, lib. 4. ver. 2.

" Oh ſpare, for pity, Venus, ſpare!
" I am not what I was " In lovely Cynara's eaſy reign,
" When heat warm'd every vein,
" And manly beauty fill'd my face.

" Ceaſe, Queen of ſoft deſires,
" To bend my mind grown ſtiff with age,
" And fifty years engage
" To crackle in thy wanton fires:
" But youth and beauty hear." Creech.

The ſervice of the Muſes ſympathizes in many things with the ſervice of the Ladies; it is better to retire too ſoon than too late, and to ſay betimes, with a firm reſolution to keep one's word:

Vixi puellis nuper idoneus,
Et militavi non ſine gloria:
Nunc arma, defunctumque bello
Barbiton hic paries habebit (54).

(54) Horat. Od. 26. lib. 3. ver. 1.

That is,
" Once I was gay and great in charms,
" Succeſs ſtill waited on my arms,
" In Venus' battles bravely ſtout,
" I fought, and conquer'd when I fought.
" But now my arms and wanton lyre
" Whoſe tunes could ſpread harmonious fire,
" In Venus ſhrine unheeded lie,
" With all my love's artillery."
Creech.

Authors ſpeak of certain Monarchs, who gave order to ſome of their Domeſtics to tell them every day, Remember ſuch a buſineſs (55). If I may be allowed to compare ſmall things to great ones, Poets in the deline of their age, ſhould have ſome body to tell them every morning, Remember how old you are. Horace boaſts of having had ſuch a Monitor:

(55) Remember that you are mortal. This is attributed to Philip of Macedon. Remember the Athenians. Herodot. lib. 5. cap. 105, concerning Darius the ſon of Hyſtaſpes.

Eſt mihi purgatam crebro qui perſonet aurem,
Solve ſenescentem mature ſanus equum, ne
Peccet ad extremum ridendus & ilia ducat (56).

" And ſtill, methinks, ſounds thro' my well purg'd
" ear
" A little voice, Fond Horace have a care;
" And while 'tis well releaſe thy aged horſe,
" Leſt, when he runs, but with unequal force,
" And ſtretches hard to win, he break his wind,
" Derided, diſtanc'd, baſely lag behind."

(56) Horat. Epiſt. 1. lib. 1. ver. 7.

And here is what I find in the Menagiana. " Pere-
" rius formerly begged his friends to be ſo kind as " to give him notice when his vein grew low, and he
" ſhould be no longer able to make verſes with ho-
" nour (57)." If Daurat had acted with the like precaution, he would not have out lived his own glory. But nothing has done him more injury than his voluntary ſubjecting himſelf to the drudgery of making Verſes on every Book that was printed. What a miſerable thing is it, ſaid Balzac (58), to be obliged to praiſe every new Book, that is, to be in a worſe condition in proſe than Auratus Poeta Regius was, who did that of his own free will, which I do as a ſlave condemned to the gallies. A French Poet (59) has been ſeen of more recent memory, who prepared Sonnets for future Books. See how he has been ridiculed in the Continuation of the Parnaſſe réformé.

(57) Menagiana, pag. m. 384.

(58) Letter 25 to Chapelain, Book 4. pag. m. 194.

(59) His name was Pelletier. See the Guerre des Auteurs, pag. m. 163.

[P] He was .... a good Critic ....; but he has preſented the public with very little of that kind.] Some of his Critical Remarks are to be ſeen on the Sibylline Verſes in Opſopæus's Edition. He had laboured much on that ſubject in his Lectures, as we are informed by a Letter of Stuckius to Goldaſtus (60). Quam doleo, ſays he, me Jo. Aurati præceptoris mei viri ingenioſiſſimi, & in emendandis antiquis Poëtis Græcis acutiſſimi dictata, & annotationes in illa carmina ante multos annos, & ejus ore calamo exceptas cum aliis nonnullis meis Libris Lutetiæ amiſiſſe! i. e. " What a grief is " it to me to have loſt, among ſome other Books, at " Paris, the Dictata of my Maſter John Daurat, a " moſt ingenious man, and very acute in correcting
" the ancient Greek Authors, and his Annotations on " thoſe Verſes which I took down in writing from " his own mouth many years ago!"

(60) It is the 13th of the Collection of Letters to Goldaſtus, publiſhed at Francfort in 1688.

mean-ſpirited [Q], and ſpent his time in endeavouring to find all the Bible in Homer. He died at Paris the firſt of November 1588, at the age of above fourſcore [R]. The Collection which was made of his Verſes did him no honour: the Bookſellers had more regard to their Intereſt than his Reputation. They foiſted in ſome Poems which were none of his, and ſome pieces which he would not have owned for his, though they were of his compoſition (q).

(q) Thuan. Hiſt. lib. 89. ſub fin.

[Q] He began to grow mean-ſpirited.] Scaliger ſpeaks in the preſent tenſe, He begins to grow mean-ſpirited; &c. Whereon ſee the Remark [E] of this Article.

[R] He died . . . . at the age of above fourſcore.] La Croix du Maine makes Daurat ten years younger than others do: he places his birth in the year 1517: he muſt therefore have believed that Daurat died at the age of ſeventy one. Mr. Baillet (61) is in the right not to depend much on this opinion, in prejudice of that of Papyrius Maſſo, Thuanus, and Scævola Sammarthanus, who were all very particularly acquainted with Daurat, ſince it is certain that La Croix du Maine is miſtaken. Here are four Verſes of Daurat, which demonſtrate it: they were made on the death of Leodegarius à Quercu, who had lived fourſcore and five years.

(61) Jugem. ſur les Poët. tom. 3. pag. 403.

Octoginta annos quo natus quinque ſupraque,
Officio functus, plenus honoris obit.
At tuus Auratus pare pœnè ætate ſuperſtes,
Hos elegos tumulo donat habere tuo:

Engliſhed:

" Which duty done, with honour, at the age
" Of eighty five and more, he left the ſtage.
" Thy Daurat with this mournful verſe appears,
" To weep thy death, himſelf of almoſt equal years."

Mr. Menage makes uſe of them (62), to prove that Daurat lived to above eighty: in which he is without compariſon better grounded than when he accuſes Mr. Baillet (63) of having ſaid that Poet lived only to ſeventy one; for it is true that Mr. Baillet mentions it as a thing different from the common opinion, but he obſerves at the ſame time that the common opinion is preferable to that of la Croix du Maine. I ſhall take notice of another ſmall miſtake of Mr. Menage. He ſays that all the Poets of that time made Verſes on the death of Daurat, and, among others, Ronſard, his favourite Diſciple (64). But it is certain that Ronſard died (65) ſome years before his Maſter; and one need only caſt ones eyes on theſe Words of Papyrius Maſſo, to know that Diſciple could not render any poetical ſervice to the memory of Daurat. O ſi hodie diſcipulus ejus Petrus Ronſardus inſignis Poëta viveret, quas ille nænias, aut quæ epitaphia ſcriberet? i. e. " If his ſcholar the famous Poet Ronſard were now " alive, what elogies, and what epitaphs would he " write!" I chuſe to follow Papyrius Maſſo rather than Thuanus. The latter ſays Daurat died about the latter end of November, being near fourſcore years of age.

(62) Remarques ſur la Vie d'Ayrault, pag. 499.

(63) Anti-Baillet, tom. 1. pag. 266.

(64) Remarques ſur la Vie d'Ayrault, pag. 187.

(65) The 27th of Dec. 1585.

DAUSQUEIUS, or DAUSQUIUS, or D'AUSQUEIUS (a) (CLAUDIUS) Canon of Tournay, was born at St. Omers the 5th of December 1566 (b). He entered into the Society of the Jeſuits, but at what time I know not, and quitted it I know not when neither, nor for what reaſon. He was ſtill of it when Father Scribanius publiſhed his Amphitheatrum honoris, in the year 1607. He was praiſed in that Work as one of the moſt learned men of his age (c). It is certain that he was learned both in Greek and in Latin, and in whatever is comprehended under the name of Literature; but he did not write well: his ſtyle is too affected, too obſcure, and too full of antiquated phraſes. He has been commended as a good Preacher (d). ROBERT DAUSQUEIUS, his father, the fourth ſon of ANTHONY DAUSQUEIUS Bailiff of St. Omers, was killed in the King of Spain's ſervice during the war which the Duke of Alençon raiſed in the Low-Countries (e). We ſhall ſpeak of the Writings of the Canon of Tournay [A], without forgetting the fraud of a Bookſeller of Paris [B].

(a) He latinized his name (which was d'Auſque, ſays Swertius, Athen. Belg. pag. 178,) theſe three ways.

(b) Valer. Andreas, Bibliotb. Belgicæ, pag. 140.

(c) Amphitheatrum honoris, lib. 2. cap. 13.

(d) Valer. Andreas, Bibliotb. Belg. pag. 140.

(e) Claud. Dauſquius, in S. Joſephi Sanctificatione, pag. 228, 229.

☞DAWES

[A] We ſhall ſpeak of the Writings of Claudius Dauſqueius.] He made a Latin Tranſlation of the XL Homilies of S. Baſil of Seleucia, and publiſhed it with Notes in the year 1604, in 8vo. It is not a good one, if we refer our ſelves to the Judgment of the Dominican Combefis (1). He publiſhed ſome Notes on Quintus Calaber, in the year 1614, and Silius Italicus with an ample Commentary in the year 1618, in 4to. His Scutum D. Mariæ Aſpricollis, and his Juſti Lipſii Scutum adverſus Agricolæ Thracii Satyricas Petitiones, were printed at Doway, in the year 1616, in 8vo. The Approbation of theſe two Books, and the Epiſtle Dedicatory, being dated in the year 1616, I cannot be perſuaded but there is a fault in the paſſage where Alegambe (2), and Valerius Andreas Deſſelius (3) affirm they were printed in the year 1610. They are miſtaken alſo in ſaying that they were written adverſus Agricolam Thracium. This Agricola Thracius is no other than George Thomſon, a Scot, who publiſhed a Book at London in the year 1606. againſt Juſtus Lipſius. This was the Work which Dauſqueius refuted. He had a quarrel with ſome Franciſcans, who maintained that St. Paul and St. Joſeph were Saints in their mother's wombs. On which occaſion he publiſhed his Sancti Pauli Sanctitudo in utero, extra, in ſolo, & in cœlo, at Paris, 1627, in 8vo. and his Sancti Joſephi Sanctificatio extra uterum, ſeu binoctium adverſus F. Marchantij Minoritæ Exprovincialis inanias, item Aplyſiarum F. Minorum Audomaropolitanorum Spongia, at Lyons, 1631, in 8vo. His two beſt Books are thoſe which I ſhall ſpeak of in the following Remark.

(1) See Baillet, Jugem. des Savans, tom. 4. pag. 493.

(2) Alegambe, Bibliotb. Societ. Jeſu, pag. 81.

(3) Valer. Andreas, Bibliotb. Belgicæ, pag. 140.

[B] . . . . without forgetting the fraud of a Bookſeller of Paris.] Mr. Chevillier will inform us wherein it conſiſts. " People take too much liberty, and " play tricks with the Works of the preſs, as they pleaſe, " without any regard to ſincerity. Whatever the " Bookſeller may ſay, who from the year 1677 has " ſold Dauſquius's Book intitled Antiqui novique Latii " Orthographica (4), he ought not to have ſuppreſſed " the fine Cut wherein ten principal Latin Writers " are ingraved, and wherein we read that the Book " was printed at Tournay by Adrian Quinqué, in the " year 1632: neither ought he to have taken out " ſome other leaves, by which the date of the im- " preſſion might have been known. And it is no good " reaſon to ſay, that the King having taken Tour- " nay, Dauſquius, who was kept there, became a " Frenchman: De Hiſpano factus jam Gallus. On " which account he uſurps the right of ſubſtituting " a Title page, in which he puts his Cypher and his " Sign, with this Subſcription, Pariſiis apud, &c. " 1677. As if victory alſo exerciſed her empire " over the difference of times, and the diſtance " of places; or had the power to make the year " 1632 be the year 1677, and the city of Tournay " in the Earldom of Flanders, to be that of Paris " in the Iſle of France. I defy thoſe who have bought " his Dauſquius, and have ſeen no other copy, to " tell who was the Printer of it, and out of what " Printing-houſe it came. And yet this is what our " Kings have ordered ſhould be known (*). Theſe " are the Words of their Ordinances, ſo that the " buyers of Books may eaſily know in what Printing- " houſe the Books have been printed. All that he could " do, when he became poſſeſſed of the remaining " Copies of that Author, was to expoſe them to ſale " with a leaf containing theſe words, Veneunt Pariſiis, " apud &c. but without making any alteration or mu-

(4) It is a Work in two Volumes in folio.

(*) Edicts of Francis I, at Fontainebleau, the 28th of December 1541, and of Charles IX, at Gaillon, in the month of May 1571, inſerted among the Ordinances collected by Fontanon, pag. 468, and 474, tom. 4. of the Edition of 1611.

DAWES (Sir WILLIAM), Archbiſhop of York in the eighteenth Century, was deſcended of a good family [A], and ſon of Sir John Dawes Bart. by Jane the daughter and only child of Richard Hawkins of Braintree in the county of Eſſex Gent. He was born September the 12th 1671 at Lyons (a Seat, which came by his mother) near Braintree; and received the firſt rudiments of Learning at Merchant-Taylors-School in London, from the Reverend Mr. John Hartcliffe and the Reverend Mr. Ambroſe Bonwicke, ſucceſſive Maſters of that School, under whoſe care he made great proficiency in the knowledge of the Claſſics; and was a tolerable maſter of the Hebrew Tongue, even before he was fifteen years of age, which was chiefly owing to the additional care, which Dr. Kidder, afterwards Lord Biſhop of Bath and Wells, took of his education (a). In Act Term in the year 1687 (b) he was entered a Scholar of St. John's College in the Univerſity of Oxford under the tuition of Mr. Lee (c); and after his continuance there two years or upwards, he was made Fellow. In 1693 he publiſhed a Poem intitled, The Anatomy of Atheiſm [B]. Upon the death of his two elder brothers about the ſame time [C] he ſucceeded to his father's eſtate and title, and ſoon after left Oxford, and entering himſelf a Nobleman in Katherine-Hall in Cambridge, lived in his eldeſt brother's chambers there, and afterwards took the Degree of Maſter of Arts (d). His early piety appears from his writing his Duties of the Cloſet before he was twenty one years of age (e). As he was not yet of age ſufficient to enter into Holy Orders, he therefore thought proper to viſit his eſtate, and to make a ſhort tour into ſome other parts of the Kingdom, which he had not ſeen. But his intended progreſs was in ſome meaſure ſtoped by his happening to meet with Frances, the eldeſt daughter of Sir Thomas D'Arcey of Braxſteed Lodge in Eſſex Bart. to whom he made his addreſſes, and not long after married (f). Soon after his marriage he was ordained Deacon and Prieſt by Dr. Henry Compton Biſhop of London [D]; and within a ſhort time was preſented to the Deanery and Living of Bocking in Eſſex; and was afterwards nominated one of the Chaplains in ordinary to King William. In 1696, when he was but five and twenty, he had the Degree of Doctor of Divinity conferred upon him by a Royal Mandate [E], becauſe at that time he was not of ſtanding ſufficient to be admitted regularly; and this Degree qualified him for the Maſterſhip of Catherine-Hall, to which, upon the death of the Reverend Dr. Echard, he was unanimouſly elected [F], and in a ſhort time became Vice-Chancellor of the Univerſity. In 1698 the King gave him a Prebend of Worceſter, in which he was inſtalled on the 26th of Auguſt that year (g). After Queen Anne's acceſſion to the Throne

(a) Preface to the firſt vol. of The Whole Works of the moſt Reverend Father in God, Sir William Dawes Bart. late Lord Archbiſhop of York, Primate of England and Metropolitan. In three Volumes, pag. 5-9. edit. London 1733 in 8vo.

(b) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 1088. 2d edit. London 1721.

(c) Preface, ubi ſupra, pag. 10.

(d) Ibid. pag. 12, 13.

(e) Ibid. pag. 13, 14.

(f) Ibid. pag. 15, 16.

(g) Willis's Survey of the Cathedrals of York, &c. pag. 674.

" tilation in the Book; letting the Reader ſee that " it was printed at Tournay by Adrian Quinqué in " the year 1632. The moſt ſkilful Librarians have " much ado to find out all theſe tricks of the Book-" ſellers: it being a difficult matter not to be deceived " by them. The Library-keeper of the Archbiſhop of " Rheims has not ſuffered himſelf to be impoſed on " by the Dauſquius: he has ſet down the date of it in " his printed Catalogue in theſe Words, which are a " reproach to the Bookſeller; Pariſiis 1677, vel potius Tornaci, 1632, in folio (5)." I imagine the like fraud was made uſe of with regard to another Work which Dauſquius printed at Tournay in 4to. in the year 1633, under the Title of Terra & aqua, ſeu terræ fluctuantes; for the Journal des Savans ſpoke of that Book (6), and of the Antiqui novique Latii Orthographica (7), as if they had been lately printed. Let us obſerve that Salmaſius judged this Antiqui novique Latii Orthographica worth reading. See what he writes concerning it to Voſſius in his LXVIth Letter. See alſo the commendation which Voſſius has beſtowed on the ſame Book (8), and conſult Mr. Baillet, who believed that Work had been reprinted in the year 1676 (9).

(5) Chevillier, Origine de l'Imprimerie de Paris, pag. 210.

(6) Journal des Savans of the 2d of Auguſt 1677, pag. 233, of the Dutch Edition.

(7) Journal des Savans of the 15th of February 1677, pag. 55.

(8) Voſſius, de Philologia, pag. 29.

(9) Baillet, Jugemens des Savans, tom. 4. pag. 12, 13.

[A] Deſcended of a good family.] Sir Abraham Dawes, his great grandfather, was accounted one of the richeſt Commoners in his age, and in ſplendor and magnificence lived up to the port of a Nobleman. But in the time of the civil wars, the Family adhering to the Royal Cauſe ſuffered great loſſes in their fortune. But in 1663 King Charles II created Sir John, the Father of our Archbiſhop, a Baronet (1).

(1) Preface to the firſt vol. of The whole Works of the moſt Reverend Father in God Sir William Dawes, Bart. late Lord Archbiſhop of York, &c. pag. 5, 6.

[B] In 1693 he publiſh'd a Poem intitled, The Anatomy of Atheiſm.] In the title it is ſaid to have been printed at London 1694 in 4to; but Mr. Wood tells us (2), that it was firſt publiſhed in London in the latter end of Auguſt 1693. It is dedicated to Sir George D'Arcey Bart. " It has not indeed all the perfection " of a poetic compoſition; a luculency of fancy and " pomp of expreſſion may perhaps be thought wanting " in it. But then it has this equivalent excellence, " that the arguments both for and againſt the Exiſt-" ence of a God are urged and anſwered in a clear " method and eaſy diction, fitted for the comprehen-" ſion of every common reader, tho' not ſo well adapt-" ed to the taſte or genius of ſuch as are taken with " nothing but lofty flights and elaborate ſtrains (3)."

(2) Athen. Oxon. vol. 2, col. 1088.

(3) Preface, pag. 11, 12.

[C] Upon the death of his two elder brothers about the ſame time.] The eldeſt Sir Robert was a Nobleman of Catherine-Hall in Cambridge, where he died of a violent fever. The ſecond, John, was a Lieutenant of a ſhip, belonging to a ſquadron commanded by Sir John Narborough, and in waiting on ſome company from on board, was about the ſame time unhappily drown'd (4).

(4) Ibid. pag. 12, 13.

[D] Ordained Deacon and Prieſt by Dr. Henry Compton, Biſhop of London.] Upon this occaſion Sir William was often heard to ſay, that when he lay aſide his lay-habit (in which he had been as elegant as others of his quality) he did it with the greateſt pleaſure in the world, and look'd upon holy Orders as the higheſt honour, that could be conferred upon him (5).

(5) Ibid. pag. 17, 18.

[E] In 1696, when he was but five and twenty, he had the Degree of Doctor of Divinity conferred upon him by a Royal Mandate.] The Writer of the Preface above cited, who obſerves (6), that he had his Degree the ſame year, that Dr. Bentley held the Act at the public Commencement, which was in 1696 (7); yet has committed a ſtrange inconſiſtency in aſſerting (8), that Sir William was not much above ſeven and twenty, when he took that Degree, ſince he had before told us, that he was born in 1671.

(6) Pag. 21.

(7) Dr. Bentley's Sermon of Revelation and the Meſſiah, was preached at the Commencement, July 5, 1696.

[F] Unanimouſly elected Maſter of Catherine-Hall.] Upon his acceſſion to the Maſterſhip, he found the bare caſe of a new chapel, which Dr. Echard his Predeceſſor had begun, but did not live to finiſh; and to fit it up with wainſcot-ſeats, marble pavement, and a beautiful altar-piece, he contributed very liberally all the while the work was carrying on. This chapel was conſecrated by Dr. Simon Patrick Lord Biſhop of Ely Sept. 1. 1704 (9). By his own intereſt likewiſe, and that of Dr. Thomas Sherlock, now Lord Biſhop of Sarum, with the Queen and ſome of the chief Miniſters, he obtained an Act of Parliament for annexing the firſt Prebend of Norwich, which ſhould become vacant, to the Maſterſhip of Catherine-Hall for ever (10).

(8) Preface, pag. 20.

(9) Ibid. pag. 2

(10) Ibid. pag. 27, 28.

Throne, he was made one of her Chaplains; and though he miſſed of the See of Lincoln [G], yet upon the death of Dr. Nicholas Stratford Biſhop of Cheſter he was advanced to that See, to which he was conſecrated February the 7th 1707 (b); and on the 26th of February 1713 he was tranſlated to the Archbiſhopric of York in the room of Dr. John Sharp (i), and made one of the Privy-Council to her Majeſty. Upon the Queen's demiſe, he was conſtituted one of the Lords Juſtices or Regents of the Kingdom, until the late King's arrival in England, by whom he was again called to his Council. He died April the 30th 1724 in the fifty third year of his age, and was interred in the Chapel of Catherine-Hall in Cambridge near his Lady (by whom he had ſeven children, William, Francis, William, Elizabeth, Jane, D'Arcey, and Thomas) and who died December the 22d 1705 in the twenty ninth year of her age. We ſhall give his character in the Note [H].

(b) Idem, pag. 338.

(i) Idem, ibid.

[G] Tho' he miſſed of the See of Lincoln.] When that Biſhopric was vacant, he being appointed to preach before the Queen on the 30th of January, was not afraid, ſays the Writer of the Preface to his Works (11), to utter ſome bold truths, which at that time were not ſo well reliſhed by ſome perſons, that were in power, and who took occaſion from thence to perſuade the Queen (contrary to her inclination) to give it to another (12). This however made no impreſſion upon Sir William; . . . and therefore when he was told by a certain Nobleman, that he had loſt a Biſhopric by his preaching, his reply was, "that as to that he had no manner of concern "upon him, becauſe his intention was never to gain "one by preaching."

(11) Pag. 30.

(12) Dr. William Wake, the preſent Archbiſhop of Canterbury.

[H] We ſhall give his character in the Note.] Dr. Henry Felton tells us (13), that "he was a perfect O-"rator in his elocution, and thoſe ſacred ſtrains, "which carry their own reaſon and conviction with "them, were irreſiſtible in the charms and power of "his delivery." The Writer of the Preface to his Works obſerves (14), that his perſon was tall and graceful, his behaviour eaſy and courteous to all, his converſation lively, tho' without levity, his imagination ſprightly, his memory ſtrong, and his judgment equal to it. That his manner of preaching was plain and unaffected, though adorned with great melody of voice and decency of action. That he was a kind and loving huſband, an indulgent father, a good maſter; ſo ſtrict an obſerver of his word, that no conſideration whatever could make him break it; and ſo inviolable in his friendſhip, that without the diſcovery of ſome eſſential fault indeed, he never departed from it. That he was a lover of his country, as well as a loyal ſubject; and both as a Biſhop and a Peer of the Realm conſidered himſelf as reſponſible for the ſouls committed to his charge in one reſpect, and as intruſted with the lives and fortunes of his fellow-ſubjects in the other. That he was ſincerely affected to our preſent Conſtitution; "and therefore, if in ſome Parliamentary de-"bates (wherein he made a very conſiderable figure) "he happened to diſſent from other great men, who "might have the ſame common good in view, but "ſeemed to purſue it in a method incongruous to his "ſentiments; this ought to be accounted his honour, "and a proof of his integrity, but cannot, with any "colour of juſtice, be deemed party-prejudice, or a "ſpirit of contradiction in him; becauſe thoſe very "men, whom he ſometimes oppoſed, at other times "he adjoined himſelf to, when he perceived them in "the right (15)." That he was aſſiduous in the diſcharge of his epiſcopal functions, and behaved towards his Clergy in the moſt affectionate manner, without any reſpect of perſons. H.

(13) Diſſertation on reading the Claſſicks and forming a juſt Style, pag. 185. 4th edit. London 1730.

(14) Pag. 34, & ſeqq.

(15) Ibid. pag. 42, 43.

DECIUS (PHILIP) natural ſon of Triſtan de Dexio [A], who made a conſiderable figure at the Court of the Dukes of Milan, was a very famous Civilian. He was born in the year 1454, and was carefully inſtructed in polite Literature at Milan. The plague having obliged him to leave that City, he retired to his brother, who was Profeſſor of the Civil Law at Pavia [B]. He began to ſtudy the ſame Science at the age of ſeventeen, and by his diſputing humour gave a great deal of trouble to Jaſon Mainus and James Puteus his Maſters [C]: for he puzzled them more than once with his Objections. He alſo tired his brother to ſuch a degree, by propoſing difficulties to him, that the reproofs which he received from him conſtrained him to ſeek the ſolution of his doubts elſewhere. He maintained ſome Theſes in public the ſecond year of his ſtudying Law, and ſucceeded therein perfectly well. He went the next year to Piſa with his brother, who was [A] He was natural ſon of Triſtan de Dexio.] His anceſtors having left the village of Dexio (1) ſettled at Milan, and took the name of the village where they were born (2). This family had ſubſiſted above 300 years (3) at Milan with ſome ſplendor, when Triſtan was born.

(1) Near Milan.

(2) Panzirolus, de claris Legum Interpret. lib. 2. cap. 135. pag. m. 299.

(3) Ultra CCC annos cum dignitate vixerunt. Idem, ibid.

[B] He retired to his Brother, who was Profeſſor of the Civil Law at Pavia.] He was born in lawful wedlock, and was named Lancelot. He died at Pavia in the year 1500 (4).

(4) Idem, ibid.

[C] By his diſputing humour he gave a great deal of trouble to . . . . his Maſters.] Here is what Panzirolus ſays of it: Quos argumentis quandoque exagitavit, atque æſtuantes reliquit. Fratri quoque aſſiduis interrogationibus moleſtus non ſemel cum objurgatione rejectus eſt (5). i. e. "Whom he ſometimes exerciſed "with arguments, and left ſuming. He was alſo very "troubleſome to his brother by perpetually aſking "him queſtions, for which he was more than once "turned away with reproofs." There is nothing more importunate than a young Scholar who has wit, and loves to diſpute: I do not wonder, therefore, that ours was chid for it by his brother. The reprimand in all likelihood was very ſharp, ſince the young man durſt not teize his brother any more, and did not conſult him even when he undertook to maintain Theſes in public (6). Lancelot renewed his cenſures, and called him a raſh fellow, and diſputed againſt him with intent, if I am not miſtaken, to put him to a non plus in order to humble him; but he was repulſed ſo vigorouſly, that he was ſtruck with admiration, and confeſſed before the Audience that his brother would quickly ſurpaſs him. Such an acknowledgment would not be ſo hard to a father as to an elder brother. Impugnanti problemata Lancelloto tanto acumine argumenta rejecit, ut admiratus coram aſſantibus ſe brevi ab illo ſuperatum iri prædixerit (7). Paul Jovius, ſpeaking as an eye-witneſs, aſſures us that our Philip diſputed with more ardour than any one elſe. Enarrabat ſubtiliſſime & , uti ſæpe vidimus, longe omnium acerrime diſputabat (8). Let us relate one inſtance more. Decius being Profeſſor at Piſa made Laurence Pucci (9) diſpute againſt the Theſes which Bartholomew Socinus had adviſed a Scholar to maintain in public. The day after the Diſpute, a paper was poſted up which gave notice that in eight days the ſame Theſes turned into Problems would be maintained on both ſides by Pucci among the Students, and by Decius among the Doctors. This gave an alarm, and the conſequences were apprehended; for it was perceived that ſuch a procedure tended to the diſhonour of the other Doctors who were Profeſſors. For which reaſon the Principal of the College forbade Decius to proceed on pain of impriſonment (10).

(6) Inconſulto fratre propoſitiones publice diſputandas ediderit. Idem, ibid.

(7) Panzirolus, de claris Legum Interpretibus, pag. 300.

(8) Paulus Jovius, Elog. cap. 88. pag. m. 207.

(9) Who was afterwards Cardinal.

(10) Panzirolus, de claris Legum Interpret. pag. 301, 302.

was invited thither to be Profeſſor of the Civil Law. He there gave ſo many proofs of his wit and learning, that at the age of one and twenty he obtained the Profeſſor's Chair for explaining the Inſtitutes. His Lectures drew a great number of Auditors, and made him admired, among other things, for the witty jeſts he made uſe of in his public diſputations (a). His reputation increaſed when he was ſome time after promoted to the place of Profeſſor extraordinary of the Civil Law; yet he was not contented, but complained of the ſmallneſs of his ſalary [D]. Francis Accolti, who had been alone the ordinary Profeſſor for the Evening Lectures, having been diſpenſed with by reaſon of his great age, Bartholomew Socinus was put in his room. Our Decius left no ſtone unturned to get a ſhare in that place, and had already obtained what he deſired [E]; but he was deprived of it, ſo ſoon as it was known that Socinus threatened to retire if ſuch a diviſion was made. To make Decius amends, they gave him the Profeſſorſhip of Canon Law. This was done by the intrigues of Socinus (b), who hoped that Felinus would run away with all the glory of that function; Felinus, I ſay, who had taught the Canon Law a long time, and underſtood it perfectly well. Socinus was deceived in his conjectures. Decius was more followed than Felinus, and gave him ſo much uneaſineſs by that ſuperiority of glory, that he forced him to abſent himſelf. Felinus retired abruptly (c). The Curators of the Univerſity, being informed of the reaſon of this retreat, were very angry with Decius, and deprived him of his places. They were reprimanded for it by Laurence of Medicis; and this was the reaſon that when he went to Florence, to demand the payment of his ſalary, they told him, in a pretty rough manner, that he muſt return to Piſa. He anſwered that he would not, becauſe he had accepted the Profeſſorſhip which thoſe of Siena had offered him; but he was obliged to renounce it, and reſume his employments at Piſa, for they threatened him with ſtopping the arrears of his penſion, and forbad him to remove his effects. They granted him ſome advantages; and promiſed to make him Socinus's Collegue at two years end. Socinus, who was at Siena, being informed of this, ſent word that he would not return to Piſa, if that promiſe was performed. This menace made ſuch an impreſſion, that they told our Philip he

(a) Plura alia quæ provocatus perlepida dicteria, jocoſaque ſcommata inter diſputandum dicebat ſæpius excepto pro jucundis vulgo recitabantur. Panzirolus, de clar. Leg. Interpret. pag. 301. See alſo Forſt. Hiſt. Juris Civil. lib. 3. cap. 39. pag. m. 533.

(b) See Forſterus, Hiſt. Juris Civil. lib. 3. cap. 39. pag. 534.

(c) About the year 1483.

[D] He complained of the ſmallneſs of his Salary.] This circumſtance is diſadvantageous to his memory: I own the blur would be greater, if the fault in queſtion did not appear frequently; but in ſhort, the multitude of mercenary Profeſſors, too ſelf-intereſted, and ſolliciting too eargerly for an augmentation of their Salary, does not wipe off the blame of his behaviour. However it be, our Philip, tho' loaded with glory, and honoured with the public approbation, was nevertheleſs uneaſy when he conſidered his penſion: he thought it too ſmall, and complained of it to the Curators of the Univerſity. One of them gave him very fair hopes; for, added he, I am very well perſuaded of your merit. I had rather, anſwered the Profeſſor, you ſhould have a bad opinion of me. And being aſked the reaſon of ſo extraordinary an anſwer, he replied, It is becauſe if you had a bad opinion of me, I ſhould hope for a better Salary by undeceiving you; but ſince my ſalary is very ſmall, while you eſteem me, I have no hopes left. The Latin of Panzirolus expreſſes this better; for which reaſon I ſhall tranſcribe it: "Cum tenui ſtipendio ſe ali apud Gymnaſii "Præfectos quereretur, Alomanuſque Renutius inter illos "ſenior eum bono animo eſſe juſſiſſet, quod benè apud ſe "audiret, Philippus, Mallem, inquit, ut ſiniſtram de "me opinionem haberetis. Illis reſponſi novitatem "mirantibus, & rationem perquirentibus, Si de me, "reſpondit, prava concepta eſſet opinio, detecto er"rore, amplius ſtipendium ſperare poſſem, ſed cum "benè audiens parvo adhuc digner honorario, nihil "mihi ſpei reliquum eſſe poteſt (11)." I have obſerved a thouſand and a thouſand times in the Lives of the Lawyers written by Panzirolus, that to raiſe the glory of the Profeſſors, he takes exact notice of the augmentation of their Salaries. This certainly is a proof that they were judged well qualified to make an Univerſity flouriſh; it is a ſign of their ſuperior parts therefore, and of their capacity. Self-love, always attentive on its own juſtification, and more ingenious in that reſpect than can be expreſſed, fails not to make uſe of this fair gloſs, and by that means to elude the reproaches of venality and avarice; but it cannot well ſhut the door againſt theſe two difficulties. One is, that theſe amplifications of Salaries are almoſt always the effect of the complaints and importunate ſollicitations of thoſe who are gratified therewith, or of their menaces to retire, in compliance with a more lucrative invitation (12). The other is, that theſe more lucrative invitations would not be addreſſed to people who were thought diſintereſted, and ſenſible of nothing but glory. Our Decius had not that ſenſibility, nor was it his character. He leaped like a roe-buck from place to place, from Univerſity to Univerſity, he went away, and he returned, according to the amount of the penſions which were promiſed him, and he would needs take notice himſelf in his Epitaph that his wages amounted at length to 1500 crowns of Gold. He was afraid the term aureus would not ſufficiently expreſs the largeneſs of the price which his Lectures had coſt; wherefore he added to it the barbarous words in auro. Philippus Decius, revocatus in Italiam ab excelſa Florentinorum Rep. poſteaquam ſtipendium M. D. aureorum in auro pro lectura conſecutus fuiſſet, de morte cogitans, hoc ſepulchrum ſibi fabricari curavit (13). i. e. "Philip Decius, being recalled into Italy by the Re"public of Florence, after he had obtained a Stipend "of 1500 crowns of gold for his Lectures, thinking "of death, cauſed this tomb to be made for himſelf." He intimates that he did not think of death till after he had attained this great penſion. Titulo res digna ſepulchri. A circumſtance fit to be inſcribed on a Tomb-ſtone. This Epitaph deſerves cenſure more on that account, than for the rudeneſs of the ſtyle (14). Let it not be ſaid that he refuſed the thouſand crowns of gold which the Senate of Milan, the city of Bologna, and the Republic of Venice, offered him, while he had but eight hundred at Piſa (15); for without doubt he refuſed them in hopes of being paid for that refuſal with intereſt: and we ſee, accordingly, that the Univerſy of Piſa augmented his Penſion, and made it much larger than any he could have got in other Univerſities. Take notice, by the way, that Mr. Wharton has offended a little againſt the laws of exactneſs, in ſaying that the Florentines recalled him into Italy by a penſion of 1500 crowns of gold (16).

(11) Idem, ibid. pag. 301.

(12) Compare this with what is ſaid in the Remark [A] of the Article ACCARISI (Francis); and in the Remark [G] of the Article ALCIAT (Andrew).

(13) Panzirolus, de claris Legum Interpretibus, pag. 309.

(14) It was turned to ridicule. See Paul. Jovius, Elog. pag. 208.

(15) Demum Piſas cum DCCC. aureorum ſtipendio omnium ſupremus conductus eſt, ubi & à Mediolanenſi Senatu, & à Bononienſibus, Venetiſque mille aureorum annua promiſſione fruſtra ſolicitatus per multos annos perſeveravit, nec ad MD. aureorum honorarium pervenit. Panzirolus, de clar. Leg. Interpret. pag. 308.

(16) Henricus Wharton, in Appendice ad Hiſtoriam Literariam Gulielmi Cave, pag. 202.

[E] He had a mind to have a ſhare in the place of F. Accolti, and he had already obtained what he deſired.] Some aſſert that he actually performed the functions of the place, and that it was not taken from him till after Socinus, grieved at the heart to ſee his School empty, had demanded either his own diſmiſſion, or that of Decius. Bartholomæus Socinus Juris Cæſarei in eodem Gymnaſio Profeſſor cum ſe diſcipulis viduatum doleret, aut ſemetipſum aut Philippum munere ſuo dimitti petiit (17). I find Panzirolus's account more probable, which is that Socinus demanded this as ſoon as he knew of the promiſe which had been made to our Philip, and before he could have obſerved that ſuch a concurrent was prejudicial to him.

(17) Idem, ibid. pag. 203.

he might retire if Socinus came to reſume his Profeſſorſhip. Accordingly, upon Socinus's return, he immediately retired to Siena, and was there Profeſſor of Canon Law, and afterwards of Civil Law. He took a Journey to Rome about the year 1490, and was appointed Auditor of the Rota by Innocent VIII. He conſecrated himſelf to the Eccleſiaſtical State, but having received the firſt Orders, he could proceed no farther by reaſon of his baſtardy. Some Authors have ſuppreſſed this obſtacle, and have rather choſen to ſay that out of complaiſance to his father, and his brother, and becauſe he was tired with repeating his Breviary every day, he left Rome and returned to Siena (d). He there ſaw himſelf expoſed to the envy of ſome other Profeſſors, which obliged him to go to Piſa, where he taught ſometimes the Canon Law, and ſometimes the Civil Law; not without a great many quarrels [F]. He was invited to Padua to fill the firſt Chair of Canon Law, in the year 1502. Lewis XII, looking on him as his ſubject, and deſigning to make him Profeſſor at Pavia, demanded him back from the Venetians, who after great oppoſition, ſubmitted at length to the King's pleaſure [G]. Decius arrived at Pavia towards the end of the year 1505, and there demonſtrated himſelf worthy of the earneſt deſire which Lewis XII had expreſſed to get him. Having done the duties of the Profeſſorſhip ſeven years, he obtained a ſalary of two thouſand livres, which was more than any Profeſſor had ever had in that Univerſity. The diſputes of France with the Court of Rome precipitated him into a thouſand misfortunes. Being conſulted by Lewis XII concerning the celebration of a Council, he gave his opinion that a ſmall number of Cardinals had a right to call one, and wrote a Book on that ſubject. In purſuance of this doctrine, a Council was held at Piſa, and he followed the Prelates of the French faction thither. This irritated Julius II to ſuch a degree, that he declared him excommunicate; which puniſhment was not, in all probability, ſo hard to bear, as the plundering of Decius's houſe when Pavia was taken [H]. Finding himſelf not ſafe in Italy, he retired into France, where he obtained the place of a Counſellor in the Parliament of Grenoble [I]. He went, by the King's order, to join the ſcattered remains of the Council of Piſa at (d) Alii ejus natales celantes rem aliter narrant. Cum Triſtanus pater, & Lancellotus frater factum non probarent, & ipſe in canonicis horis quotidie recitandis tædio afficeretur, relicta Roma, iterum ad Senenſes remeavit. Panzirolus, de claris Legum Interpretibus, pag. 305.

[F] He taught at Piſa . . . . . not without a great many quarrels.] Socinus was not the only perſon who would not have him for an Antagoniſt, that is, who would not read his Lectures at the ſame hour that he did, and on the ſame ſubjects. It appears from the Work of Panzirolus, that in the Univerſities of Italy the Profeſſors were matched in that manner, and that thoſe who were ſo matched paſſed for the Rivals, the Antagoniſts, and the Competitors of each other. They were almoſt always at open war, and they heated themſelves ſometimes ſo furiouſly in the public Diſputations, that people went to them as to a combate of Gladiators. Our Decius had rendered himſelf ſo formidable that few Profeſſors would be matched with him. They complained of his abuſive language, and of the Artifices which he made uſe of to attract Auditors. Ibi (Piſis) eum omnes concurrentem recuſare, hominem ut maledicum, maliſque artibus auditores captantem criminari (18). Anthony Coccus had the courage to enter the liſts againſt him: the action was ſharp, and they plied one another with the loweſt ſcurrilities, and the moſt unworthy the gravity of their character: Mox ad matutinam ejuſdem Juris (Pontificii) ſedem tranſlatus Antonium Coccum Florentinum ob veterem æmulationem durum adverſarium concurrentem invenit. In ea contentione ita ſe exagitarunt, ut nec fœdis ſcommatibus præter omnem gravitatem abſtinuerint (19). Jaſon Mainus, being called to the Profeſſorſhip of the Civil Law, would not have Decius for his Antagoniſt: he repreſented that decency would not permit two Profeſſors who were natives of the ſame city to make war on one another. Whereupon it was ordered that our Philip ſhould return to profeſs the Canon Law (20). Mainus was not always ſo diſcreet: he had a terrible quarrel with Decius (21).

(18) Panzirolus, de claris Legum Interpretibus, pag. 305.

(19) Idem, ibid.

(20) Ex eodem, ibid.

(21) See the Remark [F] of the Article MAINUS.

[G] Lewis XII . . . . demanded him back from the Venetians, who after great oppoſition ſubmitted to the King's pleaſure.] The French Embaſſador inſiſted ſo ſtrenuouſly in the Senate of Venice to obtain Decius, that the Florentine Envoy could not help ſaying he would acquaint his maſters with it. He thought it a very remarkable ſingularity, that two ſuch powers ſhould diſpute for one man. Ludovicus Gallorum Rex Decium, velut ſubjectum, Ticinum revocat, ſed Venetis eum dimittere recuſantibus, Regius Orator maximam in Senatu contentionem exercuit, quod admiratus Joannes Bernardi Oricellarius, qui ibi pro Florentinis Legatus aderat, ſe ingentem ob unum hominem inter Excelſos Principes ortam altercationem vidiſſe Florentinis relaturum dixit (22). Hence we may refute a miſtake of Paul Jovius: he ſays that the French Governor cauſed our Decius to come from Piſa to Pavia (23). Mr. Wharton has committed the ſame fault (24).

(22) Panzirolus, de claris Legum Interpretibus, pag. 307.

[H] They plundered the houſe of Decius when Pavia was taken.] Pavia being taken, the Cardinal of Sion cauſed Decius's houſe to be pillaged; and his Library was ranſacked. They had even a mind to take that Profeſſor's daughter, who was then but ten years old, out of the Cloiſter of St. Andrew; but at the entreaty of the Nuns they left her there, having firſt ſtripped her of all ſhe had. That nothing might eſcape their vengeance, it was ordered that all Decius's effects ſhould be delivered up to the public (25). Paul Jovius tells us that the Cardinal of Sion did not ſuffer any houſe to be pillaged in Pavia except Philip Decius's (26). This happened in the year 1512. Forſterus, therefore, has been guilty of a groſs blunder; for having ſaid that this great Civilian complains that he was reduced to poverty and indigence, expelled his country, and unjuſtly ſtripped of his whole fortune, and had nothing left but hope, the ſole comfort of the miſerable; ſe egenum, inopem, à patriâ ejectum, fortunis omnibus abſque ſua culpa ſpoliatum, præter ſpem (unicum miſerorum ſolatium) nihil habere, he adds, hæc autem perpeſſus eſt anno 1498 (27), i. e. "theſe misfortunes he ſuffered in "the year 1498." Mr. Varillas ought to have mentioned this diſaſter, ſince he thought it incumbent on him to ſpeak of a leſſer. Philip Decius, ſays he (28), was not exempt from the reſentment of Julius . . . . He had provoked the Court of Rome to the higheſt degree, by offering the Council of Piſa to digeſt the matters which they were to conſider of, and to furniſh the neceſſary Authorities to ſupport them. That Court was alſo afraid he would write in favour of the reſolutions which ſhould be there taken, and that his authority might make them approved wherever that was reſpected. All the thunders of the Church were fulminated againſt him; and he was put in ſuch a condition, that tho' he was univerſally beloved and eſteemed in Milan, where he ſo worthily filled the chair of the firſt Profeſſor of Civil Law, he durſt not ſtir out of his houſe but very ſeldom, and very well attended. He is miſtaken in ſaying that Decius was Profeſſor of the Civil Law at Milan.

(23) Ab ipſis Piſis ubi uxorem duxerat Ticinum à Gallo præſide opimis ſtipendiis evocatus. Jovius, Elogiorum, pag. 207.

(24) Wharton, in Append. ad Hiſt. Litterar. Guil. Cave, pag. 202.

(25) Extracted from Panzirolus, de claris Legum Interpret. pag. 307, 308.

(26) Unam omnium Decii domum militi diripiendam dedit. Jovius, Elogior. pag. 207. Wharton, in Append. ad Hiſt. Litterar. Guill. Cave, pag. 302, ſays the ſame.

(27) Forſterus, Hiſt. Juris Civilis, pag. 505. He quotes the Epiſtle Dedicatory of Decius's Counſels.

(28) Varillas, Hiſt. de Louis XII, liv. 8. vers la fin, pag. m. 85. at the year 1512.

[I] He obtained a Counſellor's place in the Parliament of Grenoble.] This city does not belong to Gallia Narbonenſis as Panzirolus ſuppoſes. In Narbonenſi Provincia, ſays he (29), Gratianopoli cum CCL aureorum honorario Senator eſt declaratus. He does not mention the year: I do not know whether Mr. Allard fixes it right, when he ſays that Decius was honoured with that employment in the year 1514 (30); and I doubt of what Panzirolus ſays, that Decius was Profeſſor of the Civil

(29) Panzirolus, de claris Legum Interpretibus, pag. 308.

(30) Allard, Bibliotb. de Dauphiné, p. 87.

at Lyons; and afterwards he profeſſed the Civil Law in the Univerſity of Valence (e). After the death of Julius II. he was abſolved by Leo X, who offered him a Profeſſorſhip of Canon Law at Rome; but fearing to offend the King by accepting thoſe offers he refuſed them (f). After the death of Lewis XII, he was invited to Piſa, but Francis I would not permit him to go thither, and ſent him to profeſs the Canon Law at Pavia. He left that city, becauſe he was not paid his ſalary, and ſeeing Milan beſieged by the troops of the Emperor Maximilian, he returned to Piſa, where his Profeſſor's Salary amounted at firſt to 800 crowns of gold, and at laſt to 1500. He died at Siena, the 13th of October 1535, at the age of fourſcore and one, and was buried at Piſa, in the marble tomb which he had cauſed to be made for that purpoſe. He had a baſtard daughter, whom he greatly loved, and who was a very lewd woman [K]. His memory grew very ſhort the laſt years of his life (g) [L]. We have ſeveral Books of his writing: wherein, as has been obſerved, he tortured the Interpreters, and ſometimes made falſe quotations (h). His Commentaries on the Decretals are much eſteemed (i). We ſhall take notice of ſome miſtakes of Moreri [M].

(e) See the Remark [I].

(f) Mr. Doujat, Præn. Canon. pag. 617, has not rightly underſtood this; he ſuppoſes Decius accepted them.

(g) Extracted from Panzirolus, de claris Legum Interpretibus, lib. 2. cap. 135.

(h) Idem, ibid.

(i) Doujat. Præ-not. Canon. pag. 618.

Law at Valence, after he had been Counſellor in the Parliament of Grenoble. I ſhould rather believe that he was a Counſellor in that Parliament after having profeſſed Law in the Univerſity of Valence.

[K] He had a baſtard daughter . . . who was a very lewd woman.] It is ſaid that her irregularities were attended with imprudence: ſo that her father had the grief to be informed of them; but he feigned to be ignorant of the matter. This girl had not even the power to ſave appearances, but was ſeen to play and toy with boys in the ſtreets; which is not in Italy, as in ſome other places; an equivocal ſign of lewdneſs, but a convincing proof. Here is another diſorder: inſtead of getting money by her ill conduct, ſhe ſpent a great deal; for ſhe bought the favours of young men at a very dear rate. I ſhall cite Panzirolus. Filiam naturalem in deliciis habuit, quæ citharam edocta, diſſimulante patre, minus honeſtam cum adoleſcentibus, quos magna etiam pecunia conducebat, vitam egiſſe dicitur, & cum illis in publico jocari non erubeſcebat (31). Let us put Decius in the Catalogue which I have ſpoken of in another place (32). However, if we believe Paul Jovius (33), his only daughter was married to a Gentleman of Siena.

(31) Panzirol. de claris Leg. Interpret. pag. 308.

(32) In the Remark [G] of the article STILPO.

(33) Jovius, Elogior. pag. 207.

[L] His memory grew very ſhort the laſt years of his life.] It failed him when the degree of Doctor was to be conferred on Corraſius (34). Others ſay that he no longer remembred any paragraph, or any law, and that he could ſcarce ſpeak one word of Latin. Sub finem vitæ adeo factus eſt oblivioſus, ut nullius Legis vel Paragraphi reminiſci, & vix Latine quid proloqui potuerit (35). I have not found theſe words in the Author whom Freherus cites, but I have met with the whole fact a little more at large in a work of Corraſius himſelf. He ſpeaks thus (36): Quin & noſtra hac ætate Philippus Decius, egregius Juriſconſultus, anno 1536 (37) (quo tempore me in Senenſi Academia Doctoratus titulo donavit) adeo ſenectute emarcuerat, ut nullius legis aut paragraphi ex jure noſtro recordaretur: imò ægre quicquam Latine proloqui poſſet. Quare quum mihi ipſa gradus inſignia conferre conaretur, alium quendam è collegis oportuerit prodire, qui verba ſolita nuncuparet. i. e. "And in our own age Philip Decius, an excellent Civilian, in the year 1536 (at which time he conferred on me the degree of Doctor in the Univerſity of Siena) was ſo decayed by old age that he remembred no head or paragraph of our Law: nay, he could ſcarce ſpeak any Latin. For which reaſon when he ſtrove to confer the Degree on me, another of his Collegues was obliged to ſtep forth and pronounce the cuſtomary words."

(34) Senio confectus memoriæ adeo infirmæ fuit, ut Joanni Corraſio inſignia Doctorum traditurus defecerit. Panzirolus, de claris Legum Interpretibus, pag. 309.

(35) Freherus, in Theatro, pag. 814. He cites Forſterus, in Hiſt. Juris Civilis Rom. lib. 2. cap. 39.

(36) Joh. Corraſius, Notis in Arreſtum Parlamenti Tholoſani, pag. m. 71. I have not the French Edition; ſo I cite the Latin Verſion made by Hugh Sureau.

(57) Panzirolus, and all the other Biographers, place the death of Decius in the year 1535.

[M] We ſhall take notice of ſome miſtakes of Moreri.] I. Exactneſs does not ſuffer one to ſay that Decius lived in the beginning of the XVI Century; for he was born in the year 1454, and had acquired a great reputation before he was thirty years old. II. He ſtudied under his brother, firſt at Pavia, and afterwards at Piſa. Wherefore mention ſhould not have been made of Piſa only. III. Jaſon, Bartholomew Socini, and Jerom Zanetini, were not his maſters: he heard their public Lectures; but that is not what we mean when we ſay a perſon had ſuch and ſuch maſters. IV. I doubt whether he was married or not: Panzirolus ſays nothing of it, tho' he follows him ſtep by ſtep thro' the ſmalleſt circumſtances of his life, and expreſly makes him father of a natural daughter. This negative argument appears to me preferable in this caſe to the affirmation of Paul Jovius (38). V. Decius did not retire to Pavia; he was called thither by Lewis XII. VI. He did not go to Pavia when he left Piſa: for he was Profeſſor at Padua when Lewis XII ſent for him to Pavia. Paul Jovius has deceived a great many people in this particular: ab ipſis Piſis, ſays he (39), ubi uxorem duxerat, Ticinum a Gallo Præſide, opimis ſtipendiis evocatus; i. e. "Being invited from Piſa, "where he had married a wife, to Pavia, by the "French Governor, on an offer of a large ſtipend." VII. Being retired to France after the plundering of his houſe, he did not ſtay two years at Bourges, as Moreri aſſerts, after Paul Jovius (40). The ſilence of Panzirolus ſeems to me a demonſtration againſt this; and beſides, Chronology does not favour Moreri. He will have it that Decius, having ſtaid two years at Bourges, was called to Valence by Lewis XII, and honoured with the poſt of a Counſellor in the Parliament. This able Civilian's houſe was pillaged in the year 1512, and it is very probable he did not arrive in France till towards the end of the ſame year. Now Lewis XII died the firſt of January 1515. It is more reaſonable to believe thoſe who ſay that Decius on his arrival in the Kingdom was promoted to the place of Counſellor. Mr. Doujat is miſtaken in placing this under the year 1510 (41). VIII. Decius was not interred at Pavia, but at Piſa. IX. Inſtead of nimis venuſtè, in the Verſes of Latomus, it ſhould be read minus venuſtè.

(38) Piſis ubi uxorem duxerat. Jovius, Elogior. pag. 207.

(39) Jovius, ibid. Wharton, Freherus, Theatr. Vir. ill. pag. 814, ſay the ſame thing.

(40) In civitate Biturigum jus divinum edocuit per duos ferme annos. Jovius, Elog. pag. 207. Wharton, Freherus, &c. ſay the ſame.

(41) Doujat. Prænotion. Canonicæ, pag. 617.

Take notice of another fault of Paul Jovius. He ſays that Decius, being returned to Italy, entered into the ſervice of the Univerſity of Siena. It was into the ſervice of the Univerſity of Piſa. Take notice alſo of a miſtake of Mr. le Laboureur: he ſuppoſes that John James de Mêmes, Profeſſor of Law at Toulouſe, had Philip Decius for his Collegue (42). The latter never taught there.

(42) Le Laboureur, Addit. aux Mémoir. de Caſteln. tom. 2. pag. 835.

DEJOTARUS, one of the Tetrarchs of Galatia, gradually aggrandized himſelf in ſuch a manner that he encroached on almoſt all the rights of the other Tetrarchs, and obtained of the Roman Senate the title of King, and the leſſer Armenia (a). He was at laſt the ſole Tetrarch (b). He did the Romans conſiderable ſervices in all their wars in Aſia [A]; and not doubting but Pompey's cauſe was that of the Roman people, and that (a) Hirtius, de Bello Alexandr. cap. 67.

(b) Strabo, lib. 12. pag. 390.

[A] He did the Romans conſiderable ſervices in all their Wars in Aſia.] Cicero ſpeaks of them in a magnificent manner; here are his words (1): Quid de patre (Dejotaro) dicam? cujus benevolentia in populum Romanum eſt ipſius æqualis ætati: qui non ſolum ſocius imperatorum noſtrorum fuit in bellis, verum etiam dux copiarum ſuarum. Quæ de illo viro Sulla, quæ Murena, quæ Servilius, quæ Lucullus, quam ornate, quam honorifice,

(1) Philippica XI, cap. 13.

that Cæsar's party were the rebels, he declared for Pompey [B], and brought him a good body of forces. He was severely censured for it some time after, when Cæsar, returning from Egypt to encounter Pharnaces King of Pontus, approached Galatia. Dejotarus, in order to make him forget his attachment to Pompey, and to procure himself a support against the other Tetrarchs, had supplied him with large sums of money (c), and given the troops of Domitius Calvinus (d) quarter in his dominions. This was not unserviceable to him; for having received some sharp reprimands, he found favour with Cæsar [C]. He had asked him pardon, and to do it with more humility, he had put off the royal habit. Cæsar made him resume it, pardoned him what was past (e), and confirmed the title of King to him and his son (f); but took him along with him to the war against Pharnaces (g), and afterwards deprived him of Armenia and part of Galatia (h). Some time after Dejotarus had a very troublesome affair at Rome. He was accused there of an attempt on Cæsar's life: it was averred that when Cæsar lodged with Dejotarus, the latter had a design to kill him. Castor, the son of Dejotarus's son-in-law, carried on this accusation, and suborned the Physician (i) of his maternal grandfather, to give evidence against his master. Cicero pleaded the cause of the accused person (k), and succeeded admirably well; nevertheless, he did not carry the cause: Cæsar gave sentence on neither side [D], but chose to leave the matter undecided: those who assert the contrary

(c) Cicero, Orat. pro Dejotaro, cap. 5.

(d) He was Julius Cæsar's Lieutenant in Asia.

(e) Hirtius, de Bello Alexandr. cap. 68.

(f) Cicero, Orat. pro Dejotaro, cap. 3.

(g) Hirtius, de Bello Alexandr. cap. 68.

(b) Cicero, de Divinat. lib. 2. cap. 8, and 36. and Philipp. II, cap. 37.

(i) He was come to Rome with the Ambassadors of Dejotarus.

(k) Vide Orationem Ciceronis pro Rege Dejotaro, passim.

rifice, quam graviter sæpe in Senatu prædicaverunt? Quid de Cn. Pompeio loquar? qui unum Dejotarum in toto orbe terrarum ex animo amicum, vereque benevolum, unum fidelem populo R. judicavit. Fuimus imperatores ego, & M. Bibulus in propinquis, finitimisque provinciis: ab eodem rege adjuti sumus, & equitatu, & pedestribus copiis. i. e. "What shall I say of the father (Dejotarus)? whose affection to the Roman "people equals his age: who was not only the Ally "of our Generals in War, but also the leader of his "own forces. With what eloquence, with what honour, with what earnestness have Sylla, Murena, Servilius, and Lucullus, frequently extolled that man's "conduct in the Senate? What shall I say of Cn. "Pompeius? who judged Dejotarus to be of all mankind the most cordial friend, truly affectionate, and "faithful to the Roman People. My self and Bibulus "were at the head of an army in the provinces bordering on his dominions; and were assisted by the "same King with forces, both horse and foot." See also what he wrote while he commanded in Cilicia (2).

(2) Idem, Epist. 4. lib. 15. ad Famil.

[B] Dejotarus declared for Pompey.] Immediately after the Latin passage we have just now read, Cicero continues in this manner: Secutum est hoc acerbissimum & calamitosissimum civile bellum: in quo quid faciendum Dejotaro? quid omnino rectius fuerit, dicere non est necesse, præsertim cum contra ac Dejotarus sensit, victoria belli judicârit. Quo in bello si fuit error, communis ei fuit cum Senatu: sin recta sententia, ne victa quidem caussa vituperanda est. i. e. "Then followed that "most cruel and calamitous civil war: what did De"jotarus then? What was most right to be done, "needs not now be said, especially since the fortune of "war has decided contrary to the judgment of De"jotarus. In which war if he committed an error, "he erred with the Roman Senate: but if his opinion "was right, the cause must not be condemned though "it failed of success." These words inform us that Dejotarus thought Pompey would triumph: and therefore he had engaged in that party as much for political reasons as for reasons of justice. We shall see in the following remarks that he was always of opinion that he had declared for the right side, but he took care not to speak his thoughts before Cæsar.

[C] Having received some sharp reprimands, he found favour with Cæsar.] He asked pardon of Cæsar for having fought against him at the battle of Pharsalia; he represented to him the situation of his country, which made it impossible for him to be supported by Cæsar's troops: he added that it belonged not to him to judge of the differences of the Roman people; but to obey those who were possessed of the government on all occasions. To say the truth, these were false excuses; for he was strongly persuaded that the cause of Pompey was that of the Roman people, and that Cæsar was a rebellious subject. He did undertake to judge therefore of the differences of the Roman people. However we ought not to think it strange that he concealed his true thoughts; for there are hardly any but Saints of the first rank, or Philosophers who heartily despise all worldly things, who can act more ingenuously than he did. All his excuses were rejected: he was told that his imprudence was visible, and that he could not be ignorant that Cæsar was Master of Rome, that is to say, of the seat of the Senate, and the centre of the authority of the Roman people. Let this be said in favour of those who do not understand Latin; for those who do will be more pleased that I should quote the words of Hirtius. And here they are (3): Cum propius Pontum finesque Gallogræciæ accessisset (Cæsar), Dejotarus, Tetrarches Gallogræciæ tunc quidem penè totius, quod ei neque legibus neque moribus concessum esse cæteri Tetrarchæ contendebant: sine dubio autem Rex Armeniæ minoris à Senatu appellatus, depositis Regiis insignibus, neque tantùm privato vestitu, sed etiam reorum habitu supplex ad Cæsarem venit oratum, ut sibi ignosceret, quòd in ea parte positus terrarum, quæ nulla præsidia Cæsaris habuisset, exercitibus imperiisque in Cn. Pompeii castris affuisset. Neque enim se debuisse judicem esse controversiarum populi Romani, sed parere præsentibus imperiis. Contra quem Cæsar, cum plurima sua commemorasset officia, quæ consul ei decretis publicis tribuisset, cumque defensionem ejus nullam posse excusationem imprudentiæ recipere coarguisset, quod homo tantæ prudentiæ ac diligentiæ scire potuisset quis urbem Italiamque teneret, ubi Senatus populusque Romanus, ubi Respublica esset, quis deinde post L. Lentulum & M. Marcellum consul esset: tamen se concedere id factum superioribus suis beneficiis, veteri hospitio & amicitiæ, ac dignitati ætatique hominis, precibus eorum qui frequentes concurrissent hospites atque amici Dejotari ad deprecandum. De controversiis Tetrarcharum postea se cogniturum esse dixit: regium vestitum ei restituit. Legionem autem unam, quam ex genere civium suorum Dejotarus natura disciplinaque nostra constitutam habebat, equitatumque omnem ad bellum gerendum adducere jussit.

(3) Hirtius, de Bello Alexandrino, cap. 67.

(4) Abram. in Cicer. Oration tom. 2. pag. 467.

[D] He was accused of an attempt on Cæsar's life... Cæsar gave sentence on neither side.] On this occasion I can only cite Father Abram: Videtur Cæsar, says he (4), sententiam distuliisse, dum ut statuerat primo quoque tempore proficisceretur in Orientem: certè non fuit absolutus ut constat è 2 Philippica. i. e. "Cæsar seems "to have delayed giving sentence, till he should take "a journey into the East, as he designed speedily to "have done: it is certain he was not acquitted, as "appears from the second Philippic." I set down in the margin the words which he has quoted from the IId Philippic (5). They put me in mind of a thing I have observed elsewhere (6), which is that Advocates are very subject to contradict themselves, because they make use of the same fact, or the same reason, sometimes one way, and sometimes another, according as the causes which they have in hand require. When Cicero refuted the Accusers of Dejotarus, he said it was not at all probable that that Prince, who had lately received so many favours from Julius Cæsar, should contrive to kill him. Quæ quidem à te in eam partem accepta sunt, C. Cæsar, ut eum amplissimo regis honore & nomine affeceris. Is igitur non modo à te periculo liberatus, sed etiam honore amplissimo ornatus arguitur domi te suæ interficere voluisse, quod tu, nisi eum furiosissimum judicas, suspicari profecto non potes. Ut enim omittam, cujus ..... tam inhumani & INGRATI animi à quo rex appellatus esset in eum tyrannum inveniri (7). i. e. "Which "things, O Cæsar, were accepted by you so favour"ably,

(5) Quis enim cuiquam inimicior quam Dejotaro Cæsar? ... à quo vivo nec præsens nec absens quisquam æqui bonive impetravit ... at ille nunquam (semper enim absenti affui Dejotaro) quicquam sibi quod nos pro illo postularemus, æquum dixit videri. i. e. "For who was "ever a greater "enemy to another than "Cæsar was to "Dejotarus?... "from whom, "in his life-"time, he could "never obtain "any right or "justice, either "present or ab"sent... but he "never allowed "any thing to be "just in his opi"nion which "we asked on "the behalf of "Dejotarus, "with whom I "constantly "corresponded." Cicero, II Philipp. cap. 37.

(6) Above, in the Remarks [B] and [C] of the Article ANTONIUS (Marcus) the Orator.

A Contradiction of Cicero.

(7) Cicero pro Dejotaro, cap. 5.

trary are miſtaken [E]. Some months after he was aſſaſſinated. Dejotarus no ſooner received the news of it, than he retook all that Cæſar had diſpoſſeſſed him of (l). His great age did not hinder him from joining Brutus in Aſia (m), and by that ſtep he confirmed the proteſtations of his good intentions which had been made to the Senate (n). He was not ſo good-natured as his Orator repreſents him [F]: he put his daughter and his

(l) Cicero, Philipp. II.

(m) Dio, lib. 47. pag. 338.

(n) Cicero, Philipp. XI. cap. 3.

" ably, that you granted him the honourable title of " King. He, therefore, who had not only been by " you freed from danger, but even highly honoured, " is accuſed of a deſign to murder you in his own " houſe; which you cannot poſſibly ſuſpect, unleſs you " think him the greateſt madman in the world. For, " not to inſiſt that it would argue a moſt inhuman " and UNGRATEFUL mind, if he ſhould prove a ty- " rant with reſpect to him from whom he had " received the royal dignity &c." But when, ſome months after, he undertook to prove a Decree which had been publiſhed under the name of Julius Cæſar to be a forgery, he argued in this manner: This Decree is favourable to Dejotarus; therefore Cæſar, who was always an enemy to Dejotarus, and who never granted him either any favour or any juſtice, is not the author of it; and thereupon he particularly alledged all the hardſhips which Cæſar had put on Dejotarus even in the midſt of Galatia, that is when and where Dejotarus deſigned to deſtroy him, as his accuſers affirmed. Compellarat hoſpitem præſens, computarat, pecuniam imperarat, in ejus tetrarchia unum ex Græcis comitibus ſuis collocarat: Armeniam abſtulerat à Senatu datam (8). i. e. " He had ſent for his Hoſt, had made a calculation, " and had commanded him to furniſh a certain ſum " of money, and had alſo placed one of his Greek " Attendants in his Tetrarchy; and had taken Arme- " nia from him which had been given him by the Se- " nate." So that Cæſar's behaviour with regard to Dejotarus ſerved for an argument both pro and con in Cicero's hands. When it was neceſſary to prove that Dejotarus had great obligations to Cæſar, it was ſet forth as a beneficent behaviour; but when it was neceſſary to prove that Dejotarus had never any ſhare in Cæſar's friendſhip, it was repreſented as the very reverſe. What appeared in Cæſar's conduct favourable to Dejotarus ſerved for a proof againſt the Accuſers; and what appeared therein adverſe to that Prince, ſerved for evidence againſt Marc Antony. I would fain know what Cicero would have anſwered to one who ſhould have ſaid to him: I am informed by your ſecond Philippic, that when Cæſar paſſed through Galatia, he treated Dejotarus very harſhly: it is probable therefore that Dejotarus, to revenge himſelf, conſpired againſt Cæſar: and conſequently you ought to ſtrike out of your Oration for Dejotarus the proof which you have made uſe of againſt his Accuſers, drawn from the gratitude which the great favours he had received from Julius Cæſar inſpired him with.

(8) Idem, Philipp. II. cap. 37.

WHY Cæſar made no deciſion.

If the ſtratagems of Politicians were not well known, one would be amazed to ſee that Cæſar did not pronounce a ſentence of acquittal in the cauſe of Dejotarus; for to judge of the accuſation by the anſwer of the accuſed, never was a calumny more groſly invented than that of Dejotarus's Accuſers. Beſides that one of that King's Ambaſſadors offered Cæſar to go to priſon, and to anſwer for his Maſter's innocence body for body: Hieras quidem cauſſam omnem ſuſcipit, & criminibus illis pro rege ſe ſupponit reum (9). The moſt probable thing they ſaid, in my opinion, is that Dejotarus during the war of Africa was extremely inquiſitive after news from that country, and eager to hear bad news of Cæſar (10): it was of importance to him to ſtand no longer in fear of him; and nothing but that fear hindred him from taking poſſeſſion again of what he had loſt. Cæſar made no doubt of it; for which reaſon he was well pleaſed not to acquit him: he bridled him by that means, and encouraged ſpies and informers. It was his intereſt that the puniſhment of the calumny on this occaſion ſhould not free his enemies from the apprehenſion they might be in of being calumniated. This uneaſineſs is proper to be kept up, when a man is placed in ſuch a poſt as Cæſar's. What Cicero repreſented is very fine: if it be permitted to ſuborn domeſtics to give evidence againſt their maſters, and if thoſe falſe accuſers are not puniſhed, war is declared againſt all maſters of families, nobody can be ſafe in his own houſe, and by a ſtrange metamorphoſis maſters would be ſlaves to their ſervants, and ſervants would become their maſters tyrants. Servum ſollicitare verbis, ſpe, præmiiſque corrumpere, abducere domum, contra dominum armare, hoc eſt non uni propinquo, ſed omnibus familiis bellum neſarium indicere. Nam iſta corruptela ſervi ſi non modo impunita fuerit, ſed etiam à tanta authoritate approbata, nulli parietes noſtram ſalutem, nullæ leges, nulla jura cuſtodient: ubi enim id quod intus eſt atque noſtrum impune evolare poteſt, contraque nos pugnare, fit in dominatu ſervitus, in ſervitute dominatus. O tempora, ô mores (11). Cicero did not conſider that the terrible diſorder he repreſented will always be what tyrants and uſurpers ſeek. They would have us afraid leſt the walls and floors of our chambers ſhould ſtart up as witneſſes. Obſerve that at all times ſpies and informers have taken notice in what manner people diſcourſe about news. This was one of the crimes they objected to Dejotarus.

(9) Cicero, pro Dejotaro, ſub fin.

(10) Reliqua pars accuſationis duplex fuit: una Regem ſemper in ſpeculis fuiſſe ... ſequutum eſt bellum Africanum, graves de te rumores qui etiam furioſum illum Cælium excitaverunt ... Eo, inquit, tempore ipſe Nicæam, Epheſumque mittebat qui rumores Africanos exciperent, & celeriter ad ſe referrent. Cicero, pro Dejotaro, cap. 8.

(11) Cicero, pro Dejotaro, cap. 11.

[E] . . . . They who aſſert the contrary are miſtaken.] A Political Treatiſe printed in the year 1660, wherein are ſhewn the reaſons of one of the Chambers of Accounts in France for ratifying the Letters of naturalization of Foreigners tho' Proteſtants, contains theſe words (12): If you had read thoſe Pamphlets, perhaps the opinion which you have brought with you from home would drop from you as eaſily as the papers of Condemnation againſt Dejotarus did from Cæſar, after he had heard the great Cicero ſpeak ſo eloquently and ſo forcibly in his defence. One man is here taken for another; Dejotarus for Ligarius. See the Article of LIGARIUS, Remark [A].

(12) Folio 5 verſo.

[F] He was not ſo good-natured as Cicero repreſents him.] Dejotarus was reproached with having applied a Verſe to two pieces of news which he had received at the ſame time, the one good, and the other bad; one, that his friend Domitius had been ſhipwracked, and the other, that Cæſar was beſieged in a Caſtle. Cicero, to ſhew this was a calumny, ſaid, among other things, that Dejotarus was a good-natured man, and that the Verſe in queſtion is the moſt barbarous in the world. Let our friends periſh, provided our enemies periſh likewiſe. This is the ſenſe of that Verſe. Quum eſſet ei nunciatum Domitium naufragio periiſſe, te in caſtello circumſideri, de Domitio dixit verſum Græcum eadem ſententia qua etiam nos habemus Latinum, Pereant amici dum una inimici intercidant. Quod ille ſi eſſet tibi inimiciſſimus nunquam tamen dixiſſet: ipſe enim manſuetus, verſus immanis (13). Plutarch has repreſented Dejotarus under a quite different idea. According to Chryſippus, ſays he, God reſembles Dejotarus King of the Galatians, who having ſeveral children killed them all except him to whom he deſigned to leave his Kingdom. To underſtand this it is neceſſary to ſee ſomewhat at length what goes before and what follows. As towns and cities, when they are too full of people, draw out or ſend colonies to diſtant places, and begin wars againſt ſome nation or other: So God, according to Chryſippus, ſends the beginnings of ſome mortality; and he cites for witneſſes Euripides and others, who ſay that the Trojan war was ſent by the Gods to exhauſt the too great multitude of the people. . . . Conſider how Chryſippus always aſcribes to God the faireſt names, and the moſt humane appellations in the world, but, on the contrary, ſavage, cruel, barbarous, and Galatian acts; for thoſe great mortalities and deſtructions of mankind, ſuch as were occaſioned by the Trojan war, or by the Median or Peloponneſian, do not properly reſemble the colonies which cities ſend forth, unleſs thoſe people know of ſome city founded and peopled under ground in hell. But Chryſippus makes God like to Dejotarus, King of Galatia, who having ſeveral children, and being deſirous of leaving his Dominions and Kingdom to one of them only, ſlew all the reſt himſelf; as if he had cut away and pruned the other branches of a vine, that the ſingle one which remained might become larger and ſtronger (14), tho' the vine-dreſſer does this when the branches are yet ſlender and weak. And we, to ſpare the bitch, while her puppies are yet too young to his ſon-in-law to death, and demoliſhed the fortreſs where they lived. It is very likely that Caſtor eſcaped his hands [G], and that it was he who, in the year of Rome 714, obtained the territories which Dejotarus and Attalus left vacant in Galatia by their death. Dejotarus to ſee, take ſeveral from her: whereas Jupiter not only ſuffers men to grow in ſtature and attain to perfect age, but having himſelf given them exiſtence, and forwarded their growth, plagues them afterwards by preparing for them occaſions of corruption and death, whereas he ought rather not to have given them any cauſes or principles of birth (15). Theſe words of Plutarch contain a compariſon which makes me recollect an impertinence of Vanini, which I have read in Father Garaſſe's Doctrine Curieuſe, page 815. "As for mankind, ſaid he, we ſhould do with them as Fellers "of Wood do yearly in large foreſts: they go and "view them, to diſcover the dead wood and the "green, and to thin the foreſt, cutting away whatever "is uſeleſs and ſuperfluous, or detrimental, to pre"ſerve only the fair trees, or young hopeful tillers. "In the ſame manner, ſaid this wicked Atheiſt, a "rigorous viſitation ſhould every year be made of all "the inhabitants of great and populous cities, and "thoſe who are uſeleſs, and hinder the reſt from "living, ſhould be put to death; ſuch as perſons "who have no trade or profeſſion uſeful to the pub"lic, decrepit old men, vagabonds and idle fellows: "nature ſhould be pruned, and cities thinned; and "a million of people ſhould be yearly put to death, "who are as briars and nettles to the reſt, and hin"der them from growing." The action which Plutarch imputes to Dejotarus does not ſeem very certain, when we compare it with the praiſes which Cicero has beſtowed on this King of Galatia, and the ſilence of his Accuſers with reſpect to ſuch a piece of cruelty. Would he have ventured to call Dejotarus a good father of a family, optimus Pater familias (16), if Caſtor his grandſon could have reproached him with the murder of his children? Would he have ventured to aſſert that his probity, known to all the world, was a full refutation of the calumny? Hoc loco Dejotarum non tam ingenio & prudentia, quam fide & religione vitæ defendendum puto. Nota tibi eſt, C. Cæſar, hominis probitas, noti mores, nota conſtantia: cui porro, qui modo populi Romani nomen audivit, Dejotari probitas, integritas, gravitas, virtus, fides non ſit audita (17)? i. e. "Here I think Dejotarus is to be defended not ſo "much from his capacity and prudence, as from "his ſincerity and integrity of life. You, O Cæſar, "are no ſtranger to the man's probity, his manners, or "his conſtancy: and who, that has ever heard the "name of the Roman people, has not heard of the "probity, integrity, gravity, virtue, and ſincerity of "Dejotarus?" Take particular notice, that at the time of the accuſation Dejotarus had but one Son. It is even true that he had no more than one when Cæſar lodged in his houſe (18). I may be told that Strabo (19) relates a thing which favours Plutarch; which is, that Dejotarus, having ſeized the capital city of his Son in Law Saocondarius, cauſed him to be maſſacred there, treated his daughter, the wife of Saocondarius, in the ſame manner, demoliſhed the fortreſs, and plundered moſt of the houſes. I anſwer, that this differs very much from the Relation of Plutarch. This was done, without doubt, in revenge of the horrid treaſon of that ſon-in-law, who, in all likelihood, had been the principal director of the accuſation of Dejotarus.

(13) Cicero, pro Dejotaro, cap. 9.

(14) Τῷ Γαλάτῃ Δηιοτάρῳ ποιῶ Χρύσιππος ὅμοιον τον Θεὸν, ὃς πλειόνων αὐτῷ παίδων γιγνότων, ἐνι βουλόμενος τὴν ἀρχὴν ἀπολιπεῖν καὶ τὸν οἶκον, ἅπαντας ἐκείνους ἀπίσφαξεν, ὥσπερ ἀμπέλου βλαστοὺς ἀποτιμῶν καὶ κολούσας, ἵνα εἷς ὁ λειφθεὶς ἰσχυρὸς γένηται καὶ μέγας. Dejotaro Galatæ ſimilem Deum Chryſippus facit. Qui cum haberet complures filios, cum vellet uni regnum domumque relinquere, cæteros omnes necavit: tanquam vitis palmites ſi præcideret, ut unus aliquis ſuperſtes, validus magnuſque fieret. Plut. de Stoic. Repugn. pag. 1049. C.

Let us obſerve, by the way, that the Capital of Saocondarius was called Gorbeius: but as Strabo a few pages before (20) calls the Capital of Saocondarius's grandſon Morzeus, it is probable thoſe names have been corrupted. This is Caſaubon's conjecture. The ſame may be conjectured concerning the Capital of Dejotarus; it was called Blucium (21) according to ſome Manuſcripts, and Blubium according to others. Who doubts but here is ſome fault, ſince Cicero (22) calls the Caſtle where Dejotarus was to receive Cæſar Caſtellum Lucceium (23)?

[G] It is very probable that Caſtor eſcaped him.] Caſtor was the promoter of the accuſation at Rome, where he ſuborned Dejotarus's Phyſician to give evidence againſt his maſter (24). Judge whether Dejotarus, who had not ſpared his daughter, would have ſpared ſuch a grandſon? We are to believe, therefore, that Caſtor did not fall into his hands. I do not know what became of the ſon of Dejotarus; but he did not ſucceed his father: he had obtained of the Senate (25), and afterwards of Cæſar (26), the title of King, and was to marry a daughter of Artavaſdes King of Armenia (27). Cicero praiſes him greatly (28). The ſucceſſor of Dejotarus was named Amyntas, if we may believe Strabo (29). Now this Amyntas had been Dejotarus's Secretary (30), and afterwards General of his troops in the army of Brutus, whoſe party he forſook (31), and went over to the camp of Antony. This, doubtleſs, was what obliged Antony to give him Pilidia in 714 (32), and Galatia, Lycaonia, and Pamphilia in 718 (33). Now ſince Dion aſſerts that in 714 the Triumvirs gave Caſtor the Dominions of Dejotarus deceaſed in Galatia, and thoſe of Attalus deceaſed in the ſame country (34), I am apt to believe that Strabo is miſtaken, when he makes Amyntas the immediate ſucceſſor of Dejotarus. I think we had better ſay, with Dion, that Caſtor ſucceeded Dejotarus, and afterwards we may make Amyntas the ſucceſſor of Caſtor. Tho' Father Noris proves by ſome examples that it is uſual with Dion to give the ſon the name of the father, he ſhall never perſuade me that this has happened with reſpect to Caſtor; and ſuppoſing it had ſo happened, yet Father Noris would nevertheleſs have committed a miſtake (35); for in that caſe Dion could not have taken Caſtor for Dejotarus, ſince Caſtor was not the ſon of Dejotarus, but only his daughter's ſon. Caſtor, who accuſed his grandfather at Rome of having attempted Cæſar's life, is in all probability the ſame perſon whom Dion has mentioned as the ſucceſſor of Dejotarus. As to Dejotarus Philadelphus King of Paphlagonia, the ſon of Caſtor (36), I own I know not whence to derive his extraction. I cannot tell whether his father be the ſame Caſtor who accuſed his grandfather; this may be: I only know that he forſook Marc Antony in the war of Actium to join Octavius (37), and that he was the laſt King of Paphlagonia (38).

I will not end this Remark without acquainting my Reader, that when I ſpoke of Saocondarius the ſon-in-law of Dejotarus, I took Strabo's words in a different ſenſe than they are commonly underſtood in. Τὸ τῦ Κάſτορ◦ βαſίλειον τῦ Σαωκονδαρίυ, ἐν ᾧ γαμβρὸς ὄν◦α τῦτον ἀπέφαξε Δηϊόταρ◦ς, καὶ τὴν θυγατέρα τὴν ἑαυτῦ. These are the words of Strabo (39): they may ſignify either, The Capital of Caſtor Saocondarius, in which Dejotarus his father-in-law put him and his wife to death; or, The Capital of Caſtor the ſon of Saocondarius, in which the latter was put to death with his wife, by Dejotarus his father-in-law. This laſt Tranſlation (40) ſeems to me preferable to the other, becauſe I am certain that Caſtor was the ſon of Dejotarus's daughter, and not knowing his father's name, I may as well call him Saocondarius as by any other name. Obſerve, by the way, an advantage our Tongue has over the Greek, which did not condemn ſuch a diſpoſition of words, whereby the ſame term might be taken as well for a man's ſurname, as for the name of his father.

Perhaps the authority of Suidas may be alledged againſt me, who has given the name of Caſtor to Dejotarus's ſon-in-law; but the authority of Suidas is of no weight here. He ſuppoſes Dejotarus was accuſed by his ſon-in-law before Cæſar. This is far from being exact. Cicero the Advocate of the accuſed perſon, and conſequently deſerving more credit than a hundred thouſand Suidas's, declares plainly and formally in ſeveral paſſages of his Oration, that Caſtor the grandſon of Dejotarus was the accuſer, and he ſpeaks but faintly, and in indirect terms, of the ſhare which the father of this Caſtor might have in the plot. I doubt not but the ſon had his father's approbation, and that Dejotarus made this the pretext for the barbarity with which he treated his ſon-in-law; but after all, exactneſs requires that we here follow the teſtimony of Cicero. Beſides, has not honeſt Suidas told us that Dejotarus was a Roman Senator? Is it not ſo groſs a piece of ignorance, that it makes him altogether unworthy of credit on this head? We ſhall ſee below whether Dejotarus's ſon-in-law was a man of learning, and the Author of ſeveral Books.

(15) Plut. de Stoic. Repugn. pag. 1049, C. of Amiot's Tranſlation.

(16) Cicero calls him ſo, pro Dejotaro, cap. 9.

(17) Idem, ibid. cap. 6.

(18) Ibid. cap. 3.

(19) Strabo, lib. 12. pag. 391.

(20) Ibid. pag. 387.

(21) Ibid. pag. 390.

(22) Pro Dejotaro, cap. 7.

(23) Others read Lucetium.

(24) Cicero, pro Dejotaro, cap. 7.

(25) Idem, ad Attic. Epiſt. 17. lib. 5.

(26) Idem, pro Dejotaro, cap. 3.

(27) Idem, Epiſt. 21. ad Attic. lib. 5.

(28) Idem, Philipp. XI, cap. 8 & 36.

(29) Strabo, lib. 12. pag. 390.

(30) Dio, lib. 49. pag. 469.

(31) Philipp. XI, ubi ſupra.

(32) Appian. de Bello Civil. lib. 5. pag. 715.

(33) Dio, lib. 49. pag. 469.

(34) Idem, lib. 48. pag. 430.

(35) Poſt pugnam Philippenſem ſcribit Dio lib. 48. Caſtori etiam cuidam Attali & Dejotari in Gallograecia defunctorum ditio tradita eſt A. U. 714. debuit dicere Dejotaro, non Caſtori. Dio non ſemel filios alienos nomine videlicet patrum eorundem appellat. i. e. "Dion writes "that after the "battle of Philippi the dominions of Attalus and of Dejotarus who "died in Galatia were given "to one Caſtor, in "the year of "Rome 714: "he ſhould have "ſaid to Dejotarus, not to "Caſtor. For "Dion more "than once "gives the fa"ther's name to "the ſon." Noris, Cenotaph. Piſ. pag. 209.

(36) Strabo, lib. 12. pag. 387.

(37) Dio, lib. 1. pag. 488.

(38) Strabo, ibid.

(39) Lib. 12. pag. 391.

(40) Father Abram conſtantly follows it in his Commentary on Cicero's Oration for Dejotarus.

Dejotarus had another ſon-in-law, againſt whom he undertook a religious war [H]; for as he was the Patron of the Temple and Prieſts of the Goddeſs Cybele, he could not ſuffer Brogitarus his ſon-in-law to profane that ſacred place: he therefore armed againſt him, and drove him thence. He was infatuated with extreme ſuperſtition for auguries [I]; whereupon Cicero has made ſome very good reflections [K]. We cannot well diſcover at what time Brutus

[H] He had a .... ſon-in-law, againſt whom he undertook a religious war.] The abominable Clodius, having found a man in Phrygia ready to give a good ſum of money, on condition that he ſhould be inveſted with the High-prieſthood of Peſſinus, made him a grant of it. This man had married a daughter of Dejotarus, and was named Brogitarus. He was put in poſſeſſion of the Temple, and the Prieſts were expelled thence. But Dejotarus, full of zeal for the worſhip of Cybele, drove out the uſurper, who profaned all thoſe holy ceremonies. See how Cicero has diſplayed his eloquence on this occaſion. Sed quid ego id admiror? he addreſſes himſelf to Clodius (41), qui accepta pecunia Peſſinuntem ipſum, ſedem, domiciliumque Matris Deorum vaſtaris, & Brogitaro (42) Gallo-græco impuro homini ac nefario totum illum locum fanumque vendideris: ſacerdotem ab ipſis aris pulvinaribuſque detraxeris: omnia illa quæ vetuſtas, quæ Perſæ, quæ Syri, quæ reges omnes, qui Europam Aſiamque tenuerunt, ſemper ſumma religione coluerunt, perverteris? quæ denique noſtri majores &c. Quod quum Dejotarus religione ſua caſtiſſimè tueretur, quem unum habemus in orbe terrarum fideliſſimum huic imperio atque amantiſſimum noſtri nominis, Brogitaro, ut ante dixi, addictum pecunia tradidiſti. .... Quum multa regia ſunt in Dejotaro, tum illa maxime, quod tibi nullum munus dedit: quod eam partem legis tuæ, quæ congruebat cum judicio Senatus, ut ipſe rex eſſet, non repudiavit: quod Peſſinuntem per ſcelus à te violatum, & ſacerdote ſacriſque ſpoliatum recuperavit, ut in priſtina religione ſervaret: quod ceremonias ab omni vetuſtate acceptas, à Brogitaro pollui non ſinit, mavultque generum ſuum munere tuo, quàm illud fanum antiquitate religionis carere. i. e. "But why do I wonder at that? You, who for a ſum of money have given up to plunder Peſſinus itſelf, the ſeat and habitation of the Mother of the Gods, and have ſold the whole place and temple to an impure and wicked man, Brogitarus (42) the Galatian; who have dragged the Prieſt from the very altars; and have ſacrilegiouſly perverted all thoſe things which antiquity, and which the Perſians, Syrians, and all the Kings of Europe and Aſia, have always reſpected with the higheſt veneration? thoſe things, in ſhort, which our anceſtors &c. Which temple when Dejotarus, the moſt faithful friend on earth to this Empire, and the greateſt lover of the Roman name, religiouſly and zealouſly protected, you, as I ſaid before, delivered up to Brogitarus for money .... Tho' there are many royal qualities in Dejotarus, yet theſe things deſerve particular mention: that he never made you any preſent; that he did not reject that part of the Law propoſed by you which agreed with the judgment of the Senate, conſtituting him King: that he recovered Peſſinus which had been wickedly profaned by you, and deprived of its Prieſt and ſacred rites, to preſerve its ancient veneration; that he ſuffered not ceremonies which had been received from the utmoſt antiquity to be polluted by Brogitarus, and had rather his ſon-in-law ſhould reap no benefit from the bribe he gave you, than that Temple ſhould loſe the religious veneration which has been paid it for ſo many ages."

(41) Cicero, Orat. de Haruſpicum reſponſis, cap. 13.

(42) Add hereto this paſſage of the Oration for Sextius, cap. 26. Lege tribunitia Matris Magnæ Peſſinuntius ille ſacerdos expulſus, & ſpoliatus ſacerdotio eſt; fanumque ſanctiſſimarum, atque antiquiſſimarum religionum venditum pecunia grandi Brogitaro, impuro homini, atque indigno illa religione, præſertim cum ea ſibi ille non colendi, ſed violandi cauſſa appetiviſſet. i. e. "By the Tribunitian Law the Prieſt of Cybele at Peſſinus was expelled, and deprived of his office; and that moſt holy and ancient Temple was ſold for a large ſum to Brogitarus, an impure wretch, and unworthy of ſo ſacred a character, eſpecially as he had ſought it not for the ſake of religion, but of plunder."

[I] Dejotarus was infatuated with extreme ſuperſtition for Auguries.] He undertook nothing without conſulting the flight of birds, and he was ſo entirely guided by that ſort of auſpices, that he ſometimes diſcontinued his journeys, and returned home, after he had made ſeveral days march. He had no other reaſons to act in that manner, than the preſages which he met with by the way. The flight of an Eagle was once the occaſion of his interrupting a journey, and it was very lucky for him; for if he had proceeded, he would have been cruſhed under the ruins of the chamber which was deſigned him, and which fell the night following. As he was very expert in theſe matters, he was his own Prophet, and his own Soothſayer. He had not forgotten to furniſh himſelf with the moſt neceſſary qualification of the profeſſion; that is, never to be at a ſtand, never to confeſs himſelf miſtaken, and to have always ſome ſubterfuge in reſerve. He found out one full of morality when he had loſt the greateſt part of his dominions, and a great ſum of money, for having born arms againſt Cæſar: he led his troops to Pompey: the march was long, and he never met with any other than good omens by the way; for which reaſon he flattered himſelf that Cæſar would be defeated. But things put on quite another face. Cæſar was victorious, and made Dejotarus feel his reſentment in a very diſagreeable manner. What did Dejotarus? Had he ſincerity enough to acknowledge that his ſcience was deceitful? Did he ſhew any regret, any repentance for his exceſſive credulity? Not at all: he entrenched himſelf behind the fineſt Maxims of Morality; he ſaid that the auguries which had inclined him to purſue his march to Pompey's camp, were in reality good omens, ſince under their direction he had followed the ſide of juſtice. It is true, it coſt him the greateſt part of his dominions; but, ſaid he, the glory of having performed my duty is more dear to me than all the riches of the earth. Leſt I ſhould be ſuſpected of having adulterated this paſſage of Cicero, I ſhall ſet it down at length in the margin (43). Note, that this man, who ſo religiouſly revered the orders of providence with reſpect to the doctrine of auguries, made no difficulty of uſurping the dominions of his neighbours, or of putting his ſon-in-law and his daughter to death for quarrels which had been, without doubt, kindled by ambition. In all probability he would not have given his father better quarter, had he been his competitor.

[K] ... Whereupon Cicero has made ſome very good reflections.] He obſerves that the principles of the Romans in the ſcience of Auguries was ſtrangely different from thoſe of Dejotarus, and that in ſome things the oppoſition was ſo great as to be directly contrary. This obſervation makes very ſtrongly againſt the doctrine of Preſages; for ſince there is none but God who knows what will happen, it is God alone who ſends them. Now God does not contradict himſelf, he does not make uſe of the ſame things to foreſhew good and evil. Solebat ex me Dejotarus percontari noſtri augurii diſciplinam, & ego ex illo ſui. O dii immortales quantum differebat, ut quædam eſſent etiam contraria (44)! i. e. "Dejotarus uſed to aſk me concerning the doctrine of our Augury, and I him concerning his. Good Gods! how widely did they differ, ſo that in ſome reſpects they were even directly contrary." Here is a conſideration of more weight. What could Dejotarus ſay more frivolous, than to maintain that he did not repent his having followed the Auſpices which heaven had preſented, while he was marching to join Pompey; that he did not repent it, I ſay, becauſe he had always preferred glory before the poſſeſſion of a Kingdom? What is this to the Auſpices? Did you not know before they were preſented to you, what you owed to the friendſhip of the Roman People; what fidelity, what juſtice required of you? Was you not fully perſuaded that glory, honour, and virtue are preferable to a crown? It was not therefore to teach you theſe truths that a Crow cawed on your way: you knew them as well before as you do at preſent. Auguries do not teach moral Doctrines, but good or bad events: if they promiſed you good ſucceſs, they deceived you; you fled with Pompey, and have been ſtripped of your dominions by the conqueror. Nam illud admodum ridiculum, quod negas Dejotarum, auſpiciorum quæ ſibi ad Pompejum proficiſcenti facta ſunt, non pœnitere, quod fidem ſecutus, amicitiamque Po. Ro. functus ſit officio. Antiquiorem enim ſibi fuiſſe laudem & gloriam quàm regnum & poſſeſſiones ſuas. Credo id quidem, ſed hoc nihil ad auſpicia. Nec enim ei cornix canere

(43) Quid ego hoſpitem noſtrum clariſſimum atque optimum virum Dejotarum commemorem, qui nihil unquam niſi auſpicato gerit? qui quum ex itinere quodam propoſito, & conſtituto revertiſſet, aquilæ admonitus volatu, conclave illud ubi erat manſurus ſi ire perrexiſſet, proxima nocte corruit. Itaque ut ex ipſo audiebam, perſæpe revertit ex itinere, quum jam progreſſus eſſet multorum dierum viam. Cujus quidem hoc præclariſſimum eſt, quod poſtea quàm à Cæſare tetrarchiæ regna, pecuniaque mulctatus eſt, negat, ſe tamen eorum auſpiciorum, quæ ſibi ad Pompeium proficiſcenti, ſecunda evenerunt, pœnitere. Senatus enim auctoritatem, & P. R. libertatem atque imperii dignitatem, ſuis armis eſſe defenſam, ſibique eas aves, quibus auctoribus officium, & fidem ſecutus eſſet, bene conſuluiſſe: antiquiorem enim ſibi ſuiſſe poſſeſſionibus ſuis gloriam. Cicero, de Divinat. lib. 1. cap. 15.

(44) Idem, ibid. lib. 2. cap. 8, & 26.

Brutus pleaded the cauſe of Dejotarus ſo ſtrenuouſly before Cæſar [L]. If the women of the Old Teſtament might be compared with thoſe of Paganiſm, Sarah the wife of Abraham might be put in parallel with Stratonice the wife of Dejotarus [M]. That Prince returned a ſmart anſwer to Craſſus's raillery about his old age [N]. Moreri has given but a very ſhort Article of Dejotarus: yet he had abundance of matter, and nothing to do but to collect it. His conciſeneſs has not prevented his falling into groſs miſtakes [O]. I ſhall nere poterat recte eum facere, quod Po. Ro. libertatem defendere pararet: ipſe hoc ſentiebat ſicuti ſenſit. Aves eventus ſignificant aut adverſos, aut ſecundos. Virtutis auſpiciis video eſſe uſum Dejotarum, quæ vetat ſpectare fortunam, dum præſtetur fides. Aves vero ſi proſperos eventus oſtenderunt, certe fefellerunt. Fugit è prælio cum Pompejo, grave tempus: diſceſſit ab eo, luctuoſa res: Cæſarem eodem tempore & hoſtem & hoſpitem vidit, &c (45). It is moſt certain that Dejotarus had not examined the Auſpices to learn whether, by joining Pompey, he ſhould embrace the good cauſe, but to learn whether his journey ſhould be attended with proſperous ſucceſs. He conſulted and ſtudied the Auguries only to know whether he acted prudently: he was already well ſatisfied that he acted juſtly; for ſince he remained firmly perſuaded that Pompey's ſide was that of juſtice, after he had ſeen the entire ruin of the Republican party, he was far from doubting it while Pompey's affairs were in a flouriſhing condition. It was inſincerity, therefore, and a falſe ſhame, which made him have recourſe to this evaſion; the omens have not deceived me, becauſe I had rather act like a man of probity and honour, than gain a Kingdom. This brings to my mind a ſubterfuge very common with thoſe who during religious Wars preach to their people that God promiſes them good ſucceſs, that all preſages are favourable &c. it frequently happens that all theſe fine promiſes are followed by the loſs of a battle. The Preacher is not diſconcerted at it; but finds out a hundred admirable ſhifts: if we had conquered, we ſhould have relied too much on the arm of fleſh, we ſhould have aſcribed too much to our own conduct: a defeat teaches us that we were not humble enough; the finger of God will be hereafter more viſible: ſo at the bottom the preſages were fortunate, ſince the victory will become fatal to the conqueror, and the vaniſhed party will the better learn to put their truſt in him who is the rock of all ages.

(45) Ibid.

(46) Cicero, in Bruto, cap. 5.

(47) See Fabricius, in the Life of Cicero, ad ann. 707.

(48) De (Bruto) Cæſarem ſolitum dicere, magni refert hic quid velit: ſed quidquid volt, valde volt, idque animadverti-ſe cum pro Dejotaro Niceæ dixerit, valde vehementer eum viſum & libere dicere. i. e. "Cæſar uſed "to ſay of Brutus, it is of "great conſequence what "affair he eſpouſes; for "whatever he "undertakes he "earneſtly proſecutes; and "this he took "notice of when "he pleaded for "Dejotarus at "Nice, it ſeeming to him that "he ſpoke with "great vehemence and "freedom." Cicero, ad Atticum Epiſt. 1. lib. 14.

(49) Plutarch. in Bruto, pag. 986.

(50) Her name was Electra.

her own, and brought them up tenderly and magnificently (51). Plutarch in another place gives the wife of Dejotarus the name of Berenice, Βερενίκη. He ſays one thing of her which the Sceptics make uſe of. He ſays that a Woman of Lacedæmon approaching Berenice, it fell out that thoſe two women turned away their heads from each other immediately and at the ſame time; Berenice, becauſe ſhe could not endure the ſmell of butter; and the other, becauſe ſhe could not bear the ſmell of perfumes. Πρὸς δὲ Βερενίκην τὴν Δημοτάρου τῶν Λακεδαιμονίων τινὲς γυναικῶν ἀφικέσθαι λέγουσιν· ὡς δὲ ἰσχὺς ἀλλήλων προσῆλθεν, ἐυθὺς ἀποστραφῆναι, τὴν μὲν τὸ μύρον, ὡς ἔοικε, τὴν δὲ τὸ βούτυρον δυσχεράνασαν. Et ferunt Spartanam quandam mulierem acceſſiſſe Berenicem Dejotari uxorem, cumque invicem appropinquaſſent, averſas fuiſſe, quod unguentum altera, altera butyrum olfaciens averſaretur (52). The Greek termination of Stratonice and Berenice perhaps confounded Plutarch's ideas, and might occaſion his giving the ſame Queen ſometimes the former name, and ſometimes the latter. Perhaps alſo Dejotarus had two Wives, one named Stratonice, and the other Berenice.

(51) Taken from Plutarch in his Treatiſe de Virtutibus Mulierum, pag. 258.

(52) Plut. adverſus Colotem, pag. 1109, B.

(53) Idem, in Vita Craſſi, pag. 553.

(54) Cicero, pro Dejotaro, cap. 10.

(55) See the 4th Letter of the 15th Book ad Familiares, and the Oration pro Dejot. cap. 13.

(56) Epiſt. 17. and 18. lib. 5. ad Atticum.

(57) Plut. in Catone minore, pag. 765. E. He makes uſe of the plural number παῖδας.

[N] He returned a ſmart anſwer to Craſſus's raillery on his old age.] That Roman General paſſed thro' Galatia, in his expedition againſt the Parthians, and there found King Dejotarus who was very old, and yet was building a new city. Upon which he ſaid to him, by way of raillery, Methinks, Sir, you begin to build very late, ſince you ſet about it the laſt hour of the day. The King of Galatia anſwered him immediately, And you, O General, are not ſet out very early on your expedition againſt the Parthians. For Craſſus was then above threeſcore years old, and his face ſpoke him yet older than he was (53). Dejotarus muſt have been then very old; for Cicero ſpeaking of a time very near it, ſays they uſed to wonder that Prince had the ſtrength to fit faſt on horſeback, after ſeveral perſons had liſted him on. Dejotarum quum plures in equum ſuſtuliſſent, quod hærere in eo ſenex poſſet admirari ſolebamus (54). It was when Cicero commanded in Cilicia, in the year 702. Craſſus had been defeated two years before. Cicero contracted a very ſtrict friendſhip with King Dejotarus while he was in Cilicia, and received all manner of aſſiſtance from him (55). He gave his ſon and his nephew to Dejotarus the ſon, who took them with him into Galatia (56). I have another proof of the old age of Dejotarus. He was already far advanced in years when Pompey made war on Mithridates. He recommended his children and family to Cato of Utica (57). We have ſeen above (58) that he had but one ſon at the time of the War againſt Pharnaces.

(58) In the Remark [F], Citation (18).

(59) Animadv. in Euſeb. pag. 16 and 56.

(60) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Græc. pag. 159.

(61) In Indice Autorum Plinij.

(62) In Apion. lib. 2.

(63) Biblioth. lib. 2. pag. m. 75.

(64) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Græc. pag. 132.

[O] Moreri has committed ſome groſs miſtakes.] It is not true, as he aſſerts, I, that Dejotarus was accuſed of having put his daughter and his ſon-in-law Caſtor to death: II, And that this was the occaſion on which Cicero pronounced that admirable Oration in his defence, which is ſtill extant. The true ſubject of the Accuſation and the Defence may be ſeen in the Text of this Article. III, There is very little probability that Caſtor the Hiſtorian was the ſon of Dejotarus's ſon-in-law. Why then does Moreri aſſert this as a certain fact?

Whether Caſtor, the Author of ſeveral Books, was the ſon-in-law of Dejotarus.

Scaliger (59), Voſſius (60), Father Hardouïn (61), and ſeveral other great men, think that Caſtor ſurnamed the Chronographer by Joſephus (62) is the ſon-in-law of Dejotarus. Three reaſons hinder me from coming into their opinion. The firſt is, that this Caſtor, as they confeſs, wrote a Book which was intitled Χρονικὰ ἀγνοήματα, Chronological ignorances. Now this Work has been cited by Apollodorus (63), who flouriſhed under Ptolemy Euergetes the ſecond of that name (64): therefore Caſtor muſt have flouriſhed in the ſame reign at the lateſt. How then could he be the ſon-in-law of Dejotarus? for that ſon-in-law was yet alive when Cicero pleaded for Dejotarus (65), that is to ſay, in the year of Rome 709, or thereabouts. Could a man who

(65) Cicero, pro Dejot. cap. 10; where, addreſſing himſelf to Caſtor, he plainly inſinuates that his father was an accomplice in the accuſation. A little before he had ſaid that Caſtor, after the battle of Pharſalia, continued on Pompey's ſide, to pleaſe his father. You will ſee this in the following Citation.

I ſhall take notice of them below in the laſt Remark.

who flouriſhed in the reign of Euergetes, which reached from the year of Rome 608 to the year 636, be yet living in the year 709? I draw my ſecond reaſon from Caſtor the Chronographer's having compoſed a great many Books, on ſubjects which required a man's whole time. Such an Author as he muſt have ſtudied prodigiouſly, and have done ſcarce any thing elſe. This does not at all ſuit the ſon-in-law of Dejotarus. He is ſpoken of as a man who was very active and zealous on Pompey's ſide, ſo that his ſon, out of complaiſance to him, would not diſarm after the defeat of Pharſalia, whatever pains Cicero took to perſuade him to it. Hic vero adoleſcens . . . cum in illo noſtro exercitu equitaret cum ſuis delectis equitibus, quos una cum eo ad Pompejum pater miſerat, quos concurſus facere ſolebat? quam ſe jactare? quam ſe oſtentare? quam nemini in illa cauſſa ſtudio & cupiditate concedere? Cum vero, exercitu amiſſo, ego, qui pacis auctor ſemper, poſt Pharſalicum prælium ſuaſor fuiſſem armorum non deponendorum, ſed abjiciendorum, hunc ad meam auctoritatem non potui adducere, quod & ipſe ardebat ſtudio ipſius belli, & patri ſatisfaciendum eſſe arbitrabatur (66). That is, "This young man . . . . when he rode in our army "with his choſen horſe which his father had ſent with "him to Pompey, what excurſions did he uſe to make? "how did he beſtir himſelf? what ardour did he ex"preſs? yielding to none in affection and zeal for the "cauſe. When the army was loſt, I, who am al"ways for promoting peace, and, after the battle of "Pharſalia, perſuaded them not only to lay down "their arms, but to caſt them away, could "not prevail on him to take my advice, becauſe "he was eagerly bent on the war himſelf, and "thought it his duty to anſwer his father's ex"pectation." Add to this that Cicero in his Defence of Dejotarus does not ſay one word which inſinuates that the ſon-in-law of that Prince was a learned man. He could not well have been ſo perfectly ſilent in the matter, if that ſon-in-law had been as illuſtrious by his Writings as Caſtor the Chronographer was. I may be told that this ſilence is one of Cicero's rhetorical artifices: he was afraid leſt the learning of the father might be a favourable preſumption in behalf of the ſon who was the Accuſer of Dejotarus; but this objection is of no force. Cicero might have aggravated the fault of the ſon a hundred ways, and even the fault of the father, on account of the learning of the latter. It may be replied, that perhaps the ſon in law of Dejotarus had not yet publiſhed his Books. But how comes it then, that he is quoted by Apollodorus? and when did he publiſh them? Did not Dejotarus, who lived not above three or four years at moſt after his cauſe was heard at Rome, put him to death (67)? Beſides this, I obſerve that Cicero takes it for granted that the Son in Law of Dejotarus was not known in the world, but by the honour Dejotarus did him to give him his daughter in marriage; before that he crawled in obſcurity. One would not ſpeak thus of a great Author. The enormous, the prodigious diſtance there is between him and Sovereign Princes, is no reaſon to ſay he is unknown, or lives in obſcurity; and nothing would ſooner perſuade me that he had acquired a very great reputation, than to ſee a Prince make choice of him for his Son in Law. I believe, therefore, that if the learned Caſtor had married the daughter of Dejotarus, he would have attained that honour by the luſtre of his Learning; and conſequently that Cicero would not have ventured to ſay what he has ſaid of him: Rex Dejotarus veſtram familiam abjectam & obſcuram de tenebris in lucem vocavit: quis tuum patrem antea qui eſſet, quam cujus gener eſſet, audivit (68)? i. e. "King Dejotarus called forth your family, "which was abject and obſcure, from darkneſs to "light: who ever heard of your father, till he heard "whoſe ſon in law he had the honour to be?" My third reaſon is, that tho' ſeveral ancient Writers have cited Caſtor, not one of them gives him the quality of the Son in Law of Dejotarus. Yet, qualities of this ſort are ſeldom omitted; for as they are very rare among Authors, and the luſtre which they communicate to him who poſſeſſes them reflects, in ſome degree, on the whole Republic of Letters, a Writer takes a pleaſure in ſaying, when he can ſay it, that the Author whom he quotes is Son or Son in Law to a King. If ever this rare circumſtance ought to be remembred, it is when the King who is the father in law has been ſo well known to learned men, as Dejotarus has been ſince the pronouncing of Cicero's Oration: whence ſhould it happen, therefore, that the ſon in law of Dejotarus ſhould never be mentioned under that title? Varro (69), Joſephus, Plutarch, Juſtin Martyr, Tatian, Euſebius, S. Cyril, Auſonius, and Stephanus Byzantinus, have quoted Caſtor, and none of them has thought fit to call him the ſon in law of Dejotarus. If I am not deceived there is none but Suidas who has done it. But who is there who knows not the prodigious confuſion of his Dictionary? Almoſt every thing is found there by bits and ſcraps: how often does he ſeparate what ought to be united, and join what ought to be ſeparated? We have already ſeen that Suidas took Dejotarus for a Roman Senator.

What I have ſaid concerning the continual application with which Caſtor muſt have ſtudied, will appear very probable to all thoſe who weigh the nature of his Works. It appears that he laboured to reform Chronology, and to point out the miſtakes of the ancient Hiſtorians. He is cited (70) in relation to the Kingdoms of Sicyon, Argos, and Athens, and in relation to the Aſſyrian Monarchy. He had written a Work concerning the city of Babylon; and concerning the nations which had been ſucceſſively maſters of the ſea (71). He had compoſed a Treatiſe of the Nile; and another wherein he compared the Roman cuſtoms with thoſe of the Sect of Pythagoras (72). I do not ſpeak of the Rhetorical Works which Suidas attributes to him; for perhaps they belong to another Caſtor. All who are able to judge of theſe things will readily acknowledge, that of all the productions of the pen, there are none which demand more time, more application, and more patience, than thoſe wherein it is propoſed to rectify Chronology, and to criticize Hiſtorians. This is what Caſtor employed himſelf in: witneſs his Errata of the Chronologers, Χρονικὰ ἀγνοήματα, and the Book hinted at by Auſonius (73).

Nothing has ſurprized me more, than to ſee that the Antonius Castor of Pliny has been confounded with the Son in Law of Dejotarus. This is what Father Hardouïn has done (74), not conſidering that Antonius Caſtor lived in Pliny's time, and to above a hundred years of age. He was an excellent Botaniſt, who cultivated in his garden a great number of plants, and diſcourſed of them learnedly. He had never been ſick, and having lived above a Century, he had his memory ſtill good, and his body very vigorous. Pliny had ſeen this garden, and received great light from our Botaniſt. Nobis certe, exceptis admodum paucis, contigit reliquas contemplari ſcientia Antonii Caſtoris, cui ſumma auctoritas erat in ea arte noſtro ævo, viſendo hortulo ejus, in quo plurimas alebat; centeſimum ætatis annum excedens, nullum corporis malum expertus, ac ne ætate quidem memoria aut vigore concuſſis (75). Can this be applied to the ſon in law of Dejotarus? Was he not killed with his wife by his father in law before the year of Rome 714, above fifty years before Pliny was born (76)? When Father Hardouïn, grounding himſelf on a paſſage of Pliny, conjectures that Antonius Caſtor compoſed ſome Volumes concerning Plants, he is much more in the right: yet, it may be Pliny's Words (77) ſignify only that Caſtor had ſhewn the plant in queſtion in his garden, or had made a deſcription of it to the curious who went to ſee him. What keeps me in ſuſpence as to the Conjecture of this able Commentator is, that methinks if Caſtor had publiſhed Books of Botany, Pliny would have hinted ſomething of it when he mentions the garden, and the learning of the ſame perſon (78). However it be, Father Hardouïn has gueſſed better than Voſſius: he applies the paſſage of the XXth Book of Pliny to Antonius Caſtor; but Voſſius has underſtood it of Caſtor the Chronographer cited by Apollodorus.

(66) Cicero, pro Dejotaro, ibid.

(67) Strabo, lib. 12. pag. 391.

(68) Cicero, pro Dejot. cap. 11.

(69) In Libris de vita Populi Romani. You may find in Voſſius de Hiſt. Græcis, pag. 158, 159, in what places the other Authors whom I name cite Caſtor.

(70) Euſebius, in Chron.

(71) Περὶ θαλάσσης κρατούντων.

(72) Plutarch quotes it in Quæſtion. Roman.

(73) Quod Caſtor cunctis de Regibus ambiguis. Auſonius, in Profeſſor. Burdig. Epigr. 23. ver. 7.

(74) In Indice Autorum Plinii.

(75) Pliniue, lib. 25. cap. 2. Moreri quotes the 1ſt Chapter of the 15th Book.

(76) He was born in the year of Rome 774, and died at the age of about 56, in the year 831.

(77) They are at the beginning of the 17th Chapter of the 20th Book.

(78) In the 2d Chapter of the 25th Book.

DELLIUS (QUINTUS), a Greek Hiſtorian. Plutarch ſpeaks of him twice: I, When he relates that Marc Antony ſent to ſignify to Cleopatra that ſhe ſhould come to

to him in Cilicia to juſtify her conduct (a); for ſhe was accuſed of having ſupplied Brutus and Caſſius with ſuccours: II, When he mentions the diſgrace of ſome faithful ſervants of Marc Antony (b). The firſt paſſage informs us that Dellius was ſent to Cleopatra to acquaint her with the order for her to come to Cilicia: the ſecond lets us know that Dellius retired from Marc Antony's Court, on the notice which had been given him that Cleopatra deſigned to get him killed. On the firſt occaſion, Plutarch makes him act in a very cunning manner [A]; and on the ſecond repreſents him as guilty of a great indiſcretion [B], with regard to what men call good fortune in matters of gallantry. It is in this laſt paſſage we learn that Dellius was an Hiſtorian [C], and that he acquainted the public with the reaſon why he retired from the Court of Marc Antony. He did it in a circumſtance of time very favourable to Auguſtus. It was a little before the battle of Actium; and he was both well informed of the deſigns of Marc Antony, and very capable of acquainting Auguſtus with the condition of the enemy (c). Seneca the father relates ſeveral things which do no honour to Dellius [D]. It is ſuppoſed, with good probability, that the Dellius of the 3d Ode of the 2d Book of Horace is the ſame with him whom Plutarch mentions [E], and who was ſent Embaſſador by Marc Antony more than

(a) Plutarch. in Marc. Antonio, pag. 926.

(b) Ibid. pag. 943.

(c) Dio, lib. 50. pag. m. 495.

[A] Plutarch . . . . makes him act in a very cunning manner.] As ſoon as he had ſeen and heard that beauteous Queen, he judged ſhe would ſoon become neceſſary, and that her beauty, ſeconded by a tongue well hung, would give her the aſcendant over Marc Antony in every reſpect. For which reaſon he began to make his Court to Cleopatra, and adviſed her to appear in Cilicia with all her ornaments. He aſſured her ſhe had nothing to fear from ſo polite and courteous a General as he who ſent for her. She found herſelf wonderfully confirmed by this diſcourſe in the hopes which ſhe had conceived of making herſelf beloved by Marc Antony. She reaſoned in this manner: ſince Cæſar, and the great Pompey's ſon (1), who ſaw me only when I was a young unexperienced girl, and knew nothing of the world, did notwithſtanding become my conqueſt, what ought I not to expect at preſent, when my beauty and wit are in their full perfection? Ἡ ὃ κὰ Διλλίῳ πιστεύσασα, κὰ τοῖς πρὸς Καίσαρα κὰ Γναῖον τὸν Πομπηΐου παῖδα πρότερον αὐτῇ γεγυμνασμένοις ἀφ' ὥρας συμβολαίοις τεκμαιρομένη, ῥᾴων ἤλπιζεν ὑπάξεσθαι τὸν Ἀντώνιον. ἐκεῖνοι μὲν γὰρ αὐτὴν ἔτι κόρην κὰ πραγμάτων ἄπειρον ἔγνωσαν, πρὸς ὃ τῦτον ἤμελλε φοιτήσειν, ἐν ᾧ μάλιστα καιρῷ γυναῖκες ὥραν τε λαμπροτάτην ἔχυσι κὰ τῷ φρονεῖν ἀκμάζυσι. Illa hinc ab Dellio inducta, hinc conjecturam ducens ex prioribus ſuis formæ cum Cæſare & Cneo Pompeii filio commerciis, facile Antonium ſperavit ſe ſubacturam: quando puellam adhuc illi & rerum rudem cognoverant, ad hunc verò ventura erat quo maximè tempore ſpeciem habent fœminæ florentiſſimam & ingenio vigent (2). This way of reaſoning is much better than thoſe imagine who talk only of girls of fifteen, and roſes half blown, and who look on twenty as the beginning of old age: impertinent people, who may eaſily know, both by what paſſes in their own time, and by the Hiſtory of paſt ages, that the Ladies who have charmed great Princes the moſt, and who have made the moſt noiſe in a Court, were of an age which had allowed them time to acquire experience in affairs, and to perfect their underſtanding; and that there are few whoſe empire is laſting, if the graces of the mind do not ſecond the charms of the body. Plutarch obſerves that Cleopatra charmed more by the agreeableneſs of her words and converſation, than by her beauty, which had nothing very extraordinary (3).

(1) This has puzzled the Critics; for one does not ſee how the ſon of Pompey could love Cleopatra before the defeat of Brutus and Caſſius. See the Letters of Marcus Velſerus.

(2) Plut. in M. Antonio, pag. 926, 927.

(3) Καὶ γὰρ ἦν (ὡς λέγουσιν) αὐτὸ μὲν καθ' αὑτὸ τὸ κάλλος αὐτῆς οὐ πάνυ δύσπαρβλητον οὐδὲ οἷον ἐκπλῆξαι τοὺς ἰδόντας. Neque enim erat (ut perhibent) figura ejus per ſe uſque adeo incomparabilis, neque ut obſtupefaceret ſpectatores. Ibid. p. 927. D.

[B] He was guilty of a great indiſcretion.] He had complained at table that they made them drink vinegar, while Sarmentus drank the moſt delicious wines at Rome. This Sarmentus was a young boy, whom Auguſtus ardently loved. The compariſon went far; and ſince it offended Cleopatra, it is a ſign Dellius had complained that the Queen provided but indifferently for thoſe who made her taſte the pleaſures of love. This is pretty extraordinary; for when a woman has wherewithal to buy the moſt ſucculent meats and the beſt liquors for ſuch people, ſhe provides them very willingly, in order to increaſe or revive their vigour. Plutarch has not taken notice whence he learned this cauſe of Cleopatra's being irritated againſt Dellius: there is no likelihood of its being found in the Hiſtory of this latter, as it was there found that a Phyſician named Glaucus gave Dellius notice that Cleopatra had a deſign to put him to death. However it be, Plutarch obſerves that Dellius was one of thoſe who forſook Marc Antony, being driven to it by the affronts and ſcurrilities of Cleopatra's flatterers. We ſhall ſee preſently a Paſſage of Seneca, which is a proof of the unlawful commerce between Dellius and that Queen. Dion (5) ſpeaks of a commerce much more criminal. Κἄιντοι τινα Δίλλιον παιδικὰ ποτὲ ἑαυτῆ γενόμενον, πέμψας. Miſſo ad eum Q. quodam Dellio exoleto ſuo, i. e. "Having ſent to him one Q. "Dellius his (6) Catamite."

(4) See his words in the Remark [F], in the Marg. Citation (26).

(5) Lib. 49. pag. 474.

(6) That is, Marc Antony's.

[C] Plutarch . . . ſays that Dellius was an Hiſtorian.] Voſſius (7) approves the conjecture of Caſaubon on a paſſage of Strabo (8), where Adelphius is cited as the Author of the Hiſtory of Marc Antony's Expedition againſt the Parthians. Strabo adds that the Author of that Hiſtory had commanded part of the troops in that expedition, and that he was a good friend of Marc Antony's. All this ſuits Dellius: ſo that as there is no Writer who makes mention of the Hiſtorian Adelphius, it is very probable, as Caſaubon gueſſes, that we ſhould read Dellius and not Adelphius in that paſſage of Strabo. When I ſay All this ſuits Dellius, I do not mean there are authorities to prove that he had a command in the war which Marc Antony made on the Parthians: I only mean that this is very likely. And indeed, we know Marc Antony took him along with him in the expedition of Armenia, in the year of Rome 720 (9), and ſent him twice on negotiations to Artavaſdes.

(7) Voſſ. de Hiſt. Græcis, pag. 477.

(8) Lib. 11. pag. 360.

(9) Dio, lib. 49. pag. m. 474.

[D] Seneca the father relates ſeveral things which do no honour to Dellius.] We can hardly expreſs in our tongue the name which was given to Dellius: Quem Meſſala Corvinus deſultorem bellorum civilium vocat (10). Meſſala Corvinus called him the Vaulter of the Civil Wars. He threw himſelf into every party, and changed ſides like a weathercock. He quitted Dolabella to join Caſſius; and his life had been promiſed him, provided he killed Dolabella. He left Caſſius to join Marc Antony; and at laſt he forſook Marc Antony, and embraced the party of Auguſtus. It is he, adds Seneca, of whom there are ſome laſcivious Letters extant written to Cleopatra (11). Seneca calls him Deillius. It is of him, no doubt, that Seneca the Philoſopher ſpeaks, when he ſays Auguſtus had ſo much clemency, that he choſe out of the enemy's army thoſe whom he deſigned for the future to admit to his greateſt intimacy, the Cocceius's, the Duillius's &c. (12). According to Lipſius's Remark we ſhould read, not Duillius, but Deillius, or rather Dellius (13). If the Reader remembers what I have ſaid in the Remark [AA] of the Article CHARLES V, he will be perſuaded that this clemency of Auguſtus was joined with the moſt refined Policy.

(10) Seneca, Pater, Suaſoria 1, pag. m. 12.

(11) Hic eſt Deillius cujus Epiſtolæ laſcivæ ad Cleopatram feruntur. Idem, ibid.

(12) Cocceios & Duillios & totam cohortem primæ admiſſionis ex adverſariorum caſtris conſcripſit. Seneca, de Clementia, lib. 1. cap. 10.

[E] The Dellius of the III Ode . . . of Horace is the ſame with him whom Plutarch mentions.] This is the opinion of Monſr. Dacier: but what he adds does not ſeem to me altogether ſo likely. It is probable, ſays he (14), that he had ſome ſhare in the favours which he pretended to ſollicit for his maſter, and that he received from Cleopatra the ſame pleaſure which he afforded to Antony; for Seneca ſpeaks of ſome very free letters which he had written to that Princeſs. This paſſage contains two principal facts; the one, that Dellius uſed his intereſt with Cleopatra to induce her to favour Marc Antony's love; the other, that he alſo ſpoke at the ſame time for himſelf, and not without ſucceſs. The firſt fact is not very probable: Marc than once (d). I ſhall put together in one Remark ſome miſtakes which I have collected relating to this Article [F].

(13) Lipſius, in Tacit. Annal. lib. 1.

(14) Remarks on the 3d Ode of the 2d Book of Horace.

(d) See the Remark [C] at the end.

Antony had no occaſion for a ſollicitor. Cleopatra went to attend him as her judge; and as good an opinion as ſhe had of her wit and beauty, ſhe nevertheleſs conceived new hopes from what Dellius had told her of Marc Antony's humour: ſhe dreſſed herſelf in the moſt advantageous manner ſhe could, ſhe appeared in all her finery the day of the firſt interview, and omitted no artifice to make him in love with her, wherein ſhe eaſily ſucceeded; ſo that a third perſon was at all times as unneceſſary, as he would have been troubleſome to them on ſome occaſions. As to the ſecond fact, I think it very probable; and after all, I doubt not but if Dellius had acted the part of a Sollicitor for his maſter, he would have done what ſuch people generally do in the like caſe; he would have paid himſelf: and if he had not imitated thoſe who are employed as purveyors for wine, who taſte it the firſt, he would at leaſt have imitated the domeſtics of the ſecond rank, who eat what is taken from their maſter's table.

[F] I ſhall put together . . . ſome faults which I have collected.] Andrew Schottus aſſerts that Dion has given Dellius the title of Hiſtorian, and that Plutarch has reckoned him among the flatterers of Cleopatra. Qui Δίλλιον ὁ ἱστορικὸς Dioni lib. 50, & Plutarcho in Antonio, inter Cleopatræ adulatores numeratur (15). Thoſe two facts are falſe. Plutarch's words have not been well underſtood by Andrew Schottus; he has referred the relative ὧν to κόλακες, whereas it ſhould be referred to φίλων. The ſequel of the diſcourſe evidently ſhews it. Such is the trouble given by languages whoſe Grammar is not ſo rigorous as that of the French. I put the Words quoted by Schottus in the margin, and add thereto the Latin Verſion (16). It will appear from thence that Plutarch is ſo far from putting Dellius into the number of Cleopatra's flatterers, that he ſays that Queen's flatterers drove him away. Lipſius, having cited Plutarch's words, adds that Dion ſays the ſame things, eadem Dio, quinquageſimo libro (17). But it is not true that Dion ſays the ſame as Plutarch: he does not ſpeak of the flatterers of Cleopatra; neither does he ſay that Dellius was an Hiſtorian, or for what reaſon he withdrew.

(15) Schott. in Senecæ Suaſor. I. num. 39. pag. m. 19.

(16) Πολλοὺς δὲ τῶν ἄλλων φίλων οἱ Κλεοπάτρας κόλακες ἐξέβαλον, τὰς παροινίας καὶ βωμολοχίας οὐχ ὑπομένοντας, ὧν καὶ Μᾶρκος ἦν Σίλανος καὶ Δίλλιος ὁ ἱστορικός. Complures alios illius amicos expulere Cleopatræ adulatores, quod contumelias & procacitatem eorum non ſuſtinerent: in quibus M. Syllanus fuit, & Dellius hiſtoricus, Plutarch. in Antonio, p. 943.

(17) Lipſ. in Tacit. Annal. lib. 1.

DELPHINUS (PETER) General of the Order of Camaldoli in the beginning of the ſixteenth Century. We have ſome Letters of his, which were written before he was General, during the time which elapſed from the year 1462, to the year 1480 (a). They have omitted in the printed Edition a curious paſſage which is to be found in a Manuſcript Copy of thoſe Letters [A]. Delphinius died the 15th of January 1525, and was interred at Murano near Venice, in the Convent (b) of S. Michael (c).

(a) Mabillon, Muſeum Italic. tom. 1. pag. 202.

(b) It is of the Order of Camaldoli.

(c) Mabillon, Muſ. Ital. tom. 1. pag. 202.

[A] They have omitted . . . a curious paſſage which is to be found in a Manuſcript copy of thoſe Letters.] The curious and learned Father Mabillon has informed us what it is (1). The paſſage which has been omitted was in the XXXV Letter of the VII Book, and contains what follows. The inhabitants of Arezzo had thrown into a well a Lyon (2) of Stone, which was on the top of the great Church. It was taken out thence when the French entred that City under Charles VIII, and was placed in the middle of the great ſtreet, and all the inhabitants of Arezzo, who paſſed by it, were obliged to kneel down before that Lyon, and to aſk pardon for their revolt.

(1) Mabillon, Muſ. Ital. tom. 1. pag. 179.

(2) It was the arms of Florence.

DEMETRIUS MAGNES, a Greek Author, contemporary of Cicero [A], wrote ſome Books, the loſs whereof has been greatly regretted by thoſe who apply themſelves to know or to compoſe the Lives of ancient Writers. He wrote a Work concerning the Authors, and Cities, which bore the ſame name [B]. This Work was uſeful

[A] He was contemporary with Cicero.] This is proved by the following Words: Memini librum tibi afferri a Demetrio Magnete (ad te miſſum ſcio) περὶ ὁμονοίας. Eum mihi velim mittas. Vides quam cauſſam mediter (1). i. e. "I remember a Book was brought "you (for I know it was ſent) from Demetrius Mag"nes concerning Concord: I deſire you will ſend it me. "You ſee what I have in my head." What follows is a much clearer proof: Hæc igitur videbis, &, quod ad te ante ſcripſi, Demetrii Magnetis librum quem ad te miſit de concordia, velim mihi mittas (2). i. e. "Theſe "things therefore you will ſee: and, as I wrote you "before, I deſire you to ſend me the Treatiſe of De"metrius Magnes on Concord, which he ſent you." You ſee Demetrius had ſent his Book concerning Concord to Pomponius Atticus: he therefore lived at the ſame time with that good friend of Cicero's. If Voſſius had remembred the ſecond paſſage which I have quoted, he might have ſpared the arguments he makes uſe of (3) to prove that in the firſt paſſage we ſhould read ὁμοιοτέλευτα, and not ὁμωνύμων. The learned Mauſſacus contends for the latter reading. Ego dico reſtituendum περὶ ὁμωνύμων, de hoc enim opere loqui voluit Cicero. De Concordia autem ſcripſiſſe Demetrium illum adhuc non legi (4). i. e. "I am of opinion it ſhould be correct"ed περὶ ὁμωνύμων, for of that Work Cicero intend"ed to ſpeak: but I do not remember yet to have "read that this Demetrius wrote of Concord." He did not remember therefore to have read Cicero's Letter wherein the ſame Book of Demetrius is intitled De Concordia. Let us learn from this example how ſubject the moſt able Critics are to give us very falſe Corrections. Henry Valeſius has not taken notice of this miſtake of Mauſſacus. Let us obſerve a miſtake of Jonſius: he ſays that Cicero reckons Demetrius Magnes among thoſe who had taught him Rhetoric, and cites Cicero's Brutus (5). I have conſulted that Work, and do not find this in it; I only find there that Cicero frequented the School of Demetrius the Syrian, and that Dionyſius Magnes was continually with him. Eodem tempore Athenis apud Demetrium Syrum, veterem & non ignobilem dicendi Magiſtrum, ſtudioſè exerceri ſolebam . . . . (6), aſſiduiſſime autem mecum fuit Dionyſius Magnes (7). You will ſee in Plutarch (8), that one of Cicero's maſters in the Art of Rhetoric was named Dionyſius Magnes. It is eaſy to perceive whence Jonſius's miſtake aroſe: his memory tranſpoſed the ſurnames of the two perſons whom Cicero mentions in the ſame page. Mollerus has followed the error of Jonſius (9).

(1) Cicero, ad Attic. Epiſt. 11. lib. 8. pag. 787, 788. ed. Græv.

(2) Idem, Epiſt. 12. ejuſdem Libri, pag. 799.

(3) Voſſius, de Hiſtor. Græcis, lib. 1. cap. 23. pag. 149, 150.

(4) Mauſſac. Notis ad Harpocrat. Voce Μαθώνη.

(5) Jonſius, de Script. Hiſt. Philoſoph. pag. 207.

(6) Cicero, in Bruto, cap. 111.

(7) Idem, ibid.

(8) Plutarch. in Cicer. pag. 862, E.

(9) Moller. de Script. Homonym. pag. 901.

[B] He wrote a Work concerning the Authors who bore the ſame name.] Diogenes Laertius gives us the Title of it: Δημήτριος ὁ Μάγνης ἐν τοῖς περὶ ὁμωνύμων Ποιητῶν τε καὶ Συγγραφέων, Demetrius Magneſius in libro de Poetis ac Scriptoribus æquivocis (10). In another place (11) he obſerves that the Author had ſpoken of ſix perſons who were named Thales. I omit the other paſſages wherein he cites him. A learned Commentator (12) was of opinion that the word συνωνύμων ſhould be ſtruck out, and ὁμωνύμων inſerted in this paſſage of Plutarch (13): Οὐ μὴν ἔγημε ταύτην, ἀλλὰ Σαμίαν τινὰ συνῴκησεν, ὡς ἱστορεῖ Δημήτριος ὁ Μάγνης ἐν τοῖς περὶ Συνωνύμων. Non duxit eam tamen uxorem (Demoſthenes) ſed Samiam quandam, ut tradit Demetrius Magneſius in libris de Synonymis, in matrimonio habuit. i. e. "De"moſthenes did not marry her, but a Samian, as De"metrius Magnes aſſerts in his Treatiſe of Synony"mous Writers." The ſame Commentator obſerves that Demetrius was not the only one who wrote on that ſubject, and that the Greeks cite Dionyſius of Sinope in ὁμωνύμοις, and one Simareſtus in συνωνύμοις (14). The

(10) Diog. Laertius, lib. 1. in Epimenide, num. 112; and lib. 5. in Ariſtotele, num. 3.

(11) Idem, lib. 1. in Thalete, num. 38.

(12) Iſaac. Caſaubon. in Diog. Laert. lib. 1. num. 38.

(13) Plut. in Demoſthene, pag. 853. A. He quotes alſo pag. 858, F. without marking the Title of the Book, and pag. 859, B. without giving him the ſurname of Magnes.

(14) See below Citation (27).

ful and neceſſary, conſidering the great number of Poets, and Philoſophers, &c. whoſe names were alike. Plutarch, Diogenes Laertius, Stephanus Byzantinus, Harpocration, &c. have

The firſt of theſe two obſervations has been very ill comprehended by Voſſius, or rather he truſted too much to his memory, and was deceived by it. He pretends (15) Caſaubon has ſaid, that inſtead of reading in Diogenes Laertius περὶ συνωνύμων, it ſhould be read περὶ ὁμωνύμων. He adds that nothing ſhould be changed, ſince Demetrius had written Books on both thoſe ſubjects. He proves it by the words of Plutarch which I have quoted above. This is to ſuppoſe that there is περὶ συνωνύμων in Diogenes Laertius; which is falſe. It is likewiſe falſe that Caſaubon meant to introduce that term there; he only meant this with regard to the Life of Demoſthenes written by Plutarch. Monſr. Menage (16) has taken notice of theſe two faults of Voſſius, which notwithſtanding have lately occaſioned a learned man (17) to ſay that Caſaubon was in the wrong to pretend that ὁμωνύμων ſhould be inſerted in Diogenes Laertius's Life of Thales. He wrongfully accuſes Jonſius of having pretended the ſame thing. Mr. Menage might have obſerved a third miſtake of Voſſius; for under pretext that Plutarch cites the Work de Synonymis, it muſt not be imagined to be a different Book from that which others quote by the Title de Homonymis. Wherefore Caſaubon ſhould not have required any alteration to be made in the text of Plutarch. It is very probable Plutarch wrote theſe words ἐν τοῖς περὶ συνωνύμων. An Hiſtorian who quotes a great many Books does not oblige himſelf to ſpecify them preciſely by the ſame word which the Authors made choice of for the Title; but is contented to denote them by terms which ſignify the ſame thing: now it is certain that in common diſcourſe the word Synonymous was as much made uſe of as the word Homonymous, when a man intended to ſay that ſuch and ſuch Poets, ſuch and ſuch Cities, &c. had the ſame name. It was only in Logical Writings that a diſtinction was obſerved between ὁμώνυμα homonymous, and συνώνυμα ſynonymous. At this day we are by the caprice of cuſtom in another ſituation: we may not ſay indifferently ſuch an Author has written a Treatiſe of equivocal Writers, or of ſynonymous Writers, or of Writers of the ſame name (18). The ideas which are annexed to the word equivocal do not allow this liberty, and conſequently in common diſcourſe, as well as in Books of Logic, we ought to obſerve ſome diſtinction between ὁμώνυμα equivoca, and συνώνυμα ſynonyma, when he would expreſs the ſenſe of thoſe terms in our own language. Plutarch, as I have already ſaid, had no need to make any diſtinction on ſuch an occaſion. He was as free to cite the ſame Work of Demetrius, either by the term ὁμωνύμων, or by the term συνωνύμων, as we are free at this day to cite the ſame Work of Father Rapin, either by the Title of a Compariſon between Plato and Ariſtotle, or by the Title of a Parallel between Plato and Ariſtotle. Perfect accuracy would require that in citing a Book we ſhould uſe the very ſame Words which conſtitute the Title in the Editions, and not content ourſelves with making uſe of equivalent expreſſions; but moſt Authors cannot ſubject themſelves to this. Some retain things better than words; they remember, for example, that David Blondel compoſed a Work on the Euchariſt, but do not remember that the Work is intitled Eclairciſſemens familiers de la controverſe de l'Euchariſtie. i. e. "Familiar explications of the con-"troverſy concerning the Euchariſt." They even imagine that inſtead of the word Euchariſt, the Author made uſe of the words Lord's Supper; wherefore they will cite without any ſcruple, Blondel in his Treatiſe of the Lord's Supper, full as ſoon as Blondel in his Treatiſe of the Euchariſt, or Blondel in his Explications of the Controverſy concerning the Euchariſt. Some doubt whether it be in the Title Lord's Supper, or Euchariſt; but fearing to loſe ſome precious moments, if they laid down their pen to go and ſatisfy themſelves by opening the Book, they are contented with an equivalent term. Let us apply this to Plutarch with reſpect to the difference which appears between him and Diogenes Laertius in relation to the Book of Demetrius Magnes. He was more intent on the Thing than the Word; he knew that Author had compoſed a Book concerning Writers of the ſame name, and that a circumſtance of Demoſthenes's marriage was found therein; he knew that the word συνώνυμα was as good to repreſent the ſubject of the Book, as the word ὁμώνυμα; and this was enough for him: he did not think the thing worth the trouble of interrupting himſelf, even tho' he ſhould have been in doubt whether the Author's title was περὶ ὁμωνύμων, and not περὶ συνωνύμων. I ſhould not have enlarged ſo much on theſe minute matters, if I had not thought it might be of uſe to ſhew us the illuſions of Critics. How many times have they believed that certain paſſages ſhould be corrected under pretence of ſome difference in Letters? how many times, I ſay, have they believed this without any reaſon, and unjuſtly exclaimed againſt the Tranſcribers? What ſhall I ſay of ſo many Authors, and of ſo many Books which they multiply unreaſonably, under pretence that they do not find the ſame Orthography in the Ancients who quote them? O what a multitude of blunders would in purſuance of ſuch rules be committed a thouſand years hence in commenting on our Writers, who with the utmoſt negligence ſpell Authors names (19), and ſet down the Titles of Books as they think fit (20).

If the learned Mauſſacus had ſufficiently conſidered this, he would not have imagined the Work of Demetrius Magnes cited by Plutarch περὶ συνωνύμων to be different from that which others cite περὶ ὁμωνύμων (21). It is to no purpoſe for him to produce in ſupport of his opinion the paſſage of Stephanus Byzantinus where Demetrius is quoted ἐν συνωνύμοις (22). I wonder he has not quoted Harpocration (23), who obſerves that Demetrius Magnes, in operę de urbibus ſynonymis, ſaid there were four cities named Methone. Infer from hence that theſe two Titles ſuppoſe no difference, and that, in the notion of thoſe who have cited them, ὁμώνυμα and συνώνυμα are the ſame thing. It may alſo be alledged that if the Author made uſe of one of thoſe two words for the title of one of his Books, and of the other for the Title of the other Book, it was not with a deſign to mark any diſtinction: for it is viſible that the notion according to which an Author compoſes a Treatiſe of the ſeveral Cities named Antioch, is the ſame which is purſued in writing a Book concerning the ſeveral Authors named Thales, or Ariſtophanes; and ſo the diſtinction of the Logicians between ὁμώνυμα æquivoca and συνώνυμα univoca cannot take place on this occaſion. Mauſſacus ſhould have remembred that the Book quoted by Stephanus Byzantinus, and by Harpocration, ἐν τοῖς συνωνύμοις, treated of the Cities which bore the ſame names. Now there is no likelihood that Plutarch had that Book in view: he certainly cited the Book wherein Demetrius ſpoke of the perſons who had been named Demoſthenes. It is not, therefore, a good refutation of Caſaubon to ſay, Stephanus Byzantinus has cited Demetrius Magnes ἐν συνωνύμοις, therefore the word συνωνύμων ought to remain unaltered in Plutarch (24). The refutation would be ſomewhat better, if it could be made out that the Book of which Diogenes Laertius has given the Title is not the ſame with that which is mentioned by Plutarch. But this cannot be maintained without arguing againſt probability; and it is certain that Caſaubon looked on the Book quoted by Plutarch, and that quoted by Diogenes Laertius, as one and the ſame work. He ſhould have attacked him, therefore, on that ſide. Take notice of one thing which is ſingular: Berkelius had no notion of our Demetrius Magnes; for here is the Note he has made on theſe words of Stephanus Byzantinus, Δημήτριος ἐν συνωνύμοις, Demetrius in Synonymis. Fortaſſis intelligendus Demetrius cognomento Ixion, qui ut Suidas auctor eſt quædam ad Grammaticam ſpectantia conſcripſit (25). i. e. "Perhaps we are to underſtand this of "Demetrius ſurnamed Ixion, who, as Suidas informs "us, wrote ſome things relating to Grammar." It is ſurprizing that his memory could furniſh him with nothing concerning our Demetrius, of whom ſeveral ancient and modern Authors have ſaid many things; but beſides this, he deſerves cenſure for having ſuppoſed that Stephanus Byzantinus cited a Grammatical Work. It was more natural to ſay it was ſome Treatiſe which related either to Hiſtory, or Geography; for it is cited on occaſion of a name which belonged both to a city, and to a river. This ſort of homonymous or ſynonymous

(15) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Græc. pag. 150.

(16) Menag. in Laert. lib. 1. num. 38.

(17) Joh. Mollerus, de Script. Homonymis, pag. 902.

(18) See above the Remark [F] of the Article ALLATIUS.

(19) See the Nouvelles de la Republ. des Lettres, Sept. 1685, Art. 9. pag. 1024, &c.

(20) See above, Citation (10) of the Article DAMIAN.

(21) Mauſſ. Diſſertat. Critica de Harpocrat. pag. m. 398.

(22) Steph. Byzant. in Ἀλαβών.

(23) Harpocrat. in Μεθώνη.

(24) Compoſuerat & hic autor libros περὶ συνωνύμων, ut teſtatur Plutarchus in Vita Demoſthenis, male enim illo loco vir quidam doctiſſimus legendum cenſet Δημήτριος Μάγνης ἐν τοῖς περὶ ὁμωνύμων, pro συνωνύμων, autor Stephanus apud quem voce Ἀλαβών, citatur idem Demetrius ἐν συνωνύμοις. Mauſſac. Diſſertat. Crit. de Harpocrat. pag. 398.

(25) Berkel. in Steph. Byzant. pag. 87.

have quoted this Demetrius. The fact for which Athenæus cites him is very remarkable; it is that Theotimus, who had written againſt Epicurus, was accuſed by Zeno the Epicurean, and condemned to death (a). There is a paſſage to be found in Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus [C], of which I ſhall ſay ſomething.

(a) Athen. lib. 13. pag. 611.

nymous terms does not belong to a Grammarian, as ſuch. I add this reſtriction, becauſe there is a kind of homonymies or ſynonymies, which belong merely to Grammar, and on which the Ancients publiſhed ſome Treatiſes. Mauſſacus is in the right to obſerve that after the multitude of Books compoſed by Authors of the ſame name, or on the ſame ſubject, had occaſioned one man's Writings to be confounded with another's, Criticiſm, which was before employed only in diſcerning whether a Work was ſuppoſititious or genuine, undertook a new province, that is, to diſtinguiſh the Works which reſpectively belonged to each of the homonymous Writers. He names three Authors who applied themſelves to this branch of Criticiſm: the firſt is our Demetrius Magnes, he calls the ſecond Simareſtus, and the third Dionyſius of Synope (27). Conſult Wowerus in the XVI Chapter of his Treatiſe de Polymathia (28). But let us not forget what Jonſius obſerves (29); which is, that the Work of Dionyſius of Sinope was a Comedy (30), and that of Simareſtus a Grammatical Treatiſe (31). So that Mauſſacus and Caſaubon have not well matched them with Demetrius Magnes. They would have done better if they had matched him with Agreſphon (32), of whom Suidas ſpeaks (33). They ſay nothing of him: but this omiſſion is not ſo unpardonable as their not mentioning what Aulus Gellius relates concerning a Book wherein the Author examined, among other things, quot fuerint Pythagoræ nobiles, quot Hippocratæ (34), i. e. "how many famous "men there were of the names of Pythagoras, and of "Hippocrates."

None among the Moderns have laboured ſo uſefully as Meurſius and Jonſius in this part of critical learning, with regard to ancient Authors of the ſame name (35). But as the conformity of names has not occaſioned fewer miſtakes among the Authors of theſe latter ages, it has been neceſſary to write ſomething on that ſubject. A learned German (36) has applied himſelf to it, and has ſucceeded very well. His deſign comprehends the homonymous Writers both ancient and modern. His Book (37) was printed at Hamburgh, in the year 1698. We find therein an infinite number of faults pointed out, which conſiſt in the attributing a Book to an Author who did not write it, and who had nothing in common with the true Author but the name, &c.

(26) Mauſſac. Diſſert. Crit. de Harpocrat. pag. 398.

(27) Ita Simareſtus quidam libros περὶ συνωνύμων compoſuerat. Hinc etiam Dionyſii Sinopenſis περὶ ὁμωνύμων tractatus apud Ulpianum Demoſthenis ἐξηγητήν. Idem, ibid.

(28) Pag. m. 126.

(29) Jonſius, de Scriptor. Hiſtor. Philoſoph. pag. 250.

(30) See Athenæus, lib. 9. cap. 7. pag. 381.

(31) Jonſius, de Script. Hiſt. Philoſoph. pag. 448.

(32) See above the Remark [H] of the Article APOLLONIUS of Tyana.

(33) Suidas, in Ἀπολλώνιος.

(34) Aulus Gellius, lib. 14. cap. 6.

(35) Do not forget what I have ſaid of ALLATIUS in the Remark [F] of his Article.

(36) Joannes Mollerus, Flenſburgo Cimber.

(37) It is intitled, Homonymoſcopia Hiſtorico-Philologico-Critica, ſive Scbediaſma παραγωγὴν de Scriptoribus Homonymis quadripartitum, &c. in 8vo.

[C] There is a paſſage in Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus, of which I ſhall ſay ſomething.] This Author, who was as good a Critic as an Hiſtorian, obſerves that Callimachus and the other Grammarians of Pergamus had written nothing but what was very imperfect concerning the Orator Dinarchus. He adds that Demetrius Magnes, who paſſed for a very learned man, and had ſpoken of the ſame Orator, and that with an air which promiſed wonders, in his Book de Homonymis, was notwithſtanding miſtaken (38). He tranſcribes the whole paſſage, wherein we find that Demetrius had firſt obſerved that there were four Dinarchus's, and afterwards had ſaid ſomething of each of them, beginning with the Orator. We alſo find there all he had ſaid of that Orator. The Criticiſm of Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus thereon is very good: he complains that Demetrius ſays nothing either of the Birth of Dinarchus, or of that Age he lived in, or of the country where his eloquence was employed. Theſe were things in which he might have been eaſily informed, if he had taken the pains to enquire after them. Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus proves it by producing the diſcoveries he had made concerning thoſe particulars by his inquiries. I congratulate my ſelf on having had the like taſte before I had read this paſſage of Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus: I did not know that he had taken notice of theſe defects in the Narration of our Demetrius, when I blamed thoſe who write the Elogy of a man, without ſetting down either the place, or time, of his birth, or of his death, &c (39). Theſe defects, however, cannot comfort us for the loſs of that Author's Writings: for his Narrations, tho' imperfect, would be of great ſervice to us.

(38) Δῆμος (read Δημήτριος) ὁ Μάγνης ὃς ἔδοξε πολύϊστωρ ἐν τῇ περὶ τῶν ὁμωνύμων πραγματείᾳ, &c. Demetrius Magneſius, qui polyhiſtor fuiſſe viſus eſt, in tractatu de homonymis, &c. Dionyſius Halicarn. in Judicio de Dinarcho, pag. m. 349.

(39) See the Nouvelles de la Repub. des Lettres, June 1684, Art. V, pag. 500 of the Edition of 1686.

DEMOCRITUS, one of the greateſt Philoſophers of Antiquity, was of Abdera in Thrace (a). He was educated by Magi [A], who taught him Theology and Aſtrology. He afterwards heard Leucippus, and learned from him the Syſtem of Atoms and a Vacuum. The extraordinary inclination he had for the Sciences induced him to travel into all parts of the world where he hoped to find able men. He went to viſit the Prieſts of Egypt: he conſulted the Chaldeans and the Perſian Philoſophers; and it is ſaid he penetrated even into India and Ethiopia, to confer with the Gymnoſophiſts. In theſe travels he ſpent his whole patrimony, which amounted to above a hundred Talents (b); after which he was obliged to be maintained by his brother: and if he had not given demonſtrations of his great underſtanding, he would have incurred a mark of infamy, for not having preſerved his eſtate [B]. The ſpirit of great Travellers reigned in him: he went to the fartheſt parts of the Indies in ſearch of the riches of learning, and cared very

(a) See the Remark [A].

(b) A Talent is worth l. 193. 15. 0 ſterling.

[A] He was educated by Magi.] Xerxes King of Perſia, having lodged at the houſe of Democritus's father, made him a preſent of ſome Magi, who were the Maſters of Democritus (1). But as there is an infinite difference between lodging King Xerxes, and entertaining his army, that Author is inexcuſable who has ſaid that Democritus's father was able to provide a repaſt for that Monarch's army without incommoding himſelf (2). Moreri has been caught in this ſnare; which he might have avoided, if he had minded the words of Diogenes Laertius; but he does not ſeem to have conſulted him. If he had, would he have ſaid, that Diogenes Laertius ſuppoſes Democritus was of Miletus? Laertius ſays no ſuch thing; he only ſays it was the opinion of ſome people. I obſerve, by the way, that Moreri ought not to have quoted Herodotus without ſome further addition. It was the way to perſuade his Readers that the fact he mentions is to be found in the Muſes of Herodotus. But this is falſe, and there is no likelihood that Diogenes Laertius intended to cite the Author of thoſe Muſes. I believe in that paſſage, and in ſome others, he means a different Herodotus from him whoſe Works we have.

(1) Diog. Laert. in Vita Democriti, lib. 9. num. 34.

(2) Valer. Max. lib. 8. cap. 7. num. 4. Exter.

[B] If he had not given proofs . . . . of a great underſtanding . . . . he would have incurred a mark of infamy, for not having preſerved his Eſtate.] It was enacted by the Laws of the country, that thoſe who had ſpent their patrimony ſhould not be interred in the ſepulchre of the Family. To avoid the reproaches of thoſe who envied him, and the uneaſineſſes they might have cauſed him in conſequence of thoſe Laws, he endeavoured to get himſelf exempted from the penalty which he might have incurred. For this purpoſe, he choſe among his Works that which ſurpaſſed all the reſt (3), and read it to the Magiſtrates. They were ſo charmed with it, that they made him a preſent of five hundred talents, and erected ſtatues to him, and decreed that after his death he ſhould be buried at the public charge; which was performed accordingly (4). Diogenes Laertius murders his Narrations in ſuch a manner, that I thought my ſelf obliged to add ſome little circumſtances to them. Athenæus relates the fact better: and he does it thus (5). He ſays Democritus

(3) It was intitled Μέγας διάκοσμος, the great Diacoſmos.

(4) Diog. Laert. in Vita Democriti, num. 39.

(5) Athen. lib. 4. cap. 19. pag. 168.

very little for the treaſures which he had almoſt at his own door. He was never at Athens (c), if we believe ſome Authors; or if he was there, as ſome others aſſert, he made himſelf known to nobody there. He gave two proofs of an extraordinary ſagacity [C], which made him admired by the great Hippocrates. But we muſt not believe all that has been ſaid on that head; we ought rather to imagine that Writers have taken a pleaſure

(c) See Valer. Maximus criticiſed on this head in the Remark [B] towards the end.

Democritus was formally accuſed, and forced to plead his cauſe; and that having read one of his Books (6), and repreſented that the expences he had been at in order to render himſelf capable of compoſing it, had ſwallowed up his whole patrimony, he was acquitted. Every body is acquainted with theſe verſes of Horace, which teſtify the negligence of Democritus with regard to worldly goods;

(6) It was the great Diacoſmos, and the Hiſtory of Hell, τὰ περὶ τῶν ἐν ἅιδου. Idem, ibid.

Miramur, ſi Democriti pecus edit agellos
Cultaque, dum peregre eſt animus ſine corpore velox (7)?

(7) Horat. Epiſt. 12. lib. 1. ver. 12.

——"Are we ſurpriz'd to ſee
"Democritus' Eſtate a Common, fed
"By other's cattle, while his ſoul is fled
"Far diſtant, and his body's left behind?"

Simon Boſius (8) has ſuppoſed, without foundation, that Horace, by a ſlip of memory, had ſaid that of Democritus which ſhould have been ſaid of Anaxagoras. It is true, Plutarch informs us that Anaxagoras left his lands uncultivated (9); but for ought any thing that appears to the contrary, Democritus might have done the ſame. Had not Cicero ſaid it before Horace? Democritus, qui (vere falſo ne quæreremus) dicitur oculis ſe privaſſe, certè ut quam minimè animus à cogitationibus abduceretur, patrimonium neglexit, agros deſeruit inculios, quid quærens aliud niſi beatam vitam (10)? i. e. "Democritus, who is reported (whether truly "or not is a queſtion) to have put out his own eyes, that "his mind might be as little diverted from contem-"plation as poſſible, neglected his Eſtate, and left his "fields untilled: what end could he propoſe by it, "unleſs it were to live happily?" Philo teſtifies that the Greeks ſaid Anaxagoras and Democritus left their lands uncultivated, in order to apply themſelves with leſs diſtraction of mind to the ſtudy of wiſdom (11). But how, will you ſay, can this be reconciled with the Authors who have written (12) that Democritus, when he divided the inheritance with his two brothers, choſe the leaſt lot, which conſiſted in money, and conſequently was more proper for a traveller? I anſwer that we muſt content our ſelves with knowing the different Accounts which are found of theſe things: it would be too difficult, at moſt times, to reconcile them, and to chuſe the beſt. Valerius Maximus relates that Democritus gave all his Eſtate to his country, reſerving only a very moderate ſum to himſelf. He repreſents this Patrimony as an immenſe Eſtate, and makes no mention of Democritus's brothers. This is to relate things very negligently: and there are ſome other faults in his Narrative. Democritus, cum divitiis cenſeri poſſet, quæ tantæ fuerunt, ut pater ejus Xerxis exercitui epulum dare ex facili potuerit, quo magis vacuo animo ſtudiis literarum eſſet operatus, parva admodum ſumma retenta, patrimonium ſuum patriæ donavit. Athenis autem compluribus annis moratus, omnia temporum momenta ad percipiendam & exercendam doctrinam conferens, ignotus illi urbi vixit; quod ipſe in quodam volumine teſtatur (13). i. e. "Democritus, "whoſe riches were ſuch that his Father was able to "furniſh an entertainment for Xerxes's army with-"out inconvenience, that he might apply himſelf to "ſtudy with the greater freedom of mind, gave his "whole patrimony to his country, reſerving only a "very ſmall ſum. He ſtaid ſeveral years at Athens, "ſpending every moment of his time in the attain-"ment and proſecution of knowledge, and lived un-"known in that city, as he himſelf teſtifies in one "of his Books." I have already cenſured the feaſting of that prodigious army. It is not probable that Democritus made ſo long a ſtay at Athens, ſince ſome Authors ſay he was never there. The great travels of Democritus, of which Valerius Maximus ſays nothing, deſerved more notice than his abode at Athens. The ſame Writer has made no mention of the moſt wonderful circumſtance of that abode. He ought principally to have reflected on the contempt which Democritus had for the glory he might have acquired, if he would have made himſelf known.

(8) See Lambin on this paſſage of Horace.

(9) Ἀναξαγόρας τὴν χώραν κατέλιπε μηλόβοτον. Anaxagoras agrum ovibus paſcendum reliquit. Plut. de vitando ære alieno, pag. 831. E. Τὴν οἰκίαν ἐκεῖνος ἐξέλιπε, καὶ τὴν χώραν ἀφῆκεν ἀργὴν καὶ μηλόβοτον ὑπ' ἐνθουσιασμοῦ καὶ μεγαλοφροσύνης. Hic numinis afflatu & animi ductus celſitudine domum deſeruit, & agrum reliquit incultum vaſtatumque. Idem, in Pericle, pag. 162, B. See the Remark [A] of the Article ANAXAGORAS.

(10) Cicero, de Finibus, lib. 5. cap. 29.

(11) De vita contemplat. pag. 891.

(12) Apud Laert. in Democrito, num. 35. See alſo Ælian, lib. 4. cap. 20.

(13) Val. Max. lib. 8. cap. 7. Extern. num. 4.

[C] He gave two proofs of extraordinary ſagacity.] Democritus going to viſit Hippocrates, the latter cauſed ſome milk to be brought. It is not ſaid whether it was done to make a trial of Democritus's ſkill; it is only ſaid that he declared it was the milk of a black ſhe-goat, which had brought forth but once. Hippocrates had brought a female with him: the firſt time Democritus ſaw her, he called her maid, but the next day he called her woman; and it was found that ſhe had been deflowered the night before. This, without doubt, argues a very penetrating wit, and I ſhould not wonder if Hippocrates was ſurprized at it. Were I aſked my opinion of this ſtory, I ſhould anſwer without heſitation that I believe it falſe. Not but that I think it poſſible for the cauſe of blackneſs in a creature, and reiterated fœcundity, to produce ſome peculiar quality in the milk. This is not at all impoſſible; and it is very poſſible, on the other hand, that it may not be ſo. The ſame thing may be ſaid of the other inſtance. It is poſſible that the loſs of virginity may produce ſome alteration in a woman's exterior; and it is poſſible it may produce none at all. Theſe two contraries being poſſible, let us ſuppoſe that in the milk of a black goat, which has brought forth but once, there is a particular quality which depends on blackneſs, and the firſt bearing: will it be poſſible for a man to diſtinguiſh this quality? I anſwer that this ſeems to me not impoſſible; but I do not believe that any man has yet attained to that degree of knowledge. It is ſaid that bees have ſo nice a diſcernment as to know, among ſeveral perſons who come near their hives, thoſe who have lately taſted the venereal pleaſure (14). There is nothing in this but what is probable; for the organs of inſects are ſo delicate, that an emanation of corpuſcles which excite no ſenſation in a man (15), may irritate the ſmell of bees and ants. But the knowledge of Democritus would exceed that of bees; ſince it is not ſaid that they can diſtinguiſh whether it be the firſt time that a perſon has done the act. I ſay, therefore, that though all that is ſaid of bees were true, and though it were certain that the loſs of virginity would make ſome change in the outward appearance, it muſt not thence be inferred that any man has ever been able to diſtinguiſh that change: and however it be, I am perſuaded that Democritus did not know the two things in queſtion. Nevertheleſs I may relate them without being guilty of a lie; for I do no more than quote what I find in Diogenes Laertius.

(14) Plutarch. in Præc. Conjug. pag. 144.

(15) However ſee what will be ſaid of Father Cotton, in the Article MARIANA, Remark [C].

I ſhould not be ſo clear of lying as I am, if I ventured to tell this ſtory with ſome additions which I had not found in the ancient Writers; for which reaſons I accuſe thoſe of lying and falſification, who have ſaid that Democritus knew by the eyes of the girl who accompanied Hippocrates, that ſhe had paſſed the night with a man (16). What they add, that this ſagacity is odious to one half of mankind, might paſs, if they did not deduce it from a falſe ſuppoſition; for certainly it would be a very diſagreeable thing to be in dread of people who could know by a girl's eyes whether ſhe had loſt her maidenhead or not. Thoſe who love pious frauds ought to endeavour to make the world believe there are many people who have ſuch a faculty; but there would be reaſon to fear that this error would be more vigorouſly and effectually oppoſed than any ſuperſtition. A vaſt number of people would be free-thinkers, and would dogmatize like free-thinkers in oppoſition to this pious fraud. Some ſay it was by the girl's voice that Democritus knew ſhe had been deflowered (17). He obſerved, ſay they, that her voice had not the ſame tone as it had the day before; and hereupon they tell us that Albertus Magnus diſcovered the ſlip of a maid-ſervant, without ſtirring out of his cloſet. She had been ſent to a tavern for wine, and returned ſinging: Albertus, though intent on this ſtudy, took notice however

(16) Puellam Hippocratis comitem virginem primo, ſequenti verò die fœminam ſalutavit, quod nocturnæ deflorationis veſtigia in ejus oculis perciperet, inviſa generis humani dimidio ſagacitate. Joan. Chryſoſt. Magnenus, in Vita Democriti, pag. 7.

(17) Gaſpar à Reies, in Elyſio jucundar. Quæſtion. Campo, Quæſt. 39. num. 7. pag. m. 474.

a pleaſure to interſperſe the Hiſtory of the Philoſophers with as many prodigious Adventures as that of the Knights Errant; and it is certain that the exploits of the famous Orlando would not be more wonderful in point of bravery, than the two diſcoveries of Democritus in point of inſight into the ſecrets of nature. Some ſay he lived 109 years [D]; and that he deferred the hour of his death for ſome days in favour of his ſiſter [E]. He compoſed a very great number of Books (d); which needs not be wondered at, even though however, that the girl's voice was not ſo clear as before, and thence concluded that ſhe had loſt her maidenhead in that ſhort journey. Nec minus vocis mutationem ob eandem fere cauſam, quo tantum ſigno ferunt Albertum Magnum ex muſeo ſuo puellam, ex ænopolio vinum pro hero apportantem, in itinere vitiatam fuiſſe deprehendiſſe, quod in reditu ſubinde tantantis ex acuta in graviorem mutatam vocem agnoviſſet (18). See the laſt paragraph of this Remark.

(d) Extracted from Diogenes Laertius, lib. 9. in Vita Democriti, num. 34, & ſeq.

(18) Idem, ibid.

I have nothing to ſay againſt la Mothe le Vaier; for if he ſays that Democritus knew the qualities of the ſhe-goat by the ſmell of the milk, he tells us at the ſame time that according to Diogenes Laertius it was the ſight, and not the ſmell, by which Democritus made the diſcovery. So that la Mothe le Vaier does not deceive us; he gives us no room to believe that his conjecture is a fact which he took from the ancient Authors. The Reader will not be diſpleaſed to find here the foundation of his conjecture: Democritus, ſays he (19), made himſelf admired in his conference with Hippocrates, judging in the ſame manner (20) that the milk which had been preſented to them was of a black goat, which had brought forth but once. I know very well that the Writer of his Life (*) ſpeaks of this diſcernment as an effect of the ſight: but what we read in Philoſtratus of a young ſhepherd, who knew by the ſmell that the milk was not pure, makes me think the ſame thing of the action of Democritus. That peaſant, who was tall and wonderfully ſtrong, was named Agathio, and had deſired the Sophiſt Herodes to get ready for him the next morning a veſſel full of milk pure in his ſenſe, that is to ſay, which had not been milked by the hand of a woman. But he perceived, ſo ſoon as it was offered him, that it was not ſuch as he had deſired, proteſting that the ſcent of her hands who had milked it offended his noſtrils. Philoſtratus thereupon calls him a Diviner.

(19) Tom. 10. Lettre 4. pag. 31.

(20) That is, as Pherecydes had foretold an earthquake by the ſmell of ſome well-water.

(*) Diog. Laert.

As frivolous as the Story I have told of the diſcovery of Albertus Magnus may be, yet very able Phyſicians ſpend a good deal of time in reaſoning on the ſympathy which they ſuppoſe there is between the organs of generation and the throat; and it is common enough to ſee people, and even ſome of the meaner ſort, obſerve that a Preacher, the firſt year of his marriage, has the tone of his voice more dry, broken, and hoarſe than before. Meurſius aſſerts that anciently nurſes meaſured the necks of the girls they had under their care, with a thread, in order to know whether their virginity was gone or not (21). He proves this by a paſſage of Catullus; but I ſhould chuſe to ſay, that paſſage only ſhews that they uſed to meaſure their necks on their wedding day, and the day after. See the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, for the month of January 1686, pag. 17. Iſaac Voſſius, in his Comment on the ſame paſſage, makes a Note wherein he ſpeaks of a pretended Book of Democritus, in which the manner of meaſuring the neck is deſcribed. This therefore belongs of right to this part of my Commentary. In veteri ſcripto de ſympathia & antipathia, quod perperam tribuitur Democrito, ita hæc referuntur: Λαβὼν βιβλάριον καταμάτρησον ἀπὸ ὠτίου ἐς ὠτίον. κἂν μὲν ἴσον ᾖ, παρθένος ἐστι. εἰ δὲ μὴ, ἔφθαρται. Nempe ſi filum aut funiculum ex lino aut papyro accipias, & anterioris colli ſpatium ab aure ad aurem, & deinceps cervicem ſeu averſam metiaris colli partem ſimiliter ad aures, fuerintque hæc intervalla inæqualia, defloratam eſſe ſponſam, contra, ſi æquales fuerint iſti ſemicirculi, eſſe etiamnum virginem. Aliud quoque addit ſignum, ſcilicet ſi collum fuerit calidum & nates frigidæ, & hoc quoque amiſſæ virginitatis eſſe indicium (22). i. e. "In an old "Treatiſe of Sympathy and Antipathy, which is "falſely attributed to Democritus, theſe things are "thus related: Take a thread or a ſmall ſtring of "linen or the papyrus, and meaſure the forepart of "the neck from ear to ear, and then the hindpart "likewiſe from ear to ear; and if thoſe diſtances be "unequal, you may conclude the bride has been de"flowered; but if, on the contrary, thoſe ſemicircles "be equal, ſhe is yet a virgin. He alſo adds an"other ſign, which is, that if the neck be warm "and the buttocks cold, this alſo is a mark of de"floration." There was another way of meaſuring; of which Severinus Pinellus ſpeaks in the 5th chapter of the 1ſt Book de Notis Virginitatis, and Gaſpar à Reies in his 38th Queſtion.

(21) Meurſ. Auct. Philol. cap. 36. apud Almelov. Specim. Antiquit. e ſacris profanarum, pag. 67.

(22) If. Voſſius, in hæc Verba Catulli, Epith. Pelei & Thetidis, Non illam nutrix orienti luce reviſens Heſperno collum poterit circundare filo, pag. 248.

[D] Some ſay he lived 109 years.] We find nothing certain, either as to the time of his birth, or the time of his death. Wherefore we ſee Scaliger has done no more than obſerved wherein Authors contradict themſelves (23). Democritus in the Chronicle of Euſebius flouriſhed at the beginning of the 70th Olympiad, and died the 2d year of the 93d (24). On this foot he muſt have lived much longer than 109 years, or elſe he muſt have flouriſhed ſo early as the 19th year of his age. Diodorus Siculus makes him die at the age of 90, the 1ſt year of the 94th Olympiad (25). Lucian aſſures us that Democritus ſuffered himſelf to die of hunger at the age of 104 (26). If we had any thing certain concerning the age of Anaxagoras, we ſhould better know the Chronology of Democritus; for the latter aſſerts in one of his Works (27), that he was forty years younger than Anaxagoras. But there is nothing but diſagreement among the Authors who ſet down the dates of Anaxagoras's life. He was 32 years old, it is ſaid (28), when Xerxes paſſed into Europe: he lived ſeventy two years, and died the 1ſt year of the 78th Olympiad. I omit ſeveral other confuſions which are no eaſier got clear of than theſe. We may boldly affirm that Ælian is miſtaken (29), in ſuppoſing that Democritus derided Alexander, on account of the uneaſineſs that Prince was in when he conſidered that he had not yet conquered one world, and that there was an infinite number of them according to Democritus. The 109 years which are given this Philoſopher cannot bring him down to the conqueſt of Alexander. The opinion of Aulus Gellius is ſolid; and he had it from good hands: he aſſerts that Socrates was younger than Democritus (30). Now Socrates died the 1ſt year of the 95th Olympiad, at the age of ſeventy (31): Democritus therefore muſt have been then eighty years old at leaſt. So that he would have been above 140, if he had been alive when Alexander aſcended the throne, the 1ſt year of the 111th Olympiad. Let us not forget the kind of death which Marcus Antoninus (32) attributes to Democritus, in oppoſition to all the other Writers. He makes him die of the lowſy diſeaſe; taking, as it ſeems, one man for another, Pherecydes for Democritus. You will ſee in the Remark [E] ſeveral authorities concerning the voluntary death of our Philoſopher. They may be joined with theſe three Verſes of Lucretius:

(23) Scalig. in Euſeb. num. 1616, pag. 109.

(24) Mr. Menage, Notæ in Laert. lib. 9. num. 41, imputes to Euſebius the placing the death of Democritus in the 4th year of the 94th Olympiad. Jonſius deceived him, who ſays this pag. 23.

(25) Diod. Sicul. lib. 14. cap. 11.

(26) Lucian. in Macrobijs, pag. m. 639, 640. tom. 2.

(27) In parvo Diacoſmo, apud Laërtium in Democrito, num. 41.

(28) Laert. lib. 2. num. 7.

(29) Ælian. Hiſt. div. lib. 4. cap. ult.

(30) Aulus Gellius, lib. 17. cap. 21.

(31) See his Life, by Mr. Charpentier, pag. 284.

(32) Περὶ τῶν εἰς ἑαυτὸν, lib. 3. Sect. 3.

(33) Lucret. lib. 3. ver. 1052.

Denique Democritum poſtquam matura vetuſtas
Admonuit memorem motus langueſcere mentis,
Sponte ſua leto caput obvius obtulit ipſe (33).

" Democritus, perceiving age invade,
" His body weaken'd, and his mind decay'd,
" Obey'd the ſummons with a chearful face;
" Made haſte to welcome death, and met him half
" the race." Dryden.

[E] He deferred the hour of his death for ſome days in favour of his ſiſter.] His ſiſter was grieved, not to ſee he was going to die, but becauſe on account of his death ſhe ſhould not be able to aſſiſt at the feaſt of Ceres. To free her from this uneaſineſs, he cauſed ſome hot bread to be brought him every morning, and with nothing but the ſmell of that bread he ſupported life till the three days (34) of the feſtival were paſt: after though he had not lived ſo long: for he loved retirement, and applied himſelf to ſtudy in a very ſingular manner [F]. Beſides, he was a man of fine parts, and of a vaſt and penetrating genius, which entered into every part of knowledge. Natural and Moral Philoſophy, the Mathematics, polite Learning, the polite Arts, were all within the ſphere of his activity. He became very ſkilful in every thing, and even ſo far as to raiſe himſelf to the glory of Invention, as Seneca informs us [G]. I have read in ſome modern Authors after which he let himſelf gently fall into the arms of death. It is thus that Diogenes Laertius relates it (25). This favours very much of the invention of a mind at leiſure; but Athenæus does not relate the thing with the ſame circumſtances: for he ſays that Democritus, being weary of old age, reſolved to haſten his death, by daily leſſening his uſual allowance. The feſtival of Ceres drew near, and the women of the houſe were ſadly afraid leſt he ſhould die during the continuance of that anniverſary; for they could not have been preſent at the ceremony, if he had died then. They begged of him therefore to put off his death till after the ſolemnity, that they might celebrate it with joy: he conſented, and ordered them to bring him a pot of honey. The ſmell only of that honey kept him alive for ſome days; after which he made it be taken away, and died (36). A modern has raſhly undertaken to criticiſe Athenæus (37). He charges him with having ſaid that Democritus's ſiſter, Prieſteſs of Ceres, deſired her brother not to die during the feſtival, and that Democritus cauſed a large pot of honey to be brought, and eat nothing but honey for ſeveral days. This is not very probable, ſays our Modern, it is much more likely to ſay that this good old man being ready to expire, and incapable of taking nouriſhment, prolonged his life only by ſmelling to the honey, as my countryman Cælius Rhodiginus aſſerts. Et hæc quidem minus probabiliter Athenæus, cum vero ſit propius moribundum ſenem omniſque alimenti incapacem non ipſo melle, ſed ſola mellis evaporatione vitam produxiſſe, ut aſſeruit Rhodiginus meus (lib. 21. c. 3.) (38). Who would not laugh on reading this? For I, it is not true that Athenæus ſays Democritus eat honey: he affirms that this Philoſopher took only the ſmell of it. Διαζῆσαι ἡμέρας ἱκανὰς τὸν ἄνθρωπον τῇ ἀπὸ τοῦ μέλιτος ἀναφορᾷ μόνῃ χρώμενον: In multos dies vitam prorogaſſe ſolo mellis odore & halitu continuatam (39). II, It is falſe that the ſmell of honey is more proper to prolong a man's life ſeveral days than the honey itſelf. Suppoſing the man within four inches of the grave, I do not retract what I have ſaid. III, Athenæus does not even ſpeak of Democritus's ſiſter, ſo far is he from making her Prieſteſs of Ceres, a dignity which is not aſcribed to her by Diogenes Laertius. It is this laſt Hiſtorian who mentions the intreaties employed by that ſiſter. IV. Laſtly, it is ridiculous to cite a Cælius Rhodiginus concerning facts which paſſed above two thouſand years ago.

(34) It laſted 9 days, according to Ovid; 4, according to Heſychius; 5, according to Ariſtophanes. See Caſtellanus, de Feſtis Græcorum, pag. 173. Caſaubon, in Laert. lib. 9. num. 43, ſuppoſes that where Democritus lived it laſted but three days; though it was otherwiſe at Athens. Yet, in his Notes on Athenæus, pag. 537, he ſays it laſted but three days at Athens.

(35) In ejus Vita, lib. 9. num. 43.

(36) Athen. lib. 2. cap. 7. pag. m. 46.

(37) He cites Athenæus, l. 2. cap. 3. he ſhould have ſaid cap. 7.

(38) Balthaſar Bonifacius, Hiſt. Ludicra, lib. 1. cap. 11. pag. m. 33.

(39) Athen. lib. 2. cap. 7.

[F] He applied himſelf to ſtudy in a very ſingular manner.] He made choice of a room in a houſe ſituated in the middle of a garden, and he kept himſelf ſhut up in that room with ſo perfect an unconcern for every thing that was doing about him, that when he had notice given him one day to be preſent at a ſacrifice, he did not perceive either that the bullock which was to be ſacrificed had been tied near his chamber, or that his father had come to give orders for that ceremony (40). He muſt needs have been a lover of ſolitude, ſince he took delight in ſhutting himſelf up in the tombs. Ἤσκει δὲ καὶ ποικίλως δοκιμάζειν τὰς φαντασίας ἐρημάζων ἐνιότε καὶ τοῖς τάφοις ἐνδιατρίβων. Nitebatur autem etiam variè probare imaginationes, ſæpe ſolitarius vivens atque etiam ſepulcra incolens (41). He did it to ſound the ſtrength of his imagination, and to try it every way poſſible. Lucian hereupon tells a pleaſant ſtory: he ſays that Democritus ſhut himſelf up in a ſepulchre which was without the city, and there paſſed days and nights in ſtudying and compoſing. Some young people endeavoured to fright him; they diſguiſed themſelves like dead bodies, they took the moſt frightful vizards they could get, and came about him, making a hundred leaps and capers. He did not vouchſafe them a look, but only ſaid to them, ſtill keeping on writing, Have done playing the fool. Ὁ δὲ ὅτι ἤδεισε τὴν προσποίησιν αὐτῶν, ὅτι ὅλως ἐνέλιπε πρὸς αὐτούς. ἀλλὰ μεταξὺ γράφων, παύσασθε ἔφη παίζοντες. οὕτω βεβαίως ἐπίστευε μηδὲν εἶναι τὰς ψυχὰς ἔτι ἔξω γινομένας τῶν σωμάτων. Hic neque ipſorum ſimulationem timuerit, neque ipſos omnino reſpexerit: ſed inter ſcribendum dixerit, deſinite inepti tire: adeo firmiter credidit animas nihil eſſe poſtquam è corporibus exierint (42). The reaſon was, ſays Lucian, becauſe he was firmly perſuaded that the ſoul died with the body, and that whatever is ſaid of ſpectres, and ghoſts, and the return of ſpirits, is conſequently a chimæra. Nobody ſcarce has heard of Democritus, without learning at the ſame time that Hippocrates was ſent for to cure him. Some very good Critics (43) are perſuaded that the Letters which are extant concerning this among thoſe of Hippocrates are fictitious: but without doubt this fiction was very ancient. It has been feigned, therefore, long ago that the Abderites had written to Hippocrates, to deſire him to come and viſit Democritus. They were afraid he would become quite diſtracted, and that his great learning would perfectly turn his head; which they looked on as a great misfortune to the public. Hic præ multa quæ detinet ipſum ſapientia ægrotat, ut timor ſit ne noſtra urbs Abderitarum peſſumdetur, ſi Democritus mente fuerit motus (44). They ſaw he cared for nothing, laughed at every thing, ſaid the air was full of images, endeavoured to find out what the birds ſaid, and boaſted that he took journeys from time to time into the immenſe ſpace of things. It appears, from one of theſe Letters of Hippocrates, that the love of ſolitude had expoſed Democritus to the ill reports which were ſpread concerning him. In veritatis regione quam ſapientia colluſtrat, non eſt pater, nec mater, uxorve, aut cognati, non liberi nec fratres neque famuli, fortunaque vel aliud ex his quæ tumultum faciunt. Democritus illuc præ ſapientia commigravit, & inſania teneri creditur ob ſolitudinis amorem (45). i. e. "In the region "of truth, which is inlightened by wiſdom, there is "neither father, nor mother, wife, or relations, nei"ther children, brothers, nor ſervants, neither fortune, "nor any other of thoſe things which make ſo much "diſturbance in the world. Democritus out of wiſ"dom tranſported himſelf thither, and was thought "to be diſtracted by reaſon of his love for ſolitude." However, the forgery of theſe Letters would not hinder me from believing that Hippocrates was actually ſent for by the Abderites, and, in a word, that he who forged thoſe Letters built on facts ſupported by a tradition of ſome authority (46). But here is ſomething ſtronger. Dr. Drelincourt, Profeſſor of Phyſic at Leyden, one of the learneſt men of our age, has aſſured me there is no room to doubt but that the Letters concerning Democritus, among thoſe of Hippocrates, are genuine: and he ſays it is the general opinion of the Phyſicians.

(40) Diog. Laertius, lib. 9. cap. 36.

(41) Ibid. num. 38.

(42) Lucian. in Philopſeude, tom. 2. pag. 495.

(43) Menag. in Laert. lib. 9. num. 4.

(44) Apud Hippocrat. in Epiſt. num. 5. citante Magneno, in Vita Democriti, pag. 24.

(45) Magnenus, ibid. pag. 26.

(46) I do not, therefore, deſtroy here what I have ſaid above, Citation (47) of the Article ABDERA.

[G] He became very ſkilful, . . . and even ſo far as to be able to raiſe himſelf to the glory of invention, as Seneca informs us.] Here is the Elogy which his Hiſtorian has given him: Ἦν ὡς ἀληθῶς ἐν φιλοσοφίᾳ πάνσοφος. τὰ γὰρ φυσικὰ, καὶ τὰ ἠθικὰ, ἀλλὰ καὶ τὰ μαθηματικὰ, καὶ τὴν ἐγκυκλίους λόγους καὶ περὶ τεχνῶν πᾶσαν εἶχεν ἐμπειρίαν. Erat revera in Philoſophia quinque certaminum peritus. Namque naturalia, moralia, mathematica, liberalium diſciplinarum orbem artiumque omnem peritiam callebat (47). i. e. "He was really a perfect Maſter in all "parts of Philoſophy. For he underſtood Phyſics, "Ethics, Mathematics, and the whole circle of arts "and ſciences." As to the things which he invented, you will find that Seneca does not much commend him. Democritus, inquit, inveniſſe dicitur fornicem, ut lapidum curvatura paulatim inclinatorum medio ſaxo alligaretur. Hoc dicam falſum eſſe. Neceſſe eſt enim ante Democritum, & pontes, & portas fuiſſe, quarum fere ſumma curvantur. Excidit porro vobis, eundem Democritum inveniſſe, quemadmodum ebur molliretur, quemadmodum decoctus calculus in ſmaragdum converteretur, qua hodieque coctura inventi lapides coctiles colorantur. Illa ſapiens licet invenerit, non qua ſapiens erat, invenit. Multa enim facit, quæ ab imprudentiſſimis aut æque fieri videmus, aut peritius, aut exercitatius (48). i. e. "Democritus, ſaid he, is

(47) Laert. lib. 9. num. 37.

(48) Seneca, Epiſt. 90. pag. m. 371.

Authors that his long life was a conſequence of his chaſtity [H]; but I do not find this in the Ancients. If all that has been quoted as his was taken from his genuine Writings, it cannot be denied but that he fed himſelf with whimſies in ſome reſpects [I]; for it

" ſaid to have invented the arch in building, ſo as " the gradual inclination of the ſtones may be ſup- " ported or bound by the middle ſtone. This I ſay is " falſe. For it is certain there were bridges and gates " before Democritus, the higheſt parts of which are " generally bowed. But you have forgotten that " the ſame Democritus alſo found out a method of " ſoftening ivory, and of changing a pebble into an " emerald by boiling, by which method ſtones which " are found fit for the purpoſe are coloured at this " day. Though he was a wiſe man who invented " theſe things, yet they were not the effect of his " wiſdom: for many things which he did we ſee per- " formed by the moſt ignorant full as well, or even " more artificially and more ſkilfully."

[H] I have read in ſome moderns that his long life was an effect of his chaſtity.] An Author, whom I have already refuted (49), aſſures us that Democritus, who was indebted for his long life of above a hundred years to honey and his exact continence, deteſted the act of love as a thing which made a man to leap out of a man. He cites Pliny, in the VI Chapter of the XXVIII Book; but you will find in Pliny only theſe words: Venerem damnavit Democritus, ut in qua homo alius exſiliret ex homine (50). Not a word, either of the vertue of honey, or of continency, with regard to the long life of Democritus. As to the honey, our modern Author might have found a witneſs; ſince Athenæus tells us that Democritus was always a great lover of honey, and was of opinion that a man to preſerve his health ſhould apply honey inwardly, and oil outwardly (51). That Philoſopher even ſeems to have promiſed a reſurrection to bodies buried in honey; for it is very likely that theſe words of Pliny, Similis & de aſſervandis corporibus hominum ac reviviſcendi promiſſa Democrito vanitas qui non revixit ipſe (52); i. e. " Such another piece of folly was " the project of preſerving the dead bodies of men, " and the bringing them to life again, deviſed by De- " mocritus, who did not come to life again himſelf," refer to a paſſage of Varro, which I am going to copy. Quare Heraclides Ponticus plus ſapit qui præcepit ut comburerent, quam Democritus qui ut in melle ſervarent: quem ſi vulgus ſecutus eſſet, peream ſi centum denariis calicem mulſi emere poſſemus (53). i. e. " For " which reaſon Heraclides Ponticus, who directed " them to be burnt, was more in the right than De- " mocritus who would have them preſerved in honey: " and if the common people had followed his advice, " a glaſs of wine mixed with honey muſt have coſt a " conſiderable ſum." But as to the other point, I know not where our modern could meet with an authority for it. Give him leave to reaſon, and he will not attain his end: if he ſays that Democritus blamed the ſport of love for no other reaſon than becauſe he found the abſtaining from it had been of ſervice to him, he will lay down a falſe principle; ſince there are a great number of people who counſel chaſtity, becauſe they feel the ſad and miſchievous conſequences of incontinence. Another Modern goes too far, when he ſays that Democritus recommended both by reaſons, and by his own example, the approaching the fair ſex but rarely. Morum præterea integritas pudicitiaque tanta, ut rationibus exemploque rarum Veneris uſum commendaret (54). He cites Pliny, and the IV Chapter of the III Book of Rodericus a Caſtro de natura Mulierum. He does not ſay what paſſage of Pliny we are to conſult; but no doubt he had in view the words which I have quoted from the VI Chapter of the XXVIII Book, wherein there is no mention of Democritus's having ſet himſelf up for an example. Roderic de Caſtro does not ſay Democritus quoted himſelf; and if he had ſaid ſo, he would be but one blind man leading another.

I do not ſay this to detract in the leaſt from the continency of Democritus: my deſign is only to make modern Writers ſenſible of the obligation they lie under to advance nothing but what they find in Authors worthy of credit. We ſhall ſee below (55) that Tertullian does not give Democritus a good teſtimony in this reſpect.

(49) Balth. Bonifacius, Hiſt. Ludicra, lib. 11. cap. 5. pag. 317.

(50) Dr. Drelincourt has directed me to two paſſages very like this: one is in Galen, Comm. III, in VI Epidemior. pag. 478, l. 7; the other in Tertullian de Anima, cap. 27. pag. 330, C. See alſo Clem. Alexandrin. lib. 2. Pædag. pag. 193, D.

(51) Athen. lib. 2. cap. 7. pag. 46.

(52) Plin. lib. 7. cap. 55.

(53) Varro, in Libro περὶ ταφῆς, apud Nonium, voce Vulgus.

(54) Magnenus, in Vita Democriti, pag. 8.

(55) In the Remark [K].

[I] It cannot be denied but that he ſed himſelf with whimſies in ſome reſpects.] Columella (56) has cited the Book which Democritus had written concerning Antipathies. It was aſſerted there, that if a woman, in the time of her courſes, walked three times round every bed, with her feet bare, and her hair looſe, ſhe would kill all the caterpillars in a garden. Sed Democritus in eo libro qui Græcè inſcribitur περὶ ἀντιπαθῶν, affirmat has ipſas beſtiolas enecari, ſi mulier, quæ in menſtruis eſt, ſolutis crinibus, & nudo pede unamquamque aream ter circumeat, poſt hoc enim decidere omnes vermiculos, & ita emori. What can ſavour more of ſuperſtition? Democritus uſed to ſay alſo, that to make a woman confeſs the truth, the tongue of a frog ſhould be applied to her heart while ſhe ſlept (57). But this tongue was to be plucked out of a live frog, and that without holding the frog by any other part (58). The frog was alſo to be put again into the water. If you would know Pliny's judgment of this device, you need only conſult the paſſage where he mentions a like vertue which was attributed to the heart of an owl. They pretended that if it was laid on a woman's left breaſt, while ſhe was aſleep, it would make her reveal all her ſecrets. Nec omittam in hac quoque alite (bubone) exemplum magicæ vanitatis: quippe præter reliqua portentoſa mendacia, cor ejus impoſitum mammæ mulieris dormientis ſiniſtræ tradunt efficere, ut omnia ſecreta pronunciet (59). Pliny calls this a magical Romance: without doubt he paſſed the ſame judgment on Democritus's ſtory, and placed it in the liſt of thoſe Romances; for immediately after he obſerves that the Magicians add ſome other things, which, if true, would make frogs of greater uſe to mankind than the laws. That animal would furniſh a never failing expedient for the putting an end to all gallantry among the women. Pliny's words are not clear enough, either with reſpect to the application of the remedy, or with reſpect to a notable circumſtance. He does not ſay whether the expedient prevented cuckoldom, or whether it only hindred a woman's perſiſting in adultery. This is no Logical diſtinction, but a matter of conſequence: every expreſſion ought to be weighed, and even the leaſt ambiguities avoided. They ought likewiſe to be avoided as to the manner of applying the expedient: but we ſhall ſee this has not been done in the paſſage of Pliny. Addunt etiamnum alia Magi, quæ ſi vera ſunt, multò utiliores vitæ exiſtimentur ranæ, quàm leges. Namque arundine transfixa natura per os, ſi ſurculus in menſtruis defigatur à marito, adulteriorum tædium fieri (60). Du Pinet has tranſlated thus: If a frog be empaled on a reed, ſpitting it through the head and the privy parts. Father Hardouïn ſuppoſes the reed to be thruſt firſt thro' the privy parts, arundine transfixa per ranæ pudenda ad os uſque. Pliny is obſcure, therefore, as to the ceremonial. I ſay nothing of the other obſcurities.

Here are other whimſies of Democritus. He ſaid that by mingling together the blood of certain birds which he named, a ſerpent would be produced of ſo wonderful a property, that whoever ſhould eat it would be able to underſtand what the birds ſaid to one another. Pliny is in the right to ridicule this chimæra, as well as the ſtory of Melampus, who it is pretended came to underſtand the language of birds, by ſerpents licking his ears. Qui credit iſta, & Melampodi profectò aures lambendo dediſſe intellectum avium ſermonis dracones non abnuet: vel quæ Democritus tradit nominando aves, quarum confuſo ſanguine ſerpens gignatur, quem quiſquis ederit, intellecturus ſit avium colloquia (61). Since he finds him ſo credulous, that he thinks he has a right to inſult him, and to applaud himſelf for not adopting ſuch fooleries, Democritus's ſtories muſt certainly have been very ſtrange ones. The Book which that Philoſopher had written concerning the Chamæleon, was, I fancy, one of the beſt magazines of his exceſſive credulity. Jungemus illis, ſays Pliny (62), ſimillima & peregrina æquè animalia: priuſque chamæleonem, peculiari volumine dignum exiſtimatum Democrito, ac per ſingula membra deſecatum, non ſine magna voluptate noſtra cognitis proditiſque mendaciis Græcæ vanitatis. i. e. " Let us add to theſe ſome other animals, which " are

(56) De Re Ruſtica, lib. 11, ſub fin.

(57) Democritus quidem tradit, ſi quis extrahat ranæ viventi linguam, nulla alia corporis parte adhærente, ipſaque dimiſſa in aquam, imponat ſupra cordis palpitationem mulieri dormienti, quæcunque interrogaverit, vera reſponſuram. Plin. lib. 32. cap. 5. pag. 846.

(58) Or rather, without any other part adhering to it.

(59) Plin. lib. 29. cap. 4.

(60) Idem, lib. 32. cap. 5.

(61) Plin. lib. 10. cap. 49. See alſo lib. 29. cap. 4.

(62) Idem, lib 28. cap. 8.

it is pretended he had a receipt to attain the underſtanding of the language of birds. They would alſo perſuade us that he was much addicted to Magic [K]; I mean that ſort

" are very like the former, and altogether as ſtrange: " and firſt the Chamæleon, which Democritus judg- " ed worthy a peculiar Treatiſe, anatomizing every " part of it, and diſcovering the abſurd impertinen- " cies of the Græcian vanity, to our great diverſion." After this ſetting out, Pliny entertains us with ſome ridiculous Extracts from that Book; and then concludes thus: Utinam eo ramo contactus eſſet Democritus, quoniam ita loquacitates immodicas promiſit inhiberi: palamque eſt virum alias ſagacem & vitæ utiliſſimum nimio juvandi mortales ſtudio prolapſum (63). i. e. " I wiſh Democritus had himſelf been touched with " that wonderful bough, ſince he has aſſured us that " it had the vertue to ſtop immoderate loquacity: it " being manifeſt that he, who was otherwiſe a wiſe " man, and of great uſe to human ſociety, has loſt " himſelf through a too eager deſire of ſerving man- " kind." We ſhall ſee ſome other paſſages in the following Remark.

(63) Ibid.

Pliny is to be commended for having mentioned the pretended ſecret vertues of the Chamæleon in order only to explode and ridicule them: but he would have deſerved yet greater commendation if he had kept a part of his incredulity for Democritus; I mean, if he had not too lightly believed that Philoſopher to be the Author of that Work, and of ſeveral others which went injuriouſly under his name. The thought of Aulus Gellius ſeems to me very reaſonable; that Democritus was not the Author of thoſe ſtories about the Chamæleon, and the underſtanding the language of birds; but that certain mountebanks had ſkreened themſelves under the authority of that famous Philoſopher. Librum eſſe Democriti nobiliſſimi Philoſophorum de vi & natura chamæleontis; eumque ſe legiſſe Plinius Secundus in naturalis hiſtoriæ viceſimo octavo refert; multaque vana atque intoleranda auribus deinde quaſi à Democrito ſcripta tradit. . . . . His portentis atque præſtigiis à Plinio Secundo ſcriptis non dignum eſſe cognomen Democriti puto. . . . . Multa autem videntur ab hominibus iſtis malè ſollertibus hujuſcemodi commenta in Democriti nomen data, nobilitatis auctoritatiſque ejus perfugio utentibus (64). We cannot avoid making this judgment, when we conſider the character which Lucian has given him. He places Democritus, Epicurus, and Metrodorus, in the rank of thoſe Free-thinkers whoſe ſouls are ſteeled againſt thoſe who would perſuade them to credit prodigies. According to him, Democritus was always of opinion that miracle-mongers do nothing but by artifice: he endeavoured to diſcover the method by which they deceived, and if he failed therein, he notwithſtanding believed the whole to be nothing but impoſture. Ὥστε παῦτο τὸ μηχάνημα ἐδεῖτο Δημοκρίτου τινὸς . . . . ἀδαμαντίνην πρὸς ταῦτα καὶ τὰ τοιαῦτα τὴν γνώμην ἔχοντος· ὡς ἀπίστησαι. Ut res planè Democritum aliquem requireret . . . . qui adverſus hæc & ſimilia mentem haberet adamantinam ut non crederet, &c (65).

(64) Aulus Gellius, lib. 10. cap. 12.

(65) Lucianus, in Pſeudom. pag. 873, tom. 1.

[K] They would perſuade us he was much addicted to Magic.] This does by no means agree with the Ideas of Lucian which have been juſt now mentioned. However it be, it is fit we ſhould hear Pliny (66): Certè Pythagoras, Empedocles, Democritus, Plato ad hanc (Magicen) diſcendam navigavere, exſiliis verius, quam peregrinationibus, ſuſceptis. Hanc reverſi prædicavere, hanc in arcanis habuere. Democritus Apollobechem Coptiten, & Dardanum è Phœnice illuſtravit: voluminibus Dardani in ſepulchrum ejus petitis: ſuis (67) verò ex diſciplina eorum editis: quæ recepta ab aliis hominum, atque tranſiiſſe per memoriam, æquè ac nihil in vita, mirandum eſt. In tantum fides iſtis faſque omne deeſt, adeo ut ii qui cætera in viro illo probant, hæc ejus eſſe opera inficientur. Sed fruſtra. Hunc enim maximè affixiſſe animis eam dulcedinem conſtat. Plenumque miraculi & hoc, pariter utraſque artes efflo- ruiſſe: Medicinam dico, Magicenque, eadem ætate illam Hippocrate, hanc Democrito illuſtrantibus. i. e. " It is " certain that Pythagoras, Empedocles, Democritus, " and Plato went into foreign parts to learn Magic; " and may rather be ſaid to have gone into voluntary " baniſhment, than to have undertaken to travel. " This was the ſcience they boaſted of at their return, " and repreſented as a great myſtery. Democritus has " explained the Writings of Apollobeches of Coptos, " and Dardanus the Phœnician; the Writings of " Dardanus being depoſited in his tomb, his own " (67) which he had compiled from their doctrine " were publiſhed: and it is ſurprizing beyond any " thing in life to me, that they have been handed " down and preſerved to us; ſince they are ſo en- " tirely deſtitute of truth or probability, that they " who approve of the man in other reſpects, deny " theſe Works to be his. But in vain. For it is cer- " tain his mind was prodigiouſly fond of thoſe agree- " able deluſions. This likewiſe is very wonder- " ful, that both arts ſhould ſhoot up at once; I mean " Phyſic, and Magic; the former being explained " by Hippocrates, and the latter by Democritus, in " the ſame age." I have ſet down the paſſage ſomewhat at length, in order to inform the Reader, 1, that the favourers of Democritus have always denied that he wrote the Books of Magic which were aſcribed to him; 2, that Pliny maintained in oppoſition to them that they were juſtly attributed to him. Let us go on to another paſſage of Pliny (68): In promiſſo herbarum mirabilium occurrit aliqua dicere & de magicis: quæ enim mirabiliores ſunt? Primi eas in noſtro orbe celebravere Pythagoras atque Democritus conſectati magos. i. e. " In the promiſed account of ſome won- " derful herbs ſomething may be ſaid of thoſe made " uſe of in Magical operations: for what herbs are " more wonderful? The firſt who diſcourſed of them " in our parts of the world, were Pythagoras and " Democritus, in imitation of the Magi." A little after he obſerves that ſome people would not allow certain Books aſcribed to thoſe two great men to be the production of their pens; and here is what he ſays in anſwer. Nec me fallit hoc volumen ejus à quibuſdam Cleemporo Medico adſcribi: Pythagoræ pertinax fama antiquitaſque vindicavit. Et id ipſum auctoritatem voluminibus affert (69), ſi quis alius curæ ſuæ opus illo viro dignum judicavit: quod feciſſe Cleemporum cum alia ſuo & nomine ederet, quis credat? Democriti certè chirocmeta eſſe conſtat. At in his ille poſt Pythagoram magorum ſtudioſiſſimus quanto portentoſiora tradit? i. e. " Nor am I ignorant that this Book of his is by ſome " attributed to Cleemporus the Phyſician: but con- " ſtant fame and antiquity have both adjudged it to " Pythagoras. And this very thing is a further ar- " gument the Books are genuine (69); for who can " believe that Cleemporus, when he publiſhed other " things under his own name, would not have done " the ſame by a Work of his which he judged wor- " thy of ſo great a man? The Chirocmeta is un- " doubtedly Democritus's. But how much more por- " tentous things are delivered in that Treatiſe by the " latter, who was the greateſt admirer of the Magi " next to Pythagoras?"

(68) Plin. lib. 24. cap. 17.

(69) This is a weak reaſon; for how many ſilly Books go under celebrated names, and eſpecially on the ſubject of Magic?

Before I go any farther, I ſhall dwell a little on the Title of the Work juſt now mentioned by Pliny. Salmaſius luckily diſcovered that this Book ought not to be intitled Chirocineta: for which reaſon he has corrected that word which was in the Editions of Pliny, and ſhewed that Chirocmeta ſhould be put in its place. He has at the ſame time corrected a paſſage of Vitruvius, where mention is made of the ſame Work of Democritus: Multas res attendens, ſays Vitruvius (70), admiror etiam Democriti de rerum natura volumina, & ejus commentarium quod inſcribitur χειροκμητων, in quo utebatur annulo ſignans cera molli quæ eſſet expertus. i. e. " In taking notice of many things, I alſo ad- " mire Democritus's Books of the nature of things, " and his Commentary intitled Chirocmeta, wherein " he ſealed with ſoft wax thoſe things which he had " himſelf experienced the truth of." We read before in Vitruvius χειροτονητον in quo etiam utebatur annulo ſignans cera ex millio quæ eſſet expertus. Salmaſius, on the ſame principle, corrects that paſſage of Diogenes Laertius, where it is ſaid that Democritus wrote χερικὰ ἢ φυσικὰ προβλήματα. It ſhould be χειρόμητα ἢ φυσικὰ προβλήματα (71). Caſaubon's Criticiſm had gone no farther than to conjecture that the fault in Diogenes Laertius might be amended by the Chirocineta of Pliny (72). But this would have been to expel one diſeaſe by another. They who are of opinion that the word Chirocineta ſhould be left in Pliny, explain it according

Some Remarks concerning the Book intitled Chirocmeta.

(70) Vitruv. lib. 9. cap. 3.

(71) See Salmaſ. in Exercit. Plinianis, pag. 1100, 1101.

(72) Caſaubon. in Laert. lib. 9. num. 49.

(67) Father Hardouin in this place quotes Clemens Alexandrinus, l. 1. Stromat. pag. 303. who ſays Democritus explained a pillar of Acicari a Babylonian Author, and inſerted that Explication in his Writings.

fort of Magic which is founded on a compact with the Devil. I do not think he was ſuch a viſionary as to put out his own eyes [L], as ſome have aſſerted. The manner in which cording to their own fancy: ſome ſay that Title ſignified that the Work was to be handled often (73); and others think it was ſo intitled, becauſe it was to be handled with great ceremony (74). Heſychius wonderfully confirms the Corrections of Salmaſius; for he acquaints us that the Critics uſed to put a piece of wax on thoſe places of a Work which ſeemed to them obſcure, and to deſerve further examination. There is a ſtrong objection remaining. If the Chirocmeta of Democritus was a Work wherein he had ſet his ſeal on all the things which he had ſpoken of from experience, how came it to be ſtuffed with ſo many fables, and ſo many ridiculous and ſuperſtitious ſtories? Pliny is not ſatisfied with characterizing it in general by theſe words: In his Democritus poſt Pythagoram magorum ſtudioſiſſimus quanto portentoſiora tradit? but cites ſeveral things out of it which ſavour of the black Art.

(73) Nec melius interpretantur ita dicta quod aſſidue manibus tractanda eſſent. Salmaſius, Exercit. Plinian. pag. 1100, C.

(74) Du Pinet, in the Margin of his French Tranſlation of Pliny.

I find great perplexity in all this, and I do not ſee a better expedient than the NON LIQUET, or the ἐπέχω, i. e. the ſuſpenſion of aſſent, of the Sceptics. It may be Democritus, without examining the conſequences of his Syſtem too nearly, hoped to diſcover ſeveral occult qualities, and the art of performing a thouſand extraordinary things by the help of Magic. This being once allowed, we may imagine that he greedily read all Books of Magic, and compiled the pretended wonders he had ſeen therein, and alſo thoſe which he might have learned by word of mouth. He might have made ſome ſurprizing experiments of the vertue of certain herbs, and have marked with his ſeal the page of his Chirocmeta, in which he ſet down his experiments. This Book might be ſo intitled, though the greater part of the things it contained had not been approved by the Author's ſeal, and ſo nothing hinders but Pliny might have found a great many fables in it. This is one way of accounting for the matter: but it does not ſeem to me to be the beſt. I ſhould rather ſay that Democritus did not compoſe the ſuperſtitious, fabulous, and magical Writings, which went under his name. Diogenes Laertius having given a long Catalogue of the Works of this Philoſopher, adds that ſeveral others were falſly aſcribed to him (75). Columella (76) owns it with regard to a certain Book the true Author of which was named Dolus (77) Mendeſius. It ſeems Suidas gives but a ſmall number of Books for the true Works of Democritus. We have ſeen above the complaint made by Aulus Gellius. Laſtly, we may ſay that if Diogenes Laertius has not rejected more of them, this only proves that there were Forgers, who ſoon after Democritus's death, publiſhed ſeveral Treatiſes under his name: they were taken for his legitimate iſſue, and ſucceeding ages conformed to that opinion: this was enough for Pliny (78), and Diogenes Laertius (79), to receive thoſe Works as the genuine productions of Democritus. And what made people ſo eaſily impoſed on at firſt, was that the exceſſive curioſity of that Philoſopher, his love for ſolitude, his application in making experiments, and the ſucceſs of ſome of his predictions, eaſily perſuaded them he had left in writing all the ſecrets, and all the remarks, which were to be found in the Books that appeared under his name.

(75) Diog. Laert. in ejus Vita, ſub fin.

(76) Columell. de Re Ruſtica, lib. 7. cap. 5.

(77) Or rather Bolus, according to Suidas.

(78) Pythagoræ pertinax fama antiquitaſque vindicant. It is the proof which Pliny makes uſe of, lib. 24. cap. 17.

(79) The Works which he rejects are thoſe which had been rejected by common conſent, ὁμολογουμένως ἐστὶν ἀλλότρια, omnino aliena conſenſu omnium ſunt.

Petronius teſtifies that Democritus ſpent his life in making experiments on Vegetables and Minerals: Omnium herbarum ſuccos Democritus expreſſit: & ne lapidum virgultorumque vis lateret, ætatem inter experimenta conſumpſit. i. e. "Democritus extracted the "the juice of every herb; and left the vertues of "ſtones and plants ſhould lie undiſcovered, he ſpent "his whole life in experiments." They ſay, that foreſeeing it would be a bad year for olives, he bought a great quantity of oil at a low price, by which he got an immenſe profit; but he would not take advantage of it, contenting himſelf with making it appear that he could be rich if he pleaſed. They wondred that a man, who had never ſeemed to mind any thing but his ſtudies, ſhould on a ſudden concern himſelf in trade: who doubts but when the reaſon was known, a great many people took him for a Magician? Others thought him worthy of divine honours. Ὡς δὲ προειπών τινα τῶν μελλόντων εὐδοκίμησε, λοιπὸν ἐνθέου δόξης παρὰ τοῖς πλείοσι ἠξιώθη (80). Ubi vero futura quædam prædixerat, ſequenſque rerum eventus fidem fecerat, divinis jam honoribus dignus à pleriſque judicatus eſt. Here is the paſſage which proves this traffic, and the conſequence of it. Ferunt Democritum, qui primus intellexit, oſtenditque cum terris cœli ſocietatem, ſpernentibus hanc curam ejus opulentiſſimis civium, præviſa olei caritate ex futuro Vergiliarum ortu, qua diximus ratione, oſtendemuſque jam plenius, magna tum vilitate propter ſpem olivæ, coëmiſſe in toto tractu omne oleum (81), mirantibus qui paupertatem & quietem doctrinarum ei ſciebant in primis cordi eſſe. Atque ut apparuit cauſa, & ingens divitiarum curſus, reſtituiſſe mercedem anxiæ & avidæ dominorum pœnitentiæ, contentum ita probaſſe, opes ſibi in facili, cum vellet, fore (82). Another time he adviſed his brother Damaſus on a very hot day to employ his reapers only in carrying into the barn the corn which they had already cut down. He foreſaw a furious ſtorm, which happened quickly after. Tradunt eundem Democritum mentente fratre ejus Damaſo ardentiſſimo æſtu oraſſe ut reliquæ ſegeti parceret, raperetque deſecta ſub tectum, paucis mox horis ſævo imbre vaticinatione approbata (83). I have heard that a Gentleman of Normandy, knowing by the Barometer that it would rain ſoon, got his hay in while it was very fair weather. This made the country people in the neighbourhood ſay that he dealt with the Devil, ſince he could ſo ſeaſonably foretel the change of the weather for his own intereſt. Were they leſs raſh in judging ill of their neighbours in the age of Democritus? Were not the ſecrets of nature in the hands of an incomparably leſs number of people than they are at preſent? Democritus, therefore, was more liable to be ſuſpected of Magic, than he would be at this day.

(80) Diogenes Laert. lib. 9. num. 39.

(81) Cicero, lib. 1. de Divinatione, cap. 3. Ariſtotle, lib. 1. Politic. cap. 7. and Diogenes Laertius, in Thalete, attribute this to Thales; but with this difference, that Thales bought the oil which was to be made that year, according to Cicero, and the oil-preſſes according to Ariſtotle and Diogenes Laertius. See Father Hardouin on this paſſage of Pliny, and Mr. Menage on Laertius, lib. 1. num. 26.

(82) Plin. lib. 18. cap. 28.

(83) Idem, lib. 18. cap. 35.

I ſhall obſerve occaſionally, that in my opinion Salmaſius refutes Solinus but ill, concerning the conteſts of Democritus with the Magi. Solinus pretends that Philoſopher made uſe of the ſtone Catochites againſt them with good ſucceſs. Accipimus Democritum Abderiten oſtentatione ſcrupuli hujus frequenter uſum ad probandam occultam naturæ potentiam in certaminibus quæ contra magos habuit (84). i. e. "I have heard that "Democritus of Abdera frequently ſhewed the effect "of this pebble, to prove the occult power of na"ture in the diſputes he had with the Magi." Salmaſius (85) oppoſes to Solinus ſeveral paſſages of Pliny, which, as has been ſeen in this Remark, teſtify that Democritus was very much attached to the Magicians. But who told Salmaſius there is no emulation among thoſe people? Is it not very probable that they contend for reputation? Is not this confirmed by our Dæmonographical Writers? Do they not tell us there are Magicians who can undo what the others do? It is plain that Jannes and Jambres, who withſtood Moſes (86), took him for a Magician. So Democritus might for a conſiderable time be the humble follower of the Magicians, and then, when he thought he knew as much or more than the others, he might thwart thoſe he met with, in order to raiſe his own reputation above them.

(84) Solin. cap. 3. ſub fin.

(85) Salmaſ. in Exercit. Plinian. pag. 98, 99.

(86) 2 Tim. iii. 8.

[L] I do not think he was ſuch a Viſionary as to put out his own eyes.] Several Authors relate this ſilly ſtory. The reaſon which is moſt commonly given why he did ſo, is that he hoped to meditate more profoundly, when the objects of the ſight ſhould not divert the intellectual powers of his mind (87). Democritum Philoſophum in monumentis hiſtoriæ Græcæ ſcriptum eſt . . . . luminibus oculorum ſua ſponte ſe privaſſe, quia exiſtimaret cogitationes commentationeſque animi ſui in contemplandis naturæ rationibus vegetiores & exactiores fore, ſi eas videndi illecebris, & oculorum impedimentis liberaſſet (88). Was it not enough for him to ſhut himſelf up in a dark place, or to keep his eyes ſhut during the time of his meditation? Laberius, in a Dramatic Piece, feigns that this Philoſopher blinded himſelf, that his ſight might be no longer ſhocked by the proſperity of the wicked: Laberius, I ſay, feigns this for no other reaſon, than becauſe

(87) Cicero, de Finit. lib. 5. cap. 29. neither affirms the fact nor denies it: if he had owned it he would never have found out his reaſon for it.

(88) Aulus Gellius, lib. 12. cap. 17.

which he comforted Darius is ingenious enough [M]. He is excuſable for having laughed at human life in general [N]: and it was better to do that than to imitate Heraclitus, who wept eternally. He was the forerunner of Epicurus [O]; for the Syſtem of the latter differs from that of Democritus no otherwiſe than on account of ſome improvements. It is Democritus alſo who has furniſhed the Sceptics with all they have ſaid againſt the teſtimony of the ſenſes; for beſides that he uſed to ſay truth was hidden at the bottom of a well, he maintained there was nothing real but atoms and vacuum, and that all the reſt conſiſted only in opinion (e). This is what the Carteſians ſay at this day of corporeal qualities, as colour, ſmell, ſound, ſavour, heat, cold: theſe, ſay they, are only modifications of the ſoul. Democritus was nothing leſs than Orthodox concerning the divine nature [P], and he believed that our ultimate end is the tranquillity of the mind. Plato hated becauſe the Hypotheſis was convenient for him to ſupport the character he had undertaken. He even explained how Democritus deprived himſelf of ſight; it was, ſaid he, by expoſing himſelf to the light reflected by a ſhield (89). Cauſam voluntariæ cæcitatis finxit aliam (Laberius) (90) vertitque in eam rem quam tum agebat, non inconcinniter. Eſt enim perſona, quæ hæc apud Laberium dicit, divitis avari & parci ſumtum plurimum aſotiamque adoleſcentis viri deplorantis.

(e) Laert. lib. 9. num. 44. Sext. Empiricus, adverſ. Mathemat. pag. 163. See above the Citation (62) of the Article of ARCESILAUS.

(89) Idem, lib. 10. cap. 17.

(90) In mimo quem ſcripſit Reſtionem. Idem, ibid.

Democritus Abderites phyſicus philoſophus
Clypeum conſtituit contra exortum Hyperionis,
Oculos effodere ut poſſet ſplendore æreo.
Ita radiis ſolis aciem effodit luminis,
Malis bene eſſe ne videret civibus.
Sic ego fulgentis ſplendorem pecuniæ
Volo elucificare exitum ætati meæ;
Ne in re bona eſſe videam nequam filium.

" Laberius feigned another cauſe of his voluntary " blindneſs, and turned it very ingeniouſly to the ſub- " ject he had then in hand. For he introduces a perſon " under the character of a rich miſer, who laments " the prodigality and debauchery of his ſon in theſe " words:

" When virtue griev'd and vice triumphant rode,
" Abdera's Sage with indignation glow'd:
" His honeſt heart was mov'd; with eager haſte
" Full in the ſun a beamy ſhield he plac'd;
" Then, from ſuch ſights to free his troubl'd mind,
" Catch'd the full blaze, and as he look'd grew blind.
" So ſhall my gold, the Rival of its fire,
" Pour on theſe eyes an everlaſting fire
" Till ſight be loſt; for I will never bear
" To ſee it ſquander'd by a wanton heir."

Plutarch had heard it reported that Democritus made uſe of burning Glaſſes, on which he ſtedfaſtly fixed his eyes, in order to remove an obſtacle of his meditation: Ὅθεν ἰκτῖνο μὲν ψεῦδός ἐϛι τὸ Δημόκριτον ἐκθσῖαι σβέσαι τὰς ὄψεις ἀπερειδόμενον εἰς ἔσοπτρα πυρωθέντα καὶ τὴν ἀπ' αὐτῶν ἀνάκλασιν δεξάμενον. Equidem falſum eſt quod dicitur Democritum ſponte ſua oculos extinxiſſe in ignitum ſpeculum eos defigentem luminiſque reflexionem accipientem (91). But he rejects this ſtory as a Fable. The Author of the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, having mentioned the reaſon which, according to Laberius, induced that Philoſopher to blind himſelf, adds; " Others ſay that he put out his eyes to me- " ditate with leſs diſtraction. This is more probable, " though perhaps it is full as falſe; for what likeli- " hood is there that Democritus, who laughed at " every thing, ſhould make the proſperity of a wic- " ked man the ſubject of vexation? This ſhould ra- " ther be matter of ſport and diverſion for a Philo- " ſopher like him, who made it his buſineſs to turn " all the world to ridicule (92)." He might by that means have ſed himſelf with an imaginary triumph over Religion (93). Tertullian alledges another reaſon for our Philoſopher's conduct. He pretends that Democritus could neither look on a woman without wiſhing to enjoy her, nor miſs enjoying her without vexing and fretting himſelf. He could find no better remedy, therefore, againſt this perſecution, than to deprive himſelf of ſight. Tertullian draws from thence matter of great triumph for the faithful over the Pagan Sages. Democritus excæcando ſemetipſum, quod mulieres ſine concupiſcentia aſpicere non poſſet, & doleret ſi non eſſet potitus, incontinentiam emendatione profitetur (94). This is a very imaginary triumph; for what we moſt certainly know concerning Democritus utterly overthrows Tertullian's ſuppoſition. He was a man diſengaged from the pleaſures of ſenſe, given to meditation, who deſpiſed honours and riches, and travelled till he was fourſcore (95). But a man ſcarce thinks of travelling into far countries when he is blind; and if thoſe who are above fourſcore had any occaſion to put out their eyes, it would not be becauſe the ſight of women kindles in them the fire of love. A deſire attended with the regret of not enjoying, is not cured by the privation of ſight: the lewdneſs of the heart requires a different remedy. Clemens Alexandrinus ſays a thing which, if taken right, invincibly refutes Tertullian; I have mentioned it in the body of this Article towards the end. But here are that Father's own words: Δημόκριτος δὲ γάμου καὶ παιδοποιΐαν παραιτῆται, διὰ τὰς πολλὰς ἐξ αὐτῶν ἀσχολίας τε καὶ ἀφολκὰς ἀπὸ τῶν ἀναγκαιοτέρων. Democritus autem repudiat matrimonium & procreationem liberorum propter multas, quæ ex ipſis oriuntur, moleſtias, & quod abſtrahant ab iis quæ ſunt magis neceſſaria (96). i. e. " Democritus rejected marriage and the procreation of " children, on account of the many troubles which " ariſe thence, and becauſe they take a man off from " things of greater conſequence."

(91) Plut. de Curioſitate, pag. 521, C.

(92) Nouv. de la Repub. des Lettres, for the month of Feb. 1686, pag. 155.

(93) Quare religio pedibus ſubjecta viciſſim Obteritur, nos exæquat victoria cœlo. i. e. " Thus by his " conqueſt we " our right re- " gain; " Religion he " ſubdu'd, and " We now " reign." Lucret. lib. 1. ver. 79.

(94) Tertullian. in Apolog. cap. 46.

(95) He ſays it himſelf, apud Clem. Alexand. Stromat. lib. 1. pag. 304, & apud Euſebium Præpar. lib. 10. cap. 4. pag. m. 472.

(96) Clem. Alex. Stromat. lib. 2. pag. 421.

[M] The manner in which he comforted Darius is ingenious enough.] I do not relate it, becauſe it may be read in Moreri, and in an Author whoſe Works are to be had every where (97). The latter has embroidered it a little. As he cites nobody, I ſhall ſupply that omiſſion. I ſay, therefore, that the ſtory is to be found only in a Letter of the Emperor Julian.

(97) La Mothe le Vayer, tom. 8. pag. 340. See alſo Father Garaſſe, Doctrine Curieuſe, pag. 297.

[N] He is excuſable for having laughed at human life in general.] On this head ſee Montagne (98), quoted by the Author of the New Letters againſt Father Maimbourg's Hiſtory of Calviniſm (99).

(98) Eſſais, liv. 1. chap. 50.

(99) Letter 21. pag. 715.

[O] He was the forerunner of Epicurus.] I cannot come into the opinion of thoſe who ſay that the few innovations which were ſeen in the Syſtem of Democritus, after it had been adopted by Epicurus, were ſo many depravations (100). But I own that Epicurus did not add many things to it, and that he ſpoiled ſome. Quid eſt in Phyſicis Epicuri non à Democrito? Nam etſi quædam commutavit, ut quod paulo ante de inclinatione atomorum dixi, tamen pleraque dicit eadem, atomos, inane, imagines, infinitatem locorum, innumerabilitatemque mundorum, eorum ortus & interitus, omnia ferè quibus naturæ ratio continetur . . . . (101). Democritus vir magnus in primis cujus fontibus Epicurus hortulos ſuos irrigavit (102). i. e. " What is there " in the Natural Philoſophy of Epicurus which is not " borrowed from Democritus? For tho' he altered " ſome things, as what I mentioned before, for in- " ſtance, concerning the inclination of Atoms, yet " his ſyſtem is for the moſt part the ſame, holding " atoms, vacuum, images, infinity of ſpace, and in- " numerable worlds, their formation and diſſolution, " and almoſt every thing in the œconomy of nature " . . . Democritus, one of the greateſt men that ever " was, from whoſe ſprings Epicurus watered his own " little gardens." He did himſelf a prejudice in not acknowledging the obligations he had to Democritus, and by calling him a dotard, or dealer in trifles, λῆρόκριτον, nugarum cenſor. This was one of his quibbles.

(100) See Cicero, lib. 1. de Finibus, cap. 5, and 6.

(101) Cicero, de Nat. Deor. lib. 1. cap. 12, 26, 43.

(102) Ibid. cap. 33. See alſo Plutarch, adverſus Colotem, pag. 1108.

[P] He was nothing leſs than orthodox concerning the divine nature.] If he had only taught that God was a Spirit placed in a ſphere of fire, and the ſoul of the world (103), he would have been a hundred times more excuſable than he is; but I find other dogms much more dangerous are attributed to him in the hated him, and was very near burning all the Books of Democritus [Q]. This, methinks, did leſs injury than honour to the latter. The Atomical Syſtem is not near ſo abſurd Books of Cicero. Quid? Democritus qui tum imagines, earumque circuitus in Deorum numero refert, cum illam naturam quæ imagines fundat ac mittat, tum ſcientiam intelligentiamque noſtram, nonne in maximo errore verſatur? cumque idem omnino quia nihil ſemper ſuo ſtatu maneat, neget eſſe quicquam ſempiternum, nonne Deum ita tollit omnino ut nullam opinionem ejus reliquam faciat (104)? i. e. "Was not Democritus in "an egregious error, who taught that the images of "objects which preſent themſelves on every ſide, and "alſo the nature which ſcatters round or emits ſuch "images, and even our own knowledge and percep"tion, were to be reckoned among the Gods? And "when the ſame Philoſopher denies any thing to be "eternal, becauſe nothing remains perpetually in the "ſame ſtate, does he not deſtroy the very idea of a "God?" Theſe are the dogms which Velleius, one of the Interlocutors in Cicero, attributes to Democritus: they are ſuch, that whoever embraces them may be truly affirmed to be in the condition of him who ſaid, (104) Cicero, de Natura Deor. lib. 1. cap. 12, and 38.

(103) Νοῦν μὲν γὰρ εἶναι τὸν Θεὸν ἰσχυρίζεται καὶ αὐτὸς (Δημόκριτος) πλὴν ἐν πυρὶ σφαιροειδεῖ, καὶ αὐτὸν εἶναι τὴν τοῦ κόσμου ψυχήν. Cyrillus contra Julian. lib. 1. This is taken from Plutarch, de Plac. Philoſoph. lib. 1. cap. 7. pag. 881, D. where he ſays Δημόκριτος νοῦν τὸν Θεὸν ἐμπυρειδῆ, τὴν τοῦ κόσμου ψυχήν. Democritus mentem Deum in igne globoſo, mundi animam.

O Jupiter, car de toi rien ſinon
Je ne conois ſeulement que le nom (105).

(105) See Amiot's Plutarch, in the Treatiſe of Love, chap. 12.

"O Jupiter! for thy name is all I know of thee."

For the nature which Democritus called God, had neither the unity, nor eternity, nor immutability, nor other attributes which are eſſential to the divine nature. He laviſhly beſtowed the name of God on the images and ideas of objects, and on the act of our underſtanding by which we know objects. I dare ſay that this error, as groſs as it is, will never be that of a little genius, and that none but men of great parts are able to produce it. I do not know whether any body has ever taken notice that the opinion of one of the moſt ſublime wits of this age, That we ſee all things in the infinite Being, in God, is no more than the doctrine of Democritus, unfolded and amended. Take notice, in particular, that Democritus taught that the images of objects, thoſe images I ſay which are ſcattered around, or which turn every way to preſent themſelves to our ſenſes, are emanations of God, and are themſelves a God; and that the actual idea of our mind, is a God. Is there any great difference between this opinion and ſaying that our ideas are in God, as Father Mallebranche aſſerts, and that they cannot be the modification of a created mind? Does it not follow thence that our ideas are God himſelf? For our ideas and our knowledge may eaſily paſs for the ſame thing. Notwithſtanding Cicero makes one of his Interlocutors inſiſt, that theſe opinions of Democritus are worthy a native of Abdera (106), that is to ſay, a fool and a blockhead; I am ſure a little genius will never form them. In order to form them a man muſt comprehend the whole extent of power, which belongs to a nature capable of painting in our mind the images of objects. The intentional ſpecies of ſchool-men are the diſgrace of the Peripatetics: a man muſt be I know not what to be able to perſuade himſelf that a tree produces its image in all the parts of the air around it, even to the brain of an infinite number of ſpectators. The cauſe which produces theſe images is quite a different thing from a tree. Search after it as much as you pleaſe; if you find it on this ſide the infinite Being, it is a ſign you do not well underſtand the matter. I do not deny but theſe dogms of Democritus are at the bottom very abſurd. St. Auguſtin has ſolidly refuted them, and ſhewn us a difference between Democritus and Epicurus which few Authors mention. He obſerves that according to Democritus there was in the Atoms either an animated or ſpiritual vertue, which made the images of objects participate of the divine nature, or at leaſt a ſoul capable of doing us good or hurt; but Epicurus acknowledged nothing but the nature of atoms or corpuſcles in its principles. Democritus hoc diſtare in naturalibus quæſtionibus ab Epicuro dicitur, quòd iſte ſentit, ineſſe concurſioni atomorum vim quandam animalem & ſpiritalem: quâ vi eum, credo, & imaginas ipſas divinitate præditas dicere, non omnes omnium rerum, ſed deorum, & principia mentis eſſe in univerſis, quibus divinitatem tribuit; & animantes imagines, quæ vel prodeſſe nobis ſoleant, vel nocere: Epicurus verò neque aliquid in principiis rerum ponit, præter atomos (107). I do not know whether St. Auguſtin has well underſtood the Text of Cicero which he paraphraſes. He would be excuſable if he did not underſtand him; for Cicero has not explained himſelf very clearly. However it be, here is a part of St. Auguſtin's paraphraſe: Quanto melius ne audiſſem quidem nomen Democriti, quàm cum dolore cogitarem, neſcio quem, ſuis temporibus magnum putatum, qui deos eſſe arbitraretur imagines, quæ de ſolidis corporibus fluerent, ſolidæque ipſæ non eſſent, eaſque hac atque hac motu proprio circumeundo atque illabendo in animas hominum facere, ut vis divina cogitetur; cùm profectò illud corpus, unde imago flueret, quanto ſolidius eſt, tanto præſtantius quoque eſſe judicetur? Ideoque fluctuavit, ſicut iſti dicunt, nutavitque ſententia, ut aliquandò naturam quandam, ac qua fluerent imagines, DEUM eſſe diceret; qui tamen cogitari non poſſet; niſi per eas imagines, quas fundit ac emittit, id eſt, quæ de illa natura, quam, neſcio quam, corpoream & ſempiternam, ac etiam per hoc divinam, putat, quaſi vaporis ſimilitudine continuâ velut emanatione ferrentur, & venirent atque intrarent in animas noſtras, ut Deum vel Deos cogitare poſſemus (108). i. e. "How much better would it "have been that I had never ſo much as heard the "name of Democritus, than that I ſhould with grief "reflect that a certain perſon, reputed a great man in "his time, ſhould fancy the images which flow from "ſolid bodies, and are not themſelves ſolid, to be "Gods, and that theſe, by a peculiar motion, wind"ing this way and that, and inſinuating themſelves "into men's minds, ſhould be taken for a divine "power; when the body from whence the image "flows, by how much the more ſolid it is, ought to "be judged by ſo much the more excellent? There"fore he fluctuated, as they ſay, and wavered in his "opinion, ſometimes ſaying that a certain nature, "from whence images flowed, was GOD; but after "what manner it is impoſſible to conceive, unleſs "thoſe images which it pours forth or emits, that is, "which ariſe like a vapour with a continual emana"tion from that nature, which he imagines to be "ſomething corporeal and eternal, and for that rea"ſon divine, ſhould come and enter into our minds, "and give us an idea of a God or Gods." See the margin (109).

(107) Auguſtin. Epiſt. 56. pag. m. 273.

(108) Idem, ibid.

(109) We ſhall ſee in the Remark [E] of the Article LEUCIPPUS a paſſage of Plutarch, which will inform us that Democritus ſeems to have attributed ſome ſenſation to Atoms.

[Q] Plato was very near burning all the Books of Democritus.] He collected them diligently, and was going to throw them into the fire, when two Pythagorean Philoſophers repreſented to him that it would be to no purpoſe, becauſe ſeveral perſons had already furniſhed themſelves with them. The hatred Plato bore Democritus appears from this; that having mentioned almoſt all the ancient Philoſophers, he has never cited him, not even in thoſe paſſages where his deſign was to contradict him. Diogenes Laertius, who ſays this, adds that it was an artful piece of policy; ſince it prevented people from perceiving that Plato contradicted the moſt excellent of all the Philoſophers. The Hiſtorian perhaps would have better hit the mark, if he had made uſe of the thought which Mr. Salo employed when he made the Extract of a certain Book (110). Fault has been found, ſays he (111), with this Cardinal for diſcovering that his principal deſign is to ſhew all the faults in Fra. Paolo, and for naming that Author in almoſt every chapter of his Book. It is ſaid that Baronius acted with a great deal more policy. For tho' he had undertaken his Annals to combate the hereſies and falſhoods of the Centuriators of Magdeburgh, yet he took particular care not to contradict them openly in his Book, but has written his Hiſtory plainly and ſimply, without naming them at all, otherwiſe than by the general appellations of Heretics and Innovators. And the reaſon which induced him to act in that manner, was that he judged the leſs he ſaid of them the better; for fear of exciting the curioſity of mankind, and raiſing a deſire to ſee a Book which it is always dangerous to read. Whereas in the method Cardinal Palavicini has taken, his Book can neither be read nor underſtood without reading that of Fra. Paolo. And then there is ſome danger leſt that Hiſtory, which is extremely well

(110) The Hiſtory of the Council of Trent, by Cardinal Palavicini.

(111) Journal des Savans of the 23d of March 1665.

(106) Democritus ... tum cenſet imagines divinitate præditas ineſſe univerſitati rerum: tum principia mentesque quæ ſunt in eodem univerſo Deos eſſe dicit: tum animantes imagines, quæ vel prodeſſe nobis ſolent vel nocere: tum ingentes quaſdam imagines, tantaſque ut univerſum mundum complectantur extrinſecus. Quæ quidem omnia ſunt patria Democriti quam Democrito dignior. Cicero, de Nat. Deorum, lib. 1. cap. 38.

abſurd as Spinoziſm [R]: but it is pleaſant enough to ſay, with Moreri, that according to Democritus the Atoms were infinite in magnitude; for, on the contrary, they were of an inconceivable ſmallneſs. We ſhall obſerve in the Remark [K] that a great many Books were handed about under his name, which were none of his. We ſhould ſee clearer in this matter, if we had the Treatiſe of Callimachus (g), and the Treatiſe of Thraſyllus concerning his Works (h). I do not know whether the Sieur Peter Borel (i), who had promiſed three Volumes in folio, De Vita & Philoſophia Democriti (of the Life and Philoſophy of Democritus), could have given us any light. If Ælian (k) has ſaid that Protagoras was the ſon of Democritus, he is miſtaken. Democritus did not approve a man's marrying, or amuſing himſelf with getting of children. He uſed to ſay, this was engaging one's ſelf in too importunate cares, which divert a man from more neceſſary employments. See the Remark [L] towards the end. He uſed to ſay alſo that the pleaſure of love was a flight Epilepſy [S].

(g) Suidas makes mention of it.

(h) See Laertius, num. 41.

(i) He was a Phyſician of Caſtres in Languedoc. The Catalogue of the Books which he promiſed the Public may be ſeen before his Antiquitez Gauloiſes, printed at Paris in 1655. See alſo the Preface to the 2d Century of his Obſervat. de Medecine.

(k) Ælian. Var. Hiſt. lib. 1. cap. 23.

What

well written, ſhould be preferred before the Cardinal's, which may be more true, but is not more probable. The inconvenience which Baronius deſigned to avoid, is, methinks, the ſame with that which Plato intended to beware of. There lies all the artifice. Diogenes Laertius was not much acquainted with the military ſtratagems of Authors, ſince he did not lay his finger on this, when he was ſpeaking of Plato's conduct. It is pretended that Ariſtotle actually did what Plato deſigned to do, and that in order to be the only Philoſopher of whom poſterity ſhould have any knowledge, and to ſeize to his own uſe with impunity the treaſures of thoſe who had philoſophized before him, he burned all their Writings. A Profeſſor of Pavia has related all this as a certain fact, and pretends that Pliny ſpeaks of it plainly enough. Quod Plato deſignaverat, exequutus eſt Alexandri ope Ariſtoteles, quaſi parum eſſet Alexandro, ſi ſe monarcham redderet Aſiæ, niſi Ariſtoteli jus in philoſophos daret, qui quod ſua tantum de tot antiquis monumenta ſupereſſe voluit, tyrannidem in ingenia videtur affectaſſe . . . . Dum itaque Regum fortunas unica vincendi libidine ductus everteret Alexander, ſuperbiſſimo furore ambitioſus nominis Ariſtoteles in philoſophorum principes eſt debacchatus, unoque incendio congeſtas triginta ſex ſeculis tot ſapientiæ divitias abſumpſit, & ſi quæ voluit ſupereſſe funeri, ea omnium ludibrio dicteriiſque laceſſenda tradidit poſteris, dum in optimorum bona invectus, abſciſſis perditiſque ſapientiæ ſtatuarum capitibus, ſuum impoſuit ſingulis: neque obſcure literarii peculatus reum facit Ariſtotelem curioſiſſimus Plinius, in Præfat. ad D. Veſpaſianum Imp. (112). i. e. "What Plato had deſigned, Ariſtotle, by "the aſſiſtance of Alexander, executed; as if that "Prince had thought it a ſmall matter to make himſelf Monarch of Aſia, unleſs he alſo gave Ariſtotle "dominion over the Philoſophers, who ſeems to have "affected a tyranny over the learned World, by deſtroying ſo many monuments of antiquity, that "none but his own might deſcend to poſterity. . . . . "While Alexander, therefore, incited merely by the "luſt of conqueſt, was overturning the fortunes of "Kings, Ariſtotle, being immoderately ambitious of a "great name, vented his rage on the principal Philoſophers, and in one pile conſumed ſo many treaſures of wiſdom, which had been heaping up for ſix "and thirty ages; and thoſe which he ſuffered to eſcape deſtruction, he delivered down to be the ſcorn "and ridicule of poſterity; while he invaded the properties of the moſt excellent men, and cutting off and demoliſhing the heads of the ſtatues of the ancient "ſages, placed his own on every one of their "ſhoulders: neither does Pliny obſcurely accuſe Ariſtotle of plagiariſm, in his preface to the Emperor "Veſpaſian." He is miſtaken with regard to the ſecond point. Pliny ſays nothing by which we may diſcover Ariſtotle to be intended by him rather than any other plagiary; and I doubt not but he is alſo miſtaken as to the burning of the Books. See what Charles Emanuel Vizzanius has obſerved on that head, in his Commentary on Ocellus Lucanus (113). The Jews tell a ſilly ſtory, that Ariſtotle having learned all his Philoſophy from the Writings of Solomon, which were found at Jeruſalem when Alexander made himſelf Maſter of that city, burned them, that he might arrogate to himſelf the honour of the wiſdom contained therein (114).

(112) Joan. Chryſoſt. Magnenus, in Prolegomenis Democriti reviviſcentis, pag. 23.

(113) Pag. m. 144.

(114) Bartolocci, in Bibliotb. Rabbin. in the Journal des Savans, 1692, pag. 464. See above Citation (27) of the Article ARISTOTLE.

[R] The Atomical Syſtem is not . . . . . ſo abſurd as Spinoziſm.] For at leaſt the Atomiſts acknowledge a real diſtinction between the things which compoſe the Univerſe; which being granted, it is not incomprehenſible that while it is cold in one country, it ſhould be hot in another, and that while one man enjoys perfect health, another ſhould be very ſick. In the Syſtem of Spinoza, where the whole Univerſe is but one ſubſtance, it is a perfect contradiction; it is, I ſay, a contradiction of that nature to maintain that Peter is learned while William is ignorant; and ſo of every ſort of contrary attributes which are true at the ſame time of ſeveral perſons, ſome of one and ſome of another. By ſuppoſing an infinite number of Atoms really diſtinct from one another, and all eſſentially indued with an active principle, we may conceive action and reaction, and the continual changes which are obſerved in nature: but where there is but one principle, there can be neither action nor reaction, nor any change of the ſcene. So, by leaving the ſtrait road, which is the ſyſtem of a God the free Creator of the world, we muſt neceſſarily admit a multiplicity of principles; we muſt allow of antipathies and ſympathies among them, and ſuppoſe them independent from one another as to exiſtence and power of acting, and yet capable of mutually hurting one another by action and reaction. Aſk not why in certain caſes the effect of reaction is rather this than that; for there can be no reaſon given of the properties of a thing, unleſs it has been made freely, by a cauſe which had its reaſons and motives in producing it.

(115) Galeni Commentar. I, in Librum III Epidemiorum Hippocratis.

[S] He ſaid the pleaſure of love was a ſlight Epilepſy.] This thought was aſcribed to Democritus, if we believe Galen. Τὶς γὰρ ἀνάγκη γράφειν Δημόκριτον μὲν εἰρηκέναι μικρὰν ἐπιληψίαν εἶναι τὴν συνουσίαν (115). Clemens Alexandrinus intended to ſay the ſame thing (116); for his Sophiſt of Abdera is no other than Democritus: but he did not underſtand the meaning of that Philoſopher, ſince he charges him with having thereby taught that the venereal act is an incurable diſeaſe (117). Aulus Gellius attributes the definition in queſtion, not to Democritus, but to Hippocrates. Theſe are his words: Hippocrates autem, divina vir ſcientia, de coïtu venereo ita exiſtimabat, partem eſſe quamdam morbi teterrimi, quem noſtri comitialem dixerunt, namque ipſius verba hæc traduntur, τὴν συνουσίαν εἶναι μικρὰν ἐπιληψίαν (118). Macrobius (119) has copied this paſſage of Aulus Gellius word for word, according to his uſual cuſtom; ſo that we have but one witneſs for the aſcribing this thought to the great Hippocrates. This witneſs is Aulus Gellius; whoſe authority is not comparable to that of Galen with reſpect to a fact like this. Nobody knew better than Galen whether Hippocrates had ſaid ſuch a thing or not: wherefore ſince he has attributed it to Democritus, it is a ſtrong preſumption that it came from that Philoſopher, and not from the Phyſician Hippocrates. The learned man whom I have cited above (120), has done me the honour to write me word, that he makes no doubt but Aulus Gellius is miſtaken. His reaſon is, that in matters of Phyſic, it is much more probable that Galen is exact than Aulus Gellius. Moreover, theſe words are not to be found in any Book of Hippocrates; tho' it be true that he inſinuates this thought in ſome paſſages of his Works (121): and beſides, we ſee that Clemens Alexandrinus agrees with Galen, and not with Aulus Gellius. I find alſo that Monſr. Menage declares for Galen againſt Aulus Gellius. He cites Stobæus, who attributes this definition to the venereal act not only to Eryximachus, but alſo to Democritus (122).

(116) Μικρὰν ἐπιληψίαν τὴν συνουσίαν ὁ Ἀβδηρίτης ἔλεγε σοφιστής. Parvam epilepſiam dicebat coïtum Sophiſta Abderites. Clem. Alexand. lib. 2. Pædagog. pag. 193, D.

(117) Νόσον ἀνίατον ἡγούμενος. Morbum immedicabilem exiſtimans. Idem, ibid.

(118) Aulus Gellius, lib. 19, cap. 2.

(119) Macrob. lib. 2. Saturnal. cap. 8.

(120) Profeſſor Drelincourt. See the Remark [G] towards the end, and the Remark [H] Citation (50).

(121) Sub initium Lib. de Genit. pag. 27. lin. 35, & Lib. de Off. nat. pag. 62. lin. 19. I am as certain of the exactneſs of theſe citations, as if I had examined them my ſelf. I give them as they were ſent me in a Letter by Dr. Drelincourt.

(122) Menag. in Laert. lib. 9. num. 43. p. 410, 411.

What is related of the diſpleaſure cauſed him by his maid-ſervant, in telling him a thing for which he had a mind to ſeek a natural reaſon, is curious enough [T].

[T] What is related of the diſpleaſure cauſed him by his maid-ſervant . . . is curious enough.] I have not yet met with any Modern who has cited an ancient Author for this: Montagne tells the ſtory in the following manner. "Democritus, having eaten at his "own table ſome figs which taſted of honey, began "immediately to conſider with himſelf whence that "unuſual ſweetneſs ſhould proceed, and to be ſatis-"fied in that point, was going to riſe from table, to "view the ſituation of the place where thoſe figs had "been gathered: his maid, underſtanding the occa-"ſion of his moving, laughed, and told him that he "need not give himſelf any further trouble about the "matter, for it was ſhe herſelf who had put them "into a veſſel in which there had been ſome honey. "He was vexed that ſhe had deprived him of the "opportunity of making the inquiry, and robbed "him of a ſubject of curioſity. Get you gone, ſaid he, "you have provoked me; but however I am reſolv-"ed to inquire into the cauſe, as if it were natural. "And by his good will he would not have failed "finding ſome true reaſon for a falſe and ſuppoſed ef-"fect." Kuhnius tells the ſame ſtory (123), without quoting any Author. He might have quoted Plutarch (124).

(123) Kuhnius in Diog. Laert. lib. 9. num. 38. pag. 539.

(124) Plutarch. Sympoſ. lib. 1. cap. 10.

DEMONTJOSIUS, or DEMONTJOSUS (LEWIS). See MONT JOSIEU.

DEMPSTER (THOMAS) taught Claſſical Learning at Paris towards the beginning of the ſeventeenth Century. He was of Scotland, and when he came over to France, ſaid he had left a great Eſtate in his own country for the ſake of the Catholic Religion. He alſo pretended to be deſcended of a very noble family. Though his buſineſs was to teach ſchool, he was notwithſtanding as ready to draw his ſword, and as quarrelſome as if he had been a Duelliſt by profeſſion. He ſcarce paſſed a day but he fought, either with his ſword, or at fiſty-cuffs, ſo that he was the terror of all the Schoolmaſters. He did a couragious action at Paris in the College of Beauvais [A], which expoſed him to troubles, the conſequences of which he would not hazard. For which reaſon he retired to England, where he not only found refuge, but alſo a handſome wife whom he brought with him to Paris when he returned thither. Going one day through the ſtreets with this woman, who expoſed to view the fineſt neck and the whiteſt ſhoulders in the world [B], he ſaw himſelf ſurrounded by ſo many people that the crowd would probably have ſtifled them both, if they had not found a houſe to retreat into. A beauty diſplayed in that manner, in a country where it was not the faſhion, drew that multitude of Cits about them. He paſſed the Alps, and taught polite learning in the Univerſity of Piſa, for which he had a good ſalary. One day returning home from the College, he found that his wife had been run away with: his own ſcholars had aſſiſted the rape. He bore it like a Stoic: and perhaps he was not ſorry to be rid of a treaſure which was ſo difficult to keep. He went to Bologna, and was Profeſſor there during the remaining part of his life. He was there alſo admitted a Member of the Academy della notte (a). We have ſeveral Works of his Compoſition [C]. He died in the year 1625, according to Moreri's Dictionary, where you will find the names of ſeveral Univerſities in which he taught, but not all [D]. He was a man of a prodigious

(a) Extracted from Nicius Erythr. Pinacoth. I. pag. 24, 25.

[A] He did an action of courage in the College of Beauvais.] Grangier, Principal of that College, being obliged to take a journey, appointed Dempſter his ſubſtitute. The latter puniſhed a ſcholar who had challenged one of his ſchool-fellows to fight a duel: he made his breeches to be let down, and having cauſed a luſty fellow to horſe him, he whipped him ſoundly in a full ſchool. The ſcholar, to revenge this affront, brought three Gentlemen of his Relations, who were of the King's life-guards, into the College. Dempſter made the whole College take arms, hamſtrung the three life-guard-men's horſes before the College gate, and put himſelf in ſuch a poſture of defence, that the three ſparks were forced to aſk him quarter. He gave them their lives, but he impriſoned them in the belfrey, from whence he did not releaſe them till ſome days after. They ſought another way to revenge themſelves; they cauſed an information to be made of the life and moral behaviour of Thomas Dempſter, and got ſome witneſſes to be heard in evidence againſt him. This was what obliged him to go over to England (1).

(1) Ex Nicio Erythr. Pinacoth. I. pag. 24.

[B] His wife expoſed to view the fineſt neck and the whiteſt ſhoulders in the world.] Let us cite Nicius Erythræus, who tells the ſtory in Latin. Ubi (in Anglia) non modo tutum ab inſectatoribus ſuis perfugium, verum etiam mulierem nactus eſt, forma & vultu, adeo liberali, adeo venuſto, ut nihil ſupra, quam in uxoris habuit loco. Quæ mulier, cum luce quadam, Pariſiis, quo rurſus Thomas cum ea ſe receperat, conſpecta eſſet, & quia forma præſtabat, ut diximus, & quia habitu erat dementiſſimo; nam & pectus & ſcapulas, nive ipſa candidiores, omnium oculis expoſitas habebat; tantus, viſendi gratia, hominum concurſus factus eſt, ut niſi ſe in domum cujuſdam, una cum viro, recepiſſet, nihil propius factum eſſet, quàm ut ambo à multitudine opprimerentur (2). This ſhould teach us how neceſſary it is to conform to the cuſtoms of the place where we are, and eſpecially with regard to public decency.

(2) Idem, ibid. pag. 25.

[C] We have ſeveral Works of his compoſition.] His Supplements to Roſinus de Antiquitatibus Romanis teſtify that he was a man of great reading. He wrote Commentaries on Claudian, and on Corippus (3); four Books of Letters; ſeveral dramatical pieces, and ſome other Poems (4); ſome Books of Law; an Apparatus to the Hiſtory of Scotland, a Martyrology of Scotland, and a Liſt of the Scottiſh Writers (5): I very juſtly call it a Liſt; for he only ſets down the bare names of the Authors.

(3) Erythræus has committed a miſtake here: inſtead of Coripum he ſays Criſpum.

(4) Erythr. Pinac. I, pag. 26.

(5) Miræus, de Script. Sæculi XVI, num. 147.

[D] You will find in Moreri ſeveral Univerſities in which he taught, but not all.] Moreri does not mention the Univerſity of Nîmes, where Dempſter diſputed for a Profeſſor's chair, and carried it. He tells us this himſelf (6): Quem (locum Virgilii) ut nodum mihi inſolubilem objecit quidam, dum profeſſionem in Regia Nemauſenſium Academia, diſputationi commiſſam, magno licet concurſu, obtinui, rejectiſque aliis, ſolus, quod inter plures dividere volebant quidam ardeliones, ſummo cum honore conſequebar, ſenatu faventiſſimo, unico Barnerio in tot egregiis viris, & omni literarum genere eminentibus, contradicente, maximo conſenſu Conſulum, Civiumque aliorum, exceptis quibuſdam, quos ſi mererentur nominarem, nunc quia indigni ſunt tanto honore, cum ſuo livore, imo & malignitate callida intermori patiar, potius quam nominibus compellatos vivere meo beneficio velim. i. e. "Which paſſage of Virgil a certain "perſon propoſed to me as a difficulty not to be ſolv-"ed, when I obtained the Profeſſorſhip in the Royal "Univerſity ous memory [E], indefatigable, an utter ſtranger to diſſimulation, a warm friend, and a violent enemy (b): he had neither much judgment (c), nor much ſincerity; for he ſhamelefly publiſhed I know not how many fables [F]. Some of his Books were condemned by the Inquiſition at Rome [G]. This diſgrace was a natural conſequence of the paſſionate ſallies of his pen.

(6) Dempſt. Paralipom. ad Cap. III Libri V Antiquit. Romanar. Roſini, pag. m. 872.

(b) Moribus apertis & ſimulandi neſcius, ſive amore odiove quempiam proſequeretur, utrumque palam. Ut amicis obſequentiſſimus, ita inimicis maxime infenſus, Aub. Miræus, in Script. Sæc. XVI, pag. 161.

(c) Homo multæ lectionis, ſed nullius plane judicii. Uſſerius, Antiq. Brit. Eccleſ. cap. 1.

" Univerſity of Nîmes, which was diſputed for by a " great number of Candidates; and which I alone " very honourably carried from the other competitors, " tho' ſome buſy people would have had it divided " among ſeveral; the Senate declaring in my favour, " and not one among ſo many excellent men, and " eminent in every part of learning, diſſenting, be- " ſides Barnier; the choice being alſo approved by " the Conſuls and the other Citizens, excepting ſome " few, whom I would name if they deſerved it; but " ſince they are unworthy ſo much honour, I ſhall " let their envy and fly malice die with them, rather " than contribute to their living by taking notice of " them." The paſſage which was propoſed to him as an indiſſoluble knot, was this:

Non ego te, menſis & Diis accepta ſecundis,
Tranſierim, Rhodia, & tumidis, Bumaſte, racemis (7).

(7) Virgil. Georgic. lib. 2. ver. 101.

" The Rhodian, ſacred to the ſolemn day,
" In ſecond ſervices is pour'd to Jove;
" And beſt accepted by the Gods above:
" Nor muſt Bumaſtus his old honours loſe,
" In length and largeneſs like the dugs of cows."
Dryden.

It is very likely that he paſſed at that time for a Huguenot (8); for the Univerſity of Nîmes was deſtined only for thoſe of the Proteſtant Religion.

(8) Hankius, de Scriptor. Rom. lib. 2. pag. 174, ſays, that Dempſter loſt his Eſtate for having preferred the Reformed Religion to the Roman Catholic: but he has miſunderſtood the words of Nicius Erythræus.

[E] He was a man of a prodigious memory.] He uſed to ſay that he knew not what it was to forget. Mentis acumine ſatis valuit, ſed memoriæ tenacitate longe plurimum, adeo ut multoties diceret, ignorare ſe quid ſit oblivio (9). I can ſcarce believe but this is a Romance. It is ſaid that he remembred the moſt recondite paſſages of Antiquity. Nihil adeo abditum in antiquitatis monumentis cujus non meminiſſet, ita ut Franciſcus Cupius vir in literis omni comparatione major Dempſterum magnam Bibliothecam loquentem compellare conſueverit (10). i. e. " There " was nothing ſo hidden in the monuments of anti- " quity, but that he remembred it; on which account " Francis Cupius, a man of incomparable learning, " uſed to call him the great ſpeaking Library." If this be true, he well deſerved the appellation of a ſpeaking Library, which ſome Authors have given him. As he was extremely laborious, for he uſed to read fourteen hours every day without intermiſſion (11), he muſt neceſſarily have known an infinite number of things. If this had ſuffered him to write with great politeneſs, and all the beauties of a moſt exquiſite judgment, he would have been a greater prodigy than his memory was; but to write judiciouſly and politely was not his talent (12). I recollect a paſſage of Balzac, which I cannot well produce on a better occaſion. Si nos gens de Cour, ſays he, ne peuvent ſouffrir notre jeune Docteur, qui a ſacrifié aux Graces, de quelle façon traiteront-ils le farouche Heinſius, s'il lui prenoit envie de faire ſon entrée dans les Cabinets? Avec combien de huées en auroient-ils chaſſé le vilain Craſſot, & l'indécrotable Demſterus? Qui pouroit ſauver des coups d'eſpingles Federic Morel, & Theodore Marcile, ces deux célèbres Anti-Courtiſans, qui tomboient toûjours du Ciel en Terre, & parloient une langue qui n'étoit ni humaine, ni articulée, bien-loin d'être commune, & intelligible. Ces gens-là étoient rudes & ſauvages, & néanmoins, ils avoient leur prix, auſſi bien que les Diamants bruts (13). " If our Courtiers cannot bear our young Doctor, who " has ſacrificed to the Graces, how would they treat " the wild Heinſius, if he ſhould take a fancy to enter " their cloſets? With what hoots would they have " ſent away the dirty Craſſot, and the incorrigible " ſloven Demſterus? Who could ſave from malicious " inſults Federic Morellus and Theodore Marcilius, " thoſe two famous Anti-Courtiers, who always look- " ed as if they fell from the clouds, and ſpoke a lan- " guage which was neither human nor articulate, ſo " far was it from being common and intelligible. " Theſe people were unpoliſhed and wild, and yet they " had their value, as well as rough diamonds."

(9) Miræus, de Script. Sæc. XVI, pag. 147.

(10) Idem, ibid.

(11) Erat hic, uti refert Matthæus Peregrinus, indefeſſus in legendo, ita ut quatuordecim diei horas in librorum lectione continuare ſoleret. Idem, ibid.

(12) Stylus ei copioſus, confragoſus tamen. i. e. " His ſtyle was " copious, but " rugged." Idem, ibid.

(13) Balzac, Letter III to Chapelain, liv. 1. pag. m. 209.

[F] He ſhamelefly publiſhed I know not how many fables.] To do honour to Scotland, he made a preſent to that country not only of the Engliſh and Iriſh Writers, but alſo of Books which never exiſted. Dempſterus in ſuum Scriptorum Scotiæ Catalogum pro libidine ſua Anglos, Walſos, & Hibernos paſſim retulit, & ad aſſertiones ſuas firmandas finxit ſæpiſſime Authores, opera, locos, & tempora (14). i. e. " Dempſter, in his " Catalogue of the Writers of Scotland, has frequent- " ly inſerted thoſe of England, Wales, and Ireland, " juſt according to his own fancy; and, to confirm his " own aſſertions, has very often produced Authors, " which never exiſted, and fictitious works, times, " and places." Here is what the learned Archbiſhop Uſher ſaid of Dempſter. Commenti genus eſt illi homini non minus familiare, quam librorum qui nunquam ſcripti ſunt ex ipſius otioſo deprompta cerebro recenſio (15). i. e. " It is a ſort of fiction no leſs familiar to that man, " than his mentioning of Books which were never writ- " ten, but were inventions of his own idle brain." Let us ſee the words of a third Witneſs: Quod verò Demſterus Hiſt. Scot. lib. 6. num. 536. affirmat Faſtidium noſtrum Scotorum Chronicon ſcripſiſſe, id homini nugivendulo, & in gentis ſuæ rebus pene ſemper ineptienti condonandum eſt (16). i. e. " What Dempſter af- " firms in his Hiſtory of Scotland, that our Faſtidius " wrote a Scottiſh Chronicle, muſt be pardoned in a " retailer of trifles, and one who almoſt perpetually " talks like a fool of the affairs of his own nation." Let it not be ſaid that none but Engliſh or Iriſh Authors judge diſadvantageouſly of him: for their judgment is approved even by the Catholics of other Nations. I ſhall cite only Monſr. Baillet, a French Prieſt. Thomas Dempſter, ſays he (17), has given us an Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of Scotland in 19 Books, wherein he ſpeaks much of the learned men of that country. But tho' he was an able man in other reſpects, his underſtanding was not the more ſound, nor his judgment the more ſolid, nor his conſcience the better for it. He could have wiſhed that all learned men had been Scots; he forged Titles of Books which were never publiſhed, to raiſe the glory of his native country, and has been guilty of ſeveral cheating tricks, by which he has loſt his credit among men of learning. Theſe are nearly the complaints which have been made of him by Uſher (*), Ware (†), Father Labbe (‡), Sandius (‡), Nicholas Antonio (), &c. Father Labbe, in the paſſage quoted by Mr. Baillet, obſerves that he had never ſeen the Judicium de omnibus omnium gentium & temporum Hiſtoricis which is attributed to Dempſter. I believe the Title is ill quoted, and that Father Labbe meant nothing more than the judgment paſſed by Dempſter on a very great number of Authors, and that in a very few words, which is prefixed to his Roſinus.

(14) Jac. Waræus, de Scriptor. Hiberniæ, pag. 119. apud Pope Blount, Cenſura Authorum, pag. 643.

(15) Jacob. Uſſerius, de Britan. Eccleſ. Primord. pag. 463, apud eund. ibid.

(16) Gul. Cave, ad ann. Chr. 420, apud eundem, ibid.

(17) Jugem. des Savans, tom. 2. pag. 188.

(*) Jacob. Uſſerius, de Britann. Eccleſ. Primord. cap. 13. pag. 463.

(†) Jacob. Waræus, Rerum Hibernic.

(‡) Ph. Labbe, Biblioth. Bibl. pag. 159.

(‡) Chriſtoph. Sandius, Animadv. in Voſſium, pag. 175.

() Nicol. Anton. Biblioth. Hiſp. Præfat. pag. 34.

[G] Some of his Books were condemned by the Inquiſition at Rome.] You will find in the Decree of the 16th of March 1621, Thomæ Dempſteri de Antiquitate Romanorum, donec corrigatur; and in the Decree of the 17th of December 1623, Scotia illuſtrior, ſeu Mendicabula repreſſa modeſta Parechaſi Thomæ Dempſteri. Sir Thomas Pope Blount aſſerts (18) that there is inſerted in this laſt Decree, Liber inſcriptus Hiberniæ ſive antiquioris Scotiæ Vindiciæ adverſus immodeſtam Parechaſim Thomæ Dempſteri. I cannot find this in my Edition (19). We ſee in the Bibliotheca Bibliothecarum of Father Labbe (20), that the Author of the book intitled Hiberniæ ſive Antiquioris Scotiæ Vindiciæ was named G. F. Federicus Hibernus, and that his Book was printed at Antwerp in the year 1621, in 8vo.

(18) Cenſura Authorum, pag. 643.

(19) It is that of Geneva 1667, printed from that of Rome of the ſame year.

(20) Pag. 198, Edit. Rhotomag. 1678: the paſſage is miſplaced.

☞DENHAM (JOHN) an excellent Engliſh Poet in the ſeventeenth Century, was the only ſon of Sir John Denham Knight, of Little Horſely in Eſſex (a), ſometime Chief

(a) Account of the Engliſh Dramatick Poets. By Gerard Langbaine, pag. 126. edit. Oxon 1691.

Chief Baron of the Exchequer in Ireland, and one of the Lords Commiſſioners of that Kingdom (b), by Eleanor his wife, one of the daughters of Sir Garret More Knight, Baron of Mellefont in Ireland (c). He was born in the City of Dublin in the year 1615; and in 1617 his father being made one of the Barons of the Exchequer in England, he was brought by him to London, and educated in Grammar Learning there. In Michaelmas Term 1631 at the age of ſixteen years he was entered a Gentleman Commoner of Trinity College in Oxford; "but being looked upon, ſays Mr. Wood (d), as a ſlow "and dreaming young man by his ſeniors and contemporaries, and given more to cards "and dice than his ſtudy, they could never then in the leaſt imagine, that he could "ever inrich the world with his fancy or iſſue of his brain, as he afterwards did." From this College, where he continued about three years, and had been examined in the public ſchools for the Degree of Bachelor of Arts, he went to Lincoln's-Inn [A], where "though "he followed his ſtudy very cloſe to the appearance of all perſons, yet he would game "much, and frequent the company of the unſanctified crew of gameſters, who rook'd "him ſometimes of all he could wrap or get (e)." But his father being informed of this ill conduct of his, reprimanded him in very ſevere terms, and threatened to diſinherit him, if he did not reform. Upon this he wrote a little Eſſay againſt Gaming (f), which he preſented to his father, to ſhew him his deteſtation of that practice. However, after his father's deceaſe, (who died on the 6th of January 1638, and was interred in Egham Church in Surrey,) he returned to his former ill courſes, and ſoon loſt ſeveral thouſands of pounds, which had been left him. In the latter end of the year 1641 he publiſhed a Tragedy called The Sophy [B], which was extremely admired by the beſt judges, and particularly Mr. Edmund Waller, who then ſaid of the Author, that he broke out like the Iriſh rebellion, threeſcore thouſand ſtrong, when no body was aware, or in the leaſt ſuſpected it. Soon after he was pricked High Sheriff of Surrey, and made Governor of Farnham-Caſtle for the King. But he being not well ſkilled in military affairs, ſoon after quitted that poſt, and retired to his Majeſty at Oxford (g), where he publiſhed his Poem called Cooper's Hill [C]. In 1647 he was intruſted by the Queen with a meſſage to the King, and (b) Wood, Hiſt. & Antiquitat. Univerſitatis Oxon. lib. 2. pag. 298.

(c) Idem, Ath. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 422. 2d edit. London 1721.

(d) Ibid.

(e) Idem, ibid.

(f) It was printed at London in about three ſheets in 8vo. Wood, col. 423.

(g) Idem, col. 422, 423.

[A] Went to Lincoln's-Inn.] Mr. Langbaine (1) and Sir Thomas Pope-Blount (2) tell us, that he followed the ſtudy of the Civil Law there; but this appears to be a miſtake; for Mr. Wood aſſures us (3), that he ſtudied the Common Law.

(1) Account of the Engliſh Dramatick Poets, pag. 126. edit. Oxford 1691.

(2) Remarks upon Poetry. With Characters and Cenſures of the moſt conſiderable Poets, whether ancient or modern, Part 2. pag. 66. edit. London 1694.

(3) Hiſt. & Antiq. Univerſ. Oxon. lib. 2. pag. 298.

[B] His Tragedy called, The Sophy.] It was printed at London 1642 in 4to, and ſince publiſhed with his Poems and Tranſlations. It was acted at the Private Houſe in Black Friars by his Majeſty's Servants. In the Prologue we have the following lines:

But, Gentlemen, if ye diſlike the Play,
Pray make no words on't till the ſecond day,
Or third be paſt; for we would have you know it,
The loſs will fall on us, not on the Poet:
For he writes not for money, nor for praiſe,
Nor to be call'd a wit, nor to wear bays:
Cares not for frowns or ſmiles: ſo now you'll ſay
Then, why the Devil, did he write the Play?
He ſays, 'twas then with him, as now with you,
He did it when he had nothing elſe to do.

Winſtanley affirms (4), that this Tragedy is equal to any of the chiefeſt Authors.

(4) Lives of the moſt famous Engliſh Poets, pag. 185. edit. London 1687.

[C] His Poem called Cooper's Hill.] It was printed at Oxford 1643 in one ſheet and an half in 4to, and again with Additions at London 1650 and 1655 in 4to. This laſt edition is printed under this title: Cooper's Hill, written in 1640. Now printed from a perfect copy, and a corrected impreſſion. By John Denham Eſq; pagg. 18. In the Preface to the Reader ſigned J. B. the Reader is aſſured, that though there had been five impreſſions of this Poem, this is the only true copy; and that thoſe former were all but meer repetitions of the ſame falſe tranſcript, which ſtole into print by the Author's long abſence from London. "I had not patience, ſays the Editor, (hav-"ing read the original) to ſee ſo noble a piece ſo "ſavagely handled; therefore I obtained from the "Author's own papers this perfect edition. You "may know this by that excellent allegory of the "Royal Stag (which among others was lopt off by "the Tranſcriber) ſkilfully maintained without drag-"ging or haling in words and metaphors, as the "faſhion now is with ſome that cannot write, and "cannot but write." It was printed again at London in 1667 and 1668 in 8vo, in a Collection of his Poems (5). In the Miſcellany Poems publiſhed by Mr. Dryden (6) this Poem is printed as it was publiſhed in the year 1650, and as it was publiſhed after the Reſtoration. We have the following lines with relation to this Poem in The Seſſion of the Poets printed in theſe Miſcellany Poems (7):

(5) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 423. 2d edit. London 1721.

(6) Part 5. pag. 74, & ſeqq. 4th edit. London 1716.

(7) Part 2. pag. 94.

Then in came Denham, that limping old bard,
Whoſe fame on the Sophy and Cooper's Hill ſtands;
And brought many Stationers, who ſwore very hard,
That nothing ſold better, except 'twere his lands.

But Apollo adviſ'd him to write ſomething more,
To clear a ſuſpicion, which poſſeſſed the Court,
That Cooper's Hill, ſo much bragg'd on before,
Was writ by a Vicar, who had forty pound for't.

Mr. Dryden tells us (8), that it "is a Poem, which "for majeſty of the ſtyle, is, and ever will be, the "exact ſtandard of good writing." Mr. Pope alludes to it in the following lines of his Windſor-Foreſt (9).

(8) Epiſtle Dedicatory before his Rival Ladies.

(9) Ver. 257, & ſeqq. Works of Alexander Pope, Eſq; Vol. 1. With Explanatory Notes and Additions never before printed, pag. 78. edit. London 1736, in 12mo.

"Ye ſacred Nine! that all my ſoul poſſeſs
"Whoſe raptures fire me, and whoſe viſions bleſs;
"Bear me, oh bear me to ſequeſter'd ſcenes,
"The bow'ry mazes and ſurrounding greens:
"To Thames's banks, which flagrant breezes fill,
"Or where ye Muſes ſport on Cooper's Hill,
"(On Cooper's Hill eternal wreaths ſhall grow,
"While laſts the Mountain, or while Thames ſhall flow)
"I ſeem thro' conſecrated walks to rove,
"I hear ſoft muſic die along the grove:
"Led by the ſound, I roam from ſhade to ſhade,
"By god-like Poets venerable made:
"Here his firſt Lays majeſtic Denham ſung;
"There the laſt Numbers flow'd from Cowley's tongue (10).
"O early loſt! what tears the river ſhed,
"When the ſad pomp along his banks was led?
"His drooping ſwans on ev'ry note expire,
"And on his willows hung each Muſe's lyre.
"Since Fate relentleſs ſtop'd their heav'nly voice,
"No more the foreſts ring, or groves rejoice;
"Who now ſhall charm the ſhades, where Cowley ſtrung
"His living harp, and lofty Denham ſung?"

(10) Mr. Cowley died at Chertſey, on the borders of the Foreſt.

Mr. Somerville likewiſe has the following lines upon our Poet (11):

(11) The Chace; a Poem. By William Somerville Eſq; B. 3. verſe 366, & ſeqq. edit. London 1735, in 4to.

and employed in other affairs relating to his Majeſty [D]. In April 1648 he conveyed away James Duke of York, then under the tuition of Algernoon Earl of Northumberland, from St. James's in Weſtminſter, and carried him into France to the Prince of Wales and the Queen-mother. Not long after this he was ſent with William (afterwards Lord) Crofts, as Envoys to the King of Poland from King Charles II [E]. About the year 1652 he returned to England; and his circumſtances being reduced, ("for by gaming "and the war he had ſquandered away much of his eſtate at Egham, and elſewhere, "and the reſt ordered to be ſold by the Parliament the 15th of July 1651 (b)") he was kindly entertained by the Earl of Pembroke at Wilton; where, and ſometimes at London, he continued with that Nobleman above a year. At the Reſtoration he entered upon the Office of Surveyor-General of all his Majeſty's Royal Buildings [F]; and at the Coronation of the King he was created Knight of the Bath. He was greatly valued at Court for his admirable genius and writings [G]; but upon ſome diſcontent ariſing from a ſecond marriage, he loſt his ſenſes; however being ſoon after cured of his diſtemper, he wrote

(b) Idem, ibid.

. . . . Tread with reſpectful awe
Windſor's green glades, where Denham, tuneful bard,
Charm'd once the liſtning Dryads with his ſong
Sublimely ſweet. O! grant me, ſacred ſhade,
To glean ſubmiſs what thy full fickle leaves.

(12) Preface to the 2d edition corrected and much enlarged by the Author, London 1736, in 4to.

The noble Author of an Eſſay on human Life (12) obſerves, that Cooper's Hill has met with univerſal applauſe, though its ſubject ſeems rather deſcriptive than inſtructing; but it is not the hill, the river, nor the Stag-Chace; it is the good ſenſe and the fine reflections ſo frequently interſpers'd, and as it were interwoven with the reſt, that gives it the value, and will make it, as was ſaid of true wit, everlaſting like the Sun. It was tranſlated into Latin Verſe by Mr. Moſes Pengry of Brazen Noſe College Oxford, and publiſhed there in 1676 in 4to, under the title of, Cooper's Hill, Latine redditum ad nobiliſſimum Dominum Gulielmum Dominum Cavendiſh, honoratiſſimi Domini Gulielmi Comitis Devoniæ filium unicum.

[D] In 1647 he was intruſted by the Queen with a meſſage to the King, and employed in other affairs relating to his Majeſty.] In the Dedication of his Poems to King Charles II, he obſerves, that after the delivery of King Charles I into the hands of the army, he undertaking to the Queen, that he would find ſome means to get acceſs to his Majeſty, ſhe ſent him, and by the help of Hugh Peters he got admittance, and coming well inſtructed from the Queen (his Majeſty having been long kept in the dark) he was pleaſed to diſcourſe him of the whole ſtate of his affairs. "One morning, continues our Author, waiting upon "him at Cauſham, ſmiling upon me, he ſaid, he "could tell me ſome news of my ſelf, which was "that he had ſeen ſome verſes of mine the evening "before (being thoſe to Sir R. Fanſhaw (13), and aſk-"ing me when I made them, I told him two or three "years ſince. He was pleaſed to ſay that having "never ſeen them before he was afraid I had written them ſince my return into England; and though "he liked them well, he would adviſe me to write "no more; alledging, that when men are young, and "have little elſe to do, they might vent the over-"flowings of their fancy that way; but when they "were thought fit for more ſerious employments, if "they ſtill perſiſted in that courſe, it would look, as "if they minded not the way to any better. Where-"upon I ſtood corrected as long as I had the honour "to wait upon him; and at his departure from "Hampton Court, he was pleaſed to command me "to ſtay privately at London, to ſend to him and re-"ceive from him all letters from and to all his cor-"reſpondents at home and abroad; and I was fur-"niſhed with nine ſeveral cyphers in order to it. "Which truſt I performed with great ſafety to the "perſons, with whom we correſponded. But about "nine months after being diſcovered by their know-"ledge of Mr. Cowley's hand, I happily eſcaped "both for my ſelf, and thoſe that held correſpondence "with me." That time was too hot and buſie for ſuch idle ſpeculations; but after I had the good fortune to wait upon your Majeſty in Holland and France, you were pleaſed ſometimes to give me arguments to divert and put off the evil hours of our baniſhment, which now and then fell not ſhort of your Majeſtie's expectation. After when your Majeſty departing from St. Germains to Jerſey, was pleaſed freely (without my aſking) to confer upon me that place, wherein I have now the honour to ſerve you, I then gave over poetical lines, and made it my buſineſs to draw ſuch others, as might be more ſerviceable to your Majeſty, and I hope more laſting. Sir John Berkley in his Memoirs (14) mentions our Author's being employed in King Charles the Firſt's affairs, and obſerves (15), that Mr. Denham during his impriſonment having contracted a great familiarity with Mr. Peters, a Preacher, and a powerful Perſon in the Army, was diſpatched by the Queen from France with a Commiſſion to diſcover the intentions of the Army, and to promote an agreement between his Majeſty and them.

(13) Upon his Tranſlation of Paſtor Fido. See Poems and Tranſlations, with the Sophy. Written by the Honourable Sir John Denham Knight of the Bath, pag. 110. 2d edit. London 1671.

(14) Memoirs of Sir John Berkley, containing an account of his Negotiation with Lieutenant Gen. Cromwell, Commiſſary General Ireton, and other Officers of the Army, for reſtoring King Charles the Firſt to the Exerciſe of the Government of England, pag. 14, 37, and 93. 2d edit. London 1702, in 8vo.

[E] Sent with William (afterwards Lord) Crofts, as Envoys to the King of Poland from King Charles II.] This we are informed of by Mr. Wood (16). Among our Author's Poems we have one under this title (17), On my Lord Croft's and my Journey into Poland, from whence we brought ten thouſand pounds for his Majeſty, by the decimation of his Scotiſh ſubjects there.

[F] Entered upon the Office of Surveyor-General of all his Majeſty's Royal Buildings.] Mr. Wood tells us (18) that "King Charles I did grant to him the "reverſion of the place of Surveyor of his Buildings "after the deceaſe of Inigo Jones; which place he "entering upon at the Reſtoration of King Charles II "ann. 1660, (for the ſaid Jones died 21 July 1651 ..) "he enjoyed it to the time of his death, and got by "it ſeven thouſand pounds." In the paſſage quoted above from the Preface to his Poems, he tells us himſelf, that King Charles II freely, without his aſking, conferred upon him that place.

(15) Pag. 4.

(16) Athen. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 423.

(17) Poems and Tranſlations &c. pag. 67. 2d edit. 1671.

(18) Col. 423.

[G] His writings.] They are as follow: Cato Major; a Poeme of Old Age; London 1648 in 12mo, in four Parts, &c. (19). The Deſtruction of Troy: or an Eſſay upon the ſecond Book of Virgil's Æneids. London 1656 in four ſheets and an half in 4to. This was written in the year 1636. In the Preface to it he remarks, that "it is a vulgar error in tranſlating Poets to affect being Fidus Interpres. Let that care be with them, who deal in matters of fact or matters of faith; but whoſoever aims at it in Poetry, as he attempts what is not required, ſo he ſhall never perform what he attempts; for it is not his buſineſs alone to tranſlate language into language, but poeſie into poeſie; and poeſie is of ſo ſubtile a ſpirit, that in pouring out of one language into another, it will all evaporate; and if a new ſpirit be not added in the tranſfuſion, there will remain nothing but a Caput mortuum, there being certain graces and happineſſes peculiar to every language, which give life and energy to the words. And whoſoever offers at verbal tranſlation, ſhall have the misfortune of that young traveller, who loſt his own language abroad, and brought home no other inſtead of it. For the grace of the Latine will be loſt by being turned into Engliſh words; and the grace of the Engliſh by being turned into the Latine phraſe. And as ſpeech is the apparel of our thoughts, ſo are there certain garbs and modes of ſpeaking, which vary with the times; the faſhion of our clothes being not more ſubject to alteration, than that of ones ſpeech. And this I think Tacitus means by that which he calls, Sermonem temporis iſtius auribus accommodatum; the delight of change being as due to the curioſity of the ear as of the eye. "And therefore if Virgil muſt needs ſpeak En-"gliſh, it were fit he ſhould ſpeak not only as a man "of this nation, but as a man of this age. And if "this wrote a beautiful copy of verſes upon the death of Cowley, whom he ſurvived but a few months; for he died at his Office near Whitehall, which he before had built, about the 19th of (i) March 1668, and was interred on the 23d of the ſame month in Weſtminſter Abbey, near the graves of Chaucer, Spencer and Cowley (k).

(19) Wood, col. 423.

(i) Wood, Hiſt. & Antiq. Univ. Oxon. pag. 299. But Langbaine, p. 127. and Sir Thomas Pope-Blount in his Remarks upon Poetry, with Characters and Cenſures of the moſt conſiderable Poets, Par. 2. pag. 66, ſay that he died on the 10th. (k) Wood, Hiſt. & Antiq. ubi ſupra.

" this diſguiſe I have put upon him (I wiſh I could " give it a better name) ſit not naturally and ea- " ſily on ſo grave a perſon, yet it may become him " better than a fool's coat, wherein the French and " Italian have of late preſented him: at leaſt, I hope, " it will not make him appear deformed, by making " any part enormouſly bigger or leſs than life, I " having made it my principal care to follow him, " as he made it his to follow Nature in all his pro- " portions. Neither have I any where offered ſuch " violence to his ſenſe, as to make it ſeem mine, and " not his. Where my expreſſions are not ſo full as " his, either our language, or my art were defective " (but I rather ſuſpect my ſelf;) but where mine are " fuller than his, they are but the impreſſions, which " the often reading of him hath left upon my thoughts; " ſo that if they are not his own conceptions, they " are at leaſt the reſults of them. And if (being " conſcious of making him ſpeak worſe than he did " almoſt in every line) I err in endeavouring to " make him ſpeak better, I hope it will be judged " an error on the right hand, and ſuch an one as " may deſerve pardon, if not imitation." Mr. Dryden (20) mentioning our Author's, Mr. Waller's, and Cowley's Tranſlations from Virgil, tells us, that it is the utmoſt of his ambition to be thought their equal, or not to be much inferior to them. But to return to the reſt of our Author's writings, he wrote a Panegyric on his Excellency the Lord General George Monk, Commander in chief &c. Printed at London in one ſheet in 4to in March $16\frac{59}{60}$. Though his name be not ſet to it, yet, as Mr. Wood obſerves (21), " the frequent report " was then among the Academicians, that he was the " Author of it." A Poem on Mr. Abraham Cowley's Death and Burial among the ancient Poets; printed at London in one ſheet in fol. in Auguſt 1667 (22). A new Verſion of the Pſalms of David. The ſecond Impreſſion of his Poems and Tranſlations with the Sophy, at London 1671 in 8vo, contains the following pieces: Cooper's-Hill; The Deſtruction of Troy; On the Earl of Strafford's Tryal and Death: On my Lord Croft's and my Journey into Poland &c; On Mr. Thomas Killigrew's Return from his Embaſſy from Venice, and Mr. William Murray's from Scotland; To Sir John Mennis, being invited from Calice to Bologne to eat a Pig; Natura Naturata; Sarpedon's Speech to Glaucus in the XIIth Book of Homer; out of an Epigram of Martial; Friendſhip and ſingle Life againſt Love and Marriage; On Mr. Abraham Cowley's Death &c; A Speech againſt Peace at the Cloſe Committee; To the Five Members of the honourable Houſe of Commons, the humble Petition of the Poets: a Weſtern Wonder; A ſecond Weſtern Wonder; News from Colcheſter &c; A Song; On Mr. John Fletcher's Works; To Sir Richard Fanſhaw, upon his Tranſlation of Paſtor Fido; A Dialogue between Sir John Pooley and Mr. Thomas Killigrew; An occaſional Imitation of a modern Author (23) upon the Game of Cheſs; The Paſſion of Dido for Æneas; Of Prudence; Of Juſtice; The Progreſs of Learning; and the Sophy, a Tragedy. He wrote likewiſe a Prologue to his Majeſty at the firſt Play preſented at the Cock-Pit in Whitehall, being part of that noble Entertainment, which their Majeſties received Nov. 19. an. 1660, from his Grace the Duke of Albemarle. This Prologue was printed at London 1660 on one ſide of a broad ſheet of paper (24). He had a hand in writing Certain Verſes written by ſeveral of the Author's Friends, to be re-printed with the ſecond edition of Gondibert. London 1653 in 8vo (25). Our Author likewiſe made an Engliſh Tranſlation in verſe of the Book of Pſalms. Mr. Wood informs us (26), that in 1680 there was publiſhed under his name at London in half a ſheet in fol. a piece intitled, The true Preſbyterian without diſguiſe, or a character of a Preſbyterian's ways and actions; but that it was then queſtioned by many whether Sir John Denham was the Author of it. The ſame Hiſtorian likewiſe obſerves, that in the year 1666 there were printed by ſtealth in 8vo certain Poems, intitled Directions to a Painter, in four copies or parts, each dedicated to King Charles II in verſe. They were very ſatyrical upon ſeveral perſons engaged in the war againſt the Dutch in 1665; and at the end of them is a piece intitled, Clarendon's Houſe-warming, and after that his Epitaph, both very ſevere upon Edward Lord Clarendon. To theſe Directions our Author's name is ſet; " yet they were thought by many, ſays Mr. Wood, to have been " written by Andrew Marvell Eſq; The Printer " that printed them, being diſcovered, ſtood in the " pillory for the ſame."

(20) Dedication of his Tranſlation of Virgil's Æneis. Works of Virgil tranſlated &c. vol. 2. pag. 419. edit. London 1730.

(21) Col. 423.

(22) Wood, col. 424.

(23) Sir Will. Davenant's Gondibert.

(24) Wood, col. 424.

(25) See the Article of DAVENANT (Sir William) Note [D].

(26) Ubi ſupra.

T

DES BARREAUX (JAMES DE VALLEE, Lord) born at Paris in the year 1602, of a very noble family [A], was one of the Wits of the ſeventeenth Century. He made a great progreſs in his ſtudies under the Jeſuits, who perceiving he had a genius capable of the greateſt things, endeavoured to prevail on him to enter into their Society; but neither he nor his family would give ear to the propoſal. He did not love them, and ſometimes uſed to rail at them in an agreeable manner. His intimacy with Theophile [B] without doubt contributed very much to this, as well as to the Libertiniſm for which he has been ſo famous. He was yet but young, when his father procured him the place of a Counſellor in the Parliament of Paris. His wit was admired there, though he

[A] He was of a very noble family.] He was ſon of JAMES DE VALLE'E, Lord Des-Barreaux, who died Maſter of Requeſts, and Preſident of the great Council, and grandſon of JAMES DE VALLE'E, Knight, Lord Des-Barreaux, of Chateauneuf, and Chenailles, Comptroller General of the Finances, a perſon of ſuch conſideration in the reign of Henry III, and the beginning of the following reign, that he had a great ſhare in the Councils, and the King often held a Council at his houſe, and frequently wrote to him with his own hand on important affairs. Mr. Des-Barreaux who is the ſubject of this Article was ſecond couſin to Monſieur de Laubeſpine Chateauneuf, Keeper of the Seals, and by his mother's ſide he was couſin german to the Counteſs de Bouteville (1), and conſequently uncle, after the mode of Britany, to the Marſhal de Luxemburgh, and the Ducheſs of Mecklemburgh. Mary de Vallée, his eldeſt ſiſter, left no children of her marriage with the Preſident Viole. Elizabeth de Vallée, his other ſiſter, was married to Mr. du Boulai-Favier, Maſter of Requeſts, who was Intendant in Normandy. The iſſue of this marriage was two daughters, one of which was married to Mr. Talon (2) and the other to the Count de Tiliere and de Carouge.

[B] He was very intimate with Theophile.] He was very handſome in his youth; and it is ſaid Theophile was in love with him, and ſometimes was even jealous of him. That Poet, ſpeaking of him ſomewhere, ſays, Valleus noſter qui fuit olim meus, i. e. " Our de " Vallée, who was formerly mine." Some people pretend he had abuſed him; but perſons who were intimately

(1) Mother of the Marſhal de Luxemburgh. She died, not in the month of Jan. 1695, as was publiſhed in the Gazettes, but in the month of Auguſt 1696, at the age of 92, in the 69th year of her widowhood. See the Hiſtorical Letters of the month of Sept. 1696, pag. 327, 328.

(2) Advocate General, and afterwards Preſident au Mortier in the Parliament of Paris.

he would never report a cauſe [C]. We ſhall ſee, in the Remarks, what obliged him to part with that place [D]. As he loved his pleaſures and his liberty extremely, he did not think himſelf very unhappy in having quitted the long Robe. He made a great number of Latin and French Verſes, and ſome very pretty Songs; but he never publiſhed any thing: for he minded nothing but good cheer, and diverſions. He was wonderfully entertaining at Table, and was known to and beloved by the greateſt Lords and the politeſt men in the Kingdom. There was no province wherein he had not his particular friends, whom he viſited frequently, taking a pleaſure in ſhifting his quarters according to the ſeaſons of the year [E]. Four or five years before his death he entirely forſook his vicious courſes: he paid his debts, and gave up the remainder of his Eſtate (a) to his ſiſters, reſerving to himſelf an Annuity for life of four thouſand livres. He then retired to Chalon on the Saone, which he ſaid was the beſt and pureſt air in France: he there hired a ſmall houſe, and was viſited by the better ſort of people, and particularly by the Biſhop, who bore him a good teſtimony. He died in that city like a good Chriſtian in the year 1674. He had made a devout Sonnet two or three years before his death, which is known to every body [F], and is a very fine one. Neither his relations intimately acquainted with Monſieur Des-Barreaux have aſſured us that he always abhorred that unnatural vice, and that nec agens nec patiens voluit unquam inſervire præpoſteræ libidini. See the Margin (3).

(a) He had received above 400 thouſand livres for his ſhare of his paternal and maternal Eſtates, beſides what came to him by collateral Inheritance.

(3) The Collection of Theophile's Letters, publiſhed by Mayret, contains two in French and ſeveral in Latin from Theophile to Des-Barreaux, and a Latin one from the latter to Theophile.

[C] His Father procured him a Counſellor's place in the Parliament . . . he would never report a Cauſe.] He ſaid it was a ſordid occupation, and unworthy a man of parts, to read wrangling papers with attention, and to endeavour to underſtand them. He once undertook to report a Caſe: the Cauſe was of no great conſequence; but finding himſelf preſſed by the parties, he ſent for them, and burned the papers before their faces, paying the money that was demanded out of his own pocket.

[D] We ſhall ſee in the Remarks what obliged him to part with that place.] They ſay it was Cardinal Richelieu's falling in love with the famous Marion de Lorme, who was fond of our Des-Barreaux. I am going to produce my Author. "The Cardinal ſaw "Marion de Lorme without being ſeen by her, and "found her a thouſand times more beautiful than he "had imagined. He had a mind to know whether "St. Mars was loved by her, and employed Bois-"robert to diſcover it. The Abbot was not long "before he gave his Eminence the information he "wanted, and acquainted him that vanity had a "greater ſhare than love in the complaiſance which "Marion de Lorme ſhewed to the King's Favourite, "and that her affection was entirely placed on Des-"Barreaux, a Counſellor in the Parliament, a hand-"ſome young fellow, of a lively wit, and ſprightly "converſation, but exceſſively debauched and impi-"ous. The Cardinal ordered Bois-robert to propoſe "to Des-Barreaux, that if he would reſign his miſ-"treſs to him, and engage her to make a ſuitable "return to his paſſion, the ſacrifice would be ſo well "taken, that any thing ſhould be done for the raiſing "of his fortune that he ſhould deſire. Bois-robert "executed his commiſſion with a great deal of ad-"dreſs; but Des-Barreaux anſwered the propoſal no "otherwiſe than in a jeſting way, feigning all along "to believe the Cardinal incapable of ſo much weak-"neſs. That Miniſter was ſo provoked at it, that "he perſecuted Des-Barreaux as long as he lived, and "forced him to quit his place and leave the King-"dom (4)."

(4) Galanteries des Rois de France, tom. 2. pag. 189, of the Dutch Edition 1695.

The perſon who furniſhed me with ſome Memoirs concerning Mr. Des-Barreaux, had promiſed me the refutation of this paſſage in the Gallantries of the Kings of France; but a long illneſs has prevented him from ſending it me.

[E] He took a pleaſure in ſhifting his quarters, according to the Seaſons of the year.] He went in ſearch of the beſt fruits and the beſt wines in the climates where they excelled: but eſpecially in winter he went to ſeek the Sun on the Coaſts of Provence. He paſſed the three worſt months in the year at Marſeilles. The houſe which he called his favourite was in Languedoc: it was that of the Count de Clermont de Lodeve, where he uſed to ſay good cheer and liberty were on their throne. In Anjou he had the houſe du Lude, which was formerly the reſort of the greateſt wits and the beſt company. Sometimes he went to Mr. de Balzac (5) on the banks of the Charante; but his chief reſidence was at Chenailles on the Loire, a pleaſant houſe, and formerly a houſe of pleaſure and good cheer. It belonged to one of his uncles, and afterwards to Mr. de Chenailles his firſt couſin, a Counſellor in the Parliament of Paris (6). I muſt add, that the pleaſures of the mind were ſometimes the occaſion of his journeys; as when he went into Holland on purpoſe to ſee his good friend Mr. Des Cartes, and to improve by the inſtructions of that great genius (7).

(5) See the Letter which Balzac wrote him the 12th of October 1641: it is the 26th of the 2d Book of the 2d Part of the Lettres Choiſies. The Couſin he mentions to him, who would not marry again, is doubtleſs the Counteſs de Bouteville.

(6) He retired to the Hague on account of his Religion, in 1694.

(7) Baillet, Vie de Des-Cartes, tom. 2. pag. 176.

[F] He had made a devout Sonnet . . . . . which is known to every body.] I ſhall nevertheleſs inſert it here at length.

Grand Dieu, tes jugemens ſont remplis d'équité;
Toûjours tu prens plaiſir à nous être propice:
Mais j'ai tant fait de mal, que jamais ta bonté
Ne me pardonnera ſans choquer ta juſtice.
Oüy, Mon Dieu, la grandeur de mon impiété
Ne laiſſe à ton pouvoir que le choix du ſuplice:
Ton intereſt s'oppoſe à ma félicité;
Et ta clémence même attend que je périſſe.
Contente ton deſir puis qu'il t'eſt glorieux;
Offenſe toy des pleurs qui coulent de mes yeux;
Tonne, frappe, il eſt temps, rens moi guerre pour guerre:
J'adore en périſſant la raiſon qui t'aigrit:
Mais deſſus quel endroit tombera ton tonnerre,
Qui ne ſoit tout couvert du ſang de JESUS-CHRIST.

"Great God, thy judgments equitable are;
"Mercy is ſtill thy darling attribute:
"Yet ſuch a wretch, ſo full of guilt am I,
"Tho' Mercy pleads, Juſtice forbids to ſave.
"Yes, yes, my God! my great impiety
"Leaves thee the choice of puniſhment alone:
"Thy int'reſt is againſt my happineſs,
"And ev'n thy clemency awaits my fall.
"Then ſatisfy thy glory's juſt demand,
"And let my falling tears provoke thy wrath:
"Now, thunder, ſtrike, and give me war for war:
"Falling I own the juſtice of the blow:
"But, mark'd for vengeance, let me not deſpair;
"Fall where thy thunders will, the Blood of CHRIST is there."

The Author of the Art of Speaking finds this Sonnet admirable. He has inſerted it in his Book as an example of the figure which the Rhetoricians call Epiſtrophe, or Conſent (8). This Sonnet is to be found in a letter of Mr. Bourſault. The Title of the Letter ſpecifies that it was written to Mr. Des-Barreaux who believed in God only when he was ſick (9). The Author mentions to him the death of an unhappy woman who was the diſgrace of her ſex, and who left ſome children which were the heirs of her infamy. He pretends that by her death God had broken down the obſtacles which hindred Des-Barreaux from approaching him. We may conclude from hence that this woman had been our Libertine's miſtreſs. He adds, that he makes no doubt but among the ill examples which they had mutually ſhewn each other, ſhe had learned of him to believe in God only when ſhe was ſick. He repreſents to him what the mercy of God had frequently done for him. Was it not that mercy, ſays he to him (10), which in order to reclaim you from your vicious courſes, ſent you the laſt ſickneſs you had: during which

(8) Art de parler, liv. 2. chap. 3. pag. 100. of the Dutch Edition 1679.

(9) Lettres Nouvelles de Mr. Bourſault, pag. 18. of the Dutch Edition, 1698.

(10) Ibid. pag. 21.

which being touched by the greatneſs of your ſins, you made that Sonnet, which has gained you as much glory as it will one day cauſe confuſion in you, for having been capable of thinking ſo well, and unhappy enough to live ſo ill? . . . . . Let us lay aſide the Chriſtian for a moment, and ſpeak only of the man of honour. Tell me, I beſeech you, whether a man who ſhould ſay that to another which you ſay to God, and ſhould break his word with him as baſely as you have done, would be a man of honour? . . . . What are you going to do, with death following within two ſteps of you, to day at the Capuchins, and to morrow at the Minims, but to ſeek what you ought to fly, and, if I may dare to ſay it, to inſult God where others go to worſhip him (11)? He ſends him the Fable of the Sick Kite; and aſſerts that if there is any greater extravagance in the world than not to believe in God, it is having the weakneſs to invoke him without believing in him: and as he is not more God when we are ſick, than when we are well, there is neither more nor leſs reaſon to believe in him at one time than at another (12). This he ſuppoſes to be the anſwer of the Kite's mother, and declares that he knows none but Æſop capable of putting ſo judicious an anſwer into her mouth: and laſtly, he moſt earneſtly exhorts Mr. Des-Barreaux not to tire out God's mercy. Note the Fable of the Kite appears in the following words in the new Edition of Phædrus.

(11) Ibid. pag. 22.

(12) Ibid. pag. 24.

Multos cum menſes ægrotaſſet milvius,
Nec jam videret eſſe vitæ ſpem ſuæ,
Matrem rogabat, ſancta circumiret loca,
Et pro ſalute vota faceret maxima.
Faciam, inquit, fili; ſed opem ne non impetrem
Vehementer vereor; ſed qui delubra omnia
Vaſtando, cuncta polluiſti altaria
Sacrificiis nullis parcens, nunc quid vis rogem (13)?

(13) See the Phædrus printed at Amſterdam, 1698, pag. 325 of the Commentary of Gudius. Append. Fab. I. in Edit. P. Burm.

" Kite had lain ill three months and more,
" And all the Quacks had giv'n him o're.
" Mamma he call'd, then thus began;
" All fleſh is graſs, and life a ſpan,
" But pray'rs, perhaps, may ſtill prevail,
" The Gods can cure when Doctors fail.
" I'd pray, my ſon, mamma reply'd,
" But fear, alas! to be deny'd:
" They'll ſay this ſudden Reformation
" Is nought but baſe diſſimulation."

I have not found this Fable among thoſe which are attributed immediately to Æſop in the Edition of Nevelet, but I have found it among thoſe which an anonymous Author has put into Latin verſe (14), and has given as the genuine Fables of Æſop. I can ſee no footſtep there of the thought produced by Mr. Bourſault, and which he ſuppoſes Æſop alone capable of ſuggeſting. This by the by.

(14) They are in the ſame Edition of Nevelet.

He is in the right to ſay it would be the utmoſt extravagance to addreſs prayers to a Deity whoſe exiſtence one does not believe; but I do not know whether Des-Barreaux was ever guilty of ſuch a piece of madneſs. St. Paul ſeems to ſuppoſe that an extravagance of this kind is not to be met with among men: How, ſays he (15), ſhall they call on him, in whom they have not believed? It ſeems to me poſſible enough that thoſe who have determined nothing poſitively, either as to the exiſtence, or the non-exiſtence of God, may make ſupplications and prayers to him at the view of imminent danger. Now this is the caſe of almoſt all infidels. They doubt whether there is a God; they do not clearly know that he does exiſt; but, on the other hand, they do not clearly know that he does not exiſt. The Biſhop of Tournay begins his Reflections on Religion by this thought. It is natural for ſuch people, at the approach of death, to take the ſureſt courſe, and to recommend themſelves to the divine favour and mercy ad majorem cautelam (16). They hope to obtain ſomething by their prayers, in caſe there is a Being who hears them, and can grant their petition; and they have nothing to fear, in caſe there is no ſuch Being. But if any man was arrived at ſuch a pitch of incredulity, as to become a downright Atheiſt by firm perſuaſion of mind, and to continue in that perſuaſion while dangerouſly ſick, I do not conceive it poſſible for him to call upon God from the bottom of his heart. Let us not therefore imagine that Des-Barreaux fell into the extravagancy imputed to him, of invoking God without believing there was a God. Let us rather ſay that his cuſtom of invoking him in his ſickneſs is a ſign, either that in the time of health he did not doubt of the exiſtence of God, as is aſſerted in the Memoirs which have been communicated to me, or that at moſt he conſidered it as a diſputable problem, the affirmative of which he embraced when he feared he ſhould die. His inclination for pleaſure made him return to his former courſe and his old language, when his health was reſtored. This does not prove him to have been an Atheiſt in reality. It only proves, either that he rejected almoſt all the peculiar doctrines of poſitive Religion, or that, from a principle of pride, he was afraid of being ridiculed as having forfeited the title of a Free-thinker, if he did not continue to talk like a Libertine. It is probable enough that thoſe who affect in company to attack the moſt common truths of Religion, ſay more than they really think. Vanity has a greater ſhare in their diſputes than conſcience. They imagine that the ſingularity and boldneſs of the opinions which they maintain, will gain them the reputation of men of great parts. This tempts them to lay open the difficulties to which the doctrines of Providence and thoſe of the Goſpel are liable, againſt the perſuaſion of their own mind. By degrees, therefore, they get a habit of holding impious diſcourſes, and if their vanity be accompanied by a voluptuous life, their progreſs in that road is the ſwifter. This ill habit, contracted on one hand under the auſpices of pride, and on the other under the auſpices of ſenſuality, takes off the edge of the impreſſions of education; I mean it ſtifles the ſenſe of thoſe truths which they learned in their childhood concerning the Deity, Heaven, and Hell; but it is not a faith quite extinguiſhed; it is only fire which lies hid under aſhes. They are ſenſible of its activity ſo ſoon as they conſider, and eſpecially at the approach of danger: then we ſee them more fearful than other men (17); and they proceed even to ſuperſtition. The remembrance of having ſhewn more contempt for holy things than they really had for them, and of having endeavoured to free their minds from that yoke, redoubles their diſquiet. It has ſcarce ever been ſeen that a grave man, averſe to pleaſures and the vanities of the world, has ſet himſelf to dogmatize in company in favour of impiety, even tho' a long ſeries of ill-guided meditations has hurried him on inwardly to reject all Religion. Such a man, far from endeavouring to root out of the minds of young people the doctrines which might preſerve them from a debauched life, far from deſiring to inſpire his own opinions into thoſe who might make an ill uſe of them, or whom they might deprive of the conſolations which the hope of a bleſſed eternity cauſes them to feel in their afflictions, would rather fortify them therein out of a principle of charity and generoſity. He keeps his own opinions either wholly to himſelf, or communicates them to ſuch perſons only as he ſuppoſes incapable of making an ill uſe of them. This is what ſpeculative Atheiſts do, who have not been ſpoiled by debauchery or the ſpirit of romancing (18). The misfortune of having been too much ſtruck with a certain principle, and of having purſued it through too many gradations of conſequences, has brought them to a certain perſuaſion. The grace of God may free them from it at the ſight of death, but otherwiſe they perſiſt in their indolence in the midſt of ſickneſs, and of ſtorms, and if they conform to the ceremonies appointed by the Church for dying perſons, it is to ſpare their friends the vexatious conſequences of their rejecting the Ritual. This inclines one to believe that Libertines like Des-Barreaux are not greatly perſuaded of the truth of what they ſay. They have made no deep examination, they have learned ſome few objections, which they are perpetually making a noiſe with; they ſpeak from a principle of oſtentation, and give themſelves the lie in time of danger (19). Mr. de Balzac has characterized them very juſtly, when he ridiculed a Grammarian of Gaſcony, who braved the Deity, and yet fell into the moſt cowardly ſuperſtition on every the leaſt occaſion. The expreſſions he has made uſe of, as well in verſe as in proſe, are ſo fine that I think my ſelf obliged to tranſcribe them. Audiſti in quotidianis Comœdiis Pyrgopolinicis partes bellè agere. Audiſti uſurpantem crebro, ſibique affingentem Virgilianum illud:

(15) Romans x. 14.

(16) See the Remark [E] of the Article of BION the Boryſthenite.

(17) See above the paſſage of CHARRON, in the Remark [I] of his Article.

(18) See the Remark [C] of the Article VAYER, at the end.

(19) See the Article of BION the Boryſthenite, Remark [E] and that of HENAULT.

Felix qui potuit rerum cognoſcere cauſas,
Atque metus omnes & inexorabile fatum
Subjecit pedibus, ſtrepitumque Acherontis avari.

ons nor his friends can deny he was a great Libertine [G]; but they pretend that fame has aggravated things too much [H] according to cuſtom, and that in the latter part of his life he was convinced of the truth of Religion; in other reſpects they aſſert that he always

Ne vobis imponat verborum illa magnificentia: Hiſtrio & Recitator Virgilianus eſt, non Philoſophus Virgilianus. Meticuloſiſſimum omnium animal timet etiam non timenda. Neque ignem modò, ſed ſuſpicionem quoque ignis, & fumum è longinquo volantem, & ſubluſtriorem umbram timet. . . . . .

Vilis Grammaticus, gentis pars fœda togatæ,
Impuro tantùm ore ferox, ne credite verbis,
Corde pavet gelido, quamvis verba ardua jactet
Sæpius, & tragicas effundat in aëra voces.
Non furor hic conſtans, non Numina fortiter odit,
Intrepiduſque Polos audet ridere tonantes,
Ut quondam Capaneus Thebana ad mœnia pugnans,
Cùm non arma Jovis flammaſque timeret Olympi.
Hic dubii imbellis ventura pericula caſus,
Et ſimulachra malorum, & larvas horret inanes,
Contemptor placidique Jovis Cœlique ſereni.
Quas non ille aras, humili formidine tacta
Mente petet, quos non Superos in vota vocabit,
Si videat maris iratos inſurgere fluctus,
Sentiat aut propriis ardere incendia venis,
Inſolito-ve urgeri oppreſſum pondere pectus,
Æger, inops animi, atque inſtantis victima Fati (20)?

(20) Balzac. Epiſt. Select. pag. m. 279.

" You have heard him daily act the part of the Bully " in the Play. You have heard him frequently re- " peating and applying to himſelf this paſſage of " Virgil:

" Happy the man who, ſtudying Nature's laws,
" Thro' known effects can trace the ſecret cauſe;
" Who ſuperſtitious fears can bravely quell,
" Inexorable fate, and all the din of Hell!"

" Let not this magnificent bravado impoſe on you: " he can mimic Virgil and repeat his verſes, but " will never be ſuch a Philoſopher as Virgil was. He " is the moſt timorous animal in the world, and " dreads even thoſe things which there is no reaſon " to fear. He is afraid not only of fire, but even " the ſuſpicion of it, and ſmoke ariſing at a diſtance, " and trembles at a ſhadow by moon-ſhine. . . . . .

" Grammarian vile! ſcoundrel of abject race!
" He's bold in tongue, but truſt not to his words,
" His heart's a coward, tho' he talks ſo big,
" And vents his impious rant in tragic ſtrains.
" His rage is fickle, tim'rouſly profane,
" He dares not laugh when thunder ſhakes the poles,
" As Capaneus of old, who ſtorming Thebes
" Brav'd Jove himſelf, and fearleſs ſtood the bolt.
" This wretch dreads diſtant dangers, ills but dream't,
" And trembles at the empty forms of night,
" Who ſcorns a peaceful God, and ſerene ſky.
" But if a ſtorm excite the angry waves,
" Or if a fever burn within his veins,
" Or ſome unuſual load his breaſt oppreſs,
" To ev'ry ſhrine, and ev'ry ſaint he bows
" Submiſſive, wild with fear, of counſel void,
" An abject victim of impending fate."

Let us obſerve occaſionally, that ſeveral perſons who are fully perſuaded of the truths of Chriſtianity, forget their vows when the danger is over; which gave riſe to the proverb, Paſſato il pericolo, gabbato il ſanto. How many debauchees are there, tho' very orthodox in other reſpects, who fearing to be caſt away at ſea, or to die of a diſeaſe, promiſe God to live ſoberly if they eſcape? They do eſcape, and live as wickedly as they did before. Would one not think they acted in alluſion to thoſe human Laws which diſpenſe with a man's keeping his word, if it was obtained by ſuperior force, or in priſon, or made to an enemy who held a piſtol to his breaſt, or, in a word, while ſeized with a juſt fear, metu cadente in conſtantem virum?

[G] His friends cannot deny he was a great Libertine.] They ſay he did not diſapprove the truths of Chriſtianity, and wiſhed to be fully convinced of them; but he pretended nothing was ſo difficult to a man of wit as to believe. He was born a Catholic, but he had not the leaſt faith either in the worſhip or the doctrines of the Romiſh Religion; and he uſed to ſay that if the Goſpel and the Scripture are the rule of our actions and of our belief, there was no better Religion than the Proteſtant.

[H] . . . . But they pretend that fame has aggravated things too much.] Several people, without knowing him, have ſpoken of him as an impious perſon, and an Atheiſt; but the truth is, that excepting ſome ſallies in the heat of diſpute, which ſometimes made him puſh his arguments too far, he never diſcovered that his opinions were ſuch as to deny the exiſtence of God. He was ſometimes indeed too bold and licentious in his little rakiſh Songs. This is the import of the Memoirs which have been communicated to me. I have read in the ſecond edition of the Menagiana a thing which in my opinion deſerves not to be credited; for it is a ſtory which is told about every where, and attributed to a thouſand different people. However it be, here is Mr. Menage's ſtory. One day when Mr. Des-Barreaux and Mr. d'Elbene were together, it being in Lent, they had a mind to eat meat, but could get only ſome eggs, of which they had an omelette, or pancake, made. While they were eating it, there happened ſuch a terrible ſtorm of thunder, that it ſeemed as if the Houſe they were in would have been overturned. Mr. Des-Barreaux, without any concern, took the diſh and threw it out of the window, ſaying, Here's a noiſe indeed about an omelette (21). I give no more credit to another ſtory which I have heard. It is ſaid that Des-Barreaux, being very ſick, ſent for the Prieſts in as much haſte as if he had been an old devotee. His bed was ſurrounded with holy water, tapers, croſſes, images, and all the apparatus of the Romiſh devotion. They aſked him how he did; Judge you, anſwered he, of the ill ſtate of my body and mind by the furniture which ſurrounds me. This ſhort ſtory has been probably forged in imitation of the anſwer which Pericles returned, when he ſuffered an old woman's remedy to be hung about his neck. Ὁ γοῦν Θεόφραστος ἐν τοῖς ἠθικοῖς διαπορήσας εἰ πρὸς τὰς τύχας τρέπεται τὰ ἤθη, καὶ συμμένουσι τοῖς τῶν σωμάτων πάθεσι, ἐξίστανται τῆς ἀρετῆς, ἱστόρηκεν ὅτι νοσῶν ὁ Περικλῆς ἐπισκοπουμένῳ τινὶ τῶν φίλων δέξασθαι περίαπτον ὑπὸ τῶν γυναικῶν τῷ τραχήλῳ περιηρτημένον, ὡς σφόδρα κακῶς ἔχων, ὁπότε καὶ ταύτῃ ὑπόμενοι τὴν ἀβελτηρίαν. Scriptum reliquit in Ethicis Theophraſtus, ubi diſputat an mutentur cum fortuna mores, & corporis agitati affectibus deſciſcant à virtute, ægrum Periclem amico cuipiam, qui ipſum inviſebat, amuletum oſtendiſſe à mulieribus ex collo ſuo ſuſpenſum, quaſi, quum eas etiam toleraret ineptias, graviter admodum ægrotaret (22). i. e. " Theo- " phraſtus in his Morals, having made a moot-point " whether men's manners change with their fortunes, " and their ſouls, being jogged and diſturbed by the " ailings of their bodies, do ſtart aſide from the rules " of virtue, hath left it upon record, that Pericles, " when he was ſick, ſhewed one of his friends who " came to viſit him an amulet or charm, which the " women had hung about his neck; as much as to " ſay, that he was very ſick indeed, when he would " admit of or indure ſuch a foolery as that was."

(21) Menagiana, pag. 240, 241, of the 2d Edition of Holland.

(22) Plutarch. in Pericle, pag. 173, A.

What I am going to quote is taken from the Letters of Guy Patin. " I have juſt now been informed that " the debauched Mr. Des-Barreaux is dead; a fair " ſoul in the ſight of God, if he believed in him! " At leaſt he talked pretty much like a man who had " not a great deal of faith as to the affairs of the " other world; but he has infected a great many " poor young fellows with his Libertiniſm: his con- " verſation was very dangerous, and very peſtilent to " the public: it is ſaid he had ſome tincture of it " before he went to Italy; but at his return he was " compleatly accompliſhed: a wag uſed to ſay that " he had been ſpoiled by keeping company too much " with the Monks, none of thoſe Hermits of Thebaïs, " or of our good ſouls, who ſpend their time in devo- " tion and ſtudy, but of thoſe who are ſo numerous " in the cities of Italy, and think of nothing leſs " than of God." As Patin wrote this the 28th of May 1666 (23), it plainly appears he truſted to a falſe report of the death of Des-Barreaux. He was not yet undeceived the 18th of June following; for here ways was, according to the world, a man of probity and honour, that he had a ſincere and honeſt heart, was civil, and ready to ſerve others, charitable, a good friend, generous and liberal (b). He was never married, and had no brother, but only two ſiſters (c).

(23) This Letter is the CCCCX. See page 203 of the 3d Volume.

(b) This, and whatever in the Remarks is not ſupported by a public quotation, is taken from Memoirs which come from a good hand, the Original whereof I keep by me.

(c) See the Remark [A].

here is what he wrote in a Letter dated that day (24). "They ſay nothing of Mr. Des-Barreaux; and I "know not where he is at preſent. He lived as one "of the ſect of Cremoninus; who took no care of "their ſoul, and very little of their body, unleſs it "were to get it laid three foot under ground. He "has not failed to corrupt the minds of a great ma-"ny young people, who ſuffered themſelves to be in-"fatuated by that Libertine." What he wrote four years after about St. Pavin ſhews that he had diſcovered his news to be falſe; for he ſpeaks of Des-Barreaux as living, and a penitent. There died here a few days ſince, ſays he (25), a great ſervant of God, named Mr. de St. Pavin, a great companion of Des-Barreaux, who IS another very illuſtrious Iſraelite, ſi credere fas eſt. This diſcourſe, methinks, inſinuates plainly enough that both thoſe Libertines deſired to be taken for Converts; and thus the event would have quickly contradicted the predictions of Monſr. Boileau, who had put the converſion of St. Pavin in the number of moral impoſſibilities.

(24) It is the CCCCVII.

(25) Letter DXII. dated from Paris, the 11th of April 1670. See page 510 of the 3d Volume.

Avant qu'un tel deſſein m'entre dans la penſée,
On pourra voir la Seine à la Saint Jean glacée,
Arnaud à Charenton devenir Huguenot,
Saint Sorlin Janſéniſte, & SAINT PAVIN BIGOT (26).

(26) Boileau, Sat. 1. ver. 125.

"Er'e ſuch a thought my mind ſhall entertain,
"Ice ſhall at midſummer lock up the Seine,
"Arnauld at Charenton turn Huguenot,
"St. Sorlin Janſeniſt, and St. Pavin devout."

There is no doubt but St. Pavin was ſtill in a bad way when Mr. Boileau ſpoke of him. Whence comes it then that the learned Hadrian Valeſius places the converſion of St. Pavin on the day of Theophile's death? He is certainly miſtaken. See the Valeſiana (27); you will alſo meet with ſomething there concerning our Des-Barreaux: "I ſaw Meſſieurs Des-"Barreaux and Bardouville when I was young: they "were great companions, and diſciples of Theophi-"le..... As to Mr. Des-Barreaux, after he had "made himſelf the ſubject of a great deal of talk in "Paris, finding old age come on, he gave himſelf up "to devotion. Some detractor or other, who thought "his reformation did not proceed from a pure motive "of piety, made this epigram upon him at that time.

(27) Pag. 92. of the Dutch Edition.

"Des Barreaux ce vieux débauché
"Affecte une Réforme auſtere:
"Il ne s'eſt pourtant retranché
"Que ce qu'il ne ſauroit plus faire (28).

(28) Ibid. pag. 31.

"Des-Barreaux, that old worn out rake,
"Pretending ſtrictly to reform,
"Has done no more than juſt forſake
"What he no longer could perform."

DIACCETO. See JACCETIUS.

DIAGORAS, a famous Athlet or Wreſtler of the Iſle of Rhodes, reckoned one of the moſt illuſtrious men of Antiquity among his anceſtors [A]. The glory which he acquired by his victories at the public Games of Greece, became extremely remarkable by thoſe which his ſons, and the ſons of his daughters (a), obtained there. He once carried two of his ſons thither: they won the crown, and taking their father on their ſhoulders, carried him through an incredible multitude of ſpectators who threw flowers on them by handfuls, and applauded his glory and good fortune (b). Some Authors ſay he was ſo tranſported with joy on this occaſion, that he died of it [B]. But there is reaſon to

(a) See above the Remark [C] of the Article BERENICE, the daughter, ſiſter, and mother, &c.

(b) Extracted from Pauſanias, lib. 6. pag. 184.

[A] He reckoned one of the moſt illuſtrious men of Antiquity among his anceſtors.] I mean that he was deſcended from a daughter of Ariſtomenes, the greateſt Hero that ever was among the Meſſenians. This Ariſtomenes had beſtowed two of his daughters in marriage, and had a third left. Damagetus, King of Jalyſus in the Iſle of Rhodes, demanded her in marriage, becauſe the Oracle of Delphi had counſelled him to marry the daughter of the worthieſt man in Greece. Ariſtomenes did not only conſent to give him his daughter, but conducted her to the Iſle of Rhodes himſelf. Damagetus had by this wife a ſon named Diagoras. If Pauſanias, who ſupplies me with all this (1), meant that Diagoras the Athlet, the father and grandfather of ſo many victorious Athlets, was the ſon of Damagetus by the daughter of Ariſtomenes, he had not well conſulted Chronology. In one place he ſays (2) that death prevented Ariſtomenes from viſiting Ardys and Phraortes, the former King of Lydia, and ſon of Gyges, and the latter King of the Medes: and in another place (3) he aſſerts that Dorieus, the ſon of Diagoras the Athlet, lived in the time of Conon the Athenian General. Now the reign of Ardys reaches from the ſecond year of the 26th Olympiad to the 3d year of the 37th (4). Phraortes reigned from the ſecond year of the 31ſt Olympiad to the laſt year of the 36th; and Conon flouriſhed about the 96th Olympiad: it is therefore againſt all probability that Dorieus, the contemporary of Conon, ſhould be the ſon of a man whoſe father married in the reign of Phraortes. See below the Remark [D] and [F].

(1) Lib. 4. pag. 234.

(2) Ibid.

(3) Lib. 6. pag. 285.

(4) See Calviſius.

Note, when we examine the Greek of Pauſanias a little more carefully than Romulus Amaſeus, his Latin Tranſlator, did, we find that Diagoras the Wreſtler was the ſon of a Damagetus whoſe father, named Dorieus (5), was the ſon of Damagetus by the daughter of Ariſtomenes.

(5) It is τοῦ Δωρίεως in the Editions of Pauſanias, lib. 4; but according to the conjecture of Camerarius, it ſhould be read Δωριέως, as in the 6th Book.

[B] Some Authors relate that he was ſo tranſported with joy . . . . . that he died.] I believe this is no where to be found but in Aulus Gellius among the Ancients, and that it is he who ought in this reſpect to be deemed the original of a vaſt number of more modern Authors, who have cited this example whenever they ſpeak of joy as a thing capable of killing. When I ſay Aulus Gellius has been their original, I do not ſuppoſe that they all conſulted him: he is the immediate original with regard to ſome, and by reduction with regard to all the reſt. Here is what he ſays: he does not relate the fact ſo ſimply as Pauſanias does; but no doubt he added ſome rhetorical embelliſhments. De Rhodio etiam Diagora celebrata hiſtoria eſt. Is Diagoras tres filios adoleſcentes habuit, unum pugilem, alterum pancratiaſtem, tertium luctatorem; eoſque omnes vidit vincere coronarique eodem Olympiæ die: & quum ibi eum tres adoleſcentes amplexi, coronis ſuis in caput patris poſitis, ſuaviarentur, quumque populus gratulabundus flores undique in eum jaceret: ibi in ſtadio, inſpectante populo, in oſculis atque in manibus filiorum animam efflavit (6), i. e. "There is alſo a celebrated "ſtory of Diagoras the Rhodian. This Diagoras had "three young men for his ſons, one a Boxer, the ſe-"cond a Pancratiaſt, and the third a Wreſtler; all of "whom he ſaw crowned Victors in the Olympic "Games on the ſame day: and when the three young "men embraced their father, and putting their crowns "on his head, kiſſed him, while the people congra-"tulated him, and threw flowers on him from every "ſide; he expired in the ſtadium, in the ſight of the "people, amidſt the kiſſes and embraces of his ſons."

(6) Aulus Gellius, Noct. Attic. lib. 3. cap. 15.

to believe this is false [C]. The time in which he lived may be found in one of the Authors quoted by Moreri [D]; but those Authors do not say that the occasion of his death is differently reported. Yet this is what Moreri asserts [E].

Since the first impression of this Article, I have found in the Works of Pindar an Ode made by him in honour of Diagoras. We there learn (c) that this Athlet had twice obtained the victory in the Games of Rhodes, four times in the Isthmian Games, and twice in the Nemean; and that he had been victorious in the Games celebrated at Athens, at Argos, in Arcadia, at Thebes, in Bœotia, in the Island of Ægina, at Pellene

(c) Pindar. Ode VII Olympior.

[C] . . . . . There is reason to believe this is false.] The fact would have been too singular to be omitted by those who have spoken amply of Diagoras: I cannot conceive that Pausanias, who speaks of him so sedately (7), and with several digressions, could have passed over a death of this kind in silence, if he had heard it discoursed of as a certain event. Now without doubt he would have heard of it as such, if the thing had been certain. Observe, that he not only explains to us the situation of the statues which were erected to Diagoras, his sons, and his grandsons, and touches on many particular circumstances which concern that family; but he speaks also of the glorious day, on which this man saw himself honoured with so many applauses and felicitations, on account of the victories of his sons. Could he have avoided making this Remark, that Diagoras died of joy under the flowers which they threw on him, and amidst the blessings of the Assembly? Let us take the silence of Pausanias, therefore, for a proof of Aulus Gellius's bad discernment. Cicero and Plutarch furnish us with another proof. They both relate what was said to Diagoras on the day of that signal victory. A Lacedæmonian accosted him, to exhort him not to lose so glorious an opportunity of dying. Would there have been any occasion for such a remonstrance if he had actually died of joy? Would he not have prevented that Lacedæmonian's smart saying, and put it out of the power of Cicero or Plutarch, or any other Moralist, ever to have alledged the example of Diagoras in the manner they have done? They have produced him, not as a man who died of joy on the very pinnacle of his good fortune, but as a man to whom it was represented that he would do well to die at such a conjuncture. Is not this a convincing proof against Aulus Gellius? I shall observe that Cicero and Plutarch report the thought of the Lacædemonian so differently, that a negative and an affirmative are not more opposite. They agree only in the general aim, which is to prove that death ought not to be grievous to those who enjoy great felicity. Die, Diagoras; for now wilt thou go to heaven. Secundis suis rebus volet etiam mori, non enim tam cumulus bonorum jucundus esse potest, quam molesta decessio. Hanc sententiam significare videtur Laconis illa vox, qui quum Rhodius Diagoras Olympionices nobilis uno die duos suos filios victores Olympiæ vidisset, accessit ad senem, & gratulatus, Morere, Diagora, inquit; nunc enim in cœlum ascensurus es. Magna hæc & nimium fortasse Græci putant, vel tum potius putabant. Isque qui hoc Diagoræ dixit, permagnum existimans patrem quum duobus filiis treis Olympionicas una ex domo prodire, cunctari illum diutius in vita fortunæ objectum inutile putabat ipsi (8). i. e. "He would also wish to die in his prosperity; for the "flow of good fortune cannot be so pleasing, as the "ebb is displeasing. This seems to be the meaning "of that sentence of the Lacedæmonian, who when "Diagoras of Rhodes, a noble victor in the Olympic "Games, had seen his two sons obtain the crown at "Olympia on one day, approached the old man, and "congratulating him said, Die, Diagoras; for now wilt "thou go to heaven. The Grecians think, or rather "then thought, this a great, and perhaps an excessive "felicity; and he who said this to Diagoras judged "it a most extraordinary thing that three victors in "the Olympic games, a father and two sons, should "proceed from one family, and therefore deemed it "unnecessary for him to live any longer, exposed to "the caprice of fortune." This was the compliment according to Cicero; and it was as follows according to Plutarch, Die, Diagoras; for thou canst not go to heaven. Οὐ γὰρ (ὡς Αἴσωπος ἔφασκε) χαλεπώτατός ἐστιν ὁ τῶν εὐτυχεστάτων θάνατος, ἀλλὰ μακαριώτατος εἰς ἀσφαλῆ χώραν τὰς εὐπραξίας κατατιθέμενος τῶν ἀγαθῶν καὶ τύχην μεταβαλλομένας ἀπολιπών. διὸ βέλτιον ὁ Λάκων τὸν ὀλυμπιονίκην Διαγόραν ἐπιδόντα μὲν υἱοὺς στεφανηφόρους ὀλυμπιάσιν, ἐπιδόντα δ' υἱωνοὺς καὶ δυναστείας, ἀσπασάμενος, Κάτθανε (εἶπε) Διαγόρα, εἰς τὸν Ὄλυμπον οὐκ ἀναβήσῃ. Non enim (ut Æsopus ait) mors est felicium acerbissima, verum beatissima: quæ res bonorum virorum lætas securo loco deposuit, & fortunæ declinavit conversionem. Melius ergo Lacon ille qui Olympionicen Diagoram, quum spectasset filios ille victores Olympiæ, spectasset etiam nepotes ex filiis & filiabus, salutans, Morere Diagora, inquit: non enim in cœlum ascensurus es (9). i. e. "For, as Æsop observes, the death of the happy "men is not the most grievous, but most blessed, "since it secures their felicity, and puts it out of for-"tune's power. And that Spartan advised well, who "embracing Diagoras, who had himself been crown-"ed in the Olympian Games, and saw his sons and "grand-children victors, said, Die, Diagoras; for thou "canst not ascend to heaven." This Lacedæmonian's argument is, I confess, obscure to me, which way soever it be turned, either as Cicero has done, or as Plutarch. I should understand it a little better according to the sense of the latter; I should imagine that the Lacedæmonian had argued in this manner: You are arrived at the highest pitch of glory to which you can aspire, for you must not promise yourself that if you lived yet a long while you would mount to heaven; die therefore, that you may not run the risque of a fall. I advise those who have nothing of greater consequence to do to examine this whole matter. Volaterranus has made an innovation in it (10). The subject may furnish many subtile and even learned observations. For my part, I will content myself with citing the Poet Terence, who makes one of his dramatical persons say:

Nunc est profecto interfici cum me perpeti possum,
Ne hoc gaudium contaminet vita ægritudine aliqua (11).

"Now could I willingly suffer my self to be killed,
"Lest a longer life should taint my joy by some displeasure."

(7) Lib. 6. pag. 184.

(8) Cicero, Tusc. 1, circa finem, folio 253, D. Edit. Basil. 1528. Take notice that in the later Editions they have put non enim, instead of nunc enim; in which case the Spartan's words should be rendred, Die Diagoras; for thou canst not go to heaven.

(9) Plutarch. in Pelopida, pag. 297, A, B.

(10) Diagoras Rhodius cum se victorem duosque Olympionicas filios vidisset, Nunc, ait, tibi Diagora moriendum ne amplius Olympiam ascendas, quod sane præ gaudio accidit. Autores Plin. Gellius. i. e. "Diagoras the "Rhodian, "when he saw "himself and "his two sons "Victors in the "Olympian "Games, said, "Now, Diagoras, you ought "to die, that "you may never come up "to Olympia "more; which "really happened to him thro' "excess of joy. "My Authors "are Pliny and "Gellius." Volaterran. lib. 15, pag. 539. Pliny says nothing of this; and Gellius does not relate it in this manner.

(11) Terent. Eunuch. Act. 3. Scen. 5. ver. 3.

[D] The time wherein he lived may be found in one of the Authors quoted by Moreri.] It is not with precision, but in general, and in this manner. Dorieus, the third son of Diagoras, was expelled Rhodes with his brother Pisidorus. They retired to Thurium in Italy, and thence it came to pass that when they were crowned at the Games, the public crier called them Thurians. Dorieus returned to Rhodes, when the faction which had expelled him was no longer uppermost. He openly sided with the Lacedæmonians in the war of Peloponnesus, fitted out some ships at his own expence, and fought like a lyon against the Athenians. They hated him to that degree, that having taken him prisoner they resolved to treat him very ill; but his presence struck the Assembly: they were touched to see a person in captivity whose glory had been so transcendent, and they restored him his liberty (12). The Lacedæmonians were not so generous: they took him as he was on a journey near Peloponnesus, at the time that the Rhodians, by the instigation of Conon, made an alliance with the Persians and Athenians, and treated him as a State-Criminal, that is, they put him to death. Conon disengaged the Rhodians from the alliance of the Lacedæmonians (13) in the 96th Olympiad (14). Hence we may know in general the time of Diagoras.

THE History of Dorieus the son of Diagoras.

(12) Pausan. lib. 6. pag. 184, 185.

(13) Androtion, in Commentarijs Rerum Atticar. apud Pausaniam, ibid.

(14) Diod. Sicul. lib. 14.

[E] . . . but those Authors do not say . . . . what Moreri asserts.] If Plutarch, Pausanias, Aulus Gellius, and Cicero (15), related somewhat differently the occasion of Diagoras's death, as Moreri asserts, some of them must have attributed his death to one cause, and some to another; but this is what they have not done. Aulus Gellius makes him die of joy; the other three say not one word of his death.

(15) These are the four Authors whom Moreri cites.

lene (d), and at Megara. This Ode was made on the crown of the exerciſe of boxing, which he won at the Olympic Games celebrated the 79th Olympiad (e). Neither his father Damagetus, nor Tlepolemus, the founder of the Rhodians, and the ſtock of the family, were forgotten. On the contrary, it may be ſaid that Pindar's Digreſſion on the Adventures of Tlepolemus is ſomewhat prolix. However it be, we learn thence that our Diagoras was deſcended from Jupiter [F]. Others ſay his extraction was immediately divine [G]. This Ode of Pindar was placed in a Temple of Minerva in Letters of gold (f).

(d) Six times.

(e) See Benedictus in Pindar. ibid. pag. 123.

(f) See ibid.

[F] Our Diagoras was deſcended from Jupiter.] For Tlepolemus was the ſon of Hercules and Aſtydamia, the daughter of Amyntor (16). Some ſay Amyntor alſo deduced his extraction from Jupiter (17); and ſo Diagoras could have carried his pedigree up to the greateſt of the Gods, as well in the male line as in the female, beginning from Tlepolemus.

(16) Pindar Ode VII Olymp.

(17) See Benedictus in Pindar. ibid. pag. 129.

[G] Others ſay his Extraction was immediately divine.] An old Scholiaſt tells us there was a Tradition that Diagoras was the ſon of Mercury, and that the thing happened in this manner. His mother walking out in the fields, and finding her ſelf incommoded by the exceſſive heat of the weather, went and repoſed herſelf under the ſhade of a wood. Mercury, to whom that wood was conſecrated, laying hold on the opportunity, enjoyed the woman; and this gave birth to Diagoras. Nobody had been born in that manner ſince Hercules. Ὁ δὲ πρῶτος ἀφ' Ἡρακλέους λέγεται τοιοῦτος γένεσθαι. Theſe are the terms of the Scholiaſt (18). We may juſtly complain that Benedictus has tranſlated them obſcurely; qui primus, ſays he (19), ab Hercule tantus dicitur habitus. Note, it is very true that it has been ſaid, that after Hercules no woman was with child by Jupiter (20); but it is not true that this has been ſaid of the other Gods with regard to the whole time which paſſed from Hercules to Diagoras. The latter was yet living in the 79th Olympiad, a long while after the birth of Romulus, the fruit of the embraces of the God Mars and Rhea Silvia.

(18) See the Greek Summary of the 7th Ode of Pindar's Olympics, pag. 77. of the Oxford Edition, 1698.

(19) Benedictus in Pindar. pag. 123.

(20) See the Remark [N] of the Article HERCULES.

DIAGORAS, ſurnamed the Atheiſt (a), lived in the 91ſt Olympiad [A]. It might be ſaid that he was a Philoſopher of Athens; for he philoſophized in that city: but he was not a native of it. He was born either in the Iſle of Melos, one of the Cyclades, or in the city of Melia in Caria [B]. Prepoſſeſſion as an Author, and an exceſſive fondneſs for a production of his own mind, drew him into impiety [C]. He was one of the moſt downright and determined Atheiſts in the world: for he made uſe of no equivocations, nor any ſubterfuge; but flatly denied there were any Gods [D]. The Athenians ſummoned him to give an account of his doctrine, but he took to flight, whereupon they ſet

(a) Cicero, de Natur. Deor. lib. 1, & 3, cap. 6; Diodor. Sicul. lib. 13. cap. 6; Lactant. de Ira Dei, cap. 9; & multi alij.

[A] He lived in the 91*ſt Olympiad.*] It was then that he forſook the country of the Athenians, to eſcape being puniſhed for his Atheiſm (1). Euſebius, therefore, has been miſtaken, in placing him under the 74th Olympiad. Scaliger (2) has taken notice of this error, in which he found a miſcomputation of ſixty ſix years: it ſhould be ſixty ſeven; for he obſerves that in the 2d year of the 91ſt Olympiad the Athenians promiſed a reward of a talent to him who ſhould kill Diagoras, and two talents to him who ſhould bring him alive. Now Euſebius has placed Diagoras under the 3d year of the 74th Olympiad; ſo that he has committed a miſtake of ſixty ſeven years. Voſſius (3) has not avoided this error. Lactantius has been more miſtaken the other way, that is, by making Diagoras not ſo ancient as he was. He not only makes him live after Epicurus, but even after the ages wherein Philoſophy flouriſhed: for he brings him down to the times when that Science was decayed. Verum iis poſtea temporibus quibus jam philoſophia defloruerat, extitit Athenis quidam Diagoras qui nullum eſſe omnino Deum diceret, ob eamque ſententiam nominatus eſt ἄθεος (4). i. e. "But in ſucceeding times, "when Philoſophy no longer flouriſhed, there ap- "peared at Athens one Diagoras, who aſſerted there "was no God at all; and for that opinion he was "ſurnamed the Atheiſt."

(1) Diodor. Siculus, lib. 13. cap. 6.

(2) Ad num. 1535, pag. 101.

(3) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Græcis, pag. 436.

(4) Lactant. de Ira Dei, cap. 9.

[B] The Iſle of Melos . . . . or the City of Melia . . . was the place of his birth.] He is ſurnamed Melius; which is the Epithet given him by Cicero (5), Ælian (6), and Diogenes Laertius (7). Euſtathius (8), who calls him a Mileſian, is miſtaken: Voſſius, who makes him an Athenian, is miſtaken alſo. I ſay he makes him an Athenian; for having ſpoken of the Philoſopher Diagoras, he adds puto eundem eſſe Diagoram Athenienſem, qui reliquit ſermones Phrygios (9). i. e. "I take him to be the ſame with Diagoras the "Athenian, who left behind him the Phrygian Diſ- "courſes." He quotes the words of Tatian wherein he ſays that Diagoras was of Athens, Διαγόρας Ἀθηναῖος ἦν. Creſollius (10) ſpeaks only of Diagoras an Athenian, the ſame with him who is cited by Tatian; ſo that as Tatian, in all appearance, meant no other than the ſame Diagoras who was ſurnamed the Atheiſt, we muſt conclude that they were all ignorant what countryman he was. Volaterranus and Benedictus have followed the error of Euſtathius, the former in the 15th Book of his Compilation, the other in his Commentary on Pindar (11).

(5) Lib. 1. de Natur. Deor.

(6) Lib. 2. cap. 23. Var. Hiſt.

(7) In Diogene, lib. 6. num. 59.

(8) In Odyſſ. lib. 3.

(9) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Græc. pag. 436.

(10) Theatr. Sophiſtar. pag. 72.

[C] Prepoſſeſſion as an Author . . drew him into impiety.] The matter happened thus. He delighted in making verſes, and had compoſed a Poem which a certain Poet ſtole from him. He ſued the thief; who ſwore he was not guilty of the crime, and ſoon after publiſhed that Work as his own, which gained him great reputation. Diagoras, conſidering that he who had injured him had not only eſcaped unpuniſhed for his theft and perjury, but had alſo acquired glory thereby, concluded there was no Providence, nor any Gods; and wrote ſome Books to prove it. It is Heſychius Illuſtrius (12) who tells this ſtory. It muſt be confeſſed that no Author was ever more enamoured of his own Works than Diagoras, nor dared to rate them at ſo high a price. What, becauſe Diagoras miſt the glory which he expected from one of his Books, muſt the whole Univerſe ſuffer, muſt Nature be deprived of her director and preſerver? What compenſation is this? Let me not be told that my Reflection is forced: I agree there is ſomething falſe and overſtrained in this turn; but I aver that Diagoras would not have argued as he did, if he had not a particular eſteem, and a very intimate affection, for the good he had loſt. I do not know whether the proſperity of a wicked man ever occaſioned thoſe to doubt a Providence who felt the good effects of that proſperity, or who at leaſt received no hurt from it. We ſhall ſee in the following Remark ſome other cauſes of Diagoras's impiety.

(11) Benedictus, in Pindar. Ode 7 Olymp. pag. 123.

(12) In Διαγόρ.

[D] He flatly denied there were any Gods.] Thus are his dogms characterized, when they are to be diſtinguiſhed from thoſe of Protagoras, who only made Religion a diſputable problem. In hac quæſtione plerique, quod maxime veriſimile eſt, & quo omnes duce natura vehimur, deos eſſe dixerunt: dubitare ſe Protagoras: NULLOS ESSE OMNINO Diagoras Melius & Theodorus Cyrenaicus putaverunt (13. i. e. "As to "this Queſtion, moſt people, according to the greater "probability, and the general guidance of nature, "have affirmed there are Gods: Protagoras declared "that he doubted; but Diagoras the Melian and "Theodorus the Cyrenæan thought there were NO "GODS AT ALL." It is very likely, therefore, that Valerius Maximus is miſtaken, when he ſays Diagoras was baniſhed from Athens for having ſaid that he set a price on his head (b). They publiſhed by ſound of trumpet a reward of a talent to any who ſhould kill him, and two to any who ſhould bring him alive; and they cauſed this Decree to be engraved on a pillar of braſs. Their ſeverity extended very far [E]; but they could not get him apprehended, for he took ſhipping and was caſt away (c). Tatian (d) tells us that he was puniſhed for having openly divulged the myſteries of the Athenians [F]. Some learned men gueſs that the Book he attributes to him treated of the (b) Diodor. Sicul. ibid.

(13) Cicero, de Natura Deorum, lib. 1. init. He ſays in the ſame Book: Quid, Diagoras, Atheos qui dictus eſt, poſteaque Theodorus, nonne aperte Deorum naturam ſuſtulerunt? Nam Abderites quidem Protagoras . . . cum in principio libri ſui ſic poſuiſſet, de Diis neque ut ſint neque ut non ſint habeo dicere, Athenienſium juſſu urbe atque agro eſt exterminatus. See Lactant. de Ira Dei, cap. 9.

(c) Athen. lib. 13. pag. 611.

(d) Suidas, in Διαγόρας, and Melanthes, in Libro de Myſteriis, apud Scholiaſten Ariſtophanis in Avib. folio 139 verſo, Edit. Florent. 1525.

he knew not whether there were any Gods, and that if there were, he knew not their nature. Athenienſes Diagoram Philoſophum pepulerunt, quia ſcribere auſus fuerat, primum ignorare ſe an Dii eſſent: deinde, ſi ſint, quales ſint (14). This ſuits Protagoras perfectly well, but Diagoras not in the leaſt; and conſequently Valerius Maximus has taken the one for the other (15): this is uſual enough with him. Moreri copies him without miſtruſting any thing, and falls into ſeveral faults of omiſſion according to cuſtom. See above (16) the paſſage of Athenagoras, and the Remark [G], where we ſhall ſay ſomething of the Title of a Book of Diagoras againſt the Deity. What Sextus Empiricus obſerves merits our attention. Diagoras had been as ſuperſtitious as any perſon whatever, and had began his Poems in a devout manner: but no ſooner did he ſee the perjured fellow who had wronged him eſcape with impunity, than he maintained there were no Gods. Διαγόρας δὲ ὁ Μήλιος, διθυραμβοποιὸς, ὡς φασι, τὸ πρῶτον γενόμενος, ὡς εἴτις ἄλλος δεισιδαίμων· ὃς γε καὶ τῆς ποιήσεως ἑαυτῷ κατήρξατο τὸν τρόπον τοῦτον· κατὰ δαίμονα καὶ τύχην πάντα τελεῖται· ἀδικηθεὶς δὲ ὑπό τινος ἐπιορκήσαντος καὶ μηδὲν ἕνεκα τούτου παθόντος, μεθημόσατο εἰς τὸ λέγειν μὴ εἶναι θεούς. Diagoras autem Melius, qui fuit, ut dicunt, primum Dithyrambicus, ut ſi quis alius ſuperſtitioſus, qui etiam poëſim ſuam inchoavit hoc modo,

A Dæmone & fortuna fiunt omnia.

Injuria autem affectus ab aliquo qui pejeraverat, & propterea nihil paſſus fuerat, eò deductus eſt ut diceret non eſſe Deum (17). i. e. "Diagoras the Melian "was at firſt, they ſay, a Dithyrambic Poet, and as "ſuperſtitious a man as any in the world: he began "his Poem in this manner,

"By God and Fortune all things are perform'd.

"But having been injured by a perjured villain, "who ſuffered no puniſhment on that account, he "was induced to ſay there was no God." The Scholiaſt on Ariſtophanes aſſures us that Diagoras, who greatly feared God before, ran headlong into Atheiſm on loſing a depoſit by the fraud of the perſon whom he had intruſted with it. Διαγόρας ὁ Μήλιος τὸ πρότερον ὢν θεοσεβὴς, παρακαταθήκην ὑπό τινος ἀποστερηθεὶς ἐπὶ τὸ ἄθεον ἐξέβαμεν (18). This depoſit did not conſiſt in Verſes, but in effects or money (19). We read in the ſame Scholiaſt that Diagoras became an Atheiſt becauſe the Athenians had ſubdued his country (20). To this, methinks, refers what the ſame Scholiaſt relates in another place; that the Edict of proſcription which was publiſhed againſt that impious perſon, becauſe he divulged the myſteries, and diſſuaded people from initiating themſelves therein, was chiefly publiſhed at the taking of Melos, for before that time he hindred nobody from initiating themſelves. The Edict offered a talent to whoever ſhould kill him, and two to whoever ſhould apprehend him. Οὕτω γὰρ ἐκήρυξαν τὸν μὲν ἀποκτείναντα αὐτὸν τάλαντον λαμβάνειν, τὸν δὲ ἀγαγόντα δύο. ἐκηρύχθη δὲ τοῦτο διὰ τὸ ἀσεβὲς αὐτοῦ ἐπὶ τὰ μυστήρια πᾶσι δηλοῦντος καινοποιῶν αὐτά. καὶ τοὺς βουλομένους μυεῖσθαι ἀποτρέπων καθάπερ Κρατερὸς ἱστορεῖ. ἐκκεκήρυκται δὲ μάλιστα ὑπὸ τοῦ ἅλωσιν τῆς Μήλου, διὸν γὰρ κωλύω πρότερον (21). Craterus did not forget this Edict in his Collection of the Decrees of the Athenians. We have juſt now ſeen that the Scholiaſt of Ariſtophanes quotes this Collection. He cites him alſo in his Notes on the Comedy of the Frogs, Act I, Scene VII. Conſult the 105th folio of the Edition of Florence, 1525.

(14) Val. Max. lib. 1. cap. 1, ſub fin.

(15) See Leopardus, Emendat. lib. 11. cap. 11.

(16) Citation (15).

(17) Sextus Empiric. adverſ. Mathematic. pag. 318.

(18) Scholiaſt. Ariſtoph. in Nub. Act. 3. Scen. 1.

(19) Ὃς χρήματα παρατεθέντος τινὶ καὶ ἀποστερηθεὶς εἰς ἄθεον ἐτράπη. Ibid.

(20) Ἢ διότι Μηλονιπολεμήσαν Ἀττικοί. Ibid.

(21) Scholiaſt. Ariſtoph. in Avib. folio 193 verſo, Edit. Flor. 1525.

[E] The ſeverity of the Athenians extended very far.] For beſides ſetting a price on the head of Diagoras, as we have juſt now ſaid, they perſuaded all the people of Peloponneſus to do as much. This is what may be gathered from the Scholiaſt of Ariſtophanes, in the paſſage I have cited of his Notes on the Comedy of the Frogs. He borrows this from Craterus. In another place he cites Menander, who had ſaid in his Treatiſe of Myſteries, that the proſcription regarded not only Diagoras, but alſo the Pellanians (22), becauſe they had publiſhed his Work (23). The ſame Scholiaſt relates that the indignation of the Athenians againſt Diagoras provoked them to do a great deal of miſchief to Melos the native country of that Atheiſt. Ἐφ ᾧ οἱ Ἀθηναῖοι ἀγανακτήσαντες, τὴν Μῆλον ἐκάκωσαν (24). The Melians got ſo ill a character after the affair of Diagoras (25), that it is believed Ariſtophanes (26) gave Socrates the ſurname of Melian, only to make him paſs for an Atheiſt. "Ariſtophanes gave this name to Socrates, becauſe he "had been the diſciple of Ariſtagoras, who was of "the Iſle of Melos, and becauſe all the Melians had "the reputation of being Atheiſts ſince the Philoſopher Diagoras, who took it into his head to deny "the being of a Deity." It is Mademoiſelle le Fevre who ſays this in the 349th page of her Notes on the Clouds of Ariſtophanes. She took it from the old Scholiaſt, and conſequently it is not againſt her, but againſt him, that I am going to make an obſervation. The Decree of the Athenians againſt the impious Diagoras was publiſhed in the 1ſt year of the 91ſt Olympiad (27): it was after that time, therefore, that the Melians muſt have had this ill reputation. Now Socrates was at that time above fifty years old: therefore ſeveral years muſt have paſſed ſince the Lectures given him by Ariſtagoras: and it would have been a very ſcurvy jeſt to carry ſo high, and by ſo retroactive an effect, the ſlanders which Diagoras raiſed againſt his country. Ariſtagoras would then have been in his grave, or at leaſt very aged. Who can conceive that Ariſtophanes could have perſuaded himſelf that he ſhould do a great prejudice to Socrates, by making the people remember that Ariſtagoras the Melian had taught Socrates? I might propoſe another Objection. The Comedy of the Clouds, wherein Socrates is called a Melian, was acted before the proſcription of Diagoras (28): but if we believe the Scholiaſts (29), there are things in this Comedy which relate to facts poſterior to the proſcription; ſo I inſiſt not on this difficulty. But as neither Diogenes Laertius, nor his Commentators, know any thing at all of this Ariſtagoras the Melian, the maſter of Socrates, I ſuſpect a little that the word Ariſtagoras has ſlipped into the Scholia of Ariſtophanes inſtead of Diagoras. What fortifies my conjecture is to ſee that the Scholiaſt gives two characters to his Ariſtagoras, which ſuit Diagoras (30): he makes him a Dithyrambic Poet, and a profaner of the myſteries. In another place of thoſe Scholia (31) it is ſaid that Diagoras was contemporary with Simonides and Pindar; according to which ſuppoſition he might have taught Socrates.

[F] Tatian relates that he was puniſhed for having divulged the myſteries of the Athenians.] Here are the words of Tatian (32). Διαγόρας Ἀθηναῖος ἦν, ἀλλὰ τοῦτον ἐξορχησάμενον τὰ παρ' Ἀθηναίοις μυστήρια, μιμήματι· καὶ τοῖς φευγίοις αὐτῶν λόγοις ἐντυγχάνοντες ἡμᾶς μεμισήκατε. Diagoras Athenienſis erat, ſed quod myſteria apud Athenienſes prophanaſſet, punitus eſt: hujus Phrygios libros cum legatis, nos odiſtis. I do not know whether a good Rhetorician would have reaſoned thus: You have puniſhed a man who had profaned the myſteries; and though you read his Books, yet you hate us. Tatian's aim is to ſhew that the hatred the Gentiles bore the Chriſtians was unjuſt; and to prove it, he alledges two things to them: one, that they had puniſhed the profane Diagoras; the other that they read his Books. Methinks there was no great addreſs in calling to remembrance the ancient ſeverity of the Athenians againſt thoſe who had ridiculed the Religion of the Greeks, as the Chriſtians then did. Beſides, did not Tatian ſee that it was eaſy to anſwer him? When you ſhall have been treated as Diagoras

(22) Perhaps we ſhould read Pallenians, and underſtand them to be the inhabitants of Pallene, a Borough of Attica according to Stephanus Byzantinus.

(23) Ἐν ᾗ ἐκηκήρυξαν καὶ αὐτὸν καὶ τοὺς ἐκδιδύντας Πελλανεῖς. Schol. Ariſtoph. in Avib. folio 193 verſo.

(24) Idem, in Nub. Act. 3. Sc. 1. folio 78.

(25) Διεβέβλητο δὲ ἐπὶ ἀθηναίοις οἱ Μήλιοι ἀπὸ Διαγόρου. Idem, ibid.

(26) In Nub. Act. 3. Scen. 1.

(27) Diod. Siculus, lib. 13. cap. 6.

(28) The firſt year of the 89th Olympiad, and afterwards reviſed the year following. See Samuel Petit. Miſcell. lib. 1. cap. 6.

(29) Samuel Petitus, ibid.

(30) Ἐπειδὴ τὸν Ἀριστοφάνης διθυραμβοποιὸς ἐξεχρήσατο τὰ ἐλεεινά. Scholiaſt. Ariſtoph. ibid.

(31) Idem, ibid. folio 105.

(32) Tatian. contra Græcos, pag. m. 164.

the myſteries of the Goddeſs Cybele [G]. Others ſay that Diagoras dictated very juſt Laws to the Legiſlator of the Mantineans [H]. Cicero mentions ſome profane repartees of was, your Books will be treated as his are: there will be ſome curious people who will preſerve the Writings you compoſe againſt our Gods, you need not fear it; only ſuffer a puniſhment like that of Diagoras which you have reminded us of. I deſire to be excuſed if I ſometimes take notice of defects in reaſoning. It is of greater uſe to point out them to young Readers, than to ſhew them a falſe fact. I return to my Text.

Athenagoras and Suidas acquaint us with this ſame diſcovery of the Athenian myſteries. I put Suidas's words in the margin (33); which ſhew that this impious perſon was not contented with letting all the World know what thoſe myſteries were; he alſo laughed at them, and diſſuaded thoſe from initiating themſelves who had a mind to it. We have already cited the Scholiaſt of Ariſtophanes (34) for this fact. Let us ſee what Athenagoras ſays. Διαγόρᾳ μὲν γὰρ εἰκότως ἀθεότητα ἐπικάλων Ἀθηναῖοι, μὴ μόνον τὸν Ὀρφικὸν εἰς μέσον κατατιθέντι λόγον, καὶ τὰ ἐν Ἐλευσῖνι καὶ τὰ τῶν Καβείρων δημεύοντι μυστήρια, καὶ τὸ τοῦ Ἡρακλέους, ἵνα τοὺς γογγύλους ἕψοι, κατακόπτοντι ξόανον. ἄντικρυς δὲ ἀποφαινομένῳ μηδὲ ὅλως εἶναι Θεόν: Diagoræ quidem ſacrilegam impietatem jure damnabant Athenienſes, qui cum arcanos Orphei ſermones vulgo exponebat, tum Eleuſinia & Cabirorum myſteria publicabat: & Herculis ſtatuam, ne ligna rapis coquendis deeſſent, diſſecabat: denique palam & diſertè Deum eſſe negabat (35). i. e. "The Athenians very juſtly condemned "the ſacrilegious impiety of Diagoras, who not only "expoſed the ſecret Diſcourſes of Orpheus, and the "myſteries of Eleuſis and the Cabiri; but he cleft "the ſtatue of Hercules in pieces, to ſupply wood "for boiling his turneps; and moreover, he publick-"ly and flatly denied there was a God." Read the ſequel of his Diſcourſe, and you will find a ſolid argument founded on the capital difference there was between the Chriſtians and Diagoras. The latter having ridiculed the Gods, and the Grecian Myſteries, did not ſubſtitute better in their room: but the Chriſtians ſubſtituted the true Deity. I find here a thing which very few profane Authors have mentioned; I mean the treatment which Hercules met with from Diagoras: Father Garaſſe ſpeaks of it, but with too much embroidery. Here is what he ſays (36): "I expect our pretenders to wit will repreſent "to me that Diagoras the Mileſian (37), who was "called THE ATHEIST by way of eminence, was a "man of parts, and that Sardanapalus was a brave "Prince: for as to Diagoras, who publickly laughed "at the Gods, and taught that there was no other "Deity in the world than kind nature, going one "day, as it is ſaid, into an inn, made a witty repartee, "which has been admired by all antiquity (38); for "finding there was nothing to be had for his dinner "beſides lentils, and that there was no wood in the "houſe to dreſs them, he bethought himſelf of an "old ſtatue of Hercules, which was the tutelar Deity "of the houſe, and accoſting him ſaid, Veni Hercules "tertium decimum ſubi certamen & excoque lentem. I "muſt oblige you to undertake a thirteenth labour to "day, to dreſs theſe lentils: and another time go-"ing into a Court-yard where the Prieſts were tak-"ing an Augury from the feeding of birds, and ſee-"ing that the whole ſacred College was greatly ter-"rified becauſe the chickens did not eat, he took "them, in a ſeeming paſſion, and dipping them three "or four times in a tub full of water; You ſhall drink, "ſays he (39), ſince you will not eat: and on account "of theſe two ſayings, they maintain that this Athe-"iſt was a man of good wit, and that the introdu-"cing of Atheiſm is no mark of ſtupidity. I con-"feſs that theſe two repartees are well enough for a "ſcoundrel; but to conclude from theſe two anſwers "that Diagoras was a man of excellent wit, is what "I cannot comprehend, foraſmuch as there are at "preſent a thouſand porters and coblers who, when "they are gay and a little warmed with wine, make "better jokes than theſe, and when they have done "are as ſtupid as Diagoras was."

(33) Τὰ δὲ μυστήρια οὕτως ηὐτελίζεν, ὡς πολλοὺς ἐκτρέπειν τῆς ἀρετῆς . . . τὰ μυστήρια πᾶσι διηγγέλλετο, κοινοποιῶν αὐτὰ, καὶ μικρὰ ποιῶν, καὶ τοὺς βουλομένους μυεῖσθαι ἀποτρέπων. Myſteria adeo contemnebat ut multos à virtute averteret . . . myſteria narrabat omnibus, ea evulgans & extenuans, & illos, qui volebant initiari, avertens. Suidas, in Διαγόρας.

(34) In the Remark [D] Citation (21).

(35) Athenag. in Legat. pag. m. 36.

(36) Doctrine Curieuſe, liv. 2. Sect. 5. pag. 139.

(37) It is a miſtake; it ſhould be Melian.

(38) I have met with but one ſingle Author among the Heathens who relates this adventure: it is the Scholiaſt on Ariſtophanes, in Nub. Act. 3. Scen. 1. However, it is falſe that Antiquity has praiſed this action. S. Epiphaniuſ, in Ancorato, pag. m. 106, reproaches the Pagans with not having hearkened to the Leſſon of Diagoras; and thereupon he relates, pretty much at length, that man's action againſt the Idol of Hercules. Clemens Alexandrinus relates it likewiſe, Admonit. ad Gentes, pag. 15.

(39) I do not know this has been ſaid of Diagoras: it is of Publius Claudius that Valerius Maximus relates it, lib. 1. cap. 4. num. 3.

[G] Some learned men gueſs that the Book which Tatian aſcribes to him treated of the myſteries of the Goddeſs Cybele.] Voſſius believed this; for having cited the words of Tatian, he adds (40): Phrygios ſermones fuiſſe arbitror hiſtoriam eorum quæ ad Cybelen ſive matrem Phrygiam & ejus ſacra pertinerent, atque ab eo eſſe fine hoc conſcriptam ut à ſacris illius hominеs averteret, i. e. "The Phrygian Diſcourſes I take to be "the Hiſtory of thoſe things which related to Cy-"bele, or the Phrygian Mother, and her rites, and "to be by him written with a deſign of drawing men "away from her myſteries." Methinks Tatian ſhould have alledged the moſt impious Writings of Diagoras, and conſequently thoſe whoſe Titles we ſee in Heſychius Illuſtrius and Suidas. Thoſe two Authors tell us, that when he ſaw the proſperity of his Plagiary, he publiſhed a Work concerning his renouncing of Religion (41); that is, he publiſhed the motives of the worſt of all Apoſtaſies, or, in his way of thinking, the motives of his converſion. This Work was intitled Λόγοι ἀποπυργίζοντες. Hadrian Junius will have this to ſignify Diſcourſes which precipitate from towers; quaſi orationes de turribus præcipitantes dicas. Æmilius Portus, the Tranſlator of Suidas, explains this Title as if it ſignified, Diſcourſes which overthrow towers and fortifications; turrium ac munitionum deſtructrices. Perhaps the Author had in view to ſignify that his Work was a fortreſs ſtrengthened with good towers againſt all the aſſaults of Divines. According to the idea of Junius, this impious Writer would have boaſted of having thrown down all the Deities from heaven into the abyſs of annihilation; according to that of Æmilius Portus, he would have boaſted of having demoliſhed the ramparts with which Religion has fortified her ſelf. Perhaps he directly attacked Cybele, as Voſſius ſuppoſes; Cybele, I ſay, the mother of the Gods, the Goddeſs covered with towers:

Qualis Berecynthia mater
Invehitur curru Phrygias TURRITA per urbes
Læta Deûm partu, centum complexa nepotes
Omnes cœlicolas, omnes ſupera alta tenentes (42).

"High as the mother of the Gods in place,
"And proud, like her, of an immortal race;
"That when in pomp ſhe makes the Phrygian round,
"With golden TURRETS on her temples crown'd
"An hundred Gods her ſweeping train ſupply,
"Her offſpring all, and all command the ſky."
Dryden.

Perhaps he imagined that by deſtroying the mother he deſtroyed the whole family, without taking the pains to attack every God in particular. According to this conjecture, which does not appear to me very ſolid, Tatian might be eaſily reconciled with Suidas and Heſychius, as to the Title of Diagoras's Work.

[H] Others ſay that he dictated very juſt Laws . . . to the Legiſlator of the Mantineans.] There will be nothing in this Remark but what is worthy of attention. Ælian having ſaid (43) that the Laws of Mantinea were moſt juſt, and as good as thoſe of the Locrians, of Crete, or Lacedæmon, or thoſe of the Athenians, adds that the perſon who gave thoſe Laws to the people of Mantinea was the Athlet Nicodorus, highly renowned on account of his Victories, but who having in his latter days applied himſelf to the drawing up of Laws, had done his country a much greater ſervice than the proclaiming the prizes with which he had been honoured could have been (44). Ὀψὲ τῆς ἡλικίας, καὶ μετὰ τὴν ἄθλησιν καὶ νομοθέτης αὐτοῖς ἐγένετο, μακρῷ τούτου ἄμεινον πολιτευσάμενος τῇ πατρίδι τῶν κηρυγμάτων τῶν ἐν τοῖς σταδίοις. Ætatis ſuæ tempore, & exacta pugilatione legiſlator eis extitit, longè utiliorem ſe patriæ in ea re præſtans, quam quum publice victor in ſtadiis proclamaretur (45). This is not all: Ælian obſerves that according to the common opinion theſe Laws were compoſed by Diagoras, who gave them ready drawn up to his friend Nicodorus. Laſtly, Ælian declares that he could ſay a great deal of Nicodorus, (40) De Hiſtor. Græc. pag. 437.

(41) Ἐπιτιθεὶς ὁ Διαγόρας λυπηθείς, ἔγραψε τοὺς ἀποπυργίζοντας λόγους, ἐκπτώσιν ἔχοντας τῆς περὶ τὸ θεῖον δόξης. Quam ob rem mœſtus Diagoras λόγους, ſcripſit ἀποπυργίζοντας quæ defectionis cauſam a communi de Diis perſuaſione continebant. Heſych. Illuſtrius, in Διαγόρας, ex Verſione Hadriani Junii. Æmilius Portus, the Tranſlator of Suidas, ſays, quæ continent refutationem opinionis de divino numine.

(42) Virg. Æn. lib. 6. ver. 785.

(43) Ælian. Var. Hiſt. lib. 2. cap. 22.

(44) The Grecian Cities thought themſelves moſt happy and glorious, when thoſe who obtained the prize in the Games were of their inhabitants.

(45) Ælian. Var. Hiſt. lib. 2. cap. 23.

of Diagoras [I]. Some ſay this impious perſon was indebted for his liberty to Democritus [K]. The blunder of Peter Gregoire of Toulouſe is a very groſs one. He imagined Diagoras was accuſed of having ſtolen the Poems of another [L]. Clemens dorus, but that he would not, becauſe the praiſes which he ſhould give him would ſeem to belong alſo to Diagoras. This is ſomething remarkable. Here is a downright Atheiſt and without any reſerve, who gives Laws to a State, as juſt as thoſe of Solon, or of Lycurgus. On the other ſide, here is a Prieſt who ſets up for an Hiſtorian, and who ſuppreſſes the praiſes which Nicodorus has moſt juſtly deſerved; who ſuppreſſes them, I ſay, becauſe the glory of them would reflect on Diagoras. Not that Diagoras was unworthy to partake of thoſe praiſes, but he denied the Deity, and conſequently the Hiſtorian ought not to be equitable with reſpect to him; muſt the Laws of Hiſtory be prevaricated with, ſince an Atheiſt was thereby deprived of the honour due to him. We ſhould leſs wonder at ſo depraved a notion of morality, if we did not conſider that it is a Pagan Prieſt who publiſhes it. Poor wretches! you look on your ſelves as neceſſary to God, you think he ſtands in need of the politic uſe you make of your injuries and your praiſes. You would not think thus, if you had any faith in the Oracles of Job (46).

(46) Chap. xiii. ver. 7.

Let us here take notice of a ſtrange wrong-headed inference of the Civilian Baudouin. He relates what concerns the Legiſlator of Mantinea, and makes this reflection on it; that impiety is not only a great wound to the Laws, but alſo a great miſchief to States; and that it is rather to be wiſhed there were no Laws, juriſdiction, or ſociety, than that the adminiſtration of juſtice ſhould be in the hands of impious men; and that he will always maintain that the Laws of Diagoras ought to be ſuſpected. Narrat Ælianus, quendam olim pugilem Nicodorum, apud Mantinenſes factum eſſe præſtantiſſimum Legiſlatorem: nec alio quàm Diagoræ athei hominis conſilio uſum eſſe, ab eoque leges accepiſſe, quas ferret. De Diocletiano, & ipſis adeò Romani juris auctoribus, idem dici poſſe videtur. Ego verò in ea perſto ſententia, magnam eſſe & legum labem, & civitatum perniciem, impietatem: & potiusquam hæc jus dicat, optandum eſſe, nullam planè eſſe jurisdictionem, nullam legem, civitatem nullam. Fremant licet Epicuræi hujus ætatis legulei: ego tamen Diagoræ leges ſuſpectas eſſe contendam (47). i. e. "Ælian tells us that Nicodorus, once a Wreſtler, became an excellent Law-giver among the Mantineans; and that he adviſed with no other than Diagoras the Atheiſt, from whom he received the Laws which he eſtabliſhed. The ſame, I think, may be ſaid of Diocleſian, and the Authors of the Roman Law. But I perſiſt in this opinion, that impiety is a great ſtain in the Laws, and of pernicious conſequence to ſociety; and rather than impious perſons ſhould preſide in the tribunals, it were to be wiſhed we had no Government, no Laws, and no Society. Let the Epicurean pettifoggers of our age fume: I ſhall ſtill inſiſt that the Laws of Diagoras are to be ſuſpected." A man of accurate underſtanding would not have ſpoken thus, but would have more juſtly ſpecified what ought to be diſtinguiſhed. If they who adminiſter juſtice, either by the inſtitution of Laws, or by the execution of the Edicts and Ordinances of the Legiſlator, were at the ſame time Atheiſts by principle, and paſſionate enemies of all piety and virtue, it is certain that it would be better to live without Laws and without Tribunals, than to be ſubject to ſuch a juriſdiction; but if, notwithſtanding their Atheiſm, they were zealous for the public good, and piqued themſelves on executing to the greateſt advantage the Regulations which they ſhould judge moſt proper to reſtrain evil-doers, to prevent litigious ſuits, to maintain the rights of widows and orphans, fair dealing in trade, concord in families, &c. who doubts but it would be incomparably more advantageous to live under ſuch Law-givers, or ſuch Judges, than without any Juriſdiction at all? But the better to know what a wrong way of thinking Baudouin was in when he compoſed this part of his Work, it is ſufficient to conſider two things: one, that though he knew no more of the Laws of Diagoras, than what he had learned by reading of Ælian, he notwithſtanding ſays that he ſuſpected them; and yet Ælian, as little diſpoſed as he was to do Diagoras juſtice, had highly extolled them. The ſecond thing to be conſidered is, that Baudouin compares the Emperor Diocleſian, and the Authors of the Roman Law, with the Legiſlator of the Mantineans directed by our Diagoras. He admires the excellent Laws they made, he only wonders that impious men were able to form ſo noble a Work, and three lines after he tells us that it is better have neither Laws nor Polity, than to have them drawn up by impious perſons, that is to ſay, by the Emperors who perſecuted the Chriſtians. Equidem cum ſæpe cogito, in rebus civilibus præſtantiſſimos fuiſſe legiſlatores, quos hactenus Eccleſiæ hoſtes acerrimos fuiſſe dixi: & eorum quotidie nomina & tituli in iis, quos ſæpe volvimus, libris Juris Civilis occurrant, ſæpe etiam attonitus obſtupeſco tam & à vera religione averſam eſſe ſapientum (ut vocantur) hominum mentem, tamque omnium propè regnorum imperiorumque omnem conſtitutionem eſſe à rectâ pietate alienam & abhorrentem: ut quos alioqui prudentiſſimos nomothetas laudare ſolemus, inſanos carnifices in hac cauſa execrari cogamur (48). i. e. "Truly when I reflect that thoſe whom I have hitherto repreſented as the bittereſt enemies of the Church were moſt excellent Lawgivers in civil matters; and that their names and titles frequently occur in the Books of Civil Law; I am often aſtoniſhed and amazed that the minds of wiſe men (as they are called) ſhould be ſo averſe to the true Religion, and that the entire conſtitution of almoſt all Kingdoms and Empires ſhould be ſo remote from and contradictory to real piety: ſo that thoſe whom we praiſe in other reſpects, as moſt prudent Law-givers, we are forced to execrate on this account as furious and inhuman butchers." The more I read, the more I am perſuaded that it is not ſo difficult to find Writers who have fine and good thoughts, as it is to find thoſe who expreſs them without intangling themſelves in ſome falſe reaſoning: a good Logician is more rare than is commonly imagined.

(48) Idem, ibid.

(47) Franciſcus Balduinus, ad Edicta Principum Romanorum de Chriſtianis, pag. m. 111.

[I] Cicero mentions ſome profane repartees of Diagoras.] Being in Samothrace, they ſhewed him ſeveral pictures or votive tablets hung up in the Temples by perſons who had eſcaped ſhipwrack: look here, ſaid they, you who do not believe there is a Providence. I do not wonder, anſwered he, to ſee the pictures of thoſe who have eſcaped; it is the cuſtom to paint them; but no care is taken any where to repreſent thoſe who have periſhed at ſea. Diagoras cum Samothracian veniſſet, Atheos ille qui dicitur, atque ei quidam amicus, tu qui Deos putas humana negligere, nonne animadvertis ex his tabellis pictis quàm multi votis vim tempeſtatis effugerint, in portumque ſalvi pervenerint? Ita ſit, inquit, illi enim nuſquam picti ſunt qui naufragium fecerunt, in marique perierunt (49). Diogenes Laertius tells the ſtory much better (50): he makes one immediately perceive the point; but in the way Cicero relates it, a man muſt be almoſt a conjurer to diſcover the drift of it. What follows is better unfolded. Diagoras was on board a veſſel caught in a violent ſtorm: in the height of it they began to ſay to Diagoras that they well deſerved what they underwent, for having taken on board ſuch an impious wretch as he was; behold, anſwered he, the great number of Veſſels which are expoſed to the ſame ſtorm as ours is; do you think I am on board every one of them? Idemque cum ei naviganti vectores adverſa tempeſtate timidi & perterriti dicerent, non injuria ſibi illud accidere qui illum in eandem navem recepiſſent, oſtendit eis in eodem curſu multas alias laborantes, quæſivitque num etiam in iis navibus Diagoram vehi crederent (51). This ſhould teach the faithful and orthodox, that the arguments which are borrowed from the ordinary courſe of Providence are not proper to be urged to all ſorts of unbelievers.

(49) Cicero, de Nat. Deor. lib. 3. cap. 37.

(50) He obſerves that by ſome Authors this anſwer is attributed to Diogenes, and by others to Diagoras. Θαυμάζοντος τινὸς τὰ ἐν Σαμοθρᾴκῃ ἀναθήματα, ἔφη, πολλῷ ἂν ἦν πλείω εἰ καὶ οἱ μὴ σωθέντες ἀνέθεσαν. Admirante quodam ea quæ in Samothracia ſunt donaria, longe, ait, plura eſſent ſi & qui ſervati non ſunt ea dedicaſſent. i. e. "When one admired the votive pictures in Samothrace, there would have been many more, ſaid he, if thoſe who have been loſt had dedicated them." Diogen. Laert. lib. 6. in Diagora, num. 59.

[K] Some ſay he owed his liberty to Democritus.] It is ſaid that that Philoſopher, ſeeing him among a great many ſlaves who were expoſed to ſale, examined him, and found in him ſo happy a diſpoſition that he bought him for ten thouſand drachms, and made him, not his ſervant, but his diſciple (52).

(51) Cicero, de Natura Deor. lib. 3. cap. 57.

(52) Suidas & Heſychius Illuſtrius, in Διαγόρας.

[L] Peter Gregoire . . . . imagined he was accuſed of having Clemens Alexandrinus did not well underſtand the doctrine of this Philoſopher [M].

having ſtolen the Poems of another.] Let us quote his words (53): Diagoras Teleclidis filius impius dictus, quod plagii accuſatus à Poëta quodam, de ſurrepto pæane à ſe conſcripto, ejuraſſet furto ſe non teneri, atque ille paulo poſt prolato in lucem pæane ſecunda fama hominum uteretur, quamobrem & mœſtus Diagoras orationes ſcripſit ἀποπυργίζοντας, quaſi de turribus præcipitantes ideas, quæ defectionis cauſſam à communi de Diis perſuaſione continebant, ut ſcribit Heſychius Mileſius Illuſtrius. i. e. "Diagoras the ſon of Teleclides, ſur-"named the Impious, being accuſed by a certain "Poet of Plagiariſm, in ſtealing a Hymn which he "had written, ſwore he was not guilty of the fact, "and the other ſoon after, publiſhing that Hymn, ob-"tained a great reputation; whereat Diagoras being "vexed, wrote the Diſcourſes intitled ἀποπυργίζοντας, "that is, caſting headlong from towers, which con-"tained his motives for diſſenting from the common "perſuaſion concerning the Gods, as Heſychius Il-"luſtrius writes." Peter Gregoire did not underſtand the Author whom he cites; Diagoras was not the Accuſed, but the Accuſer. This falſhood deſerves to be taken notice of, becauſe it is capable of impoſing on a Reader. It is probable that an innocent man who calls the Gods to witneſs his innocence, and purges himſelf by oath, may be terribly provoked when he ſees his calumniator triumph over him. Wherefore the Narration of Peter Gregoire, being almoſt as likely as that of Heſychius, may eaſily lead one out of the way.

(53) Syntagm. Juris Univerſi, lib. 36. ſub finem, pag. m. 744. Thomaſius has taken notice of this miſtake, in Tractatu de Plagio Literario, num. 406.

[M] Clemens Alexandrinus did not well underſtand the doctrine of this Philoſopher.] He thought that Diagoras, and ſome others who have paſſed for Atheiſts, got that ill reputation for no other reaſon than becauſe they more diſtinctly knew the falſity of the Pagan Religion; and he is aſtoniſhed that men of ſuch regular lives ſhould have been defamed as impious perſons (54). They did not arrive, ſays he (55), at the knowledge of the truth; but they perceived error: and this perception is a good ſeed to produce the light of truth. This doctrine differs much from the opinion of a vaſt number of people, who imagine it eaſier to convert a ſuperſtitious Pagan to the true Religion than an Atheiſt. Muretus (56) approves that Father's ſentiment concerning the cauſe of Diagoras and ſome others paſſing for Atheiſts: but they are certainly miſtaken. Diagoras was reputed an Atheiſt, becauſe he rejected the exiſtence of the Deity abſolutely and without any reſtriction. See above the Remark [D]. What we find in the Scholia of Ariſtophanes ought to go for nothing: Διαγόρας μελῶν ποιητὴς ἄθεος, ὃς καὶ καινὰ δαιμόνια εἰσηγεῖτο: i. e. The Poet Diagoras, the Atheiſt, who alſo introduced new Deities. Such a teſtimony, oppoſed to the contrary authorities, is a fly ſet againſt an elephant.

(54) Clem. Alexand. Admonit. ad Gentes, pag. m. 15.

(55) Εἰναὶ τὴν ἀλήθειαν αὐτὴν μὴ γνωρίζειν, ἀλλὰ τὴν πλάνην γε ὑποπτεύειν· ὅπερ ἐ σμικρὸν εἰς ἀληθείας φρονήσεως ζώπυρον ἀναφύεται σπέρμα: Etiamſi veritatem ipſam non conſideraverint, ſed errorem quidem certè ſuſpicati ſint; quod quidem non parvum exoritur ſemen ad excitandam ſcintillam intelligentiæ veritatis. Idem, ibid.

(56) Muret. Var. Lect. lib. 10. cap. 17.

DIANA (JOHN NICHOLAS DE) a Jeſuit, is known to me only by the perſecution which he ſuffered for a Sermon he had preached on St. Lucifer. The Inquiſitors of Sardinia condemned this Sermon, and ſhewed a great deal of animoſity againſt the Jeſuit. He did not acquieſce in their judgments; and employed ſo many methods of defence, that at laſt he obtained the victory in the 13th year of the proſecution. Diego Arze-Reynoſo, the Inquiſitor General, annulled all the proceedings of the Tribunal of Sardinia, and chaſtiſed ſome of the Aſſeſſors; and the better to re-eſtabliſh the reputation of Diana, he created him Qualificator of the Supreme Council of the Inquiſition, and cleared him from all blemiſh by a Decree paſſed the 19th of December 1653 (a). I ſhall quote a paſſage out of it [A] that the Reader may ſee the iniquities which are

(a) Extracted from a Writing intitled, Libellus ſupplex à Patribus Societatis Jeſu Provinciæ Toletanæ Catholico Hiſpaniarum Regi oblatus Madriti anno 1696, menſe Aprili, contra Libellum ſupplicem eidem regiæ Majeſtati oblatum à R R. P P. Carmelitis ad ſuadendum ut univerſis imponatur ſilentium circa antiquitatem Ordinis Carmelitici tenendum, poſt Decretum Inquiſitionis Toletanæ contra 14 Volumina de Actis Sanctorum.

[A] He was cleared by a Decree of the 19th of December 1653. I ſhall quote a paſſage out of it.] I take it from the Petition which the Jeſuits of the Province of Toledo preſented to the King of Spain in the year 1696 (1). They pretend that the Petition preſented by the Carmelites to the ſame Prince is unjuſt, becauſe it tends to obtain that ſilence may be kept on both ſides, after the Inquiſition of Toledo has condemned fourteen Volumes of the Acta Sanctorum. Theſe Jeſuits ſet forth, among other things, that, according to the Style of the Holy Office, it is allowed to provide againſt the Decrees of the Inquiſition, and that when the Inquiſition has condemned a Book, it does not intend to deprive the Author of the liberty of juſtifying his ſentiments. They ſhew that the Apology of a Book condemned by that Tribunal has been ſometimes found ſo convincing, that the Inquiſition has revoked its own ſentence (2), and they prove it by the iſſue of the long Cauſe of the Jeſuit John Nicholas de Diana. His reputation continued blemiſhed for ſeveral years; but having ſhewn the partiality of his Judges, he glorioufly obtained the diſannulling of their ſentence. Per annos omnino duodecim & quinque menſes graviſſimè paſſus eſt optimus ille Jeſuita pro defenſa veritate: & fuit hæc quidem veritas denſis adeo paſſionum obfuſcata nebulis ut tantum non pateretur eclipſim. Fuit auctori neceſſe adverſus Sardiniæ Inquiſitores excipere velut partiales & paſſioni obnoxios. Suam autem exceptionem illam & damnatas propoſitiones eâ probavit Diana argumentorum energiâ & evidentiâ ut, &c (3). i. e. "For twelve years and five months did that "good Jeſuit moſt grievouſly ſuffer for defending the "truth; which was ſo obſcured by the thick clouds "of paſſion, that it was very near ſuffering an eclipſe. "The Author was under a neceſſity of excepting a-"gainſt the Inquiſitors of Sardinia, as partial and "ſubject to paſſion: and Diana made good that ex-"ception and the propoſitions which had been con-"demned with ſuch clearneſs and ſtrength of argu-"ment that &c." And becauſe the proceedings of the Inquiſitors of Sardinia had cauſed ſome ſcandal, the ſupreme Council of the Inquiſition thought themſelves obliged to remove it by a Decree, part of which follows: Ut in omni tempore præſenti perinde ac futuro conſtet, innoteſcat, atque publica fiat innocentia dicti Patris Diana; ut item illi ad quos hujus rei notitia pervenerit quique proinde ſcandalum fuerint paſſi ex proceſſibus in illa cauſa commiſſis, & in libello impreſſo ſupra relatis, publicam hanc ſatisfactionem habeant ſuper dicta præfati Patris innocentia & catholica illius in Evangelio exponenda doctrina . . . Pariter ſciant omnes quod Tribunal atque ſupremum ſacræ Inquiſitionis Concilium non ſolum convictos contra fidem caſtiget, ſed innocentiam etiam præmiet inculpatorum, addita ſatisfactione publica contra notorias iiſdem impactas injurias, ad Deum denique Dominum noſtrum omnipotentem remittente dicto P. Diana publicam ac juſtam vindictam de gravi ſibi illata injuria per delatorem, conjuratores, æmulos ac falſos teſtes, minuſque bene affectos miniſtros, ſupplicando divinæ Majeſtati ejuſque piæ clementiæ quatenus omnium talium mentibus lucem dignetur infundere, qua illuſtrati errore ſuo cognito correctoque & peculiariter in hoc caſu commiſſa culpa animas ſuas poſſint ſalvas facere &c. (4). i. e. "To the end that in all times, "preſent as well as future, the innocency of the ſaid "Father Diana may be known and made public; "that thoſe alſo whom the knowledge of this affair "may have reached, and have therefore been ſcan-"dalized at the proceedings in that cauſe, which "are related in the abovementioned printed Caſe, "may have this public ſatisfaction concerning the "ſaid Father's innocence, and his orthodoxy in ex-"pounding the Goſpel. . . . That it may likewiſe be "known unto all perſons that the Tribunal and ſu-"preme

(1) I ſet down the Title at length in the Citation (a) of this Article.

(2) Quod ita non raro factum eſt ut Inquiſitio edicta ſua revocaverit ac propoſitiones modo confixas ſuo priſtino reſtituerit ſplendori, quin & novis approbationibus ac laudibus exornarit. Libell. Supplex, pag. 5.

(3) Libell. Supplex, pag. 5.

(4) Libell. Supplex, pag. 6.

are committed in those proceedings, but not always with impunity.

" preme Council of the Holy Inquisition does not " only chastise those who are convicted of corrupting " the Faith, but also rewards the innocence of the " blameless, making public satisfaction for the noto- " rious injuries which have been offered them. Lastly " the said Father Diana resigning to God Almighty " the public and just revenge of the great injury done " him by the Informer, the malicious conspirators, " and false witnesses, and the officers who were ill " affected towards him, beseeching the Divine Ma- " jesty and his gracious clemency that he would so " far enlighten the minds of all such, that perceiv- " ing their error and correcting it, and particularly " the fault committed in this case, they may save " their souls, &c." I assure my self that several Readers will be well pleased to find here the other like instances which the Jesuits produce in their petition. The Ist is that of Julian Archbishop of Toledo. He wrote a Book de tribus Substantijs, which was condemned by Pope Benedict II: he justified it by a very vigorous Apology, and his reasons were so well approved, that the Pontiff took off the prohibition and highly commended the Archbishop (5). The IId example is that of Stephen Fagundez, a Jesuit. He published a Work (6), which was prohibited to be read: but when his Apology appeared, intitled, Apologeticus Tractatus pro suo libro in 5 præcepta Ecclesiæ ad quæstionem de lacticiniorum ovorumque esu tempore quadragesimæ, i. e. " An Apologetical Treatise for " his Book on the five precepts of the Church as to the " question concerning the eating of milk-meats and " eggs in the time of Lent," the Book was ordered to be examined anew, and it was declared that none of the propositions which had been condemned deserved censure; so that by a new Decree of the 18th of April 1630, the Tribunal of the Inquisition permitted that Work to be read. The IIId instance is that of the great Tostatus. Some of his opinions having been condemned, he demanded to be heard, but could not obtain it: the intrigues of his enemies were the occasion of his being denied this common justice. Upon which he made such loud complaints, that they reached the ears of Pope Eugenius IV, who ordered Tostatus to appear in person at the Court of Rome, there to maintain his opinions. Tostatus appeared, and defended himself so well that he obtained a glorious victory (7).

(5) Ibid. pag. 20. ex Roderico in sua Historia, & ex Toletano Concilio XV.

(6) It is intitled, Quæstiones de Christianis Officiis & Casibus Conscientiæ in 5 Præcepta Ecclesiæ.

(7) Libell. Supplex, pag. 21, ex Proœmio Apologetici Tostati, Parte 2.

DICÆARCHUS, a scholar of Aristotle, composed a great number of Books which were much esteemed [A]. Cicero and his friend Pomponius Atticus valued them highly [B], and I think their esteem extended even to the Work wherein he attacked the

[A] He composed a great number of Books, which were much esteemed.] It is thought that his Work on Music contained not only the description of the customs and manners which concerned the exercise of that art, but also the History of the Dramatical pieces which had disputed the prize. For which reason it is supposed his Treatise περὶ μουσικῶν ἀγώνων, de Certaminibus Musicis (1), was but a part of the Treatise περὶ μουσικῆς, de Musicâ (2). It is also supposed that the Treatise περὶ Διονυσιακῶν ἀγώνων, de Certaminibus Dionysiacis (3), and likewise another Treatise which was intitled παναθηναϊκὸν (4), were parts of the Treatise περὶ μουσικῶν ἀγώνων, de Certaminibus Musicis. Jonsius speaks thus: Liber hic Dicæarchi περὶ μουσικῶν ἀγώνων de quo diximus, omnino pars fuit ejusdem operis περὶ μουσικῆς de Musica, quo & de ipsis antiquis Musicis atque Poëtis eorumque fabulis, de saltationibus, & de certaminibus musicis eum egisse verisimile est (5). Such a Work would be an admirable repertory for the Author of an Historical Dictionary. The Book of Dicæarchus περὶ Βίων, de Vitis, quoted by Diogenes Laertius (6), would be a repertory no less useful. I make the same judgment of the Work which he intitled περὶ τῆς τῆς Ἑλλάδος βίου, de Vita Græciæ (7), wherein he gave the description of Greece, and of the Laws and Customs of the Græcians. St. Jerom (8) has quoted this Book. I doubt not but Porphyry had the same Work in view when he put Dicæarchus into the number of those who have briefly and exactly collected what concerned the Greeks (9). See in Vossius (10) the Title of some other Works of Dicæarchus. Consult also what I am going to say.

[B] .... Cicero and .... Pomponius Atticus valued them highly.] Cicero makes no scruple to assert, on the word of Dicæarchus, a thing which he could hardly believe; which was, that all the cities of Peloponnesus were maritime. He consulted a learned man who was greatly surprized to read such a thing in Dicæarchus, and yet advised him not to doubt the truth of it. This learned man was a Greek (11). I shall set down the words of Cicero, which are glorious for Dicæarchus. Peloponnesias civitates omneis maritimas esse hominis non nequam, sed etiam tuo judicio probati, Dicæarchi tabulis credidi. Is multis nominibus in Trophonia (12) Chæronis narratione Græcos in eo reprehendit, quod mare tam secuti sunt, nec ullum in Peloponneso locum excipit. Quum mihi autor placeret: etenim erat λεπτολογώτατος, & vixerat in Peloponneso: admirabar tamen, & vix accredens communicavi cum Dionysio. Atque is primo est commotus, deinde quod tum de isto Dicæarcho non minus bene existimabat, quàm tu de C. Vestorio, ego de M. Cluvio, non dubitabat, quin ei crederemus .... Istum itaque ego locum totidem verbis à Dicæarcho transtuli (13). i. e. " On the credit of " the tables of Dicæarchus, a man of no ill charac- " ter, nay one who has been approved by you, I be- " lieve that all the Peloponnesian cities were situate " near the sea. He reprehends the Grecians, in " Chæron's account of the Cave of Trophonius, on " several considerations, for being so very fond of the " sea; and he excepts not any one place in Peloponnesus. Though the Author pleased me, because he " was well versed in history, and had lived in Peloponnesus; yet was I surprized, and scarce believing " what he asserted, I communicated the matter to Dionysius. He also was at the first a little surprized, " but on consideration, having no less an opinion of " Dicæarchus than you have of C. Vestorius, or I of M. " Cluvius, he made no doubt but we might depend upon " him .... This passage, therefore, I have translated " word for word from Dicæarchus." Let us strengthen this passage by the following words of the 12th Epistle of the 2d Book (14): Dicæarchum rectè amas: luculentus homo est & civis haud paullo melior quam isti nostri ἀδικιαταρχοι; i. e " You are in the right to love " Dicæarchus; he is a man of extensive learning, and " a much better member of Society than those adicæ- " archi, or unjust governors of ours;" and by these (15): Nunc prorsus hoc statui ut quoniam tanta controversia est Dicæarcho familiari tuo (16), cum Theophrasto amico meo, ut ille tuus τὸν πρακτικὸν βίον longe omnibus anteponat, hic autem θεωρητικὸν, utrique à me mos gestus esse videatur. Puto enim me Dicæarcho affatim satisfeciisse. i. e. " I am now come to this resolution, " that since there is such a dispute between your in- " timate acquaintance Dicæarchus and my friend The- " ophrastus, the former preferring an active life far " before all others, and the latter a theoretic, I will " keep fair with both. For I think I have given " abundant satisfaction to Dicæarchus." But Cicero no where testifies a greater esteem for Dicæarchus than in the 2d Epistle of the 2d Book (17); crying out O magnum hominem! See the whole passage. It has been thought very strange, and justly, that Vossius has not taken notice of it (18). He observes the same silence with regard to that of the 3d Book de Legibus; nor does he say any thing of the Book de interitu hominum. In the 3d Book de Legibus, Cicero informs us that this Philosopher had published some very good Discourses on Politics: Theophrastus institutus ab Aristotele abundavit ut scitis in eo genere rerum, ab eodemque Aristotele dictus Dicæarchus huic rationi studioque non defuit. i. e. " Theophrastus, who was " instructed by Aristotle, abounded, as you well " know, in precepts of that kind, and Dicæarchus, " who was taught by the same master, applied him- " self

(1) It is cited by the Scholiast on Aristophanes, ad Vespas, folio 519, apud Jonsium de Scriptor. Hist. Philos. pag. 86.

(2) It is cited by the same Scholiast ad Nub. folio 99, apud Jonsium, pag. 89.

(3) It is cited by the same Scholiast ad Aves, folio 606, apud Jonsium, pag. 88.

(4) It is cited by the same Scholiast ad Vespas, folio 467, apud Jonsium, ibid.

(5) Jonsius, ibid. pag. 89.

(6) Lib. 3. in Platone.

(7) Athenæus, lib. 13. pag. 595. & lib. 14. pag. 636.

(8) Adversus Jovinianum, lib. 2. and not, as it is in Moreri, lib. 11.

(9) Τῶν συντόμως τε καὶ ἀκριβῶς τὰ Ἑλληνικὰ συναγαγόντων. Unus eorum qui res Græcanicas breviter & accuratè collegerunt. Porphyr. lib. 4. de Abstinent. apud Vossium, de Hist. Græc. pag. 47.

(10) De Histor. Græc. pag. 46, 47.

(11) See the 18th Epistle of the 7th Book to Atticus.

(12) Athenæus, lib. 13. pag. 594, cites Dicæarchus, Περὶ τῆς εἰς Τροφωνίου καταβάσεως, De descensu in antrum Trophonij.

(13) Cicero, Epist. II, lib. 6 ad Attic.

(14) Ad Atticum.

(15) Epist. XVI lib. 2 ad Atticum.

(16) See also Epist. XXX lib. 13.

(17) Ad Atticum. See also the 4th Epistle of the 8th Book.

(18) Rupertus, Epist. ad Reinesium, pag. 503.

the immortality of the Soul [C]. Moreri attributes it to another Dicæarchus, who was of " ſelf to the ſame ſtudy." In another place he relates a very curious thing; that Dicæarchus, having made a comparative calculation of all the accidents which take away mens lives, found that war deſtroyed more than any other thing. Eſt Dicæarchi liber de interitu hominum, Peripatetici magni & copioſi, qui collectis ceteris cauſis, eluvionis, peſtilentiæ, vaſtitatis, belluarum etiam repentinæ multitudinis, quarum impetu docet quædam hominum genera eſſe conſumpta, deinde comparat quanto plures deleti ſint homines hominum impetu, id eſt bellis & ſeditionibus, quàm omni reliqua calamitate (19). i. e. " There is alſo extant a Book of " the death of mankind, written by Dicæarchus, an " eminent and knowing Peripatetic, who having " collected the various cauſes, as inundations, plagues, " devaſtations, the ſudden irruption of wild beaſts, " by which he allows conſiderable numbers of men " to be deſtroyed, afterwards computes how many " more are taken off by the violence of their own " ſpecies, that is by wars and inſurrections, than by " all other calamities put together." All this teſtifies the eſteem which Cicero had for this Writer. I ſhall immediately quote a paſſage wherein he calls him his delight.

(19) Cicero, de Officiis, lib. 2. cap. 5.

[C] . . . . And I believe their eſteem extended even to the Work wherein he attacked the immortality of the Soul.] He had made two Treatiſes on this ſubject; each divided into three Books. Dicæarchus in eo ſermone, quem Corinthi habitum tribus libris exponit doctorum hominum diſputantium, primo libro multos loquentes facit, duobus Pherecratem quendam Phthiotam ſenem, quem ait à Deucalione ortum, differentem inducit, nihil eſſe omnino animum, & hoc eſſe nomen totum inane, fruſtraque & animalia & animantes appellari, neque in homine ineſſe animum vel animam, nec in beſtia. Vimque omnem eam, qua vel agamus quid, vel ſentiamus, in omnibus corporibus vivis æqualiter eſſe fuſam, nec ſeparabilem à corpore eſſe, quippe quæ nulla ſit, nec ſit quicquam, niſi corpus unum & ſimplex, ita figuratum ut temperatione naturæ vigeat & ſentiat . . . . (20). Acerrime delitiæ meæ Dicæarchus contra hanc immortalitatem diſſeruit. Is enim tres libros ſcripſit qui Leſbiaci vocantur, quod Mitylenis ſermo habetur, in quibus vult efficere animos eſſe mortales (21). i. e. " Dicæarchus " in that Diſcourſe held by ſome learned men diſ- " puting at Corinth, which he has given us in three " Books, introduces in the firſt Book ſeveral interlo- " cutors, and in the other two one Pherecrates, an " old man of Phthia, whom he makes to be deſcended " from Deucalion, arguing that the ſoul is nothing " more than an empty name; that the term Animal " is of no ſignificancy, ſince there is no ſoul either " in man or beaſt; and that the whole power where- " by we either do or feel any thing, is equally dif- " fuſed through all living bodies, and is not ſeparable " from body, being nothing in itſelf, nor any other " than ſimple body, ſo modified that it lives and feels " by the diſpoſition of nature . . . . Dicæarchus, who " is my delight, has argued ſtrenuouſly againſt this " immortality: for he wrote three Books which are " called Leſbian, becauſe the diſcourſe is ſuppoſed to " have been held at Mitylene, wherein he endeavours " to prove that our ſouls are mortal." Cicero declares in ſome of his Letters that he wanted thoſe two Works, and deſires Pomponius Atticus to ſend them him (22).

(20) Idem, Tuſc. I, cap. x, & xviii.

(21) Ibid.

(22) Dicæarchi περὶ ψυχῆς utroſque velim mittas. Idem, Epiſt. 32. lib. 13 ad Attic.

AN invincible Objection againſt Dicæarchus concerning the Immortality of the ſoul.

I ſhall obſerve, by the way, that this opinion of Dicæarchus is not worthy a Philoſopher: to reaſon in ſuch a manner is to have no principles, and to overturn the harmony of a ſyſtem. If you once ſuppoſe, with this Author, that the ſoul is not diſtinct from the body, and that it is no more than a power equally diſtributed through all living things, and which makes but one ſimple being with the bodies which are called living, either you no longer know what you ſay, or you are obliged to maintain that this virtue always accompanies the body: for what is not diſtinct from the body is eſſentially the body, and according to the firſt principles of reaſon it is a contradiction to ſay a being ever exiſts without its eſſence. Whence it manifeſtly follows that the faculty of feeling does not ceaſe in dead bodies, and that the parts of living bodies carry away each of them its life and ſoul with it, when they are corrupted. There is therefore no room to flatter one's ſelf that ſenſation will ceaſe after death, and that one ſhall be ſubject to no pain. If a body is capable of pain when it is ſeated in the nerves, it is equally ſuſceptible of it wherever it be, either in ſtones, or in metals, or in the air, or in the ſea. And if an atom of air was once deſtitute of thought, it ſeems very impoſſible that its converſion into that ſubſtance which we call animal ſpirits, ſhould ever render it a thinking ſubſtance. This ſeems as impoſſible as to give a local preſence to a being, which had been for ſome time without any local preſence. Wherefore, to reaſon conſequently, it muſt be laid down for certain, either that the ſubſtance which thinks is diſtinct from body, or that all bodies are ſubſtances which think, ſuppoſing it cannot be denied but that men have thoughts: whence it follows, according to the principle of Dicæarchus, that there is a certain number of bodies which think. Cicero, however, argues very ill againſt Dicæarchus (23): he pretends that according to that Philoſopher a man ſhould not ſuffer pain, becauſe he could not perceive that he had a ſoul. The Philoſopher might eaſily anſwer, I do not deny but that a man feels, and that he perceives he feels, but I deny that he knows what feels in him to be a ſoul diſtinct from his body. It is very true that he does not feel it; for he only knows it by reaſoning. Lactantius (24) makes uſe of the Paralogiſm of Cicero.

I have juſt now perceived that ſome may fall into an illuſory way of reaſoning againſt the argument I have oppoſed to the ſyſtem of Dicæarchus; which obliges me to prevent an Objection. I may be told that ſenſation may be a modification of body: whence it would follow that matter, without loſing any thing which is eſſential to it, may ceaſe to feel ſo ſoon as it ſhall be no longer ſhut up in the organs of a living machine. I anſwer that this doctrine is abſurd; for all the modalities of which we have any knowledge are of ſuch a nature, that they do not ceaſe but to give place to another modality of the ſame kind. No figure is deſtroyed but by another figure, nor is any colour driven out but by another colour (25). I grant that, according to the old Philoſophy, cold and heat, which expel one another out of the ſame ſubject, are not accidents of the ſame ſpecies; but it will be allowed me at leaſt that they belong to the ſame kind of qualities which are named tangible. Wherefore, to reaſon well, it muſt be ſaid that no ſenſation is driven from its ſubſtance, but by the introduction of ſome other ſenſation. Nothing hinders but that the ſenſation may be a kind which has other kinds under it, before we come at what they call ſpecies infima. According to this my Objection loſes nothing by the anſwer which I am refuting; and I have ſtill foundation to ſay, that if the animal ſpirits have not out of the nerves the ſenſation which they had in them, they have not loſt it but by acquiring another ſort of ſenſation. I ſhall be told, without doubt, that there are modalities which ceaſe, without being ſucceeded by another poſitive modality: the inſtance of motion will be alledged againſt me; but that of figures muſt not be ſpoken of: it is too viſibly againſt the defenders of Dicæarchus. But I reply that motion and reſt do not differ, as is ſuppoſed, in the ſame manner as poſitive modalities and privations do. Reſt and motion are both the one and the other a very real and poſitive local preſence: their difference conſiſts only in external relations, and altogether accidental. Reſt is the duration of the ſame local preſence; motion is the acquiſition of a new local preſence: and conſequently what ceaſes to move does not loſe its modality, without acquiring another of the ſame nature: it has always a poſition equal to its extenſion among the other parts of the Univerſe. When an inſtance ſhall be given us of a body which loſes one place without acquiring another, we will allow that certain bodies may loſe one ſenſation, without acquiring another: but as it is impoſſible to produce ſuch an inſtance, we have a right to maintain that every body which felt once, would feel always. Is not the converſion of a being into

(23) Dicæarchum vero cum Ariſtoxeno æquali & condiſcipulo ſuo doctos ſane hominnes omittamus, quorum alter ne condoluiſſe quidem unquam videtur, qui animum ſe habere non ſentiat: alter ita delectatur ſuis cantibus, ut eos etiam ad hæc transferre conetur. i. e. " But let us paſs " by Dicæarchus " and Ariſtoxe- " nus his con- " temporary and " fellow diſciple, " of whom the " one ſeems ne- " ver to have " felt pain, ſince " he perceived " not that he had " a ſoul; and the " other is ſo de- " lighted with " his own mu- " ſic, that he " endeavours to " introduce har- " mony even " into theſe " matters." Cicero, Tuſc. 1. cap. 18. He had ſaid, cap. X, that Ariſtoxenus the Muſician and Philoſopher made the ſoul to conſiſt in a harmonious agreement of the organs, hic ab artificio ſuo non receſſit. See Lactantius, Inſtit. lib. 7. cap. 13, & de Opificio Dei, cap. 16.

(24) Lib. 7. cap. 13.

(25) I intend to ſpeak here only of Bodies viſible to man.

of Lacedæmon [D], and a ſcholar of Ariſtarchus: but he is in the wrong in making him the Author of ſeveral Books, ſince Suidas, who is perhaps the only Author who has ſpoken of that Dicæarchus, does not aſcribe a Book to him of any ſort. This furniſhes me with a Remark againſt Meurſius [E]. There is a paſſage in Pliny which ſhews that Dicæarchus had received a Commiſſion from ſome Princes, to take the height of the mountains [F]. Geography was one of his principal ſtudies (a), and we have a Treatiſe of his ſtill extant on that ſubject (b). The Work he compoſed concerning the Republic of Lacedæmon was extremely honoured (c). He held it for a maxim, that a man ought to make himſelf beloved by every body, but that he ought to contract an intimate friendſhip with none but men of probity (d). What he cenſures in Plato deſerves reprehenſion [G]. Voſſius ought not to have attributed to him a Treatiſe on Dreams.

(a) See Strabo, lib. 2. pag. 71, who obſerves that Polybius frequently cenſured Dicæarchus.

(b) It was printed at Augsburgh, by the care of Hoeſchelius, in the year 1600.

(c) See the Remark [E].

(d) Plut. Sympoſ. lib. 4. init. pag. 659.

into nothing impoſſible in the order of nature? Would not the converſion of figure into a privation of all figure, or the converſion of local preſence into a privation of all local preſence, be a converſion of ſomething real and poſitive into nothing? They are therefore impoſſible in the order of nature: therefore the converſion of ſenſation into a privation of all ſenſation is impoſſible; for it would be a converſion of ſomething real and poſitive into nothing. To conclude, I ſay that all the modes of bodies are founded on the eſſential attributes of body, which are the three dimenſions. Which is the reaſon why the loſs of a figure, or a local preſence, is always attended with the acquiſition of another figure, or of another local preſence. Extenſion never ceaſes, nor ever loſes any thing: wherefore the corruption of one of its modes is neceſſarily the generation of another. For the ſame reaſon, no ſentiment can ceaſe but by the exiſtence of another; for in the Syſtem which I am refuting, the ſenſation would be a mode of the body, as well as figure, and ſituation. But if you would found ſenſation on any attribute of matter different from the three dimenſions, and unknown to our underſtanding, I ſhould anſwer you that the changes of this attribute ought to reſemble the changes of extenſion. Theſe can never make all figure, or all local preſence, ceaſe: and ſo the changes of this unknown attribute would never cauſe all ſenſation to ceaſe; they would be no more than the paſſage from one ſenſation to another, as the motion of extenſion is only the paſſage from one place to another.

[D] . . . . Moreri attributes it to another Dicæarchus . . . . of Lacedæmon.] It is unconceivable how he could commit this miſtake; for after he has quoted the paſſage of Cicero concerning the impiety of Dicæarchus with regard to the nature of the ſoul, he adds that Tertullian alſo mentions the error of this Philoſopher. Now here are the words of Tertullian quoted by Moreri. Denique qui negant principale, ipſam priùs animam nihil cenſuerunt, Meſſenius aliquis Dicæarchus. i. e. "Laſtly, they who deny the principal, were "firſt of opinion that the ſoul is nothing, as was one "Dicæarchus a Meſſenian." The Philoſopher whoſe error Tertullian takes notice of is Dicæarchus of Meſſina; why then does Moreri attribute this error to Dicæarchus of Lacedæmon? He heaps miſtake upon miſtake by referring us to a great number of Authors who have ſpoken of Dicæarchus, ſince he appropriates all their teſtimonies to a Dicæarchus of Lacedæmon, to whom Suidas aſcribes no Book, either little or great; and ſince it cannot be denied that ſome of thoſe teſtimonies concern Dicæarchus of Meſſina. A learned Critic (26) believed the Summaries of the Tragedies of Sophocles and Euripides cited by Sextus Empiricus (27) to be the production of the Grammarian Dicæarchus, of whom Athenæus makes mention in his 1ſt Book (28). I agree that ſuch a Work would better ſuit Dicæarchus the Grammarian of Lacedæmon, and Scholar of Ariſtarchus, than Dicæarchus of Meſſina, the Scholar of Ariſtotle; but notwithſtanding, when I conſider that Suidas attributes no Work to the former, and tells us that the latter was a Philoſopher, a Rhetorician, and a Geometrician, I had rather give all the Works which are quoted under the name of Dicæarchus to the Diſciple of Ariſtotle. If he of whom Athenæus ſpeaks in the 14th page of his 1ſt Book, without calling him a Grammarian, whatever Reineſius ſays, was the Dicæarchus of Lacedæmon, he would rather have attributed to his own country than to the city of Sicyon the invention of what he is diſcourſing of in that paſſage, ſince there are Authors who attribute it to the city of Lacedæmon. This invention concerned dancing, and it was probably in the Book περὶ μουσικῶν ἀγώνων, de Certaminibus Muſicis, that Dicæarchus ſpoke of this, as alſo of the dance named the Crane (29).

(26) Reineſius, Epiſt. 69. pag. 608.

(27) Adv. Mathem. cap. 19.

(28) Pag. m. 14.

[E] . . . . to whom Suidas . . . . aſcribes no Books of any kind. This furniſhes me with a Remark againſt Meurſius.] He pretends (30) that Dicæarchus of Lacedæmon wrote ſo excellent a Book on the Government of Sparta, that it was read every year before the youth in the Aſſembly of the Ephori, and that the Edict concerning this was executed during a very long ſpace of time. What he quotes from Suidas is very juſt, if one clauſe be excepted; which is, that Suidas there ſpeaks only of Dicæarchus of Meſſina. Ἔγραψε τὴν πολιτείαν Σπαρτιατῶν. καὶ νόμῳ ἐτέθη ἐν Λακεδαίμονι, καθ' ἕκαστον ἔτος ἀναγινώσκεσθαι τὸν λόγον εἰς τὸ τῶν Ἐφόρων ἀρχεῖον. τὰς δὲ τὴν ἡσυχὴν ἔχουσας ἡλικίαν ἀκροᾶσθαι. καὶ τοῦτο ἐκράτησε μέχρι πολλοῦ. Scripſit Reſpublicam Spartanorum. Et Lacedæmone lex eſt lata, ut quotannis liber iſte in prætorio Ephororum legeretur, & juventus auſcultaret. Idque diu obtinuit (31).

(29) See Plutarch in the Life of Theſeus.

(30) Meurſ. Miſcell. Lacon. lib. 4. pag. 334.

(31) Idem, ibid.

[F] Pliny teſtifies that he had received a commiſſion from ſome Princes to take the height of the mountains.] Here are the words of Pliny: Globum tamen effici mirum eſt in tanta planitie maris camporumque. Cui ſententiæ adeſt Dicæarchus vir in primis eruditus, regum cura permenſus montes, ex quibus altiſſimum prodidit Pelion 1250 paſſuum ratione perpendiculi, nullam eſſe eam portionem univerſæ rotunditatis colligens (32). i. e. "It is a wonder, however, that a globe ſhould "be made in ſo wide an extent of plain, of earth "and ſea. Which opinion Dicæarchus, a man of "extraordinary learning, comes into, having at the "deſire of ſome Kings meaſured the mountains, the "higheſt of which he ſays is Pelion, being 1250 "paces perpendicular, thence gathering it to bear no "proportion to the whole rotundity of the globe." I am amazed that Father Hardouïn has not taken notice that this paſſage is inconſiſtent with what he quotes from Geminus; for Geminus aſſerts (33) that, according to the calculation of Dicæarchus, mount Cyllene in Arcadia is in height 15 ſtadia or thereabouts, that is near 1900 paces. Therefore it is not true that Pelion, which is but ten ſtadia high, is the higheſt mountain which was meaſured by Dicæarchus. However it be, we have here a confirmation of what we find in Suidas, that Dicæarchus had written a Book on the meaſure of the mountains of Peloponneſus. The paſſage of Pliny has eſcaped the diligence of Voſſius.

(32) Plin. lib. 2. cap. 65.

(33) In Element. Aſtronom. cap. 14. pag. 55. apud Harduin. in Plin. tom. 2. pag. 217.

[G] What he cenſures in Plato, deſerves reprehenſion.] He blamed Plato for giving too much power to love: it is Cicero who acquaints us with this (34), and I believe his words will help us to underſtand thoſe of Diogenes Laertius, which ſeem to have been ill tranſlated. Here are the words of Laertius (35): Λόγον δὲ πρῶτον γράψας αὐτὸν τὸν Φαῖδρον, ᾧ γὰρ ἔχει μειρακιώδες τι τὸ προέλημμα. Δικαίαρχος δὲ καὶ τὸν τρόπον τῆς γραφῆς ὅλον ἐπιμέμφεται ὡς φορτικόν (36). They have been thus rendred: Phædrum primo illum ſcripſiſſe fama eſt, habet enim quæſtio illa nonnihil juvenile. Porro Dicæarchus totum id ſcribendi genus ut grave ac moleſtum carpit. This Tranſlation does no honour to the original: it ſuppoſes that Laertius, having ſaid there is ſomething which ſavours of the young man in the Phædrus of the Philoſopher Plato, thought to fortify what he had ſaid by quoting a man who found the manner wherein that Philoſopher had written that Treatiſe harſh and heavy. Methinks it would be better to ſuppoſe this to be the meaning of Diogenes Laertius.

(34) Quem (Platonem) non injuria Dicæarchus accuſat qui amori autoritatem tribuerit nimiæ. Cicero, Tuſcul. 4. cap. 34.

(35) Diog. Laert. lib. 3. in Platone, num. 38.

(36) See the Remark [B] of the Article BION the Boryſthenite, Citation (8) &c.

Dreams [H]. Lactantius knew not how to place Dicæarchus properly [I]. I was never more ſurprized than to ſee the ſterility of the Jeſuit Jerom Raguſa [K], on ſo illuſtrious a ſubject as Dicæarchus, who has done ſo much honour to Sicily his native country (e).

(e) He was of a City now called Meſſina, and formerly Meſſana. Suidas.

A perſon

Laertius. It is ſaid that Plato's firſt work was that which is intitled Phædrus: and indeed the queſtion which he there examines very much ſavours of the young man; wherefore Dicæarchus condemned the whole character of that piece, becauſe of the extravagant ſallies, and the impetuous overflowing of imagination which he obſerved in it. Cicero, as I have already ſaid, inſinuates this paraphraſe to us; for the exceſs of which he ſays Dicæarchus accuſed Plato, with reſpect to the authority of love, no doubt regarded the Phædrus. One of the Commentators on Cicero's Epiſtles (37) has made uſe of this paſſage of Laertius, to confirm a quite ingenious conjecture. He ſuppoſes that Dicæarchus wrote a Book the Title of which was, Φαίδρου περισσὰ, The Superfluities of the Phædrus, and that Cicero ſends to his friend Atticus for this Book. Cicero expreſſes himſelf thus: Libros mihi de quibus ad te antea ſcripſi velim mittas, & maxime Φαίδρου περισσῶν & Ἑλλάδος. i. e. "I deſire you to ſend me "the Books of which I wrote to you formerly, and "particularly thoſe of the Superfluities in the Phædrus, and of Greece." Here follows the note of Boſius. Videntur his verbis duo libri Dicæarchi ſignificari, quorum primo auctor ille multa è Phædro Platonis ut ſuperflua & redundantia reſecanda eſſe docuerat: altero virorum illuſtrium quos Græcia tuliſſet vitam conſcripſerat, huncque librum vocarat Ἑλλάδος βίον, ut illum Φαίδρου περισσά. Laërtius vulgo traditum refert Platonem (38) omnium dialogorum totam ejus ſcripti rationem ut nimis inſolentem & faſtidioſam damnaſſe. i. e. "By theſe words two Books of Dicæarchus's ſeem "to be ſignified, in the firſt of which that Author "had ſhewn that many things ought to be lopped off "from Plato's Phædrus as ſuperfluous and redundant: "in the other he had written the Lives of the illuſtrious men of Greece; and had intitled the one "The Life of Greece, and the other, The Superfluities "of the Phædrus. Laertius relates that it was a common report that Plato firſt wrote the Phædrus, and "that Dicæarchus, of all his Dialogues, condemned the "manner wherein that was written as too ſwollen and "affected." Boſius quotes the Greek of Diogenes Laertius, and cites a paſſage of Plutarch (39), wherein certain deſcriptions inſerted in the Phædrus were cenſured as ſuperfluous. See Reineſius and Monſr. Menage. The former (40) thinks that Cicero ſent for the Book of Phædrus the Epicurean Philoſopher περὶ Θεῶν, and that of Dicæarchus intitled Βίος Ἑλλάδος. He therefore partly contradicts, and partly agrees with Boſius: but he did not know that Boſius has committed a fault here; which is to confound the Work of Dicæarchus intitled Βίοι, Lives, with that which bore the Title of Βίος Ἑλλάδος, The Life of Greece. The firſt contained the Lives of illuſtrious Men: the ſecond deſcribed Greece, and the Grecian cuſtoms. Mr. Menage has taken notice of this miſtake (41).

(37) Simeon Boſius in Epiſt. Cicer. ad Atticum XXXIX lib. 13.

(38) I quote this paſſage according to the Edition of Grævius. It is viſible that the Printers have here skipped three or four words, ſuch as theſe perhaps, primum Phædrum conſcripſiſſe, Dicæarchum vero.

(39) In Erotico.

(40) Reineſius, Var. Lect. lib. 3. cap. 3. pag. 377.

(41) Menag. Not. ad Diogen. Laertium, lib. 3. num. 4. ſub fin.

[H] Voſſius ought not to have attributed to him a Treatiſe of Dreams.] Let us ſet down the words of Voſſius: Nec magis ambigere licet de libro quem Tullius eum de divinatione, & ſomniis ſcripſiſſe auctor eſt (42). i. e. "Nor is there any more reaſon to doubt of the Book "which Tully informs us he wrote of divination and "dreams." He cites nothing for this fact. In all appearance he truſted to ſome Author who ſaid the ſame thing, and who cited nobody, and he would not take the pains to ſearch where Cicero could have ſaid this. I doubt not but if this particularity be to be met with in any Book of Cicero, it is in that de Divinatione. Having run it over, I have found four paſſages there which concern Dicæarchus. In the firſt, it is aſſured that he rejected all ſorts of Divinations, except that of dreams, and that of furious rapture (43). Whence I infer that at the worſt it muſt be granted me that Voſſius ſhould have ſaid de divinatione ex ſomniis, and not de divinatione & ſomniis. The ſecond place is but a confirmation of the firſt, and I would not quote it if it did not furniſh me with an incidental Reflection. Nec vero unquam animus hominis naturaliter divinat niſi quum ita ſolutus eſt & vacuus, ut ei planè nihil ſit cum corpore; quod aut vatibus contingit, aut dormientibus. Itaque ea duo genera à Dicæarcho probantur (44). i. e. "Nor does a man's ſoul ever divine naturally, unleſs when it is ſo diſengaged and "free, that it has nothing at all to do with the body; "which happens either to raptured Prophets, or to "thoſe who ſleep." Either Cicero muſt not have underſtood Dicæarchus's doctrine, or the latter muſt have contradicted himſelf, and not have underſtood his own meaning. Can a man who allows no diſtinction between human ſouls and the body, believe that frantic people, enthuſiaſts, or dreamers, have thoughts which are not material; that is to ſay, that in that ſtate their ſoul finds itſelf perfectly diſengaged from the commerce which it had with the body? It is certain that if ſuch a man believed this, he would not know what he ſaid, and would involve himſelf in a plain contradiction. Now we have ſeen (45) that Dicæarchus admitted no diſtinction between the ſouls of living bodies, and the living bodies themſelves: if he believed, therefore, as Cicero imputes to him, that becauſe in ecſtaſies and dreams the mind of a man is diſengaged from all commerce with the body, the divinations of enthuſiaſts and dreamers are not to be rejected, he has contradicted himſelf, and demoliſhed his own Hypotheſes by an incomprehenſible piece of jargon. But let us not condemn him without a hearing. Perhaps the reaſons on which he grounded himſelf for the retaining the divinations of ecſtaſies, and dreams, while he rejected all other methods of foretelling things to come, are not well reported by Cicero. This exception in favour of dreams, and alienations of mind, was a wrong ſtep in Dicæarchus, and I ſhould be glad to know how he extricated himſelf out of the difficulty. The third paſſage ſays no more than the ſecond; for which reaſon I content my ſelf with placing it in the margin (46). The fourth is more favourable to Voſſius than all the reſt. At noſtra intereſt ſcire ea quæ eventura ſint. Magnus Dicæarchi liber eſt neſcire ea melius eſſe quam ſcire (47). i. e. "But it concerns us to know thoſe things which "ſhall happen. Yet Dicæarchus has ſhewn in a "large Treatiſe, that it is better not to know than "to know them." But this Book of Dicæarchus is not that which Voſſius ſpeaks of; it is not intitled, either de divinatione & ſomniis, or de divinatione ex ſomniis, and perhaps it is not different from that of the deſcent into the cave of Trophonius. In a word, this Philoſopher might have explained his ſentiment on the ſubject of Divinations in ſome of the Books of which Voſſius had already given the Title: wherefore it was not neceſſary to quote that de divinatione & ſomniis apart.

(42) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Græcis, pag. 47.

(43) Dicæarchus Peripateticus cætera divinationis genera ſuſtulit, ſomniorum & furoris reliquit. Cicero, de Divinat. lib. 1. cap. 3.

(44) Idem, ibid.

(45) In the Remark [C] Citation (20).

(46) Me Peripateticorum ratio magis movebat & veteris Dicæarchi, & ejus qui nunc floret Cratippi, qui cenſent eſſe in mentibus hominum tanquam oraculum aliquod ex quo futura præſentiant; ſi aut furore divino concitatus animus aut ſomno relaxatus ſolute moveatur ac libere. Cicero, de Divinat. lib. 2. cap. 48.

[I] Lactantius knew not how to place him properly.] He very juſtly condemns Dicæarchus on the Mortality of the Soul; but he is miſtaken when he accuſes him of having been the forerunner of Democritus with regard to that falſe doctrine: for Dicæarchus, having been one of Ariſtotle's diſciples, did not flouriſh till long after Democritus. In eadem ſententia fuit etiam Pythagoras antea, ejuſque præceptor Pherecydes; quem Cicero tradit primum de æternitate animarum diſputaviſſe. Qui omnes licet eloquentia excellerent; tamen in hac duntaxat contentione non minus auctoritatis habuerunt, qui contra hanc ſententiam diſſerebant, Dicæarchus primo, deinde Democritus, poſtremo Epicurus (48). i. e. "Of "the ſame opinion alſo was Pythagoras before, and "his maſter Pherecydes; the firſt, according to Cicero, "who diſputed againſt the immortality of the ſoul. "Who tho' they all excelled in eloquence, yet, in this "ſingle controverſy, thoſe who diſputed againſt this "opinion had no leſs authority, viz. Dicæarchus "firſt, then Democritus, and laſtly Epicurus."

(47) Ibid.

(48) Lactantius, Divin. Inſtit. lib. 7. cap. 8. See alſo cap. 7, & 13.

[K] I have . . . . been ſurprized . . . . at the ſterility of the Jeſuit Jerom Raguſa.] His Elogia Siculorum qui veteri memoria floruerunt, printed at Avignon in the year 1690, contain only the Titles of a few of Dicæarchus's Books, and an Extract of Charles Stephens. This extract imports that, according to

A perſon, who would not make himſelf known, has ſent me ſome Objections which I am going to examine. They concern the Argument which I have propoſed (f) againſt Dicæarchus's opinion of the nature of the ſoul [L]. This will afford me an occaſion that Philoſopher, mankind had no beginning, and the ſoul periſhed with the body. The laſt Dogm ſuits his notions, and Cicero, quoted by Charles Stephens, aſcribes it to Dicæarchus, as we have ſeen above (49): but I do not know on what authority Charles Stephens imputed to him the other dogm. If the Jeſuit had been ſatisfied with copying Charles Stephens, he would not have committed a great blunder: he would not have charged him with ſuppoſing that the Dicæarchus who held theſe ill opinions was not the Meſſenian (50); for to that Dicæarchus does Charles Stephens plainly impute them. It is true he fancies, by a very groſs miſtake, that Dicæarchus native of Meſſana, and the diſciple of Ariſtotle, is not Dicæarchus the Meſſenian. This is what the Jeſuit ſhould have cenſured him for.

(f) In the Remark [C].

(49) Remark [C].

(50) Qui tamen Dicæarchum talia opinantem alium fuiſſe à Dicæarcho noſtro opinatur. Hier. Raguſa, pag. 94.

[L] I am going to examine ſome Objections . . . with regard to his opinion concerning the nature of the ſoul.] The Author of theſe Objections begins by unfolding our Philoſopher's Syſtem. He pretends that Dicæarchus meant that living bodies differ from a dead body only in that their parts are ſhaped and put together in a certain manner. He compares this opinion with that of Des Cartes, in the following manner. If a dog differs from a ſtone, it is not becauſe he is compoſed of a body and ſoul, and the ſtone is a body only: it is ſolely becauſe he is compoſed of parts ſo put together that they make a machine, which the ranging of the corpuſcles of a ſtone does not. This is the opinion of Des Cartes. This idea is very proper to make us underſtand the opinion of Dicæarchus: we need only ſuppoſe that he extended to all living bodies what the Carteſians ſay only with regard to beaſts: we need only ſuppoſe that he reduced man to the condition of a machine; whence it will follow that the human ſoul is not diſtinct from the body, but that it is only a conſtruction, a mechanical diſpoſition of ſeveral parts of matter. This being ſuppoſed, the Author of the Objections pretends that I do not weaken the Syſtem of Dicæarchus, ſo far am I from being able to conſider the difficulty which I have propoſed as an invincible one. I have aſſerted that Dicæarchus either did not know what he ſaid or was obliged to maintain that the power in which he made the ſoul to conſiſt, always accompanied the body; and it is anſwered, that he is only obliged to maintain that it always accompanied the living body: they add, that if I had always joined together theſe two terms body and living, my conſequence might have been entirely admitted by Dicæarchus, and therefore would have done no damage to his Syſtem. It is pretended, therefore, that he may deny that becauſe the ſoul is a power of living bodies, it thence follows, that it is found in dead carcaſes; for if it only conſiſts in the mechanical diſpoſition of certain bodies, as he ſuppoſes, it manifeſtly follows that it ought to ceaſe ſo ſoon as that diſpoſition ceaſes, ſo ſoon as the machine ſubſiſts no longer. It is thus, continue they, that a Carteſian would anſwer to thoſe who ſhould maintain that, according to his Hypotheſis, the ſoul of beaſts ſubſiſts even after they are killed. You are miſtaken, would he anſwer; for ſince I ſuppoſe it conſiſts only in a certain diſpoſition of the organs, I ought neceſſarily to ſuppoſe that it periſhes ſo ſoon as that diſpoſition is deſtroyed. The Author of the Objections ſuppoſes, that it has never been concluded againſt the Carteſians, that the faculty of feeling does not ceaſe in dead bodies, and that the parts of living bodies carry away each of them its life and ſoul when they are corrupted. It is certain, that this conſequence is not objected to the Carteſians; but it is becauſe they do not attribute any ſenſation to the ſoul of beaſts: for if they made it to be ſenſitive, the ſame difficulties which I have objected againſt Dicæarchus would fall upon them, and they would be obliged to give a ſolution of them as well as he. Laſtly it is objected to me that the Remarks which I have made on all modalities which are known to us not ceaſing to be ſuch but by giving place to other modalities of the ſame kind; whence it follows that a body which had ſenſation on ſome occaſions, would never ceaſe having it: it is objected to me, I ſay, that this little concerns Dicæarchus; for he never attributed life to matter till after the modification requiſite to make it a living body, that is to ſay, by the different diſpoſition of its parts. I had no right, therefore, to oblige him to give life to any part of the matter after its diſſolution, tho' before and after it be really a body, but not a living body. This is the concluſion of the Author of the Objections. Take notice that he has not entred the Liſts for Dicæarchus's doctrine itſelf; he having acknowledged the falſity and impiety of it: he only deſigned to ſhew that I was in the wrong to accuſe him of inconſiſtency, and that that Syſtem does not loſe its connection and regularity, tho' our Philoſopher had not admitted a ſenſation, and an imperiſhable life in bodies which have been once alive.

You clearly ſee here the whole ſtate of the Queſtion: the only point is to know whether a Philoſopher who believes there are bodies which think, and bodies which do not think, reaſons conſequently. I maintain that he does not, and that whoever once admits, for example, that a combination of bones, and nerves, feels and reaſons, ought to maintain, on pain of being declared guilty of not knowing what he ſays, that every other combination of matter thinks, and that the thought which ſubſiſted in ſuch a combination, ſubſiſts under other modifications in the diſunited parts, after the diſſipation of that combination. I do not repeat the proof I have already produced on this ſubject, nor is it neceſſary for me to give them any new ſtrength: for the Author of the Obſervations has not attacked them. He has only obſerved that Dicæarchus needs not give himſelf any trouble about the matter, conſidering he has declared, that matter does not begin to live till after a certain diſpoſition of its parts. But it is in this point principally that I would charge him with not knowing what he ſaid. By life he did not underſtand merely breathing, eating, walking: he underſtood all the operations of the man, the action of the five external ſenſes, imagination, reflection, reaſoning &c. I maintain that he ſuppoſes what has hitherto been inconceivable to all mankind, if he ſuppoſes that the ſole diſpoſition of the organs of the human body makes a ſubſtance which never had thought before to become a thinking ſubſtance. All that the diſpoſition of theſe organs can do, is confined, as in a clock, to local motion diverſly modified. The difference can lie only in the greater or leſs degree of motion. But as the diſpoſition of the ſeveral wheels which compoſe a clock, would be of no ſervice to produce the effects of that machine, if every wheel, before it was placed in a certain manner, was not actually indued with an impenetrable extenſion, a neceſſary cauſe of motion ſo ſoon as it is puſhed forward with a certain degree of force; I ſay likewiſe, that the diſpoſition of the organs of a man's body would be of no ſervice to produce thought, if every organ, before it was put in its place, was not actually indued with the faculty of thinking. Now this faculty is quite a different thing from impenetrable extenſion; for all that you can do to this extenſion, by pulling, ſtriking, or puſhing it all imaginable ways, is a change of ſituation, the whole nature and eſſence whereof you fully conceive, without having occaſion to ſuppoſe any ſenſation, and even when you deny there is any ſenſation in it. Some great Genius's have ſhewed themſelves a little too ſlow of heart in believing with regard to the diſtinction between the ſoul of a man and the body; but no one, that I know of, has yet ventured to ſay he conceived clearly, that in order to make a ſubſtance paſs from the privation of all thought to actual thought, it was ſufficient to put it in motion (51), ſo that this change of ſituation ſhould be, for inſtance, a ſenſe of joy, an affirmation, an idea of moral vertue, &c. and even tho' ſome ſhould boaſt that they conceived this clearly, they would not deſerve credit, and we might apply to them a paſſage of Ariſtotle which I have quoted in another place (52). What an abſurdity would it be to maintain that there are two ſpecies of colour, one the object of the ſight, and nothing more; and the other the object of the ſight, and of the ſmell alſo? It is ſtill more abſurd to maintain that there are two ſpecies of roundneſs, one which conſiſts merely in that the parts of the circumference of a body are equidiſtant from the centre, and

(51) Note that the Peripatetics, when they aſcribe thought to brutes, do not give this faculty to matter, but to a ſubſtantial form, which, according to them, is neither matter nor body, and which is produced anew in matter, without being compoſed of matter. So that they agree matter never acquires ſenſation or knowledge.

(52) Above, in the Article ARRIAGA, Citation (8).

occaſion of ſaying a word concerning a Diſpute which has made a great noiſe in England [M].

the other, which, beſides this, is alſo an act whereby the round body perceives that it exiſts, and ſees ſeveral other bodies round about it. The ſame abſurdity recurrs in maintaining that there are two ſorts of circular motion, one which is nothing elſe but the change of ſituation on a line whoſe parts are equidiſtant from the centre, the other which, beſides this, is alſo an act of love towards God, a fear, a hope &c. What I have ſaid of roundneſs with reſpect to viſion, may be applied to all ſorts of figures with reſpect to all ſorts of thoughts; and what I have ſaid of circular motion has no leſs force with regard to all the other lines on which a body may move either ſlowly or ſwiftly. And therefore we ought to conclude that thought is diſtinct from all the modifications of body which have come to our knowledge, ſince it is diſtinct from all figure, and all change of ſituation: but that not being the queſtion here, let us content ourſelves with concluding that Dicæarchus, to reaſon conſiſtently, ought to admit every kind of matter to be endued with the faculty of thinking; for otherwiſe it was abſurd to pretend, that in caſe ſeveral veins, arteries, &c. were placed one by another as the different parts of a machine, this combination would produce the ſenſations of colour, taſte, ſound, ſmell, cold, heat, love, hatred, affirmation, negation, &c. See the margin (53).

(53) He believed that the ſoul was the harmony of the four elements. Plut. de Placit. Phil. lib. 4. cap. 2. He ought, therefore, to have believed that all mixed Bodies have a Soul, for the four elements, muſt neceſſarily be there reduced to harmony. But is it not as abſurd to ſuppoſe that the harmony of the four elements produces thought, as to ſuppoſe that a certain concert of Muſic would be a ſound which ſhould be indued with conſciouſneſs, and know the neighbouring objects?

[M] This will afford me occaſion of ſaying a Word concerning a Diſpute which has made a great noiſe in England.] I imagine that if I had ſimply and abſolutely aſſerted that no body has hitherto boaſted of having a clear idea of a modification of matter which is an act of ſenſation, I ſhould not have proceeded too raſhly; for I have juſt now read in the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, that Mr. Locke, one of the profoundeſt Metaphyſicians in the world, ingenuouſly acknowledges that a body indued with thought is an incomprehenſible thing. And take notice that he makes this confeſſion while he is anſwering an Objection founded on this incomprehenſibility. It was therefore greatly his intereſt to deny the foundation of that objection; for which reaſon we ought to conclude his confeſſion to be very ſincere, and an effect of the force of truth, and a proof that all his utmoſt efforts to comprehend the union of the materiality of a ſubſtance with thought were ineffectual. Now ſince a man of ſuch ſuperior underſtanding confeſſes this, is it not probable that no perſon ever boaſted of having comprehended ſuch an union? This would be too vague, if I did not add ſomething to it. Let me add then that the queſtion, whether the ſoul of man is diſtinct from matter, makes a part of the famous diſpute between Dr. Stillingfleet (54) and Mr. Locke. The firſt maintained that matter is incapable of thought, and thereby became the Defender of a fundamental Article of philoſophical Orthodoxy. He made uſe of this argument among others, that we cannot conceive how matter can think. Mr. Locke admits this principle to be true, and contents himſelf with denying the conſequence; for he aſſerts that God can do things which are incomprehenſible to human underſtanding, and therefore, becauſe man cannot comprehend how a portion of matter ſhould acquire the faculty of thinking, it does not thence follow that God, who is almighty, cannot, if he pleaſe, give ſome degrees of ſenſation, perception, and thought, to certain Collections of created matter combined together as he thinks proper . . . . (56). All the difficulties which are formed, ſays he (57), againſt the poſſibility of there being matter which thinks, drawn from our ignorance, or the narrow limits of our conception, do not any ways affect the power of God, if he pleaſes to communicate to matter the faculty of thinking, and they do not prove that he has not actually communicated it to certain parts of matter diſpoſed as he thinks proper, till it can be ſhewn that it is a contradiction to ſuppoſe ſuch a thing. Here is a formal confeſſion of the incomprehenſibility of the thing, and a recourſe to the extent of God's power with regard to effects which are beyond the limits of our underſtanding. It is much after the ſame manner that the ſchoolmen ſuppoſe there is in creatures an obediential power, by which God might raiſe them, if he pleaſed, to any ſtate whatever: a ſtone might become capable of the beatific Viſion, and a drop of water might become capable of waſhing away all the pollution of original ſin. Take notice that to refute this obediential power in matter, with reſpect to knowledge, we may urge a proof which it does not appear (58) Dr. Stillingfleet has made uſe of. It has always ſeemed to me very proper to ſhew the impoſſibility of joining together the three dimenſions and thought in the ſame ſubject. You will find the ſubſtance of this proof in the Book which I cite (59). A Divine who ſhewed a great deal of paſſion againſt the Abbot de Dangeau, who had made uſe of this argument, criticized him as well as he could; but he has produced nothing but impertinencies.

(56) Ibid. pag. 497.

(57) Ibid. pag. 506.

(58) In the Extracts of the Nouvelles de la Republ. des Lettres, Nov. 1699, Art. 1.

(59) Nouvelles de la Republ. des Lettres, Auguſt 1684, Art. 6.

Mark well the expreſſion of Philoſophical Orthodoxy which I have made uſe of; for I do not pretend that with regard to Theological, Evangelical, or Chriſtian Orthodoxy, Dr. Stillingfleet is ſuperior to Mr. Locke. To inſiſt that becauſe the ſoul of man thinks, it is therefore immaterial, is, in my opinion, good reaſoning, and, beſides, eſtabliſhes a very ſolid foundation of the immortality of our ſouls, a doctrine which ought to be conſidered as one of the moſt important Articles of true Philoſophy; but this truth, ſo far as it is grounded on ſuch a principle, does not belong to the faithful, nor to Chriſtian Theology. A Chriſtian Divine, and every Chriſtian in general, as a Chriſtian, believes the immortality of the ſoul, Heaven, Hell, &c. becauſe theſe are truths which God has revealed to us. It is in this reſpect only that his faith is a true act of Religion, a meritorious act (61), acceptable to God, a ſtate of a child of God, and a diſciple of Jeſus Chriſt; and thoſe who ſhould believe the immortality of the ſoul only on account of the philoſophical ideas which reaſon furniſhes them with, would be no further advanced in the Kingdom of God, than thoſe who believe that the whole is greater than a part. Since Mr. Locke, therefore, grounds his belief of the immortality of the ſoul on Scripture, he has as much Chriſtian, Evangelical, and Theological Orthodoxy as any one can have. What he ſays on this ſubject is admirable (62). I may probably cite it in ſome other place (63).

(60) See the ſame Nouvelles, &c. Jan. 1685, pag. 12.

(61) I ſpeak here according to the hypotheſis of the merit of Works.

(62) See the Nouvelles de la Republ. des Lettres, Novemb. 1699, p. 510, and the Book intitled, Parrhaſiana, pag. 388, &c.

(63) In the laſt Remark of the Article PERROT (Nicholas) Sieur d'Ablancourt.

(54) One of the moſt learned men in Europe. He died Biſhop of Worceſter, in the year 1699.

(55) Nouvelles de la Republ. des Lettres, Nov. 1699, pag. 500.

DICÆARCHUS, Commander of the Fleet which Philip, the laſt King of Macedon but one, fitted out to attack the Iſlands Cyclades againſt all right and equity, began that unjuſt enterprize by a moſt abominable action; for, as if he would at the ſame time have terrified both Gods and men, he no ſooner ſaw himſelf in a condition to ſet ſail, than he erected two Altars, one to Impiety, and the other to Injuſtice, upon which he celebrated the whole Divine Service, neither more nor leſs than as if he had deſigned to pay his homage to thoſe two Crimes in the ſame manner as he would have done to Gods. Polybius, if we had him entire, would have acquainted us with the ſucceſs of that war, and the ſequel of Dicæarchus's actions: the fragments which we have remaining of that Writer only inform us that this impious wretch, engaging in a conſpiracy, expired under the torture (a).

(a) Extracted from Polybius, Hiſt. lib. 17. cap. 35. pag. 705.

DIEU (LEWIS DE), Miniſter of Leyden, and Profeſſor in the Walloon College in that City, was a man of great abilities, and well verſed in the Oriental Languages. He was born the 7th of April 1590, at Fluſhing, where his father DANIEL DE DIEU, a man a man of merit and quality [A], exerciſed the holy Miniſtry. He ſtudied under Daniel Colonius, his maternal uncle, who was Profeſſor at Leyden in the Walloon College. He was four years Miniſter of the French Church at Middleburgh [B]. He might have ſucceeded Uyttenbogard, who had been the Court-Miniſter at the Hague [C]: but his natural averſion to the manners of a Court did not permit him to comply with the deſire of Prince Maurice in that particular. He was called to Leyden in the year 1619, to teach with his uncle Colonius in the Walloon College; and he diſcharged the duty of that employ with great diligence till his death, which happened in the year 1642. He publiſhed a Commentary on the four Goſpels [D], and Notes on the Acts of the Apoſtles,

[A] His father, DANIEL DE DIEU, was a man of merit and quality.] He was a native of Bruſſels, and had been a Miniſter there two and twenty years. He removed thence to ſerve the Church at Fluſhing, after the Duke of Parma had taken Bruſſels (1). He underſtood Greek and the Oriental Languages, and he could preach, with the applauſe of his Auditors, in German, Italian, French, and Engliſh. He was much beloved by the Sieur de Sainte Aldegonde. The Churches of the Netherlands ſent him in 1588, with ſome other Miniſters, to Queen Elizabeth, to inform her of the deſigns of the Duke of Parma, who ſecretly made her propoſals of peace, tho' the King of Spain was equipping a formidable fleet againſt England. LEWIS DE DIEU, the father of Daniel, was for a long time a domeſtic to Charles V, and obtained a Patent for the ennobling of himſelf and all his poſterity, as a recompence for his ſervices. He embraced the Reformation, and died in that perſuaſion; ſo that his friends were obliged to conceal his body at Bruſſels for ſix weeks, and to convey it to Antwerp, where it was interred by night. He had married the daughter of Peter van Ceulen, better known by the name of Colonius which his Schoolmaſter gave him. This Colonius (2) inſinuated himſelf very much into the favour of Robert Stephens, who adviſed him to go to Geneva. He was there recommended to Calvin, who inſtructed him in his opinions, and exhorted him to ſtudy Divinity. He dedicated himſelf to the Miniſtry, and performed the firſt functions of it at Metz, where the Baron de Clervant had procured a Church to be erected. Francis de Beaucaire, Biſhop of Metz, had written a very abuſive book, reflecting on the doctrine and perſons of the Miniſters. Colonius returned a ſharp anſwer to it, and in a few words: this anſwer was publiſhed at Geneva, in the year 1566. He was perſecuted by the Catholics of Metz, and detained in priſon for ſome time; and when that Church was ruined by the perſecution, and the Temple demoliſhed in the King's preſence, he retired into the Palatinate with John Taffin his Collegue. They were both Miniſters at Heidelberg; Taffin preached in French, and Colonius in German. The latter died young, and left a ſon named Daniel Colonius, who was Miniſter and Principal of the Walloon College at Leiden (3). I have already ſaid that the ſiſter of Daniel Colonius was the mother of Lewis de Dieu. A Book (4) has lately fallen into my hands, which obliges me to lengthen this Remark. I find there that Lewis de Dieu, the grandfather of him who is the ſubject of this Article, attended his maſter Charles V in his expeditions into Africa and Germany, and that he made no ſecret to him of his being a Proteſtant. The Emperor only adviſed him to take ſpecial care of himſelf, becauſe it would not be in his power to ſave him from the hands of the Inquiſition (5). Lewis de Dieu was obliged to conceal himſelf ſoon after the abdication of Charles V; for that Prince could no longer ſcreen him from the hatred of the Jeſuits (6). It is ſaid that this worthy man was inſtructed by Calvin himſelf. He was going over into England with ſome other young men: Calvin, who was going over in the ſame veſſel (7), repreſented to them that they ought not to ſwear when they plaid at cards. None but Lewis de Dieu ſubmitted to this reproof: all the reſt laughed at it: wherefore Calvin, finding him alone, ſpoke to him of God, and made ſo real a convert of him, that the young man wrote to his friends that nothing ſhould ever ſeparate him from the faith of John Calvin (8). He dedicated his ſon Daniel to the Miniſtry. They alſo relate the following circumſtance; that a certain Jeſuit gave this Daniel notice that thoſe of his order were ſearching after the dead body of Lewis de Dieu, and deſigned to hang it on a gibbet: upon which Daniel dug it up, and hid it. The Jeſuit who gave him this information of the affair, offered to aſſiſt him in taking up and concealing the body (9).

(1) It was in 1585.

(2) See his Article, under the word COLOGNE.

(3) Ex Oratione funebri Lud. de Dieu.

(4) Aphoriſmi Theologici Ludovici de Dieu, cum Præfatione Melchioris Leydeckeri.

(5) Melchior Leydeckerus, Præfatione Aphoriſmorum Theologic. Lud. de Dieu, ex Concione funebri Lud. de Dieu, habitâ Belgicè ab Abrahamo Heidano.

(6) Leydecker. ibid.

(7) This is a ſingular fact, and unknown, as I imagine, to all thoſe who have written of Calvin; no body, that I know of, having obſerved that Calvin ever made a voyage to England.

(8) Leydecker. Præfatione Aphoriſm. Theologic. Lud. de Dieu, ex Concione fun. Lud. de Dieu.

(9) Idem, ibid.

[B] He was four years Miniſter . . . . . at Middleburgh.] Mr. Leydecker, Profeſſor of Divinity at Utrecht (10), aſſures us that Lewis de Dieu, having been Miniſter only at Fluſhing for two years, went thence to Leyden in the year 1619. I have followed Polyander, the Author of the funeral Oration: but I here give my Reader notice that it appears by the ſequel of Polyander's diſcourſe, that Lewis de Dieu was Miniſter of the Church of Fluſhing, and not of that of Middleburgh.

(10) Ibid.

[* That Profeſſor Leydecker ſpeaks the truth we have the teſtimony of de Dieu himſelf, who, in his Epiſtle Dedicatory of Xavier's Life of Chriſt addreſſed to the Magiſtrates of Fluſhing, has theſe words: Quæ (Urbs veſtra) me non tantum in lucem edidit, ſed & in ſtudiis, publicis ſumptibus, benignè aluit, tandemque Eccleſiæ Paſtorem vocavit; ac per biennium tenuit atque amavit, donec a Lugduno-Batava Eccleſia vocatum, veſter in publicum Eccleſiæ bonum amor dimittendum eo judicaret. ADD. REM.]

[C] He might have ſucceeded Uyttenbogard, who had been the Court Miniſter at the Hague.] Mr. Leydecker acquaints us with ſome circumſtances of this affair which deſerve to be read. Prince Maurice being in Zeland heard Lewis de Dieu preach, who was yet but a Student, and ſome time after ſent for him to Court. The young man modeſtly excuſed himſelf, declaring that he deſigned to ſatisfy his conſcience in the exerciſe of his Miniſtry, and to cenſure freely what he ſhould find deſerved cenſure; a liberty which Courts did not care to allow. Beſides, he thought the poſt which was offered him more proper for a man in years than a Student. His modeſty and prudence were commended by Prince Maurice.

[D] He publiſhed a Commentary on the four Goſpels.] This was in 1631. His firſt care had been to examine the Latin Verſions of the Syriac New Teſtament made by Tremellius and Guy le Fevre de la Boderie †, and that of St. Matthew's Goſpel in Hebrew, made by Munſter and Mercerus. He found a great many faults in thoſe Verſions; which put him upon examining the vulgar Tranſlation, thoſe of Eraſmus, and Theodore Beza, the Syriac, Arabic, and Ethiopic. He compared them with one another, and all of them with the Greek Text. He made no ſcruple to cenſure Beza in thoſe particulars which he thought deſerved cenſure, and did a great deal of juſtice to the Author of the Vulgate. Magnus vir fuit Beza, ſays he (11), eximiæ eruditionis, acerrimi judicii; quique ſuis in Novum Teſtamentum laboribus nunquam laudatam ſatis operam Eccleſiis navavit, æternumque & ſupra invidiam nomen comparavit. Verum ſi Vulgatum quoque Interpretem, quiſquis is tandem fuerit, doctum imo doctiſſimum virum fuiſſe aſſeram, non me peccaſſe judicavero. Suos habet, fateor, nævos, habet & ſuos barbariſmos. Sed quin paſſim ejus fidem judiciumque admirer, etiam ubi barbarus videtur, negare non poſſum. i. e. "Beza "was a man of great abilities, of excellent learning, "and acute judgment, who by his labours on the "New Teſtament has done a ſervice to the Church "which can never be ſufficiently commended, and "gained immortal honour above the reach of envy; "but if I ſhould likewiſe pronounce the Author of "the Vulgate, whoever he was, to be a very learned man, I ſhould not think myſelf in the wrong. "I own he has his blemiſhes, and is ſometimes guilty "of Barbariſms; but I cannot help frequently admiring his fidelity and judgment even where he "appears barbarous." Father Simon ſpeaks advantageouſly of the Writings of Lewis de Dieu, in the XXXV Chapter of his Critical Hiſtory of the Commentators on the New Teſtament.

† In Latin Guido Fabricius Boderianus.

(11) In Præfatione.

ſtles, and the Apocalypſe of St. John, which he printed in Hebrew and Syriac [E], with a Latin Verſion of his own (a). I ſhall acquaint the Reader what other Books we have of his in the Remarks [F]. He refuſed the poſt which was offered him of Divinity-Profeſſor in the new Univerſity of Utrecht; and if he had lived long enough, he would have had the ſame poſt in that of Leyden (b). He married the daughter of Henry Bogard, Counſellor of Fluſhing, by whom he had eleven children, one of whom practiſed Phyſic at Leyden (c), and afterwards at Amſterdam; and another ſtudied Divinity, and was Miniſter at Woubrugge. The Phyſician left two ſons, one of whom follows his father's profeſſion at Amſterdam, and the other ſtudies the Civil Law (d).

(a) Ex Epiſtolâ Dedicatoriâ & Præfatione novæ Editionis 1693.

(b) Leydeckerius, Præf. Aphoriſm. Lud. de Dieu.

(c) Ex Orat. funebri.

(d) Ex Epiſtola Dedicat. novæ Edition. 1693.

[E] He printed the Apocalypſe in Hebrew and Syriac.] This wants explanation. It muſt not be imagined that he publiſhed two Apocalypſes, one in the Hebrew language, and the other in the Syriac. Lewis de Dieu publiſhed the Apocalypſe in Syriac only, but he cauſed one impreſſion to be made in the Syriac Character, and another in the Hebrew Character. I received this information from Mr. de la Roque, a French Miniſter at London (12).

(12) See above Citation (30) of the Article COLOMIES.

[F] I ſhall acquaint the Reader what other Books we have of his.] He publiſhed the Hiſtory of the Life of Jeſus Chriſt, written in the Perſian tongue by the Jeſuit Jerom Xavier, with learned Notes; and he joined to the Original a Latin Tranſlation. The Hiſtory of St. Peter written in the Perſian language was alſo publiſhed by him with [a Latin Tranſlation and] Notes. As to the two firſt Chapters of Geneſis tranſlated into Perſian by Jacobus Tawuſus (α), he only publiſhed them with an Advertiſement to the Reader. I ſay nothing of the Rudiments which he publiſhed of the Hebrew and Perſian tongues, nor of his Parallel of the Grammar of the Oriental Languages (13). Since his death they have printed his Commentary on the Epiſtle to the Romans, with a Collection of Obſervations on all the other Epiſtles of the Apoſtles, and a Commentary on the Old Teſtament (14). His Treatiſe de Avaritia, his Rhetorica ſacra, and his Aphoriſmi Theologici (15), owe their appearance abroad to the care of Mr. Leydecker. His Obſervations on the Scripture have been reprinted at Amſterdam in folio, in 1693, corrected and enlarged, together with the Apocalypſe in Syriac. Take notice Alegambe acknowledges that Lewis de Dieu has faithfully tranſlated the Book of Jerom Xavier; but he accuſes him of having tacked to it Heretical Obſervations which deſerve to be burnt; additis Animadverſionibus hæreticis & rogo dignis. Cæterum non infideliter textum interpretatus eſt, ſi nonnulla demas quæ fortaſſe Codex ipſius vitiata habuit. Thus he expreſſes himſelf in the 189th page of his Library of the Writers of his Order.

(13) Extracted from his Funeral Oration pronounced by Polyander

(14) Witte, in Diario Biograph.

(15) Theſe Aphoriſms were printed at Utrecht, in the year 1693.

[α § Jacobus Tawuſus, Tawoſus, or Tuſius, as he is ſometimes called, was a Jew of Tûs in Khoraſan. His Tranſlation of the Pentateuch is inſerted in the fourth Volume of the London Polyglott, and was firſt publiſhed at Conſtantinople in the year 1551, together with the Targum of Onkelos, the Arabic Verſion of Saadias, and the Commentaries of Solomon Jarhi, all in the Hebrew Character. This Perſian Tranſlation of the Pentateuch, tho' uſeful in other reſpects, and alſo Xavier's Hiſtory of Chriſt, which the Author tells us was tranſlated from his Original by a native of Perſia, are both condemned by the learned Mr. John Greaves, a competent judge, as written in a very barbarous ſtyle, and therefore not to be imitated. Quæ adhuc [Perſice] edita ſunt, ſays he (16), ſive Pentateuchus a Tawuſhio Judæo, ſive Xaverii Hiſtoria a Cl. Viro D. Ludovico de Dieu: ea adeò barbarè ſcripta ſunt, ut expers planè venuſtatis omnis ſit habendus, quiſquis eorum ſolœciſmos judicaverit imitandos. ADD. REM.]

(16) In Præfatione Aſtronom. Shah Cholgij.

DIGBY (Sir KENELM) became very illuſtrious in the preſent age for his Virtue and Learning. He was deſcended of a very ancient Family in England. His great-grandfather was Everard Digby, who accompanied by ſix of his brothers, fought valiantly at Boſworth Field on the ſide of Henry VII againſt the Uſurper Richard III. His father, who was alſo named Everard, did not imitate this noble example of Loyalty; for he ſuffered himſelf to be engaged in the Gunpowder-plot againſt James I, and for that crime had his head ſtruck off. His ſon, of whom we are now ſpeaking, glorioufly wiped out this ſtain, and immediately rendred himſelf ſo worthy that Monarch's eſteem, that he reſtored him to his Eſtate. He afterwards appeared with ſplendor at Court, and was not leſs beloved by Charles than he had been by King James. Charles I made him Gentleman of his Bed-Chamber, Commiſſioner of the Navy, and Governor of the Trinity-Houſe. He granted him Letters of Repriſal againſt the Venetians, by vertue whereof he took ſeveral prizes from them, and with a ſmall Fleet which he commanded fought that of the Venetians near the Port of Scanderoon, and made his way through it with his booty. As he had been all his life a lover of learning, he acquired an extraordinary ſkill in Languages, and the Sciences, and became a good Philoſopher. He tranſlated ſeveral Authors into his mother-tongue, and in his Treatiſe of the Nature of Bodies, and the Immortality of the Soul, he has diſcovered great penetration, and an extenſive knowledge. His cloſe application to the Mathematics did not hinder him from ſearching eagerly into the ſecrets of Chymiſtry, by means whereof he found out ſome excellent Medicines which he freely gave away to people of all ſorts, and eſpecially to the poor. He pronounced a Diſcourſe in public at Montpellier on the Sympathetic Powder, which was printed, and ſold in great numbers. In the year 1651 he publiſhed his Treatiſe of the Immortality of the Soul, on the ſubject of which he had had long conferences with Monſieur Des-Cartes. Theſe two Philoſophers appointed to meet at the College of Boncourt at Paris. The nature and ſtate of the ſoul was the principal ſubject of their converſation: and tho' they could not agree as to ſeveral points, they parted full of eſteem for each other. Theſe were the leaſt conſiderable qualities of Sir Kenelm Digby: his attachment to the Royal Family, which had been driven from the Throne of England, his two Embaſſies to Innocent X from the Queen, widow of the unfortunate Charles I, whoſe Chancellor he was, the firmneſs with which he owned before the Parliament that he was a Catholic, and the conſtancy with which he bore the confiſcation of his Eſtate and the baniſhment which he drew on himſelf by that confeſſion, render him yet more illuſtrious. He retired into France, and there gained the affection of all perſons of wit and honour. On the reſtoration of Charles II Sir Kenelm Digby returned to London, where he abode till having having been long troubled with the ſtone, and perceiving his kidneys ulcerated, he had a mind to go over to France. He cauſed himſelf to be carried towards the ſea in a litter; but his illneſs increaſed upon him to that degree that they were obliged to bring him back to London, where he died on the 11th of March (his birth-day) 1665, being near ſixty years old. He married the only daughter of Sir Edward Stanley, ſon of the Earl of Derby, by a daughter of the Duke of Norfolk, and had three ſons by her, the eldeſt of whom was killed near Brentford, in an engagement with the Rebels, and left no iſſue. The youngeſt died in his infancy; and the other ſon left only two daughters (a).

(a) Bullart, Academ. des Sciences, tom. 2. pag. 137, &c. N.B. This Article not being of the number of thoſe which I have given a Liſt of, in the 134th, and following pages of the 8th Volume of the Journal Literaire de la Haye, in order to prevent all cavil on account thereof, I here add the following Letter written to the Bookſeller the 17th of March 1719: Sir, Having accidentally found this Article of Mr. Bayle's Dictionary in my Copy, I ſend it you. I am ſorry it is come ſo late; but you may add it at the end of the firſt Volume, and this will the better ſhew that nothing has been inſerted but what was Mr. Bayle's own. I am, Sir, Your &c. BASNAGE.

☞DIGBY (Sir KENELM). We ſhall endeavour to ſupply the defects of the preceding Article of him. He was ſon and heir of Sir Everard Digby [A] of Dryſtoke in Rutlandſhire Knight, by Mary, daughter and ſole heir of William Mulſho of Gothurſt in Buckinghamſhire. He was born at Gothurſt on the 11th of July 1603 [B]. About the year 1618 he was ſent to Glouceſter Hall in the Univerſity of Oxford, after he had been educated in the Proteſtant Religion, and was committed to the care of Mr. Thomas Allen, though placed under another Tutor (a). He continued here in the quality of a Gentleman Commoner for more than two years, and afterwards travelled in foreign countries for ſome time. October the 28th 1623 he received the honour of Knighthood from King James I at Hinchingbrook, who had before reſtored to him the eſtate forfeited by his father. In 1628 he was Admiral of a Fleet going into the Levant, and gained great honour by his brave conduct at Algiers in reſcuing many Engliſh ſlaves, and by attacking the Venetian Fleet in the Bay of Scanderoon [C]. In the years 1638 and 1639 he had a correſpondence by Letters with the Lord George Digby, afterwards Earl of Briſtol, relating to the authority of the Fathers and other diſputes between the Popiſh and Proteſtant Religions; the former of which Sir Kenelm had about two years before embraced [D]. Theſe Letters were afterwards publiſhed [E]. In 1639 he with Mr. Walter Mountague was employed by the Queen to engage the Papiſts to a liberal contribution to the King, which they

(a) Wood, Hiſt. & Antiquit. Univerſit. Oxon. lib. 2. pag. 383. and Athen. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 351. 2d edit. London 1721.

[A] Son and heir of Sir Everard Digby.] Sir Everard was eſteemed the handſomeſt man of his time (1); but being unhappily engaged in the Gun-powder-plot, upon his trial he confeſſed the indictment, and was hang'd, drawn and quarter'd at the Weſt-end of St. Paul's in London, on Jan. 30, 160$\frac{4}{5}$ (2), aged twenty four (3). At his execution, when the Executioner plucked out his heart, and according to cuſtom held it up ſaying, Here is the heart of a Traitor, Sir Everard made anſwer, Thou lieſt. This is related by Francis Lord Bacon (4), tho' without mentioning Sir Everard's name. That Gentleman was ſon of Everard Digby of Dryſtoke in Rutlandſhire Eſq; who was Maſter of Arts and Fellow of St. John's College in Cambridge in 1579, and publiſhed ſeveral books, particularly Theoria Analytica viam ad Monarchiam ſcientiarum demonſtrans. London 1579 in 4to. De duplici Methodo Libri duo, Rami Methodum refutantes, London 1580 in 8vo. De Arte Natandi Libri duo, London 1587, (5), and A Diſſuaſive from taking away the Goods and Livings of the Church, &c. London in 4to (6). He died at Dryſtoke about the year 1592 (7).

(1) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 354. 2d edit. London 1721.

(2) A true and perfect Relation of the whole Proceedings againſt the late Traitors &c. edit. London 1606, in 4to.

(3) Wood, ubi ſupra.

(4) In his Hiſtoria Vitæ & Mortis, apud Wood, col. 354.

(5) Hyde, Catalog. impreſſor. Libror. Bibliotheca Bodleianæ, pag. 220.

(6) Wood, ubi ſupra.

(7) Idem, ibid.

[B] Born at Gothurſt on the 11th of July 1603.] This we are informed of in the Book of Nativities collected by Dr. Richard Napier of Buckinghamſhire, a MS. in the Aſhmolean Muſeum at Oxford; and in an Almanack for 1673 publiſhed by John Gadbury; and in Mr. Wood's Hiſtoria & Antiquitates Univerſitatis Oxonienſis (8), & Athen. Oxonienſ. (9), But Ben Johnſon will have it to be June in theſe verſes (10);

"Witneſs thy action done at Scanderoon
"Upon thy birth-day the eleventh of June."

(8) Lib. 2. pag. 383.

(9) Vol. 2. col. 351.

(10) In his Underwoods, pag. 243.

[C] Attacking the Venetian Fleet in the Bay of Scanderoon.] Ben Johnſon in the lines above quoted tells us, that this battle was fought on the eleventh of June; but a Pamphlet publiſhed the ſame year giving an account of that fight, and written very probably by Sir Kenelm himſelf, fixes it on the 16th of that month.

[D] Sir Kenelm had about two years before embraced the Popiſh Religion.] In ſome of Archbiſhop Laud's Letters at the end of Mr. Henry Wharton's Hiſtory of the Trial and Troubles of the moſt Reverend Father in God Dr. William Laud Archbiſhop of Canterbury (11), there is a Letter of that Prelate to Sir Kenelm dated at Lambeth 27th March 1636, wherein it appears, that he had then newly changed his Religion for that of Rome; which being done unknown to the Archbiſhop, the latter was highly diſpleaſed, and endeavoured to regain him to the Proteſtant Religion, but in vain. In 1638 there was printed at Paris a Conference with a Lady about the choice of Religion, written by our Author, and reprinted at London 1654 in 8vo. It was anſwered by Dr. William Twiſſe, Prolocutor of the Aſſembly of Divines at Weſtminſter in 1642; but that Anſwer was never publiſhed (12).

(11) Pag. 610. edit. London 1695, in fol.

(12) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 81 and 352.

[E] Theſe two Letters were afterwards publiſhed.] They were printed at London 1651 in 12mo, under the following title: Letters between the Lord George Digby, and Sir Kenelm Digby Knight, concerning Religion. In the firſt Letter written by the Lord Digby, and dated at Sherburn November the 2d 1638, he tells Sir Kenelm (13), that he "thought himſelf as "happy to bear the name of his friend, and pro-"miſed to himſelf as much eternity by the relation, "as he (14), who engraved Sir Philip Sidney's friend-"ſhip on his monument." He then obſerves (15), that though Sir Kenelm's example and advice had ever been his prime directory in the way of his ſtudies, and in the ſeveral judgments of what I read, ſays he, yours muſt be ever with me of ſingular authority; yet in the particular concerning the Fathers, I muſt confeſs, as I came unto them perhaps with different preparations, ſo I have likewiſe peruſed many of them with reflections upon their uſefulneſs farre differing from thoſe you ſpecifie. I am ſo farre from receiving them as judges, that in many caſes I cannot admit them as witneſſes authentick enough, whereon to paſs a verdict in Religion. I diſcover methinkes too prone a biaſs in moſt of their evidence, either to the eſtabliſhing of their own private opinions, or to the deſtruction of their adverſaries; and this even in the moſt primitive of them; faction, it ſeems, and a kind of ſectary-paſſion having had as ſtrong, though not ſo various a current, even neer to the very ſprings of verity, as afterward in the remoter channels, as you can much better inſtance (if you pleaſe) then I, out of Euſebius, Epiphanius, and St. Auguſtine, who themſelves alſo, as they ſeem to adhere to the Catholick Church, and as the Roman glories in them, may well be by both ſides allowed an Expurgator. With regard

(13) Pag. 2.

(14) Fulk Greville, Lord Brooke.

(15) Pag. 2, 3.

they effected; and thereupon ſome ſtiled the forces then raiſed for his Majeſty The Poſh Army (c). In the beginning of the civil wars he exerted himſelf very vigorouſly in the King's cauſe; but was afterwards impriſoned by the Parliament's order in Winchester Houſe, and had leave to depart thence in July 1643 at the deſire of the Queen of France, and to travel into that country. He compounded for his eſtate in 1649; and the Parliament then voted, that he ſhould depart the Nation, and not return without leave from the Houſe under pain of death and confiſcation of his eſtate. However he afterwards returned for a time; "and as it is ſaid, continues Mr. Wood (d), cringed to Oli- "ver; but in what ſenſe, whether in order for the good of the Roman Catholics, or for "the carrying on of ſome public deſign, I cannot now tell." About the ſame time he being Chancellor to Henrietta the Queen-mother of England, ſhe ſent him as her Envoy from France to the Pope; and at his firſt coming to Rome he was highly eſteemed by all perſons, on account of his admirable parts and learning, as well as majeſtic port and behaviour.

(c) Whitelocke's Memorials of the Engliſh Affairs, pag. 32. edit. London 1732.

(d) Athen. Oxon. col. 352.

to what Sir Kenelm had ſaid, that he relied more upon the Fathers for what they tell us they were taught, than upon what they teach, the Lord Digby profeſſes (16), that he ſhould do ſo too, could he but be half ſo well aſſured of the firſt part of Sir Kenelm's reaſon, namely, that the former was derived from an infallible authority, as he was of the other, that their own reaſons were liable to error. But as his Lordſhip could yet find no reaſon to make him acknowledge, that there is any infallible authority but only the Scriptures, which he conceived is not what Sir Kenelm meant; ſo he found as little that the Fathers (eſpecially thoſe before the firſt Nicene Council) were perſuaded of any ſuch. And granting they had, he could leaſt of all diſcern which of the various doctrines they deliver, were rightly delivered to them from that unerring authority; ſince it is apparent, that they teach many uncertainties and errors, as dogmatically, and with as ſolemn confirmations, as they do the moſt authentic truths. "Hardly ſhall you find Scripture "alledged more frankly by them, or the Church. "Tradition proclaimed more lowdly in any point of "faith, than by Juſtin and Tertullian in the rigid "cenſure of the uſe of images, and in the ſame "Tertullian in affirming Chriſt's deſcent to free the "Patriarchs; and in theſe two and diverſe others, "the groſs aſſertion of the Angels copulation with "the women, and laſtly, then in all the Millenaries "moſt confident authorizing of their Judaic Doctrine. "Theſe are perhaps of the ſlighter inſtances, ſuch as "flow eaſieſt into a Letter from a bad memory; and "yet I pray you reſolve me which of them I ſhall "let paſs, as derived from infallibilitie? Whether "that, which our Church approves, and the Roman "condemnes, as the firſt; or that which the Roman "agrees to, and we diſallow, as the ſecond; or the "ſecond laſt, which both ſides reject? I profeſs I "am as yet to diſtinguiſh which of them theſe Fa- "thers meant we ſhould ſwallow as delivered to them, "and which chew and conſider as only delivered by "them. Theſe and many more irreconcileable paſ- "ſages in them have rendered me much alike affected "both to what you ſay they tell us they were taught, "and to what they teach; that is, to have my rea- "ſon, as much as I can, cleared and enlightened by "both, but to ſuffer it to be hood-winked and led "implicitly by neither. I reverence theſe holy Fa- "thers as divine eſtabliſhers of faith in things, where "they all concur, and where not, as happy aiders of "the underſtanding, as it were ſacred bellowes of the "ſoul, whether to make it glow unto contrition and "fervor of zeal, or to ſubtilize and exalt it into flames "of contemplation (17)." Sir Kenelm in his anſwer dated at London December the 26th 1638, begins (18) with complaining to his Lordſhip in behalf of the Fathers, and repreſenting their grievances to him, that his Lordſhip was ſo rigorous as to exclude them from being Witneſſes in matters of Religion. Their humility, as well of underſtanding, as of manners, will not let them be troubled when they are recuſed as judges. They never pronounce any thing out of their own breaſts, unto which they will confine other men's aſſents. But when they tell you plainly what they were taught, and what they finde believed and practiſed generally throughout the whole Church, have they not reaſon to take it unkindly to be rejected? If you will examine their veracity by all thoſe circumſtances, that are uſually conſidered in taking men's depoſitions, you will find them ſtrong on their ſide. They were right honeſt men, not onley believed, but known to be ſuch by all the world. They are acknowledged on all hands to be ſo judicious, as would more blemiſh one's own judgment then theirs, but to call it in queſtion. What they wrote of are matters belonging to their own art and trade, in which ſurely they would have great care and attention not to miſtake, ſince their own and their poſteritye's eternal ſalvation depended on it. Since then there is will and ability to inform us of truth, why ſhould we ſuſpect them? . . . . . Their private opinions (for the eſtabliſhing of which your Lordſhip ſaith, you diſcover too prone a bias in moſt of their evidence) doe not intereſt our beliefs; in ſuch points we are as free as they . . . . The Faction and Sectary-paſſion that your Lordſhip remarketh even near the ſprings of verity, belongeth only to their adverſaries; their warmth is juſt and due zeale. With regard to the three Fathers, of whom his Lordſhip had ſaid, the Papiſts as well as Proteſtants allow them an Expurgator, Sir Kenelm profeſſes (19), that he never met in his reading with any doctrine of faith in them, which he did not entirely aſſent to. He afterwards obſerves (20), that to ſum up as ſhortly and plainly as he can, the uſe, which he conceives is to be made of reading the Fathers, and "letting paſs what "they wrote as Commentators upon the Scriptures, "and as Philoſophers, and all which is but as Divines "and Scholars, we are generally to take hold of "what they deliver us as Paſtors of the Church, "which appeareth chiefly by what they writ againſt "thoſe they brand with hereſies, which they could "not doe, were not thoſe poynts which they cenſure, "againſt the known and generall tradition of the "Church: and next when they deliver us dogmati- "cally and profeſſedly any doctrine in ſuch part as "we may reaſonably conceive they intended we "ſhould take it as a matter of faith, not giving it as "conceptions of their own, which they bring onely "learned arguments on texts of Scripture to main- "tain; in all which a free and good judgment will "eaſily diſcern by reading them, which way to in- "cline." With reſpect to the four inſtances urged by his Lordſhip, he declares, that as to the firſt, the uſe of images, he does not conceive it to be a precept given by Chriſt, but ſince introduced by the Governors of the Church as a thing convenient to raiſe devotion in the people (21). As to the ſecond, viz. Tertullian's affirming Chriſt's deſcent to hell to free the Patriarchs, that "not only he, but all the Fathers, that ever ſpake of "that particular, deliver it as a matter of faith, and "ſo hath been held by the Church (22)." As to the third inſtance; the aſſertion of the angels copulation with women, that "it is a queſtion of Philoſophy, and not "of faith; for many, or rather moſt of the Fathers "were of opinion, that they were not pure ſpirits, "but had very ſubtle and immortal bodies (the con- "trary of which was never yet delivered as matter "of faith; howbeit by force of argument now the "corporeity of angels is exploded out of the ſchools;) "and thus ſuppoſing that opinion, the way is ob- "vious enough in commenting ſome texts of Scrip- "ture to fall into that error, which ſo becometh an "error in Philoſophy, and in no wiſe concerning "faith (23)." As to the laſt inſtance, the notion of the Millennium, it appeareth plainly to have grown among ſome of the Fathers (with whom the authority of

(16) Pag. 3, 4.

(17) Pag. 4, 5.

(18) Pag. 8.

(19) Pag. 10.

(20) Pag. 13.

(21) Pag. 15.

(22) Pag. 15, 16.

(23) Pag. 16.

behaviour. " But at length growing high, ſays the Hiſtorian abovementioned (e), and " huffing his Holineſs, he was in a manner neglected; and eſpecially for this reaſon, " that having made a collection for the afflicted Catholics in England, he was found to " be no faithful ſteward in that matter." Having read the writings of Des Cartes, he went to Holland to ſee him, and found him in his retirement at Egmond; and having diſcourſed with him a long time without making himſelf known, Mr. Des Cartes, who had ſeen ſome of his works, told him, he did not doubt but he was the famous Sir Kenelm Digby; and if you, Sir, reply'd the Knight, were not the illuſtrious Mr. Des Cartes, I ſhould not have come over from England on purpoſe to ſee you (f). He wrote ſeveral works, which procured him a great reputation [F]. He died at his houſe in Covent-Garden on the 11th of June 1665, and was interred in a vault built at his

(e) Ibid.

(f) See Mr. Des-Maizeaux's Life of M. de St. Evremond, prefixed to the firſt volume of the Works of that Author, pag. 41. 2d edit. London 1728 in 8vo, and the Article of DES CARTES, in this Dictionary, Vol. 4. Note [BB], pag. 147.

" of Papias weighed much) by literally interpreting a " text of the Apocalyps; but never any of them urged " the generally received opinion of the Church, nor " publick tradition from Chriſt and his Apoſtles. " And beſides, the Church has never yet to this day " condemned as an hereſie that part of the Millena- " ries Beliefe, which ſome of the Fathers held, " (which is, of the Saints reigning with Chriſt a " thouſand years upon earth after their reſurrection, " and enjoying onely ſpirituall delights,) but only " other foul extremities, which went under the name " of the Millenaries Hereſies. Now by what I have " ſaid to thoſe inſtances in particular, and bringing " that ſpirit that I ſaid before was required to the " reading of the Fathers, I conceive it will be no " hard matter to determine which of them, as your " Lordſhip ſayes, we are to ſwallow as deliver'd to them, " and which to chew and conſider as onely delivered " by them." In the Poſtſcript he obſerves (27), that though his Lordſhip was pleaſed to have called his inſtances ſlight ones, and ſuch as flow eaſieſt into a Letter from a bad memory, yet " you muſt give me " leave, continues he, to believe them the ſtrongeſt and " ſharpeſt that can be urged upon this ſubject, and " the flower and quinteſſence of what Mr. Chilling- " worth (28), and the beſt Wits have produced againſt " the tradition of the Church and the authority of " the Fathers." The Lord Digby wrote an excellent and elaborate Anſwer to this Letter, dated at Sherburn March 29th, 1639; in which in the firſt place he joins with Sir Kenelm in full admiration of the piety, learning, and integrity of thoſe reverend Fathers of the Church, whoſe lives, whoſe zeals, whoſe deaths abundantly merited that title with everlaſting celebrations of their Memories (29). Their veracity, ſays he (30), I attribute infinitely unto from a due conſideration of all theſe happy circumſtances, wherewith your eloquence authorizes it. And he obſerves, that in many caſes he holds their teſtimonials moſt ſacred and unqueſtionable; ſuch are the grand fundamentals of Chriſtianity, the doctrine of believing in one God, of the Incarnation, the Paſſion, the Reſurrection, and ſome other the conſtitutive Articles of Chriſtian Faith. But that on the other ſide there are many caſes, in which he can in no wiſe venture to give ſentence upon their evidence. " Such, ſays he (31), are moſt, if " not all the now converted poynts between the Ro- " miſh Church, and ours; and as in my former Letter, " levelling at theſe, I could not admit the Fathers " for witneſſes authentical enough whereon to paſs " a verdict in many caſes of Religion; ſo likewiſe " I muſt again profeſs in this, that I am as far as ever " from allowing them in theſe ſuch a determining " and convincing authority. Witneſſes of ſuch an " overruling teſtimony, though they bear the name of " Witneſſes, are judges in effect, and they do give " the law, tho' another pronounce it. Now to be " judges, I could cite you many paſſages, wherein " they themſelves do utterly renounce the pretenſion; " and you ſay yourſelf, that their moderation will not " let them be troubled when they are recuſed for ſuch. " Neither will I wrong that vertue of theirs ſo much, " as to embrace their teſtimonies with any cloſer ad- " herence than itſelf deſires. For be they what they " will in point of interpreting to us the doctrines of " the Church and Scripture, I am ſure they are the " beſt declarers and limiters of their own, both for " their proper ſenſe, and the degrees of our receiving " them." He then remarks (32), that the reaſons prevalent with him of the Uncertainty, or rather in his opinion Impoſſibility of drawing out of the Fathers any ſuch proofs either way in our controverſies, whereon an inquiring and judicious perſon ſhould be obliged to rely and acquieſce, are ſo amply and learnedly, ſays he, ſet down by Mr. Daillé in Emploi des Peres (33), I think little of material or weighty can be ſaid on this ſubject, that his rare and piercing obſervation hath not anticipated. But becauſe you will expect from me ſomewhat more than a bare reference, take in ſhort the chief inducements I will ſet down as briefly and perſpicuouſly as I can. Not to inſiſt upon the more frequent ones, namely, the few writings extant of the primitive Doctors of the firſt, ſecond, and third ages of Chriſt; the many ſuppoſititious children, that bear the name of Fathers, they do not ſo much as ore refer; the alterations, raſures, and inſertions, which through ignorance, fraud, or maliciouſneſs, have defaced, maimed, and corrupted even thoſe few monuments that remain of venerable antiquity; I ſay . . . . thoſe, which ſeem of the greateſt force with me to invalidate that authority in our queſtions, are theſe four: I. Their contradictions to one another. II. Their variance from themſelves. III. Their repugnances both to Papiſts and Proteſtants. IV. Laſtly, Their want of ability in many points of their controverſies; in moſt of will to decide them. He afterwards (34) conſiders Sir Kenelm's three grounds, whereon he builds the pretended certainty of this method in reſolving differences out of the Fathers declarations; 1. That they were faithful collectors of the general Traditions of the Church in their times: 2. That they are ſincere conveyers of them to us: 3. That the Traditions collected and conveyed by them are infallible. He then confutes Sir Kenelm's argument to ſhew, that all doctrines of faith whatſoever admitted in the preſent Church were ſo taught by Chriſt to the Church, which he planted himſelf; viz. That the reaſon why the preſent Church believes any propoſition to be of faith, is, becauſe the immediate preceding Church of the Age before, delivered it unto her for ſuch; and ſo we may carry it from Age to Age untill we come to the Apoſtles and Chriſt. " An eaſie progreſs, ſays his Lord- " ſhip (35), and which, if you remember, Mr. White " (36) much inſiſted upon at that time, when Mr. Chil- " lingworth did me the favour to give him a meeting " for conference at your lodging. Although I ſet a " great value upon that Gentleman's learning and " faire way of diſputation; yet I confeſſe his argu- " ment hath often made me ſmile, it did ſo bring in- " to my head that gallant conſequence of Charles " Thynne's, wherewithall you once made me very " merry, by which he undertook to demonſtrate, that " ſurely in the world there might be a man ſo diſpoſed, " as (having a good riſe, and with a convenient career) " to leap at once from England to Rome; for, ſaid " he, bring me the beſt Jumper you know; and is " it not likely, that there may be another, that you " know not, ſo active as to out-jump him a foot? Let " him be brought; I hope, you will not deny but " he may out-jump an inch; and ſo by inches and " ſtraw-breadths of out-leaping one another, why not " to a thouſand miles? I dare ſay, that Mr. Hooper " was better ſatisfied of the corruption of times in " his pedegree from King Peppin, then I was by " that Logick of the Incorruption of times in his " deduction of all Romiſh Doctrines from Chriſt; nor " am I yet better ſatisfied."

(27) Pag. 21.

(28) Mr. Chillingworth's Religion of Proteſtants a ſafe way to ſalvation &c. was publiſhed in the latter end of the year 1637.

(29) Pag. 24.

(30) Pag. 25.

(31) Pag. 26.

(32) Pag. 27, 28.

(33) This Book was publiſhed in 1631. The Title is Traicté de l'Employ des Sainctes Peres &c.

(34) Pag. 69.

(35) Pag. 85.

(36) Mr. Tho. White, Author of a Book intitled, The Dialogues of William Richworth; or the Judgment of Common Senſe in the Choiſe of Religion, Paris 1640 in 12mo, and reprinted in 1654, in 12mo.

[F] He wrote ſeveral works.] Beſides thoſe already mentioned, he wrote, I. Obſervations upon Religio Medici, occaſionally written by Sir Kenelm Digby, Knight. London 1643, 1644 in 12mo. Theſe Obſervations were written in one night, and addreſſed to Edward Earl of Dorſet, and dated from Wincheſterhis own charge in the choir of Chriſt-Church within Newgate London, near the body of his wife Venetia, daughter and coheir of Sir Edward Stanley of Tongue-Caſtle in Shropſhire, to whoſe memory he had ſome years before his death, erected over the ſaid vault a noble monument of black marble, with a buſt of his Lady made of copper gilt. But this monument was deſtroyed in the Fire of London in 1666. His excellent Library, which he had conveyed to France during the time of the confuſion, fell, after his death, for want of his being naturalized, to the King of France, of whom it being begged by a certain Gentleman, was ſold for ten thouſand crowns (g). Mr. Edward Leigh (b) ſtiles him an ingenious learned Gentleman, and an ornament of this Nation. And Mr. Wood tells us (i), that he was maſter of a good, graceful, and judicious ſtyle; that his perſon was handſome and large, and that nothing was wanting to make him a compleat Gentleman; that he had a graceful elocution and noble addreſs; and "that had he been "dropt out of the clouds in any part of the world, he would have made himſelf re- "ſpected." He had a great faculty, (which proceeded from his copious wit and invention) of propoſing and reporting matters to the Virtuoſi, eſpecially to the Philoſophical Aſſembly at Montpellier, and the Royal Society at home (k). But Mr. Henry Stubbe (l) ſtiles him the Pliny of our age for lying; which ſevere character of him was chiefly grounded on an account, which Sir Kenelm gave of a city in Barbary under the King of Tripoli, which was ſaid to be turned into ſtone in a very few hours by a petrifying vapour; that is, men, beaſts, trees, houſes, utenſils, &c. every thing remaining in the ſame poſture, as children at their mothers breaſts, &c. This account Sir Kenelm had from Mr. Fitton, an Engliſhman reſiding in Florence, as Library-Keeper to the Grand Duke of Tuſcany, in a Letter dated July the 2d 1656, and Mr. Fitton from the Grand Duke, who a little before had written to the Baſſa of Tripoli to know the truth. The account was inſerted in the Mercurius Politicus of that time as ſent by Sir Kenelm, then at Thouloufe in France, in a Letter to a friend of his in England in September following. There is a beautiful Portrait of him by Vandyke in the Royal Palace at Kenſington. He had a ſon John, who died not long before Mr. Wood publiſhed his Hiſtoria & Antiquitates Univerſitatis Oxonienſis (m); and a younger brother called Sir John Digby, who was a Colonel in (g) Idem, ibid. pag. 353, 354.

(b) Fœlix Conſortium: or a fit Conjunction of Religion and Learning, lib. 3. cap. 15. pag. 180. edit. London 1663 in fol.

(i) Col. 351.

(k) Idem, ibid.

(l) Animadverſions upon the Plus ultra of Mr. Glanvill, pag. 161.

(m) See lib. 2. pag. 383.

(36) Our Author was confined there by order of the Parliament, as we have obſerved in the Text of this Article.

(37) In the Article of BROWN (Sir Thomas) Note [A] vol. 3. pag. 610, 611.

(38) It is in 12mo. But the place and date of the impreſſion do not appear.

Houſe (36) the 22d of December 1642. We have given ſome paſſages of this piece in another place (37). II. A Treatiſe, of the Nature of Bodies. Paris 1644 in fol. London 1658, 1665, and 1669, in 4to. It was attacked by Alexander Roſſe in a Book intitled, The Philoſophical Touch-ſtone: or, Obſervations on Sir Ken. Digby's Diſcourſes of the Nature of Bodies and of the reaſonable Soul, &c. in which his erroneous Paradoxes are refuted &c. London 1645 in 4to. III. Treatiſe of the Nature of Man's Soul. Paris 1644 in fol. London 1645, 1658, 1669 in 4to. This Book, which was likewiſe anſwered by Mr. Roſſe, with the Treatiſe of the Nature of Bodies, was tranſlated into Latin by J. L. and had a Preface put to them by Thomas White, who wrote himſelf Thomas Anglus ex Albiis Eaſt-Saxonum: and the Tranſlation was printed at Paris 1651 in fol. IV. Obſervations on the XXIId Stanza in the IXth Canto of the IId Book of Spencer's Fairy Queen. London 1644 in 8vo. V. Inſtitutionum Peripateticarum Libri quinque, cum Appendice Theologicâ de Origine Mundi. Paris 1651 fol. ſubjoined to the Tranſlations of his two Treatiſes of the Nature of Bodies and of the Soul by J. L. It was tranſlated into Engliſh by Thomas White abovementioned. London 1656 in 8vo. This Mr. White had printed at Lyons in 1646 a Syſtem of the Peripatetic Philoſophy according to the Hypotheſis of our Author under the following title; Inſtitutiones Peripateticæ ad mentem ſummi clariſſimique Philoſophi Kenelmi Equitis Digbæi. In the Preface he tells us, that he uſed the words ad mentem Digbæi, becauſe Sir Kenelm in his Treatiſe of the Soul had examined into the whole compoſition of nature from the firſt principles of body to the inviſible properties, and explained them in ſo juſt a manner, that he was neither able nor willing to proceed in any other method; and therefore had made uſe of Sir Kenelm's Book. He publiſhed alſo a piece intitled, Quæſtio Theologica, quomodo ſecundum Principia Peripatetices Digbæanæ, ſive ſecundum Rationem, & abſtrahendo, quantum materia patitur, ab authoritate humani Arbitrii libertas ſit explicanda, & cum Gratia efficaci conciliandâ (38). i. e. "A Theological "Queſtion, in what manner, according to Sir Kenelm "Digby's Principles of the Peripatetic Philoſophy, or "according to Reaſon, and abſtracting, as much as "the ſubject will permit, from authority, the free- "dom of man's will may be explained and reconcil- "ed with efficacious Grace." He printed likewiſe in 1652 Inſtitutiones Theologicæ ſuper Fundamentis in Peripateticâ Digbæana jactis extructæ: i. e. "Inſti- "tutions of Divinity built upon the Foundations laid "down in Sir Kenelm Digby's Hypotheſis of the Pe- "ripatetic Philoſophy." VI. Of the Cure of Wounds by the Powder of Sympathy. London 1658 in 8vo. This Diſcourſe was read in French to a Society of Virtuoſi at Monpelier in France in 1657, and tranſlated into Engliſh by Richard White. London 1660. It was reprinted at London with the Treatiſe of Bodies in 1669, and tranſlated into Latin by Laurence Stranſius of Darmſtad in Heſſia. It is alſo printed in a Book intitled, Theatrum Sympatheticum, publiſhed by John Andreas Endter at Nuremberg 1662 in 4to. It was likewiſe printed in High-Dutch. VII. Diſcourſe concerning the Vegetation of Plants. London 1661 in 8vo, and 1669 in 4to. It was read to the Royal Society at Greſham-College on the 23d of January 1660. It was printed in Latin at Amſterdam 1663, and 1669 in 12mo under this title, Diſſertatio de Plantarum Vegetatione. VIII. Choice and experimental Receipts in Phyſic and Chirurgery: and Cordial and diſtilled Waters and Spirits, Perfumes, and other Curioſities. Theſe two pieces were tranſlated out of ſeveral Languages by George Hartman, ſometime Steward to Sir Kenelm Digby the collector of them, and printed at London 1668 in 8vo. The firſt was printed afterwards at Francfort 1677 in 8vo under this title: Medicina experimentalis &c. IX. Sir Kenelm Digby's Cloſet opened, whereby is diſcovered ſeveral ways of making metheglin, ſider, cherry-wine, &c. London 1669, 1677 in 8vo. X. Excellent Directions for Cookery, &c. London 1669, 1677 in 8vo. XI. Choice Collection of rare chymical Secrets and Experiments in Philoſophy. As alſo rare and unheard-of medicines, menſtruums, and alkaheſts, with the true Secret of volatilizing the fixt Salt of Tartar, &c. London 1682 in 8vo &c. Publiſhed by G. Hartman abovementioned. Mr. Wood tells us (39), that ſome aſcribe to him, tho' very improbably, the Letter to Dr. Sam. Turner concerning the Church and the Revenues thereof. London 1647 in 8vo, which was reprinted at London 1683 in 4to with this title: A Diſcourſe of Epiſcopacy and Sacriledge, by way of Letter, written in 1646; which Letter was written, according to Mr. Wood (40), by John Fountain lately a Royaliſt, but then of the other party; and was anſwered by Dr. Richard Stewart in a piece printed in 1647 in five ſheets and an half in 4to, with this title, An Anſwer to a Letter written at Oxford, and ſuperſcribed to Dr. Sam. Turner concerning the Church and Revenues thereof. Sir Kenelm tranſlated into Engliſh, A Treatiſe of adhering to God. London 1654 in 8vo, written in Latin by Albertus Magnus, Biſhop of Ratiſbon.

(39) Ath. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 353.

(40) Ibid. col. 147.

T

in King Charles I's Army, and afterwards a Major General in the Weſt of England. He was wounded at Taunton, and died at Bridgwater (n).

(n) Idem, Athen. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 354.

DINANT, a City in the Netherlands, ſeated on the Meuſe, between Charlemont and Namur. Its ſituation in the neighbourhood of ſeveral mines of iron and copper, and ſeveral quarries of black marble, and other ſorts of ſtone, occaſioned the inhabitants to eſtabliſh a Trade which conſiderably enriched them (a); but the miſeries of war reduced them at divers times to a deplorable condition. They felt this grievous calamity the moſt ſeverely in the year 1466, as I have ſaid elſewhere (b). An Italian Author has committed a fault which may miſlead a ſpeculative Reader [A]. This city was very ill treated by the French in the year 1554. The Count de Souches, General of the Imperial forces, made himſelf maſter of it in the year 1674. The French took it the year following. It was agreed by the Treaty of Nimeguen, that if they reſtored it, Spain ſhould yield them up Charlemont; and that if Spain choſe rather to keep Charlemont, ſhe ſhould prevail on the Biſhop of Liege to yield them Dinant (c). This Ceſſion not being obtained, France got Charlemont delivered up to her, and continued in poſſeſſion of Dinant till the peace of Reſwick, by vertue of which that City was reſtored to its firſt maſter, the Biſhop of Liege.

(a) Lewis Guicciardin, Deſcript. Belgij, pag. m. 507.

(b) In the Article BURGUNDY (Charles Duke of) Remark [C].

(c) See the 13th Article of the Peace concluded at Nimeguen between France and Spain, the 17th of Sept. 1678.

[A] An Italian Author has committed a fault which may miſlead a ſpeculative Reader.] A Monk named Remigio Fiorentino has written a political Diſcourſe on the miſchiefs which may happen from the inſolence of people who offer indignities to a Prince's effigies. He mentions, among other inſtances, what Charles Duke of Burgundy did to the inhabitants of Dinant. Carlo Duca di Borgogna ultimo non uſo tanta e ſi memorabil crudeltà contra di Nantes, ſe non perche i Nanteſi havevon fatto la ſtatua ſua e d'alcuni altri Gentilhuomini ſuoi amici, e l'havevono appiccate per la gola alle forche (1). i. e. "Charles, the laſt Duke of Burgundy, "practiſed ſuch great and remarkable cruelty againſt "Nantes for no other reaſon than becauſe the inhabitants had dreſt up the effigies of himſelf and of "ſome other Gentlemen his friends, and hanged "them by the neck on the gallows." It is plain that he names Nantes for the city which did this, and was chaſtiſed for it. His miſtake proceeded from his having taken the firſt ſyllable of Dinant for an Article. Now as there is a city called Nantes, it is evident that this error is likely enough to miſlead: for if the ſtate of learning ſhould a thouſand years hence be in the ſame condition it was in the XVth Century, there would be Critics who would inſiſt that it was at Nantes in Britany, and not at Dinant on the Meuſe, where the Burgundian ſhewed himſelf ſo revengeful; and they would boaſt of a diſcovery, which nobody had ſpoken of before, I mean of an expedition of the laſt Duke of Burgundy againſt the Bretons. They would ſearch for the time, the occaſion, and the circumſtances of this war, and they would find a great many things to ſupport their conjectures. In a word, this would furniſh out a fine long chapter of their Adverſaria, variæ Lectiones & Emendationes, ſive Racemationes. They who have read Works of this ſort will grant me that I argue from what is paſt to what may be hereafter. But not to pry into future Ages, let us content ourſelves with the preſent. I am ſure ſeveral perſons have already been deceived by Remigio Fiorentino, or by thoſe who deceived him. I make no doubt but more compilations than one will put Nantes among the cities which have been laid deſolate for having inſulted the ſtatues of a ſovereign Prince.

(1) Remigio Fiorentino, Conſideratione Civili ſopra l'Hiſtoire di Guicciardini e d'altri Hiſtorici, cap. 43. fol. m. 59.

(2) He has put in the Margin, Carlo Duca di Borgogna gaſtica con ſeverità la città di Nantes. i. e. "Charles "Duke of Burgundy ſeverely "chaſtiſes the "city of Nantes." The ſame is to be found in the Table of Contents.

DINOTH (RICHARD) was of Coutances in Normandy, and lived in the ſixteenth Century. He publiſhed, among other Latin Books, the Hiſtory of the Civil Wars raiſed on account of Religion in France and the Netherlands [A]. There is no queſtion but he was of the Proteſtant Communion, and I believe he ſettled at Montbelliard no otherwiſe than as a Refugee. He had before that time made ſome ſtay at Straſburgh (a). He does not write with much paſſion.

(a) See the Epiſtle Dedicatory of his Hiſtory of the Civil Wars in the Netherlands.

[A] He publiſhed, among other Latin Books, the Hiſtory of the Civil Wars . . . . in France and the Netherlands.] The Epitome of Geſner's Bibliotheca (1) informs me that they printed at Baſil, in 4to, in the year 1582, Richardi Dinothi de Bello Civili Gallico Religionis cauſa ſuſcepto libri VI. The Oxford Catalogue mentions three other Books of Richard Dinoth, which are de Bello Civili Belgico libri VI, in 4to, at Baſil 1580; Adverſaria Hiſtorica, in 4to, at Baſil, 1581; de Rebus & Factis memorabilibus Loci communes Hiſtorici, & Sententiæ Hiſtoricorum, in 8vo, at Baſil, 1580. I do not know whether this date of the Hiſtory of the Civil Wars of the Low Countries is right; for the Edition I make uſe of is of the year 1586, and I have obſerved nothing in it to induce one to believe it is the ſecond. The Author dedicates it to the Senate and Univerſity of Straſburgh, and dates the Epiſtle Dedicatory from Montbelliard the 18th of Auguſt 1586.

(1) Epitome Geſneri, pag. m. 724.

DIOGENES the Cynic was one of thoſe extraordinary men who run every thing to extremity, without excepting reaſon itſelf, and who verify the maxim, That there is no great genius without ſome little mixture of madneſs. He was born at Sinope, a City of Pontus, and was expelled thence for the crime of coining falſe money (a). His father (b), who was a Banker, was baniſhed for the ſame crime. Diogenes retired to Athens, and by his great perſeverance prevailed on the Philoſopher Antiſthenes to become his maſter (c) [A]. He

(a) Diog. Laertius, lib. 6. in ejus Vita, init.

(b) His name was Iceſius. Some ſay he died in priſon, and that his ſon made his eſcape, without waiting till the Judges gave ſentence. Diog. Laert. ibid.

(c) Idem, ibid. num. 21. Ælianus, Var. Hiſt. lib. 10. cap. 16.

[A] By his great perſeverance he prevailed on the Philoſopher Antiſthenes to become his maſter.] A very able man, in ſpeaking of this, has committed a groſs miſtake in Chronology. His words are theſe (1): "It is related of the ſame Diogenes, that when the "Philoſopher Antiſthenes, Author of the Sect of the "Cynics, his maſter, became Socrates's Diſciple, "and on that account diſmiſſed all his Scholars, Diogenes would not leave him, at which Antiſthenes "being angry, took up a cudgel to chaſtiſe him: but "this did not fright Diogenes, who bowed his head "to receive the blow, and ſaid; There is no cudgel "ſo hard but I can indure it, to learn ſomething good "of you." Socrates died the firſt year of the 95th Olympiad, and the death of Diogenes muſt be placed in the ſame year with that of Alexander the Great, or within a few years after (2). Now that Prince died the laſt year of the 113th Olympiad, according to Euſebius, or the firſt year of the 114th, according to Petavius. We may ſuppoſe, therefore, that Diogenes

(1) Mr. Joly, Avis Chretiens & Moraux pour l'Inſtitution des Enfans, pag. 4, 5. He cites no body, but he might have cited Ælian, Var. Hiſt. lib. 10. cap. 16. as to Diogenes's anſwer after the blow of the cudgel.

(2) See the Remark [H].

He not only chearfully ſubmitted to the kind of life which was peculiar to the followers of that Founder of the Cynics, but he alſo added thereto new degrees of auſterity; ſo that there never was a Philoſopher who contemned the conveniencies of life ſo much as he. We ſhould be deceived if we imagined that with his ſtaff and his wallet, and the tub which ſerved him for a dwelling [B], he was more humble than thoſe who live deliciouſly [C]: he looked down on all the world with ſcorn; he magiſterially cenſured all mankind, and thought himſelf, no doubt, much ſuperior to all other Philoſophers. One cannot help finding ſomething great in his behaviour, when conſidered in a certain light; and ſince Alexander, who was ſo good a judge of the matter, found a grandeur in died the 3d year of the 114th Olympiad: and ſince he died at about ninety years of age, he was born the firſt year of the 92d Olympiad: he was therefore but about 12 years old when Socrates died; and conſequently was not excluded the School of Antiſthenes for the reaſon alledged by Mr. Joly. A few years may be got, if we were to ſtick rigorouſly to the account of thoſe who ſay Alexander and Diogenes died the ſame day: but this will not mend the matter; for we muſt remember that the proceedings againſt Socrates laſted ſome time; and it is inconteſtable that during thoſe proceedings Antiſthenes did not ſhut up his ſchool to go to that of Socrates. Beſides, Diogenes did not come to Athens till after he had coined falſe money in his own country, and even borne an office in the Mint (3), and after he had been at Delphi to conſult the Oracle (4). If ſo, can it be ſaid, with any ſhew of probability, that he was but fifteen or ſixteen years old when he began to ſollicit a place among the Scholars of Antiſthenes at Athens?

(3) Diog. Laert. lib. 6. num. 20.

(4) Ibid. num. 21.

[B] A tub ſerved him for a dwelling.] He had ordered ſomebody to provide him a cell, but as that order was not ſpeedily executed, he grew impatient, and lodged himſelf in a tub which was in the Temple of the Mother of the Gods. This is what he himſelf related in one of his Letters (5). I wiſh the Commentators on Diogenes Laertius had inquired how he obtained permiſſion to appropriate to himſelf a thing which belonged to a Temple. He had not always the ſame Tub: an inſolent young fellow broke the firſt in pieces, and was for that act of inſolence condemned to be whipped. The Athenians, who inflicted that puniſhment on him, gave Diogenes another Tub (6). This Tub, no doubt, was different from that which he had at Corinth, where he dwelt when Philip King of Macedon deſigned to attack that place. All the inhabitants laboured with extreme diligence in fortifying the city: and Diogenes, unwilling to be the only idle perſon, buſied himſelf in rolling his Tub about (7). Monſr. Menage infers from hence that this Tub was not of clay; tho' he acknowledges, at the ſame time, there are ways to roll a Tub of clay without breaking it, as on ſoft or even ground, for inſtance. Teſtaceum non fuiſſe Diogenis dolium, ſed ligneum, illud convicerit, quòd illæſum, ne otioſus eſſet, ſæpe verſaret; de quo eſt apud Lucianum in libello Quomodo conſcribenda ſit hiſtoria. Quamquam teſtaceum dolium verſari & circumagi potuit; in ſimeto, vel ſolo ſubacto, vel reſtibilibus agris, vel in æquato etiam pavimento; cùm præſertim ampla illa & capacia dolia pro amplitudinis modo ſolida fuiſſe & ſpiſſa credibile ſit (8). He does not make this Remark to no purpoſe: he had an eye to the Verſes of a Latin Poet (9), who aſſures us Diogenes's Tub was of clay:

(5) Ibid. num. 23.

(6) Ibid. num. 43.

(7) Lucianus, de conſcrib. Hiſtoriâ, tom. 1. pag. m. 659.

(8) Menag. Not. ad Diogen. Laert. lib. 6. num. 23. pag. 234.

Dolia nudi
Non ardent Cynici: ſi fregeris, altera fiet
Cras domus, aut eadem plumbo commiſſa manebit.
Senſit Alexander, TESTA cum vidit in illa
Magnum habitatorem, quanto felicior (10) hic, qui
Nil cuperet, quam qui totum ſibi poſceret orbem.

(9) Juven. Sat. 14. ver. 308.

(10) Moreri reads feliciter, and ſays it is thought Juvenal intended to praiſe Diogenes in theſe verſes. The thing is clearly paſt doubt; ſo that his it is thought is worth nothing.

" The naked Cynic's jar ne'er flames; if broken
" 'Tis quickly ſodder'd, or a new beſpoken.
" When Alexander firſt beheld the face
" Of the great Cynic, in that narrow ſpace;
" His own condition thus did he lament:
" How much more happy thou, that art content
" To live within this little hole, than I,
" Who after empire, that vain quarry, fly!"
Dryden.

I ſhould not think it ſtrange that any one ſhould condemn Diogenes's exceſſive affectation of poverty, in chooſing no other habitation than a tub; but to infer thence that he was a drunkard, is moſt ridiculous. We ſhall immediately ſee a long train of impertinences, which will not be near ſo tedious a paſſage as the remaining part of this Article. " As to Dio-
" genes the Cynic, his name is his Elogy; for it is
" as much as to ſay, Diogenes with the inclinations
" of a Dog. This ſpark ſet up for a Philoſopher,
" and his principal actions are theſe. 1. He lived
" night and day in a caſk: thus Æneas's companions when they had eaten their meat fell on board
" their trenchers, menſas conſumimus, inquit Iulus;
" (lib. VII. Æn. vſ. 116.), and he, after he had " drank out the Wine, make uſe of the Caſk, that " is, he loved it ſo well that he would needs live in it.
" Thus the good old dame in Ariſtophanes ordered " her body to be buried in the cellar under the Caſk,
" to moiſten her bones: thus tipplers in a tavern,
" when they have emptied the bottle, make uſe of
" the neck as a candleſtick, to game by after ſupper:
" thus Buchanan in his laſt illneſs cauſed a hogſhead
" of Bourdeaux Wine to be ſet at his bed's head, that
" as he expired he might enjoy the ſmell of that de" licious liquor (11): thus Bettheau the fiſherman,
" ſays Ronſard, would needs be buried in his boat.
" Thus Diogenes lived night and day in his Caſk,
" very ſorry, you may think, that it was empty:
" and thus our pretenders to Wit live night and day
" in a tavern (12)." Never did any man deſerve leſs to be charged with being a good fellow than Diogenes. He thought it very ſtrange that thoſe who are thirſty do not drink at the firſt ſpring they meet with, inſtead of hunting after choice wines: he thought them more unreaſonable than brutes; and for his own part he deſired no other liquor to quench his thirſt than what nature provided for him in a river. Ἥδιον ἔπινε τοῦ ῥέοντος ὕδατος, ἢ οἱ ἄλλοι τὸν Θάσιον οἶνον. Κατεγίλα δὲ τῶν ὑπότε ὀλίγων τὰς μὲν κρήνας παρερχομένων. Ζητούντων δὲ ὁπόθεν πάντως ὠνήσαιντο χίον ἢ λέσβιον. καὶ πολὺ ἔφασκεν ἀφρονεστέρους εἶναι τῶν βοσκημάτων. Jucundius bibit fluentem aquam quam alii vinum Thaſium. Deridebat autem eos qui quum ſitirent, præterirent fontes, quærerentque unde omnino emerent Chium vel Leſbium, & multo hos dicebat eſſe inſipientiores jumentis (13). But after all, it is not certain that he had no other habitation than a Tub. They aſked him one day, Who will bury you when you are dead, ſince you have neither man nor maid? He who wants a houſe, anſwered he (14). This ſuppoſes he had a houſe.

(11) See above the Remark [D] of the Article BUCHANAN.

(12) Garaſſe, Doctrine Curieuſe, pag. 134, 135.

(13) Dio Chryſoſt. Orat. VI, pag. m. 89.

(14) Diog. Laert. lib. 6. num. 52.

[C] It muſt not be imagined he was more humble than thoſe who live deliciouſly.] He uſed to ſay that all the curſes of the Stage were fallen on him; ſince he was a vagabond, had neither houſe nor country, was obliged to beg, was ill cloathed, and lived from hand to mouth. And yet, adds the Hiſtorian, he took as much pride in thoſe things as Alexander could do in the conqueſt of the whole World. Διογένης ὁ Σινωπεὺς συνεχῶς ἐπίλεγεν ὑπὲρ ἑαυτοῦ, ὅτι τὰς ἐκ τῆς τραγῳδίας ἀρὰς αὐτὸς ἐκπλήροι, καὶ ὑπομένει. εἶναι γὰρ πλάνης, ἄοικος, πατρίδος ἐστερημένος, πλωχὸς, δυσείμων, βίον ἔχων τὸν ἐφήμερον, καὶ ὅμως ἐπὶ τούτοις μεγα ἐφρόνει ὑδὲν ἧττον, ἢ Ἀλέξανδρος ἐπὶ τῇ τῆς οἰκουμένης ἀρχῇ, ὅτε καὶ Ἰνδῶν ἐλὼν εἰς Βαβυλῶνα ὑπέστρεψεν. Diogenes Sinopenſis de ſeipſo dicere ſolitus eſt, ſe implere & ferre tragicas execrationes. Nam erronem ſe eſſe, domo & patria carere, mendicum agere, male veſtiri, & in diem vivere. Nihilominus tamen in his ſibi non minus placebat, quàm Alexander in terrarum orbis imperio, quum ſubactis Indis in Babylonem reverteretur (15).

(15) Ælian. Var. Hiſt. lib. 3. cap. 29.

in it [D], there must needs have been some. Let us not trust those who have criticized Alexander on this account [E], nor those who have blamed our Philosopher's conduct towards that Prince [F]. They who find contradictions in what is related of Diogenes [D] Alexander the Great found a grandeur in his behaviour.] He must needs have done it, since he declared that if he was not Alexander, he would choose to be Diogenes (16). I do not wonder that he admired a man who, tho' he might have obtained any favours from him, would ask him nothing, and even bade him, without complement or ceremony, to stand away, and not intercept the Sun (17). Could a Prince who sees himself continually beset with gaping wolves, and tho' his power be ever so great is not able to content every importunate craver, forbear admiring a private person who refuses riches which are offered him? Alexander had seen Statesmen and Philophers flock to him from all parts (18); and every body was eager to make his court to him. Diogenes was the only man who did not stir from his place: Alexander, finding he did not come to him, as he expected, was obliged to make him a visit. If this indifference appeared to him somewhat very uncommon, he admired the greatness of soul which shone in that Philosopher's Answer (19). It has been justly said that on this occasion Alexander was surpassed by a private man. Eadem re gloriari Socrates potuit, eadem Diogenes à quo victus est (Alexander). Quid ni victus sit illo die quo homo supra mensuram humanæ superbiæ tumens, vidit aliquem cui nec dare quidquam posset nec eripere (20). "In the same thing "might Socrates glory, and likewise Diogenes by "whom Alexander was overcome. For must he not "be overcome on that day, when swelling with "more than human pride, he saw one to whom he "could give nothing, and from whom he could take "nothing?" These words plainly shew that Seneca thought Diogenes had not this discourse with Alexander till after the conquest of Persia, and at the time when this Prince, dazzled with the splendor of his good fortune, would be called a God. But if any one should think that from these words it does not clearly appear that this was Seneca's opinion, I shall desire him to read what follows: Necesse est à Socrate beneficio vincar: necesse est à Diogene, qui per medias Macedonum gazas nudus incessit, calcatis regiis opibus. Nonne ille tunc merito & sibi & cæteris, quibus ad dispiciendam veritatem non erat offusa caligo, supra eum eminere visus est, infra quem omnia jacebant? Multo potentior, multo locupletior fuit, omnia tunc possidente Alexandro. Plus enim erat, quod hic nollet accipere, quam quod ille posset dare (21). i.e. "I must neces-"sarily yield in point of generosity to Socrates, and "likewise to Diogenes, who walked naked thro' the "midst of the Macedonian wealth, and trod the royal "treasures under foot. Did not he then seem justly "both to himself and to others, whose eyes were not "so far blinded as to be incapable of perceiving the "truth, superior to him to whom all things were "subject? He was much more powerful, and "much richer, than Alexander, who then possessed "all: for what the one would have refused, was "more than the other could have given." We have here an instance of those mistakes which are fallen into for want of attention. All the World knows, I, that Alexander never returned to Greece after he went over into Asia; II, that Diogenes never stirred out of Greece while Alexander was subduing Asia: it is therefore for want of attention, and by being too much set upon Antitheses, that Seneca has here confounded the times. It is certain that the conversation between Alexander and Diogenes was prior to the Persian war. Alexander saw that Cynic at Corinth, when he was declared Captain General of all Greece, to make war on Darius (22). Diogenes Laertius is very near, if not quite, guilty of the Anachronism of Seneca (23).

[E] . . . . Let us not trust those who have criticised Alexander on this account.] "If Alexander had not "been Alexander, he would have been Diogenes: so "much does virtuous poverty command the esteem "of royalty and greatness." These words are to be found in a Sermon which Balzac has criticised; and he censures them in the following terms (24). "The "Preacher imagined this to be an extreme good say-"ing, and I think it an extreme bad one: for, in your "opinion, and in real truth, what is it to be Diogenes? I am going to tell you, by only translating "the Greek Text, without any addition of my own, "To be Diogenes, is to violate the established customs "and received Laws; it is to have neither modesty, "nor decency; it is to know neither relation, guest, "nor friend; it is to be either barking or biting "continually; it is to eat a raw sole, or bloody meat, "in a full market; it is to offend the eyes of the "people by actions yet more filthy, actions which can-"not be performed with too great secrecy, or in too "remote a retirement. This it is to be Diogenes, "and what Alexander wished to be, if he had not "been Alexander. A worse saying could not have "been uttered by the disciple of Aristotle, and the "Preacher could not have said a more disobliging "thing to those whom he designed to praise than by "making use of a comparison so odious, at least "to every body who is not a stranger to good books." Two persons are here criticized, Alexander and the Preacher. The latter, in my opinion, deserves the censure which is let fly at him; for when one praises the poverty of the Mendicant Friars, all possible care should be taken to prevent the Reader's reflecting on that of the Cynic Philosophers. But as to Alexander, I maintain he is unjustly censured, and as a proof of it I produce the following words of Costar (25): Do you think, Sir, that Balzac has fully entred into Alexander's meaning? That Conqueror was not acquainted with this definition of Diogenes, and desired to resemble him only in what he had just discovered and observed in him; an extreme contempt of whatever seemed most shining and pompous in life. He had offered him his riches, and his interest; and all the favour that ragged wise man asked of him, was to stand out of his Sun; as if he had said, Do not deprive me of the benefits of nature, and I leave you those of Fortune, which I think beneath me. Alexander perfectly comprehended the vigour and firmness of so elevated a soul; and turning himself to the Lords of his Court: Do not laugh, said he, at this man; for were I not what I am, I would be what he is; that is, were I not in possession of wealth and honour of all sorts, I should think my self happy in despising them as this Philosopher does. Let Balzac say what he will to the contrary, this is a delicate and fine thought, and not at all unworthy of a disciple of Aristotle. A man of ever so little judgment cannot but perceive that Costar has hit the mark, and that Balzac's criticism is built on a very false foundation. Plutarch has paraphrased this saying of Alexander in a manner which deserves to be read (26).

[F] . . . . nor those who have blamed our Philosopher's conduct towards that Prince.] "He was so bru-"tish, that being asked a question by Alexander, "who went to see him one day in his tub that he "might lose no part of the diversion, he answered "him just in the same way as Brusquet (27) used to "speak to the King, and having made a wry face "at him, and thouing him in a familiar manner, "said to him, Art thou not afraid, Alexander, that "I should bite thee? for I am a mad dog, that is, I "am enraged at thy luxury, thy excesses, and thy "over-insolent Majesty; and afterwards, being asked "by some of Alexander's attendants, who diverted "themselves with him as if he had been the fool in "a play, whether he had ever seen any good and "wise Princes, with a Sardonian laugh, he said, in "a drolling way, ὡς κολοιῶν πιτνομένων, I have seen "as many as crows and may-bugs in the Spring. "Such was the wit and civility of the man, who "richly deserved an exemplary chastisement (28)." There are many things to be censured in this passage, besides that which the Prior Ogier has censured (29). I. Alexander did not go to see Diogenes to divert himself; it was a serious Visit. II. When a man acts sincerely, he does not relate matters as he finds them in Authors of no authority; but borrows them from Writers more worthy of credit, as those are, with regard to this Visit of Alexander, who have written either the Life of that great Prince, or the Life of Diogenes. What has Father Garasse done? He has suppressed

(16) Plut. in Alexandr. pag. 671.

(17) Idem, ibid. Val. Maximus, lib. 4. cap. 3, sub fin. Dieg. Laertius, lib. 6. num. 38.

(18) Plut. in Alexand. pag. 671.

(19) Λέγεται τὸν Ἀλέξανδρον οὕτω διατεθῆναι καὶ θαυμάσαι καταφρονηθέντα τὴν ὑπεροψίαν, καὶ τὸ μέγεθος τοῦ ἀνδρὸς ὧσαι. Perhibitur in tantum permotus Alexander fuisse & obstupuisse contemptus despicientiam hominis & animi celsitudinem ut &c. Plut. in Alexandr. pag. 671: item de Fortun. vel Virtute Alexandri, pag. 331.

(20) Seneca, de Benefic. lib. 5. cap. 6.

(21) Idem, ibid. cap. 4.

(22) Plut. in Alexand. pag. 671.

(23) He tells us, lib. 6. num. 60, that Alexander made Diogenes an unexpected Visit, and said to him, I am the great King Alexander. Ἐγὼ εἰμι Ἀλέξανδρος ὁ μέγας βασιλεύς. And I, answered the other, am Diogenes the Dog. κἀγὼ φησὶ Διογένης ὁ κύων. This is to suppose that Alexander had already conquered Darius; for when he saw Diogenes he was no more than King of Macedon, and he had no pretension to stile himself the Great King.

(24) Balzac, Socrate Chrestien, pag. 243.

(25) Costar, Suite de la Defense de Voiture, pag. 39.

(26) Plut. de Fortuna vel Virtute Alex. Orat. 1, circa fin. pag. m. 331, 332.

(27) He was a famed Jester at Court.

(28) Garasse, Doctrine Curieuse, pag. 135.

(29) He ridiculed Garasse for his ignorance, in not knowing that every body was thou'd in Greek, and that therefore Diogenes did not thou Alexander out of incivility. Censure de la Doctrine Curieuse, pag. 175.

Diogenes [G], ſhould conſider that a man of his humour could not fail being ſubject to remarkable inequalities in his behaviour. He had a great preſence of mind; as appears from his ſmart ſayings, and quick repartees, which generally contained a good deal of poignant wit. He paſſed no ill judgment on him, who called him a mad Socrates (d). Diogenes ſpent a conſiderable part of his life at Corinth, and died there in a very advanced age. Authors do not agree either as to the manner, or time of his death [H]. He cared very little whether he was buried or not; however, he had an honourable funeral [I]. The reaſon of his living at Corinth, was his being bought by a man preſſed the Narratives of Plutarch and Diogenes Laertius, and has given a quite different one, without acquainting us whence he had it (30). III. Nothing is more abſurd than to have recourſe to this Viſit of Alexander, when one has a mind to caſt infamy on the memory of Diogenes: for where are the Readers who are unacquainted with the admiration which that Prince conceived for him? and will not the conſideration of his having had ſuch an admirer much rather incline one to admire Diogenes than to deſpiſe him? And therefore though Garaſſe has taken particular care not to mention what Alexander declared on that occaſion, he has nevertheleſs plaid the part of a very bad Orator, by putting his Readers in the way to remember a thing which fruſtrates his deſign.

(d) It was Plato who called him ſo. See Ælian, Var. Hiſt. lib. 14. cap. 33.

(30) Dion Chryſoſtome has made an entire Oration on this Conference between Alexander and Diogenes, wherein he has inſerted, no doubt, a hundred things of his own invention; but I do not find what Garaſſe ſays there.

If any one deſires to ſee an anſwer to Garaſſe's invectives againſt our Diogenes, let him conſult la Mothe le Vayer. One of our own Writers, ſays he (31), has ſhewn ſo little equity (I will not uſe a harſher expreſſion) that he has made no ſcruple to compare Diogenes and Democritus to Bruſquet and Maitre Guillaume (32), whom he aſſerts to have been at leaſt as wiſe as thoſe Philoſophers. Good God! is it poſſible that a man can allow himſelf to talk in this manner! He ſays Plutarch and Laertius might very well have ſpared themſelves the trouble of tranſmitting to us the fooleries of thoſe two ſcoundrels, one of whom, namely Democritus, deſerves no other title than that of a Merry-Andrew, and the other that of a ſturdy Beggar. In a word, continues he, all the difference there was between them amounted to no more than there is between Maitre Guillaume and Jack Pudding, or Bruſquet and Pantalon. Diogenes was a perfect fool and a madman, and Democritus a perpetual buffoon: theſe are his very words. In reality, there is no man of tolerable ſenſe, or ever ſo little converſant in the nature of things, but muſt be ſcandalized at them, and feel his indignation riſe at ſuch extravagant compariſons.

(31) Traité de la Vertu des Païens, in the 5th Volume of his Works, edit. in 12mo, pag. 133, 134. He has not named the Writer whom he refutes; but you are to know it was Father Garaſſe.

(32) A famous Buffoon at Court.

Note, it is ſaid (33) that Alexander finding Diogenes aſleep, repeated to him the 24th Verſe of the 2d Book of the Iliad, Οὐ χρὴ παννύχιον εὕδειν βουληφόρον ἄνδρα.

Stertere perpetuam non dignum eſt principe noctem.

"Ill fits a chief whole nights in ſleep to ſpend."

(33) Theo, in Progymn. cap. 5. pag. m. 71.

And that Diogenes immediately repeated to him what follows in the ſame paſſage of Homer,

Ὧι λαοί τ' ἐπιτετράφαται κὴ τόσσα μέμηλε.
Cui populique ſalus, & tanta negotia curæ.

"On whom his people, and their hopes depend."

He could not have anſwered with greater preſence of mind or more to the purpoſe. Diogenes juſtified himſelf, and ſignified at the ſame time what was Alexander's duty. He ſhewed that if it be a fault to ſleep all night, it is when a man is intruſted with the government of a people.

(34) Hieronymus, lib. 2. contra Jovinianum: This is taken from Diogenes Laertius, who ſays, lib. 6. num. 37. Θεασάμενος ποτὲ παιδίον ταῖς χερσὶ πῖνον, ἐξέῤῥιψε τῆς πήρας τὴν κοτύλην, εἰπὼν παιδίον με νενικηκεν εὐτελείᾳ. Intuitus aliquando puerum manibus bibentem, cotylam pera productam abjecit dicens, puer me vilitate ſuperavit. See alſo Seneca, Epiſt. 90.

(35) Diog. Laert. lib. 6. num. 52.

[G] Some contradictions have been found in what is related of Diogenes.] We are told, on one hand, that he had no other lodging than a Tub, and that he threw away his wooden bowl, when he perceived that he could drink out of the hollow of his hand. Quodam vero tempore habens ad potandum cavum ligneum vidit puerum manu concava bibere, & eliſiſſe illud fertur ad terram dicens, neſciebam quod natura haberet poculum (34). i. e. "He had once a wooden bowl to drink "out of, but ſeeing a boy drinking out of the hollow "of his hand, he daſhed it againſt the ground, ſay-"ing, I knew not that nature had ſupplied me with "a cup." It is even expreſly aſſerted that he had neither man-ſervant, nor maid-ſervant (35). But, on the other hand, they tell us his man ran away from him. Some might ſuſpect a little invention in this particular, I mean, that his ſlave's deſerting him was feigned on purpoſe to have an occaſion of attributing a witty ſaying to Diogenes. They ſay he anſwered thoſe who adviſed him to ſeek after the fugitive: Would it not be ridiculous that Menades could live without Diogenes, and that Diogenes could not live without Menades (36)? For my part, I do not find theſe ſtories contradictory. Could a man of ſo croſs-grained a way of thinking, be uniform in all his actions? There is no doubt to be made but he liked at one time what he rejected at another. His life was long enough to allow of years during which he kept ſervants, and years during which he had no other cup than the hollow of his hand. This is what might be ſaid, if we had no other account of our Cynic left than his Life given us by Diogenes Laertius; but we have a Chapter in Ælian which makes it needleſs for us to have recourſe to ſuch a ſolution. Ælian acquaints us, that Diogenes was not yet a Philoſopher, when his ſervant left him. It was when he retired from Sinope that he took one of his ſlaves with him, who forſook him. He had then ſome taſte of Philoſophy, which made him ſay; Would it not be a ſhame that Manes could do without Diogenes, and that Diogenes could not do without Manes (37)? but he was not a Cynic, nor did he renounce all ſuperfluities, till a long while after. Ælian adds, that this ſervant wandred about from place to place, till he was torn in pieces by dogs at Delphi.

(36) Idem, ibid. num. 53.

(37) Οὐκ αἰσχρὸν, Μάνην μὲν μὴ δύνασθαι Διογένους, Διογένην δὲ Μάνους; An non turpe eſſet quum Manes Diogenis non egeat, Diogenem Manis indigere? Ælian. Var. Hiſt. lib. 13. cap. 28. Seneca relates the ſame thing, de Tranquill. cap. 8.

[H] Authors do not agree as to the manner . . . . of his death.] Some ſay (38) he died of an overflowing of the gall, occaſioned by his eating a neat's foot (39) raw: others, that he ſuffocated himſelf by holding his breath (40): others, that he died of the bite of a dog (41): others, that he threw himſelf down a precipice (42); others, that he ſtrangled himſelf. The laſt opinion is reported by St. Jerom as the true one, and with circumſtances which it may be of ſome uſe to know. His death, ſays he, is a teſtimony of his temperance and virtue; for as he was going to the Olympic Games, a fever ſeized him by the way: he lay down under a tree, and refuſed the aſſiſtance of thoſe who accompanied him, and offered him either a horſe or a chariot. Do you go to the Games, ſaid he to them; this night will determine my illneſs: if I get the better of it, I will go to morrow to the Olympic Games; if that gets the better of me, I ſhall go to the ſhades below. He ſtrangled himſelf that very night, pretending he was going to loſe his fever, rather than his life Abite quæſo, & ſpectatum pergite. Hæc me nox aut victorem probabit aut victum. Si febrem vicero, ad agonem: ſi me vicerit ad inferna deſcendam: ibique per noctem eliſo gutture, non tam mori ſe ait quam febrem excludere (43). Some Authors (44) have ſaid that he died the ſame day as Alexander the Great did, in the 113th Olympiad. He was near ninety years old (45). But if he had not lived after Alexander, could he have been ſent for by Perdiccas, and threatened with death if he failed coming (46)? Could Craterus have defired a viſit from him (47)?

(38) Diog. Laert. lib. 6. num. 76.

(39) Βοὸς πόδα. It is certainly a fault, and ought to be corrected by πολύποδα; for a great number of Authors quoted by Menage, in hunc locum, agree that Diogenes's death was occaſioned by his eating a raw Polypus.

(40) Ἀλλ' ἀνίβα χεῖλος ποτ' ἐδόντας ἐρίσας καὶ τὸ πνεῦμα συνδαμάσαι, Tandem qui ſublatus eſt cum labris dentes obfirmaſſet, & ſpiritum continuiſſet. Cercidas, apud Diog. Laert. lib. 6. num. 77.

(41) Diog. Laert. ibid. Suidas.

(42) Ælian. Var. Hiſt. lib. 8. cap. 14.

(43) Hieronym. lib. 2. adv. Jovinianum.

(44) Demetrius in Æquivocis, apud Laertium, num. 79. Plutarch. Sympoſ. lib. 8. cap. 1. Suidas.

[I] He cared very little whether he was buried or not; however, he had an honourable funeral.] It is ſaid that as he was dying he gave orders that his corps ſhould not be buried at all, or only covered with a little duſt in a ditch. He wiſhed he might ſerve for food to all ſorts of animals (48). We further find in Diogenes Laertius, that he deſired to be thrown into the Iliſſus, for the uſe of his brethren; but theſe words have, no doubt, been foiſted into the Hiſtorian's Text: for what Writer can be ſo abſurd as to ſay this Philoſopher deſired to be thrown into a river, that he might be of ſome uſe to the dogs? It is not likely, therefore, that theſe words ſhould proceed from Laertius: they might be firſt written in the margin, to mark Ælian's opinion (49), which was that our Cynic ordered

(45) Laertius, lib. 6. num. 76.

(46) Idem, num. 44.

(47) Idem, num. 57.

(48) Idem, num. 79.

(49) Var. Hiſt. lib. 8. cap. 14.

man of that City [K], who made him Tutor to his ſons. Notwithſtanding he was a ſlave, he perfectly kept up his character (e). The moſt ſhameleſs and inexcuſable circumſtance of his life, was his brutiſhly plunging himſelf in acts of impurity in the open view of the world [L]; for which he alledged very bad reaſons.

(e) See the Remark [K].

dered his body to be thrown into the Iliſſus; and then ſome Tranſcriber inſerted them impertinently in the text. Note, that the Iliſſus is a river of Attica, and that Diogenes died in a ſuburbs of Corinth (50); whence we may conclude that Ælian has committed a miſtake. Mr. Menage has made a very learned Note on this (51). There is a paſſage in Cicero which deſerves to be tranſcribed: we there learn that Diogenes, upon his friends aſking him whether the deſire he had to lie unburied tended to the advantage of the wild beaſts, or of the birds, anſwered them, that he would have a ſtaff put into his hand, that he might drive them away; how will you be able to do that, ſaid they, ſince you will feel nothing? What is it to me then, replied he, if I am torn by wild beaſts? Durior Diogenes, & idem quidem ſentiens, ſed ut Cynicus aſperius, projici ſe juſſit inhumatum. Tum amici, volucribuſne an feris? Minime vero, inquit, ſed bacillum prope me quo abigam, ponitote. Qui poteris? illi, non enim ſenties. Quid igitur mihi ferarum laniatus oberit nihil ſentienti (52)?

(50) Ἐν τῷ Κρανείῳ τῷ πρὸ τῆς Κορίνθου γυμνασίῳ. In Cranio: id erat Gymnaſium ante Corinthum. Diog. Laert. num. 77.

(51) In Laertium, lib. 6. num. 79.

(52) Cicero, Tuſcul. 1. cap. 43.

No regard was had to this great indifference of Diogenes for burial. His friends, finding him dead, made no doubt but he had put an end to his life by holding his breath. They diſputed with ſo much eagerneſs who ſhould bury him, that they had like to have come to blows. Some perſons of authority came to compoſe the difference. Diogenes was interred near the gate of the Iſthmus: his tomb was adorned with a column, on which they placed a dog of marble (53). Pauſanias mentions this tomb (54). The inhabitants of Sinope erected ſtatues of braſs to the honour of our Philoſopher, their countryman (55). I had forgot to obſerve, that there is an opinion which imports that he was interred by the ſons of Xeniades, whoſe tutor he had been (56). They add that Xeniades aſked him how he would be buried, and that he anſwered, With my face downwards; for, replied he, on being aſked the reaſon of that fancy, there will ſoon be a ſubverſion, which will turn things upſide down. He meant, if we believe his Hiſtorian, that Macedon from an inconſiderable Kingdom ſhould become a great one. Διὰ τὸ ἐπικρατεῖν ἤδη τῆς Μακεδόνας ἢ ἐκ ταπεινῶν ὑψηλὰς γίνεσθαι. Quia Macedones jam potentia majore dominarentur, atque ex humilibus ſublimes fierent (57). This explication is not juſt, ſince Diogenes died when the Macedonians were arrived at the higheſt pitch of their power. He died, as ſome will have it, on the ſame day with Alexander; ſo that he had ſeen the glory of that nation prodigiouſly exalted. According to others, we are to believe he outlived that Prince, and ſaw the diviſions of his ſucceſſors. He ſhould, therefore, have rather foretold the declenſion of the Macedonians, than their future grandeur. The expreſſion of Diogenes Laertius is not right, unleſs we ſuppoſe it to relate to the time of Philip King of Macedon: for it was under Philip that that nation, which had before made but a mean figure, began to grow formidable.

(53) Diog. Laert. lib. 6. num. 77, 78.

(54) Pauſan. lib. 2. pag. 45.

(55) Diog. Laert. num. 78.

(56) Idem, num. 31.

(57) Idem, num. 32.

[K] He was bought by a Corinthian.] As he was going over to the Iſland of Ægina, he was taken by Pirates, who carried him into Crete, and there expoſed him to ſale. He anſwered the Crier, who aſked him, What he could do, that he knew how to command men (58); and perceiving a Corinthian who was going by, he ſhewed him to the Crier, and ſaid, Sell me to that Gentleman, for he wants a maſter (59). This Corinthian was named Xeniades. He bought Diogenes, and carried him with him to Corinth, and gave him for a Tutor to his children. He alſo intruſted him with the management of his houſe. Diogenes acquitted himſelf ſo well of all theſe employments that Xeniades could not forbear ſaying, whereever he went, a good genius has come into my houſe. Diogenes's friends were deſirous of redeeming him. You are a pack of fools, ſaid he to them (60): lyons are not ſlaves to thoſe who feed them, but the latter are ſervants to the lyons. He plainly told Xeniades; You muſt obey me; for Governors and Phyſicians, though ſervants, yet require obedience from thoſe whoſe Governors and Phyſicians they are (61). He educated Xeniades's children exceedingly well, and indeared himſelf to them ſo much that they recommended him very earneſtly to their father and mother. He grew old in that family, and ſome ſay he died in it, and that he was buried by his pupils (62). The ſale of Diogenes ſerved ſome Authors for a ſubject: Menippus and Eubulus wrote ſome Treatiſes intitled, Διογένους πρᾶσις, Diogenis Auctio (63). Suidas obſerves that Diogenes was already advanced in years, when the Pirates took him: but if he ſpent the remainder of his life in the ſervice of Xeniades, how can what Dion Chryſoſtome aſſerts be true, that Diogenes paſſed the Winter at Athens, and the Summer at Corinth? We ſhall not need to wonder that he ſucceeded ſo well in the education of Xeniades's children, if we conſider the perſuaſive eloquence aſcribed to him by his Hiſtorian (64), and the effects of that eloquence. Oneſicritus had ſent one of his ſons to Athens: this young man having heard Diogenes, ſettled in that city; and his eldeſt brother did the ſame, ſo ſoon as Oneſicritus ſent him thither. Oneſicritus himſelf having had the curioſity to hear that Philoſopher, became his ſcholar; ſuch were the charms of Diogenes's eloquence (65). Oneſicritus was a man of ſome conſideration: he was much eſteemed by Alexander (66), and followed him in his wars, where he had ſome employment of diſtinction conferred on him; and he wrote a Hiſtory. Phocion, who was yet more illuſtrious than he, was the diſciple of Diogenes (67): and ſo was Stilpo of Megara (68).

(58) Philo relates this with other circumſtances. See his Treatiſe quòd omnis probus liber, pag. 883.

(59) Laertius, who ſays this, num. 74. had ſaid, num. 30. that Diogenes had preſſed the Cryer to ſay, Who will buy his Maſter?

(60) Taken from Diogenes Laertius, lib. 6. num. 74, 75.

(61) Idem, Diogen. num. 30.

(62) Idem, num. 31.

(63) Idem, num. 29, 30.

(64) Idem, num. 75.

(65) Τοιαύτη τις πρᾳότης ἰυγξ Διογένους τοῖς λόγοις. Tanta Diogenis ſermonibus illecebra inerat. Idem, num. 76.

(66) Plutarch, in Alexandro, pag. 701, & de Fort. aut Virt. Alexandri, pag. 331, aſſerts that Oneſicritus, who was one of Alexander's Court, had been Diogenes's ſcholar.

(67) Diog. Laert. lib. 6. num. 76.

(68) Idem, ibid.

[L] He brutiſhly plunged himſelf into acts of impurity.] This was his way of arguing: it is no ſin to dine; therefore it is no ſin to dine in the ſtreets (69). On this foundation he eat any where, and pretended his principle was to be extended to all natural wants; ſo that as he thought it was allowable to lie with a woman, he concluded there was no harm in lying with her publickly (70). This was calling in reaſon to the aſſiſtance of his paſſions: it was ſtraining it too far, and not underſtanding it by too much ſubtilizing in order to underſtand it: it was in a manner recta cum ratione inſanire, i. e. running mad with reaſon. We may apply this verſe of Terence to the Cynics, Faciunt næ intelligendo ut nihil intelligant (71).

" By over-ſtretching their knowledge, they come to know nothing at all."

Diogenes, an enemy to all ſuperfluity, and ſeeking as much as poſſible to be independent, committed ſelf-pollution in public, impudently ſaying, that he wiſhed he could by the ſame method appeaſe the cravings of his ſtomach. Χειμερῶν τε ἐν τῷ μέσῳ συνεχὲς, ὅθεν ἦν, ἔλεγε, κὴ τὴν κοιλίαν παρατριψάμενον τῇ λιμῷ παύσασθαι. Cumque ante ora omnium turpiter ſæpe operaretur, utinam liceret, ajebat, perfricato ventre à fame conquieſcere (72). He gloried in this impudence, pretending to find within himſelf, and without any charge, what incites other men to a thouſand expences, and a thouſand devaſtations. He added that if all the world had been like him, Troy had not been taken, nor Priam ſlain upon the altar of Jupiter. Οὐ γὰρ ἴδιὰ αὐτὸν ὑδαμόσε ἐλθεῖν ἀφροδισίων ἕνεκεν, ἀλλὰ παίζων ἔλεγεν, ἀπανταχῇ παρεῖναι αὐτῷ τὴν Ἀφροδίτην πρόχα. Neque enim uſquam illi (*72) eundem erat ob rem veneream, ſed jocans dicebat ubique ſibi adeſſe venerem gratis (73). He ſought reaſons in nature and mythology for his juſtification; and he alledged the example of certain fiſhes. Ἔφη δὲ τοὺς ἰχθῦας σχεδόν τι φρονιμωτέρους φαίνεσθαι τῶν ἀνθρώπων· ὅταν γὰρ θέωνται τὸ σπέρμα ἀποβαλεῖν ἐλθόντας ἔξω προσκνᾶσθαι πρὸς τὸ τραχύ. Dicebat autem & piſces nonnihil prudentiores apparere quam homines. Quum enim

(69) Idem, num. 99.

(70) Διὸ ἔτυ δὲ πάντα ποιεῖν ἐν τῷ μέσῳ καὶ τὰ Δήμητρος καὶ τὰ Ἀφροδίτης. Soleat autem omnia palam facere & quæ ad Cererem & quæ ad Venerem pertinent. Idem, ibid.

(71) Terent. in Prologo Andriæ, ver. 16.

(72) Diog. Laert. lib. 6. num. 69, item 46.

(*72) La Mothe le Vayer ſays that Zeno and ſome others approved this filthy action, probably becauſe of the independance on another which it ſeems to procure us: and Diogenes acting the ſhepherd Menalcas, and uſing that pretty manual operation, wiſhed he could as eaſily ſatisfy his hungry belly. Dextra mihi Deus, & telum quod miſſile libro, ſaid one on this ſubject. Dial. Sceptiques d'Oraſius Tubero, pag. m. 143, 144.

(73) Dio Chryſoſt. Orat. VI, pag. m. 90.

reaſons [M]. He had ſome illuſtrious Diſciples (f), and wrote ſeveral books (g); but it is a queſtion whether the Tragedies which went under his name were really his. It cannot certainly be ſaid whether he was an Atheiſt or not [N]; but it is certain that in (f) See the Remark [K], at the end.

(g) Diog. Laert. lib. 6. num. 80.

enim illis opus eſt ut ſemen emittant, egredi & ſeſe affricare ad aſpera (74). He alſo alledged the example of Pan. He ſaid that Mercury pitying his ſon Pan, who ran night and day up and down the mountains mad for the love of a miſtreſs whom he could not embrace (it was the Echo,) taught him this way of relieving himſelf, which Pan afterwards taught to the ſhepherds (75). Martial, as diſſolute as he was, underſtood the voice of nature better than this Philoſopher:

(74) Idem, ibid.

(75) Idem, ibid.

Ipſam crede tibi NATURAM dicere rerum,
Iſtud quod digitis, Pontice, perdis, homo eſt.

Thus he ſpeaks in the 42d Epigram of the 9th Book, to a man who followed the maxims of Diogenes. This turpitude is to be found not only in the Authors whom I have quoted, but alſo in Athenæus (76), in Plutarch (77), in St. Chryſoſtom's Homily on the Martyr Babylas, in the 34th Homily of the ſame Father on St. Matthew, in the Anthology, in Galen, &c. It is therefore ſurprizing that Eraſmus, who had ſo often peruſed St. Chryſoſtom's Babylas (78), ſhould be ſo groſly miſtaken on occaſion of the paſſage where Diogenes Laertius ſpeaks of the impure manual Operation of our Cynic. It is ſcarce to be imagined, if our own eyes did not acquaint us with it, that Eraſmus could have been guilty of ſo groſs a blunder. He thought that Diogenes, having applied himſelf to bodily labour, and gotten a good ſtomach at it, wiſhed he could ſatisfy his belly by rubbing it. Eraſmus has diſcovered herein the humour of thoſe ſtudious perſons, who are ſorry that the neceſſities of nature take them off from their Books, and he has placed this ſaying among the Apophthegms of Diogenes. He has been cruelly cenſured for it by Robortellus, and very ill defended by Nannius. The words of Eraſmus follow (79): Quum in foro in conſpectu omnium fuiſſet operatus, utinam quoque liceat (inquit) ſic perfricto ventre à fame eſſe quietum, ſentiens agitatione corporis acui ſtomachi orexim, à qua neceſſitate cupiebat eſſe liber. Itidem ſtudioſi graviter ferunt, à literis naturæ neceſſitatibus avocari. Here is a paſſage of the Anthology:

(76) Athenæus, lib. 4. cap. 15. pag. 158.

(77) Plut. de Stoicor. Repugn. pag. 1044.

(78) See above the Remark [C] of the Article BABYLAS.

(79) See the Miſcellanea Petri Nannij Alcmariani, lib. 8. pag. m. 251.

Πάντ' ἄρα Διογένης ἔφυγεν τάδε· τὸν δ' ὑμέναιον
Ἥιδιν παλάμη Λαίδος ἡ χαρίεν.
Omnia ſane Diogenes effugit hæc: nuptias verò
Perfecit dextra, Laïde nihil opus habens.

It is the concluſion of an Epigram (80), wherein Agathias gives a Liſt of ſeveral inconveniences to which a man is expoſed, when he dedicates himſelf to the ſervice of the fair-ſex, and which Diogenes freed himſelf from. I am amazed that Galen ſhould take pains rather to extenuate this crime, than to condemn it. He ſays that this Cynic Philoſopher, the firmeſt of all men againſt ſenſual pleaſure, taſted that of love, not through the allurements of voluptuouſneſs, but the better to prevent the miſchiefs which a retention of the ſeed uſually occaſions. A lady of pleaſure had appointed him a meeting, but becauſe ſhe ſtaid too long, he could not have patience, but... himſelf; and afterwards when ſhe came, he ſent her back, telling her that he had no further occaſion for her, his buſineſs being already done. Βραδυνούσης αὐτῆς, ἀπετρίψατο τὸ σπέρμα προσαπτόμενος τῇ χειρὶ τὸ αἰδοῖον· καὶ μετὰ ταῦτα παραγινομένην ἀπέπεμψεν, εἰπὼν τὴν χεῖρα φθάσαι τὸν ὑμέναιον ἆσαι. Cum diutius ceſſaret, ipſe manu pudendis admota ſemen excuſſit, ac venientem deinde mulierculam remiſit, inquiens, manus hymenæum celebrando prævenit te (81). He did not treat the celebrated curtezan Laïs after that manner. The ſcandalous Chronicle ſays that this woman, who by her charms attracted ſo many of the genteel part of the world, and who rated her favours at ſo high a price, beſtowed them freely on our Cynic, notwithſtanding he was ſuch a ſloven, and had ſuch duſty feet (82). She ſuffered him to enjoy her for nothing: Σὺ μὲν

(80) The 80th of the 7th Book, pag. m. 972.

(81) Galenus, de Locis affectis, lib. 6. Juvenal, Sat. 6. ver. 236, ſpeaks of a like impatience. Abditus interea latet ſecretus adulter, Impatienſque moræ ſilet & præputia ducit.

(82) He always went barefoot. Dio Chryſoſt. Orat. VI, pag. 89.

ταύτῃ τοσοῦτον ἀργύριον δίδως, ἡ δὲ προῖκα Διογένει τῷ κυνὶ συγκυλίεται. You give her ſo much money, ſaid Ariſtippus's ſervant to him, and ſhe tumbles with that Dog Diogenes, without receiving a doit from him (83). We ſhall ſee Ariſtippus's Anſwer in the Article LAIS (84).

(83) Athen. lib. 13. cap. 6. pag. 588.

[M] ... For which he alledged very bad reaſons.] I have mentioned them in the beginning of the preceding Remark, and ſhall ſpeak more amply of them in the Remarks of the article HIPPARCHIA.

(84) Remark [F].

[N] It cannot certainly be ſaid whether he was an Atheiſt or not.] For all the proofs which are alledged are equivocal. Father Garaſſe produces two: one that he laughed at the Gods which were commonly adored by the populace; the other, that he taught that we ought not to be aſhamed of doing whatever nature dictates to us (85). The firſt of theſe proofs is impertinent; for there is nothing more worthy of a Philoſopher, who is thoroughly perſuaded of the being of a God, than to laugh at the Pagan ſuperſtitions. The ſecond proof is not concluſive, becauſe it is poſſible to believe a God, and to be perſuaded at the ſame time that ſhame is founded only on a poſitive inſtitution. Did not the Adamites maintain their errors by paſſages of Scripture miſunderſtood? Therefore they were not Atheiſts. Here follow other proofs of Diogenes's Atheiſm. I, When he ſaw Tutors, Phyſicians, and Philoſophers, he ſaid man was the wiſeſt of all animals; but when he ſaw interpreters of dreams (86), diviners, and thoſe who gave credit to ſuch people, the covetous, and the ambitious, he thought man was the maddeſt of all beings (87). II. He refuſed to be initiated: and when they told him that thoſe who had had that advantage in this world, reigned in the other; he replied that nothing would be more ridiculous than to ſee Ageſilaus and Epaminondas in the mire, while a parcel of ſcoundrels, who been initiated, ſat on the throne of the bleſſed (88). They attribute to him the piece of Raillery which I have mentioned in the article DIAGORAS (89), that there are more people who periſh, notwithſtanding their vows, than there are whoſe prayers are heard (90). IV. He ſaid that the long proſperity of Harpalus bore teſtimony againſt the exiſtence of God (91). Diogenes quidem Cynicus dicere ſolebat Harpalum, qui temporibus illis prædo fælix habebatur, contra Deos teſtimonium dicere, quod in illa fortuna tamdiu viveret..... Improborum igitur proſperitates ſecundæque res redarguunt, ut Diogenes dicebat, vim omnem Deorum ac poteſtatem (92). Of theſe four proofs the two firſt are ſo weak that they do not deſerve to be examined. The third is a little ſtronger, but yet not convincing: for how many people are there at this day, who, without ceaſing to be Papiſts, may both think and ſay, when they ſee the Ex voto's of our Lady of Loretto, the ſame that Diogenes is reputed to have ſaid on occaſion of the Ex voto's of Samothrace? There are ſo many other proofs of the exiſtence of God, beſides that which is drawn from the efficacy of prayers, that a man who rejects that may yet remain fully perſuaded that there is a God who governs all things. If the fourth proof were convincing, we muſt reckon Claudian among the Atheiſts, who has ſaid the very ſame thing of Rufinus, that Diogenes had ſaid of Harpalus (93). He ſaid the puniſhment of Rufinus had been a ſentence of abſolution for the Gods: he thought, therefore, that Rufinus, during his proſperity, bore teſtimony againſt the Gods. Malherbe, a Chriſtian Poet, has had the ſame thought with relation to the Marſhal d'Ancre (94). If all thoſe who have ſaid that the long proſperity of the wicked is a reaſon to doubt of Providence, were Atheiſts, there would be a great many Atheiſts among Authors. But they are two very different things to ſay, Such a fact furniſhes a ſtrong objection againſt the being of God, and to ſay, this objection convinces me that there is no God.

(85) Garaſſe, Doctrine Curieuſe, pag. 137.

(86) See in Diog. Laert. num. 43, what he ſaid againſt thoſe who are affrighted at their dreams. You care very little, ſaid he to them, what you do when awake; and yet you are mightily concerned at what you dream of when aſleep.

(87) Diog. Laert. lib. 6. num. 24.

(88) Idem, num. 39.

(89) Remark [I], Citation (49) and (50).

(90) Diog. Laert. lib. 6. num. 58.

(91) See the Article of HARPALUS, Remark [I].

(92) Cicero, de Natura Deor. lib. 3. cap. 34.

(93) Abſtulit hunc tandem Rufini pœna tumultum, ABSOLVITQUE DEOS.

(94) See the Article CONCINI, Remark [F].

The whole of this may be confirmed by three Obſervations. I. The Ancients, who have ſpoken of Atheiſts, have not put Diogenes the Cynic into the liſt of in some things his moral precepts were very good [O], and that they seemed so to several Fathers of the Church. His manner of confuting the Philosopher who denied the existence of motion, has been admired [P]; but we shall shew that his Answer was incomparably more sophistical than that Philosopher's Arguments.

(95) See Ælian, Var. Hist. lib. 2. cap. 31; item Petri Petiti Observationes Miscellan. lib. 1. cap. 1.

(96) See above Remark [H], Citation (43).

(97) Diog. Laert. num. 42.

(98) Idem. num. 37.

(99) To Theodorus; see Laertius, lib. 6. num. 42.

(100) See what the Journal de Trevoux, of July 1702, Edit. of France, pag. 46. says of Mr. du Tot.

(101) Remark [I] of the Article BION the Borysthenite.

(102) De la Vertue des Paiens, pag. 134. of the 5th Volume of his Works.

of those people (95), as far as I can remember. II. S. Jerom attributes to this Philosopher a Discourse which seems to infer that he believed the immortality of the Soul (96). II. Among the witty sayings of Diogenes, there are some which seem to prove that he believed there was a God. He was asked one day, whether he believed there were any Gods? How can I doubt it, replied he to the person who put the question to him, since I am persuaded they hate thee (97)? Another time, perceiving that a woman transported with devotion had prostrated herself before the Gods in a very indecent posture, he ran to her and told her that God is present in all places, and that she ought to take care not to behave immodestly. Θεασάμενός ποτὲ γυναῖκα ἀσχημονέστερον τοῖς θεοῖς προσπίπτουσαν, βαλόμενος αὐτῆς περιελεῖν τὴν δεισιδαιμονίαν, καθά φησι Ζωΐλος ὁ Περγαῖος, προσελθὼν εἶπεν, οὐκ εὐλαβῇ ὦ γύναι μή ποτε θεῷ ὄπισθεν ἐφῇ; (πάντα γὰρ ἐστιν αὐτῷ πλήρη) ἀσχημονήσῃς. Inspexerat mulierem inhonestius coram diis procidentem, ejus superstitionem auferre volens, ut Zoilus Pergæus ait, accurrit dicens, non vereris mulier ne forte stante post tergum Deo, (cuncta enim plena ipso sunt) inhoneste te habeas (98). It must be ingenuously acknowledged, that the last of these three Remarks has no great strength: for these two notable sayings of Diogenes may be nothing but pure raillery; and, indeed, the first is ascribed to a professed Atheist (99). Generally speaking, it cannot be concluded from a person's witty sayings, whether he has inwardly any Religion or not: for the desire of saying a smart thing is usually so strong, that a man had rather gratify it than preserve a friend, or prevent a grievous misfortune. Rather than lose a jest, a bantering wit, who believes in God, will speak like a profane wretch (100), and a profane wretch will speak like one who believes in God. For which reason I do not rely on our Cynic's Hypothesis, that all things are full of God; for he made no other use of it than to ground a jest on it. The principle from which he endeavoured to prove that all things belong to the wise, would not prevent me from believing him an Atheist. All things belong to the Gods, said he; now wise men are friends of the Gods, and all things are common among friends: therefore all things belong to the wise. In the mouth of such a scoffer as Diogenes, this argument is no better a warrant of his Religion, than if Bion the Borysthenite should urge the Dilemma which I have spoken of above (101).

Let us conclude with the Text of this Remark; it cannot certainly be said whether Diogenes was an Atheist or not. La Mothe le Vayer stops here in his Apology for that Cynic. I would not assert, says he (102), that Diogenes was not as great an Atheist as this Writer makes him, nothing obliging me to suspend my belief in that respect, but the authority of the Fathers who have spoken so favourably of him; but to insist that he was such, because he ridiculed the Gods of the populace, is a very false consequence. Take special notice that this man, whose faith with regard to the existence of God is so very uncertain, did nevertheless lay down some very excellent precepts of Morality: which shall be the subject of the following Remark.

[O] In some things his moral precepts were very good.] They were abominable in some points, as we have seen above (103); but it cannot be denied that in others they were very excellent. He preached against luxury, avarice, ambition, and the spirit of revenge, with all possible strength. He shewed the vanity of human occupations from this reason principally, that we neglect the regulation of our interior faculties and passions, while we make external things our chief business. For instance, he censured the Grammarians, who made diligent inquiry after the misfortunes of Ulysses (104), while they were ignorant of their own disorders. Let us adopt the words of a celebrated Writer. With regard to his Philosophical System, says he (105), which concerned . . . . Morality only, nothing can better clear the Professors of it from all the impurities which have been charged upon them, than the single approbation of the Stoics, allowed to be the most austere of all Philosophers, and who would have been very far from giving their suffrages in favour of persons whose lives were so full of filthiness. Now every body knows that they lived in very good intelligence with the Cynics, as having both one and the same end, that is, to live virtuously, wherein they placed the Supreme Good: for which reason the Stoics called the shortest way of attaining that exalted virtue, Cynism † . . . . As to the person of Diogenes, the greatest men of antiquity had him in admiration: Alexander conceived such an esteem for him, that at the conclusion of a conversation they had together, he protested that if he had not been Alexander, he would have chosen to be Diogenes. Seneca is never tired with praising him in a thousand passages, and having called him virum ingentis animi; in his Book of the Tranquillity of Life, he adds this noble elogy to the rest, that if any one doubts of the felicity of Diogenes, he may call in question the state and blessedness of the immortal Gods. S. John Chrysostom proposes him as a pattern of many religious vertues, in the second Book written by him against those who despised a monastic life. S. Jerome ‡ speaks very honourably of him, he terms him greater and more powerful than Alexander; and displays all his vertues before Jovinian, in order to shame him thereby (106). I shall add but one thing to this passage; which is, that Dion Chrysostom, in some of his Orations, has given his most rigid precepts of Morality under the name of Diogenes.

(103) In the Remark [L].

(104) He laughed at the Grammarians, says Moreri, who inquire after the Errors of Ulysses, and neglect their own. The word Errors is not here properly used. It was not the faults of Ulysses which the Grammarians inquired into, but his wandrings from place to place.

(105) La Mothe le Vayer, pag. 127, 128. of the 5th Volume.

† Σύντομον ἐπ' ἀρετὴν ὁδόν. Diog. Laert. in Mened. in Zenone.

‡ Lib. 2 contra Jovinian. cap. 9.

(106) La Mothe le Vayer, tom. 5. pag. 129.

[P] His way of confuting the Philosopher who denied the existence of motion, has been admired.] Having patiently heard that Philosopher's Lecture, he took two or three turns in the Auditory (107). See the Remark [K] of the Article ZENO of Elea, where we shall shew that this was neither to remove the difficulty, nor to understand it.

(107) Consult Diogenes Laertius, lib. 6. num. 39. compared with Sextus Empiricus, Pyrrhon. Hypotypos. lib. 2. cap. 22. & lib. 3. cap. 8.

DIOGENES, a Native of Apollonia in the Isle of Crete [A], held a considerable rank among the Natural Philosophers who flourished in Ionia before Socrates philosophized at Athens. He was the scholar of Anaximenes, and it may be supposed, with some

[A] He was a native of Apollonia in the Isle of Crete.] We should not have known this, if we had not what remains of Stephanus Byzantinus; for he is the only Author who can be cited. He mentions five and twenty cities named Apollonia, and says the twenty third was in the Isle of Crete, that it was anciently called Eleutheria, and that Diogenes the Natural Philosopher was born there (1). Meursius did not remember this particularity, when he made a List of the illustrious men of the Island of Crete (2); for he has not inserted our Diogenes therein; and yet he has made use of this passage of Stephanus Byzantinus in a Chapter of the same Book (3). This omission is much more excusable than the mistake we find in the Jesuit Lescalopier. He pretends that the Diogenes Apolloniates of Cicero, is Diogenes of Apollonia in Illyria, ex Apollonia, urbe Illyrica, hodie Aulona (4). Monsr. Menage falsly imagined that certain Authors have said this Diogenes was of Smyrna. He puts Diogenes Laertius among those Authors; and supposes that we ought to read, in the Life of Anaxarchus, not ἔτω διήκουσε Διομύνου τοῦ Σμυρναίου (5), as the printed Editions have it, but ἔτω διήκουσε Διογένους τοῦ Σμυρναίου; hic (Anaxarchus) Diogenis Smyrnæi auditor fuit. Thus far he is in the right, and the proofs he alledges are solid. He quotes a passage of Clemens Alexandrinus (6), and a passage of Eusebius, wherein it is said that Anaxarchus was the disciple of Diogenes of Smyrna (7). But when he adds that the Diogenes, who is surnamed Σμυρναῖος in the Life of Anaxarchus, is the same with him who in the preceding chapter has the surname Ἀπολλωνιάτης, he is mistaken. Notandum

(1) Steph. Byzant. in Ἀπολλωνία.

(2) It is in the 235th and following pages of his Treatise of the Isle of Crete.

(3) Ibid. pag. 19.

(4) Lescalop. in Cicer. de Nat. Deor. pag. 46.

(5) Diog. Laert. lib. 9. num. 58.

(6) Clem. Alexand. Strom. lib. 1.

(7) Euseb. Præparat. Evang. lib. 14. cap. 17.

(a) See above, the Remark [A] of the Article ARCHELAUS the Philoſopher.

ſome probability, that he taught after him in the Ionic ſchool (a). He rectified in ſome meaſure his Profeſſor's opinion concerning the firſt Cauſe [B] : for he taught that air was the matter of all beings ; he acknowledged likewiſe that nothing could be produced from that matter without the divine power which he attributed to the air. Anaximenes had

(8) Menag. in Diog. Laertium, lib. 9. num. 58. pag. 423.

tandum autem, ſays he (8), Diogenem Smyrnæum à Laertio hoc loco appellari qui ſupra Apolloniates eidem dictus fuit, non enim diverſi ſunt Smyrnæus & Apolloniates. To comprehend the fallacy of this, we muſt obſerve two things, I, Diogenes Laertius had taken notice that Diogenes of Apollonia was the Scholar of Anaximenes, and contemporary with Anaxagoras (9). Is it credible that a few lines after he ſhould give him Anaxarchus for a diſciple, who, as he expreſly ſays, had ſome converſations with Alexander ? From the death of Anaxagoras to the reign of Alexander, there were three philoſophic ſucceſſions at Athens ; Archelaüs, who had been the diſciple of Anaxagoras, left his chair to Socrates, who having kept it a long while, left it Plato, and he had Alexander's maſter for his diſciple. Chronology will not allow, without being ſtrained, that a diſciple of the diſciple of Anaximenes ſhould follow the Court of that King of Macedon. In the ſecond place, we ſee that the ſame Clemens Alexandrinus, who plainly inſinuates that Diogenes of Apollonia was the ſcholar of Anaximenes (10), and conſequently one of the Members of the Ionic Sect, obſerves expreſly that Diogenes of Smyrna, the diſciple of Metrodorus, who had been the diſciple of Protagoras, was of the Eleatic Sect, and taught Anaxarchus (11). How can one conceive that the ſame Philoſopher ſhould be the diſciple of Anaximenes, and alſo of the diſciple of Protagoras ?

(9) Diogen. Laert. ibid. num. 57.

(10) Clem. Alexand. in Protrept. pag. 42. C.

(11) Clemens Alex. Stromat. lib. 1. pag. 301.

[B] He rectified in ſome meaſure the opinion of his Profeſſor concerning the firſt Cauſe.] I have not met with ſo particular a detail of this in any Author as in a Work of S. Auguſtin. Iſte (Anaximander) Anaximenem diſcipulum, & ſucceſſorem reliquit : qui omnes rerum cauſas infinito aeri dedit, nec Deos negavit, aut tacuit : non tamen ab ipſis aerem factum, ſed ipſos ex aere ortos credidit. Anaxagoras verò ejus auditor, harum rerum omnium, quas videmus, effectorem, divinum animum ſenſit : & dixit, ex infinita materia, quæ conſtaret diſſimilibus inter ſe particulis, rerum omnium genera pro modulis & ſpeciebus propriis ſingula fieri, ſed animo faciente divino. Diogenes quoque, Anaximenis alter auditor, aerem quidem dixit, rerum eſſe materiam, de qua omnia fierent : ſed eum eſſe compotem divinæ rationis, ſine qua nihil ex eo fieri poſſet (12). i. e. " Anaximander left Anaximenes his ſcholar and ſucceſſor ; who aſcribed the cauſes of all things to infinite Air : the being of Gods he neither denied, nor ſuppreſſed ; yet he thought the air was not made by them, but that they owed their origin to the Air. Anaxagoras, his diſciple, was of opinion that a divine Mind was the Author of all viſible things : and he ſaid that all the ſeveral kinds of things, according to their reſpective modes and ſpecies, were made out of infinite matter, which conſiſted of diſſimilar particles, but were formed by that divine Mind. Diogenes, another Scholar of Anaximenes, ſaid likewiſe that Air was the matter from which all things were produced ; but that it was indued with divine Reaſon, without which nothing could be effected by it." Cicero has repreſented this Dogm of Diogenes in a much more ſuccinct manner. Quid ? aer, ſays he (13), quo Diogenes Apolloniates utitur Deo, quem ſenſum habere poteſt, aut quam formam Dei ? i. e. " What ſhall we ſay " of air, which Diogenes of Apollonia ſuppoſed to " be God ? What ſenſe, or what form of God can " it have ?" The Jeſuit Leſcalopier finds a great deal of unfair dealing in theſe words of Velleius the Epicurean, one of Cicero's Interlocutors ; and ſee with what an air he addreſſes him (14). Quandiu impones, Vellei, extinctis, ſepultiſque philoſophis, qui reclamare non poſſunt, & illis errores affinges in quos nunquam impegerunt ? ecce hic quoque aerem Diogenis Apolloniatæ Deum facis, quem ille pro Deo nunquam habuit : nam dixit quidem libro nono Laertii, aerem eſſe στοιχεῖον, i. e. elementum, non autem Deum, & libro octavo de Civitate Dei, capite ſecundo, aerem eſſe materiem rerum de qua omnia fierent ; ſed eum eſſe compotem divinæ rationis, ſine qua nihil fieret. Jam verò in altiſſimâ illâ, divinaque ratione fruſtra ſenſum, fruſtra figuram requiris, quæ, niſi in corporeâ naturâ, non inveniri, opinor, intelligis : eſt enim illa ratio divina merè ſpiritalis. i. e. " How long, Velleius, will you injure Philoſophers who are dead and buried, and " cannot now anſwer for themſelves, by falſly imputing to them errors into which they never fell ? " Lo here likewiſe you make the Air to be the God " of Diogenes of Apollonia, which he never held to " be God : it is true, he has ſaid, in the ninth Book " of Laertius, that the air is an element, but not a " God, and in the ſecond chapter of the eighth Book " de Civitate Dei, that the air is the matter from which " all things were produced ; but that it is indued with " a divine reaſon, without which nothing could be ef- " fected. But in that moſt high and divine reaſon " you in vain look for ſenſe, or figure, which are " not to be found, as I ſuppoſe you well know, elſe- " where than in a corporeal nature : for that divine " reaſon is merely ſpiritual." This Jeſuit's complaint is unjuſt ; for it is certain that the paſſage of Cicero contains the whole ſubſtance and force of that of S. Auguſtin, and amounts to the ſame ſenſe, which is, that according to the Hypotheſes of Diogenes the air was God. He taught, if we believe S. Auguſtin, that there were two things in the air ; firſt, a matter, from which all the bodies in the univerſe might be produced, ſecondly, a divine virtue, without which nothing could be produced from that matter. Is not this making one entire being or compoſition of the air and that divine virtue, wherein, if the air was the matter, the divine virtue was the ſoul or form ? Now as it is the form which ſpecifies the compoſition, and gives it its name, it follows that the air, animated by a divine virtue or a divine nature, ought to be called God : and conſequently when Cicero ſuppoſes that the air, was God according to Diogenes, he only ſuppoſes what neceſſarily reſults from the expoſition which St. Auguſtin has given of that Philoſopher's doctrine. The objection which the Jeſuit grounds on the word στοιχεῖον is of no force ; for, as I have already ſaid, our Diogenes admitted two things in the air, matter and an efficient cauſe, and he united them intimately together (15) : on this ſuppoſition, the air, as matter, was the element or στοιχεῖον of the different bodies of the Univerſe (16) ; yet this did not hinder but that the ſame air conſidered jointly with the divine virtue with which it was indued, was God. This may be fortified by a new obſervation : the words of S. Auguſtin may induce us to judge that this reaſon or divine virtue which Diogenes joined to the air, was rather an attribute than a form, or a ſoul diſtinct from air ; that is to ſay, that, according to Diogenes, there was but one ſubſtance in the air, which was both the material principle of all things, and the reaſon, wiſdom, or intelligence, which, as the efficient cauſe, directed the production of all things. It is therefore with all imaginable juſtice, that Cicero's Vellejus charges Diogenes with having taught that the air is God. Ariſtotle will wonderfully countenance thoſe who ſhall underſtand S. Auguſtin's phraſe in this manner. He acquaints us that the ſoul of man was of air according to Diogenes, and that it knew and moved itſelf as being of an aerial nature. Its knowledge was founded on the air's being the principle of all things, its motive power proceeded from the air's being the moſt ſubtil of all beings. Διογένης δ' ὥσπερ καὶ ἕτεροί τινες, ἀέρα τοῦτον οἰηθεὶς πάντων λεπτομερέστατον εἶναι, καὶ ἀρχήν· καὶ διὰ τοῦτο γινώσκειν τε καὶ κινεῖν τὴν ψυχήν, ἢ μὲν πρῶτόν ἐστι, καὶ ἐκ τούτου τὰ λοιπὰ γινώσκειν· ἢ δὲ λεπτομερέστατον, κινητικὸν εἶναι. Diogenes autem, ſicut & alii quidam, aerem ipſam cenſuit eſſe : hunc ſubtiliſſimæ ſubſtantiæ, rerumque principium eſſe putans. Idcirco cognoſcere atque movere, animam dixit : hoc quidem cognoſcere, quo primum eſt, & ex hoc ipſo cætera conſtant ; hoc autem eſſe motivum, quo ſubtiliſſimum eſt (17). Theſe words of Ariſtotle clearly ſhew that Diogenes gave to the air the nature of a firſt principle, that of a firſt mover, knowledge, and ſubtilty in the higheſt degree, as attributes which conſtituted per modum unius one ſole and identical ſubſtance, which was God. The reſult of which is, that

(12) Auguſtin. de Civit. Dei, lib. 8. cap. 2. pag. m. 711.

(13) Cicero, de Nat. Deorum, lib. 1. cap. 12.

(14) Leſcalop. in Ciceron. de Nat. Deor. lib. 1. pag. 48, 49.

(15) Aerem compotem divinæ rationis. Auguſt. de Civit. Dei, lib. 8. cap. 2. pag. 711.

(16) Note that according to Diogenes there was no difference between ἀρχὴ principle, and στοιχεῖον, element : for he acknowledged no more than one Element. See Citation (22).

(17) Ariſtoteles, lib. 1. de Anima, cap. 2. pag. 479, E. tom. 1. Oper.

had not explained the generation of things in this manner: the air was, according to his doctrine, the sole and universal cause; and the Gods themselves were produced by it [C]. Cicero has been unjustly accused of not having faithfully reported this dogm of Diogenes (b). It is not to be doubted but Plutarch has sometimes alledged the opinions of this Natural Philosopher [D], when he simply tells us that Diogenes taught this or that: but this is a very bad way of quoting, since there were several illustrious Philosophers named Diogenes. He who is the subject of this Article was master of great eloquence (c). His merit dangerously exposed him to the jealousy of some persons in Athens (d); so that he ran the risque of his life. The beginning of his Work has been preserved to us; and it is a setting out which gives an advantageous idea of his understanding. We there find he was of opinion that a Teacher should first lay down an incontestable principle, and should make use of a style which might be both grave and simple at the same time (e). I do not mention the opinions which Diogenes Laertius ascribes to him; since they may be seen in Moreri. His opinion as to the origin and distribution of the winds is to be

(b) See the Remark [B] Citation (14).

(c) Diogenes Laertius, lib. 9. num. 57.

(d) Idem, ibid.

(e) Idem, ibid. & lib. 6. num. 81.

that his System differed scarce at all from Spinozism: God was thereby at the same time the material cause, and the efficient cause of all things; he was the immanent cause of all beings; he produced in himself all the bodies of the Universe, that infinity of worlds which Diogenes acknowledged (18). Let us observe, by the way, that the verses of Sidonius Apollinaris, which I have quoted elsewhere (19), suit the doctrine of Diogenes infinitely better than the doctrine of Archelaus to whom Savaron has applied them. Justus Lipsius had a great deal of reason to take them for the description of the opinion of Diogenes (20).

It is worth while to see in what manner he philosophized as to the production of the World: his thoughts are in some respects, and in general, conformable enough to the Hypothesis of Mr. Des-Cartes. All things being in motion, said he, some became condensed, and others rarified; in those places where condensation prevailed, a whirling motion or vortex was formed, which by its revolution drew in the rest: what was most subtil and light flew upwards, and formed the Sun in the superior region. For my warrant, I shall transcribe his Greek. Διογένης ὁ Ἀπολλωνιάτης, ἀέρα ὑφίστασθαι στοιχεῖον· κινεῖσθαι δὲ τὰ πάντα, ἀπείρους τε εἶναι τοὺς κόσμους· κοσμοποιεῖσθαι δὲ ὅταν· ὅτι τῷ παντὸς κινουμένου, καὶ ἢ μὲν ἀραιοῦ, ἢ δὲ πυκνοῦ γινομένου, ὅπου συνεκύρησε τὸ πυκνὸν, συστροφὴν ποιῆσαι, καὶ ὅταν τὰ λοιπὰ, κατὰ τὸν αὐτὸν λόγον, τὰ κυφότατα τὴν ἄνω τάξιν λαβόντα, τὸν ἥλιον ἀποτελέσαι. Diogenes Apolloniata, Aërem elementum ponit, moveri autem universa, & infinitos esse mundos affirmat. Cæterum ejusmodi somniat eorum molitionem: scilicet cùm universum ita moveretur, ut rarius hic, alibi densius fieret, ubicunque major densitas contingeret, ibi convolutionem quandam effeciſſe, tùm similem in modum cætera: quæ autem omnium leviſſimæ partes essent, eas regione superiori occupatâ Solem produxiſſe (21). It does not seem easy to reconcile this Hypothesis with what Aristotle, as we have seen above, says of the opinions of this natural Philosopher. He imputes to him the having taught that the Air is the most subtile of all beings. How then could it be said, after this, that at the beginning of the World there were bodies which became condensed, and others which became rarefied? That which is subtile and fine in the highest degree is not susceptible of rarefaction. I can perceive but one way to solve the difficulty; which is, to suppose that at the first shock the Air received it thickened, as we see Wine grows foul when the vessel is shaken. The motion continued, and in this progress of agitation some parts grew yet thicker, and others grew clear. The latter did not acquire a degree of rarefaction superior to the essential subtilty of the first principle, but superior only to the density to which the whole mass of the air was reduced by the first motion. If we had the Writings of Diogenes, we should doubtless see that he had obviated or explained all such difficulties as these; but as his system is known to us only by a very small number of loose particulars, we can only grope our way in the dark, when we attempt to put the incoherent fragments together. Take notice that Aristotle (22) praises him for having acknowledged that if all things were not made of one sole principle, there could be no action and reaction; for cold and heat cannot be transformed into one another; wherefore they require a common subject, which may be successively cold and hot. Aristotle found his account in this general notion; for he stripped the four elements of the nature of a first material principle, to bestow it on one single being, which he called the first matter.

(18) Diogen. Laert. lib. 9. num. 57.

(19) Above, Citation (9) of the Article ARCHELAUS the Philosopher.

(20) Lipsius, Manuduct. ad Philosoph. Stoic. lib. 1. Dissert. 8. pag. m. 645.

(21) Euseb. Præparat. Evang. lib. 1. cap. 8. pag. 25, B.

(22) Aristot. de Generat. & Corrupt. lib. 1. cap. 6.

I fancy Diogenes Laertius is mistaken, when he says that Diogenes of Apollonia admitted an infinite Vacuum (23). I chuse rather to follow Plutarch, who assures us that all the Natural Philosophers from Thales down to Plato rejected a Vacuum (24).

(23) Diog. Laert. lib. 9. num. 57.

(24) Plutarch. de Placitis Philos. lib. 1. cap. 18. pag. 883.

[C] The air was.... the only cause;.... the Gods themselves were produced from it.] It is a very strange thing that there should ever have been Philosophers blind enough to give God so low an original. Right order required that they should assert that God produced bodies; and some of them, on the contrary, have asserted that bodies had produced God. Can the cause be less perfect than its effect? An intelligent nature, therefore, cannot have brute matter for its cause. I do not know whether the experience of the human species may not have obscured the notions of common sense. They saw the Heroes, the wise men, and the greatest men, proceed from whence? scarce can the eyes, or the imagination, bear so filthy, so loathsome, so hideous an object. Yet it is there that you must find the principles of the greatest souls, unless God reveals to us that it is he who creates a spirit to be united to the machine of the human body. We shall see elsewhere (25) whether what passes in the propagation of the rational animal may have led those into error who have advanced so many whimsies concerning the original of the Gods.

(25) In the Remark [G] of the Article JUPITER.

[D] There is no doubt but Plutarch has sometimes alledged the opinions of this Natural Philosopher.] I only consider here his Books of the Opinions of the Philosophers. The places where he mentions the sentiments of Diogenes, as far as I have been able to find, are these; the 1st, 8th, and 13th Chapters of the 2d Book: the 5th, and 16th Chapters of the 4th Book: the 15th, 20th, and 23d Chapters of the 5th Book. I am persuaded that he almost always means Diogenes of Apollonia, and I should be of that opinion without any exception, if Monsieur du Rondel had not written to me that the passage which will be seen below (26) more probably relates to Diogenes the Cynic. This passage is in the 20th Chapter of the 5th Book of Plutarch, and seems to signify that the Diogenes there cited deprived brute animals of sensation. There is a circumstance which strongly tempts one to imagine that it is Diogenes of Apollonia who is there intended. We have seen above (27) that he said the soul was of air: now the Diogenes of this passage of Plutarch taught that animals participate of understanding and the air (28). It was the language which Diogenes of Apollonia ought to make use of, when he designed only to strip brute animals of actual understanding and sensation, and not of the soul or principle of understanding and sensation. This plainly appears to have been his aim: he admitted the soul in brutes; but he thought the thickness and humidity of their organs blunted its activity. Francis de Fougerolles, who translated into French and paraphrased Diogenes Laertius, attributes this opinion to Diogenes of Apollonia. He thought, says he (29),... that all sorts of animals have indeed understanding, but the greater part of them, being of a gross constitution, have not the free use of reason, no more than madmen, by reason of some impediment. He manifestly had this passage of Plutarch in view; but he represents it very unfaithfully.

(26) In the Remark [E] of the Article PEREIRA.

(27) In the Remark (B) Citation (17).

(28) Μετέχειν μὲν αὐτὰ τοῦ νοητοῦ καὶ ἀέρος. Rationis & aëris participes eas esse. Plut. de Placit. Philos. lib. 5. cap. 20. pag. 909.

(29) François de Fougerolles, Addit. à Diogene Laerce, pag. 655.

be found in Ariſtotle (f). What he ſaid concerning the nature of ſeed, from whence he drew the etymology of the word Ἀφροδίσια, that is Venereal affairs, may be ſeen in Clemens Alexandrinus (g). There is ſome conformity between the Doctrine of this Philoſopher, and that of Mr. Des-Cartes, with relation to the generation of the World (h).

(f) Ariſtot. Hiſt. Anim. lib. 3. cap. 2.

(g) Clem. Alexand. Pædag. lib. 1. pag. 105.

(h) See the Remark [B].

DIOGENES, a Philoſopher of the Sect of the Stoics, was ſurnamed the Babylonian (a), though he was not of Babylon, but of Seleucia on the Tigris. The nearneſs of theſe two Cities was the occaſion of this ſurname (b); beſides that the name of the former has been ſometimes given to the latter (c). This Philoſopher was the ſcholar of Chryſippus (d), and wrote ſeveral Works [A]. His reputation muſt needs have been great, ſince the Athenians deputed him Ambaſſador to Rome, with Carneades the chief of the Academics, and Critolaüs the chief of the Peripatetic ſchool. I have ſpoken of this Embaſſy elſewhere (e). Our Diogenes lived fourſcore and eight years (f), and philoſophized to the end of his life (g). He ſhewed an example of great moderation [B], when a moſt inſolent young fellow ſpat in his face. I do not think he ought to be confounded with him whom Athenæus has ſpoken ill of [C]; but I do not diſtinguiſh him from (a) Diog. Laert. lib. 6, num. 81. See alſo Strabo, lib. 16. pag. 512.

(b) Idem Diog. ibid.

(c) See Bochart, Geogr. Sacr. lib. 1. cap. 8.

(d) Cicero, De Divinat. lib. 1. cap. 3.

(e) In the Article CARNEADES, Remark [F].

(f) Lucian. in Macrob. pag. 641. tom. 2.

(g) Cicero, de Senect. cap. 7.

[A] He wrote ſeveral Works.] A Treatiſe of Divination (1), another of Nobility (2), another of Laws (3), another of Minerva. In this laſt he explained phyſically what was ſaid of the extraordinary birth of that Goddeſs. Quem (Chryſippum) Diogenes Babylonius conſequens in eo libro qui inſcribitur de Minerva partum Jovis ortumque virginis ad phyſiologiam traducens, disjungit à fabula (4). I cannot tell in what Work it was that he taught what Cicero mentions. It relates to uprightneſs in dealing: his Morality in that point was ſomewhat leſs rigid than that of Antipater his diſciple. In hujuſmodi cauſis aliud Diogeni Babylonio videri ſolet, magno & gravi Stoico, aliud Antipatro, diſcipulo ejus, homini acutiſſimo. Antipatro omnia patefacienda, ut ne quid omnino, quod venditor norit, emtor ignoret: Diogeni venditorem quatenus jure civili conſtitutum ſit, dicere vitia oportere, cetera ſine inſidiis agere, & quoniam vendat, velle quam optime vendere (5). i. e. "In caſes of this kind Diogenes the Babylonian, a Stoic of great authority, taught one thing, and his ſcholar Antipater, a moſt acute man, taught another. Antipater was of opinion every thing ought to be laid open, that nothing which the ſeller knew might be concealed from the buyer: Diogenes taught that the ſeller ought to diſcover the faults of the commodity ſo far as was injoined by the Civil Law; that he ſhould in other reſpects deal without tricking, and ſince he did ſell, might endeavour to ſell to the beſt advantage." Here is another paſſage: Quærit etiam (Hecaton in libro ſexto de Officiis) ſi ſapiens adulterinos nummos acceperit imprudens pro bonis: cum id reſcierit, ſoluturuſne ſit eos, ſi cui debeat, pro bonis. Diogenes ait, Antipater negat, cui potius aſſentior. Qui vinum fugiens vendat ſciens, debeatne dicere. Non neceſſe putat Diogenes: Antipater viri boni exiſtimat. Hæc ſunt quaſi controverſa jura Stoicorum (6). i. e. "Hecato alſo, in his ſixth Book of Offices, inquires whether in caſe a wiſe man ſhould ignorantly receive falſe money inſtead of good, he may, when he comes to know it, pay ſuch money to his creditor for good. Diogenes allows he may; but Antipater, whoſe opinion I prefer, ſays he may not. Whether a man who knowingly ſells wine which is upon the decay, ought to diſcover it. Diogenes thinks it not neceſſary; but Antipater thinks it the duty of an honeſt man. Theſe are as it were the controverted caſes of juſtice among the Stoics." I ſhould imagine that Diogenes ſpoke of theſe things in his Treatiſe of Laws.

(1) Cicero, lib. 1. de Divinat. cap. 3.

(2) Athen. lib. 4. cap. 19. pag. 168.

(3) Idem, lib. 12. cap. 6. pag. 526.

(4) Cicero, de Nat. Deor. lib. 1. cap. 15.

(5) Idem, de Officijs, lib. 3. cap. 12.

(6) Idem, ibid. cap. 23.

[B] He ſhewed an example of great moderation.] The following words of Seneca will acquaint us with the fact: Contumeliam tibi fecit aliquis. Num quid majorem quam Diogeni, Philoſopho Stoico? cui de ira cum maxime differenti adoleſcens protervus inſpuit. Tulit hoc ille leniter ac ſapienter, non quidem, inquit, iraſcor: ſed dubito tamen an iraſci oporteat (7). i. e. "Suppoſe ſomebody has offered you an affront. Was it a greater than was offered to Diogenes, the Stoic Philoſopher? whom an inſolent young fellow ſpat upon, as he was earneſtly diſcourſing on Anger. He bore it patiently and wiſely: I am not angry, ſaid he; but yet I doubt whether I ought not to be angry." This was preaching by example: he was reading a Lecture on anger; he was combating that paſſion in the chair, than which nothing is more eaſy. He had an opportunity given him of practiſing what he adviſed; an enormous affront was offered him in the midſt of his Sermon on patience, and he was not angry. Here was a Stoic in practice: however a word eſcaped him which did not perfectly tally with the doctrine of his ſect. He ought to have been certain, as a Stoic, that he ought not to be angry.

(7) Seneca, de Ira, lib. 3. cap. 38. pag. m. 580.

[C] I do not think he ought to be confounded with him whom Athenæus has ſpoken ill of.] He ſpeaks (8) of one Diogenes an Epicurean Philoſopher, a native of Seleucia near Babylon: he ſpeaks of him, I ſay, as of a man of tolerable eloquence and learning, but of bad morals, envious, and ſatyrical, not ſparing even Kings themſelves, when occaſions of joking preſented themſelves (9). He made himſelf agreeable to a King of Syria, who was notwitſtanding prepoſſeſſed in favour of the maxims of the Stoics (10): Ἀναδοχῆς δ' ἐτύγχανε παρὰ τῷ βασιλέως καί τοι τοῖς ἀπὸ τῆς στοᾶς λόγοις χαίροντι (11): acceptus gratuſque regi fuit quamvis Stoicorum placitis gaudenti. It was Alexander Bala: the Philoſopher, with a boldneſs which ill ſuited his character, one day aſked that Prince's leave to put on a purple robe and a crown of gold, in the midſt of which there appeared the image of vertue. The Prince made him a preſent of both; and the Philoſopher made a preſent of them to a woman he was in love with. Alexander, being acquainted with this, invited ſome Philoſophers and other illuſtrious perſons to dinner, and ordered Diogenes to ſit down at the table with the purple robe and crown of gold. The Philoſopher excuſed himſelf, alledging it would be a piece of indecency: whereupon the King made a ſign for his Muſic to enter, and among the reſt of them Diogenes's miſtreſs appeared adorned with the robe and crown which he had preſented her with. Every body fell a laughing: Diogenes waited till it was over, and then made a long encomium on that woman. Antiochus, who ſucceeded Alexander (12), could not bear this Philoſopher's abuſive tongue, and therefore commanded him to be put to death (13). Several things convince me that this relation does not concern our Diogenes. In the firſt place, Athenæus ſays expreſly that he who was beloved by Alexander King of Syria was of the Sect of Epicurus, and that that Prince's prepoſſeſſion in favour of the Stoical doctrines did not prevent his liking him. This ſhews that he does not ſpeak of a Philoſopher who was a Stoic in theory, and an Epicurean in practice; wherefore he does not ſpeak of the Scholar of Chryſippus, and the Collegue of Carneades in the Embaſſy to Rome. In the ſecond place, Cicero aſſures us that Diogenes the Stoic philoſophized all his life, that is to ſay, he read Lectures in the Portico at Athens till his death: Num Philoſophorum principes, Pythagoram, Democritum, num Platonem, num Xenocratem, num poſtea Zenonem, Cleanthem, aut eum, quem vos etiam Romæ vidiſtis, Diogenem Stoicum, coegit in ſuis ſtudiis obmuteſcere ſenectus? an non in omnibus iis ſtudiorum agitatio vitæ æqualis fuit (14)? i. e. "Were the principal Philoſophers, Pythagoras, Democritus, Plato, Xenocrates, or after them, Zeno, Cleanthes, or Diogenes the Stoic, whom you have alſo ſeen at Rome, conſtrained to bury their talents in ſilence by old age? Was not their application to ſtudy of equal duration with their lives?" Could he ſpeak thus of a Philoſopher

(8) Athen. lib. 5. cap. 13. pag. 211.

(9) Τοῦ γελοίε μηδὲ τῶν βασιλέων ἀπεχόμενον. Dum riſum captabat ne regibus quidem parcentem. Idem, ibid.

(10) Idem, ibid.

(11) Thus we muſt read, as Mr. Menage obſerves in Diog. Laert. lib. 6. num. 8. and not χαίροντι, as it is in the Editions of Athenæus.

(12) Ὁ μεταλαβὼν τὴν βασιλείαν Ἀντίοχος. Qui Alexandro ſucceſſit in regno Antiochus. Idem, ibid. This is not exact; for there was a King between Alexander and Antiochus.

(13) Taken from Athenæus, lib. 5. cap. 13. pag. 211.

(14) Cicero, de Senectute, cap. 7.

from the perſon who taught Carneades Logic [D]. I ſhall take notice of an Error of Moreri [E]. See below in the laſt Remark.

loſopher who, after his Embaſſy to Rome, had paſt the reſt of his days at the Court of the Kings of Syria? In the third place, the Diogenes of Athenæus was living in the year of Rome 610; for Antiochus, who put him to death, did not begin his reign before that time. Now Diogenes the Stoic was dead when Cato ſaid of him what I have juſt now quoted from the Treatiſe de Senectute; and it is certain that the Epoch of that Work is prior by ſome years to the year of Rome 610 (15). Laſtly, it is highly improbable that if the famous Philoſopher whom the Republic of Athens ſent to the Roman Senate, had obſcured his reputation by a ſhameful old age, and by a violent death which he juſtly deſerved, no Author ſhould have taken notice of it. Let us conclude, therefore, that he is not the perſon whom Athenæus means, and conſequently that Jonſius is miſtaken (16) in placing his death under the 159th Olympiad: for this Chronology has no other foundation than the narrative of Athenæus.

(15) Since Cato ſays, cap. 10, that he is in his 84th year, it muſt be in the year of Rome 603.

(16) Jonſius, de Script. Hiſt. Philoſ pag. 115, 190.

Note, I am a little diffident of the third reaſon, when I conſider, on one hand, that Diogenes lived fourſcore and eight years according to Lucian, and, on the other, that his Embaſſy was in the year of Rome 598. It follows from thence that, if he died before the time Cato is ſuppoſed to have ſaid what we read in the Book de Senectute, he came Embaſſador to Rome at the age of eighty three at leaſt. Now, as nobody has obſerved this circumſtance, and Cicero himſelf, who might have taken advantage of it, does not ſuppoſe that Cato had taken notice of it, I think it may be ſaid that this Philoſopher was not ſo old when he came to Rome on the Athenians affairs. Let us not imagine that Cicero has obſerved Chronology ſo exactly in his Dialogues, as never to have made a ſlip in that reſpect. Nothing is more difficult than ſuch an exactneſs when we bring in a man ſpeaking who lived before our time. We make him ſpeak ſometimes according to our own ideas; and what he ſays of people's death or old age is falſe for no other reaſon than becauſe inſtead of putting our ſelves in his place, we put him in ours. Cicero might have added Diogenes to the number of Philoſophers who had not given over their ſtudies before an end was put to their life: but Cato could not make this addition; for, if I am not miſtaken, he died before Diogenes. And yet, in the Dialogue de Senectute, he is introduced diſcourſing as one who ſurvived that Philoſopher.

[D] I do not diſtinguiſh him from the perſon who taught Carneades Logic.] The paſſage wherein Cicero obſerves this is curious; for which reaſon I ſhall quote it. When Carneades fell into any ſubtle or perplexed diſpute, he uſed this piece of pleaſantry: if my conſequence be good, I have got the better; if it be not, let Diogenes return me my money. Cum aliquid ejuſmodi incideret, ſic ludere Carneades ſolebat: ſi recte concluſi, teneo, ſin vitioſe, minam Diogenes reddat, ab eo enim Stoico Dialecticam didicerat; hæc autem merces erat Dialecticorum (17).

(17) Cicero, Academ. Quæſt. lib. 4. cap. 30.

[E] I ſhall take notice of an error of Moreri.] He pretends that our Diogenes was ſent to Rome, with Carneades and Critolaüs, under the Conſulſhip of P. Scipio and M. Marcellus, during the time of the ſecond Punic War. Nobody doubts this, ſays he: yet it is certain that ſeveral do doubt it, and the Jeſuit Leſcalopier condemns thoſe who do not diſtinguiſh this Diogenes from him who was ſent to Rome on the affairs of the Athenians. Cave tamen hunc (Diogenem Babylonium, Chryſippi diſcipulum, Stoicum) confundas cum altero Diogene Stoico qui cum Carneade Academico ab Athenienſibus legatus Romam de maximis rebus miſſus eſſe dicitur libro ſecundo de Orat. quippe quos docti viri ſcitè diſtinctos volunt (18). i. e. "But take care "you do not confound this Diogenes the Babylonian, the "Stoic Philoſopher, and the Scholar of Chryſippus, with "the other Diogenes a Stoic, who Cicero tells us was "ſent Embaſſador to Rome with Carneades the Aca- "demic by the Athenians on very weighty affairs; "ſince ſome learned men are of opinion they ought "to be particularly diſtinguiſhed." If Moreri had ſaid, There is no reaſon to doubt &c. I ſhould not have blamed him in the leaſt: for, whatever the Jeſuit may ſay to the contrary, it is certain that we have here but one and the ſame Diogenes. But this is not the fault I intend principally to ſpeak of. He is much more to be blamed in another reſpect, ſince there was no year during the ſecond Punic War wherein a Scipio and a Marcellus were Conſuls, and the Embaſſy of the three Philoſophers was after the end of the ſecond Punic War. This I have proved to demonſtration in the article of CARNEADES (19). Note, that Voſſius has led Moreri into this miſtake (20). I ſay nothing of a few ſmall faults, ſome whereof have been corrected in the Dutch edition (21). It had been neceſſary to have taken notice what Sect Diogenes was of; for thereby one omiſſion would have been ſupplied.

(18) Leſcalopier in Ciceron. de Natura Deor. pag. 65.

(19) Remark [N].

(20) Voſſius, de Philoſ. Sectis, pag. 103.

(21) Some faults in language have been corrected in it, but not the falſe quotations; for inſtance, that of the 6th Book of Cicero de Finibus, which Work contains but five Books. This quotation and all the others were taken from Voſſius, de Philoſ. Sectis, pag. 103.

DIONYSIUS, Tyrant of Heraclea, a City of Pontus, took advantage of the decline of the Perſians, after they had loſt the Battle of Granicus againſt Alexander. He had not dared to aggrandize himſelf while he ſtood in awe of them; but he was freed from any apprehenſions from that quarter when he ſaw them engaged in a war wherein fortune declared for the Macedonians: however he ſoon found himſelf diſappointed in the hopes he had built on the growing weakneſs of the Perſian Monarchy. He had more reaſon to dread the Conqueror, than he had ever had to fear the Court of Perſia. Thoſe who had been baniſhed from Heraclea had recourſe to Alexander for protection, and found him ſo diſpoſed to favour their intereſt, that for their ſakes he was very near dethroning Dionyſius. The thing would have infallibly happened, if Dionyſius had not avoided the blow by a thouſand politic wiles [A], among which we muſt reckon his ſtudying to obtain the good will of Cleopatra. He ſaw himſelf delivered from all his uneaſineſs

(1) Ἐξέπεσεν ἂν εἰ μὴ συνῆσε πολλῇ καὶ ἀγχινοίᾳ, καὶ τῇ τῶν ὑπηκόων εὐνοίᾳ, καὶ θεραπείᾳ Κλεοπάτρας, τοὺς ἀπειλημένους αὐτῷ πολέμους διέφυγε. Et excidiſſet ſane, niſi prudentia & ſagacitate mentis, & ſtudiis civium, & ſuis erga Cleopatram obſequiis, bella, cum minis ſibi denuntiata, effugiſſet. Photius, Biblioth. p. 709, num. 224.

(2) Juſtin, lib. 9. cap. 7. & lib. 13. cap. 6.

(3) Plutarch. in Alexand. p. 702.

[A] Alexander would have dethroned him . . . if he had not avoided the blow by a thouſand politic wiles.] One of theſe wiles was making his court to Cleopatra (1): this is the ordinary way; nothing is to be done without the fair ſex, and there are in all countries ſome women whom a man muſt engage in his intereſt, if he would ſucceed in his deſigns. But I ſhould be glad to know who this Cleopatra was: was ſhe the ſiſter of Alexander, whom Philip gave in marriage to the King of Epirus (2), and who ſeized on Macedonia upon a falſe report that Alexander had been ſlain (3)? She ſeems moſt probably to have been the perſon. Her intereſt, no doubt, was very great, both with Olympias her mother, and Alexander her brother. It was very conſiderable after that Prince's death: for we ſee Eumenes went to viſit her at Sardis, to authorize his proceedings by this Princeſs's name. Inde Sardis profectus eſt ad Cleopatram ſororem Alexandri Magni, ut ejus voce centuriones principeſque confirmaret, exiſtimaturos ibi majeſtatem regiam verti unde ſoror Alexandri ſtaret. Tanta veneratio magnitudinis Alexandri erat, ut etiam per veſtigia mulierum favor ſacrati ejus nominis quæreretur (4). i. e. "From thence "he went to Sardis to Cleopatra the ſiſter of Alex- "ander the Great, that the Officers and Chiefs might "from her mouth be confirmed in their ſubmiſſion to "his orders, not doubting but they would think the "Royal Majeſty preſent on that ſide which ſhould "be countenanced by the ſiſter of Alexander. So "great was the veneration paid to Alexander's me- "mory, that they imagined the ſacred authority of "his name might be derived even through the wo- "men

(4) Juſtin, lib. 14. cap. 1.

uneaſineſs when he heard of the death of Alexander. This news was ſo extreamly acceptable to him, that it had like to have turned his brain [B]. Perdiccas, after the death of Alexander, was no leſs inclined to favour the Exiles of Heraclea; ſo that Dionyſius found himſelf again obliged to have recourſe to a thouſand artifices, in order to lay the ſtorm which threatened him. But this perplexity was of ſhort duration, becauſe Perdiccas was ſoon killed. From thenceforward the affairs of Dionyſius always went on proſperouſly, to which his marriage with AMASTRIS greatly contributed [C]. The voluptuous Life he led made him grow ſo fat, that he hardly did any thing but ſleep; and his lethargy was ſo deep, that they had no other way to wake him than by thruſting long needles into his body; and they could ſcarce compaſs it by that method. He died at the age of fifty five years, whereof he had reigned thirty. His ſubjects greatly regretted his loſs; for he had treated them with lenity. He left his wife guardian to his children, and " men who bore any relation to him." The Hiſtorian whoſe words I have borrowed, had already ſaid that Perdiccas ſought her in marriage, with a view of becoming King (5). Caſſander, Lyſimachus, Antigonus, Ptolemy, and every one of the other Heads of parties were deſirous of having her to wife: for they thought the Macedonians would chooſe him for their Maſter whom ſhe ſhould marry; and thus each of them hoped to obtain the Empire provided he was her huſband. Antigonus kept her under a guard in Sardis; and ſhe, not loving him, and deſiring to join Ptolemy, endeavoured to make her eſcape. The Governor of the city prevented her; and at length, by Antigonus's order, he employed ſome women to put her to death. Antigonus, to avoid the infamy of ſuch a murder, commanded ſome of thoſe women to be executed, and cauſed the Princeſs to be interred in a magnificent manner (6). Thus is the public impoſed upon: Princes deſerve the name of Players better than thoſe who act on the ſtage.

(5) Ut viribus auctoritatem regiam acquireret. Juſtin. lib. 13. cap. 6. See alſo Diodorus Siculus, lib. 18. cap. 23.

(6) Taken from Diodorus Siculus, lib. 20. cap. 38, ad ann. 1 Olymp. 118.

[B] The death of Alexander was ſo extreamly acceptable to him, that the news of it had like to have turned his brain.] Here is a very ſingular effect of joy, and, if I am not deceived, more rare than that of cauſing death. Several perſons are reckoned up who have died of joy (7); but I do not remember to have read that many have loſt their ſenſes by it. This obliges me to tranſcribe Photius's own words: Εὐθυμίας μὲν ὁ Διονύσιος ἄγαλμα τὴν ἀγγελίαν ἀκούσας ἱδρυσατο· παθὼν τῇ πρώτῃ προσβολῇ τῆς φήμης ὑπὸ τῆς πολλῆς χαρᾶς, ὅσα ἂν ἡ σφοδρα λύπη θράσειε· μικρῷ γαρ περιτραπεὶς, εἰς τὸ πεσεῖν ὑπήχθη κ᾽ ἄνους ὤφθη γενόμενος. Lætitiæ ſtatuam conſecravit: & ad primum famæ adventum eo affectus eſt modo præ exuberanti gaudio quo repentina hominem conſternatio adfecerit. Nam prope erat ut vertigine correptus prolaberetur, & à ſana mente conſpiceretur alienus (8). i. e. " Dionyſius, when he received " intelligence of it, conſecrated a ſtatue to Joy; and " he was affected in the ſame manner by the firſt " tranſport which the news raiſed in him, as another " would have been by exceſſive grief: for he was ſeiz- " ed with ſuch a dizzineſs that he had like to have " fallen down, and ſeemed to be perfectly beſides " himſelf." What can reſiſt the machinal paſſions? Reaſon required that at the firſt news of the great Alexander's death, his moſt violent enemies ſhould ſeriouſly reflect on the inconſtancy of human things, not without admiring the prodigious qualities of that Prince. But our Dionyſius found himſelf ſo little in a condition to reflect gravely on the homage due on theſe occaſions to the deſtinies of Heroes, that he had almoſt loſt his reaſon; ſo violently was he hurried away by the firſt motions which were perfectly involuntary.

(7) See Valerius Maximus, lib. 9. cap. 12. & Pliny, lib. 7. cap. 53.

(8) Photius, Bibliotb. pag. 709. num. 224.

THE Hiſtory of AMASTRIS.

[C] His marriage with AMASTRIS was of great ſervice to him.] He married her after the death of his firſt wife. Amaſtris was the daughter of Oxathres, brother to the laſt Darius; ſhe was therefore couſin german to Statira, the daughter of that Darius and wife of Alexander the Great. They had been brought up together, and loved each other extremely. When Alexander married Statira, he would have Amaſtris married to one of his moſt intimate favourites. This was Craterus. He lived very well with her, till his intereſt, and perhaps his inclination alſo, after Alexander's death, induced him to marry Phila, the daughter of Antipater. Then Amaſtris, by Craterus's own conſent, married Dionyſius. She brought him a very great fortune; and as he had an opportunity of buying the furniture of Dionyſius, Tyrant of Sicily, his houſe appeared very ſplendid; and with the riches he was poſſeſſed of, being alſo ſupported by the affection of his ſubjects, he made ſome conqueſts, and ſent a powerful ſuccour to Antigonus during the war of Cyprus (9). In acknowledgment for this aſſiſtance, Antigonus married Ptolemy his nephew, Governor of the Helleſpont, to a daughter of Dionyſius by his firſt wife. Dionyſius had three children by Amaſtris, two ſons and a daughter. The daughter had the ſame name as her mother; one of the ſons was named Clearchus, and the other Oxathres. All things went well under the guardianſhip and regency of Amaſtris: for Antigonus became the protector of Heraclea and the Pupils; and when he ceaſed to be ſo, Lyſimachus took his place, and even married the widow of Dionyſius. He loved her paſſionately, till he became enamoured of Arſinoe the daughter of Ptolemy Philadelphus. This new amour occaſioned a rupture between Lyſimachus and Amaſtris; upon which that Lady governed alone in Heraclea till Clearchus, her eldeſt ſon, came of age. This Prince and Oxathres his brother were ſo wicked, that they cauſed their mother to periſh at ſea, for very ſlight reaſons. Εἰς ἔκθετον δὲ κ᾽ μιαρώτατον ἔργον ἐξέπεσον. τὴν γὰρ μητέρα μηδὲν περὶ αὐτὺς μέγα πλημμελήσασαν μηχανῇ δεινῇ καὶ κακουργίᾳ ἐπιβᾶσαι νηὸς θαλάσσῃ ἀποπνιγῆναι κατειργάσαντο. Ad nefarium & exſecrabile facinus ſunt delapſi. Matrem enim quæ nihil in eos grande peccaverat cum navi ſe commiſiſſet, inſigni commento & flagitio mari ſuffocandam curaverunt (10). Lyſimachus, who then reigned in Macedonia, felt his former paſſion revive on hearing the news of this horrid crime, and reſolved to puniſh thoſe who had committed it. He diſſembled his deſign, which he knew how to do better than any man living; Κρύψαι τὸ βυλόμενον δεινότατος ἀνθρώπων γεγονέναι λέγεται. Occultare enim quæ vellet ingenioſiſſimus mortalium fuiſſe perhibetur (11); and having expreſſed the ſame affection to Clearchus as before, he was received into Heraclea as a friend. He put to death the two unnatural Princes, who had made away with their mother, and ſeizing on all their treaſure, reſtored the inhabitants of Heraclea to their liberty. They did not keep it long: for Lyſimachus, being returned home, deſcribed the flouriſhing condition into which the prudent management of Amaſtris had put Heraclea and two other cities in ſo lively a manner, that his wife Arſinoe begged them of him as a preſent. He denied her at firſt; but as ſhe was an artful woman, and his great age made him the more eaſy to be wrought upon (12), ſhe at length obtained that valuable preſent, and ſent a Governor to Heraclea, by whom the city was very hardly treated (13). It muſt not be forgotten that Amaſtris had a ſon by Lyſimachus, named Alexander: this we learn from Polyænus (14); but the paſſage is ſo corrupted that the true reading was not found out till after ſeveral conjectures. In Caſaubon's Manuſcript it was, Ἀλέξανδρον Λυσιμαχε κ᾽ Μηριῶδ᾽ υἱὸς. That great Critic corrected Μηριῶδ᾽ by Μηκίδης. Palmerius has gueſſed more happily than he; for he thinks it ſhould be read Ἀμάσριδος. Another learned man (15), who in the main is of the ſame opinion, chooſes rather to read Ἀμήσριος or Ἀμάσριος. He ſhews (16) from a medal of our Amaſtris, that the genitive of this name was Ἀμάσριος as well as Ἀμάσριως; and he quotes Herodotus, who has written Ἀμήσριος in the genitive. He obſerves that Salmaſius (17) and Triſtan (18) are miſtaken in ſuppoſing that Amaſtris was the ſiſter of Darius.

(9) Ἀντιγόνῳ τὴν Ἀσίαν κατέχοντι λαμπρῶς συμμαχήσας. Antigono Aſiam tenenti, magnifice ſuppetias tulit. I chuſe to tranſlate it thus, rather than as it is in pag. 709 of my edition of Photius, which is that of Roan, 1653, Antigono etiam, jam magnifice Aſiam tenenti, ſuppetias tulit.

(10) Phot. pag. 712.

(11) Idem, ibid.

(12) Ἦν γὰρ δεινὴ περιπλῆξαι ἡ Ἀρσινόη, καὶ τὸ γῆρας ἥδη Λυσίμαχον εἶχεν εὐεπιχείρητον. Ingenioſa enim ad circumveniendum fuit Arſinoë, & jam ſenectus ipſa manſuefactum dederat Lyſimachum. Photius, Bibliotb. pag. 713.

(13) The whole of this is extracted from Memnon, in Photius, num. 224.

(14) Lib. 6. pag. 443. apud Ezech. Spanhemium, de Præſt. Numiſmat. pag. 466.

(15) Spanhem. ibid.

(16) Ibid. pag. 465.

(17) Ad Solinum, pag. 889.

(18) Comment. tom. 1. pag. 683.

and Regent of the State (a). It was ſhe who built the city of Amaſtris [D]. I had forgotten to ſay that our Dionyſius was aſhamed of his corpulency; for which reaſon when he gave audience, or adminiſtred juſtice, he ſat in a cheſt, ſo that no part of him was ſeen but his face (b). Some Exiles of Heraclea call him the fat hog, in one of Menander's Plays (c).

(a) Extracted from the Hiſtory of the Tyrants of Heraclea, written by Memnon. The Extracts of it are to be found in Photius, Biblioth. num. 224, pag. m. 708, &c.

(b) Ælian. Var. Hiſt. lib. 9. cap. 13; Athen. lib. 12. cap. 12. pag. 549. They alſo mention the needles which they ran into his body to wake him.

(c) Apud Athenæum, ibid.

[D]. . . . It was ſhe who built the city of Amaſtris.] This city was one of the three which Lyſimachus extolled to his wife. Stephanus Byzantinus allows indeed that this city took its name from Amaſtris, the niece of the laſt Darius, and wife of Dionyſius Tyrant of Heraclea (19); but he ſays that it was before called Cromna. He would have done better if he had ſcrupulouſly followed Strabo, who tells us (20) that Amaſtris the daughter of Oxyathres, &c. joined four towns together, and formed a City of them which was called Amaſtris. Theſe four towns were called Seſamus, Cromna, Cytorus, and Teïus; and were in Paphlagonia. It is amazing that Mela (21) ſhould mention Seſamus, Cromna, Cytorus, and Tius, without ſaying one word of Amaſtris. It cannot be anſwered that thoſe four places continued united only during the life of Queen Amaſtris, and that afterwards each of them recovered its independency, and its former name; for if this had been true, Strabo would not have aſſured us that none of them except Teius broke the union. The three others, adds he (22), continued their community, and one of them, namely Seſamus, was the fortreſs of Amaſtris. We find in Pliny ſuch another fault as that of Stephanus Byzantinus. Seſamum oppidum, ſays he (23), quod nunc Amaſtris. i. e. "The town of Seſamus, which is "now called Amaſtris." One might excuſe theſe two Authors, by ſaying that Amaſtris, with reſpect to ſome parts of it, was formerly named Cromna and Seſamus. There is a fault in the Scholiaſt of Apollonius on the 943d verſe of the 2d Book (24). It ſhould be read that Seſamus changed its name, not into that of Damatris, on account of Darius's niece, but into that of Amaſtris. This city has been famous. The Kings of Bithynia got poſſeſſion of it (25). The younger Pliny commends it highly. Amaſtrianorum, ſays he (26), civitas & elegans & ornata habet inter præcipua opera pulcherrimam eandemque longiſſimam plateam. i. e. "Amaſtris, a fine and well-"built city, has, among other principal works of "ornament, a very long and beautiful ſtreet." He begs of Trajan to defray the neceſſary expences of covering in the common ſewers which paſſed through the fine ſquare of that city; and he received a favourable anſwer. Lucian (27) teſtifies that he found there many Philoſophers, the diſciples of Timocrates. The medals of Homer which were ſtruck by the inhabitants of Amaſtris are a proof of their application to polite literature (28).

(19) Catanæus in Plin. Epiſt. 99. lib. 10. falſly charges Stephanus with having ſaid that Amaſtris was wife to Dionyſius Tyrant of Sicily.

(20) Lib. 12. pag. 375.

(21) Lib. 1. cap. 19. Father Hardouin, in Plinium, lib. 6. cap. 2. pag. 650. pretends that Mela ſays the Fortreſs of Amaſtris is called Seſamus. He does not ſay ſo.

(22) Strabo, lib. 1. cap. 19.

(23) Plinius, lib. 6. cap. 2. pag. m. 650.

(24) Baron Spanheim, de Præſt. Num. pag. 465. obſerves that Holſtenius has corrected this fault in his Notes on Apollonius.

(25) Photius, Bibl. pag. 720.

(26) Epiſt. 99. lib. 10.

(27) In Pſeudomanti.

(28) See Spanheim, de Præſt. Num. pag. 490.

DIONYSIUS of Heraclea, a debauched Philoſopher. See HERACLEOTES.

DIOSCORIDES, in Latin Dioſcoridu (a), an Iſland in the Red Sea, according to Stephanus Byzantinus. It is ſuppoſed to be now called Zocotora. If it be the ſame with that which Montagne ſpeaks of, there muſt have been very different accounts given of it: for, according to Moreri (b), the inhabitants of Zocotora have no other Religion than the Mahometan, and tolerate the exerciſe of no other, and are naturally deceitful. But, according to the Author quoted by Montagne, they are Chriſtians, and the honeſteſt people in the world, having no other fault than that of underſtanding nothing of the Religion they profeſs. This is a more common thing than one would imagine, and may agree in ſome reſpect with the principles of the Quietiſts [A], whoſe pretended devotion is incumbred with ſo many myſterious follies, that there is hardly any extravagancy, or blaſphemy, on which they do not border in ſome part or other. But let us ſee what Montagne ſays [B].

(a) So Pinedo, in Steph. Byzant. pag. 239. maintains it ſhould be called.

(b) He quotes Daviti and Linſchot.

[A] This may agree in ſome reſpect with the principles of the Quietiſts.] Thoſe wretched Doctors teach (1) that the perfection of contemplation does not conſiſt in knowing God more perfectly than others, but in not knowing him. That (2) the truly contemplative perſon forms to himſelf no idea of God at all; that he has no diſtinct knowledge of his attributes; that he does not know them by ideas, by reflections, and by reaſoning, but by an obſcure, general, and confuſed faith, without diſtinction of perfections, attributes, or perſons. That the true and perfect contemplation has for its ſole object the Eſſence of God, conſidered under the moſt abſtracted idea poſſible. That "(3) the ſoul ought to be perſuaded that creatures are too groſs to ſerve her for a maſter and "guide in the knowledge of God. Love, therefore, "muſt go before, and leave the underſtanding behind. "The ſoul muſt love God as he is in himſelf, and "not as the imagination repreſents him to her. But "if ſhe cannot know him as he is, ſhe muſt love "him without knowing him, under the obſcure vail "of faith, almoſt in the ſame manner as a child, "who has never ſeen his father, and depending on "thoſe who ſpeak of him, loves him as much as if "he had ſeen him." That all the holy Scriptures ſay of God (4) can paſs only for florid deſcriptions; and to ſtop at them, would be to ſtop at the ſuperficies, becauſe as God cannot be comprehended by the mind, ſo neither can he be made known by words; and when we ſeek to raiſe our ſelves to him by that means, we fall the lower. That (5) God has cauſed thoſe Books to be written only to give us a high opinion of his greatneſs, that if we love him in what is ſaid of him, we might love him yet more in himſelf (6). But if the ſoul ſhould love God as he is repreſented in the Scriptures, ſhe would love nothing but a phantom, or the maſk of God, and not God as he really is. That "(7) God is "nothing of what reaſon conceives, becauſe what-"ever we know may be comprehended, and God is "incomprehenſible. When we would know God, "we change the creature into God, like idolaters, "and bring down God to the creature. (8) That ſo "long as the ſoul knows any thing by images or ſimili-"tudes, of what nature ſoever they be, even infuſed "and ſupernatural, ſhe conceives not God." That the idea which St. Paul gave of God to the Athenians, who adored an unknown God (9), is falſe, in that it does not repreſent God as he is; for he can neither be comprehended nor known. That we are obliged, in ſpeaking of him, to make uſe of terms proportioned to our weakneſs: but theſe expreſſions have nothing worthy of him, and the ideas which they form in us are not the true idea of God. That it may be ſaid of God that he is juſt, beneficent, a rewarder, an avenger, almighty &c; (10) but all this is not God. Faith does not behold him in this manner, having no other object than an unknown God every where preſent. See at the end of the following Remark a paſſage of the falſe Dionyſius the Areopagite.

(1) See the Dialogues of Monſ. de la Bruyere on Quietiſm, pag. 307.

(2) Ibid. pag. 308.

(3) Molinos, Introd. a la Guide Spirituelle, Sect. 1. num. 3 & 4. quoted by la Bruyere, pag. 310.

(4) Malaval, Pratique facile, quoted by the ſame, pag. 313.

(5) Ibid. quoted by the ſame, pag. 314.

(6) Dialog. de la Bruyere, p. 314.

(7) Malaval, Pratique facile, quoted by the ſame, pag. 315.

(8) Dialog. de la Bruyere, pag. 315, 316.

(9) Ibid. pag. 321.

(10) Ibid. pag. 322.

[B] Let us ſee what Montagne ſays (11).] "A Biſhop has left in writing that at the other end of the "world there is an Iſland, which the ancient inhabi-"tants called Dioſcorides, happy in abundance of "all ſorts of trees, and fruits, and a wholeſome air: "the people whereof are Chriſtians, and have Churches "and Altars, which are adorned with Croſſes only, "without any other Images: they are great obſervers "of faſts and feſtivals, exact payers of tythes to the "Prieſts; and ſo chaſte, that none of them can know

(11) Montagne, Eſſais, liv. 1. chap. 56. pag. m. 545.

DIOSCURIAS

DIOSCURIAS, a City of Colchis, was a place of such considerable commerce, that three hundred nations, which understood not one another's language, traded thither [A]; and the Merchants of Rome maintained there a hundred and thirty Interpreters. Pliny, who asserts this on the credit of Timosthenes, observes that in his time this city was uninhabited (a). But Ammianus Marcellinus testifies that it still made a figure in his time (b). Some ascribed the founding of it to Castor and Pollux, and others to the two charioteers of those Heroes [B]. Arrian, an eye-witness, tells us it was then called Sebastopolis; and that it was a Colony of the Milesians, 2260 Stadia from Trapezus (c).

(a) Plin. lib. 6. cap. 5.

(b) Dioscurias nunc usque nota. Ammian. Marcellin. lib. 22. cap. 8, pag. m. 313.

(c) In Periplo Ponti Euxini.

DIYLLUS

" more than one woman in his whole life-time: and " besides, so contented with their condition, that " though they lie in the midst of the sea, they are " ignorant of the use of ships; and so simple, that " they understand not one word of the religion which " they so carefully observe. An incredible thing to " those who do not know that the Pagans, who were " such devout idolaters, were absolutely unacquainted " with any thing more of their Gods, than their " names and statues. An ancient Tragedy of Euri- " pides, intitled Menalippe, began thus:

" O Jove, of whom we here below
" Nothing besides the name do know (12)!"

(12) See the Remark [P] of the Article DEMOCRITUS.

What Montagne observes of the old Pagans is very true: the idea which they annexed to the word God bore no manner of resemblance to the divine nature, and was infinitely remote from it; so that the Athenians were not the only people to whom St. Paul might have said that they had raised an Altar to an unknown God (13). All their Altars deserved the same inscription, and I cannot think of the distinction which they made at Athens between the known Gods and the unknown (14), without calling to mind the distinction which is made in the Aristotelian Schools, between occult qualities and manifest qualities. There is no other difference among the Peripatetics between manifest qualities and occult qualities, than that they have a word to denote the manifest qualities, calor, frigus, humiditas, siccitas, &c. and have none to denote the qualities of the load-stone. In the same manner among the Athenians there was no other difference between the unknown Gods, and the known, than that they had a name to give to the one, as Jupiter, Mars, Mercury, Venus, &c. and knew not what to call the others. If the divine nature which they worshiped was not like the Quintessence of Aristotle (15), as destitute of a name as of an idea, it was at least as little known. The inhabitants of Marseilles made open profession of worshipping the unknown Gods, and they even found that this inspired them with a greater dread for their Deities (16). They adored them afar off; and did not approach the place where their statues were. The Priest did not approach them without trembling, and was afraid lest they should appear to him, that is, he was afraid to know them. Lucian imagines, that because in other places the Gods were worshipped under figures exposed to the eyes of the public, there was a great difference between the Massilians and other nations; for, says he, the Massilians, not knowing their Gods, dread them the more. He fancied, therefore, that they knew the Deity better in Greece and Italy than at Marseilles: but he was greatly deceived; he should only have said that they better knew under what figure the Statuaries and Painters represented it.

IGNORANCE of the Pagans with respect to their Gods.

(13) Acts xvii. 23.

(14) The entire Inscription which St. Paul had seen was, Diis Asiæ, & Europæ, & Africæ, Dijs ignotis & peregrinis, if we believe St. Jerom, Comment. in Epist. ad Titum, cap. 1.

(15) Quinta illa non nominata magis quam non intellecta natura, Cicero, Tuscul. 1. cap. 17.

(16) Apply here what Tacitus says; Arcebantur aspectu quo venerationis plus inesset. i. e. " They " were kept from " seeing in order " to raise their " veneration." Hist. lib. 4. cap. 65.

Simulacraque mœsta Deorum
Arte carent, cæsisque extant informia truncis.
Ipse situs, putrique facit jam robore pallor
Attonitos: non vulgatis sacrata figuris
Numina sic metuunt: tantum terroribus addit
Quos timeant non nosse Deos.
. . . . . .
Non illum cultu populi propiore frequentant
Sed cessere Deis. Medio cum Phœbus in axe est,
Aut cælum nox atra tenet, pavet ipse sacerdos
Accessus, dominumque timet deprendere luci (17).

(17) Lucan. Pharsal. lib. 3. ver. 412.

" Old Images of forms mis-shapen stand,
" Rude and unknowing of the Artist's hand;
" With hoary filth begrim'd each ghastly head
" Strikes the astonish'd gazer's soul with dread.
" No Gods, who long in common shapes appear'd,
" Were e're with such religious awe rever'd:
" But zealous crowds in ignorance adore,
" And still the less they know, they fear the more.
. . . . . .
" The pious worshippers approach not near,
" But shun their Gods, and kneel with distant fear:
" The Priest himself, when, or the day, or night,
" Rolling have reach'd their full meridian height,
" Refrains the gloomy path with wary feet,
" Dreading the Dæmon of the grove to meet;
" Who, terrible to fight, at that fix'd hour,
" Still treads the round about his dreary bow'r."

Mr. Rowe.

The Pagans could not retort this Animadversion on Christianity, under pretence that it is therein recommended to captivate our understanding to the obedience of Faith, that Faith is said to be better defined by ignorance than by knowledge, that we are to conduct our selves not by the way of examination, but by the way of authority, and that we are to adore mysteries without comprehending them: this retorsion, I say, would be unjust on Christianity in general, since the Protestant Communions do not reject the way of examination, and are not afraid, as the Priest of Marseilles was, lest the objects of their faith should appear manifest.

We have seen in the preceding Remark the maxims of the modern Mystics; but it must be observed here, that they pretend they are as ancient as Mystical Divinity: for they quote these words of St. Dionysius: " (18) As for you, my dear Timothy, apply your " self seriously to mystical contemplations, abandon " your senses, the operations of your mind, all sensi- " ble and intelligible objects, and generally all things " which are, and which are not; to the end that you " may raise your self, as much as man is able, and " unite your self, in an unknown and inexpressible " manner, to him who is above every being, and all " knowledge." Note, there are some Philosophers who are of opinion that what the Quietists say of the falsity of the notions under which the Deity is usually conceived, is very reasonable, and that the images which the sacred Writers have employed to make him known to us, want to be rectified. See what I shall quote from Charron, in one of the Remarks of the Article SIMONIDES (19).

(18) Molinos, Introd. à la Guide Spirit. num. 14. cited by La Bruyere, Dialogue 8. pag. 316.

(19) In the Remark [G].

[A] Three hundred nations . . . . . traded thither.] Strabo relates the same thing (1). It is true he says some Authors instead of 300 nations reckoned but 70. He attributes such a multitude of languages to the savage manner in which the people of those countries lived; for having no society with one another, each nation preserved their own language without learning that of their neighbours.

(1) Strabo, lib. 11. pag. 343.

(2) Lib. 1. cap. 19.

(3) Lib. 6. cap. 5.

(4) Cap. 15.

(5) Lib. 22. cap. 8. pag. m. 313.

(6) Lib. 11. pag. 342.

(7) Lib. 42. cap. 3.

[B] Some ascribed the founding of it to Castor and Pollux, and others to the two Charioteers of those Heroes.] The first opinion, which is that of Pomponius Mela (2), is confirmed by the name which this city bore. Yet Pliny (3), Solinus (4), Ammianus Marcellinus (5), &c. speak only of the two charioteers. Pliny calls them Amphitus and Telchius: according to Strabo (6) their names were Rheca and Amphistratus; but Ammianus Marcellinus calls them Amphitus and Cercius. In some Editions of Justin (7) they are named Frudius and Amphistratus.

DIYLLUS, a Greek Hiſtorian, born at Athens. I ſpeak of him only to obſerve a miſtake of Moreri [A].

[A] I ſpeak of him only to obſerve a miſtake of Moreri.] He affirms that Diyllus began his Hiſtory where Ephorus ended his: he is miſtaken (1); but if this circumſtance were true, he would nevertheleſs deſerve blame, ſince he has left his Reader to the trouble of ſeeking where Ephorus's Hiſtory ended. It would be in vain to look for this where one might naturally expect to find it, that is, in the place where Moreri ſpeaks of Ephorus; for he has forgotten to inform us of this particular there, as well as here. But to ſay no more of his omiſſions; let us only take notice of his fault of commiſſion. It is the more inexcuſable, for that it has been committed, as it were, under the eye of Voſſius, who ſo plainly pointed out what ought to have been ſaid. Voſſius (2) has quoted two paſſages, in one of which it is aſſerted (3) that Diyllus had compoſed a Hiſtory divided into XXVII Books, which began at the taking of the Temple of Delphi, and comprized the actions of thoſe times in Greece and Sicily. The other paſſage imports that Ephorus ended his Hiſtory at the ſiege of Perinthus, and that Diyllus began the other part of his work at that ſiege (4), and ended it at the death of King Philip, the father of Alexander. It is therefore inconteſtable that Diyllus's Hiſtory reached from the invaſion of Delphi to the death of Philip, that is, it began at the time that Philomelus, General of the Phocæans, made himſelf maſter of Delphi, towards the end of the CVth Olympiad, about the year of Rome 397. The ſiege of Perinthus coincides with the 2d year of the CIXth Olympiad, and the 410th of Rome. Moreri's quotations are falſe (5); and if he had well weighed what the paſſage of Athenæus cited by Voſſius informed him of, he would not have advanced ſo wrong a conjecture. Diyllus, according to the paſſage of Athenæus, made mention of Demetrius Phalereus: therefore he ought not to be placed, as he is by Moreri, in the year of Rome 410; ſince that Demetrius flouriſhed after the death of Alexander. Caſaubon has happily reſtored the quotation from Diyllus in Athenæus (6), and enabled Mauſſacus to rectify it in the Dictionary of Harpocration (7).

(1) The learned Reineſius has fallen into the ſame error. See the paſſage wherein he ſpeaks of Diyllus, in his Variæ Lectiones.

(2) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Græc. pag. 360.

(3) Diodor. Sicul. lib. 16. cap. 14. pag. m. 747.

(4) Δίυλλος δ' ὁ Ἀθηναῖος τῆς δυναστείας συντάξεως ἀρχὴν ποιούμενος τῆς Ἐφόρου ἰσταται τὴν τελευτὴν Diyllus verò Athenienſis alterum opus exordiatur inde ubi Ephorus Hiſtoriam finierat. Idem, ibid. cap. 77. pag. 795.

(5) He quotes Diodorus Siculus, lib. 10. and Voſſius, pag. 30.

(6) Caſaub. in Athen. lib. 4. cap. 14. pag. 281.

(7) In voce Ἀμφικτ.

☞DODWELL (HENRY), a moſt learned Engliſh Writer in the latter end of the 17th Century, was deſcended of a good family [A], and by both his parents was of Engliſh extraction. He was born in the pariſh of St. Warburgh (a) in the City of Dublin in Ireland in the latter end of October 1641 (b). In 1648 his parents, being deprived of all advantage from their eſtate in Connaught, which was poſſeſſed by the Rebels, brought him to England; and he was educated in the Free-ſchool at York from 1649 to 1654. During this interval he had the misfortune to loſe both his parents, and was reduced to ſuch neceſſity, that he had not money enough to buy pen, ink, and paper (c). But in 1654 his uncle Mr. Henry Dodwell, who was Miniſter of Hemley and Newbourn in Suffolk, ſent for him to his houſe, where he aſſiſted him in his ſtudies for two years (d). In 1656 he was admitted a Student of Trinity-College in Dublin (e), under the tuition of Dr. John Stearn, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his application to his ſtudies, his piety, and charity (f). When he had taken the Degree of Bachelor he became Fellow of the College (g); and after he had proceeded Maſter of Arts, he left his Fellowſhip in 1666, to avoid going into holy Orders [B], according to the Statutes of the College. Dr. Jeremy Taylor, Biſhop of Down and Connor, who had a particular kindneſs for him, offered to uſe his intereſt to procure him a Diſpenſation, to continue in his Fellowſhip. But he refuſed to accept of that offer, becauſe it might become an ill precedent, and of bad conſequence afterwards to the College (h). He came over to England the ſame year, and reſided at Oxford for the ſake of the public Library [C]. Thence he returned to his native country for a time, and in 1672 publiſhed a poſthumous Treatiſe of Dr. John Stearn de Obſtinatione, with Prolegomena of his own writing [D]. His next Work was Two Letters of Advice: I. For the Suſception of Holy Orders; II. For Studies Theological &c. [E]; to the ſecond and third editions of which is added A Diſcourſe concerning the

(a) Wood, Faſti Oxon. vol. 2. col. 232. 2d edit. London 1721.

(b) Life of Mr. Henry Dodwell; with an Account of his Works, and an Abridgment of them, that are publiſhed, and of ſeveral of his Manuſcripts. By Francis Brokesby, B. D. vol. 1. cap. 2. pag. 11. edit. London 1715, in 8vo.

(c) Ibid. pag. 13, 14, 15.

(d) Ibid. pag. 16, 17.

(e) Wood, ubi ſupra.

(f) Life of Dodwell, cap. 3. pag. 18.

(g) Wood, ubi ſupra.

(h) Life of Dodwell, cap. 4. pag. 23.

[A] Deſcended of a good family.] His grandfather Henry Dodwell was of the city of Oxford (1), and a Clergyman (2), and ſon of William Dodwell, ſuppoſed to be brother of Alderman Henry Dodwell, Mayor of that City in the 34th of Queen Elizabeth 1592 (3). Our Author's father William Dodwell betook himſelf to a military life, and was Corporal of the Field; which poſt was equal to that of a Captain of Horſe (4). Mr. Dodwell's mother was daughter to Sir Francis Slingſby, who was uncle to that Sir Henry Slingſby, who was put to death with Dr. Hewet for a conſpiracy againſt Cromwell the Protector in the year 1658 (5).

(1) Wood, Faſti Oxon. vol. 2. col. 232. 2d edit. London 1721.

(2) Life of Mr. Henry Dodwell. By Francis Brokeſby B. D. cap. 1. pag. 7.

(3) Wood, ubi ſupra.

(4) Life of Dodwell, pag. 8.

(5) Ibid.

[B] Left his Fellowſhip in 1666, to avoid going into holy Orders.] The reaſons why he declined that function were, the great weight of it; his natural baſhfulneſs, and the too mean thoughts, which he had of his own abilities; and becauſe he believed, that he could in one reſpect be more ſerviceable to the Church, and to Religion, whilſt he continued in a lay-ſtation, than if he took orders; "in that whilſt he "continued a laick, ſays Mr. Brokeſby (6), and as "ſuch, vindicated the ſacred Miniſtry, and became "the Champion of Religion and the Prieſthood, the "wicked adverſaries of both could have no ſhadow "to object that againſt him, which they (ridiculouſly "enough) object againſt Clergymen, when they ap"pear as Advocates for God and Religion, and aſ"ſert the dignity of their office, and the rights of the "Chriſtian Church, of which they are Paſtors, and "Miniſters of Chriſt its Head, viz. that they plead "their own cauſe, and are biaſſed by ſelf-intereſt. "Mr. Dodwell was ſenſible, that what theſe de"bauchees ſlanderouſly and impiouſly object againſt "Clergymen, (as forſooth) a piece of Prieſtcraft, there "could not be the leaſt pretence againſt himſelf, "whilſt he continued among the laity, and in that "ſtation appeared in the cauſe of Chriſt, his Church, "and his Miniſters."

(6) Ibid. pag. 24, 25.

[C] He came over to England the ſame year, and reſided at Oxford for the ſake of the public Library.] This we are informed of by Mr. Wood (7); but Mr. Brokeſby makes no mention of this circumſtance.

(7) Ubi ſupra.

[D] Publiſhed a poſthumous Treatiſe of Dr. John Stearn de Obſtinatione, with Prolegomena of his writing.] This Treatiſe was printed at Dublin 1672 in 8vo under this title: De Obſtinatione: Opus poſthumum pietatem Chriſtianam Scholaſtico more ſuadens. Mr. Dodwell in his Prolegomena Apologetica, de Uſu Dogmatum Philoſophicorum &c. vindicates Dr. Stearn, who in this Book from his high commendations of the Stoick Philoſophy, and his frequent quotations from the Heathen Writers, might ſeem to depretiate the Holy Scriptures.

[E] His next work was Two Letters of Advice &c.] Theſe Letters were printed firſt at Dublin, and afterwards twice at London. One of them was written for the ſake of a ſon of Biſhop Leſley, a brother of Mr. Charles Leſley famous for polemic writings.

the Phœnician History of Sanchoniathon, in which he is of opinion, that after the History of Moſes had been tranſlated into Greek, and ſo made common to the learned men of the neighbouring Nations, they endeavoured to rival it by pretended Antiquities of their own, that ſo they might not ſeem to come behind a people, who till then had been ſo obſcure. Dr. William Wotton thinks * that this notion of Mr. Dodwell may help to give a very probable account of thoſe vaſt Antiquities of the Egyptians pretended to by Manetho. In 1673 he wrote a Preface, without his name, to An Introduction to a Devout Life by Francis De Sales, printed at Dublin. In 1674 he came over again to England, and ſettled at London, and ſoon became acquainted with the learned men there, eſpecially Dr. William Lloyd, ſucceſſively Biſhop of St. Aſaph and Worceſter, whom he attended to Holland, when that Divine was appointed Chaplain to the Princeſs of Orange (i). In 1675 and the following years he publiſhed ſeveral works [F]; and particularly his Diſſertationes Cyprianicæ [G]. His Diſſertatio de Ripa Striga ad Lactantium de

* Reflections upon antient and modern Learning, cap. 9. pag. 109. edit. London 1694, in 8vo.

(i) Ibid. cap. 7. pag. 38, 39.

[F] In 1675 and the following years he publiſhed ſeveral works.] In 1675 he publiſhed in 8vo Conſiderations of preſent Concern, how far the Romaniſts may be truſted by Princes of another Communion. This was written on occaſion of the Controverſial Letters and the Iriſh Remonſtrance (8). The chief adverſary our Author had in reſpect to this Treatiſe was Father Walſh, whom he wrote againſt with all imaginable candour, in hopes that as he was caſt out of communion with the Church of Rome, he might be induced to embrace that of the Church of England. Mr. Dodwell told Mr. Brokeſby (9), that all the reaſon Father Walſh gave why he would not embrace the Communion of the Church of England, but choſe to be reconciled to that of Rome, was, becauſe of the latter's putting up Prayers for the Dead; "which, ſaid he, "can do me no harm, and they may do me good." In 1676 Mr. Dodwell publiſh'd at London in 8vo, Two ſhort Diſcourſes againſt the Romaniſts: 1. An Account of the fundamental Principles of Popery, and of the Inſufficiency of the Proofs, which they have for it. 2. An Anſwer to ſix Queries propoſed to a Gentlewoman of the Church of England by an Emiſſary of the Church of Rome. This was reprinted at London in 1688 in 4to with A new Preface relating to the Biſhop of Meaux, and other modern Complainers of Miſrepreſentation. In 1679 he publiſhed at London in 4to a Tract intitled, Separation of Churches from Epiſcopal Government, as practiſed by the preſent Nonconformiſts, proved ſchiſmatical from ſuch principles as are leaſt controverted, and do withal moſt popularly explain the ſinfulneſs and miſchief of ſchiſm. In the latter end of the Introduction to this Book he mentions a deſign of his to write an Hiſtory of the firſt Schiſms in the Chriſtian Church, as a ſecond part of this work, which he ſtiles the Hiſtorical Part, as the former the Rational. In the latter he intended to ſhew, that "by the notion of "ſchiſm, which was condemned for ſuch in the firſt "and pureſt Ages, our ſeparating brethren cannot be "excuſed from guilt; and alſo, that the ſeveral prin-"ciples, on which he grounds it, were alſo owned "by, and are certainly agreeable to the ſenſe of the "Apoſtles." This Tract he began, writing it in Latin, that it might be beneficial to foreigners as well as to our own nation. But he never finiſhed it, being diverted by other undertakings (10). His Separation of Churches being animadverted upon by Mr. Richard Baxter in his True and only Way of Concord of all the Chriſtian Churches, printed at London 1680 in 8vo, our Author publiſhed at London 1681 in 8vo, A Reply to Mr. Baxter's pretended Confutation of a Book intitled, Separation of Churches from Epiſcopal Government &c. To this Reply are added Three Letters written to Mr. Baxter in the year 1673 concerning the Poſſibility of Diſcipline under a Dioceſan Government. In 1683 Mr. Dodwell publiſhed at London in 8vo, A Diſcourſe concerning the one Altar, and the one Prieſthood, inſiſted on by the ancients in their diſputes againſt ſchiſm. Dr. Grabe valued this Treatiſe ſo highly, that he had thoughts of tranſlating it into Latin for the uſe of foreign Churches (11).

(8) Life of Dodwell, pag. 40.

(9) Ibid. pag. 42, 43.

(10) Ibid. pag. 58.

(11) Ibid. pag. 83.

[G] His Diſſertationes Cyprianicæ.] There are two Editions of them, one in folio at the end of St. Cyprian's Works publiſhed by Dr. John Fell Biſhop of Oxford in 1682; and the other printed at Oxford 1684 in 8vo. He wrote theſe Diſſertations at the deſire of Biſhop Fell, and his Epiſtle Dedicatory to that Prelate is dated the 7th of April 1682 from his retirement at St. Aſaph. The firſt Diſſertation is concerning the name Clerus; in which he endeavours to ſhew, that it was not given in St. Cyprian's, Tertullian's, or the Apoſtles time, to the Laity, but that the Clergy had a ſuperiority over, and exerciſed diſcipline upon them. The ſecond is on the words in the IXth Epiſtle, Me in iiſdem literis & Scripturæ & Senſus, & Chartæ ipſæ moverunt; and in it he ſhews how the true Literæ formatæ might be diſtinguiſhed from the counterfeits, which the Chriſtians then made uſe of. The third relates to a practice condemned by St. Cyprian and a Synod, of women cum Viris iiſque Clericis concumbentium, and yet, as they profeſſed, keeping themſelves chaſte. The fourth is deſigned to prove the Continuance of divine Viſions and Prophecies in the Church till the time of St. Cyprian. The fifth is concerning the reciting of names out of the Diptychs of the Church in the time of the Euchariſt. The ſixth is on thoſe words of St. Cyprian, Epiſt. XXIX Cum Preſbyteris doctoribus . . . doctorem audientium conſtituamus, to ſhew who theſe Preſbyteri Doctores were. The ſeventh is on the XXXIIId Epiſtle, occaſioned by the Lapſi, procuring Reſtitution to Communion, not in the name of the Preſbyters or the Laity, but of the Martyrs, and this without the conſent of the Biſhops, (as the Donatiſts did afterwards;) by which the Martyrs challenged the right of being Principles of Unity, which St. Cyprian challenges as the prerogative of the Biſhop. The eighth is concerning the Nature of Prerogatives, and how the ſuffrage of Martyrs was in that Age by ſome ſo eſteemed, that what they granted could not be oppoſed even by the Biſhop himſelf; and likewiſe concerning the Privilegium indulgentiæ, according to the Roman Law. The ninth, after declaring what Auctoritas is in the Roman Law, ſhews, that Epiſcopal Authority belonged not to Preſbyters during the vacancy of the Biſhop's See. The tenth is deſigned to prove, that the power of ordaining not only Preſbyters and Deacons, but even Lectores, reſided in the Biſhop, Preſbyters having no right to ordain; and that Biſhops were a College, and a diſtinct Order. The eleventh ſhews how ſmall the number of Martyrs was in the firſt perſecutions, and how later Martyrologies, eſpecially of the Romaniſts, have multiplied them without the authority of ancient monuments. He inſiſts particularly upon the teſtimony of Origen againſt Celſus L. III. where he aſſerts, that there were ὀλίγοι . . . . κ) σφόδρα ἀναριθμητοι few, and thoſe eaſily numbered, who ſuffered death in the cauſe of the Chriſtian Religion. He ſhews how without authority and unſkilfully the compilers of the Martyrologies have enlarged the number of Martyrs under Decius; how falſely Adrian is made a perſecutor; how many of the perſecutions were only local and partial, as that under Trajan, and thoſe under him from the rage of the populace, ſometimes excited by the Jews, the bitter enemies of the Chriſtians; how ſhort many perſecutions were, the perſecutors themſelves reigning but a little time, as Decius; and ſome of them beginning their perſecutions late, as Valerian; what Edicts ſome Emperors made in favour of Chriſtians, which reſtrained the Governors of Provinces; and that if cities, from their privileges, uſed greater liberty againſt the Chriſtians, yet their power extended not to the lives of perſons: how ſome Emperors, as Commodus, Alexander Severus, Philip, &c. were favourable to Chriſtians, and others not enemies to them: how that many of the Edicts of perſecutors reſpected only ſuch as were converted from Heatheniſm or thoſe who converted them, (beſides thoſe, who offered themſelves,) and not ſuch as were born of Chride Morte Perſecutorum was printed at the end of Lactantius's Works with Commentaries by Thomas Spark M. A. at Oxford 1684 in 8vo. In 1686 his Tract de Jure Laicorum Sacerdotali appeared [H]. In 1688 he publiſhed the poſthumous works of Dr. John Pearſon, Biſhop of Cheſter [I]; and the year following his own Diſſertations upon Irenæus [K]. April the 2d 1688 he was elected by the Univerſity of Oxford Camden's Profeſſor of Hiſtory, in his abſence, and without his knowledge; and May the 21ſt he was incorporated Maſter of Arts in that Univerſity (k). But in November 1691 he was deprived of his Profeſſorſhip for refuſing to take the Oaths of Allegiance to King William and Queen Mary [L]; and ſeparated from the Church of England, after their Majeſties had nominated Biſhops to fill the Sees of thoſe, who would not acknowledge their authority, he conſidering the new Biſhops, and thoſe who joined with them, as Schiſmatics [M]. He continued for ſome time at Oxford after he loſt his Profeſſorſhip; ſtian parents; Maximinus's only reaching Biſhops, or, at moſt, them and Preſbyters, and even Decius's chiefly being directed againſt the Paſtors, which was likewiſe the caſe of the two firſt years of the perſecution under Dioclefian, till he reſigned the Empire. Many perſecutions were proſecuted more by tortures, impriſonments, and baniſhments, than by capital puniſhments. The firſt year of Valerian's perſecution was by baniſhment, and ſending to the mines; and when after he proceeded to put Chriſtians to death, and among others St. Cyprian and Xyſtus Biſhop of Rome, immediately wars aroſe, which diverted him from the violence of his perſecution. Some Governors of Provinces were leſs ſevere than others in executing ſevere Edicts. Mr. Dodwell deſcribes the tenth perſecution moſt largely in the ſeveral ſteps of it; and ſhews, that few ſuffered in the weſtern part of the Empire, which fell to the ſhare of Conſtantius Chlorus, and after his death to Conſtantine. He obſerves in the concluſion, that the fewneſs of thoſe, who ſuffered death for the Chriſtian Religion, (that is, few, if compared with the legendary Writers) detracts nothing from the honour of it, conſidering that the unparallel'd magnanimity of Chriſtians in their chearful ſuffering tortures and death, and the joy which they expreſſed in having the crown of martyrdom, abated the fury of their perſecutors, when they ſaw how much all people pitied them, and abhorred the cruelty of thoſe, who put them to death, and withal obſerved, that Chriſtians were not deterred hereby; that multitudes offered themſelves as ſacrifices in this cauſe; and that ſuch as perſiſted in their fidelity to Chriſt were eſteemed as glorious conquerors. He wrote this Diſſertation at the deſire of Biſhop Lloyd (12). It was attacked by Father Thierry Ruinart in his General Preface to his Acta primorum Martyrum ſincera & ſelecta ex libris tum editis, tum manuſcriptis collecta, eruta, & emendata, notiſque & obſervationibus illuſtrata, printed at Paris 1689 in 4to. Biſhop Burnet in a Letter to our Author (13) has the following paſſage relating to this ſubject. "In one "of theſe [Diſſertations on St. Cyprian] you labour-"ed to leſſen one of the glorious characters of the "Chriſtian Religion from the number of the Mar-"tyrs; and in the next you began the account of "the patience and fortitude of the Martyrs with "the wilfulneſs of the firſt Chriſtians, and their "deſire of fame and vain-glory. It is true, you af-"ter that give better reaſons for it: but would a "Vaninus, a Hobbes, and a Spinoſa, ſay any thing "more derogatory to that glory of our moſt holy "Faith, than you wrote in thoſe two Diſſertations? "And tho' what you wrote in the firſt of theſe, was "anſwered to the ſatisfaction of many, you neither "vindicated yourſelf, nor acknowledged your miſ-"takes, which in a matter of that great importance "you ought to have done." In anſwer to this Mr. Dodwell replies thus (14): My Diſcourſes of Martyrs and Martyrdoms were written by me in a proſpect of the ſucceſſion of King James II. I am ſure, with a deſign of advancing, not of undervaluing martyrdom.... Nor am I conſcious of any thing produced by any of my learned adverſaries ſo unexceptionable and expreſs in favour of them, as the teſtimony of Origen is for me. Yet I could ſay more, if the bookſelling trade had been open, and if I had not a great veneration for the goodneſs and piety of ſeveral of the Fathers, who were notwithſtanding of too eaſy belief of matter of fact not ſufficiently atteſted. Mr. Brokeſby tells us (15), that Mr. Dodwell often mentioned Ruinart as a learned and candid adverſary; and ſaid, that he could not anſwer him, becauſe during the war with France he could not procure his Book. But at the ſame time he acknowledged, that there was another thing, which diſcouraged him from reſuming that ſubject; which was, that he ſhould be obliged to expoſe the weakneſs and credulity of ſome ancient Writers, which might be made uſe of by men of little Religion to bad purpoſes. In his twelfth Diſſertation he treats of the ſignal Fortitude of the Martyrs. In the thirteenth he ſhews, that they were encouraged to ſuffer with this magnanimity from the belief, that Martyrdom was a ſecond Baptiſm, and procured the ſame benefits; which he obſerves to have been a received opinion in the firſt Ages of the Church, and founded upon the Scriptures. At the end of theſe Diſſertations, Mr. Dodwell has ſubjoined ſome Chronological Tables, chiefly the Canons of Ptolomy collated with manuſcripts, ſome Faſti out of manuſcripts, a Fragment of Theon, and another of the Emperor Heraclius, both on Ptolomy's Canons.

(k) Wood, col. 831, 232.

(12) Ibid. pag. 102.

(13) See Four Letters, which paſſed between the Right Reverend Biſhop of Sarum, and Mr. Henry Dodwell, printed from the Originals, edit. London 1713, in 12mo. Theſe Letters were publiſhed by Mr. Nelſon.

(14) Ibid.

(15) Life of Dodwell, pag. 103.

[H] In 1686 his Tract de Jure Laicorum Sacerdotali appeared.] It was printed at London in 8vo. It was written upon the following occaſion. Mr. William Baxter had tranſlated Hugo Grotius's Diſſertation de Cœnæ adminiſtratione ubi paſtores non ſunt, and publiſhed it under the title of Anti-Dodwelliſm; being two curious Tracts formerly written by Hugo Grotius, concerning a ſolution of theſe two curious Queſtions: 1. Whether the Euchariſt may be adminiſtred in the abſence of, or want of Paſtors, &c.

[I] In 1688 he publiſhed the poſthumous Works of Dr. John Pearſon Biſhop of Cheſter.] He added to them a Diſſertation of his own concerning the Succeſſion of the Biſhops of Rome, and publiſh'd them under the following title: Joannis Pearſonii S. T. P. Ceſtrienſis nuper Epiſcopi Opera poſthuma: edenda curavit H. Dodwellus, cujus etiam acceſſit de ſucceſſione primorum Romæ Epiſcoporum uſque ad annales Cl. Ceſtrienſis Cyprianicos Diſſertatio ſingularis. Oxford 1688 in 4to.

[K] His Diſſertations upon Irenæus.] They were printed at Oxford 1689 in 8vo under the title of Diſſertationes in Irenæum. Theſe Diſſertations are only Prolegomena to what he farther deſigned, which was to ſhew what the ancient hereſies were, which diſturbed the primitive Church, and what the foundation of them was. He has ſubjoined to them a Fragment of Philippus Sidetes, de Catechiſtarum Alexandrinorum Succeſſione, with his Notes upon it.

[L] In November 1691 he was deprived of his Profeſſorſhip for refuſing to take the oaths of Allegiance to King William and Queen Mary.] He was firſt forbidden to read his Lectures; the laſt, which he was permitted to read, being that of November 6th 1691. After that he was deprived. Tho' he was told by learned Council, that the Act ſeemed not to reach his caſe, becauſe he was Prælector, not Profeſſor; yet he being always ſtudious of peace, and averſe to contention even in defence of a juſt right, choſe rather to acquieſce in his deprivation (16). He gives us his own ſenſe of it in his Appendix to his Lectures. Poſſem fortaſſe moleſtè ferre, quod culpâ meâ nullâ amotus fuerim; ſed dum cauſam expendo, contra mihi potius gratulor, habuiſſe me quo fuerim in tali cauſâ pellendus.

(16) Ibid. pag. 220.

[M] Separated from the Church of England.... conſidering the new Biſhops, and thoſe, who joined with them, as Schiſmatics.] Upon this occaſion he publiſhed A Cautionary Diſcourſe of Schiſm, with a particular regard to the Caſe of Biſhops, who are ſuſpended for refuſing to take the new oath; printed at London in 8vo, and his Vindication of the Deprived Biſhops, in anſwer ſhip; and then retired to Cookham, a village near Maidenhead in Berkſhire, in the road between London and Oxford. While he reſided here, he became acquainted with Mr. Francis Cherry of Shotteſbrooke, a Gentleman of great learning and piety, for the ſake of whoſe converſation he removed to Shotteſbrooke; and having loſt his nephews, whom he deſigned for his heirs, on the 24th of June 1694 married the daughter of a perſon, in whoſe houſe he had lodged at Cookham, and by her had ten children (l). He continued at Shotteſbrooke the reſt of his life, except when he went to London and Oxford to conſult books, and ſee his friends. But to return to an account of his works; in 1692 he publiſhed his Lectures read at Oxford [N]; and in 1694 wrote a Preface to the Engliſh Tranſlation of Degory Whear's Method of reading Hiſtory. In 1698 he publiſhed his Annales Velleiani, Quintilianei, Statianei [O]; and in 1701 his Treatiſe de veteribus Græcorum Romanorumque Cyclis [P]. The ſame year his Letter to a Friend was inſerted in the ſecond edition of the Canon of the New Teſtament vindicated, by John Richardſon, B. D. in which Letter Mr. Dodwell ſhews how far he was from Mr. Toland's ſentiments in his Amyntor, though that Writer had made uſe of ſeveral paſſages out of our Author to ſupport his own opinions. In 1702 he publiſhed his Annales Thycididei & Xenophontei [Q], and An Apology for Tully's Philoſophical Writings, prefixed to Mr. Samuel Parker's Tranſlation of Tully de Finibus. About the ſame time he wrote a Letter concerning the Immortality of the Soul againſt Mr. Henry Layton's Hypotheſis. In 1703 his Diſſertations upon the leſſer Greek Geographers were printed at Oxford with Dr. John Hudſon's edition of them. The year following his Chronology upon Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus was publiſhed by Dr. Hudſon in his edition of that Hiſtorian at Oxford 1704 in fol.; and the ſame year his Diſſertations upon the Age of Phalaris and Pythagoras appeared [R]. In the year 1705 obſerving that the deprived Biſhops were reduced to a ſmall

(l) Life of Dodwell, pag. 304, 305, 306.

† It is intitled, The Unreaſonableneſs of a Separation from the New Biſhops: or a Treatiſe out of Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, ſhewing, that although a Biſhop was unjuſtly deprived, neither he nor the Church ever made a ſeparation, if the Succeſſor was not a Heretick. Tranſlated out of an antient Greek Manuſcript in the Publick Library at Oxford by Humfrey Hody, B. D. Fellow of Wadham College. London 1691 in 4to.

ſwer to Dr. Hody, who had tranſlated and publiſhed a Greek Manuſcript, found among the Baroccian manuſcripts in the Bodleian Library †; but he writing an Anſwer to Mr. Dodwell, the latter publiſhed a Defence of the Vindication of the deprived Biſhops. He wrote likewiſe a Tract, which was deſigned as a Preface to the Defence, but being then ſuppreſſed, was afterwards printed with this title; The Doctrine of the Church of England concerning the Independency of the Clergy on the Lay-Power as to thoſe Rights of theirs, which are purely ſpiritual, reconciled with our Oath of Supremacy, and the Lay-Deprivations of the Popiſh Biſhops in the beginning of the Reformation; a Letter to Dr. Tillotſon about Schiſm; a Diſcourſe againſt Marriages in different Communions, annexed to Mr. Leſley's Diſcourſe on the ſame ſubject; a Latin Diſcourſe, intitled, De Nupero Schiſmate Anglicano Paræneſis ad exteros, tam Reformatos, quam etiam Pontificios, quâ jura Epiſcoporum vetera, eorundemque Magiſtratu ſæculari independentia omnibus aſſerenda omnibus commendetur. London 1704 in 4°; and a Treatiſe, intitled, Occaſional Communion fundamentally deſtructive of the Diſcipline of the Primitive Catholick Church, and contrary to the Doctrine of the lateſt Scriptures concerning Church Communion: London, 1705.

[N] In 1692 he publiſhed his Lectures read at Oxford.] They were printed at Oxford 1692 in 8°, under the title of Prælectiones Academicæ in Scholâ Rhetorices Camdenianæ.

[O] In 1698 he publiſhed his Annales Velleiani, &c.] They were printed at Oxford 1698 in 8vo under this title: Annales Velleiani, Quintilianei, Statianei, ſeu Vitæ P. Vellei Paterculi, M. Fabii Quintiliani, P. Papiniani Statii, obiterque Juvenalis pro temporum ordine diſpoſitæ.

[P] His Treatiſe de veteribus Græcorum Romanorumque Cyclis.] It was printed at Oxford 1701 in 4to. Dr. Edmund Halley, Savilian Profeſſor of Geometry in that Univerſity, wrote an Account of this Book in a Letter to Robert Nelſon Eſq; printed at London 1715 in 8vo, and ſubjoined to Mr. Brokeſby's Life of Mr. Dodwell; in which Letter he ſtiles that Book an excellent one, and the moſt elaborate of all our Author's pieces, and which ſeems to have been the work of the greateſt part of his Life. It is divided into ten Diſſertations; in the firſt of which he aſſerts the civil uſe of the Cycle invented by Meto; in the ſecond he ſhews the ſame with reſpect to the Cycle of Calippus; in the third he treats of the Athenian Cycles, which were more ancient than Meto; in the fourth of the civil Cycles of the Olympiads; in the fifth of the Delphic and Bœotian Cycles; in the ſixth of the Iſthmian Games, and the Corinthian and Sicilian Cycles; in the ſeventh of the Nemean and Argolican Cycles; in the eighth of the Lacedæmonian Cycles, and the Magiſtrates mentioned by Xenophon to the end of the Peloponneſian War; in the ninth of the Macedonian, and therein occaſionally of the Jewiſh Cycles; and in the tenth of the ancient Cycles of the Romans.

[Q] His Annales Thycididei & Xenophontei.] They were printed at Oxford in 4to 1702 under this title: Annales Thycididei & Xenophontei. Præmittitur apparatus cum Vitæ Thycididis Synopſi Chronologicâ.

[R] His Diſſertations upon the Age of Phalaris and Pythagoras.] They were printed at Oxford 1704 in 8vo with this title; Exercitationes duæ: prima de Ætate Phalaridis: ſecunda de Ætate Pythagoræ Philoſophi. This was written on occaſion of the diſpute between Dr. Bentley and Mr. Boyle. In the Preface Mr. Dodwell declares, that he cannot be entirely of the Doctor's opinion, that Atoſſa the daughter of Cyrus was the firſt inventor of writing Epiſtles; for which opinion the Doctor cites Hellanicus, who is mentioned by Tatian and Clemens Alexandrinus. Mr. Dodwell refutes this teſtimony; and obſerves, that there are ſufficient proofs of Epiſtles before Atoſſa's days. For tho' that of Bellerophon be allowed to be Homer's fiction, yet from thence it is evident, that Epiſtles were uſed in Homer's time, ſince he adapted himſelf to the cuſtoms uſed in his own days. Now Homer himſelf lived before Atoſſa's and even her father's time, viz. in the time of the Cimmerian's irruption under Cyaxares. Harpagus's Letter to Cyrus is mentioned as a thing not ſtrange, tho' the ſending it in an hare's belly is. Tho' the Epiſtles of Philoſophers in Laertius may be juſtly queſtioned; yet thoſe in the holy Scriptures cannot; ſuch as Jezabel's, 1 Kings xxi. the King of Syria's, 2 Kings v. Jehu's, 2 Kings x. and many others. The invention of Epiſtles is not to be expected from Hiſtory, ſince the Art of Writing was of ſo great uſe in men's private affairs; and conſequently firſt chiefly uſed therein; and then afterwards in other things written for pleaſure, as Poetry and Hiſtory. It is no wonder therefore, that we do not find in Hiſtory who firſt invented Epiſtles; neither does the teſtimony of Pliny ſignify any thing, which only relates to the matter, on which Epiſtles firſt were written. The invention aſcribed to Atoſſa was not that of writing Epiſtles, but that of joining the Tables, on which they were written, with ſuch exactneſs, that they might be more conveniently carried; which is expreſſed by the word συνάσσειν, an Art unknown to Homer. But ſuppoſing Atoſſa did invent Epiſtles, this hinders not but that Phalaris might write Epiſtles, ſince he was contemporary with her, who, after ſhe had had two former huſbands, and was probably near thirty years old then, was married to Darius ſmall number, he wrote his Caſe in View conſidered, to ſhew that in caſe thoſe Biſhops ſhould leave all their ſees vacant either by death or reſignation, thoſe who had ſeparated from the Church of England would not then be obliged to keep up the ſeparation. And accordingly upon the death of Dr. Lloyd, the deprived Biſhop of Norwich, on January the 1ſt $17\frac{10}{11}$, Mr. Dodwell with ſome other friends wrote to Dr. Ken, the deprived Biſhop of Bath and Wells, to know whether he challenged their ſubjection. The Biſhop returned his anſwer, that he did not, and ſignified his deſire, that the breach might be cloſed by their joining with the Biſhops then poſſeſſed of the Sees, giving his reaſons for it. Upon this Mr. Dodwell with other friends joined in communion with them [S], though others did not. Our Author being exceedingly concerned for this wrote his Caſe in View, now in Fact, printed at London 1711 in 8vo. Beſides the books abovementioned, he wrote ſeveral others, which we ſhall give an account of in the note [T]. He died at Shotteſbrooke June the 7th 1711, aged ſeventy years, and was interred in the Chancel of the Church there, where a monument was erected to him by his widow. He was very communicative and ready to aſſiſt others in the advancement of learning, and a man of exemplary charity, humility, piety, and zeal, and of a very aſcetic life (m). He was of a ſmall, but well proportioned ſtature, of a ſanguine and fair complexion, of a grave, ſerious, (m) Ibid. pag. 513, & ſeqq.

Darius Hyſtaſpes, in whoſe time there were many Greek and Aſian Colonies planted in Sicily; and hence there was an eaſy communication of uſeful inventions to each other. In the firſt Diſſertation he concludes, that Phalaris came to Agrigentum Olympiad LVIII. 1. obtained the Tyranny ſixteen years after, Olympiad LXIII. 1. and was killed between Olympiad LXIX. 2, and Olympiad LXX. 1. In the ſecond Diſſertation he determines, that Pythagoras was born in the latter end of Olympiad LII $\frac{1}{2}$; came to Italy Olympiad LXV $\frac{1}{2}$; and died Olympiad LXXXII. 1.

[S] Mr. Dodwell . . . . joined in communion with them.] On the 10th of February $17\frac{10}{11}$ he wrote a Letter to Dr. Burnet Biſhop of Sarum (17); which began thus:

(17) See Four Letters, which paſſed between the Right Reverend the Lord Biſhop of Sarum, and Mr. Henry Dodwell, printed from the Originals.

" Right Reverend Father in God,
" I am glad, that the extinction of the late ſchiſm " has inabled me to own your ſpiritual titles; but " ſhall be more ſo, if a like Providence may put in " my power to acknowledge your ſecular honours " alſo." At the end of this Letter he deſires the Biſhop to confirm his children, or to give him leave to get them confirmed by ſome other of his venerable brethren; and concludes thus: " I value this ordi- " nance more than the looſe Latitudinarian opinions " of this Age would oblige me to do, as taking it " for the true Baptiſm of the Spirit derived from the " Apoſtles. This will make me to value the more the " favour hereby conferred on my children, if they " may receive this office from you, which may en- " title them to ſo great benefits as are the conſe- " quents of the inhabitation of the Spirit. In the " mean time I beg another boon of your prayers and " epiſcopal benediction upon me and mine. I am,
" Your Fatherhood's unworthy Communicant
" Henry Dodwell."

The Biſhop in his Anſwer gives an account of the grounds, which had led him to uſe any hard words with relation to Mr. Dodwell, and particularly objects to his two Diſſertations on St. Cyprian relating to the Martyrs among the primitive Chriſtians. In your Diſſertations, continues he, upon Irenæus, to ſupport a ſingular conceit of your own; you ſhook the authority of the Canon of the Scriptures, and . . . neither vindicated your ſelf, nor retracted what you had wrote. And I have good reaſon to believe, that the long quotation from your Book fortified the infidelity of the Age, with relation to the Canon of the Scripture more than any one thing I know. In your Latin Apology, you have ſtruck the authority of Biſhops out of the Scriptures, and put it upon a conceit of your own; and you make that order to have begun about twenty years ſooner than Blondel had fixed it; which will make it paſs but for a human conſtitution among all thoſe, who make the Scriptures the only rule of their faith. After ſome other animadverſions on Mr. Dodwell's writings the Biſhop proceeds thus: " You are a learned man, and your life has been, not " only without blemiſh, but exemplary. But you " don't ſeem to remember, or enough to conſider the " woe our Saviour has denounced againſt thoſe by " whom ſcandals come; and according to the true " notion of ſcandal, I know no man has laid more " in the way of the little ones, or weaker Chriſtians, " than you have done. . . . I do aſſure you, I would " rather wiſh that I could neither read nor write than " to have read or writ to ſuch purpoſes, as you have " been purſuing now above thirty years. You ſeem " to love novelties and paradoxes, and to employ your " learning to ſupport them. . . . . I do aſſure you, I " have a juſt value for many valuable things that I " know to be in you, and do heartily lament every " thing that is otherwiſe."

[T] He wrote ſeveral others, which we ſhall give an account of in the Note.] I. A Treatiſe of the Lawfulneſs of Inſtrumental Muſick in holy offices. London 1698. A ſecond Edition of it was printed in 1700. II. An Epiſtolary Diſcourſe proceeding from the Scriptures and the firſt Fathers, that the ſoul is a principle naturally mortal; but immortalized actually by the pleaſure of God, to puniſhment or to reward, by its union with the divine Baptiſmal Spirit. Wherein is proved that none have power of giving this divine immortalizing Spirit ſince the Apoſtles, but only the Biſhops. By Henry Dodwell M. A. London 1706 in 8vo. Our Author having in his Diſcourſe concerning the Obligations to marry within the true communion, and in his ſecond Letter of Advice for Theological Studies, repreſented the Immortality of the Soul as the effect of the divine Spirit reſtrained to thoſe within the Covenant; a Gentleman unknown to Mr. Dodwell, wrote two Letters to a friend of his, in which he miſtook Mr. Dodwell, as if he had ſuppoſed the actual mortality of all, who are out of the Peculium. This gave occaſion to the writing of this Diſcourſe. Biſhop Burnet having in a Letter to Mr. Dodwell (18) made ſome animadverſions upon our Author's doctrine in this book, Mr. Dodwell in his Reply (19) has the following paſſage: " The Atheiſts themſelves quickly gave over " their eagerneſs in buying my Book, as my Book- " ſeller himſelf informed me, when they found, upon " actual peruſal of it, how little it anſwered their ex- " pectation." It was immediately attacked in a Book intitled, A Charge of Hereſy maintained againſt Mr. Dodwell's late Epiſtolary Diſcourſe, concerning the Mortality of the Soul. By way of addreſs to the Clergy of the Church of England. Laying open his oppoſition to the received creeds, and his falſification of all ſacred and profane antiquity. By Edmund Chiſhull, B. D. late Chaplain at Smyrna, and Fellow of C. C. C. Oxon. London 1706 in 8vo. In this Book Mr. Chiſhull gives the character of Mr. Dodwell in the following words: " As for that painful layman, who " has engaged the Church in this diſpute, his mode- " ſty will, I hope, excuſe me, if I have expreſt my " ſelf ſomewhat freely concerning the ſize of his " judgment and underſtanding, and if I rank him " only in that lower claſs of learned men, who are " indeed fitted for the collecting of materials, but are " unqualified to judge rightly of, and to reaſon upon " what they ſhall collect. Yet 'tis not becauſe I " would detract from any degree of reputation he may " claim: 'tis becauſe I would leſſen that authority, " under which he propagates his errors, and becauſe " I think mankind to have a fairer right to truth, than " he to that character, in which he glories, by a falſe

(18) Four Letters &c. ubi ſupra.

(19) Ibid.

rious, but a comely pleaſant countenance, and a piercing eye; free and open in his diſcourſe, and facetious upon all proper occaſions (n). He generally travelled on foot, and read as he walked, always carrying with him in his journies books fitted for his pockets (o). His ſtyle is very obſcure and embarraſſed; and he uſed to complain to his friends, that he was not able to comprize his thoughts in a few words; for imagining that what he concluded was not firm unleſs he laid a large foundation, this occaſioned frequent digreſſions in his writings (p). He had a great correſpondence with the learned men abroad, who mention him with great reſpect; and particularly Cardinal Noris, Pagi, Magliabecchi, and Grævius.

(n) Mr. Hearne in his Edition of Leland, vol. 5. pag. 112.

(o) Life of Dodwell, pag. 523, 524.

(p) Ibid. pag. 535.

" and miſtaken learning. But if it ſhall be the for" tune of this diſcourſe to give that idea of our ad-
" verſary's abilities, which I have long ſince enter" tained from the ſtrain of all his writings, nothing
" will hereafter be believed, becauſe produced by Mr.
" Dodwell; but on the contrary, it will be queſtion-
" ed for that very reaſon, and will be ſuſpected of " heterodoxy, novelty, and ſingularity, till it has " been ſubmitted to the common teſt of truth, and " warranted by the impartial verdict of reaſon and
" religion." There were publiſhed likewiſe againſt our Author A Letter to Mr. Dodwell, wherein all the arguments in his Epiſtolary Diſcourſe againſt the Immortality of the Soul are particularly anſwered, and the judgment of the Fathers concerning that matter truly repreſented. By Samuel Clarke, M. A. London 1706 in 8vo; and A Philoſophical Diſcourſe concerning the natural Immortality of the Soul; wherein the great queſtion of the Soul's Immortality is endeavoured to be rightly ſtated and fully cleared. Occaſioned by Mr. Dodwell's late Epiſtolary Diſcourſe. In two parts. By John Norris, M. A. Rector of Bemerton. London 1708 in 8vo. Mr. Dodwell wrote in vindication of himſelf, III. A Preliminary Defence of the Epiſtolary Diſcourſe concerning the Diſtinction between Soul and Spirit, in two parts: 1. Againſt the charge of favouring impiety. 2. Againſt the charge of favouring hereſie. In the former is inſerted a digreſſion, proving that the collection of the code of the four Goſpels in Trajan's time is no way derogatory to the ſufficient atteſtation of them. By Henry Dodwell, M. A. London 1707 in 8vo. IV. The Scripture Account of the eternal Rewards or Puniſhments of all that hear of the Goſpel, without an Immortality neceſſarily reſulting from the nature of ſouls themſelves, that are concerned in thoſe rewards or puniſhments. Shewing particularly, 1. How much of this Account was diſcovered by the beſt Philoſophers. 2. How far the Accounts of thoſe Philoſophers were corrected and improved by the Helleniſtical Jews, aſſiſted by the Revelations of the Old Teſtament. 3. How far the Diſcoveries aforementioned were improved by the Revelation of the Goſpel. Wherein the teſtimonies alſo of St. Irenæus and Tertullian are occaſionally conſidered. By Henry Dodwell, M. A. Author of the Epiſtolary Diſcourſe. London 1708 in 8vo. V. The Natural Mortality of human Souls clearly demonſtrated from the holy Scriptures, and the concurrent Teſtimonies of the primitive Writers. Being an explication of a famous paſſage in the Dialogue of S. Juſtin Martyr with Tryphon, concerning the Soul's Immortality. In a Letter to a friend. With an Appendix conſiſting of a Letter to Mr. John Norris of Bemerton. And an Expoſtulation relating to the late inſults of Mr. Clarke and Mr. Chiſhull. By Henry Dodwell M. A. London 1708 in 8vo. VI. A Diſſertation concerning the Uſe of Incenſe in divine Offices. London 1711 in 8vo. In this piece he ſhews, that it is no apoſtolical Tradition. VII. Julii Vitalis Epitaphium, cum Notis Henrici Dodwelli, & Commentario G. Muſgrave. Accedit Dodwelli Epiſtola ad Cl. Gœzium de Puteolanâ & Bajanâ Inſcriptionibus. Iſcæ Dunmoniorum & Londini, 1711 in 8vo. VIII. De Parmâ Equeſtri Woodwardiana Diſſertatio, &c. Oxon. 1713 in 8vo. It was publiſhed by Mr. Thomas Hearne, A. M. Mr. Dodwell does not doubt of the antiquity of Dr. Woodward's ſhield, and believes that it was made under the reign of Nero. IX. De Tabulis Cœlorum Diſſertatio; & Tabulæ chronologicæ pro mente XII Patriarcharum, printed in the firſt volume of Dr. Grabe's Spicilegium. He began likewiſe ſeveral other Works, which he left unfiniſhed; particularly a Diſſertation concerning the Laws of Nature and Nations, in which he propoſed to ſhew, that theſe were not, as is generally ſuppoſed, the reſults of reaſon, tho' highly agreeable to it; but Laws delivered by God to Adam or Noah, the firſt common parents of all mankind, or at leaſt to ſome in thoſe firſt Ages, wherein God moſt frequently communicated his will by immediate Revelation: That theſe were tranſmitted to poſterity by Tradition, which might eaſily be accompliſhed when they related to men's practice, and ſo occurred to men's ſenſes in ſocieties: That theſe Laws are ſuppoſed in the Scriptures, and in the other earlieſt monuments of antiquity, ſuch as the antienteſt Poets: That all looked on themſelves as obliged to the obſervance of them, from the expectation of rewards, if they obeyed, or of puniſhments, if they tranſgreſſed them: That theſe muſt proceed from the arbitrary pleaſure of the great Governor of the Univerſe, and this with regard to the good of the public: That Societies were neceſſary to this end; and that theſe were at firſt formed by God himſelf, exacting a due ſubordination of ſubjects to their Governors: That firſt an huſband, then parents were Governors of Societies; and that the ſupreme Parent had authority over all his deſcendents, tho' theſe were ſuperior over their own deſcendents: That the right of preſcribing to deſcendents was fortified by a right given them by God himſelf to reward their deſcendents with bleſſings, and to puniſh them by curſes, to be performed by God himſelf, for the performance of which God look'd on himſelf as a Guarantee: That tho' ſupreme Governors were exempt from being reſponſible for their male-adminiſtration to men, yet God took care to deter theſe from uſing their power arbitrarily, and from elation of mind, by his Μῆνις, or threats of divine vengeance. He takes notice of ſome poſitive Laws, which were generally eſteemed as piacular, the violation of which made the community obnoxious to divine puniſhment, till the crime was expiated. No antecedent reaſon could have obliged God to puniſh communities for the crimes of private perſons, had he not ſettled Societies. Theſe thoughts he has given us ſome ſtrictures of in ſome of his other writings, and particularly in his Diſcourſe againſt Marriages in different Communions; but more fully in his Letter to the Reverend Mr. John Falconer, a North-Briton, who deſired his aſſiſtance in his deſigned work againſt the Deiſts and other adverſaries of Chriſtianity; in anſwer to whom Mr. Dodwell began his Diſcourſe of the Laws of Nations, in which he intended to eſtabliſh the Patriarchal Scheme (20). Not long before his death he had a deſign of ſettling the time and order, in which Tertullian wrote each of his Books. He wrote alſo a Tract concerning the Death of Judas, in which he ſuppoſed, that Judas was not ſtrangled with grief, as Grotius and Dr. Hammond imagined, but actually hanged himſelf; and a Diſſertation concerning the Time of the Greek Tranſlation of the Old Teſtament by the Septuagint; which from the teſtimony of Eupolemus in Clemens Alexandrinus and others he determines to have been done in the time of Demetrius Phalereus the Grammarian, and of Ptolomy Philopator, who might be Philadelphus, as well as Ptolomy ſon of Lagida, as there were ſeveral Phyſcones, Soteres, Philometores, and Euergetæ. He reſolved likewiſe to publiſh St. Barnabas's Epiſtle with a literal Tranſlation and Paraphraſe, and Prolegomena, the laſt of which was finiſhed in 1691 (21).

(20) Life of Dodwell, pag. 499, 500, 501.

(21) Ibid. pag. 504, 505.

DOLABELLA (PUBLIUS CORNELIUS), ſon-in-law to Cicero, was firmly attached to the party of Julius Cæſar. He was preſent at the Battles of Pharſalia, Africa, and and Munda [A]: and was wounded in the laſt of thoſe three engagements. While he was Tribune of the people he cauſed a thouſand diſorders, which mortally afflicted Cicero (a). He deſigned to get a Law paſſed for the abolition of Debts [B], in order to gain the affection of the populace, and to free himſelf from the obligation of ſatisfying his Creditors (b); but he met with very ſtrong oppoſition. Marc Antony, whoſe wife he had debauched, was the principal obſtacle in his way: ſo that it may be ſaid, if that woman had been virtuous, the city of Rome would have fallen into a terrible confuſion, by the good underſtanding there would have been between the two greateſt diſturbers of the public repoſe at that time in Italy. Every thing has its uſe in this world: the intrigues of Marc Antony's wife did a ſignal ſervice to her country, and were the occaſion (c) of his overthrowing all the deſigns of a factious Tribune (d). During theſe conteſts Cæſar was in Ægypt. His return to Rome reſtored the public tranquillity there: he pardoned Dolabella, and raiſed him to the Conſulſhip ſome years after, contrary to the eſtabliſhed forms; for Dolabella had not yet attained a competent age, nor had he been Prætor (e). Marc Antony oppoſed his taking poſſeſſion of the Conſulſhip to the utmoſt of his power [C]; but as Cæſar was killed a few months after this new quarrel between

(a) See the Article TULLIA.

(b) Dio, lib. 42. Pag. 223.

(c) Plutarch. in Antonio, pag. 919.

(d) Dio, lib. 42. pag. 224, &c.

(e) Idem, pag. 225.

[A] He was preſent at the battles of Pharſalia, Africa, and Munda.] The paſſage of Cicero which I produce to prove this, will ſerve another purpoſe. Quonam modo igitur Dolabella pervenit (in Hiſpaniam?) aut non ſuſcipienda fuit iſta cauſſa, Antoni, aut, cum ſuſcepiſſes, defendenda uſque ad extremum. Ter depugnavit Cæſar cum civibus, in Theſſalia, Africa, Hiſpania; omnibus affuit his pugnis Dolabella: Hiſpanienſi etiam vulnus accepit: ſi de meo judicio quæris, nollem: ſed tamen conſilium à primo reprehendendum, laudanda conſtantia (1). i. e. "How, therefore, did Dolabella "arrive in Spain? Either you ſhould not, Antony, "have engaged in that cauſe, or, when you had "engaged in it, you ſhould have defended it to the "utmoſt. Cæſar fought three battles againſt his fellow-citizens, in Theſſaly, Africa, and Spain; in "every one of which Dolabella was preſent; and he "even received a wound in the laſt. If you aſk my "opinion, I would not have adviſed you to have engaged in the affair; but though the deſign was to "be condemned from the very firſt, yet firm perſeverance in it would have deſerved commendation." Obſerve here two things; one of which is a piece of Rhetorical Legerdemain, and the other a tolerable good maxim. Cicero could not but know that Marc Antony, ſtaying in Italy by Cæſar's order, had done as much ſervice to the party, as if he had attended Cæſar to Egypt, and the Kingdom of Pontus. He could not but know that the fear of danger was not one of Marc Antony's faults, or that other reaſons had prevented him from following Cæſar to Africa and Spain. Yet, as his ſtaying at Rome at ſuch a conjuncture, conſidered generally, might receive a malicious turn, Rhetoric failed not to expoſe it loudly, as an act of cowardiſe. Cicero knew nothing could vex a military man more than inſults of this nature, and he took care to ply him from that quarter. Cui bello cum propter timiditatem tuam tum propter libidines defuiſti . . . Tam bonus gladiator rudem tam cito accepiſti? Hunc igitur quiſquam qui in ſuis partibus, id eſt in ſuis fortunis tam timidus fuerit, pertimeſcat (2)? i. e. "From which war you abſented your ſelf as well out "of cowardiſe as laſt . . . Have you, who are ſo good "a Gladiator, received your diſcharge ſo ſoon? Can "any one therefore fear this man, who has ſhewed "himſelf ſo timorous in the defence of his party, "when his own fortunes were at ſtake?" To irritate him the more he forgot not to beſtow great encomiums on Dolabella. I wiſh Commentators would take notice of theſe artifices of Rhetoricians.

(1) Cicero, Philippic. 2. cap. 30.

(2) Idem, cap. 29.

[B] He deſigned to get a Law paſſed for the abolition of debts.] This they called novæ Tabulæ. A learned Critic has explained them in the following manner: Sunt tabulæ novæ nihil aliud quam lex ſeu decretum communi conſenſu factum, quo civitate per alterius partis ultimam pauperiem, & ex ea ſeditionem, in extremo periculo conſtituta, nexis atque obæratis, ad concordiam faciendam, debita in univerſum remittuntur, ita ut hoc nomine nec corpora eorum, neque bona vincta teneri queant (3). i. e. "The tabulæ "novæ are no other than a Law or Decree enacted "by common conſent, whereby, when a State is in "imminent danger from the extreme poverty, and "conſequent ſeditious diſpoſition, of one party, for "the ſake of peace, all debts are remitted, and all "obligations cancelled, ſo that neither their bodies nor "goods may be liable to ſeizure on account thereof."

(3) Johan. Scheffer us, in Libello de Novis Tabulis, apud Caſparem Sagittarium, in Vita Tulliæ, pag. 13, 14.

[C] Cæſar . . . raiſed him to the Conſulſhip . . . Marc Antony oppoſed his taking poſſeſſion of that dignity to the utmoſt of his power.] Cicero has enlarged on this conteſt in his 2d Philippic, and pretends Dolabella was abuſed. They perſuaded him to ſtand for the Conſulſhip, they gave him hopes of obtaining it, and then ſuffered him to ſink under the oppoſitions which were raiſed againſt him. Cæſar was the contriver of this foul play. Nihil queror de Dolabella qui tum eſt impulſus, inductus, elusus: qua in re quanta fuerit uterque veſtrum perfidia in Dolabellam quis ignorat? Ille (Cæſar) induxit ut peteret: promiſſum & receptum intervertit ad ſeque tranſtulit: tu ejus perfidiæ voluntatem tuam adſcripſiſti (4). Cicero adds that the Senate being aſſembled on the firſt of January (5), Dolabella made a cutting ſpeech againſt Marc Antony (6), and that the latter paſſionately inveighed againſt Dolabella. Cæſar had declared that when he ſet out on his grand expedition againſt the Parthians, he would leave Dolabella Conſul in his ſtead. Marc Antony was then Cæſar's Collegue in that office; and having no mind to have Dolabella for his Collegue, he declared that he was Augur, and would take advantage of that dignity to prevent Dolabella's being choſen, or elſe to render his election void. Cum Cæſar oſtendiſſet ſe priusquam proficiſceretur Dolabellam Conſulem eſſe juſſurum . . . . tum hic bonus augur eo ſe ſacerdotio præditum eſſe dixit, ut comitia auſpiciis vel impedire vel vitiare poſſet: idque ſe facturum eſſe aſſeveravit (7). The day of the election being come, the Suffrages fell on Dolabella; whereupon Marc Antony, who had not ſaid a word during the election, declared aloud that the Aſſembly muſt be adjourned to another day. He ſpoke this as Augur, and deſiſted not from this denunciation till after Cæſar's death. Then it was his intereſt to allow the election of Dolabella to be legal, and he was reconciled to him (8). Plutarch (9) relates, in fewer words than Cicero, that Cæſar having acquainted the Senate that he intended to reſign his Office of Conſul to Dolabella, was obliged to put off that affair to another time, becauſe of the violent oppoſitions of Marc Antony, who uttered a thouſand injurious things againſt Dolabella, and received as abuſive language from him. Some time after Cæſar had a mind to proceed to his reſignation in favour of Dolabella, but was conſtrained to deſiſt, becauſe Marc Antony declared to him that the Auguries were contrary. Dolabella finding himſelf abandoned, fell into a violent rage. I find no other fault with this relation of Plutarch, than that he has omitted one very eſſential circumſtance; which is, that Cæſar did not acquieſce in ſuch a manner, as not to leave Dolabella in full right to make good his pretenſions. He left it undecided whether Marc Antony's oppoſition was null, or valid. I freely believe that he found himſelf incumbered with thoſe two men, and that notwithſtanding he ſaid one day, that he did not fear men who were ſo well fed, and ſo well dreſſed as they (10), but that he dreaded the pale and lean (11), yet he plainly felt that the friendſhip of Marc Antony and Dolabella was a burthen to him. There was probably ſome

(4) Cicero, Philipp. 2. cap. 33.

(5) In the year of Rome 710.

(6) Invectus eſt copioſius multo in ipſum & paratius Dolabella quam nunc ego. Idem, d. C.

(7) Idem, ibid. d. cap. 32.

(8) Collegam tuum depoſitis inimicitiis, oblitus auſpiciorum à te ipſo populo Romano nunciatorum, illo die, (that is, three days after Cæſar's death) collegam tibi eſſe voluiſti. Idem, Philipp. 1. cap. 13.

(9) Plut. in Antonio, pag. 921.

(10) Idem, ibid.

(11) He meant Brutus and Caſſius. Idem, ibid.

between Marc Antony and Dolabella, they ended their differences, that they might the better reſiſt the Republican party. They were Conſuls the year Cæſar was aſſaſſinated; and at firſt took ſome ſteps from which thoſe who meant well drew a good Omen [D]: but this had no conſequence. Dolabella obtained the government of Syria; but he made ſo little haſte to take poſſeſſion of it, that he gave Caſſius time to make himſelf maſter of that Province: and as he was informed the Senate had conferred the ſame government on Caſſius, he did not think fit to proceed on his journey. He ſtopped, therefore, at Smyrna, and there treacherouſly put to death Trebonius [E] Governor of Aſia Minor, and one of the murderers of Julius Cæſar. So ſoon as the news of this deed reached Rome, the Senate declared Dolabella an enemy of the Roman people. By the death of Trebonius the leſſer Aſia lay at the diſcretion of Dolabella, who then failed not to march towards Syria. All places ſubmitted to him, becauſe Caſſius was abſent; all, I ſay, ſubmitted, except Antioch: but Caſſius arriving with ſome very good troops, beſieged Dolabella in the City of Laodicea, and reduced him to the cruel neceſſity of either killing himſelf, ſome colluſion between him and Marc Antony as to the Conſulſhip of Dolabella; but it is certain that Marc Antony ſpoke inſolently to him on other occaſions; for inſtance, when Cæſar after the African War demanded of him an account of the ſale of Pompey's effects. Here is what Cicero ſays on that head: the thing could not receive a better turn. Appellatus es de pecunia, quam pro domo, pro hortis, pro ſectione debebas, primo reſpondiſti plane ferociter: &, ne omnia videar contra te, propemodum æqua, & juſta dicebas. A me C. Cæſar pecuniam? cur potius, quam ego ab illo? an ille ſine me vicit? at ne potuit quidem: ego ad illum belli civilis cauſſam attuli: ego leges perniciosas rogavi .... Num ſibi ſoli vicit? quorum facinus eſt commune, cur non ſit eorum præda communis? jus poſtulabat: ſed quid ad rem? plus ille poterat (12). i. e. "You was called "upon for the money which you owed for your houſe, "your gardens, and the ſale of confiſcated effects. "At firſt you anſwered in a very arrogant manner, "and, leſt I ſhould ſeem to condemn you in every "reſpect, with ſome reaſon and juſtice. Does Cæſar "demand money of me? Why ſhould not I as well "make a demand upon him? Did he conquer with-"out me? He could not do it: I furniſhed him with "a cauſe for a civil war: it was I who propoſed per-"nicious laws .... Did he conquer for himſelf a-"lone? Ought not they who are concerned in the "ſame action, to divide the ſpoil among them? This "was no more than juſtice: but what was this to the "purpoſe? Cæſar's power was ſuperior." After his laſt expedition to Spain, Cæſar treated him much more civilly (13): he did him a thouſand friendly offices, which was a ſign that he looked on him as a very ill man, very capable of doing him ſervice, and diſſervice alſo. Cicero, as to the choice of his friends, gives Cæſar a very bad character. Habebat hoc omnino Cæſar: quem plane perditum ære alieno, egentemque, ſi eundem nequam hominem audacemque cognoverat, hunc in familiaritatem libentiſſimè recipiebat (14). i. e. "This was Cæſar's method: if he knew a man to "be over head and ears in debt, and in indigent cir-"cumſtances, he willingly made a friend of him, "provided he was at the ſame time wicked and dar-"ing." You will find in Appian (15) a long account of Marc Antony's intrigues with regard to the Conſulſhip of Dolabella before their reconciliation, and after the death of Cæſar.

(12) Cicero, Philipp. 2. cap. 29.

(13) Ibid. cap. 32.

(14) Ibid. d. C.

(15) Appian. lib. 2. de Bello Civil.

[D] Marc Antony and Dolabella ... took ſome ſteps, from which thoſe who meant well drew a good Omen.] Marc Antony, three days after Cæſar's death, made a ſpeech in the Senate on peace and concord, and charmed the men of probity. He ſent his ſon as a hoſtage to the Conſpirators, who durſt not come down from the Capitol. Cicero frequently reminds him of that day. Unum illum diem quo in æde telluris Senatus fuit, non omnibus iis menſibus quibus te quidam multum à me diſſentientes beatum putant, anteponis? Quæ fuit oratio tua de concordia? Quanto metu veterani, quanta ſollicitudine civitas tum à te liberata eſt (16)? i. e. "Do "you not prefer that ſingle day, whereon the Senate "was aſſembled in the temple of Tellus, to all thoſe "months in which ſome, who differ widely in opi-"nion from me, think you happy? What a ſpeech "did you make to recommend Concord? From what "dread were the Veterans, and from what appre-

(16) Cicero, Philipp. 1. cap. 13. He ſays in the 2d Philipp. cap. 36. Qui tu vir, Dii immortales, & quantus fuiſſes, ſi illius diei mentem ſervare potuiſſes! Pacem haberemus quæ erat facta per obſidem, &c. i. e. "Good "Gods! how "worthy and "how great "hadſt thou "been, couldſt "thou have con-"tinued in the "ſame mind "thou waſt on "that day! We "ſhould now "have enjoyed "that peace, "which was "then made by "hoſtage &c."

"henſions was the city then freed by you?" See at the beginning of the firſt Philippic a detail of the good acts which Marc Antony did in concert with Dolabella. The latter, in particular, did a ſignal action, which was very neceſſary for the public welfare. A crowd of people of all conditions paid divine honours to a column of marble, erected in the midſt of the Forum in honour of Julius Cæſar (17). Dolabella cauſed that column to be demoliſhed, and puniſhed a great number of the factious with death; by which means he prevented the city's being pillaged: for their deſign was to render all the lovers of liberty odious. Cum ſerperet in urbe infinitum malum, idque manaret in dies latius, iidemque buſtum in foro facerent, qui illam inſepultam ſepulturam effecerant; & quotidie magis magiſque perditi homines cum ſui ſimilibus ſervis, tectis, ac templis urbis minarentur, talis animadverſio fuit Dolabellæ cum in audaces ſceleratoſque ſervos, tum in impuros & nefarios liberos, taliſque everſio illius execratæ columnæ, ut mihi mirum videatur &c. (18). i. e. "When a dread-"ful evil ſpread through the city, and daily diffuſed "itſelf farther; when thoſe people raiſed a funeral "pile in the Forum, who had been concerned in that "feigned burial; and when abandoned men, with "their ſlaves as abandoned as themſelves, conti-"nually threatened the houſes and temples of the "city, ſuch was the chaſtiſement which Dolabella "inflicted both on thoſe audacious and wicked ſlaves, "and on thoſe vile and flagitious free-men, and ſuch "was his conduct in demoliſhing that curſed column, "that I wonder &c." See another paſſage of Cicero concerning this very action, in the Remark [L] of the Article TULLIA.

(17) See Suetonius, in Cæſare, cap. 85.

(18) Cicero, Philipp. 1. cap. 2.

[E] He ſtopped at Smyrna, and there treacherouſly put to death Trebonius.] He gave Trebonius ſo many marks of friendſhip, that he prevented his being on his guard: for which reaſon it was very eaſy for him to make himſelf maſter of Smyrna in the night, and to force the houſe of Trebonius. He cauſed him to be cruelly tortured for two days, and then ordered his head to be ſtruck off, and fixed on the point of a javelin, to be carried about and expoſed to public view: the body was dragged through the ſtreets, and at laſt thrown into the Sea. Cicero deſcribes all this in a very eloquent manner (19): Conſecutus eſt Dolabella, nulla ſuſpicione belli: quis enim id putaret? ſecutæ collocutiones familiariſſimæ cum Trebonio, complexuſque ſummæ benevolentiæ falſi indices exſtiterunt in amore ſimulato: dexteræ, quæ fidei teſtes eſſe ſolebant, perfidia ſunt, & ſcelere violatæ: nocturnus introitus Smyrnam, quaſi in hoſtium urbem, quæ fidiſſimorum, antiquiſſimorumque ſociorum ... Interficere captum ſtatim noluit; ne nimis, credo, in victoria liberalis videretur; cum verborum contumeliis optimum virum inceſto ore laceraſſet, tum verberibus, ac tormentis quæſtionem habuit pecuniæ publicæ idque per biduum: poſt, cervicibus fractis, caput abſcidit, idque affixum geſtari juſſit in pilo: reliquum corpus tractum, atque laceratum abjecit in mare. I refer you to the fountain-head; for I ſhould be tedious if I tranſcribed all that is to be found on this ſubject in the Oration I quote. You will ſee below (20) the pious Reflection which Marc Antony made on the death of this murderer of Cæſar. There is a certain ſtyle of morality which people uſe of courſe, and which the moſt abandoned of mankind have the impudence to adopt.

(19) Philipp. 11. cap. 2.

(20) In the Remark [G] Citation (31).

himself, or surrendring. Dolabella chose the former (f) [F]. It is said he was then but six or seven and twenty years old (g). To shew his turbulent and seditious temper, we need only remember that, after the example of Clodius, he procured himself to be adopted by a Plebeian, that he might be Tribune of the people (b). Moreri's faults [G] are considerable.

(f) Extracted from Dion, lib. 47. ad ann. Romæ 712.

(b) Dio, lib. 24. pag. 223.

(g) Appian, de Bello Civ. lib. 2. pag. m. 279, makes him 25 years old at the death of Julius Cæsar. See the Remark [E] of the Article TULLIA.

DOLABELLA

[F] Dolabella chose to kill himself.] According to Dion Cassius (21), he slew himself; but others say that one of his guards, at his request, cut off his head, and then killed himself, without regarding the advice his master had given him, to present it to the Conqueror, in order to obtain his pardon (22). Appian calls him Marsus, but Dion gives him the name of Octavius; which occasioned Archbishop Usher (23) to say that Marsus and Octavius slew themselves in Laodicea. It appears from one of the Philippics, that Marsus Octavius, a miserable Roman Senator, was one and the same person. Cicero speaks of him with the utmost contempt. Quid opus fuit cum legione præmisso Marso nescio quo Octavio, scelerato latrone atque egente, qui popularetur agros, vexaret urbes, non ad spem constituendæ rei familiaris, quam tenere eum posse negant, qui norunt (mihi enim hic Senator ignotus est) sed ad præsentem pastum mendicitatis suæ? Consecutus est Dolabella (24). i. e. "What occasion was there "that one Marsus Octavius, a wicked and indigent "robber, should be sent before with a Legion, to "plunder the country, and oppress the towns, not "in hopes of raising an estate, which those who "know him (for this Senator is an utter stranger to "me) say it is not in his power to keep, but for the "present supply of his necessities? Dolabella follow-"ed &c." This mistake of Usher, taken notice of by Father Noris (25), is the more excusable, because Appian has represented his Marsus in an imployment (26) much inferior to that which Dion has bestowed on Octavius. I believe we should read in Dion Μαρσὸς Ὀκτάβιος, and not Μάρκος Ὀκτάβιος. If I am told that, on the contrary, we should read in Cicero Marcus Octavius, and not Marsus Octavius, I answer that my conjecture is grounded on Appian's having named this person Marsus, without any other addition. It would be absurd to insist it ought to be read Marcus in Appian: for in a History people are never denoted by their Prænomen only. I would not absolutely reject the supposition of Glandorpius (27), that this man was named Marcus Octavius Marsus.

(21) Lib. 47. pag. 393.

(22) Appianus, de Bello Civ. lib. 4.

(23) In Annalibus.

(24) Cicero, Philipp. 11. cap. 2.

(25) Noris, Cenotaph. Pisan. pag. 278.

(26) That of Præfectus nocturnarum excubiarum.

(27) Onomast. pag. 638.

[G] Moreri's faults are considerable.] I. He should not have advanced it as a doubtful matter, that the Dolabella's were descended from the Cornelij. It is a certain fact, which no body is ignorant of. II. Speaking of Dolabella, who was declared an enemy of the Commonwealth for the murder of Trebonius, he ought not to have omitted either his name, or his prænomen. I say the same with regard to the other Dolabella's whom Moreri speaks of. III. He should not have said that he was declared an enemy of the Commonwealth in the year 710, but in the year 711; for the death of Trebonius was known at Rome a year (28) after Cæsar had been killed (29). Hirtius, who was Consul in the year 711, was actually in the exercise of his Office (30), when Marc Antony wrote to him (31): Dedisse pœnas sceleratum (he speaks of Trebonius) cineri atque ossibus clarissimi viri, & apparuisse numen Deorum intra finem anni vertentis, aut jam soluto supplicio parricidii aut impendente lætandum est. i. e. "The execution of the villain Trebonius has avenged "the ashes and relics of that great man; and the "Gods have manifested their justice within the year; "we have reason therefore to rejoice that the parri-"cide is now punished, or at least in a fair way to "be so." IV. He should not have represented our Dolabella as having great power over the mind of Marc Antony, since the quarrels of those two men are a thousand times more known, and lasted much longer than their good intelligence. Quorum summum quondam inter ipsos odium, bellumque meministis, eosdem postea singulari inter se consensu, & amore devinxit impurissimæ naturæ & turpissimæ vitæ similitudo (32). i. e. "Whose former extream hatred, and professed enmity "you must needs remember, though an agreement in "vicious inclinations, and a most debauched life, has "since reconciled and brought them to be intimate "friends." V. He ought not to have been distinguished from the son-in-law of Cicero. VI. Nor, perhaps, from him who referred the trial of that woman of Smyrna, who had poisoned her husband, to the Areopagus. Valesius is of opinion that the Dolabella who refused to try that woman, was not a different person from him who put Trebonius to death, and who perished at Laodicea (33). VII. However, he ought not to have given the person who directed that reference the prænomen of Cneius, since Valerius Maximus gives him that of Publius. And let me not be told that Aulus Gellius calls him Cneus; for, besides that Moreri does not quote Aulus Gellius, but Valerius Maximus, it must be observed that Aulus Gellius cites Valerius Maximus as his Original. It is therefore more reasonable to correct the Transcriber by Valerius Maximus, than the latter by the Transcriber. VIII. He should not have asserted that the woman whose trial was referred to the Areopagus, was accused of having poisoned her husband, and a son he had by a former wife: for the most natural and proper sense of the words of the Author quoted by Moreri (34), is that this woman poisoned her husband and the son she had had by that husband, because they had killed the son she had had by another husband. Aulus Gellius, who has related this story in other words, when he copied Valerius Maximus, so well understood the sense I am speaking of, that he took care his readers might be in no doubt about it: Mulier Smyrnæa . . . id fecisse confitebatur, dicebatque habuisse se faciendi causam, quoniam idem illi maritus & filius ALTERUM FILIUM mulieris ex viro priore genitum, adolescentem optimum & innocentissimum, exceptum insidiis occidissent (35). i. e. "The woman of Smyrna confessed the fact, and in-"sisted she had good reason for committing it, be-"cause her said husband and son had treacherously "murdered ANOTHER SON of that woman by a for-"mer husband, a most virtuous and innocent youth." Ammianus Marcellinus, speaking of this fact, no doubt avoided the ambiguity which might be in the expression of Valerius Maximus; but as his Text is greatly corrupted in that place (36), it cannot wholly remove our doubts. Some Editions have it, Smyrnæa matersamilias filium PROPRIUM & maritum venenis necasse confessa; others have SOBOLEM PROPRIAM. All this condemns Moreri. Let us observe, by the way, a particular which would be repeated a hundred thousand times, were it to be mentioned on every occasion; that the Latin Tongue has not the advantage of preventing ambiguous senses as ours does. Here is Valerius Maximus, who in relating a singular and most surprizing fact, has made use of an expression which has occasioned Interpreters to be divided in opinion as to the species of the crime committed by this woman. Moreri is not the ablest man who has supposed that this woman was stepmother to one of the two men whom she poisoned. The learned Henry Valesius (37) has put the same construction on the phrase of Valerius Maximus: wherein he is less worthy of credit than Aulus Gellius, who believed the woman poisoned her own son. The difference is so great between the crime as conceived by Aulus Gellius, and the crime as represented by Valesius, that the Historian is inexcusable who has related a fact of such importance in so ill a manner as to give room for such different interpretations. IX. Moreri ought not to have attributed the murder of the young man entirely to the woman's husband; for the son, either of that husband, or of that woman, was an accomplice in the assassination. X. Lastly, he should not have asserted that the woman's accuser and her husband were the same person: for since she was guilty of having killed her husband, it was not her husband who prosecuted her; and consequently the Areopagus did not order that husband to appear before them with the accused woman at the expiration of a hundred years.

(28) Note that, as to this mistake, a great many Chronologers are of Opinion that Cæsar was killed in the year 709. See the Remark [O] of the Article CÆSAR.

(29) See Fabricius, in Vita Ciceronis, ad annum ultimum, pag. m. 214.

(30) Cicero, Philipp. 13. cap. 11.

(31) Apud Ciceron. ibid.

(32) Cicero, Philipp. 13, init. cap. 1.

(33) Vales. in Ammian. Marcellin. lib. 29. cap. 2. pag. m. 562.

(34) Matersamilias Smyrnæa virum & filium interemit, cum ab his optimæ indolis juvenem quem ex priore viro enixa fuerat, occisum comperisset. Val. Maxim. lib. 8. cap. 1. sub fin.

(35) Aulus Gellius, lib. 12. cap. 7.

(36) Lib. 29. cap. 2. pag. 562, 563.

(37) Vales. in Amm. Marcell. lib. 29. cap. 2. pag. 563.

DOLABELLA (HORACE), Author of a Book intitled Apologia pro Puritanis. It is properly a burleſque Satyr againſt the Proteſtants. This Book muſt needs be very ſcarce; for it does not ſo much as appear in the Catalogues of the moſt numerous Libraries. I am no otherwiſe acquainted with it than by having ſeen it quoted in the Doctrine Curieuſe of Father Garaſſe. It is written by way of Queſtion and Anſwer, and the Scripture muſt have been therein treated with little decency, ſince that Jeſuit ſpeaks of it in the manner he does [A].

[A] He is the Author of a Book . . . wherein the Scripture muſt have been treated with little decency, ſince Father Garaſſe ſpeaks of it in the manner he does.] "This Author has written a Book which is much "ſought after and eſteemed by men of ſenſe, where- "in he overthrows all the maxims and fancies of "the Puritans by expreſs Texts taken from the holy "Scriptures: but I wiſh he had ſhewn more reſpect "to the Holy Ghoſt, and had not taken the liberty "of making him ſometimes ſay things which are a "little ſcandalous. I allow they ſtrike home; but, "in my opinion it would have been more expedient "to have uſed other weapons, and not have ſtirred a "dunghil with a golden ſcepter, as he has done (1)." Father Garaſſe has quoted ſeveral paſſages of this Book of Dolabella: the following is one of them. Quæro cur univerſa nobilitas Anglicana dedignetur ſervire in miniſterio domus Dei, & quare viliſſimos homines & idiotas cogantur aſſumere ad miniſterium? Reſpondetur quia ſcriptum eſt Ezechielis XXVII, habuerunt nautas ad miniſterium; & Joan. II, Miniſtri autem ſciebant qui hauſerant aquam. i. e. "I deſire to "know why the Engliſh Nobility in general diſdain "to ſerve in the Miniſtry of God's Houſe, and why "they are forced to preſer men of the meaneſt rank "and capacity to the miniſterial office? Anſwer: Be- "cauſe it is written in the XXVII chapter of Eze- "kiel (†), they had mariners for the miniſtry: and "in the ſecond chapter of S. John, The ſervants (or "Miniſters) which drew the water knew whence it "was."

(1) Garaſſe, Doctrine Curieuſe, pag. 672, 673.

(†) According to the Vulgar Tranſlation.

DOLET (STEPHEN) a good Philologer, burnt at Paris for his Opinions as to Religion (a) the 3d of Auguſt 1546 (b), was of Orleans. He laboured to reform the Latin Style, and compoſed ſome tolerably good Works [A] on that ſubject. Some (c) have thought that in his Commentaries on the Latin Tongue (d) he was conſiderably aſſiſted by Naugerius, in whoſe houſe he had lived at Venice. Others publickly accuſed him of Plagiariſm [B]. He applied himſelf to the making of Latin and French Verſes, and ſucceeded indifferently well [C]. He wrote an Apology for the Sect of the Ciceronians, whom

(a) See the Remarks [C] and [G].

(b) And not 1543, as Moreri ſays; or 1545, as Mr. Baillet, la Caille, &c. ſay.

(c) Sturmius, Præfat. Formular. Linguæ Latinæ Stephani Doleti.

(d) They were printed in the year 1536, in 2 Volumes in folio.

[A] He compoſed ſome tolerably good works.] You will find a more compleat Liſt of his Works in Geſner, and in the Sieur de la Caille (1), than in Moreri. It muſt not be forgotten that Dolet, who was a Printer and Bookſeller at Lyons, had printed ſome of his own Writings. He would have printed a French Tranſlation he had made of the greateſt part of Plato's Works, if he had not been prevented by his execution (2).

(1) Hiſtoire de l'Imprimerie, pag. 321.

(2) Baillet, Jugem. des Sav. tom. 4. pag. 516.

[B] He was ſtrongly accuſed of Plagiariſm.] Before the appearance of Charles Stevens's Theſaurus, and the Obſervations of Nizolius, Dolet's Commentaries were of no larger a ſize than the Elegancies of Lawrence Valla (3): they ſwelled afterwards to two volumes in folio, at the expence of Charles Stevens, Nizolius, Riccius, and Lazarus de Baïf. This was ſoon known: Charles Stephens ſaw ſome ſheets of the ſecond volume during the courſe of the impreſſion, and obſerved that almoſt whatever related to Navigation was taken out of the Book de Re Navali publiſhed by Baïf. Obſerve what he did: he made an Abridgment of that Book de Re Navali, and publiſhed it. This gave him an opportunity of ſhewing the thefts, and ſome faults of Dolet. The latter, to juſtify himſelf, publiſhed a Treatiſe de Re Navali, extracted out of his ſecond volume, and added it to an Anſwer to his Cenſurer, which he dedicated to Lazarus de Baïf: he did not deny but he had taken a great many things from Lazarus, but he maintained it was no robbery (4).

(3) Thoſe who had ſeen the Manuſcript affirmed it.

(4) This is taken from Thomaſius's Treatiſe, de Plagio Literario, pag. 409, & ſeq. Thomaſius took it from ſome paſſages of Franciſcus Floridus Sabinus, and from the Anſwer of Dolet.

John Vulteius made very loud complaints of the perſecution which he ſuppoſed jealouſy had then raiſed againſt his friend Stephen Dolet. Let us ſee in what manner he ſpoke of it to Cardinal John of Lorraine, when he dedicated to him his two Books of Epigrams, which he got printed at Lyons, by Sebaſtian Gryphius, in the year 1536. Nemo (ut ingenuè, quod ſentio, dicam) tam inimicus nomini Gallico eſſe creditur, quàm Gallus. Id cum multi hactenus ſint experti, tum nuper STEPHANUS DOLETUS Aurelius, juvenis de lingua Latina (ne quid amplius dicam) optimè prima jam adoleſcentia meritus: reliquo vitæ curſu quid non literis adſtruet tam divino natus ingenio? tanta laborum omnium patientia, tanta conſtantia, tanta animi alacritate ad nominis immortalitatem contendens? Is, inquam, ætatis noſtræ lumen, ac Galliæ ſempiterna gloria, invidiæ morſus expertus eſt vel acerbiſſimos. Nam cùm linguæ Latinæ Commentarios (at quod opus? quàm minimè a juvene expectandum? quantæ diligentiæ? quanti laboris? quàm exacti judicii?) ad publicam omnium linguæ Latinæ amantium utilitatem in lucem emitti voluit, nullos magis ſibi adverſos cenſores ſenſit, quàm à quibus laboris uberrimum fructum jure merito expectabat. Sed valeant hujuſcemodi literarum peſtes, qui, cùm obeſſe ſurgenti doctorum gloriæ conantur, tum vel maximè profunt. i. e. "No one (to declare my opinion "ingenuouſly) is thought to be ſo great an enemy to "the French name, as a Frenchman. This has been "experienced by many, and lately by Stephen Dolet "of Orleans, who has done great ſervice to the La- "tin tongue (to ſay no more) even in his youth; "and what may not be expected in the future part of "his life, for the advancement of learning, from a "perſon born with ſo excellent a genius, of ſuch un- "wearied diligence and application, and aſpiring "with ſuch alacrity of mind to immortal fame? "This perſon, I ſay, who is the ornament of the "age, and will be the eternal glory of France, ex- "perienced the ſevereſt ſtrokes of envy. For when "he deſigned to publiſh his Commentaries of the "Latin tongue (a work of immenſe labour and exact "judgment, and little to be expected from ſo young "a man) for the public uſe of all lovers of that lan- "guage, he found no cenſurers oppoſe him more "violently than thoſe perſons from whom he had "juſt reaſon to expect the moſt grateful return for "his labour. But farewel ſuch peſts of the Repub- "lic of Letters; who when they endeavour to preju- "dice the riſing glory of learned men, contribute moſt "effectually to eſtabliſh it." Note that among thoſe Epigrams there are a great many verſes in praiſe of Dolet, and againſt his Cenſurers, and particularly againſt one Maurus.

[C] He applied himſelf to the making of Latin and French Verſes, and ſucceeded indifferently well.] His Latin Verſes were by Gruterus judged worthy of being inſerted in the Deliciæ Poetarum Gallorum; and if they are not excellent, they are yet far from being ſo imperfect as Julius Cæſar Scaliger repreſents them. This Critic's rage againſt Dolet has ſomething in it ſo violent, and, if I may ſay it, ſo brutiſh, that one cannot help thinking that great man's pen was guided by a perſonal reſentment (5). I ſhall quote the whole paſſage; where we ſhall ſee Dolet puniſhed with death, not for what was called Lutheraniſm, but for Atheiſm. Doletus . . . . Muſarum carcinoma aut vomica dici poteſt. Nam præter quam quod in eo tam grandi corpore whom Erasmus had insulted. Cultivating polite literature so much as he did, it is no wonder that he had a share in the affection of Castellanus, a learned Prelate, and very much beloved by Francis I. Castellanus interceded so earnestly for him, that he got him discharged out of prison [D], and repelled in a very rational manner the reproaches which corpore (ut ait Catullus) ne mica salis quidem, vult insanum agere Tyrannum in Poesi. Ita suo arbitratu Virgilianas gemmas suæ inserit pici, ut videri velit sua. Ignavus loquutulejus, qui ex tessellis Ciceronis febriculosas quasdam conferruminavit (ut ipse vocat) orationes: ut docti judicant, latrationes. Putavit tantundem licere sibi in divinis operibus Virgilianis. Ita dum optimi atque maximi Regis Francisci fata canit, ejus nomen suo malo fato functum est, quodque tum illi, tum illius versibus debebatur, solus passus est Atheos flammæ supplicium. Flamma tamen eum puriorem non efficit: ipse flammam potius efficit impuriorem. In Epigrammatum vero colluvionibus atque latrinis illis, quid ejus tibi sordes dicam? Languida, frigida, insulsa, plenissima illius vecordiæ, quæ summa armata impudentia ne Deum quidem esse professa est. Quapropter quemadmodum summus Philosophus Aristoteles in Natura animalium fecit, ut post enarratas partes, quibus constituuntur, etiam excrementorum faciat mentionem, hic ita ejus legatur nomen, non tanquam poetæ, sed tanquam poetici excrementi (6). i. e. "Dolet may be called the canker or im-

(5) Mr. Baillet very juſtly blames him for it, in his Jugemens ſur quelques Poetes, num. 1279, tom. 3. pag. 220.

"postume of the Muses. For besides that in so vo"luminous a Writer, there is not a grain of wit, he "sets up for a furious Tyrant in Poetry. He has
"according to his own fancy worked up Virgil's gold
"with his own base metal in such a manner, that he "would have it pass for his. A wretched prater,
"who out of the shreds of Cicero has patched up
"certain wild Orations (as he calls them); but which "the learned judge to be latrations. He imagined
"he had as good a right to be free with the divine
"works of Virgil. So while he was singing the fate
"of that great and good King Francis, his name met
"with its own evil fate, and the Atheist alone suffer"ed the punishment of the flames which both he and "his verses deserved. Yet the flames did not purify
"him, but he rather made the flames impure. Why "should I mention the filthiness which is to be found
"in the sink or common shore of his Epigrams?
"They are dull, cold, witless, and full of that ar"rogant madness, which, being armed with the most
"consummate impudence, would not even confess the "being of a God. Wherefore as the Prince of Phi"losophers, Aristotle, in discoursing of the nature of "animals, first describes the several parts of which "they are composed, and then takes notice even of "their excrements, so let his name be read here, not
"as the name of a Poet but of a poetical excrement."

(6) Scaliger, Poetic. lib. 6. pag. m. 730.

THE Origin of Julius Scaliger's hatred to Dolet.

The learned Naudé, who justly suspected that Julius Cæsar Scaliger was induced to speak in this manner by some private hatred, knew not the original ground of it (7): but I think I have discovered it. Dolet had the boldness to interfere with Scaliger: he wrote against Erasmus in favour of the Ciceronian Sect, after Scaliger had defended the cause. There are very few Authors who like such a procedure. It is looked upon as an affected design, either to surpass the first champion, or to deprive him of the glory of being the only person who breaks a lance. It is even thought that he who interposes in the combat, judges the cause has not been well defended, and stands in need of assistance. If this be the general disposition of Authors, judge how great Scaliger's indignation was when he saw Dolet enter the lists, and pretended he had catched him in several unfair artifices. He pretended, among other things, that the finest ornaments of his Oration had been pillaged by Dolet, and placed in a false light; and as to the praises which Dolet had given him, he thought himself no ways obliged to him for them, since they came too late, and with too ill a grace to repair the first offence. You will judge better of the whole from the following words of Scaliger (8):

(7) Tu en oublie deux qui valoient mieux que ton Badius, savoir Geofroi Tory, & Etienne Dolet, que Jules Scaliger par JENE SAI QUELLE haine ait dit du dernier. Naudé, Dial. de Masurat, pag. 8.

(8) This is what he wrote to Arnold Ferron, See his 14th Letter, pag. 35. of the Edition of Toulouse, in 4to 1620.

Arbitror te Doleti vidisse Dialogum adversus eum (Erasmum) quem non puduit extantibus scriptis meis, flexu alio orationis omnia mea suffurari, atque ineptissimis inurere calamistris. Itaque eædem quæ in orationibus intemperiæ, stilus paulo minor asper, sed emendicatus, ut verbis potius alienis conquisitis, atque corrogatis, quàm oblato argumento ejus loquacitas excrescere videatur. At Cæsarem laudat, inquies: accipio. Nam te ajunt ad eum retulisse, consuleret dignitati suæ, qui temere atque stolide nimis super Italico nomine ineptisset; à me integrum Dialogum apparatum, quo illius ostenderem & malevolum animum cum inani gloria conjunctum, & præceps ingenium cum stupore, & impurum dicendi genus cum loquacitate, & amentem dictionem cum impudentia. Ita igitur adblanditum, ut animum meum deflecteret à proposito, ita laudasse, ut sequi potius aliorum judicium invitus, quàm suum ipse libens apponere videretur. Pro ea re data est à nobis opera, ut & eum & alium, quem velit ipse, pœniteat posthac rabiei illius, seu impudicitiæ. Audio illum præesse Lugduni Librariis, quorum manum emendet. Id quod si verum est, in illis libris, quos nuper invulgatos à Gryphio ære comparavimus, deprehenderunt etiam pueri nostri vel insigni scutica vitia animadvertenda. Perstrinxi eum in hac secunda Oratione, sublato quidem nomine, sed ita depictum, ut vel ab infantibus Tolosanis agnosci possit. i. e.
"I suppose you have seen Dolet's Dialogue against "Erasmus, who was not ashamed, when my writings
"were in print, to steal every thing from me by giv"ing my Oration another turn, and decking it out
"with his tinsel. Therefore there appear the same "extravagancies as in his Orations, a style not quite
"so rugged, but for which he is beholden to another,
"so that his loquacity seems to be supported rather
"by other peoples words collected and raked toge"ther, than by a connected argument. But you will "say he praises Cæsar; I agree he does. For they "say you advised him to consult his reputation, he "having already rashly and foolishly plaid upon my
"Italian name; and acquainted him that I had fi"nished a Dialogue, wherein I should expose his ma"licious temper and his empty arrogance, his petu-
"lancy and his stupidity, his impropriety and his lo-
"quacity, his raving expressions and his impudence.
"Having thus soothed me, with design to divert "me from my purpose, he praised me in such a "manner, that he seemed rather unwillingly to fol"low the judgment of other people, than freely to "give his own. Wherefore I have endeavoured that "both he and others may for the future repent of "their rage and impudence. I hear he is corrector
"of a press at Lyons; and if it be true that he was "concerned in the correcting of those Books bought
"by me, which were lately printed by Gryphius, our "very school-boys have therein discovered faults for "which he deserves a severe whipping. I have re-
"primanded him in this second Oration, not by name
"indeed, but painted in such colours that he may be "known by the very children of Toulouse." He says several other things against Dolet in the same Letter. Confirm what I have said of Authors who write on the same subjects, by this passage of Diogenes Laertius. Ἔοικε δὲ καὶ Ξενοφῶν πρὸς αὐτὸν ἴσχειν οὐκ εὐμενῶς· ὥσπερ γὰρ διαφιλονικήσαντες τὰ ὅμοια γεγράφασι, συμπόσιον, Σωκράτους ἀπολογίαν, τὰ ἠθικὰ ἀπομνημονεύματα. Videtur & Xenophon haudquaquam amico in illum (Platonem) fuisse animo: nam veluti contentionis studio similia scripsere, Symposium, Socratis defensionem, Commentaria moralia (9). i. e. "Xenophon like"wise seems to have been no friend to Plato: for
"with a design as it were of vying with one another
"they wrote on the same subjects; and published each
"a Symposium, a Defence of Socrates, and moral "Discourses."

(9) Laert. in Platone, lib. 3. num. 34.

[D] Castellanus interceded so earnestly for him, that he discharged him out of prison.] Here is what the Author of Castellanus's Life says of it (10): Id magis verum esse credat qui Doletum longi carceris illuvie fœdatum, prima accusatione impiæ fraudis reum, Castellano supplice carcere emissus, & omni noxa condonata liberatum esse cognoverit. i. e. "He will be more in"clined to believe this to be true, who shall know
"that Dolet, after having suffered a long and noisome
"imprisonment, on an accusation of impious fraud,
"was delivered from prison at the intercession of Ca-
"stellanus, and received a full pardon." The reproach which a certain Cardinal made Castellanus testifies that Atheism (11), or something very near of kin

(10) Petrus Galandius, pag. 62.

(11) See the Remarks [C] and [G].

which a Cardinal had caſt on him upon that account [E]. I eaſily believe that Dolet promiſed to be a good Catholic; but as he kept not that promiſe, no body durſt ſpeak any more in his behalf when he was impriſoned the ſecond time. Being abandoned, therefore, to the fury of the Inquiſitors, he was condemned to die. A Letter has been publiſhed which teſtifies that he recommended himſelf to the Holy Virgin and to St. Stephen, a little before he was ſtrangled [F]; but, for the reaſons I have mentioned in another place (e), teſtimonies of this kind are greatly to be ſuſpected. The Poets of both parties had ſome ſkirmiſhes on occaſion of this execution. You may ſee ſome of their Verſes in Mr. le Laboureur (f), who is much in the wrong to ſay that Dolet has been placed in the Martyrology of the Proteſtants [G].

(e) Above, in the Remark [I] of the Article BERQUIN.

(f) Addit. a Caſtelnau, tom. 1. pag. 355, 356.

It has been ſaid (g) that he was a baſtard of Francis I, but that he was not owned as ſuch. I cannot think he was that Monarch's ſon: I know he was very young when he publiſhed two Tomes in folio, in the year 1536; but I cannot perſuade myſelf he was young kin to it, was the crime of which Dolet was ſuſpected: Unus primi nominis Cardinalis Caſtellanum gravi & objurgatrice oratione adortus eſſet, quod cum in Eccleſia Orthodoxorum Pontificis locum teneret, contra omnes tamen homines quibus religio & pietas cordi eſſet, eorum qui non modo Lutherana lue infecti, ſed etiam Dei expertes impietatis rei eſſent, partes tueri apud Chriſtianiſſimum Regem auſus eſſet. i. e. "A Cardinal of "principal note ſeverely reproved Caſtellanus, for that "he, who bore the rank of a chief Prieſt in an Orthodox Church, ſhould yet, in oppoſition to all men "who had religion and piety at heart, dare to defend "before the moſt Chriſtian King, not only thoſe who "were infected with the Lutheran Hereſy, but even "thoſe who were impious and profeſſed Atheiſts." In the next Remark we ſhall ſee the general Anſwer which Caſtellanus gave; and here is what he anſwered in particular concerning Dolet: Se apud Regem Doleti fraudibus & ſceleribus nullum patrocinium tribuiſſe, pro eo qui promitteret vitæ morumque emendationem homine Chriſtiano dignam Regi ſupplicem factum eſſe. i. e. "That he had never defended any of Do"let's frauds or crimes before the King, but had only "become an interceſſor with his Majeſty for one who "promiſed a reformation of life and manners worthy "a Chriſtian." This ſhews that Dolet promiſed to forſake his debauched courſe of life.

(g) Patiniana, pag. 22. of the Paris Edit.

[E] . . . Caſtellanus . . . repelled . . . the reproaches which a Cardinal had caſt on him upon that account.] He maintained that he did what a Biſhop ought to do, but that the Cardinal required Prelates to act the part of Executioners. He told him it was the duty of Biſhops, to incline the minds of Princes to clemency, and to bring home the ſtray ſheep on their ſhoulders. I weaken the expreſſions of Gallandius too much not to think myſelf obliged to tranſcribe them here, that thoſe Readers who underſtand Latin may loſe nothing. Memini Caſtellanum cùm paulum ſe collegiſſet animo ſatis incitato & commoto reſpondiſſe, ſe de quo accuſabatur in accuſatorem merito retorquere poſſe, cùm ipſe quod viri Eccleſiaſtici & viri Pontificis proprium eſſet, feciſſet; ille vero quod veri carnificis eſſet ab Epiſcopis exigeret. Epiſcoporum enim eſſe & Sacerdotum Chriſti & Apoſtolorum, virorumque ſanctorum qui nobis ſuo ſanguine Eccleſiam conſecrarunt exemplo, Regem à ſævitia & immanitate ad manſuetudinem, clementiam & miſericordiam convertere, errantem ovem humeris impoſitam in ovile reducere, deque ea recepta tanquam expugnatis hoſtium caſtris gaudio triumphare (12).

(12) Galland. in Vita Caſtellani, pag. 62, 63.

(13) He was a Phyſician at Tergow, and is now (in 1699) Profeſſor of Polite Learning at Harderwick.

(14) Intitled, Amœnitates Theologico-Philologicæ Amſtel. 1694.

(15) Mi Deus quem toties offendi propitius eſto, teque Virginem matrem precor, divumque Stephanum, ut apud Dominum pro me peccatore intercedatis. i. e. "My God, "whom I have "ſo often offended, be merciful to me, and "I beſeech thee, "O Virgin Mother, and thee, "O Holy Stephen, to intercede with the "Lord for me a "ſinner. Apud Almeloveen, pag. 79.

[F] A Letter has been publiſhed, which teſtifies that he recommended himſelf . . . . a little before he was ſtrangled.] Mr. Almeloveen (13) has inſerted it in one of his Books (14). It was written from Paris, the 25th of Auguſt 1546. Florens Junius, who wrote it, relates that the third of that month Stephen Dolet was executed, and that the Executioner having made every thing ready, adviſed him to think on his ſalvation, and recommend himſelf to God and the Saints; that Dolet making no haſte, and only muttering ſomething, the Executioner declared to him that he had orders to ſpeak to him of ſalvation before all the people: therefore, ſaid he to him, you muſt call upon the holy Virgin, and S. Stephen your patron, whoſe feſtival is celebrated this day; and if you do it not, I know what I have to do. Immediately Dolet repeated a prayer according to the form of the Executioner (15), and warned the ſpectators to read his Books with a great deal of circumſpection, and proteſted above three times that they contained many things which he had never underſtood; and having afterwards recommended himſelf to God, he was ſtrangled, and then burnt to aſhes. Florens Junius ſays that one who aſſiſted as an officer at the execution related all theſe particulars to him (16).

(16) Hæc quæ ſcribo didici ex eo qui executioni interfuit ex officio. Ibid.

[G] Monſr. le Laboureur is in the wrong to ſay that Dolet has been placed in the Martyrology of the Proteſtants.] "The pretended Martyrology of the Huguenots puts "a high value on Dolet, who was indeed a man of "wit and learning, but a Libertine; as were all the "firſt Preachers of the new Goſpel." Theſe are Mr. le Laboureur's words (17). A man might very eaſily be deceived by them; for who could believe that he ſhould advance ſuch a thing without having caſt his eyes on the volume wherein, he ſays, Stephen Dolet has been ſo much extolled? Yet what he affirms is moſt falſe: the Martyrology of the Huguenots does not mention this perſon. I have purpoſely conſulted the little Latin Martyrology of John Criſpin, and afterwards the large one in folio, which was printed in French in the year 1582; but I have found nothing in it concerning Stephen Dolet. I remember alſo to have obſerved that Theodore Beza, who keeps a pretty exact account (18) of the perſons who were put to death in France for what was called Lutheraniſm, ſays not a word of this pretended Martyr. This ſilence would have aſtoniſhed me, if I had not known that John Calvin has placed Stephen Dolet among the impious. Agrippam, Villanovanum, DOLETUM, & ſimiles vulgo notum eſt tanquam Cyclopas quoſpiam Evangelium ſemper faſtuoſe ſpreviſſe. Tandem eò prolapſi ſunt amentiæ & furoris, ut non modo in filium Dei execrabiles blaſphemias evomerent, ſed quantum ad animæ vitam attinet, nihil a canibus & porcis putarent ſe differre (19). i. e. "It is publickly known that Agrip"pa, Servetus, DOLET, and others of the ſame ſtamp, "have always contemned the Goſpel with gigantic ar"rogance; and at length fell into ſuch diſtraction and "frenzy, that they not only uttered execrable blaſ"phemies againſt the Son of God, but fancied that "as to the ſoul's life there was no difference between "themſelves and dogs or ſwine." In this Calvin and Prateolus are of one and the ſame mind: for Prateolus, ſpeaking of Atheiſts (20), joins Stephen Dolet with Diagoras, Euemerus, Theodorus, and the like perſons taken notice of by Antiquity for not admitting a Deity. Mr. le Laboureur (21) quotes ſome Latin Verſes, underneath which it is declared that Stephen Dolet, a native of Orleans, was burnt in the ſquare Maubert the 3d of Auguſt 1546, on S. Stephen's day which was his birth-day (22). So that Moreri ought not to have called in queſtion the circumſtances related by la Croix du Maine; and he had yet leſs reaſon to found his doubt on la Croix du Maine's being a Proteſtant: for if any myſtery were to be found in thoſe circumſtances, it would be much more the buſineſs of a Catholic than of a Proteſtant, to ſearch after it; a Catholic would draw thence a greater number of pious reflections than a Proteſtant.

(17) Le Laboureur, Addit. aux Mémoires de Caſtelnau, tom. 1. pag. 355.

(18) In the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of the Reformed Churches of France.

(19) Calvin. in Tract. de Scandalis, pag. 90 Tractatuum Theologicorum.

(20) In Elencho Hæret. Voce Athei.

(21) Addit. aux Mémoires de Caſtelnau, tom. 1. pag. 356.

(22) Stephanus Doletus, Aurelius Gallus, die ſancto Stephano ſacro, & natus & Vulcano devotus in Malbertina area Lutetiæ 3 Auguſti 1546.

I have very lately diſcovered that Theodore Beza, who, before he had publickly profeſſed the Reformed Religion, had publiſhed an Epitaph very much to the honour of our Dolet (23), ſtruck it out of the Editions of his Poems which he publiſhed after he had abjured the Romiſh Faith. This is a proof that the Proteſtants did not think themſelves concerned in that man's execution.

(23) It is among the Juvenilia Theodori Bezæ, fol. 31 of the Edition I make uſe of, which is in 16, without any Printer's name, or date.

young enough to be the ſon of a man who was born in the year 1494 (b). It is aſſerted, in the Patiniana, that he wrote ſome Orations againſt the City of Toulouſe, for which he made the Amende honorable.

(b) This was the year wherein Francis I was born.

DOMITIA LONGINA, daughter of the illuſtrious Domitius Corbulo (a), rendred herſelf unworthy of ſuch a father by her lewdneſs. Domitian, having been declared Cæſar, abandoned himſelf to licentiouſneſs of all ſorts. He debauched ſeveral women, and finding Domitia much to his liking, he obliged her to leave her huſband (b): he kept her ſome time in quality of his concubine, and afterwards ſolemnly married her (c). The dignity of Empreſs did not prevent her falling in love with a Player [A]; on which account the Emperor divorced her: but as he could not live without her, he took her again ſoon after (d); and to cover ſo mean an action, he pretended it was the people's deſire that he ſhould call her home again: Id populus curat ſcilicet. It is ſaid that this woman, miſtruſting her huſband's ſavage temper, ſought means to rid herſelf of him, and that ſhe was concerned in the conſpiracy which deſtroyed him [B]. Titus, the brother of Domitian, was ſuſpected of having had to do with her: but ſhe was held to be ſufficiently cleared, when ſhe had denied it on oath; for inſtead of denying ſuch adventures, ſhe uſed always to boaſt of them [C]. She had a great regard for Joſephus, and was a continual benefactreſs to him (e). As to her firſt huſband (f), his loſing of her did not excuſe him from further injury: for Domitian, not ſatisfied with having deprived him of his wife, took from him his life alſo (g). We read in Procopius an action of this wife of Domitian which deſerves great commendation [D]. The queſtion is whether it be true.

(a) Xiphil. in Veſpaſ. pag. m. 217.

(b) Sueton. in Domit. cap. 1.

(c) Xiphil. in Veſpaſ. pag. 217.

(d) Sueton. in Domit. cap. 3.

(e) Joſeph. de Vita ſua, ſub fin.

(f) His name was Ælius Lamia.

(g) Sueton. in Domit. cap. 10.

[A] The dignity of Empreſs did not prevent her falling in love with a Player.] This Player's name was Paris: he was killed in the open ſtreet by the order of Domitian, for having dared to enjoy the Empreſs. Domitian had a great mind to have his wife's throat cut, to puniſh her for that infamous commerce; but by the advice of Urſus he was ſatisfied with turning her away. Xiphilin tells us no more of the matter (1); but Suetonius informs us that Domitian quickly recalled her home. Uxorem Domitiam ex qua in ſecundo ſuo Conſulatu filium tulerat, alteroque anno à Conſulatu filiam, Auguſtam eandem Paridis Hiſtrionis amore deperditam repudiavit, intraque breve tempus impatiens diſcidii quaſi efflagitante populo reduxit (2). i. e. "He divorced his wife Domitia, by whom he had had a "ſon in his ſecond Conſulſhip, and a daughter the ſecond year after, for that being Empreſs, ſhe had "fallen deeply in love with Paris the player; but "within a very ſhort time, not bearing to be parted "from her, he took her again, pretending it was "the people's deſire." It is very probable that Dion had not forgotten this conduct of Domitian, and that we ought to charge it on Xiphilin's ill taſte, if it is not to be found in his Abridgment of Dion. I maintain that the ſuppreſſing ſuch a fact argues an ill taſte; for Domitian's ill qualities are much better laid open, when it is known that he was mean ſpirited enough to reſtore the dignity of Empreſs to a woman who had proſtituted herſelf to a player; it is a very convincing evidence of the utmoſt corruption, which draws on the memory of that Tyrant the contempt and horror it deſerves. And as it is part of the duty of an Hiſtorian to diſcover the character of his Actors by the moſt ſtriking paſſages, which ſhew the extent of their virtues, or of their vices, it is clear that Xiphilin had not much diſcernment, if he did not think himſelf obliged to preſerve the recalling of Domitia; for I ſuppoſe he found it in the Hiſtory which he abridged. Let me not be told that he did the office of an Epitomizer: one line would have been ſufficient to inform us that Domitia was recalled. The principle which has now been laid down is not favourable to Suetonius with regard to our Domitia. That Hiſtorian ſuppreſſes her having for ſome time been Domitian's concubine: he would have it that ſhe left not her firſt huſband, but in order to marry that Prince. This is to extenuate her fault, and prevent our being acquainted with the full extent of that woman's lewdneſs. Is this the duty of an Hiſtorian?

(1) Xiphil. in Domit. pag. 230, 231.

(2) Sueton. in Domit. cap. 3.

ADVICE to the Authors of Abridgments.

[B] It is ſaid . . . . ſhe was concerned in the conſpiracy which deſtroyed Domitian.] It is Aurelius Victor who obſerves it: Adſcita etiam in conſilium tyranni uxore Domitia, ob amorem Paridis Hiſtrionis à Principe cruciatus formidante (3). i. e. "Having alſo engaged "Domitia, the Tyrant's wife, in the deſign, who "dreaded her huſband's cruelty on account of her "love for Paris the Player." It is ſurprizing that the other Writers ſhould not know this.

(3) Aurelius Victor, in Epitome Imperatorum.

[C] She denied on oath that ſhe had had to do with Titus . . . . inſtead of denying ſuch adventures, ſhe uſed always to boaſt of them.] This is the height of impudence. Suetonius has acted like an Hiſtorian of good taſte, ſince he has expreſſed that woman's character by ſo ſingular a circumſtance. Quidam opinantur conſuetudinem recordatum (Titum) quam cum fratris uxore habuerit, ſed nullam habuiſſe perſancte Domitia jurabat, haud negatura ſi qua omnino fuiſſet, immo etiam gloriatura, quod illi promptiſſimum erat in omnibus probris (4).

(4) Sueton. in Tito, cap. 10.

[D] We read in Procopius an action of this wife of Domitian, which deſerves great commendation.] Procopius (5) relates that the wife of Domitian, having never approved of her huſband's tyrannical conduct, and having never done an injury to any perſon, was much reſpected by the Senators. For which reaſon, after Domitian had been aſſaſſinated, they requeſted her to come into the Senate, and offered her whatever ſhe ſhould deſire of that wicked Prince's eſtate. She demanded nothing but leave to bury him, and to erect a ſtatue to him. After this had been granted her, ſhe cauſed all the ſcattered and mangled parts of Domitian's body to be ſought for, and joined them together in the beſt manner ſhe was able. The corps thus patched up was the model of the ſtatue which ſhe erected to her huſband in the ſtreet leading to the Capitol. This ſtatue ſtood there in Procopius's time, and repreſented the barbarity which had been practiſed on Domitian. His wife's deſign was only to preſerve a monument of the barbarous action of the aſſaſſins. Triſtan has juſt reaſon to admire why this extraordinary action, if true, ſhould be concealed by ſo many Hiſtorians (6).

(5) In his Secret Hiſtory, cited by Triſtan, Comment. Hiſtoriques, vol. 1. pag. 346.

(6) Triſtan, ibid.

DONALDSON (a) (WALTER), born at Aberdeen in Scotland, bore ſome rank among the learned men of the 17th Century. He had been in the retinue and ſervice of David Cuningham, Biſhop of Aberdeen, and Peter Junius, Great Almoner of Scotland, when they went on an Embaſſy from King James to the Court of Denmark, and to the Princes of Germany. After his return home, he went to Heidelberg, where the famous Dionyſius Gothofredus taught the Civil Law. Donaldſon, having there dictated to ſome young Students a ſhort Courſe of Moral Philoſophy, ſoon ſaw himſelf dubbed an Author before he was aware of it; for the young man of Riga in Livonia, who put that (a) Konig calls him Donaldſonius: it ſhould have been Donaldſonus; for ſo the Author names himſelf in the Title of his Books.

that Manuſcript to the preſs [A], aſked nobody's leave for ſo doing. The Author, when he informs us of this, forgets not the ſeveral Editions which were made of that Work in Germany, and in Great Britain: neither does he forget the Plagiariſm of Keckerman [B]. He was afterwards Profeſſor of Natural and Moral Philoſophy, and of the Greek tongue, in the Univerſity of Sedan, and was Principal of the College ſixteen years; after which he was invited to open a College at Charenton; but that eſtabliſhment was immediately oppoſed by Law. Not to remain idle while the Law-ſuit was depending, he ſet himſelf to collect from among his papers the ſeveral parts of his Synopſis Oeconomica, which he got printed at Paris in 1620, in 8vo, and dedicated it to the Prince of Wales. It is a Book worth reading (b), and was reprinted at Roſtoch, in 8vo, in the year 1624. That wherein he reduced into Common Places, and under certain General Heads, all that lies ſcattered in Diogenes Laertius concerning the ſame thing, may likewiſe have its uſes (c). It was printed in Greek and Latin, at Francfort, in the year 1612, under the title of Synopſis Locorum communium, in qua ſapientiæ humanæ imago repræſentatur, &c.

(b) Barthius, in Stat. pag. 39, having quoted ſomething out of it, calls the Author Sani judicii hominem.

(c) See the Preface of the Synopſis Oeconomica.

[A] A young man . . . . put to the preſs the Manuſcript of his Courſe of Moral Philoſophy.] His name was Vernerus Becker. The Sieur Konig was not well acquainted with the date of this Work, ſince he ſays the Author made his Synopſis Ethica in 1631. It is the ſame Book with the Synopſis Moralis Philoſophiæ, printed in 1604, according to the Oxford Catalogue.

[B] He does not forget the Plagiariſm of Keckerman.] The Collection of Plagiaries publiſhed by Thomaſius, Profeſſor of Leipſic, does not contain the Accuſation which is here brought againſt Keckerman. I ſhall ſet down our Author's words at length, becauſe a blunder will be ſeen in them, which may be of ſome uſe to the Readers, to inſtruct them the better to form a judgment on Compilations. Acceſſit & eorum non tacitum, utcunque ſuppreſſo meo nomine, teſtimonium qui ex eo ſcripſerunt, & in ſyſtemata ſua quæ ad guſtum vidébantur tranſtulerunt. Keckermannum cum meis qui conferet, haud vana hæc aut oſtentationi dicta reperiet: plagii manifeſtarii ex eo mangonem deprehendent, quod ne erroribus quidem mutatis, tanquam mancipiorum nominibus, familiæ ſuæ pleraque adſcripſerit. Specimen accipe, quod libri ſecundi cap. 5. mendoſe ab operis erat vulgatum, plagiarius qui authorem ipſum ne de nomine quidem habebat notum ſic nothum citat. Hoc loco ſubjicimus præclaram ſententiam Caſſii quæ eſt 2. lib. epiſtolarum Ciceronis: ipſi homini duplices manus, ſoclas aures, oculos geminos divina tribuerunt, & quæ ſequuntur. At vero apud Ciceronem nuſquam iſta extat ſententia, nec eo libro ulla vel Caſſii ad Ciceronem vel Ciceronis ad Caſſium epiſtola: verba autem ſunt Amalaſuenthæ Reginæ apud Caſſiodorum epiſtola tertia libri 10. variarum quam Senatui Romano ſcribit, rationem reddens cur fratrem in regni ſocietatem aſſumpſerit; cujus hoc eſt caput, aſtra ipſa cœli mutuo reguntur auxilio & vicario labore participato mundum ſuis luminibus adminiſtrant: ipſi quoque homini, &c (1). i. e. "Hereto we may add the not ſilent Teſtimony of "thoſe who, notwithſtanding my name has been "ſuppreſſed, have tranſcribed from it, and tranſplanted whatever ſuited their taſte into their own ſyſtems. "Whoever will take the pains to compare Keckerman with my work, will find that I do not ſpeak "out of vanity or oſtentation: they will diſcover the "barefaced plagiary by this; that he has generally "appropriated to himſelf what was written by me, "without ſo much as altering the miſtakes which appear, like the names of ſlaves, to detect him. For "inſtance, a quotation had been falſe printed in the "fifth Chapter of the ſecond Book; and the Plagiary, who knew not ſo much as the name of the "real Author, quotes a fictitious one in this manner. Here I ſhall ſubjoin a notable ſaying of Caſſius, "in the ſecond Book of Cicero's Epiſtles: Nature has "given man two hands, two ears, and two eyes &c. "Now this ſentence is no where to be found in Cicero, nor is there in that Book any Epiſtle either "from Caſſius to Cicero, or from Cicero to Caſſius: "but the words are Queen Amalaſuentha's, and are "extant in the third Epiſtle of the 10th Book of "Caſſiodorus's Collection, which ſhe wrote to the "Roman Senate, to acquaint them with the reaſon "why ſhe had taken her brother as a partner in the "throne; of which this is the ſubſtance: The very "ſtars of heaven are directed by mutual aſſiſtance, "and adminiſter light to the world by ſharing alternate labour: ſo nature has given man &c." If we were to look for ſuch faults in Keckerman, we might find them in abundance. It is uſual with thoſe who compoſe at the expence of their neighbour: they carry away the houſehold-ſtuff and the ſweepings alſo; they take the corn, the ſtraw, the chaff, and the duſt at the ſame time. Rem auferunt cum pulviſculo (2).

(1) Donaldſonus, Præfat. Synopſis Oeconom.

(2) See Plautus in Prologo Truculenti, ver. 19.

DONATUS (JEROME) a noble Venetian. I ſhall add ſomething to what Moreri has ſaid of him. He commanded in Breſcia in the year 1496, and had already publiſhed his Tranſlation of Alexander Aphrodiſeus's Book de anima (a). Two years after he commanded in Ferrara (b). He died at Rome, after he had reconciled the Republic of Venice with Pope Julius II, and before the French had marched out of Italy (c). His children ſuppreſſed the Writings which the affairs of State had hindred him from perfecting (d). One of his Letters which we have extant contains a deſcription of the Earthquake which happened in Candia, while he commanded there (e). He has been inſerted by Pierius Valerianus in the Liſt of unfortunate learned men [A]. We ſhall ſee the Judgment which Eraſmus made of him [B].

(a) Petrus Bembus, Epiſt. 6. lib. 2. pag. m. 450.

(b) Idem, Epiſt. 7. lib. 2. pag. 451.

(c) Paulus Jovius, Elog. cap. 56. pag. 132.

(d) Idem, ibid.

(e) Idem, ibid.

DONATUS

[A] He has been put . . . . into the Liſt of unfortunate learned men.] And this for three reaſons. I. Becauſe his Domeſtics obeyed him ſo ill, and cauſed him ſo much vexation, that if he had not found ſome comfort in his ſtudies, he would have been the moſt miſerable of men. II. Becauſe having had a thouſand difficulties to rub through, with incredible patience, to appeaſe the fierce temper of Julius II, he had not the ſatisfaction of enjoying the fruit of ſo many fatigues; for he fell ſick the very day that he had concluded the Treaty between that Pope and the Venetians, and his diſtemper was ſo violent a fever that it quickly carried him off: ſo that the happineſs he procured his country, againſt a moſt obſtinate oppoſition of fortune, was never ſeen by him. III. Becauſe almoſt all the Works which he had written to immortalize his name, remained buried in obſcurity (1), a very mortifying diſgrace to learned men (2). The Author who ſays all this, obſerves that our Donatus was not ignorant of any ſcience, and that he was a Poet, an Orator, a Philoſopher, a Divine, and a Mathematician, in an eminent degree.

(1) Quod eruditis indigniſſimum eſt ærumnarum genus. Pier. Valerian. de Literat. Infelic. lib. 1. pag. 62. Edit. Amſt. 1647.

(2) Extracted from Pierius Valerianus, ibid.

[B] We ſhall ſee the Judgment which Eraſmus made of him.] He had ſcarce ſeen any more of Donatus's Writings than his Letters, and yet he believed him to have been a man who might eaſily have ſucceeded in any Literary enterprize, if State Negotiations had allowed him to dedicate himſelf intirely to the culti-

DONATUS (MARCELLUS), Count of Ponzano, and Knight of St. Stephen, was a Florentine; but he ſettled at the Court of the Duke of Mantua, where he had ſome conſiderable employments (a). He died in the beginning of the ſeventeenth Century, before the Impreſſion of his Scholia in Latinos Romanæ Hiſtoriæ Scriptores was finiſhed. His Relation Frederic Donatus took care to get the remaining part printed, and they were publiſhed at Venice in the year 1604. Gruterus inſerted them in the 6th Volume of his Theſaurus Criticus, in the year 1607. It is agreed that Donatus had ſome learning; but yet his Work is ſpoken of in terms not greatly for his honour. We ſhall ſee what Caſaubon thought of it [A], and we ſhall add to it the Judgment of Barthius [B].

(a) See the Remark [B].

[A] We ſhall ſee what Caſaubon thought of it.] This is to be found in his Commentary on Suetonius, in the 11th Chapter of the Life of Julius Cæſar. Tropæa ſemper ſcribendum, ſays he, non trophæa. Nullo enim modo ferendus eſt Marcellus Donatus, qui tantum hoc loco perdit verborum, ut probet veram ſcriptionem eſſe trophæa. Fuit omnino vir ille plurimarum literarum, & in Romana antiquitate adprime verſatus: ſed qui Græcæ eruditionis plane expers eſſet, ἀφύσαρον Criticum ubique ſeſe prodit. Cujuſmodi ſane hoc eſt illius judicium. i. e. "We ſhould always write tropæa, "not trophæa. Marcellus Donatus is unſufferable, "who throws away ſo many words in this place to "prove the true ſpelling to be trophæa. He was in"deed a man of conſiderable learning, and extremely "well verſed in the Roman Antiquities; but being "utterly deſtitute of the Greek language, every "where diſcovers himſelf to be an aukward Critic, "of which this judgment of his may be an in"ſtance."

[B] We ſhall add to it the Judgment of Barthius.] If the whole be taken together, it is rather diſobliging than otherwiſe. I ſhall tranſcribe it at length: and we ſhall ſee ſome facts in it which relate to the Hiſtory of our Donatus; we ſhall there find him firſt a Plagiary, and then a Copier from our modern Copiers. Vide multis Andream Tiraquellum ad Legem Nonam Connubialem, pag. CCLX. Et Marcelli Donati Dilucidationes in Tacitum, pag. CXXII. Pleriſque auctorum teſtimoniis Tiraquello debitis. Eum hominem fuiſſe plurimarum Litterarum, & in Romana Antiquitate benè verſatum, judicium eſt Iſ. Caſauboni, Ultima Editione Suetonii, ubi de Tropæi orthographia ſermo eſt. Nos nihil inde detrahimus. Tamen exſcriptorem ſtrenuum recentium, & quidem vulgatorum, Rhapſodorum, ipſorumque adeo Lexicographorum, agnoſcimus. Editæ ſunt ejus Lucubrationes Venetiis, Anno M. DC. IV. Ut mirum ſit tot paginis in Suetonium ſcriptis, non meminiſſe præclari Caſauboni Commentarii, qui toto decennio ante prodiit. Ipſe ſe in Comitatu Principis Mantuani fuiſſe memorat, & in eo Germaniam habitaſſe, ad Claudium Suetonii, cap. VIII. Eidem Principi fuit à Libellis & Secretis, in Domitianum Ejuſdem, cap. VII. Legatus quoque, deportandis Nuptialibus Muneribus, ad Capitolini Claudium Albinum. Habuit ſuburbanum, idque coluit, Montanariæ, quod eſt oppidum tertio à Mantua Miliario. Quamvis autem hoc quod modo de exſcriptione Neotericorum dixi, verum ſit, etiam illud quod de ſumma Græci ſermonis imperitia ipſe fatetur, & notat Caſaubonus; certum tamen fuiſſe in multis ſani Judicii hominem, & qui Juventutis commodo bene ſecerit. Nos iſta ea de cauſa huc adnotavimus, ut ſtudioſa juventus melius ejus Dilucidatoris meritum agnoſcere, & cautius omnia arbitrari poſſit (1). i. e. "Conſult An"drew Tiraquellus at large on the ninth matrimonial "Law, pag. CCLX. and Marcellus Donatus's Ex"planatory Notes on Tacitus, pag. CXXII: moſt of "the Teſtimonies of Authors are owing to Tiraquel"lus. Caſaubon, in his laſt Edition of Suetonius, "where he ſpeaks of the Orthography of the word "Tropæum, acknowledges him to be a man of con"ſiderable learning, and well verſed in the Roman "Antiquities. From this judgment we ſhall detract "nothing. However, I know him to be a great "Tranſcriber from Modern Writers, and even the "moſt common, as Rhapſodiſts, Lexicographers, &c. "His Lucubrations were printed at Venice, in the "year MDCIV; wherefore it ſeems very ſuprizing "that he ſhould write ſo many pages on Suetonius, "and not ſo much as once mention the excellent "Commentary of Caſaubon, which had been pub"liſhed full ten years before. In his Notes on the "8th Chapter of Suetonius's Life of Claudius, he "ſays he was in the Duke of Mantua's retinue, and attended him in Germany: in his Notes on the 7th "Chapter of the ſame Author's Life of Domitian, "he tells us he was Secretary to that Prince; and "in his Notes on Capitolinus's Life of Claudius "Albinus, that he was his Embaſſador, to carry the "nuptial preſents. He had a Country Seat which he "lived in at Montanaria, three miles from Mantua. "Though what I have juſt now obſerved of his copying the Moderns be true, and alſo what he himſelf "confeſſes, and Caſaubon mentions, of his being ut"terly unacquainted with the Greek Language; it is "however certain that he has ſhewn himſelf in many "inſtances a man of ſound judgment, and has been of "great ſervice to young ſcholars. It is for their "ſakes that I have made theſe remarks, the better "to acquaint them with the merit of this Annotator, "and to enable them to form their judgment with the "greater caution." Barthius was in the right to think it of uſe to give young men ſuch information.

(3) Eraſmus, in Ciceroniano, pag. m. 71, 72.

(1) Barthius in hæc verba Statij Sævæ novercæ, Silv. 1. lib. 2. ver. 49. pag. 171.

DONEAU (HUGH), in Latin Donellus, one of the moſt learned Civilians of the ſixteenth Century, was born at Chalons on the Saone (a), in the year 1537. His Schoolmaſter, a ſevere man, and a great whipper, had ſo diſheartened him, that neither threats nor promiſes could make him return to ſchool [A]. But at laſt, being afraid he ſhould be (a) And not in a Town near Autun, as Moreri aſſerts, being deceived by theſe Words of Meurſius, in Heduis natus, which he did not underſtand.

[A] His ſchoolmaſter . . . . had ſo diſheartened him, that they could not make him return to ſchool.] Perhaps the Reader will be glad to ſee the Latin words of the Author who acquaints me with this fact. Cum puer ob Præceptoris plagoſi ſævitiam à ludo literario planè alienaretur, ut nullis minis aut blanditiis ad eum reduci poſſet, fortè accidit, ut pater ejus pertranſeuntem iſtâc paſtorem ſuarium cerneret, quo ad ſe vocato, coram filio, rogare inſtitit, ecquid famulo opus haberet? eſſe ſibi domi filium, quem ei mancipare cuperet, averſum à literis & immorigerum. Eâ voce puer adeò conterritus eſt, ut rem ſeriò agi exiſtimans, & flens parentis genibus advolutus eum obteſtaretur, ne ſe filium ſuum in eas ſordes projiceret, velle ſe literis deinceps operam ſtudioſè dare (1). i. e. "Having, when a boy, taken "ſuch an averſion to the ſchool, by reaſon of his "maſter's harſhneſs, that he could not be prevailed on "to return to it either by fair means or by foul, his "father happening to ſee a ſwine-herd paſſing by, "called him, and aſked him before his ſon, whether "he had occaſion for a ſervant, telling him that he "had a ſon who was undutiful, and hated learning, "and was deſirous of putting him out as a ſervant "to him. The lad was ſo terrified at this, thinking "his father in earneſt, that burſting into tears he "fell at his father's feet, and begged of him not to "throw him into ſo ſordid a condition, promiſing "that he would apply himſelf diligently to his ſtudy "for the future."

(1) Freherus, in Theatro, pag. 924.

be put out ſervant to a Swineherd, he promiſed to ſtudy diligently for the future. He learned Civil Law at Toulouſe under the Profeſſors John Cotraſius and Arnold du Ferrier (b), who had no leſs than four thouſand Auditors. He was admitted to the degree of Doctor of Civil Law at Bourges in the year 1551, and profeſſed that Science in the ſame city, with Duaren, Hotman, and Cujacius [B]. He afterwards profeſſed it at Orleans. He was very near being killed in the maſſacre of 1572 (c), becauſe he was a Proteſtant; and he could not have eſcaped the violence of the murtherers, if ſome of his ſcholars, who were Germans by nation, had not ſaved him by diſguiſing him in a German dreſs, as one of their domeſtics. He had embraced the Reformation when very young, at the inſtigation of his ſiſter. He ſtayed ſome time at Geneva; and afterwards he went into the Palatinate, where he taught the Civil Law in the Univerſity of Heidelbergh. He was invited to Leyden in the year 1575, to take upon him the ſame employment: he accepted it, and diſcharged it in a worthy manner. But becauſe he was ſo imprudent as to engage himſelf farther than he ought to have done in Leiceſter's faction [C], he was forced to leave Holland in the year 1588. He returned to Germany, and was Profeſſor of Law at Altorf all the reſt of his life. He died the 4th of May 1591. He had ſo happy a memory, that he knew the whole Corpus Juris by heart (d). You will find the Titles of ſome of his Works in Moreri: the reſt are of the ſame nature. He had endeavoured all his Life to leſſen the reputation of Cujacius by criticiſing him (e). Thuanus has been guilty of ſome miſtakes [D].

(b) See Remark [B].

(c) Note, that according to Thuanus, lib. 52. pag. 1082, 1083. he then taught at Bourges.

(d) Taken from the Theatre of Paul Freherus, pag. 924, where he quotes Vitæ Profeſſorum Leidenſium, and the Funeral Program of Hugo Donellus.

(e) See the Remark [D].

DONI

[B] He profeſſed Civil Law at Bourges with Duaren, Hotman, and Cujacius.] The Author whom I have quoted (2) gives him one Collegue more, namely, Eguinard Baron; but as I know Eguinard Baron died in the year 1550, I would not affirm that he was Profeſſor of Law at the ſame time with Doneau, who, according to my Author's (3) own account, did not teach Law at Bourges till after he had taken his Doctor's degree in that ſcience, in the year 1551. It was Duaren who conferred that degree on him, the 17th of July. The Speech which he made on that occaſion in praiſe of Doneau is printed among his Works. Father Jacob (4), who had read Doneau's funeral Oration made by Scipio Gentilis, has diſtinguiſhed what ought to be diſtinguiſhed better than Paul Freher. He has contented himſelf with ſaying that Doneau was very aſſiduous at the Lectures of Eguinard Baron, and at thoſe of Francis Duaren, that he inſinuated himſelf into their favour, and Duaren eſpecially expreſſed a ſingular affection for him. I have corrected another fault of Paul Freher: he calls one of the Profeſſors of Toulouſe, whoſe ſcholar our Doneau was, Arnoldum Ferronum; whereas he ſhould have called him Arnoldum Ferrerium, as Father Jacob has done. Take this for one example of the negligence I have mentioned above (5).

(2) Paul Freher.

(3) Paul Freher.

(4) Ludovicus Jacob, de claris Scriptor. Cabilonenſibus, pag. 42.

(5) In the Remark [B] of the Article DEMETRIUS, Citation (19).

[C] He was ſo imprudent as to engage himſelf . . . in Leiceſter's faction.] Leiceſter had brought 6000 Engliſh into Holland, towards the end of the year 1585; and inſtead of maintaining the liberty of that new Republic, he endeavoured to poſſeſs himſelf of the Sovereignty: and as he was not ignorant that the people, ſupported by the Preachers, ſtuck to the Governor's intereſt againſt the Magiſtrate's party, he dexterouſly fomented thoſe diſpoſitions of the people, wherein he ſucceeded with ſo much the greater eaſe, as the oppoſite faction drew on themſelves the hatred of the Eccleſiaſtics, by oppoſing the authority of the Conſiſtories. Mr. Huber (6), who informs me of this, adds that thoſe who were on the ſide of the Conſiſtories maintained that the Sovereignty did not belong to the Magiſtrates, but to the people; a propoſition which the States of Holland ordered to be condemned the 16 of October 1587. All theſe intrigues of Leiceſter filled the new Commonwealth with factions; and ſome plots were diſcovered, whereby he endeavoured to ſeize on the greateſt towns, and particularly on Leyden and Dort. Theſe were the affairs which our Donellus was found to be concerned in, and for which he was baniſhed (7). Eam conjunctionem (plebis & Concionatorum cum Gubernatore) Leiceſtrius imprimis curæ habuit, obtrectando optimatibus, & concionatores plebeſque ſpecie religionis ſibi conciliando. Quâ in re multum ei profuit, quod Optimates diſciplinæ Eccleſiaſticæ fere adverſabantur, & Conſiſtoria ſibi adverſa reputantes, quantum poterant, cohibere gaudebant. Quorum patroni viciſſim plebi inculcabant, jus ſupremum non eſſe penes Proceres, ſed penes populum, cui iſti rationem reddere cogerentur. Contrà quàm ſententiam Ordines Hollandiæ decretum ſive diſputationem publicam ediderunt 16 d. Octobris 1587 (8). A great many people will credit this rather on the authority of Mr. Huber, than on that of Grotius; for which reaſon I do not cite what the latter has ſaid in the fifth Book of his Hiſtory of the Netherlands. It is thus he ſhould be cited, and not in the fifth Book of his Annals (9). Doneau was not the only Profeſſor who caballed againſt the authority of the States in favour of England. Lambert Daneau, a French Miniſter who took refuge in Holland, and Profeſſor of Divinity at Leyden, engaged in the ſame cabal (10). If we may believe Thuanus, this was the faction of the Preachers and the populace, and their deſign was to ſubject the Republic to the Dominion of the Engliſh (11).

(6) Profeſſor of Civil Law at Franeker: he died the 8th of November 1694.

(7) Inſidiæ quoque civitatibus Hollandiæ occupandis, nominatim Dordraco Leidæque factæ ſunt, ubi proditores quidam capite, & Hugo Donellus Juris Anteceſſor exilio, mulctati ſunt. Ulricus Huber. in Hiſtoria Civil. tom. 2. pag. 413.

(8) Idem, ibid. pag. 412, 413.

(9) Mr. Teiſſier, Addit. aux Eloges, tom. 2. pag. 424. quotes the 5th Book of the Annals.

(10) Thuan. lib. 88. pag. 147.

(11) Thuan. lib. 88. pag. 146, & ſeq.

[D] Thuanus has been guilty of ſome miſtakes.] According to his narration we ſhould believe that Doneau, when he left France, went to Leyden. Qui cum primum Avarici Biturigum (12) diu docuiſſet, poſt tumultum Pariſienſem ſolum patrium vertere coactus Lugduni Batavorum aliquanto tempore hæſit (13). i. e. "Who having firſt taught for a long time at Bourges, "was after the Maſſacre of Paris obliged to quit his "native country, and ſtaid ſome time at Leyden." Now this is falſe: for after his flight he was Profeſſor at Heidelberg, before he was ſo in Holland. Beſides this, Thuanus is miſtaken in the age of our Profeſſor: he makes him to have lived as long as Cujacius, that is ſixty eight years (14); and yet Doneau's Epitaph (15) teſtifies that he died in the ſixty fourth year of his age. Pridie Eid. Majas, they are Thuanus's words (16), fatis conceſſit, eodem quo Cujacius ætatis anno, eo minore fama, quod illius famæ voce & ſcriptis obſtrepere tota vita pro ludo habuerit. i. e. "He "departed this life the 14th of May, in the ſame year "of his age as Cujacius did, but not in ſo great fame, "having made it the diverſion of his whole life to "ſpeak and write againſt the reputation of that great "Civilian." See the XXIVth Letter of Voſſius, in page 73. I am ſurprized Thuanus ſhould not know the Zacharias Furneſterus of whom he ſpeaks is our Doneau: it was he who under that fictitious name refuted the Apology of the maſſacre of Paris ſent to the Diet of Poland in 1572 by the Biſhop of Valence. Contra eam defenſionem biennio poſt contraria defenſio edita eſt admodum virulenta à Gallo quodam in Germania profugo, Zachariæ Furneſteri nomine, quæ cum Monlucii nomen & pudorem admodum ſugillaret, anno poſt Lugduni publicatur adverſus illum Furneſteri libellum pro Joanne Monlucio Epiſcopo & Comite Valentino Dienſi præſcriptio elegantiſſime ſcripta à Jacobo Cujacio J. C. hujus ætatis principe, nomine tamen ſuppreſſo (17): i. e. "Two years after a moſt virulent Refutation of that "Defence was publiſhed by a Frenchman, who had "taken refuge in Germany, under the name of Za"chary Furneſter; which reflecting very ſeverely on "the character and reputation of Monluc, the next "year a Reply was publiſhed at Leyden to the Libel "of Furneſter, in defence of John Monluc Biſhop "and

(12) That is, at Bourges, and not at Bourdeaux, as is ſaid in the Tranſlation of Thuanus, in Teiſſier, Eloges, tom. 2. pag. 160.

(13) Thuan. lib. 100. pag. 405.

(14) Idem, lib. 99. pag. 378.

(15) Apud Meurſium, Athen. Brat. pag. 132.

(16) Lib. 100. pag. 405.

(17) Thuan. Hiſt. lib. 53. pag. 1092, col. 1.

DONI (ANTONY FRANCIS) lived in the ſixteenth Century. He was a native of Florence, and publiſhed a great number of Italian Books [A], which made him paſs for a wit. His firſt writings expreſſed an abuſive and ſatyrical character; but this he did not ſo much to ſatisfy his own inclination, as in compliance with the requeſt of one of his friends. He ſuffered ſome Letters which were not written by him to be inſerted in his Works, which did him a great deal of prejudice; for the Authors of thoſe Letters preſently boaſted that they had compoſed all that had appeared under the name of Doni. He put an end to theſe inſults by publiſhing a new Edition of his Works in a better form, and purſuant to the good advice of the Academy of the Peregrini. He ſuppreſſed the Encomiums he had beſtowed on perſons unworthy of that honour, and he praiſed others whom he had injuriouſly cenſured. He died at Venice in the month of September 1574 (a). He had fixed his abode there towards the end of the year 1547, being then about thirty ſix years old (b). He was a member of the Academy abovementioned; the ſurname of Bizzarro, which he had taken, ſuited him admirably well; for he was one who not only in his Poems, but even in his Proſe Writings, followed very particular ways. His inventions and his concetti were ſtrange flights of imagination, and he ſtrove to diſtinguiſh himſelf by ſurprizing his Readers with fictions a little too extravagant. He was of a very good family [B].

(a) Extracted from Ghilini, Teatro d'Huomini Letterati, Parte 1. pag. 20.

(b) See the 224th page of his Inferni.

☞ DONNE

" and Count of Valence, written in a moſt elegant " ſtyle, by James Cujas, the greateſt Civilian of this " age, but without having his name ſet to it." Mr. Deckher (18) knew very well that Donellus was the Author of the Writing of the pretended Furneſterus; but he has been miſtaken in two particulars: 1, in ſaying that the Anſwer of Furneſterus was publiſhed in the year 1572; 2, in ſaying it was written to refute the Apology which Michael Seureus (a), a Knight of Malta, had made in the general Diet of Poland (19).

§ (a) Michael de Sévre, Knight of Malta, and Commander of the Order. The Journal of the reign of Henry III, and the Memoirs of Queen Margaret, ſpeak of him by the name of the Chevalier de Sévre. Rem. Crit.]

(18) Deckherus, de Scriptis Adeſpotis, pag. 263.

(19) Sub eadem Catharina infamis lanienæ Pariſienſis defenſor Michaël Seureus, Eques Hieroſolymitanus, coram Ordinibus regni Poloniæ fuit. Ibid.

[A] He publiſhed a great number of Italian Books.] Here is the Liſt which Ghilini has given of them (1). Quattro libri di Medaglie: le Novelle: tre Invettive, che hanno queſti titoli, il Baleno, la Saetta, e il Tuono: tre Dialoghi ſeparatamente ſtampati, cioè della Fortuna & Infelicita di Ceſare, della Muſica, e del Diſſegno: la Libraria, diviſa in due parti: un Trattato dell' Huomo in tutte le forme, per comparazioni, alla qual' Opera diede titolo di Microcoſmo: l'Eternita della Patria in cinque libri ſpiegata: una Comedia intitolata lo Stufaiuolo: i Marmi, ne' quali s'introducono più perſone a diſcortere: i Mondi: gl' Inferni: la Zucca: la Filoſofia morale: il Cancelliere: le Proſe antiche di Dante: la Guerra navale trà la ſacra Lega, e gl' Infedeli in verſi heroici narrata: le Stanze alla villaneſca: e le Lettere.

(1) Ghilini, Teatro, Parte 1. pag. 20.

I ſhall ſay ſomething of three or four of theſe Books, and ſhall begin with that which is intitled gl' Inferni. It is a quarto of 224 pages, printed at Venice, nell' Academia Peregrina, per Franciſco Marcolini, in the year 1553. The Author had then been at Venice above five years (2), and propoſed to ſpend the remainder of his life there. There are ſeven Hells in this work; Inferno de gli Scolari & de Pedanti. Inferno de mal Maritati, & de gli Amanti. Inferno de ricchi Avari, & de Poveri liberali. Inferno delle Puttane, & de Ruffiani. Inferno de Dottori ignoranti, Artiſti, & Legiſti. Inferno de Poeti & Compoſitori. Inferno de Soldati & Capitani poltroni &c. i. e. " The Hell of Scholars " and Pedants. The Hell of ill married people, and " of lovers. The Hell of rich miſers, and poor pro- " digals. The Hell of whores and rogues. The " Hell of ignorant Doctors, Artiſts, and Lawyers. " The Hell of Poets and Compoſers. The Hell of " Soldiers and cowardly Captains &c." This is but the firſt part of the Inferni del Doni. I do not know whether he ever publiſhed the remainder.

(2) See the 224th page of his Inferni.

He had already publiſhed another Work: the title of it, which I ſhall give you at length, may ſerve to acquaint us with this man's method. I Marmi del Doni Academico Peregrino. Ciò è Ragionamenti introdotti à farſi da varie conditioni d'Huomini, à luoghi di honeſto piacere in Firenze: ripieno di Diſcorſi in varie Scienze & Diſcipline, Motti arguti, Iſtorie varie, Proverbii antichi & moderni, Sentenze morali, Accidenti & Novellette morali; Diviſo in quattro Libri. Opera giovevole à perſone d'ogni ſtato per il corregimento de' Coſtumi, & per ogni profeſſione d'Huomini. i. e. " The " Marbles of Doni, Member of the Academy of the " Peregrini. That is to ſay, Dialogues ſuppoſed to " paſs between men of various conditions, in reputa- " ble places of diverſion in Florence: full of Diſ- " courſes in different Sciences, ſmart Sayings, various " Hiſtories, ancient and modern Proverbs, moral Sen- " tences, Moral Stories and Novels; divided into four " Books. A work uſeful for people of all conditi- " tions, for the reformation of manners, and for men " of all profeſſions, &c." I have not the firſt Edition of this Book, which is that of Venice 1552; but I have that of the year 1609, in Venetia, preſſo Gio. Battiſta Bertoni, in 4to.

Here is the Title of another Book, which he printed at the ſame place, appreſſo Fran. Rampazetto, in the year 1565, in 8vo: La Zucca del Doni Fiorentino, diviſa in cinque libri di gran valore, ſotto titolo di poca conſideratione. i. e. " The Gourd of Doni the Flo- " rentine, divided into five Books of great importance, " under a trifling title."

Ghilini obſerves that Doni's Libraria is divided into two parts; but Mr. Teiſſier ſpeaks of it in a different manner. La Libraria, ſays he (3), diviſa in tre Trattati: Nel primo ſono ſcritti li Autori volgari, con cento e piu Diſcorſi ſopra di quelli: Nel ſecondo, ſono dati in luce tutti i Libri che l'Autore ha veduti a penna, il nome de componitori dell' opere, i titoli, &c. le materie: Nel terzo, ſi legge l'inventione dell' Academie, inſieme con i ſopranomi, i motti, le impreſe, & l'opere fatte da tutti li Academici. In Vinegia appreſſo Gabriel Giolito de Ferrari, 1557, in 12, & ibidem apud Altobellum Salicatum, 1580, in 12. i. e. " The Libra- " ria is divided into three parts. The firſt comprizes " the Italian Authors, with above a hundred Diſ- " courſes upon them. The ſecond acquaints us with all " the Books which the Author had ſeen in manuſcript, " the names of the Writers, their titles, ſubjects &c. " The third treats of the inventions of the Academies, " with the ſurnames, motto's, devices, and works of " all their members."

(3) Teiſſier, in Catalogo Autorum, &c. pag. 22 of the Edit. of Geneva, 1686.

[B] He was of a very good family.] I have read a Letter which was written from Como by Benedetto Volpe, wherein he obſerves that he was great-grandſon of Salvino Doni, the contemporary of Dante, and a good Poet. Io non ho già la Poeſia per heredità, come voi, che ſete Figliuolo d'un Nipote de Salvino Doni, che fu compagno di Guitton Saluti, Meſſer Cino, & Dante, Franceſchin noſtro, & tutta quella ſchierra (4). i. e. " I have not Poetry by inheritance, as you have, who " are the ſon of a grandſon of Salvino Doni, the " companion of Guitton Saluti, Meſſer Cino, and " Dante, our Franceſchino, and all that tribe." Doni anſwered, that he was deſcended from a man who had brought from Rome the Coat of Arms which was preſented to the Florentines; that the poſterity of that man continued in Florence till the time of Farinata de gli Uberti; that then one Francis Doni, who was of the Ghibeline faction, choſe to leave Florence, rather than conſent the city ſhould be diſmantled (5). He married a woman of Fieſola; from which marriage ſeveral families are derived, which

(4) La Zucca del Doni, folio 312 verſo.

(5) Leandro Alberti, Deſcritt. di tutta l'Italia, folio m. 44 verſo, relates the fact otherwiſe, and without ſaying any thing of this Doni.

I

DONNE (JOHN), an excellent Poet and Divine of the ſeventeenth Century, was born of virtuous parents of the Romiſh Religion at London in the year 1573, and deſcended by the father's ſide of a very antient family in Wales, and by the mother's of that of Sir Thomas More, and Judge Raſtal (a). In the beginning of Michaelmas Term 1584 he became a Commoner of Hart-Hall in Oxford, with his younger brother Henry; and having continued there about three years (b) removed to the Univerſity of Cambridge, where he ſtaid till his ſeventeenth year, without having taken any degree at either Univerſity, on account of the oath to be adminiſtred to him for that purpoſe [A]. From Cambridge he was tranſplanted to Lincoln's-Inn for the ſtudy of the Law; but before his admiſſion into that Society, his father, who was a Merchant, died, and left him three thouſand pounds. His mother and his friends uſed their utmoſt efforts to keep him firm to the Romiſh Religion, in which he had been born; but his regard for truth engaged him in a ſerious examination of the Controverſies between that Church and the Proteſtants, which at laſt determined him in favour of the latter [B]. About the twenty firſt year of his age he reſolved to travel; and the Earl of Eſſex going firſt to Cales in 1596, and the Iſland Voyages in 1597, he attended his Lordſhip, and did not return to England, till he had ſtaid ſome years in Italy and Spain [C], where he made many uſeful obſervations of thoſe countries, and learned their languages to perfection (c). Soon after his return he was appointed by Sir Thomas Egerton, Lord Keeper of the Great Seal, his chief Secretary [D], in which poſt he continued five years (d); during which time he fell in love with Anne, the daughter of Sir George More, then Chancellor of the Garter, and afterwards Lieutenant of the Tower, and niece to the Lord Keeper's Lady; and marrying her privately in the year 1602 (e), was diſmiſſed from his

(a) Life of Dr. John Donne, &c. By Izaac Walton, pag. 11, 12. 4th edit. London 1675. Fuller his Church Hiſtory of Great Britain, B. 10. pag. 112 ſays, that he was by his mother's ſide great great grandſon to Sir Thomas More.

(b) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 554. 2d. edit. London 1721.

(c) Walton, pag. 11-15.

(d) Idem, pag. 15.

(e) In the Epitaph on her monument in the Church of St. Clement's Danes, ſhe is ſaid to have been married fifteen years, and died Auguſt the 15th 1617. See Strype's edition of Stowe's Survey of London, vol. 2. B. 4. pag. 113. edit. London 1720, in fol.

which are ſettled at Piſtoia, in Hungary, and in the Kingdom of Naples. Salvino Doni was deſcended from the latter. He made a Sonnet, to which Dante wrote an Anſwer, and which is printed in a Collection of ancient pieces (6). Moreri's Dictionary mentions the branches of this family which have ſettled in France.

(6) Taken from a Letter of Doni printed at the end of his Zucca, folio 314.

Take notice that all the Doni's are not noble; for ſome of them are deſcended from a Factor, or neceſſary man, who took his maſter's name; it being very frequent in Florence for thoſe who had been long employed to do the buſineſs of noble families, ſcandalouſly to aſſume the names of their patrons. Euui un' altra parte de Doni, che ſon nati d'un Fattore, il quale faceva le facende loro, come ne ſono molti nella Citta di Firenze, i quali uſurpono ſpeſſo la robba & i nomi delle caſe nobili, dove hanno fatto la fattoria molto tempo; coſa molto infame & vituperoſa (7).... vi ſapro dire quali ſono i Doni nobili diſceſi dalla vera caſa, & quali ſono i plebei venuti per via di fatterie (8).

(7) Il Doni, folio 314 verſo of the Zucca.

(8) Ibid. folio 315.

[A] Without taking any Degree at either Univerſity, on account of the Oath to be adminiſtered to him for that purpoſe.] He forbore taking any Degrees, by the advice of his friends, ſays Izaack Walton (1), who being for their Religion of the Romiſh Perſuaſion, were conſcionably averſe to ſome parts of the Oath, that is always tendered at thoſe times, and not to be refuſed by thoſe, that expect the titulary honour of their ſtudies.

(1) Life of Dr. John Donne &c. pag. 12. 4th edit. London 1675.

[B] His mother and his friends uſed their utmoſt efforts to keep him firm to the Romiſh Religion .... but his regard for truth engaged him in a ſerious examination .... which at laſt determined him in favour of the Proteſtants.] " His Mother, ſays Walton (2), and " thoſe, to whoſe care he was committed, were watch- " ful to improve his knowledge, and to that end ap- " pointed to him tutors both in the Mathematicks, " and in all the other liberal Sciences, to attend him. " But with theſe arts they were adviſed to inſtill in- " to him particular principles of the Romiſh Church; " of which thoſe Tutors profeſt (tho' ſecretly) them- " ſelves to be Members. They had almoſt obliged " him to their faith, having for their advantage, be- " ſides many opportunities, the example of his dear " and pious parents." Our Author himſelf likewiſe tells us (3), that he had uſed no inordinate haſte, nor precipitation in binding his conſcience to any local Religion. " I had a longer work, ſays he, to do than " many other men; for I was firſt to blot out certaine " impreſſions of the Romane Religion, and to wreſ- " tle both againſt the examples and againſt the rea- " ſons, by which ſome hold was taken, and ſome an- " ticipations early layde upon my conſcience, both " by perſons, who by nature had a power and ſupe- " riority over my will, and others who by their learn- " ing and good life ſeemed to me juſtly to claime " an intereſt for the guiding and rectifying of mine " underſtanding in theſe matters." He was now entered into the eighteenth year of his age; and at that time had betrothed himſelf to no Religion, that might give him any other denomination than a Chriſtian. And reaſon and piety had both perſuaded him, ſays Walton (4), that there could be no ſuch ſin as ſchiſm, if an adherence to ſome viſible Church were not neceſſary. About the nineteenth year of his age, he, being then unreſolved what Religion to adhere to, and conſidering of how much importance it was to chooſe the beſt, immediately laid aſide the ſtudy of the Law, and of all other Sciences, that might give him a denomination, and began ſeriouſly to examine the controverſies between the Church of Rome and the Proteſtants (5). But let us hear his own words upon this ſubject in the Preface to his Pſeudo-Martyr abovecited. " Although, ſays he, I apprehended " well enough, that this irreſolution not only retarded " my fortune, but alſo bred ſome ſcandal, and en- " dangered my ſpiritual reputation, by laying me open " to miſinterpretations; yet all theſe reſpects did not " tranſport me to any violent and ſudden determina- " tion, till I had, to the meaſure of my poore wit " and judgment, ſurveyed and digeſted the whole " body of Divinity controverted betweene ours and " the Romane Church. In which ſearch and diſqui- " ſition, that God, which awakened me then, and " hath never forſaken me in that induſtry, as he is " the Author of that purpoſe, ſo he is a witneſs of " this proteſtation, that I behaved my ſelfe; and " proceeded therein with humility, and diffidence in " my ſelfe; and by that, which, by his Grace I tooke " to be the ordinary meanes, which is frequent prai- " er and equall and indifferent actions." When he undertook this enquiry, he believed Cardinal Bellarmin to be the beſt Defender of the Romiſh Cauſe, and therefore applied himſelf to the examination of his reaſons. He proceeded in this ſearch with all moderate haſte, and about the twentieth year of his age ſhewed the then Dean of Glocester (6) all the Cardinal's Works marked with many weighty obſervations under his own hand (7).

(2) Ibid. pag. 12, 13.

(3) Preface to his Pſeudo-Martyr, § 4. edit. London 1610, in 4to.

(4) Pag. 13.

(5) Idem, ibid.

(6) Mr. Walton, pag. 14. ſays, that he cannot recollect that Dean's name.

(7) Walton, ubi ſupra, pag. 14.

[C] Staid ſome years in Italy and Spain.] The time, which he ſpent in Spain was at his firſt going into Italy deſigned for travelling to the Holy Land, and for viewing Jeruſalem and the Sepulchre of our Saviour. But at his being in the furtheſt parts of Italy, the diſappointment of company or of a ſafe Convoy, or the uncertainty of returns of money into thoſe remote parts, denied him that opportunity; which he often mentioned with regret (8).

(8) Idem, ibid. pag. 15.

[D] Appointed by Sir Thomas Egerton, Lord Keeper of the Great Seal, his chief Secretary.] His Lordſhip, during Mr. Donne's attendance upon him, treated him as a friend rather than a ſervant, appointing him a place at his own table, to which he eſteemed his company and diſcourſe to be a great ornament (9).

(9) Idem, ibid.

his place at the ſollicitation of Sir George More, and thrown into priſon [E]. Mr. Donne's circumſtances being now greatly reduced, he and his wife were entertained by their kinſman Sir Francis Wolley of Pitford in Surry for ſome years [F], till the death of Sir Francis, a little before which that Gentleman procured a perfect reconciliation between Sir George More and his ſon-in-law and daughter; Sir George engaging to pay Mr. Donne eight hundred pounds at a certain day, as a portion with his wife, or twenty pounds quarterly for their maintenance as the intereſt for it, till the portion was paid (f). Our Author then took a houſe in Micham (g) near Croydon in Surrey, where his wife and children remained; and for himſelf hired a lodging near Whitehall, whither his friends and occaſions drew him often, and where he was as often viſited by many of the Nobility and others of this Nation, "who uſed him in their counſels of greateſt conſi-"deration, and with ſome rewards for his better ſubſiſtence (h)." His acquaintance and friendſhip were likewiſe ſought by moſt Embaſſadors of foreign Nations, and by many other ſtrangers, whoſe learning or buſineſs occaſioned their ſtay in England. His fortune was now very narrow [G], and thus it continued with him for two years; all which time

(f) Walton, pag. 20-24.

(g) It appears from ſeveral of his Letters, that he lived at Micham in 1607.

(h) Walton, pag. 25.

. [E] Fell in love with Anne, the daughter of Sir George More . . . . and marrying her privately, was diſmiſſed from his place, . . . and thrown into priſon.] The young Lady lived in the Lord Keeper's family. Sir George More, her father, having had ſome intimation of their paſſion for each other, removed her to his own houſe at Lotheſly in Surrey; but it was too late, by reaſon of ſome faithful promiſes, which were ſo interchangeably paſſed, as never to be violated by either party. Theſe promiſes were only known to themſelves; and the friends of both uſed much diligence and many arguments to divert their paſſion, but in vain. For they found methods to come together, and compleat their marriage. The news of this, in favour to Mr. Donne, and with his allowance, was made known to Sir George More by his honourable friend and neighbour Henry Earl of Northumberland. Sir George was ſo highly exaſperated, that he immediately engaged his ſiſter, the Lord Keeper's Lady, to join with him to procure his Lordſhip to diſcharge Mr. Donne from his place. This requeſt was followed with violence; and tho' Sir George was put in mind, that errors might be over-puniſhed, and deſired therefore to forbear till ſecond conſiderations might clear ſome ſcruples; yet he became reſtleſs till his ſuit was granted. The Lord Keeper at Mr. Donne's diſmiſſion ſaid, that he parted with a friend, and ſuch a Secretary, as was fitter to ſerve a King than a ſubject. Sir George More was not ſatisfied with this, and never reſted till our Author and his fellow pupil at Cambridge, Mr. Samuel Brook, afterwards Maſter of Trinity College in that Univerſity, who married him, and his brother Mr. Chriſtopher Brook, who gave Mrs. Donne in marriage, and witneſſed it, were all committed to three ſeveral priſons. Mr. Donne was firſt ſet at liberty, and never ceaſed till he had procured the enlargement of his two friends. However his wife was detained from him, and he was obliged to recover her by a long and tedious ſuit at Law, which proved troubleſome and ſadly chargeable to him, whoſe youth, and travel, and needleſs bounty, had brought his eſtate into a narrow compaſs (10). At laſt his great merit and winning behaviour gained ſo much upon Sir George More, that as the world had approved his daughter's choice, ſo he likewiſe was ſo far mitigated that he uſed his own and his ſiſter's intereſt with the Lord Keeper, that his ſon-in-law might be reſtored to his place. But the Lord Keeper anſwered, that tho' he was unfeignedly ſorry for what he had done, yet it was inconſiſtent with his place and credit, to diſcharge and readmit ſervants at the requeſt of paſſionate petitioners. Sir George's endeavours for Mr. Donne's readmiſſion were kept ſecret; but it was not long before he appeared ſo far reconciled, as to wiſh their happineſs, and not to deny them his paternal bleſſing; but yet refuſed to contribute any means towards their ſupport (11).

(10) Idem, pag. 18.

(11) Idem, pag. 18, 19.

[F] Entertained by their kinſman Sir Francis Wolley of Pitford in Surry for ſome years.] Moſt of the years, that he lived with Sir Francis, he ſtudied the Civil and Canon Law; in which he gained ſo perfect a knowledge, as was judged to hold proportion with many, who had made that ſtudy the employment of their whole life (12). As his charge encreaſed, (his wife every year bringing him a child,) ſo did Sir Francis's love and bounty (13). At this time Dr. Thomas Morton, afterwards Biſhop of Durham, ſent to Mr. Donne to deſire to ſpeak with him, and inform'd him, that the King having the day before made him Dean of Glouceſter (14), he would readily quit to his friend a Benefice of equal value with the Deanery; and therefore deſired Mr. Donne to wave all his expectations from the Court, and enter into holy Orders. Mr. Donne departed, according to Dr. Morton's deſire, without any Anſwer till the third day, and then his Anſwer, after returning him thanks for his generous offer, was to this effect: "Sir, my re-"ſuſal is not for that I think my ſelf too good for "that calling, for which Kings, if they think ſo, "are not good enough; nor for that my education "and learning, tho' not eminent, may not, being "aſſiſted with God's grace and humility, render me "in ſome meaſure fit for it. But I dare make ſo dear "a friend as you are my Confeſſor: ſome irregulari-"ties of my life have been ſo viſible to ſome men, "that though I have, I thank God, made my peace "with him by penitential reſolutions againſt them, "and by the aſſiſtance of his grace baniſhed them "my affections; yet this, which God knows to be "ſo, is not ſo viſible to man, as to free me from their "cenſures, and it may be that ſacred calling from a "diſhonour. And beſides, whereas it is determined "by the beſt of Caſuiſts, that God's glory ſhould be "the firſt end, and a maintenance the ſecond motive to "embrace that calling; and though man may pro-"poſe to himſelf both together; yet the firſt may "not be put laſt without [illegible] of conſcience, "which he that ſearches the heart will judge. And "truly my preſent condition is ſuch, that if I aſk "my own conſcience, whether it be reconcileable to "that rule, it is at this time ſo perplexed about it, "that I can neither give my ſelf nor you an anſwer. "You know, Sir who ſays, Happy is that man, "whoſe conſcience doth not accuſe him for that thing, "which he does. To theſe I might add other reaſons, "that diſſuade me; but I crave your favour, that I "may forbear to expreſs them, and thankfully de-"cline your offer."

(12) Idem, pag. 24.

(13) Idem, pag. 20.

(14) He ſucceeded Dr. G. Lewys in the Deanery of Glouceſter in 1607.

[G] His fortune was now very narrow.] This appears from ſeveral of his Letters publiſhed by his ſon (*). In his Letter to the Honourable Sir R. D. he writes thus (15). "With me, Sir, it is thus: there "is not one perſon, beſides my ſelf, in my houſe well. "I have already loſt half a child, and with that "miſchance of hers my wife fallen into an indiſpo-"ſition, which would afflict her much, but that the "ſickneſs of her children ſtupifies her; of one of "which, in good faith, I have not much hope. This "meets a fortune ſo ill provided for phyſique and ſuch "relief, that if God ſhould eaſe us with burialls, I "know not well how to perform even that. I flat-"ter my ſelf in this, that I am dying too; nor can "I truly die faſter by any waſte, than by loſs of "children." Mr. Walton, who gives this paſſage with ſome variation, tells us, that the Letter was written Auguſt 10th from Micham; and in the Poſtſcript Mr. Donne mentions his Epithalamium on the Earl of Somerſet's marriage, which is probably that printed in his Poems (16), and dated December 26th 1613, the day of the marriage. In another Letter (17) addreſſed to Sir Henry Goodere he writes as follows: The Devil doth not only ſuffer, but provoke us to ſome things naturally

(*) Letters to ſeveral Perſons of Honour: written by John Donne, ſometime Deane of St. Paul's London. Publiſhed by John Donne, Doctor of the Civill Law, pag. 152, 153. London 1654 in 4to.

(15) Ibid. pag. 152, 153.

(16) Poems by J. D. With Elegies on the Author's Death, pag. 123, & ſeqq. edit. London 1633 in 4to.

(17) Letters, pag. 49, 50, 51.

time his family remained at Micham, whither he often retired to ſtudy ſome points of controverſy between the Engliſh and Romiſh Church, and eſpecially thoſe of Supremacy and Allegiance. But at laſt he removed with his family to London, where Sir Robert Drury aſſigned him and his wife an apartment in his magnificent houſe in Drury-Lane. April 18, 1610 he was incorporated Maſter of Arts in the Univerſity of Oxford (i). In 1612 he accompanied Sir Robert Drury to Paris [H]. Before this journey, and during his

(i) Wood, Faſti Oxon. vol. I. col. 187.

turally good, upon condition that we ſhall omit ſome other more neceſſary and more obligatory. And this is his greateſt ſubtlety, becauſe herein we have the deceitful comfort of having done well, and can hardly ſpie our errour, becauſe it is but an inſenſible omiſſion, and no accuſing act. With the firſt of theſe I have often ſuſpected my ſelf to be overtaken, which is, with a deſire of the next life; which though I know it is not meerly out of a wearineſſe of this, becauſe I had the ſame deſires, when I went with the tide, and enjoyed fairer hopes than now; yet I doubt worldly encumbrances have encreaſed it. I would not that death ſhould take me aſleep; I would not have him meerly ſeize me, and onely declare me to be dead, but win me, and overcome me. When I muſt ſhipwrack, I would do it in a ſea, where mine impotencie might have ſome excuſe; not in a ſullen weedy lake, where I could not have ſo much as exerciſe for my ſwimming. Therefore I would fain do ſomething; but that I cannot tell what, is no wonder. For to chuſe, is to do; but to be no part of any body, is to be nothing. At moſt, the greateſt perſons are but great worms and excreſcences; men of wit and delightfull converſation, but as moales for ornament, except they be ſo incorporated into the body of the world, that they contribute ſomething to the ſuſtentation of the whole. "This I made account that I began early, "when I underſtood the ſtudy of our Laws; but "was diverted by the worſt voluptuouſneſs, which is "an hydropique immoderate deſire of human learn- "ing and languages; beautiful ornaments to great "fortunes; but mine needed an occupation, and a "courſe, which I thought I entred well into, when "I ſubmitted my ſelf to ſuch a ſervice, as I thought "might employ thoſe poor advantages, which I "had. And there I ſtumbled too; yet I would try "again; for to this hour I am nothing, or ſo little, "that I am ſcarce ſubject and argument good enough "for one of my own letters; yet I fear, that doth "not ever proceed from a good root, that I am ſo "well content to be leſſe, that is, dead." In another Letter to the ſame Gentleman we have the following paſſage (18): I have contracted a ſickneſſe, which I cannot name or deſcribe. . . . If it be the gout, I am miſerable, for that affects dangerous parts, as my neck and breſt, and (I think fearfully) my ſtomach, but it will not kill me yet. I ſhall be in this world, like a porter in a great houſe, ever neareſt the door, but ſeldomeſt abroad. I ſhall have many things to make me weary, and yet not get leave to be gone. If I go, I will provide by my beſt means, that you ſuffer not for me in your bonds . . . . . Sir, you would pity me, if you ſaw me write, and therefore will pardon me if I write no more. My pain hath drawn my head ſo much awry, and holds it ſo, that mine eye cannot follow mine hand. I receive you therefore into my prayers, with mine own weary ſoul, and commend my ſelf to yours. I doubt not but next week I ſhall be good news to you, for I have mending or dying on my ſide, which is two to one. If I continue thus, I ſhall have comfort in this, that my bleſſed Saviour exerciſing his juſtice upon my two worldly parts, my fortune and body, reſerves all his mercy for that, which beſt taſte it, and moſt needs it, my ſoul. I profeſſe to you truly, that my loathneſſe to give over now, ſeems to my ſelf an ill ſign, that I ſhall write no more. We ſhall add one paſſage more from another of his Letters (19): "I write from the fire-ſide in "my parler, and in the noiſe of three gameſome chil- "dren, and by the ſide of her, whom becauſe I have "tranſplanted into a wretched fortune, I muſt labour "to diſguiſe that from her by all ſuch honeſt devices, "as giving her my company and diſcourſe. There- "fore I ſteal from her all the time, which I give this "Letter; and it is therefore that I take ſo ſhort a "liſt, and gallop ſo faſt over it. I have not been "out of my houſe ſince I received your pacquet. As "I have much quenched my ſenſes, and diſuſed my "body from pleaſure, and ſo tried how I can en- "dure to be mine own grave; ſo I try now how I "can ſuffer a priſon. And ſince it is but to build one "wall more about our ſoul, ſhe is ſtill in her own "center, how many circumſtances ſoever fortune or "our own perverſeneſſe caſt about her. I would I could "as well intreat her to go out, as ſhe knows whether "to go. But if I melt into a melancholy whileſt I "write, I ſhall be taken in the manner, ; and I ſit "by one too tender towards theſe impreſſions; and it "is ſo much our duty to avoid all occaſions of giv- "ing them ſad apprehenſions, as St. Hierome ac- "cuſes Adam of no other fault in eating the apple, "but that he did it ne contriſtaretur delicias ſuas."

(18) Ibid. pag. 31-37.

(19) Ibid. pag. 137, 138.

[H] Accompanied that Gentleman to Paris.] Mr. Walton tells us (20), that "the Lord Hay was by "King James ſent upon a glorious Embaſſy to the "then French King Henry IV; and Sir Robert put "on a ſudden reſolution to accompany him to the "French Court, and to be preſent at his audience "there. And Sir Robert put on as ſudden a reſolution "to ſubject Mr. Donne to be his companion in that "journey." But there are two groſs miſtakes in this paſſage; for, I, The Lord Hay was not ſent Embaſſador to France till July 1616 (21), whereas Henry IV of France was killed on the 3d of May 1610; II. Mr. Donne was not at Paris with Sir Robert Drury at the ſame time that the Lord Hay was Embaſſador there, but in the year 1612; as is evident from ſeveral of his letters publiſhed at London 1654 in 4to. by his ſon John Donne, Doctor of the Civil Law. There is one dated at Paris April the 9th 1612 New Style (22); another dated there April the 14th New Style (23), in which he ſays, that he hopes to ſee England before Chriſtmas; another dated at the Spa July the 26th 1612 New Style (24), in which he obſerves, that he made account to be in England about the end of Auguſt. Mr. Walton informs us (25), that when Sir Robert Drury firſt requeſted Mr. Donne to be his companion in that journey, Mrs. Donne, who was then with child, and under a dangerous habit of body, profeſt an unwillingneſs to allow her huſband any abſence from her, ſaying, that her divining ſoul boded her ſome ill in his abſence. Mr. Donne therefore laid aſide all thoughts of the journey; but Sir Robert became ſo importunate, that Mrs. Donne at laſt gave a faint conſent to the journey, which was propoſed to be but for two months. Within a few days after Sir Robert Drury, and Mr. Donne left London; and on the twelfth day arrived ſafe at Paris. Two days after Mr. Donne was left alone in the room, in which Sir Robert and he and ſome other friends had dined together. To this place Sir Robert returned within half an hour, and as he left, ſo he found Mr. Donne alone, but in ſuch an ecſtaſy, and ſo altered as to his looks, as amazed Sir Robert to behold him; ſo that he earneſtly deſired Mr. Donne to declare what had befallen him in the ſhort time of his abſence? Mr. Donne was not able to make a preſent anſwer; but after a long and perplexed pauſe, at laſt ſaid, I have ſeen a dreadful viſion ſince I ſaw you: I have ſeen my dear wife paſs twice by me through this room, with her hair hanging about her ſhoulders, and a dead child in her arms. This I have ſeen ſince I ſaw you. To which Sir Robert anſwered; Sure, Sir, you have ſlept ſince I ſaw you; and this is the reſult of ſome melancholly dream, which I deſire you to forget, for you are now awake. Mr. Donne anſwered; "I cannot be "ſurer that I now live, than that I have not ſlept ſince "I ſaw you; and am as ſure, that at her ſecond ap- "pearing ſhe ſtopt and looked me in the face, and "vaniſhed." Reſt and ſleep had not altered his opinion the next day, for he then affirmed this viſion with a more deliberate and ſo confirmed a confidence, that he inclined Sir Robert to a faint belief that the viſion was true. It is truly ſaid, that deſire and doubt have

(20) Pag. 28, 29.

(21) See Camden's Annals of King James I, ad. ann. 1616. and Wilſon's Life and Reign of King James I, pag. 92, 93. edit. London 1653, fol.

(22) Letters to ſeveral Perſons of Honour. Written by John Donne, pag. 127, & ſeqq.

(23) Ibid. pag. 237-239.

(24) Ibid. pag. 89-93.

(25) Pag. 28, 29.

his ſtay in France, and after his return, many of the Nobility and others ſollicited the King for ſome ſecular employment for him [I]; but his Majeſty, who frequently took pleaſure in his converſation, and had engaged him in writing his Pſeudo-Martyr [K], printed at London in 1610 in 4to, was ſo highly pleaſed with that work, that in 1614 he have no reſt; and it proved ſo with Sir Robert, for he immediately ſent a ſervant to Drury-Houſe, with a charge to haſten back, and bring him word, whether Mrs. Donne was alive? and if alive, in what condition ſhe was as to her health? The twelfth day the meſſenger returned with this account; that he found and left Mrs. Donne very ſad and ſick in her bed; and that after a long and dangerous labour ſhe had been delivered of a dead child. And upon examination the abortion proved to be the ſame day, and about the very ſame hour that Mr. Donne affirmed he ſaw her paſs by him in his chamber (25). Mr. Walton obſerves (26), that though this ſtory was not related to him by Mr. Donne himſelf, it was told me, ſays he, (now long ſince) by a perſon of honour, and of ſuch intimacy with him, that he knew more of the ſecrets of his ſoul, than any perſon then living; and I think he told me the truth; for it was told with ſuch circumſtances and ſuch aſſeverations, that (to ſay nothing of my own thoughts) I verily believe he that told it me, did himſelf believe it to be true. In one of our Author's letters (27), which appears to be written from Paris before Eaſter (28), and is addreſſed to Sir G. F. he has theſe words: "I am yet in the ſame perplexity, "which I mentioned before; which is, that I have "received no ſyllable neither from herſelf nor by "any other, how my wife hath paſſed her danger, "nor do I know whether I be increaſed by a child, "or diminiſhed by the loſſe of a wife." Before Mr. Donne entered upon this journey he gave his wife the following copy of verſes, which Mr. Walton tells us (29) he heard "ſome critics, learned both in lan-"guages and poetry ſay, none of the Greek or Latin "Poets did ever equal."

(25) Idem, pag. 29, 30.

(26) Pag. 32.

(27) Letters to ſeveral Perſons of Honour, pag. 74.

(28) This appears from theſe words in that Letter; Preſently after Eaſter (I think) we ſhall go to Frankford to be there at the Election.

(29) Pag. 33.

A Valediction, forbidding to mourn.

As virtuous men paſs mildly away,
And whiſper to their ſouls to go,
Whileſt ſome of their ſad friends do ſay,
The breath goes now, and ſome ſay, no:

So let us melt, and make no noiſe;
No wind-ſighs, or tear-floods us move:
'Twere profanation of our joys
To tell the Laity our love.

Movings of th' earth cauſe harms and fears:
Men reckon what they did or meant.
But trepidation of the ſpheares,
Though greater far, is innocent.

Dull ſublunary lovers love
(Whoſe ſoul is ſenſe) cannot admit Abſence; becauſe that doth remove Thoſe things that elemented it.

But we, by a ſoul ſo much refin'd,
That our ſouls know not what it is,
Inter-aſſured of the mind,
Care not hands, eyes, or lips to miſs.

Our two ſouls therefore, which are one,
Though I muſt go, endure not yet
A breach, but an expanſion,
Like gold to aiery thinneſs beat.

If we be two, we are two ſo,
As ſtiff twin-compaſſes are two:
Thy ſoul, the fixt foot, makes no ſhow
To move, but does, if th' other do.

And though thine in the center ſit;
Yet when my other far does rome,
Thine leans, and hearkens after it,
And growes erect as mine comes home.

Such thou muſt be to me, who muſt,
Like the other foot, obliquely run:
Thy firmneſs makes my circle juſt,
And me to end, where I begun.

[I] Many of the Nobility and others ſollicited the King for ſome ſecular employment for him.] This we are informed of by Mr. Walton (30), who obſerves likewiſe, that the King had "given him ſome hopes "of a State-Employment, being always much pleaſed "when Mr. Donne attended him, eſpecially at his "meals, where there were uſually many deep diſ-"courſes of general learning, and very often friend-"ly diſputes or debates of Religion betwixt his Ma-"jeſty and thoſe Divines, whoſe places required their "attendance on him at thoſe times, particularly the "Dean of the Chapel, who was then Biſhop Moun-"tague (31), the Publiſher of the learned and eloquent "works of his Majeſty, and the moſt Reverend Dr. "Andrews, the late learned Biſhop of Wincheſter, who "was then the King's Almoner." The ſame Writer likewiſe tells us (32), that among others, who ſollicited for a ſecular poſt for our Author, was the Earl of Somerſet, when in the greateſt height of favour; who being then at Theobalds with the King, where one of the Clerks of the Council died that night, poſted a meſſenger for Mr. Donne to come to him immediately; and at Mr. Donne's coming, ſaid, Mr. Donne, to teſtify the reality of my affection and my purpoſe to prefer you, ſtay in this garden till I go up to the King, and bring you word that you are Clerk of the Council. Doubt not my doing this, for I know the King loves you, and know the King will not deny me. But the King gave a poſitive denial to all his requeſts, and replied, I know Mr. Donne is a learned man, has the abilities of a learned Divine, and will prove a powerful Preacher; and my deſire is to prefer him that way, and in that way I will deny you nothing for him. It appears from one of his letters (33), that Mr. Donne ſollicited for the place of one of his Majeſty's Secretaries in Ireland upon the death of Sir Geoffry Fenton. "I have made ſome offer, ſays he, for the place, in "preſervation whereof, as I have had occaſion to im-"ploy all my friends, ſo I have not found in them "all (except Bedford) more haſte and words (for when "thoſe two are together, there is much comfort even "in the leaſt) then in the Lord Hay. In good faith "he promiſed ſo roundly, ſo abundantly, ſo profuſely, "as I ſuſpected him; but performed whatever he "undertook, (and my requeſts were the meaſures of "his undertakings) ſo readily and truly, that his com-"plements became obligations, and having ſpoke "like a Courtier, did like a friend.... I know not "yet what conjecture to make of the event. But I "am content to go forward a little more in the "madneſs of miſſing rather than not pretend, and "rather wear out, than ruſt."

(30) Pag. 34, 35.

(31) Dr. James Mountague, Biſhop of Wincheſter.

(32) Ubi ſupra, pag. 35, 36.

(33) Pag. 145, 146. The Letter is addreſſed to Sir H. Goodere.

[K] His Pſeudo-Martyr.] The title of it is as follows: Pſeudo-Martyr. Wherein out of certaine propoſitions and gradations this concluſion is evicted; that thoſe, which are of the Romane Religion in this Kingdome, may and ought to take the oath of Allegeance. London 1610 in 4to. It is dedicated to King James I. Mr. Walton tells us (34), that ſeveral diſputes having ariſen concerning the Oath of Supremacy and Allegiance, in which the King had appeared, and engaged himſelf by his public writings, and his Majeſty diſcourſing with Mr. Donne concerning many of the reaſons, which are uſually urged againſt the taking of thoſe oaths, apprehended ſuch a validity and clearneſs in his ſtating the queſtions, and his anſwers to them, that his Majeſty commanded him to beſtow ſome time in drawing the arguments into a method, and then to write his anſwers to them; and having done that, not to ſend, but to be his own meſſenger and bring them to him. To this he immediately applied himſelf, and within ſix weeks brought them to the King in his own hand-writing, as they are now printed. The Work contains 392 pages in 4to. beſides a long Preface addreſſed to the Prieſtes, and Jeſuites, and to their Diſciples in this Kingdome, in which he hath the following paſſage (35). And if they (the Popiſh Writers) will be content to impute to me all humane infirmities, they ſhall neede to faine nothing. I am, I confeſſe, obnoxious

(34) Pag. 35.

(35) § 2. and 3. The pages of the Preface are not numbered.

he prevailed with him to enter into Holy Orders [L], and the ſame month appointed him one of his Chaplains, and upon the King's viſiting the Univerſity of Cambridge, recommended him to it for the Degree of Doctor of Divinity, which was immediately conferred upon him (k). His abilities and induſtry in his profeſſion were ſo conſpicuous, and himſelf ſo well beloved by perſons of Quality, that within the firſt year of his taking Orders, he had fourteen Advowſons of ſeveral Benefices offered him; but being unwilling to leave London he refuſed them. Immediately after his return from Cambridge (l) his wife died on the 15th of Auguſt 1617, on the ſeventh day after the birth of her twelfth child (m), and her death overwhelmed him with grief [M]. In this time of ſadneſs he was choſen Preacher to the honourable Society of Lincoln's-Inn [N], and was extremely valued by that Society. In 1619 he attended the Earl of Doncaſter in his Embaſſy into Germany *. In 1621 he was made Dean of St. Paul's (n) [O]; and in March 162$\frac{3}{4}$ the Vicarage of St. Dunſtan in the Weſt in London fell to him by the death of Dr. Tho. White [P], the Advowſon of it having been given to him long before by Richard Earl of Dorſet. By theſe and another Eccleſiaſtical Endowment, which fell to him about the ſame time, given him formerly by the Earl of Kent, he was enabled to become charitable to the poor, and kind to his friends, "and to make ſuch proviſion "for his children, that they were not left ſcandalous, as relating to their or his profeſ- "ſion and quality (o)." In 162$\frac{3}{4}$ he was choſen Prolocutor to the Convocation (p). About (k) Walton, pag. 41.

(l) Idem, ibid.

(m) See her Epitaph in Strype's edition of Stowe's Survey of London, ubi ſupra.

* In the 3d Volume of his Sermons is a Sermon of Valediction preached at Lincoln's-Inn April 18, 1619, on Eccleſ. xii. 1. at his going to Germany.

(n) He was elected Nov. 27, 1621. See Faſti Eccleſ. Anglicanæ by John Le Neve Gent. pag. 185. edit. London 1716 in fol.

(o) Walton, pag. 47.

(p) Fuller's Church Hiſtory of Great Britain, Book 10. pag. 112.

obnoxious enough: My naturall impatience not to digge painefully in deepe, and ſtony, and ſullen learnings; my indulgence to my freedome and libertie, as in all other indifferent things, ſo in my ſtudies alſo, not to betroth or enthral myſelfe to any one Science, which ſhould poſſeſſe or denominate me: My eaſineſs to afford a ſwete and gentle interpretation to all profeſſors of Chriſtian Religion, if they ſhake not the foundation, wherein I have in my ordinary communication and familiar Writings often expreſſed and declared myſelfe, hath opened me enough to their malice, and put me into their danger, and given them advantage to impute to me whatſoever ſuch degrees of laxines, of liberty, of irreſolution, can produce. But if either they will transferre my perſonal weakneſſes upon the cauſe, or extend the faults of my perſon to my minde, or to her pureſt part, my conſcience; if they will calumniate this poore and innocent worke of mine, as if it were written either for Oſtentation of any ability or faculty in my ſelfe; or for Provocation, to draw them to an aunſwere, and ſo continue a bookewarre; or for Flattery to the preſent State, which though my ſervices be by many juſt titles due to it, needes it not; or for Exaſperation, to draw out the civill ſword in cauſes, which have ſome pretence and colour of being ſpirituall; or to get occaſion hereby to uncover the nakednes, and lay open the incommodious and undefenſible ſentences and opinions of divers ſeverall Authors in that Church; or to maintaine and further a ſchiſme and diviſion amongſt you in this point of the Pope's pretences to temporal juriſdiction; I have no other ſhelter againſt theſe imputations, but an appeale to our bleſſed Saviour, and a proteſtation before his face, that my principall and direct ſcope and purpoſe herein, is the Unity and Peace of his Church. This Book of our Author was animadverted upon by Thomas Fitzherbert in his Cenſure of it, ſubjoined to his Supplement to the Diſcuſſion of Dr. Barlow's Anſwer to the Judgment of a Catholick Engliſh Man &c. interrupted by the death of the Author F. Robert Parſons a Jeſuit: printed at St. Omers 1613 in 4to.

[L] In 1614 the King prevailed with him to enter into holy Orders.] When his Majeſty had read and conſidered his Pſeudo-Martyr, he perſuaded him to enter into the Miniſtry; to which at that time he was and appeared to be very unwilling, apprehending it (ſuch was his modeſty) to be too weighty for his abilities (36). After this, as our Author informs us himſelf (37), the King deſcended to a perſuaſion, almoſt to a ſollicitation of him to enter into Holy Orders; which though Mr. Donne did not then refuſe, yet he deferred it for almoſt three years; all which time he applied himſelf to an inceſſant ſtudy of textual Divinity, and to the attainment of a greater perfection in the learned languages, Greek and Hebrew (38). He was ordained Deacon, and ſoon after Prieſt, by his dear friend Dr. John King, then Biſhop of London, who had been Chaplain to the Lord Keeper Egerton, at the ſame time that Mr. Donne was his Secretary (32). He ſoon became one of the moſt eminent Preachers of his time; and Mr. Chidley, a frequent hearer of his Ser-

(36) Walton, pag. 35.

(37) In his Devotions upon emergent Occaſions, London 1624 in 12mo.

(38) Walton, pag. 36.

(39) Idem, pag. 38.

mons, in his Elegy upon him, gives the following character of him in that reſpect.

——Each Altar had his fire——
He kept his love, but not his object, wit;
He did not baniſh, but tranſplanted it;
Taught it both time and place, and brought it home
To Piety, which it doth beſt become.
For ſay, had ever pleaſure ſuch a dreſs?
Have you ſeen crimes ſo ſhap't, or loveline ſs
Such as his lips did clothe Religion in?
Had not reproof a beauty paſſing ſin?
Corrupted nature ſorrowed that ſhe ſtood
So near the danger of becoming good.
And when he preach't, ſhe wiſh't her ears exempt
From Piety, that had ſuch pow'r to tempt.
How did his ſacred flattery beguile
Men to amend?

[M] His wife's death . . . . overwhelmed him with grief.] "She left, ſays Mr. Walton (40), a man of "a narrow unſettled eſtate, and (having buried five) "the careful father of ſeven children then living, to "whom he gave a voluntary aſſurance never to bring "them under the ſubjection of a ſtep-mother; which "promiſe he kept moſt faithfully, burying with his "tears all his earthly joys in his moſt dear and de- "ſerving wife's grave; and betook himſelf to a moſt "retired and ſolitary life. . . . . His firſt motion from "his houſe was to preach, where his beloved wife "lay buried (in St. Clement's Church near Temple- "Bar London;) and his Text was a part of the Pro- "phet Jeremy's Lamentation; Lo, I am the man, "that have ſeen affliction."

(40) Pag. 41, 42, 43.

[N] Choſen Preacher to the honourable Society of Lincolns-Inn.] Mr. Walton tells us (41), that he was choſen upon the removal of Mr. (42) Thomas Gataker; but this is a groſs miſtake, for Mr. Gataker left Lincoln's-Inn for the Rectory of Rotherhith in Surrey in 1611 (43), which was ſix years before Dr. Donne was choſen there.

(41) Pag. 43.

(42) Mr. Walton ſtiles him Dr.; which is a miſtake; for Mr. Gataker only took the Degree of Bachelor of Divinity.

(43) See Mr. Simeon Aſhe's Funeral Sermon on Mr. Tho. Gataker, preached at Redrith near London, Auguſt 1, 1654, pag. 48. edit. London 1654 in 4to.

[O] In 1621 he was made Dean of St. Paul's.] Dr. Valentine Carey, his Predeceſſor in that Deanery, being advanced to the Biſhopric of Exeter, and by that means the Deanery becoming vacant, the King ſent for Dr. Donne, and appointed him to attend him the next day at dinner. When his Majeſty was ſate down, before he had eat any meat, he ſaid, "Dr. "Donne, I have invited you to dinner; and though "you ſit not down with me, yet I will carve to you "of a diſh, that I know you love well; for knowing "you love London, I do therefore make you Dean "of Paul's; and when I have dined, then do you "take your beloved diſh home to your ſtudy: ſay "grace there to your ſelf, and much good may it do "you (44)."

(44) Walton, pag. 46.

[P] In March 162$\frac{3}{4}$ the Vicarage of St. Dunſtan in the Weſt in London fell to him by the death of Dr. Thomas White.] Mr. Walton tells us (45), that it fell to him IMMEDIATELY after his admiſſion into his

(45) Pag. 47.

About that time he was seized with a dangerous sickness, which inclined him to a consumption; and upon his recovery he wrote and published a book of Devotions [Q]. In August 1630 being with his eldest daughter Mrs. Harvey at Abrey-Hatch in Essex, he fell into a fever, "which with the help of his constant infirmity, "vapours from the spleen, hastened him into a consumption (q)." However he preached in his turn at Court on the first Friday in Lent following upon Psalm lxviii. 20 [R], and died on the 31st of March 1631, and was interred in the Cathedral of St. Paul's, where a monument was erected for him. His writings [S] shew him to be a man of incomparable wit and learning; and he was highly celebrated by all the great men of that his Deanery . . . by the death of Dr. White. But this is a mistake; for he was admitted into his Deanery in the latter end of 1621, and the Vicarage of St. Dunstan's was not vacant till the death of Dr. White, which happened March 1st 162¾ (46). Dr. Donne's first Sermon at that Church, as Vicar there, was preached there April 11th 1624, and is printed in the second volume of his Sermons (47).

(q) Walton, pag. 51, 52.

(46) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 486.

(47) Sermon 45. pag. 422, & seqq.

[Q] He wrote and published a Book of Devotions.] The second Edition printed at London 1624 in 12mo, is intitled, Devotions upon emergent occasions, and several steps in his sickness.

[R] He preached in his turn at Court on the first Friday in Lent following upon Psalm 68. 20.] This Sermon was printed at London 1633 in 4to under the following title: Death's Duell: Or a Consolation to the Soule against the dying life and living death of the body. Deliuered in a Sermon at Whitehall before the Kings Majestie in the beginning of Lent 1630. By that late learned and reverend Divine, John Donne, Doctor in Divinity, and Deane of St. Pauls, London. Being his last sermon, and called by his Majesties Houshold, the Doctors owne Funeral Sermon. The Editor in his Preface tells us, that "this Sermon was, by sa-"cred authoritie, stiled the Author's own Funeral Ser-"mon: most fitly, whether wee respect the time, or "the matter. It was preached not many dayes be-"fore his death, as if having done this, there re-"mained nothing for him to doe but to die. And "the matter is of death, the occasion and subject of "all Funerall Sermons. It hath beene observed of "this reverend man, that his faculty in preaching "continually increased; and that as he exceeded o-"thers at first, so at last he exceeded himselfe."

[S] His Writings.] Besides those abovementioned he wrote the following works. An Anatomie of the World: wherein by the occasion of the untimely death of Mistris Elizabeth Drury, the frailty and the decay of this whole world is represented. A Poem in two Anniversaries. London 1625 in 8vo. The second Anniversary is intitled, The Progresse of the Soule: wherein by occasion of the religious death of Mistris Elizabeth Drury, the incommodities of the soule in this life, and her exaltation in the next, are contemplated. A Sermon on Judges v. 20. London 1622 in 4to. A Sermon preached before the King at Whitehall Febr. 24 1625 on Isaiah i. 1. published by his Majesty's Command. London 1626 in 4to. A Sermon on 2 Peter iii. 13. London 1627 in 4to. Juvenilia, or Paradoxes and Problemes. London 1633 in 4to. Divine Poems, with Epistles to Sir Henry Goodere. London 1633 in 4to. Poems by J. D. With Elegies on the Author's Death. London 1633 in 4to and 1635 in 8vo. Six Sermons. London 1634 in 4to. Eighty Sermons, published by his son, and dedicated to the King. London 1640 fol. in which are included the six Sermons abovementioned. This is called the First Volume of Dr. Donne's Sermons. Fifty Sermons. London 1649 in fol. Dedicated by his son to Basil Earl of Denby. There is likewise another Dedication to the Right Honourable Bolstred Whitlock, Richard Keeble, and John Leile, Lords Commissioners of the Great Seal, in which his son observes, that the "reward, which many years since "was proposed for printing these Sermons, had been "lately conferred on him by the authority of the "Great Seal." This is the second volume. Six and twenty Sermons. London 1661 fol. dedicated by his son to King Charles II. This is called the Third Volume of his Sermons. Fasciculus Poematum & Epigrammatum Miscellaneorum. Translated into Latin by Jaspar Main, D. D. with this title, A Sheaf of Miscellany Epigrams. London 1632 in 8vo. Ignatius his Conclave; or his Inthronisation in a late Election in Hell. London 1635 in 12mo. An Edition of this piece was published in 1626 in 8vo, intitled, Ignatius his Conclave, viz. of establishing a Church in the Moon. An Apologie for the Jesuits, printed with the former. Essayes in Divinity by the late Dr. Donne Dean of St. Paul's. Being several disquisitions interwoven with Meditations and Prayers, before he went into Holy Orders. Now made public by his son J. D. Dr. of the Civil Law. London 1651 in 12mo. In the Preface we are informed, that these Essays were printed from an exact copy under the Author's own hand; and that "they were the voluntary sacrifices of "several hours, when he had many debates betwixt "God and himself, whether he were worthy and com-"petently learned to enter into holy Orders. They "are now published both to testifie his modest valua-"tion of himself, and to shew his great abilities; and "they may serve to inform thee in many holy curio-"sities." Paradoxes, Problemes, Essayes, Characters, written by Dr. Donne, Dean of Paul's. To which is added a Book of Epigrams, written in Latin by the same Author; translated into English by J. Maine, D. D. As also Ignatius his Conclave, a Satyr translated out of the originall copy written in Latin by the same Author, found lately amongst his own papers. London 1653, in 12mo. The Dedication of these pieces by his son John Donne, Doctor of the Civil Law, to Francis Lord Newport, is dated from his house in Covent Garden March 2d 165⅔. Letters to severall Persons of Honour: written by John Donne, sometime Deane of St. Pauls London. Published by John Donne Dr. of the Civill Law. London 1654 in 4to. There are several Letters of his, and others to him from the Queen of Bohemia, the Earl of Carlisle, Archbishop Abbot, Ben Johnson, printed in a Book intitled, A Collection of Letters made by Sir Tobie Matthews, Knt. With a Character of the most excellent Ladie Lucy, Countesse of Carleile: by the same Author. To which are added many Letters of his own to severall Persons of Honour, who were contemporary with him. London 1660 in 8vo. This Book is dedicated to that Countess by John Donne, who was undoubtedly our Author's son, and the same, who published the abovementioned volume of his Letters of his father. Biathanatos: or a Declaration of that Paradox or Thesis, that self-homicide is not so naturally a sin, that it may not be otherwise. London 1644, 1648 &c. in 4to. Mr. Wood tells us (48), that he had seen the original under the Author's own hand in the Bodleian Library, dedicated to Edward Lord Herbert of Cherbury. Mr. Walton (49) stiles this an exact and laborious Treatise, wherein "all "the Laws violated by that Act are diligently survey-"ed and judiciously censured; a Treatise written in "his younger years, which alone might declare him "then not only perfect in the Civil and Canon Law, but "in many other such studies and arguments, as enter "not into the consideration of many, that labour to "be thought great Clerks, and pretend to know all "things." Among our Author's Letters is one (50) addressed to the noblest Knight Sir Edward Herbert Lord of Cherbury, sent to him with his Book Biathanatos; and another (51) addressed to Sir Robert Carre, afterwards Earl of Ankerum, and sent with that Book upon the Doctor's going to Germany. In this Letter he observes, that the Book was written by him many years before; and because, says he, it is upon a misinterpretable subject, I have always gone so near suppressing it, as that it is onely not burnt. No hand hath passed upon it to copy it, nor many eyes to read it; onely to some particular friends in both Universities, then when I writ it, I did communicate it; and I remember I had this Answer, that certainly there was a false thread in it, but not easily found, Keep it, I pray, with the same jealousie: let any, that your discretion admits to the sight of it, know the date of it, and that it is a Book written

(48) Ath. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 555.

(49) Pag. 60.

(50) Pag. 20, 21.

(51) Pag. 21, 22.

that age [T]. Lucius Lord Falkland ſtiles him (r) one of the moſt wittie and moſt eloquent of our modern Divines. Mr. Walſh (s) aſſerts, that "there never was "a more copious fancy, or greater reach of wit, than what appears in Dr. "Donne." And Mr. Dryden (t) gives him the character of the greateſt Wit, though not the greateſt Poet of our Nation; and he tells us (u), with regard to his poetical performances, that "he has great variety, multiplicity, and choice of thoughts; but that "he affects the metaphyſicks not only in his Satires, but in his amorous verſes, "where Nature only ſhould reign, and perplexes the minds of the fair ſex with nice "ſpeculations of Philoſophy, when he ſhould engage their hearts, and entertain them "with the ſoftneſſes of love." The ſame Writer afterwards writes thus: Would not Donne's Satires, which abound with ſo much wit, appear more charming, if he had taken care of his words and of his numbers? But he followed Horace ſo very cloſe, that of neceſſity he muſt fall with him. And I may ſafely ſay it of this preſent age, that if we are not ſo great Wits as Donne, yet certainly we are better Poets. Mr. Pope has given us two of his Satires in a very beautiful dreſs (x). He had a ſon of both his names, who was elected a Student of Chriſt Church in Oxford from Weſtminſter School in 1622, and afterwards took the Degree of Doctor of the Laws at Padua in Italy, and on the 30th of June 1638 was incorporated in the ſame Degree in the Univerſity of Oxford. He died in the winter of the year 1662, and was interred in the Church-yard of St. Paul's Covent-Garden (y). Mr. Wood tells us (z), that he was "no better all his life-time than an Atheiſtical Buf-"foon, a Banterer, and a perſon of over-free thoughts; yet valued by King Charles II;" that he was a man of ſenſe and parts; and that beſides ſeveral writings of his father, he publiſhed ſeveral frivolous trifles under his own name, among which is The Humble Petition of Covent-Garden againſt Dr. John Baber a Phyſician, anno 1662.

(r) Anſwer to Mr. Walter Mountague's Letter concerning the changing his Religion, ſubjoin'd to Lord Falkland's Diſcourſe of Infallibility &c. pag. 288. edit. London 1651.

(s) Preface to his Letters and Poems Amorous and Gallant.

(t) Preface to his Eleonora: a Panegyrical Poem dedicated to the Memory of the late Counteſs of Abingdon.

(u) Dedication of his Tranſlation of Juvenal, pag. 9, 10. 6th edit. London 1735 in 12mo.

(x) Works of Alexander Pope, Eſq; vol. 2. pag. 133, & ſeqq. edit. London 1735 in 12mo.

(y) Wood, Faſti Oxon. vol. 1. col. 276, 277.

(z) Ibid.

written by Jack Donne, and not by Dr. Donne. Reſerve it for me, if I live, and if I die, I only forbid it the preſſe and the fire. Publiſh it not, but yet burn it not, and between thoſe do what you will with it. Our Author tranſlated likewiſe from the Greek into Engliſh, The ancient Hiſtory of the Septuagint. London 1633 in 12mo; which Tranſlation was reviſed and very much corrected by another hand, and printed at London 1685 in 8vo (52). Mr. Wood propoſes a Quære, whether he was the Author of a piece intitled, A Scourge for Paper Perſecutors, printed in the reign of King James I. The running title at the top of every page is Paper's Complaint, and it contains three ſheets and an half in 4to. He left at his death, beſides an hundred and twenty Sermons all written with his own hand, the reſultance of 1400 Authors, moſt of them abridged and analyſed with his own hand (53). "All the buſi-"neſſes likewiſe that paſt of any public conſequence "either in this or any of our neighbouring Nations, "he abbreviated either in Latine, or in the language "of that Nation, and kept them by him for uſeful "memorials. So he did the copies of divers Letters "and Caſes of Conſcience, that had concerned his "friends, with his obſervations and ſolutions of them, "and divers other buſineſſes of importance, all par-"ticularly and methodically digeſted by him (54)."

(52) Wood, col. 556.

(53) Walton, pag. 60.

(54) Idem, ibid.

[T] Highly celebrated by all the great men of that Age.] At the end of the edition of his Poems printed in 1633 in 4to we have Elegies upon him written by Dr. Henry King, afterwards Biſhop of Chicheſter, Thomas Browne, Edward Hyde, afterwards Earl of Clarendon, Dr. Corbet, afterwards Biſhop of Oxford, Henry Valentine, Izaac Walton, the Writer of his Life, Thomas Carie or Carew, Sir Lucius Cary, afterwards Lord Falkland, Jaſpar Mayne, of Chriſt-Church Oxon, Arthur Wilſon the Hiſtorian, Endymion Porter, &c. Ben Johnſon ſent his Epigrams to our Author with theſe verſes:

Who can doubt, Donne, where I be a Poet bee?
When I dare ſend my Epigrams to thee;
That ſo alone canſt judge; ſo alone do'ſt make:
And in thy cenſures, evenly doſt take
As free ſimplicity to diſavow,
As thou has beſt Authority t' allow.
Read all I ſend, and if I finde but one
Mark'd by thy hand, and with the better ſtone
My title's ſeal'd. Thoſe that for claps do write,
Let punies, porters, players praiſe delight,
And till they burſt, their backs like aſſes load;
A man ſhould ſeek great glory, and not broad.

T.

DONZELLINUS (JEROM) a learned Italian Phyſician, and Author of ſome Books [A], flouriſhed in the ſixteenth Century. He was born at Orzi nuovi, in the territory of Breſcia, and practiſed Phyſic in Breſcia for ſome time: but he was conſtrained to leave that city, on account of a literary quarrel wherein he had engaged himſelf againſt Vincent Calzaveglia, in defence of Joſeph Valdagna (a). Theſe were two Phyſicians, the former of whom publiſhed a Book againſt the other, and was refuted in ſo terrible a manner by Donzellinus, that Joſeph Valdagna and his Advocate were both obliged to quit the city of Breſcia. The latter retired to Venice, and practiſed there with great ſucceſs; but it is ſaid he came to a tragical end, and that being accuſed of having in an execrable manner affronted the Majeſty of Religion, and that of the State, he was condemned to be thrown into the ſea (b). Cozzando, who furniſhes me with this Article, places this in the year 1560. A Book is aſcribed to this Phyſician, which may well belong to another JEROME DONZELLINUS [B].

(a) A Phyſician of Breſcia, a native of Verona.

(b) Leonardo Cozzando, della Libraria Breſciana, pag. 197, 198.

DORIEUS,

[A] He is the Author of ſome Books.] He tranſlated from Greek into Latin the Treatiſe of Galen de Ptiſana, and eight Orations of Themiſtius (1). His Conſilia & Epiſtolæ Medicæ are to be found in the Collection which Scholzius publiſhed in the year 1598, at Francfort. His Letter De natura &c. was printed at Venice, in 1570, in 4to. (2).

[B] A Book is aſcribed to him, which may well belong to another JEROME DONZELLINUS.] It is intitled Remedium ferendarum injuriarum, ſive de compeſcenda Ira, and was printed at Venice, in the year 1586, in 4to; at Altorf, in 1587, in 8vo; and at Leyden, in 1635, in 12mo. (3). The Oxford Catalogue, Lindenius renovatus, Leonardo Cozzando, Konig, &c. attribute it to the ſame Author who wrote the Books I have mentioned above; but I doubt whether they be in the right: for the Donzellinus who compoſed the Remedium ferendarum injuriarum, is ſurnamed Veronenſis in the Title of the Work; and it is certain that the other was ſurnamed Brixienſis (4).

(1) Printed at Baſil, apud Petrum Pernam, 1559, in 8vo. Epit. Geſneri, pag. m. 775.

(2) See Lindenius renovatus, pag. 419, 420.

(3) This Edition contains 256 pages.

(4) Epit. Geſneri, pag. 347.

If

DORIEUS, ſon of Diagoras the Rhodian, acquired incomparable glory in the public Games of Greece. His addreſs in thoſe exerciſes was hereditary: for his father held a very illuſtrious rank among the perſons who had won the prize in thoſe Games. Dorieus obtained crowns in the Olympic Games. He obtained eight crowns ſucceſſively in the Iſthmian Games, and won ſeven in the Nemean (a). See the Sequel of the Hiſtory in the Article of DIAGORAS (b).

(a) Ex Pauſanias, lib. 6. pag. 184.

(b) A famous Athlet, Remark [D].

If Cozzando had rightly fixed the tragical death of the latter under the year 1560, he would have been manifeſtly in the wrong in aſcribing to him the Remedium ferendarum injuriarum, a Work which the Author dedicates to Sixtus Vicedomini, Biſhop of Modena, and ſon of a ſiſter of Cardinal Moron. That Cardinal lived till the year 1580, and was dead when the Epiſtle Dedicatory of the Remedium ferendarum injuriarum was written. This Treatiſe is full of excellent Morality: the Author therein declares that he is not one of thoſe who think the immortality of the Soul cannot be proved by Philoſophical reaſons (5), and he endeavours to juſtify Galen, who is accuſed of having not diſtinguiſhed the Soul from the conſtitution of the Body (6).

(5) Donzell. Remed. ferend. Injur. pag. 143. 144. Lugd. Bat. 1635.

(6) Idem, ibid. pag. 143, & ſeq.

☞DORSET (THOMAS SACKVILLE Earl of), Lord Treaſurer to Queen Elizabeth, was deſcended of an antient family [A], and ſon of Richard Sackville Eſq; and born at or near Withyam in the County of Suſſex (a) in the year 1536 [B]. He was educated in the Univerſity of Oxford (b) in Hart-Hall (c), where he became an excellent Poet (d), as appears from his performances in that way [C]. He afterwards removed to Cambridge, where he had the degree of Maſter of Arts conferred on him (e); and

(a) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 347. 2d edit. London 1721.

(b) See A Sermon preached at Weſtminſter May 26, 1608, at the Funeral Solemnities of the Right Hon. Thomas Earle of Dorſet, late Lord High Treaſurer of England. By George Abbot Doctor of Divinitie, and Deane of Winchester, one of his Lordſhip's Chapleines, pag. 13. edit. London 1608 in 4to.

(c) Wood, ubi ſupra, and Faſti Ox. vol. 1. col. 142.

(d) David Lloyd's State-Worthies, pag. 677. 2d edit. London 1670.

(e) Wood, Ath. Oxon. ubi ſupra.

[A] Deſcended of an ancient family.] Mr. Arthur Collins informs us (1), that it is evident as well from the Norman Hiſtorians as other Authorities, that this family was of noble extraction in Normandy, and denominated from a Town and Seigniory of their name in that Province, of which they were owners. HERBRAND, Lord of the ſaid Seigniory of Sackvil, is mentioned in the Norman Hiſtorians to be one of the Nobles, who came into England with William the Conqueror, and returning into Normandy, was living there in the year 1079, having iſſue three ſons, Sir JORDAN DE SACKVIL, who was Sewer of England by Grant of William the Conqueror, but reſided in Normandy, where he died; Sir WILLIAM SACKVIL, who left three daughters, heirs to their brother; and Sir ROBERT SACKVIL, the third ſon, from whom is deſcended THOMAS SACKVIL, the firſt Earl of Dorſet, of whom we treat in this article, and who was ſon of RICHARD SACKVIL, Eſq; who was a Gentleman of eminent abilities, and was of the Privy Council to King Edward the VIth, Queen Mary, and Queen Elizabeth (2). By Winifrede his Lady, daughter of Sir John Bruges, Lord Mayor of London, and married ſecondly to William Paulet Marquis of Wincheſter, he left iſſue the abovementioned THOMAS SACKVILLE, and a daughter ANNE, married to Gregory Fines, Lord Dacres of the South, who dying without iſſue by him in the 37th year of Queen Elizabeth, was buried at Chelſea (3).

(1) Peerage of England. By Arthur Collins Eſq; vol. 1. pag. 384, 385. edit. London 1735 in 8vo.

(2) Idem, ibid. pag. 395.

(3) Idem, ibid. pag. 398.

[B] Born . . . in the year 1536.] Dr. George Abbot tells us (4), that he was ſuppoſed to be ſeventy two years old, when he died, which was on the 19th of April 1608.

(4) In his Sermon preached at Weſtminſter May 26, 1608, at the Funerall Solemnities of the Right Honourable Thomas Earle of Dorſet &c. &c. pag. 16.

[C] Became an excellent Poet, as appears from his performances in that way.] Fuller informs us (5), that while he continued at Oxford, he wrote ſeveral Latin and Engliſh Poems. And Mr. Wood obſerves (6), that thoſe Poems were publiſhed, yet I preſume, ſays he, they are loſt or forgotten, as having either no name to them, or that the copies are worn out. Mr. Joſeph Spence, Profeſſor of Poetry in the Univerſity of Oxford, remarks likewiſe (7), that "the Lord Buckhurſt "was (what perhaps all perſons of his birth ought "to be) a Poet only in his youth. All the latter "part of his life he was wholly taken up in State-"affairs. In both of theſe views he was one of the "moſt conſiderable men of his time." His poetical Writings, which are ſtill extant, are, I. The Introduction to the Mirrour of Magiſtrates, with a Preface in Proſe: II. The Story of the unfortunate Duke of Buckingham in Richard the ſecond's time: III. The Tragedy of Ferrex and Porrex, ſons to Gorboduc King of Britain. The Mirrour of Magiſtrates, as Mr. Spence obſerves (8), is an old faſhioned title to a ſett of Poems, which were very much applauded in their time. It conſiſted of examples of eminent bad men, who had come to miſerable ends. The inſtances were taken, here and there, from our Engliſh Hiſtory, without any great order. There was once a deſign of collecting all the examples from the beginning of our Hiſtory to their own times. "It was then (9), ſays Mr. "Spence, that Lord Buckhurſt wrote his Induction, "which was to have ſerved for an Introduction to the "whole: but as that deſign was afterwards dropt, it "was inſerted in the body of the work juſt, before one "of the particular ſtories written by the ſame hand." The Mirrour was printed at London in 1559 in 4to, in an old Engliſh character under the following title: A Mirrour for Magiſtrates, wherein may be ſeen by example of others, with how grievous plagues vices are puniſhed &c. We have now before us an Edition of 1563 in 4to. under the following title: A Myrrour for Magiſtrates. Wherein maye be ſeen by example of others, with howe grevous plagues vices are puniſhed: and howe frayle and unſtable worldly proſperity is ſounde even of thoſe, whom fortune ſeemeth moſt highly to favour. Anno 1563. Imprinted at London in Fleetſtreet: nere to Sayncte Dunſtan's Churche by Thomas Marſhe. It is dedicated to the Nobilitie and all other in Office by William Baldwin, who in the Epiſtle Dedicatory obſerves, that "the "Worke was begun, and parte of it prynted in Queene "Maries time, but hyndered by the Lorde Chaun-"cellor that then was: nevertheles, through the means "of my Lord Stafford, the fyrſt Parte was licenced "and imprynted the fyrſte yeare of the raygne of "this our moſt noble and vertuous Queene, and dedi-"cate then to your Honours wyth this Preface. Since "which time, although I have bene called to another "trade of lyfe, yet my good Lorde Stafforde hath not "ceaſed to call upon me to publyſhe ſo much as I "had gotten at other men's hands, ſo that through "his Lordſhyppes earneſt meanes, I have now alſo "ſet forth another parte, conteyning as little of myne "owne, as the firſt part doth of other mens. Which "in the name of all the Authors I humbly dedicate "unto your Honours, inſtantly wiſhing, that it may "ſo like and delyte your myndes, that your heartful "receyving therof may encourage worthy wittes to "enterpryſe and perfourme the reſt. Which as ſoone "as I maye procure, I entende, through God's leave "and your favourable allowaunce, to publiſhe with "al expedicion." In the Preface to the Reader Mr. Baldwin tells us, that the Printer having a deſign to publiſh Lydgate's Book of the Fall of Princes tranſlated from Boccace, was adviſed to procure the ſtory to be continued where Boccace left off to the preſent time, chiefly of ſuch as fortune had dalyed with here in this Yland; upon which he engaged ſeven Gentlemen of wit and learning to aſſiſt Mr. Baldwin in that Work, who all agreed, ſays that Writer, that I ſhould uſurpe Bocha's rowme, and the wretched Princes complayne unto me; and toke upon themſelves every man for his part to be ſundry perſonages, and in their behalfes to bewaile unto me their grevous chaunces, heavye deſtinies, and woful misfortunes. In the Preface to the ſecond part we are informed that the ſtory of Edmund Duke of Somerſet ſlain at St. Albans was written by Mr. Ferrers; that of Shore's Wife, Edward the IV's concubine,

(5) Worthies, in Suſſex. See likewiſe Lloyd's State-Worthies, pag. 677.

(6) Athen. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 347.

(7) Some Account of the Lord Buckhurſt and his Writings in a Letter to the Right Honourable the Earl of Middleſex, pag. 2. prefixed to the Tragedy of Gorboduc, written by Thomas Sackville Lord Buckhurſt, afterwards Lord Treaſurer to Queen Elizabeth and Earl of Dorſet, London 1736 in 8vo.

(8) Ibid. pag. 5.

(9) In 1557.

and thence to the Temple, where he took the degree of Barriſter, "and gave tokens of "ſuch pregnancy, ſuch ſtudiouſneſs, and judgment, that he was held no way inferior to "any of his time or ſtanding (f)." He was elected one of the Knights for the County of Weſtmorland to the Parliament held in the 4th and 5th years of the reign of King cubine, deſpoyled of all her goodes, and forced to do open penance, by Mr. Church-yard; that of Lord Haſtyngs by Mr. Dolman; that of King Richard III. by Francis Segars; and that of the Blackſmith and Lord Audleye executed for trayterous rebellion, by Mr. Cawyl. The occaſion of Mr. Sackville's Induction, was, as we are informed in this Book (10), "that after he un-"derſtoode, that ſome of the Counſayle would not "ſuffer the Booke to be printed in ſuche order as "we, ſays Mr. Baldwin, had agreed and determined, "he purpoſed with himſelfe to have gotten at my "handes all the Tragedies, that were before the Duke "of Buckingham's, which he would have preſerved in "one Volume. And from that time backward even "to the time of William the Conqueror he determined "to continue and perfect all the ſtory himſelf in ſuch "order as Lydgate (folowing Bochas) had already "uſed. And therefore to make a meete Induction "into the matter he deviſed this Poeſye, which in "my judgment is ſo wel penned, that I woulde not "have any verſe thereof left out of our Volume."

(f) Abbot, ubi ſupra.

(10) Fol. 114. averſo, & 115.

It is evident that Mr. Wood had never ſeen this Edition, ſince he tells us, that Mr. Sackvile wrote a Preface in proſe, and an Induction in verſe, ſet before the ſecond part of the Mirrour of Magiſtrates: not to that Edition of the Mirrour publiſhed by William Baldwyn, but that, I ſuppoſe, which was publiſhed by John Higens. In this paſſage Mr. Wood has committed two miſtakes; for 1. Mr. Sackville's Induction is printed in Mr. Baldwin's Edition: 2. Our Poet did not write a Preface in Proſe to the ſecond Part of the Mirrour. Mr. John Higens's Edition of that Work was publiſhed with additions in 1586; and in 1610 it was reprinted in 4to. by Richard Niccols, who added to it A Winter Night's Viſion, being an addition of ſuch Princes, eſpecially famous, who were exempted in the former Hiſtory. After his Epiſtle to the Reader follows his Induction in Verſe, and then the lives of certain Princes, with their pictures wrought from wooden cuts: viz. 1. King Arthur: 2. Edmund Ironſide, &c. The laſt is Richard III. To them is added, England's Elizabeth, or the glorious and triumphant reign of that Virgin Empreſs of ſacred memory Elizabeth, Queen of England, written by Mr. Niccols. But to return to the Lord Buckhurſt's Induction; the plan of it, is a deſcent into hell. The Poet feigns he deſcended thither in perſon, as Dante had done. Thoſe unhappy men were to have paſſed there in review before him: and each in his turn to have told his tale, his own faults, and his misfortunes. "This "piece is written, ſays Mr. Spence (11), very much "in Spenſer's manner. It abounds in the ſame ſort "of deſcriptions of ſhadowy beings, and is a good "deal in the ſame ſtile. The firſt time I read it, "theſe two Authors ſeemed ſo evidently of the ſame "ſchool, (for there are ſchools in Poetry, as diſtin-"guiſhable as thoſe in painting) that I immediately "concluded Lord Buckhurſt might be ſet down "as a ſcholar of Spenſer's. But when I came to com-"pare dates, it appeared that (if one formed himſelf "by the other) it muſt have been Spenſer, that was a "ſcholar of Lord Buckhurſt's. For his Induction was "written before Spenſer was ten years old; and indeed "he took to the ſtudy of Politicks and Management "of affairs ſo early, that he left off writing before "Spenſer began." We have ſeveral beautiful paſſages cited out of this Induction, in England's Parnaſſus: or the choyſeſt flowers of our modern Poets, with their poeticall compariſons, deſcriptions of beauties, perſonages, caſtles, pallaces, mountains, groves, ſeas, ſprings, rivers, &c. Whereunto are annexed other various diſcourſes both pleaſaunt and profitable. Imprinted at London for N. L. C. B. and T. H. 1600, in 12mo. This Book, which contains 494 pages, is dedicated in Verſe to Sir Thomas Mounſon Knt. by R. A. Since the abovementioned edition of the Mirrour of Magiſtrates is now very rarely to be met with, we ſhall tranſcribe ſome paſſages out of Lord Buckhurſt's Induction.

(11) Ubi ſupra, pag. 5.

He repreſents ſorrow appearing to him, whom he deſcribes in this manner.

Her body ſmall forwithered and foreſpent,
As is the ſtalke, that ſommers drought oppreſt,
Her wealked face with woful tears beſprent,
Her colour pale, and (as it ſeem'd her beſt)
In woe and playnt repoſed was her reſt.
And as the ſtone, that droppes of water weares,
So dented were her cheekes with fall of tears.

Her iyes ſwollen with ſtowing ſtreames aſlote,
Wherewith her lookes throwen up full piteous lye;
Her forceles handes together ofte ſhe ſmote,
With doleful ſtrikes, that echoed in the ſkye:
Whoſe playnt ſuch ſighes dyd ſtrayt accompany,
That in my doome was never man did ſee
A Wight but halfe ſo woe begon as ſhe.

He afterwards repreſents himſelf as conducted by ſorrow to hell, which he deſcribes in a very poetical manner.

"And firſt within the porche and jaws of hell
"Sate diepe Remorſe of Conſcience, al beſprent
"With tears; and to herſelfe oft would ſhe tell
"Her wretchednes, and curſing never ſtent
"To ſob and ſigh; but ever thus lament,
"With thoughtful care, as ſhe that all in vayne
"Would weare and waſte continually in payne.

"Her iyes unſtedfaſt rolling here and there,
"Whirl'd on eche place, as place that vengeaunce
"brought
"So was her mind continually in feare,
"Toſſed and tormented with the tedious thought
"Of thoſe deteſted crymes, which ſhe had wrought:
"With dreadful cheare and lookes throwen to
"the ſkye,
"Wiſhing for death, and yet ſhe could not die.

"Next ſawe we Dread al trembling how ſhe ſhooke,
"With foote uncertayne prefered here and there:
"Benumde of ſpeeche, and with a gaſtly looke
"Searcht every place al pale and dead for feare,
"His cap borne up with ſtaring of his heare,
"Stoynde and amazde at his own ſhade for dreed,
"And fearing greater daungers than was nede.

"And next within the entry of this lake
"Sate fell Revenge gnaſhing her teeth for yre,
"Deviſing meanes how ſhe may vengeaunce take,
"Never in reſt tyll ſhe have her deſire;
"But frets within ſo far forth with the fyer
"Of wreaking flames, that nowe determines ſhee
"To dye by death, or vengde by death to be."

Our Author next deſcribes Miſery in the following manner.

His face was leane, and ſum deale pyned away,
And eke his handes conſumed to the bone;
But what his body was, I cannot ſay,
For on his carkas rayment had be none,
Save clouts and patches pieced one by one:
With ſtaffe in hand, and ſkrip on ſhoulders caſt,
His chiefe defence againſt the winters blaſt.

His foode for moſt was wylde fruytes of the tree,
Unles ſumtime ſum crummes fell to his ſhare,
Which in his wallet long, God wote, kept he,
As on the which full dayntlye would he fare.
His drinke the running ſtreame; his cup the bare
Of his palm cloſed; his bed the hard cold grounde:
To this poor life was Miſerie ybound.

Whoſe wretched ſtate when we had well behelde,
With tender ruth on him, and on his feares,
In thoughtful cares, furth then our pace we helde,
And by and by another ſhape appears
Of greedy Care, ſtill bruſhing up the breres;
His knuckels knobde, his fleſhe deepe dented in,
With tawed handes, and hard ytanned ſkyn.

† The Peerage of England. By Arthur Collins Esq; vol. 1. pag. 399. edit. London 1735, in 8vo.

King Philip and Queen Mary; and in the first year of Queen Elizabeth was chosen for the County of Sussex, at the same time that his father was elected for Kent. In the fifth of that Queen he was returned one of the Knights for Buckinghamshire to the Parliament then held †. He travelled into France and Italy, where "he profited very much "in

The morrowe graye no sooner hath begunne
To spread his light even peeping in our eyes,
When he is up, and to his worke yrunne,
But let the nightes blacke mistye mantels rise,
And with fowle darke never so much disguysse
The fair bright day, yet ceaseth he no while,
But hath his candles to prolong his Toyle.

By him lay heavy Slepe, the cosin of Death,
Flat on the ground, and stil as any stone,
A very corps, save yielding forth a breath.
Small kepe took he whom fortune frowned on,
Or whom she lifted up into the throne
Of high renowme, but as a living Death,
So dead alyve, of lyef he drew the breath.

The bodyes rest, the quyete of the hart,
The travaylers ease, the still nightes feer was he;
And of our life in earth the better parte;
Rever of sight, and yet in whom we see
Thinges oft that tide, and ofte that never bee:
Without respect esteming equally
King Cresus pomp, and Irus poverty.

Mr. Sackville then describes Old Age, desirous of continuing longer in life.

" But who had sene him sobbinge howe he stoode
" Unto himselfe, and howe he would bemone
" His youth forepast, as though it wrought him good
" To talke of youth, al were his youth foregone,
" He would have mused, and mervayled much
" whereon
" This wretched Age should life desyre so fayne,
" And knowes ful wel life doth but length his
" payne.

" Crooke-backt he was, tooth-shaken, and blereyed,
" Went on three feete, and sometime crept on fower,
" With old lame bones that ratled by his side,
" His skalpe all pilde, and he with elde forlore,
" His withered fist still knocking at Deathes dore,
" Fumbling and driveling, as he draws his breth,
" For briefe, the shape and messinger of Death.

" And fast by him pale Maladie was plaste,
" Sore sick in bed, her colour al forgone,
" Bereft of stomake, savour, and of taste
" Ne could she brooke no meat but brothes alone.
" Her breath corrupt; her keepers every one " Abhorring her, her sickenes past ne cure.
" Detesting phisicke, and all phisickes cure.

" But oh! the doleful sight that then we see;
" We turnde our looke, and on the other side
" A griesly shape of Famine mought we see,
" With griesly lookes, and gaping mouth that cryed,
" And roar'd for Meat, as she would there have dyed;
" Her body thin and bare as any bone,
" Wherto was left nought but the case alone.

" And that alas! was knawen on every where,
" All full of holes, that I ne mought refrayne
" From teares to se how she her armes could teare,
" And with her teeth gnashe on the bones in vayne:
" When all for nought she sayne would so sustayne
" Her starven corp, that rather seemde a shade,
" Then any substaunce of a creature made.

" Great was her force, whom stone-wall could not stay,
" Her tearing nayles snatching at all she sawe:
" With gaping jawes, that by no means ymay
" Be satisfyed from hunger of her mawe;
" But eates herselfe as she that hath no lawe:
" Gnawing alas! her carkas all in vayne,
" Where you may count eche sinew, bone, and
" vayne.

" On her while we thus firmely fixt our iyes,
" That bled for ruth of such a drery sight,
" Loe sodaynely she shryght in so huge wise,
" As made Hell-gates to shyder with the might;
" Wherewith a darte we sawe howe it did lyght
" Ryght on her brest, and therewithal pale Death
" Enthrylling it to reve her of her breath.

" And by and by a dum dead corps we sawe,
" Heavy and colde, the shape of Death aryght,
" That dauntes all earthly creatures to his lawe:
" Against whose force in vayne it is to fyght:
" Ne pieres, ne princes, nor no mortal wyght,
" Ne townes, ne realmes, cities, ne strongest
" tower,
" But al perforce must yield unto his power.

" His dart anon out of his corps he tooke,
" And in his hand (a dreadfull sight to see)
" With great tryumphe estsoones the same he
" shooke,
" That most of all my feares affrayed me:
" His bodye dight with nought but bones perdie;
" The naked shape of man there saw I playne,
" All save the flesshe, the synewe, and the vayne.

" Lastly stoode Warre in glitteryng armes yclad,
" With visage grym, stern lookes, and blackely
" hewed;
" In his right hand a naked sworde he had,
" That to the hiltes was al with blud embrewed;
" And in his left (that kinges and kingdomes rewed)
" Famine and fyre he held, and therewythall
" He razed townes, and threwe downe towers
" and all.

" Cities he sakt, and realmes, that whilom floured,
" In honour, glory, and rule above the best,
" He overwhelmed, and all theyr fame devoured,
" Consumed, destroyed, wasted, and never ceast,
" Till he theyr wealth, theyr name, and all oppreste:
" His face forhewed with woundes, and by his " side
" There hunge his targe with gashes depe and " wyde.

" In mid's of which depaynted there we founde
" Deadly debate, al full of snaky heare,
" That with a bloudy fillet was ybound,
" Out breathing nought but discord every where."

We shall proceed now to the Lord Buckhurst's Tragedy of Ferrex and Porrex, sons to Gorboduc, King of Britaine. Acted before the Queen by the Gentlemen of the Inner-Temple, at Whitehall, 18th January 1561. It was not then published; but afterwards, whilst Lord Buckhurst was in his travels, and about the time, that he was detained at Rome, some Bookseller here took the advantage of his absence, and published it at London 1565 in 8vo in a very incorrect manner (12). After his return, a correct edition of it was published under the following title: The Tragedy of Ferrex and Porrex, set forth without addition or alteration, but altogether as the same was shewed on the stage before the Queen's Majesty about nine years past, viz. the eighteenth day of January 1561, by the Gentlemen of the Inner-Temple. Mr. Wood observes (13), that Mr. Thomas Norton, who translated xxvii of David's Psalms into English Verse, and was the Author of several pieces, wrote the three first Acts of this Tragedy; and Mr. Gerard Langbaine (14) mentions an Edition printed at London 1590 in 4to with the following title: The Tragedy of Gorboduc; whereof three Acts were written by Thomas Norton, and the two last by Thomas Sackville; set forth as the same was shewed before the Queen's most excellent Majesty, in her Highness's Court of Whitehall, by the Gentlemen of the Inner-Temple. Mr. Wood is mistaken in asserting (15), that it is written in old English Rhime; as (12) Spence, pag. 6, 7. and Wood, Athen. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 347, 348.

(13) Col. 348. and 77.

(14) Appendix to his Account of the English Dramatick Poets, edit. Oxon. 1691 in 8vo. See likewise the Account, pag. 169.

(15) Col. 348.

(g) Idem, ibid.

(h) Idem, pag. 14.

(i) Stowe's Chronicle of England, fol. 661. edit. London 1631.

(k) Abbot, pag. 14. See likewise Hollinshed, ad ann. 13. Elizabeth.

" in the languages, in matter of Story and State (g);" and being prisoner at Rome for fourteen days, (which trouble was brought upon him by some, who hated him for his love to Religion, and his duty to his Sovereign,) he behaved himself so prudently, that he was set at liberty (h). Upon his return to England, he took possession of the vast estate left to him by his father, in 1566; the greatest part of which he spent in a short time by his magnificent way of life [D]. June the 8th 1567 he was created Baron of Buckhurst in Sussex (i), and in 1571 was sent Embassador to Charles IX King of France, partly to congratulate his marriage with the daughter of Maximilian the Emperor, and partly about other weighty affairs relating to both Kingdoms (k). In 1587 he was sent Embassador into the Low-Countries [E] upon a business of a very delicate nature, which he

(16) In the Preface to his Rival Ladies.

(17) Ibid.

(18) Apology for Poetry, edit. London 1595 in 4to.

(19) Spence, pag. 7, 8.

(20) A Short View of Tragedy, its Original, Excellency and Corruption. With some Remarks on Shakespear and other Practitioners for the Stage, cap. 7. pag. 84, 85. edit. London 1693.

(21) See Mr. Spence, ubi supra, pag. 8, 9.

Mr. Dryden is likewise in the passage (16), where he tells us, that it is " written in English Verse, and con- " sequently that Verse was not so much a new way " amongst us, as an old way new reviv'd." It is evident, that Mr. Dryden had never seen it, since he stiles it The Tragedy of Queen Gorboduc, and represents it as written in rhime, whereas it is in blank Verse; so that Shakespear, notwithstanding Mr. Dryden's allegation (17), was not the first beginner of that way of writing. Sir Philip Sidney (18) has the following passage relating to this Tragedy. Our Tragedies and Comedies are not without cause cried out against; observing rules neither of honest civility, nor skilful Poetry, excepting Gorboduc, (again I say of those I have seen) which notwithstanding, as it is full of stately speeches and well-sounding phrases, climbing to the height of Seneca's style, and as full of notable Morality, which it doth most delightfully teach, and so obtain the very end of Poesy; yet in truth it is defectuous in the circumstances; which grieves me, because it might not remain an exact model of all Tragedies. The defect, of which Sir Philip speaks, is the neglect of the unities of time and place, according to the rules laid down by Aristotle; to which few Authors of any Age, and none of that, have conformed themselves (19). However Mr. Rymer has found the fable and the structure of it worthy his commendation. " Gorboduc, " says he (20), is a fable doubtless better turned for " Tragedy, than any on this side the Alps in that " time, and might have been a better direction to " Shakespear and Ben Johnson, than any guide they " had the luck to follow . . . . . Here is a King, a " Queen, and their two sons. The King divides his " Realm, and gives it between his two sons. They " quarrel. The elder brother kills the younger; which " provokes the mother to kill the elder. Thereupon " the King kills the mother; and then, to make a " clear stage, the people rise up and dispatch old " Gorboduck. It is objected by our neighbours against " the English, that we delight in bloody spectacles. " Our Poets, who have not imitated Gorboduck in the " regularity and roundness of the design, have not " failed on the Theatre to give us the Atrocité and " Blood enough in all conscience. From this time " Dramatic Poetry began to thrive with us, and flou- " rish wonderfully." Mr. Pope is of opinion (21), that the Writers of the succeeding Age might have improved much in other respects by copying from Lord Buckhurst a propriety in the sentiments, a dignity in the sentences, an unaffected perspicuity of style, and an easy flow in the numbers; in a word, that chastity, correctness, and gravity of style, which are so essential to Tragedy, and which all the Tragic Poets, who followed, not excepting Shakespear himself, either little understood, or perpetually neglected. There has been an Edition of it just published under the title of The Tragedy of Gorboduc: written by Thomas Sackville Lord Buckhurst, afterwards Lord Treasurer to Queen Elizabeth, and Earl of Dorset. London 1736 in 8vo. To this Tragedy is prefixed Some Account of Lord Buckhurst and his Writings, in a Letter to the Right Honourable the Earl of Middlesex, by the Reverend Mr. Joseph Spence, Professor of Poetry in the University of Oxford; in which Letter he observes, that it was Mr. Pope, who gave this Tragedy to be printed. We shall transcribe the Chorus, at the end of the fourth Act.

" When greedy lust in royal seat to reign
" Hath reft all care of Gods and eke of men;
" And cruel heart, wrath, treason, and disdain,
" Within th' ambitious breast are lodged then;
" Behold how mischief wide herself displays,
" And with the brother's hand the brother slays.
" When blood thus shed doth stain this Heaven's " face,
" Crying to Jove for vengeance of the deed;
" The mighty God ev'n moveth from his place
" With wrath to wreke; then sends he forth with " speed
" The dreadful furies, daughters of the night,
" With serpents girt, carrying the whip of Ire,
" With hair of stinging snakes, and shining bright
" With flames of blood, and with a brand of fire.
" These for revenge of wretched murder done,
" Do make the mother kill her only son.
" Blood asketh blood, and death must death re-
" quite:
" Jove by his just and everlasting doom,
" Justly hath ever so required it:
" These times before record, and times to come " Shall find it true, and so doth present proof
" Present before our eyes for our behoof.
" O happy wight, that suffers not the snare
" Of murderous mind to tangle him in blood;
" And happy he, that can in time beware
" By other's harms, and turn it to his good.
" But wo to him that fearing not t' offend,
" Doth serve his lust, and will not see the end."

[D] Took possession of the vast estate left to him by his father; . . . the greatest part of which he spent in a short time by his magnificent way of life.] Dr. Abbot tells us (22), that upon his coming to court, " on di- " vers occasions he feasted her Highness and her No- " bles; and so he did to foreign Embassadors. At " that time he entertained Musicians the most curi- " ous, which any where he could have; and therein " his Lordship excelled unto his dying day." Sir Robert Naunton (23) observes, that Lord Buckhurst in his youth spent the best part of the great wealth and the vast patrimony left him by his father, until the Queen by her frequent admonitions diverted the torrent of his profusion. He was a very fine Gentleman of person and endowments, both of art and nature; but without measure magnificent, till on the turne of his honour, and the allay that his yearly good counsell had wrought upon those immoderate courses of his youth, and that height of spirit inherent in his house; and then did the Queen as a most judicious indulgent Prince, who when she saw the man grown settled and stayed, gave him an assistance, and advanced him to the Treasurership, where he made amends to his house for his mis-spent time, both in the increasment of his estate and honour, which the Queen conferred upon him together with the opportunity to remake himself, and thereby to shew, that he was a child that should have a share in her grace. Lloyd also having observed (24), that in a short time by his magnificent prodigality he had spent the greatest part of his estate, tells us, " that he coming to an Alder- " man of London, who had gained great penny- " worths by his former purchases of him, was made " (being now in the wane of his wealth) to wait the " coming down of the Alderman so long, that his " generous humour being sensible of the incivility of " such attendance, resolved to be no more beholding " to wealthy pride, and presently turned a thrifty im- " prover of the remainder of his estate."

(22) Sermon preached at Westminster, May 26, 1608 at the Funerall Solemnities of the Right Honourable Thomas Earl of Dorset, &c. pag. 14.

(23) Fragmenta Regalia, pag. 34, 35. edit. 1641 in 4to.

(24) State-Worthies, pag. 678.

[E] In 1587 he was sent Embassador to the Low-Countries.] After the Earl of Leicester's return from thence, the States-General met, and agreed to invest Prince Maurice, son of William, Prince of Orange, who had been killed at Delft, with the full power and authority he executed with great ſucceſs (l). Upon his return from this Embaſſy, her Majeſty "to give contentation to a great Perſonage *, in thoſe days of high employment, was "pleaſed to command him unto his own houſe [F], there privately to remain till her "farther pleaſure was known. Where his Lordſhip did bear himſelf ſo dutifully and "obſequiouſly unto her Highneſs's command, that in all the time of his reſtraint for nine "or ten months ſpace, he never would endure either openly, or ſecretly, either by day "or by night to ſee either wife or child (m)." April the 24th 1589 he was elected Knight of the Order of the Garter, but was not inſtall'd till the 18th of December (n). The Chancellorſhip of the Univerſity of Oxford becoming void upon the death of Sir Chriſtopher Hatton on the 20th of Nov. 1591, the Earl of Eſſex ſtood for it, being ſupported by thoſe of the Puritanical Party, and was oppoſed by the Lord Buckhurſt, in whoſe favour it was determined by the influence of a letter written by the Queen in his favour; upon which he was elected Chancellor on the 17th of December following (o), and in January 159½ he was incorporated Maſter of Arts in that Univerſity (p). May the 15th 1598 he was conſtituted Lord High Treaſurer of England; in which poſt the Queen "noted the continual and exceſſive pains and care, which his Lordſhip did take "in her buſineſs, his fidelity in his advices, his dexterity in advancing of her profit (q)." In 1600 there being a general ſcarcity of corn, occaſioned partly by immoderate rains about the end of the preceding year, and partly by the coldneſs of the following Spring, beſides the great exportation of it abroad, the populace reproached the Lord Treaſurer for granting Licences to the Exporters; upon which he applied to her Majeſty, who cleared him by a public Proclamation from this charge, and caſt the fault upon ſome private huckſters, ordering thoſe, who had been moſt clamorous upon this occaſion to be ſeized and puniſhed (r). King James I, upon his acceſſion to the Throne, continued him in the Poſt of Lord Treaſurer, and on the 13th of March 160¾ created him Earl of Dorſet (s). He died ſuddenly at the Council-Table of an Apoplexy [G] on the 19th of (l) Abbot, ibid.

* The Earl of Leiceſter. See Note [F].

(m) Idem, pag. 14, 15.

(n) Peerage of England, p. 402.

(o) Wood, Faſti Oxon. vol. 1. col. 341.

(p) Idem, ibid. col. 142.

(q) Abbot, pag. 15.

(r) Camdeni Annales Elizabethæ vol. 3. pag. 827. edit. Hearne.

(s) Peerage of England, vol. 1. pag. 406.

authority of Stadtholder, and to appoint him the Captain General of Holland, Zealand, and Frieſland, and to give him the command over all the Militia within the ſaid Provinces. And purſuant to this determination, they obliged all the Officers to receive a new Commiſſion from him, and to take a new oath to the States, and diſcharged all the recuſants whatſoever from the ſervice. Queen Elizabeth appears to have been diſpleaſed with theſe alterations in the Government, and to have reſented the diminution of the Earl of Leiceſter's authority, as an injury offered to herſelf. She immediately ſent over the Lord Buckhurſt to enquire into the matter, to complain of the innovations, which they had introduced in the Earl of Leiceſter's abſence, and to ſettle all differences between them (25). The States in return aſſured her Majeſty, that their late proceedings were but proviſional, and enforced thro' fear of a general revolt upon the loſs of Deventer; and that at the Earl's return they would readily acknowledge both him and his authority in as ample a manner, as if it had been granted him at the firſt (26). Lord Buckhurſt laid before the States the danger of limiting the Earl's authority; ſignified to them her Majeſty's inclination to ſend back the Earl; and oppoſed the alterations made in the Government of the Provinces by the States, but without effect (27). He likewiſe notified the diſtreſſes of the Low-Countries to the Queen; and drew up a new ſcheme for the Government of the United Provinces, which very highly offended the Earl of Leiceſter (28), and ſeems to have been one principal motive of the averſion and hatred he ever after expreſſed towards him (29), [F] Her Majeſty, to give contentation to a great perſonage, in thoſe days of high employment, was pleaſed to command him unto his own houſe.] Camden informs us (30), that the Earl of Leiceſter, upon his return from the Low-Countries, finding an accuſation was preparing againſt him by the Lord Buckhurſt, and ſome others of his enemies, for his miſconduct in the management of affairs in the United Provinces, and that he was ſummoned to appear and give an account of his behaviour before the Council, privately threw himſelf at her Majeſty's feet, and implored her protection; earneſtly intreating her, "not to receive him with diſ-"grace upon his return, whom at his firſt departure "ſhe had ſent out with honour; nor bring him down "alive to the grave, whom her former goodneſs had "raiſed from the duſt." The Queen was ſo pacified with his expreſſions of humility and ſorrow, as to paſs by the diſpleaſure, which ſhe had conceived againſt him, and admit him into her former grace and affection. The next day, when it was expected he ſhould give in his anſwer, he took his place at the Council-Table; and when the Secretary began to read his Accuſation, he roſe up and interrupted him, complaining of the injuries which had been offered him, and declaring that his public Commiſſion was limited by private inſtructions; and making his appeal to the Queen, he evaded the Accuſation, and came off in triumph. But the Lord Buckhurſt was treated in a different manner; for the Earl's averſion to him and power with the Queen ſo far prevailed, that a cenſure was paſſed upon his negotiation; and his Lordſhip was confined to his houſe for ſeveral months. The points objected to him, with his Anſwers, and the Replies of the Earl of Leiceſter, are printed in the Cabala (39).

(25) Life of Robert Earl of Leiceſter, the Favourite of Queen Elizabeth. Drawn from Original Writings and Records, pag. 223, 224. edit. London 1727 in 8vo.

(26) Ibid. pag. 225. See Lord Buckhurſt's Letter to Secretary Walſingham, in the Cabala, Part 2. pag. 14.

(27) Life of Robert Earl of Leiceſter, pag. 229, 236.

(28) Ibid. pag. 237, 238.

(29) Ibid. p. 238. Cabala, Part 2. p. 61, & ſeqq.

(30) Annales Elizabethæ lib. 3.

[G] He died ſuddenly at the Council-Table of an apoplexy.] Arthur Wilſon (32) obſerves, that this gave occaſion to ſome perſons diſaffected to him (as what eminent Officer, that hath the managing of monies, can pleaſe all?) to ſpeak many things to his diſhonour. Osborn tells us (33), that the Earl "being a very cor-"rupt man, or much abuſed, did lay claim to ſome "part of the Kentiſh Lucies land, that lay contigu-"ous to his own, and miſtruſting the integrity of "any other or more legal trial, did by the high-"neſs of his hand bring it to the Council-Table, "where about this time many cauſes were ſhamefully "carried, and from whence the moſt excellent Chan-"cellor (34) for parts that ever ſate in that Court, "might derive the moſt capital of his faults,) and "after ſome debate the Treaſurer ſtanding up, "and offering to pull out of his boſom papers, that "were pretended for their Lordſhips full and final ſa-"tisfaction, he fell down dead, as called to anſwer at "a higher Tribunal. Neither hath any ſince, as I "have been told by ſome of the family, ever queſ-"tioned Lucies Land, in the quiet poſſeſſion of which "he was thus miraculouſly eſtated. Some years af-"ter meeting with the Secretary of Richard Earl of "Dorſet (a noble Gentleman and of good parts, had "they not been poiſoned, together with the owner, by "a future malice and jealouſy in the Duke of Buc-"kingham that he was his enemy) he told me the "Treaſurer was ſubject to ſwooning, which happen-"ing in a place, where there was ſo little help, it "became his death." Echard (35) obſerves that he died as he was pulling out ſome papers relating to a cauſe, which he had brought before the Council; and that his ſudden death and effeminate life gave occaſion to his enemies to make ſevere and unuſual interpretations; but that his head being opened there were found in it certain little bags of water, which by breaking might naturally cauſe his death.

(31) Part 2. pag. 55, & ſeqq.

(32) Hiſtory of Great Britain; being the Life and Reign of King James I, pag. 43. edit. London 1653 in fol.

(33) Traditional Memoirs on the Reign of King James. Sect. 42. See the Works of Francis Osborn Eſq; pag. 536, 537. 7th edit. London 1673 in 8vo.

(34) Bacon, Lord Verulam.

(35) Hiſtory of England, B. 4. cap. 1. pag. 926. edit. London 1707. See likewiſe Sir Richard Baker's Chronicle.

of April 1608 (t). We ſhall give his character in the Note [H]. His Grace Lionel the preſent Duke of Dorſet is lineally deſcended from him [I].

(t) Camden's Annals of King James; and Arthur Wilſon's Hiſtory of Great Britain, being the Life and Reign of King James I. pag. 43. edit. London 1656, in fol.

DRABICIUS

[H] We ſhall give his character in the note.] Sir Robert Naunton tells us (36), that "they much commend his elocution, but more the excellency of his pen; for he was a ſcholar, and a perſon of quick diſpatch, faculties that yet run in the blood; and they ſay of him that his Secretaries did little for him by way of indictment, wherein they could ſeldom pleaſe him; he was ſo facete and choice in his phraſes and ſtyle: and for his diſpatches, and for the content he gave to ſuitors, he had a decorum ſeldom put in practice; for he had of his attendance that tooke into a roll the names of all ſuitors, with the date of their firſt addreſſes; ſo that a freſh man could not leap over his head, that was of a more antient edition, excepting the urgent affairs of the State. . . . . He was wholly intentive to the Queen's ſervice; ſuch were his abilities, that ſhe received aſſiduous proofs of his ſufficiency; and it hath been thought, ſhe might have more cunning inſtruments, but none of more ſtrong judgment and confidence in his ways, which are ſymptoms of magnanimity; whereunto methinks his Motto hath ſome kind of reference, Aut nunquam tentes, aut perfice." Dr. Abbot repreſents his character at large, and informs us (37), that he was an indulgent huſband, a kind father, a firm friend, a generous enemy, true to his word, ſo that an honourable perſon ſoon after the Earl's death gave that teſtimony of him, that in much converſation and concurrence in many cauſes of great weight and importance, he never heard him ſpeak, or in earneſt affirm that which he found to be otherwiſe. He lived in a very hoſpitable manner. Having lived ſeventy two years, and being married more than fifty three years to the ſame Lady, he kept houſe for forty and two years in an honourable proportion. For thirty of theſe, his family conſiſted of little leſs, in one place or another, than two hundred perſons. But for more than twenty years, beſides workmen and others hired, his number at leaſt was two hundred and twenty daily. A very rare example, ſays Dr. Abbot (38), in this preſent age of ours, when houſe-keeping is ſo decayed. He was a man of ſtrict juſtice. He bought no land, but he commonly paid more for it than it was worth, giving this reaſon of it, that it would the better proſper and continue in his name and poſterity. In his Will he was careful, that all his debts ſhould be paid. He was very kind to his tenants, of whom he commonly took leſs fines by a third part, than was uſual among other Noblemen. He was extremely charitable to the poor. In the year 1597, which was a time of the greateſt ſcarcity that had been known, "his Lordſhip ſent in- "to Suſſex of his free gift unto ſix Pariſhes ſtore of "Danſke Rie bought at Billingſgate. Divers other "years, and namely this preſent year 1608, his Lord- "ſhip hath cauſed weekly certain quarters of wheat "to be carried from his own granary at Lewes in "Suſſex, and to be ſold in the market to the poor "at a far lower rate than the price, which commonly "men did take (39)." With regard to Religion, his faith, ſays Dr. Abbot (40), was agreeable unto the Word of God, and according to the profeſſion of the renowned Church of England. In that famous Univerſity of Oxford, where his Lordſhip for more than ſixteen years was our honourable Chancellor, it was his ſpeciall care to ſubſtitute ſuch under him as were moſt ſound for Religion; which the wiſer ſort did obſerve, although common men did not mark it. As he kept down with the one hand all novelties and humours in opinions, which laboured to ſet trouble in the Church and Commonwealth; ſo with the other hand to the utmoſt of his power he depreſſed the Prieſts and Jeſuits, which have uſed too much to that place, not to the Univerſity, which, God be praiſed, is free from all ſuch imputation; but to ſome few of the city, who embrace their old ſuperſtitions. In that place I can witneſs, that his Lordſhip neither openly nor ſecretly did ever give countenance unto any that was backward in Religion. And on the other ſide, that there never was any thing ſoberly and wiſely purpoſed, which might forward true piety, which his Lordſhip did not further. But Oſborn (41) gives him a more diſadvantageous character, and tells us, that "he was much given to women and corruption in the general opinion; after whom theſe "Verſes were ſent, it being, ſays our Author, the faſhion of the Poets all my days, to ſum up great men's virtues or vices upon their graves; theſe with many more to a like ſenſe belonging to this man:

(36) Fragmenta Regalia, pag. 31.

(37) Pag. 16.

(38) Ibid.

(39) Ibid. pag. 17, 18.

(40) Pag. 18.

(41) Ubi ſupra, pag. 537.

"Diſcourteous death, that would'ſt not once conſor,
"Or deign to parley with our Treaſurer:
"Had he been thee, or of thy fatal tribe,
"He would have ſpar'd a life to gain a bribe.

"Another:

"Here lies a Lord, that wenching thought no ſin,
"And bought his fleſh by ſelling of our ſkin:
"His name was Sackvile; and ſo void of pity,
"As he did rob the country with the city."

[I] Lionel, the preſent Duke of Dorſet, is deſcended from him.] The Earl married Cecily, daughter of Sir John Baker, Knt. and by her had iſſue, 1. Robert, Earl of Dorſet. 2. Henry. 3. William, who was knighted in France by King Henry IV in October 1589, at the age of nineteen, and loſt his life in the wars in that Kingdom in 1591. 4. Thomas, who diſtinguiſhed himſelf againſt the Turks in 1595: and three Daughters, Anne, married to Sir Henry Glenham of Glenham in Suffolk; Jane, married in February 1591, to Anthony Viſcount Mountacute; and Mary, married to Sir Henry Nevile, ſon and heir to Edward Lord Abergavenny. ROBERT, eldeſt ſon and heir, was above 47 years old at the deceaſe of his father. He had all the advantages of education, attained ſeveral languages, and had a ſingular knowledge in many ſciences. He was elected for the Borough of Lewes in Suſſex in the 31ſt year of Queen Elizabeth; and in all other Parliaments, whilſt he continued a Commoner, was one of the Knights for that County. He lived in the dignity of an Earl not a full year, and died at Dorſet-houſe near Fleetſtreet in London, February 27th 160⅞, and was interr'd at Withiam, according to his directions, where a noble monument was erected to his memory. His firſt Lady was Mary, only daughter of Thomas Howard, Duke of Norfolk, and ſhe dying Sept. 4th 1591, he married Anne, Widow of Henry Lord Compton; but had iſſue only by his firſt wife, viz. three ſons, 1. Thomas, who died in his infancy 1581. 2. Richard, who ſucceeded him in his honours. 3. Edward, ſucceſſor to his brother: and three daughters, Winifrede, who died in her infancy in 1587; Cecily, married to Sir Henry Compton, Knight of the Bath, third ſon to Henry Lord Compton; and Anne, married firſt to Edward Seymour, Lord Beauchamp, grandſon to Edward Earl of Hertford, and afterwards to Sir Edward Lewes, Knight. RICHARD, Earl of Dorſet, born March 28th 1589, in the Charter-Houſe, London, was married to the Lady Anne Clifford, daughter and heir of George Earl of Cumberland, February 28th, 160⅞; and his father dying two days after, became Earl of Dorſet. He lived with great magnificence and hoſpitality in his houſes at Knowle in Kent, Bolebrook in Suſſex, and Dorſet-Houſe in London, and died March 28th 1624, and was interred at Withiam. He had three ſons, who died infants; and two daughters, Lady Margaret, born at Dorſet-Houſe July 2d 1614, who was married to John Tufton, Earl of Thanet; and Lady Iſabella, born at Knowle in Kent, October 6th 1622, and married July 5th 1647, to James Compton, Earl of Northampton. He was ſucceeded in the Earldom of Dorſet by his younger brother, Sir EDWARD SACKVILLE, who was born in 1590, and in 1613, narrowly eſcaped with his life in a duel with the Lord Bruce, a particular account of which we have in a manuſcript in the Aſhmolean Muſeum Library at Oxford, and in the Guardian. At the creation of Charles Prince of Wales, November 3d 1616, he was one of the Knights of the Bath, and having been elected one of the Knights for the County of Suſſex, was one of the leading Members in the Houſe of Commons. He was preſent at the battle of Prague in 1620, and in July 1621, ſucceeded Sir Edward Herbert as Embaſſador to the King of DRABICIUS (NICHOLAS), a famous Enthuſiaſt of the ſeventeenth Century, was born about the year 1587 (a) at Stranſnitz in Moravia, where his father was Burgomaſter. He was admitted Miniſter in 1616, and exerciſed his function at Drahotutz; and when he was obliged to ſeek a retreat in foreign countries on account of the ſevere Edicts of the Emperor againſt the Proteſtant Religion, he retired to Lednitz, a town in Hungary, in 1629 (b). He had no hopes of being reſtored to his Church, and therefore turned Woollen-draper, in which employment his wife, who was a daughter of one of the (a) Comenius born in March 1592 ſays, Hiſt. Revelat. pag. 138. that Drabicius was five years older than himſelf. Moreri places the birth of Drabicius on the 5th of Decemb. 1588.

(b) Comen. ibid. pag. 141.

France; and was made one of the Privy Council to King James. Succeeding his brother as Earl of Dorſet, he was elected Knight of the Garter May 15th 1625, and inſtalled November 23d following. After the breaking out of the Civil Wars, he was appointed Lord Chamberlain of the Houſhold to King Charles I. He died July 17, 1652, and was interred at Withiam. Several of his ſpeeches are publiſhed. The Earl of Clarendon, who has made ſome miſtakes in the account, which he gives of his Lordſhip and his family, gives him this character: "That his perſon was beautiful "and graceful, and vigorous; his wit pleaſant, ſparkling, and ſublime; and his other parts of learning "and language of that luſtre, that he could not miſcarry in the world. The vices he had were of the "age, which he was not ſtubborn enough to contemn "or reſiſt. Yet his known parts, and the very good "general Reputation he had acquired, notwithſtanding his defects (for as he was eminent in the Houſe "of Commons whilſt he ſat there, ſo he ſhined in the "Houſe of Peers, when he came to move in that "ſphere) inclined King James to call him to his Privy "Council before his death. And if he had not too "much cheriſhed his natural conſtitution and propenſity, he would have been an excellent man of buſineſs; for he had a very ſharp, diſcerning ſpirit, "and was a man of an obliging nature, much honour, "and great generoſity, and of moſt intire fidelity to "the Crown." By his Lady Mary, daughter and heir of Sir George Curſon of Croxhall in Derbyſhire, Knt. he had iſſue a daughter, Mary, who died young, and two ſons, Richard, his ſucceſſor, and Edward, who married Bridget Baroneſs Norris, daughter and ſole heir of Edward Wray, Eſq; by his wife Elizabeth, daughter and heir of Francis Lord Norris, Earl of Berkſhire. This Edward was killed at Chawley in Comnore Pariſh near Abingdon, by a common ſoldier of the garriſon at Abingdon, on the 11th of April, 1646 (43) leaving no iſſue. His brother RICHARD, Earl of Dorſet, born at Dorſet-Houſe Sept. 16th 1622, was elected for the Borough of Eaſt Grinſted in Suſſex, to the Parliament which met in November 3d 1640, and ſucceeding his father in 1652, lived retired till the Reſtoration, after which he was appointed Lord Lieutenant of the County of Suſſex. By his Lady Frances, daughter of Lionel Cranfield, Earl of Middleſex, and at laſt heir to Lionel, Earl of Middleſex, her brother, he had iſſue ſeven ſons; 1. Charles, his ſucceſſor. 2. Edward, born April 2d 1641, who died unmarried in 1678. 3. Lionel, who was born June 25th 1645, and died July the 21ſt following; 4. Richard, who died in 1712; 5. Lionel, born October the 25th 1656, who died young. 6. Cranfield, born Dec. 18th 1660, who died January 1ſt following. 7. Thomas, born February 3d 1662, who died Auguſt 19th 1675. Alſo ſix daughters, Elizabeth, Anne, and Catherine, who died young; Mary, born February 4th 1646, married to Roger Boyle, Lord Broghill, ſon and heir of Roger Earl of Orrery; Anne, born June 7th 1650, and married to Alexander Earl of Hume in Scotland; Frances, born February 6th 1665, married to Sir George Lane, Bart. created Lord Viſcount Laneſborough, and afterwards to —— Muſtian, Eſq;. CHARLES, Earl of Dorſet, eldeſt ſon of Richard Earl of Dorſet, was born June 24th 1637. The ſprightlineſs of his wit, and his exceeding good nature, recommended him very early to the intimacy of King Charles II. and thoſe of the greateſt eminency in the Court; but his mind being rather turned to books and converſation, than to what more immediately concerned the public buſineſs, though, as Biſhop Burnet in the Hiſtory of his own Time obſerves, "the King courted him for a favourite. "But when the honour and ſafety of his Country de"manded his aſſiſtance, he readily entered into the "moſt active parts of life, and underwent the greateſt "dangers with a conſtancy of mind, which ſhewed he "had not only read the rules of philoſophy, but under-

(43) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 155.

"ſtood the practice of them." Being poſſeſſed of the eſtate of his uncle the Earl of Middleſex, who died in 1674, he was created Earl of that County, and Baron of Cranfield in Bedfordſhire, by Letters Patents bearing date at Weſtminſter April 4th 1675; and in Auguſt 1677 ſucceeded his father as Earl of Dorſet. His firſt wife Elizabeth, daughter of Harvey Bagot of Pipe-Hall in Warwickſhire Eſq; and widow of Charles Berkley, Earl of Falmouth, dying without any iſſue, he married March 7th 168$\frac{4}{5}$ the Lady Mary, daughter of James Compton, Earl of Northampton, who was one of the Ladies of the Bed-Chamber to Queen Mary, and died Aug. 6th 1691, leaving iſſue by him, Lionel now Duke of Dorſet, and one daughter, the Lady Mary, who was married in 1702 to Henry Somerſet, Duke of Beaufort, and died in child-bed June 18th 1705. He had a very conſiderable hand in the Revolution, and in the Debates in Parliament, argued and voted for the vacancy of the Throne, and that the Prince and Princeſs of Orange ſhould be declared King and Queen of England. When their Majeſties had accepted of the Crown, his Lordſhip was the next day ſworn of their Privy Council, and declared Lord Chamberlain of their Houſhold. Febr. 2d 169$\frac{1}{2}$ he was elected Knight of the Garter, and inſtalled on the 24th of that month; and was four times conſtituted one of the Regents of the Kingdom during his Majeſty's abſence. April 19th 1697 he voluntarily reſigned the place of Lord Chamberlain. He died at Bath January 29th 170$\frac{1}{6}$, and was interred at Withiam on the 17th of February following. He was a great patron of men of Letters, and wrote ſeveral beautiful pieces printed in Dryden's Miſcellanies and elſewhere. Mr. Dryden in the Dedication of his Tranſlation of Juvenal to his Lordſhip, and Mr. Prior in the Dedication of his Poems to the preſent Duke of Dorſet, have drawn his character to great advantage.* His ſon and ſucceſſor LIONEL Earl of Dorſet, born January 18th 168$\frac{7}{8}$, was on the 28th of December 1708 conſtituted Conſtable of Dover Caſtle, and Lord Warden and Lord Admiral of the Cinque-Ports, which office he reſigned in 1713. On the demiſe of Queen Anne, his Lordſhip was commiſſioned by the Regency to go to Hanover, and notify her death in form, and congratulate his Majeſty's acceſſion to the Crown; whereupon his Majeſty before his leaving the yatch, which brought him to England, appointed him firſt Gentleman of his Bed-Chamber, and on the 8th of October 1714 Conſtable of Dover-Caſtle, and Lord Warden of the Cinque-Ports, having before been ſworn of his Privy-Council. On the 16th of the ſame month he was elected Knight of the Garter. June 13th 1720 he was created Duke of Dorſet; and May 30th 1725 he was appointed Lord Steward of his Majeſty's Houſhold; and on the 7th of June following, one of the Lords Juſtices during the King's abſence, as he was likewiſe again on the 31ſt of May 1727. At the Coronation of his preſent Majeſty, his Grace was Lord Steward of his Houſhold, and appointed Lord High Steward of England on that ſolemn occaſion. January 11th 172$\frac{7}{8}$ he was confirmed in the office of Lord Warden of the Cinque-Ports, and Conſtable of Dover-Caſtle. June 19th 1730, upon reſigning his place of Lord Steward of the Houſhold, he was declared in Council Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. January 170$\frac{8}{9}$ his Grace married Elizabeth, daughter of Lieutenant-General Walter-Philip Collier, brother to David Earl of Portmore; by whom he had iſſue, 1. Lady Anne, who died March 23d 172$\frac{0}{1}$ in the 11th year of her age; 2. Charles, Earl of Middleſex, born Febr. 6th 171$\frac{0}{1}$; 3. Lady Elizabeth, who was married Decemb. 6th 1726 to Thomas Lord Viſcount Weymouth, but died before cohabitation, whilſt his Lordſhip was on his travels, June 29th 1729; 4. Lord John Philip Sackville, born June 22d 1713; 5. Lord George Sackville, born January 26th 171$\frac{3}{6}$; 6. Lady Carolina. T.

the ſame buſineſs was of great ſervice to him. He endeavoured to perſuade the other Miniſters to betake themſelves to ſome ſecular employment, notwithſtanding the regulations made to prevent ſuch a diſorder [A]; and he forgot ſo much the decorum of his former character, that he became one of the hardeſt drinkers in the country, and indulged himſelf in all the actions of a lay-man (c). Finding himſelf, in danger of being robbed as he returned from a fair, he defended himſelf, and was wounded, and perhaps would not have eſcaped ſo well if he had not been aſſiſted. The other Miniſters juſtly ſcandalized at his conduct informed their ſuperiors of it, who in a Synod, which was called in Poland, examined into the affair. It was reſolved that Drabicius ſhould be ſuſpended from the Miniſtry, and that if he did not live in an edifying manner, the diſcipline of the Church ſhould be exerciſed upon him (d). This ſeverity of the Synod induced him to behave himſelf with more decency. But the caſe was quite different, when he imagined himſelf become a Prophet. He had his firſt viſion on the night of the 23d of February 1638, and the ſecond on the night of the 23d of January 1643. The firſt viſion promiſed him in general great armies from the North and Eaſt, which ſhould cruſh the Houſe of Auſtria; the ſecond declared particularly, that Ragotſki ſhould command the army from the Eaſt, and ordered Drabicius to inform his brethren, that God was about to reſtore them to their own country, and to revenge the injuries done to his people, and that they ſhould prepare themſelves for this deliverance by faſting and prayer. He received orders to write down what had been revealed to him, and to begin in the manner of the antient Prophets, The word of the Lord came unto me (e). The next day he communicated his viſion to the Miniſters, who were refugees in the ſame place with him. They communicated it likewiſe to others, but they paid no regard to it. Theſe two firſt viſions were followed by a great many others in the ſame year 1643; and there was one, which ordered, that he ſhould open the whole affair to Comenius (f), who was then at Elbing in Pruſſia. One of the viſions in January 1644 aſſured Drabicius, that the Imperial troops ſhould not deſtroy the refugees (g). They committed great ravages upon the territories of Ragotſki, plundered the town of Leidnitz, and beſieged the caſtle. Drabicius ſhut himſelf up there, and whether he had ſome little diſtruſt of the viſion, or whether he thought that the good cauſe had occaſion for aſſiſtance, he did not amuſe himſelf with prayers: he ſtood near the cannon as they were firing againſt the beſiegers, and ſet his hand to the work [B]. Unhappily for him the flame flew into his face, and almoſt deprived him of one of his eyes. The Imperialiſts raiſed the ſiege. But ſome time

(c) Politicâ illâ cum plebe converſatione corrumpi, licentioſiuſque poculis indulgenda profanioris vitæ exemplis abripi viſus eſt. Ibid. pag. 339.

(d) Idem, ibid. pag. 139, 140.

(e) De his viſis & auditis in ſcriptum referendis mandatum accipit . . . & à verbis illis Factum eſt ad me verbum Domini (ſic non aliter) inchoare jubetur. Comenius, Hiſt. Revelat. pag. 141.

(f) Ibid. pag. 143.

(g) Ibid. pag. 145.

[A] The regulations made to prevent ſuch a diſorder.] The ſuperiors of the Miniſters in exile took care to make an order, that every one ſhould continue in the town, which he had choſen for the place of his habitation; and that though every congregation had but one Paſtor, the reſt of the Miniſters ſhould preach in their turn. This appointment was made to avoid two great inconveniencies. The one was, that without this ſome of them would have run about from place to place to collect alms: Volebant patres noſtri Eccleſiis orbatos Paſtores, confratres ſuos, non mendicitati vacare, & ſtipis quærendæ cauſa alienas terras (ut ab aliis factitatum vidimus) pererrare. (1). The other was, that by diſcontinuing to preach they would become leſs fit for the ſervice of a Church, if God ſhould ever recall them to their former functions. Ut exilii tractu nemo prorſus laboribus ſacris deſueſceret, potius ſeſe mutuâ diligentiâ magis acuerent: ut ſi Deus noſtri miſertus rurſum nos Eccleſiis redderet, nemo hebetatus rediret, exercitatior potiùs (2).

(1) Comen. Hiſt. Revel. pag. 139.

(2) Idem, ibid.

[B] He ſhut himſelf up in the Caſtle of Leidnitz . . . He ſtood by the Canon . . . . and put his hand to the work.] Comenius blames him for this, Drabicio tamen, ſays he (3), vitio datum, quòd dum ex Arce tormenta in hoſtem librarentur, ille non intereſſe tantùm (ad alios præſentiæ divinæ ſpe, juxta promiſſionem ſibi factam, animandum) ſed & tormento uni ignem ipſemet admovere voluit: cum eum in angulo eſſe, & precibus vacare, præſtitiſſet. Sed inconſideratus hic novi Petri (materiali gladio Dominum defendere præſumentis) zelus à Domino ipſo caſtigatus fuit: permiſſo ut flammæ pars in illum retrò ſe agens faciem illi ambureret, oculumque alterum læderet. Utili commonitorio, ut quiſque ſibi demandata faciat, aliena munia aliis relinquat. i. e. " However Drabicius was cenſured, becauſe when the " cannon was fired from the caſtle againſt the enemy, " he not only would be preſent (to animate the reſt " by hopes of the Divine Preſence, according to the " promiſe made to him,) but likewiſe fire one of the " cannon himſelf; whereas it had been more proper " for him to have been in a corner, and applied himſelf to prayer. But the imprudent zeal of this new " Peter (preſuming to defend the Lord with the material ſword) was chaſtiſed by the Lord himſelf, " who permitted part of the flame to recoil and burn " his face, and hurt one of his eyes; which is an " uſeful inſtruction, that every man ſhould diſcharge " his own office, and leave others to perform their " particular province." A man, who believes that he has Revelations, ought to be full of faith; he ought to ſay, fata viam invenient, i. e. " The fates " will find out a way."

(3) Idem, ibid. pag. 145.

But on the contrary we ſee very often, that ſuch a man diſtruſts the Providence of God, unleſs it be aſſiſted by all that human prudence can contribute on its part. Our inſpired perſons, or thoſe who call themſelves ſo, allow themſelves leſs repoſe than other people: their agitation, ſollicitude and vigilance in preparing human means, which may be capable of bringing about events the leaſt foreſeen and foretold, ſhew that they are too much influenced by thoſe Pagan maxims, which I have mentioned in the Article of Acosta (4); namely, that after the example of the Lacedemonians the Gods are to be invoked by putting our hand to the work, and that according to the precept of Heſiod, the huſbandman ſhould ſay his Prayers with his hand on the plough (5); and that in ſhort the Prayers of the ſlothful are unacceptable to Heaven, and ſent back empty.

Sibi quiſque profecto
Eſt Deus: ignavis precibus fortuna repugnat (6).

The King of Macedon was ridiculed (7), becauſe he immediately retired out of the battle, under pretence of offering ſacrifices to Hercules: it was ſaid, that victory is due only to that General, who aſks it of the Gods by fighting valiantly: This is the true way of being heard, ſay the Pagans: Ἀλλὰ ταῖς Αἰμιλίου παρῆν εὐχαῖς ὁ θεός· εὔχετο γὰρ κράτος πολέμου καὶ νίκην δόρυ κρατῶν, καὶ μαχόμενος παρεκάλει σύμμαχον τὸν θεόν. Sed Pauli precibus volens propitiuſque annuit Deus, quippe petebat victoriam belli & palmam haſtam tenens, pugnanſque opem implorabat Dei (8). i. e. " But God willingly " granted the Prayers of Æmilius, becauſe he deſired " victory with the ſpear in his hand, and requeſted " the aſſiſtance of the Deity as he fought." Our pretended Prophets in reality purſue theſe notions.

(4) Note [B].

(5) In this manner ſome underſtand the paſſage of Heſiod, lib. 2. Ἔργ. καὶ ἡμέρ. ver. 83.

(6) Ovid. Metam. lib. 8. ver. 72.

(7) Plutarch in Paulo Æmilio, pag. 265.

(8) Idem, ibid. C.

time after they beſieged the place again, and took it. The refugees were plundered, contrary to the article of capitulation, by which they were to have their lives and goods ſecured to them (b). Thus fell Drabicius into the hands of the Imperialiſts. This did not prevent him from going to Ragotſki, and telling him in Auguſt 1645, that God commanded him to deſtroy the Houſe of Auſtria and the Pope [C], and that if he refuſed to attack that neſt of vipers, he would draw down upon his family a general ruin, which ſhould not ſpare even him that piſſeth again the wall. The Prince already knew, that Drabicius had aſſumed the character of a Prophet; for Drabicius, according to the reiterated orders, which he received in his extaſies, had ſent him a copy of his revelations, which Ragotſki threw into the fire (i). With regard to the command which the Prophet brought to him in perſon, he anſwered that a treaty of peace had juſt before been concluded (k). The death of that Prince, which happened in the month of October 1647, plunged Drabicius into extreme ſorrow: he feared that his revelations would vaniſh into mere ſmoke, and ſaw himſelf expoſed to ridicule. But he had one extatic conſolation, which reanimated him, and forbad him caſting into the fire his writings, ſince God would ſend him Comenius, to whom they ſhould be conſigned (l). Comenius having ſome buſineſs in Hungary in 1650 [D], ſaw there Drabicius himſelf and his prophecies, and made ſuch reflections as he thought proper, upon the viſions having for three years before promiſed Drabicius that he ſhould have Comenius for a Coadjutor. It is ſomewhat remarkable, that Sigiſmond Ragotſki being urged by Drabicius to make war againſt the Emperor, and by his mother to continue in peace with him, could not tell what to do, attacked as he was on both ſides with terrible threats. Drabicius denounced againſt him the judgments of the Almighty in caſe of peace, and his mother threatened him with her curſe in caſe of war. In this perplexity he recommended himſelf to the prayers of Drabicius and Comenius (m), and kept himſelf quiet till his death, that is, till the 4th of February 1652. Comenius, who expected nothing of this (n), was ſtrangely ſurprized at it. The Angel, who informed him of every thing, had not revealed to him this great Article [E]. George Ragotſki, Prince of Tranſilvania, brother

(b) Ibid.

(i) Ibid. pag. 146.

(k) Ibid. pag. 148.

(l) Ibid. pag. 148, 149.

(m) Ibid. pag. 156.

(n) Ibid. pag. 157.

[C] He went to Ragotſki and told him .... that God commanded him to deſtroy the Houſe of Auſtria and the Pope.] He received orders to go to the camp of that Prince, and to ſpeak to him at firſt in a gentle, and afterwards in a threatning manner. He was to begin with informing the Prince, that God had choſen him King of Hungary, but that it was on condition, that he ſhould overthrow the dominion of the Houſe of Auſtria and the Pope, in which God would aſſiſt him in a very particular manner. In the concluſion he was to aſſure him, that if he reſiſted the voice of God, every one belonging to him ſhould be deſtroyed, even to the very dogs. " (9) Ignarus horum arcanorum Drabicius (10), mandatum accipit " 22. Julii & 31. Julii Principis Racocii caſtra adeundi, " Principemque primùm blandis verbis, deinde duris, " alloquendi. Blandis: electum eſſe divinitùs in Regem Hungariæ, ſed eâ conditione ut Auſtriacæ & " Papali dominationi finem imponat: habiturus auxilio Deum ad omnes hoſtiles exercitus clade afficiendum " (Rev. XXX.) Duris autem: ſi viperinam illam " progeniem perſequi renuerit, mala inducturum eſſe " Deum, exciſurumque de Domo ejus mingentem etiam " ad parietem (Rev. XXXI. v. 4.)" i. e. " Drabicius being ignorant of theſe ſecrets received a command on the 22d and 31ſt of July to go to the Camp " of Prince Ragotſki, and ſpeak to the Prince at firſt " in gentle, and afterwards in ſevere terms: In gentle " terms, that he was choſen by heaven King of Hungary, but upon this condition, that he ſhould put " an end to the Dominion of the Houſe of Auſtria and " the Pope; and that he would be aſſiſted by God in " deſtroying all the armies of the enemy (Rev. XXX.) " In ſevere terms, that if he ſhould refuſe to purſue " with vengeance that race of vipers, God would " bring on him calamity, and cut off from his houſe " even him that piſſeth againſt the wall (Revel. " XXXI. v. 4.") This was an exact imitation of the ſtyle and manner of the antient Prophets. I do not find, that Drabicius ſpoke himſelf to the Prince; but communicated his commiſſion to him by other perſons (11).

(9) Hiſtor. Revelat. pag. 147.

(10) That is, Drabicius did not know that the Turk had ſent Courier after Courier to Ragotski to forbid his joining his troops with the Swedes in Moravia in 1645, and the Emperor offered Ragotski the moſt favourable conditions of peace.

(11) Per Theologum, Medicum, Aulæque magiſtrum de ſibi commiſſis informat. Drabicius, Hiſt. Revel. pag. 147.

[D] Comenius having buſineſs in Hungary in 1650.] The Proteſtants, whom the Emperor had baniſhed from his dominions, had always entertained hopes of returning thither: ſome grounded their expectations on the leagues formed againſt the Emperor; others upon the viſions of ſome Enthuſiaſts. During the life of Guſtavus the affair became almoſt certain, and there was no reaſon to deſpair after his death; for his Lieutenants continued the war to the honour of their nation, and the advantage of the league. The refugees were in hopes therefore, that the recalling of them would be one of the articles of the Peace of Munſter. But they ſaw with regret, that this long and important negotiation was concluded in January 1650 without taking the leaſt notice of their baniſhment. The Houſe of Auſtria managed with ſuch addreſs, that it obtained terms vaſtly more advantageous than it could have promiſed itſelf: the Church paid for the Emperor, notwithſtanding the proteſtations of the Court of Rome: all that had been done againſt the Sectaries of his Dominions continued fixed and immoveable. Thus the poor refugees, who were diſperſed in divers places, ſaw themſelves without any manner of hopes, and reſolved to call an aſſembly to conſult of affairs. Pacis Monaſterii & Oſnabrugæ ſexennio agitatæ, tandemque concluſæ; iterumque Norimbergæ biennio ventilatæ, tandemque terminatæ, ultima publicatio incidit in Januarium anni 1650. Quâ Bohemiæ Regno, cum incorporatis Provinciis, hæreditatis nomine, Auſtriacæ Domui relictis, diſperſi propter Evangelium à ſpe reditûs æternùm excluſi, quid jam agendum eſſet deliberare cœperunt (12). Thoſe of Poland deſired that the reſt ſhould ſend their deputies to them; all agreed except the Hungarians. The refugees in Hungary alledged for excuſe among an hundred other things, that they had often ſent Deputies to Poland ſince their common baniſhment, and that it was reaſonable that they ſhould for once come to them. They demanded particularly, that Comenius the Surintendant of the Churches of Moravia might be ſent to them: this was the more eaſily conſented to, becauſe Comenius was at that time ſent for by Prince Sigiſmond Ragotſki to conſult upon ſome points relating to the reformation of the ſchools (13). This was the reaſon, which induced Comenius, when he left Elbing, to paſs through Sileſia and Moravia into Hungary, where he celebrated the feaſt of Eaſter with ſeveral Miniſters and Gentlemen deputed thither. Drabicius was preſent there, and communicated to him his Revelations, and from that time made him in ſome meaſure his Coadjutor (14).

(12) Ibid. pag. 49.

(13) See the Article of COMENIUS in the Text, between the Quotations (b) and (i).

(14) Comenius, Hiſt. Rev. pag. 149, 150.

[E] Ragotſki died in 1652. .... The Angel, who informed Comenius of every thing, had not revealed to him this great article.] This expreſſion, which is imitated from a paſſage in the Memoirs of the Ducheſs of Mazarin, offering itſelf, I have made uſe of it. I hope I ſhall be excuſed for it. Drabicius is here the Angel who informed Comenius of every thing; but he ther of the deceaſed, knew nothing of all this prophetical management; but Comenius gave him a particular account of it, by preſenting him with the writings of Drabicius. The latter was reſtored to the Miniſtry the 20th of June 1654 (o). Comenius did this as he paſſed through Hungary in his return to Poland. After his departure from the Court of Tranſilvania, it was neceſſary to employ another perſon to inform the Prince of the viſions of Drabicius. They preſented themſelves more frequently than ever, and ordered from time to time that they ſhould be communicated to the Coadjutor, in order that he might publiſh them to the Nations and Languages, and all people of the earth, and particularly to the Tartars and Turks (p). Comenius found himſelf embarraſſed between the fear of God and that of men: he was apprehenſive, that by not printing the Revelations of Drabicius he ſhould diſobey God; and by printing them, he ſhould expoſe himſelf to the ridicule and cenſure of men. He took a middle way (q). He reſolved to print them, and not to diſtribute the copies; and upon this account he entitled the book, Lux in tenebris (r). But his reſolution of concealing this light under a buſhel did not continue long; it gave way to two remarkable events, which were taken for a grand criſis, and the unravelling of the myſtery. One of theſe events was the irruption of Ragotſki into Poland [F]; the other the death of the Emperor Ferdinand III. Neither of theſe events were of any ſervice to the predictions; on the contrary, they ſerved to confound them. Ragotſki periſhed in his deſcent into Poland; and Leopold King of Hungary was elected Emperor in the room of Ferdinand III his father; an election, which reſtored the Houſe of Auſtria to its former grandeur in Germany, or very near it, and abſolutely ruined the Proteſtants in Hungary. The hopes founded on theſe two events being ſoon blaſted, Drabicius was the greateſt ſufferer by it [G]; for the Court of Vienna being informed, that he was the perſon who ſounded the trumpet againſt the Houſe of Auſtria, ſought means to puniſh him, and, as it is ſaid, ſucceeded in it. Comenius had nothing to fear on that account: he had ſecured himſelf in an impenetrable aſylum; he was become a citizen of Amſterdam, and enjoyed there all kinds of protection. He had nothing to fear but the pen of certain Divines, and the reproaches of Ragotſki's Secretary [H]; but this was of no conſequence to a man, who wanted neither wit,

(o) Ibid. pag. 177.

(p) Ibid. pag. 179.

(q) Ibid. pag. 183.

(r) See the Note [A] of the Article KOTTERUS.

was ſo far from acquainting him with the death of Ragotſki before it happened, that he ſent him Revelations after that Prince's death, which ſuppoſed him to be ſtill living. One of their confidents ſaid upon that occaſion, that undoubtedly Drabicius trifled with them: Comenius was ſtopped, but having had time to conſider of the affair, and examine the conformity of ſeveral viſions, he found that they had prefigured the death of the Prince a year before. Theſe are the people for my money; they never are at a loſs, if they have but time to adjuſt their affairs. Febris malignæ morbo correptus fuit (Sigiſmundus Racocius) quæ illi 4. Februarii vitæ finem attulit. Quod quia nec prædictum adeò, nec exſpectatum fuit, novus offenſionis lapis fuit factum. Præſertim cùm Drabicius novas ſuas nobis ſubmittens Revelationes, tanquam de vivente adhuc ſermocinaretur, quem nos non vivere jam certi eramus. Hinc amicorum rei conſciorum unus (J. T.) ad me: Ludificamur quàm verè vivit Deus. Ad quod nihil quod reſponderem habens obmutui. Nunc iſta ordine relegenti ſapientiæ Dei veſtigia manifeſtè ſeſe oſtentant (15).

(15) Idem, pag. 156, 157.

[F] The deſcent of Ragotſki into Poland.] Comenius frankly acknowledges, that he took this for an accompliſhment of the Prophecy, which their three Seers had declared, that the Eaſt ſhould join with the North to bring on the terrible day of the Lord (16). He owns likewiſe very ingenuouſly that he was miſtaken: he could not deny it, becauſe Ragotſki's fooliſh deſign was attended with the worſt ſucceſs imaginable. But ſee what cauſe Comenius aſſigns for his miſtake: it was, ſays he (17), becauſe I had not ſufficiently obſerved, that according to the prophecies of Chriſtina Poniatovia the Eaſtern and the Northern Lions were not to meet except to confer together, and that they ſhould not even come to a good underſtanding, but part without doing any thing. Add to this, ſays he, that, according to Drabicius, it was not neceſſary that Ragotſki ſhould enter into Poland without having taken meaſures with the Tartars and Turks, and ſettled affairs in his own country. We thought, continues he, that he had done all this before he took the field, and we were deceived in that point. Conſider this well, and you will ſee here a proof of the obſtinacy of theſe men; they never want evaſions; there is always ſome clauſe, which they did not take notice of; and thus they always reſerve for themſelves a backdoor, and a reſſource in order to begin their Prophecies afreſh. If Ragotſki had executed the conditions, which Drabicius preſcribed to him, and notwithſtanding this his expedition had proved unſucceſsful, it would not have been owned that the Prophecies had been falſe; for did not Poniatovia foretel, that the Eaſt and North ſhould meet without doing any thing? Comenius was more ſubtle than we imagine, when he tacked his three ſeers together. We find more ſubterfuges in three Prophets than in one. Read the marginal Note (23) in Remark [H].

(16) Ab inſperato Principis Tranſ. cum exercitu in Poloniam adventu, credebamus jam illud impleri quod ab omnibus bis Videntibus prædictum, ut ſe Orians jungat Septentrioni, tremendumque illud opus Dei mox procedat. Ibid. pag. 183.

(17) Idem, ibid.

[G] Drabicius was the greateſt ſufferer.] I have not met with one perſon, who could tell me what the end of him was, and I cannot tell what regard is to be paid to the following account, which I have extracted from a French Author (18): Several reflections were made, ſays he, with which I think I ought not to amuſe my Readers, who indeed are not obliged to believe them, any more than a ſilly letter, which an arrant fool (whoſe name and perſon I do not deſire to know) ſent a great Monarch, agreeably to the extravagant Viſions of Nicholas Drabicius a Bohemian, burnt for an impoſtor and falſe Prophet, whoſe Book was carried to all the Courts of Europe, and even to that of the Grand Seignior, by a Miniſter of Zurich in Swiſſerland; who upon this account was fourteen years in priſon, during all which time, as a mark of his madneſs, he ſuffered his beard to grow down to his girdle, as a Gentleman of great veracity, who knew him, aſſured me. Mr. Des Marets had heard a very different account from this, which was that Drabicius was ſo far from baptizing the Great Turk, as he expected, that he was obliged to ſeek refuge in Turky, where he died. Ad multa particularia proceſſerunt (hi impoſtores) circa Ragocium . . . . magnum Turcam à Drabicio baptizandum (cum è contrario feratur ipſum Drabicium ad Turcas tranſiiſſe & inter eos obiiſſe) quorum impoſturas & falſitatem oppoſitus eventus docuit (19).

(18) Rocoles, Vienne deux fois delivrée, pag. 381.

(19) Mareſius, in Antirrhetico contra J. A. Comenium, pag. 67.

[H] Comenius . . . . had nothing to fear but the reproaches of Ragotſki's Secretary.] That Prince having ſucceeded his brother Sigiſmond, was initiated in the myſteries of Drabicius: he did not diſcover, whether he believed them or not; but he ordered that the viſions, which Drabicius might have for the future, ſhould be communicated to him (20). The Princeſs his mother was made privy to it: Drabicius was commanded by a viſion of the night to go to her, and declare a bleſſing or curſe to her, according as ſhe received his Prophecies (21). They were given to be examined by John Biſterfield a Divine and Counſellor of State, who rejected them (22). However, the reproaches of the (20) Hiſt. Revelat. pag. 162.

(21) Ibid. pag. 165.

(22) Ibid. p. 175.

wit, nor learning, nor a faculty of writing books, and citing upon all occaſions phraſes of Scripture and other ſpiritual maxims, with an air of great zeal for the cauſe of God, and the deſtruction of Antichriſt. He ſupported himſelf by theſe engines; and if he loſt his authority, his reputation, and his glory, it was only with a few perſons of good ſenſe, who are ſcarce ever the arbiters of a man's reputation. Thoſe who had once been credulous with regard to him, continued to be ſo (s), and this is what will always be the caſe. Thus all future Viſionaries and Fanatics have nothing to fear; they may vent confidently whatever comes into their head, if they have but addreſs enough to accommodate themſelves to the prevailing paſſions of the times. They will not indeed have the laughers of their ſide; but they will have other partiſans of more importance than the laughers. Conſult the Articles of COMENIUS and KOTTER. Drabicius's Viſions extend to the year 1666. It is a miſtake to aſcribe his baniſhment to ſeditious diſcourſes (t); for he was baniſhed upon the ſame account with the reſt of the Bohemian Miniſters, &c. We ſhall ſee elſewhere (u) whether Mr. Jurieu ought to have ſaid, that the learned men of Paris ſcarce knew the name of Drabicius.

(s) Toties ineptiis ejus decepti, eum pro magno Prophetâ habere pergunt, nec quicquam inde detrimenti auctoritas ejus ſenſit. Sic mundus vult decipi. Append. Diſcurſus Theolog. Arnoldi contra Comentium.

(t) Moreri has committed this miſtake.

(u) In the note [A] of the Article KOTTERUS.

the Secretary of Ragotſki ſhewed, that this Prince had to his loſs given credit to Drabicius. Theſe reproaches were not paſſed by in ſilence; Comenius repreſented that the Prince had not followed the directions of the Seer; for he went into Poland without making an alliance with the Turks. Brevi poſt à Principis Tranſylvaniæ Secretario, C. S. triſtes venerunt (ternâ vice) quibus hiſtoricè Principis ſui ruinam recitans, non obſcurè culpam in Revelationes iſtas (quaſi fidem illis habens eò impulſus fuiſſet Principes) conferre videbatur, cauſa fuit data ad nebulas illas diſcutiendum ſcribendi aliquid (23). It would be difficult to ſay whether Ragotſki really credited the Prophecies of Drabicius, or only believed that they might procure him victory by the influence, which they might have upon the people. It is poſſible enough, that a Prince of courage and a conſiderable ſhare of wit, but without any learning, might be prevailed upon by ſuch diſcourſes as thoſe of Drabicius; I mean, that he might think there was ſomething divine and prophetic in them, and be apprehenſive of the curſes denounced by that Prophet. George Ragotſki was given to underſtand that his father and brother had felt the effects of them: why may not we believe that he became credulous? But beſides it is very poſſible, that a Prince of ſagacity enough to deſpiſe theſe chimera's, may form ſchemes and great deſigns agreeably to the viſions of theſe people; for it is a very powerful engine for bringing about great revolutions, to prepare the people by explications of the Apocalypſe, uttered with an air of inſpiration and enthuſiaſm. This has occaſioned the enemies of the Proteſtants to ſay, that their Authors have laboured ſo much upon the Apocalypſe with a view only to raiſe war over all Europe, by inſpiring a Prince, who had no thought of the matter, with a deſire of taking advantage of thoſe conjunctures. Comenius was not exempt from this ſuſpicion. See the Article of KOTTERUS.

(23) Ibid. pag. 184. Obſerve that if Ragotski's expedition had ſucceeded, no notice had been taken of his not having obſerved the conditions preſcribed by the Prophet, and thus the ſame clauſes are eſſential or accidental to the prophecies of theſe people, according as the events ſhall determine. This is their great key.

DRELINCOURT (CHARLES) Miniſter of the Church of Paris, was born July the 10th 1595 at Sedan, where his father had a conſiderable poſt [A]. He paſſed thro' the ſtudy of polite Literature and Divinity at Sedan, but was ſent to Saumur, to go through a courſe of Philoſophy there under Profeſſor Duncan. He was admitted Miniſter in June 1618, and diſcharged his function near Langres [B], till he was called by the Church of Paris in March 1620. In 1625 he married the only daughter of a rich Merchant

[A] His father had a conſiderable poſt at Sedan.] He was at firſt Secretary to Henry Robert de la Mark Duke of Bouillon, and ſovereign Prince of Sedan, and was afterwards choſen Regiſter of the ſupreme Council of that City (1). He married N. Buyrette, daughter of Nicholas Buyrette, Advocate in the Parliament of Paris. This Advocate embraced the Reformation; his wife and children followed his example with ſo much zeal, that Thomas Buyrette his eldeſt ſon is placed in the Proteſtant Martyrology, and James Buyrette his ſecond ſon devoted himſelf to the Miniſtry, and would have been actually one of the Paſtors of the Church of Paris, if he had not died the ſame week, which was appointed for his ordination. Thomas Buyrette, by the advice of Calvin and his collegues, undertook the office of a Miniſter at nineteen years of age, and exerciſed it at Lyons (2). Some years after, the vehemence of the perſecutions obliged him to retire to Geneva . . ; but not finding any comfort except in the diſcharge of his vocation, he was immediately ſent to Beſançon, where God enabled him to ſettle a Church ſecretly, and to advance the Kingdom of Chriſt in a wonderful manner. His mother not having ſeen him, ſince he became a Miniſter, was paſſionately deſirous of ſeeing him; upon which he took a journey to Paris the year of the maſſacre. He fell the third day into the hands of the maſſacrers, who having learned from him his religion and function, put him to death in a cruel manner together with John Molé, huſband of Mary Buyrette, his eldeſt ſiſter, and inhumanly drag'd both their bodies into the river. This is the ſame Thomas Buyrette, who is mentioned in the Book of Martyrs, and rank'd amongſt thoſe Miniſters of Chriſt, who have ſealed the truth of the Goſpel with their blood. His mother eſcaped this deluge of blood by a kind of miracle, and retired to Sedan with the reſt of her children, whom ſhe educated in the fear of God. The laſt of them was a poſthumous daughter, and was married to Peter Drelincourt, who had likewiſe retired to Sedan, and was then Secretary to Henry Robert de la Mark (3). Theſe are the father and mother of our Charles Drelincourt.

(1) The Manuſcript Life of Charles Drelincourt.

(2) See the Epiſtle Dedicatory of the IX Dialogues de Mr. Drelincourt contres les Miſſionairès, touchant le Service des Egliſes Réformées.

(3) See the ſame Epiſtle Dedicatory.

[B] He was admitted Miniſter . . . . and diſcharged his function near Langres.] It was thought, that a Church might be founded at the Gates of Langres as in a Bailywick. Thoſe who laboured to eſtabliſh it, were deſirous that Mr. Drelincourt ſhould be Miniſter of this riſing Church. As he was aſſured, that there was a proſpect of a conſiderable harveſt in thoſe parts, he accepted of this invitation with joy, and preferred it to all the others, which were then made to him; for tho' he was but twenty two years and ſome months old, he had the happineſs to be deſired by many Churches of the Kingdom, and even ſome of the moſt conſiderable foreign Churches . . . . When he came to Langres, he was filled with great hopes, for he found in that city a great number of people, who are called Temporizers, who ſeemed only to wait for an opportunity of declaring themſelves; and in the country he ſaw people, who breathed after the purity and ſimplicity of the Goſpel, and even upon the mere report of the ſettlement of this Church flocked thither to the number of above five hundred in hopes of hearing a Sermon. But the neceſſary Decree could never be obtained of the King's Council. Mr. Drelincourt felt ſo deep a ſorrow on this account, that he fell into a fit of ſickneſs, which laſted three months, and brought him almoſt to his grave. . . . In expectation of the eſtabliſhment ſo much deſired he preached in the neighbouring churches, and even in the caſtle of Precigni, where he received impoſition of hands in the beginning of June 1618. He was not permitted to make his ordinary abode at Langres: this made him the more diligent in viſiting, inſtructing, and comforting the Proteſtants in the Country. At laſt, when all hopes of ſeeing the Church of Langres eſtabliſhed were loſt, he accepted Merchant of Paris (a); by whom he had ſixteen children [C]. The bleſſing of God, which ſhewed itſelf in his marriage by an uncommon fruitfulneſs, was not leſs viſible in the ſucceſs of his Miniſtry. His Sermons were very edifying; he was incomparably well ſkilled in comforting of the ſick, and he managed with great ſucceſs the affairs of his Church, and even thoſe of other flocks, upon which he never failed of being conſulted when they were important. The ſervices which he did the Church by the fruitfulneſs of his pen cannot be ſufficiently diſplayed [D], whether we conſider his books of devotion, or thoſe of controverſy. There is ſuch a vein of piety in the former, and the ſpirit and expreſſions of Scripture run through them in ſuch a manner, that religious minds have always and ſtill do wonderfully edify from them. What he wrote againſt the Church of Rome of the call of the Church of Paris. He preached there for the firſt time on the 15th of March 1620. He always maintained a peculiar affection for the members of his former Church (4).

(a) His name was Bolduc; he had turned Proteſtant.

(4) Extracted from the Epiſtle Dedicatory of the 3d volume of his Sermons. He dedicated it to Meſſieurs Heudelot, Lords of Precigny, and the reſt of the Faithful in and about the City of Langres.

[C] He had ſixteen children.] The ſeven firſt were all ſons; the reſt were intermixed, ſix ſons and three daughters.

The eldeſt of all was LAURENCE DRELINCOURT. He was at firſt Miniſter of Rochelle; but being obliged to leave that Church by an Edict, which prohibited that Church to have any Paſtor, who was born out of Rochelle; "he was called to Niort, where he "exerciſed his miniſterial functions with great eſteem "and faithfulneſs, till God having deprived him of "ſight in the year 1680, he died ſix months after, "aged 56 years. We have ſeveral fine Sermons of "his compoſing. He left likewiſe a Collection of "Chriſtian Sonnets (5), which are extremely ele-"gant, and highly eſteemed by thoſe, who have a "taſte for piety as well as wit. Beſides his being a "ſolid Divine, a good Preacher, and well ſkilled in "Hebrew, he had this peculiar in him, that having "at his leiſure hours ſtudied the French Language to "perfection, he admirably well underſtood all the de-"licacies and purity of it, ſo that the famous Monſr. "Conrart conſulted him almoſt every poſt upon thoſe "points. He left among other manuſcripts one, the "deſign of which is to clear the French Tongue of all "low and impure expreſſions, and which deſerves to "be publiſhed. . . Laurence Drelincourt was married, "and left only daughters (6)." If the reader has any curioſity of ſeeing what affection his father had for him, he need only read the Epiſtle Dedicatory of the Faux Paſteur convaincu.

(5) There are ſix editions: the laſt is of Amſterdam, printed by Nicholas Parmentier, 1693.

(6) Extracted from the Manuſcript Life.

The ſecond ſon was named HENRY DRELINCOURT. He was conſecrated to the holy Miniſtry, and exerciſed the functions of it at firſt at Gien, and afterwards at Fontainebleau. Theſe two brothers had the conſolation to receive impoſition of hands from their own father. The Sermons, which he preached upon theſe occaſions, have been publiſhed. Henry Drelincourt died before the laſt perſecution (7). He had been an Advocate, before he was a Miniſter (8).

(7) The Manuſcript Life.

(8) See the Epiſtle Dedicatory of the Faux Paſteur convaincu, dated April the 4th 1656. He was not then a Miniſter.

The third ſon is the illuſtrious CHARLES DRELINCOURT, Profeſſor of Phyſic at Leyden (9), whom I have already had occaſion to ſpeak of more than once (10). "He had ſcarce taken his Degrees at Montpellier in "1654, but he was immediately choſen firſt Phyſi-"cian to the Armies of the King of France in Flan-"ders, under Marſhal Turenne. Afterwards mar-"rying at Paris, he was invited to the Profeſſorſhip "of Phyſic at Leyden in 1668. He is at preſent "Dean of the Univerſity. He ſerved William III "King of England, and Queen Mary his Conſort, "till their advancement to the Throne. It was to "him alone that the King intruſted the care of his "Conſort in her journey to the waters of Aix in "1681. He had the advantage likewiſe of being "called in to all the great Perſons of the Court at the "Hague (11)." I will not omit the mention of a circumſtance, which I have read in the Epiſtle Dedicatory to the Faux Paſteur convaincu, that he had an inclination to the Miniſtry even after he became Doctor of Phyſic. If he has not the title, it is certain that he does not want any one of the qualifications requiſite for a true Miniſter of the Goſpel. There are no Divines, who are greater maſters of the Scriptures than he; and there are few but what he excells in that point. His piety is ſolid, benevolent, obliging, charitable. He ſpares neither his purſe, nor intereſt, nor advice, for the ſervice of the Refugees, who ſtand in need of his good offices. Never any man was ſo thorough a friend as he. Thoſe, who ſhall undertake a panegyric on him, will find it difficult to determine, whether the qualifications of the ſcholar or the man of honour are moſt eminent in him. If we were to collect all the encomiums on him by different Authors, it would make a Book. Thoſe, which his collegues have given him in their public Orations (12), appear to me of great value; and it is well known, that lately (13) they have repreſented his merit to great advantage upon an occaſion (14), which called them to another object, the greateſt and nobleſt, which can be imagined, and the moſt capable of diverting and engaging the whole attention of the Orator. All the writings, which he has publiſhed, are of an original and inimitable character. Conſult the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, where you will find Extracts from ſome of his Treatiſes on Phyſic. See likewiſe the Epiſtle Dedicatory to a Sermon printed at Leyden in 1682 (15). He underſtands admirably well the French Language. Neither Vaugelas nor Bouhours could point out ſo exactly the faults and negligencies of our French Writers. The ſmalleſt and moſt imperceptible defects of ſtyle cannot eſcape him, when he will give himſelf the trouble of obſerving them.

(9) See the following Article.

(10) See among other paſſages above the Preface to the Article of ACHILLES Note [A], the Article of ANDROMACHUS of Crete, and the Note [G] of the Article BRISEIS.

(11) Extracted from the Manuſcript Life.

(12) See the Funeral Oration upon Dr. Herman, written by Dr. Bidloo, the illuſtrious Profeſſor of Phyſic at Leyden. I omit many other Orations, in which he is applauded.

(13) In March 1695.

(14) The Funeral Oration on the Queen of England. Mr. Spanheim, and Mr. Perizonius have both written beautiful Orations on the death of that Princeſs.

The fourth ſon is ANTHONY DRELINCOURT. He is Phyſician at Orbes in Swiſſerland, and highly eſteemed in his profeſſion. The Magiſtrates of Bern have appointed him their Phyſician extraordinary.

The fifth ſon died at Geneva, while he ſtudied Divinity there.

The ſixth is PETER DRELINCOURT. He is a Prieſt of the Church of England, and Dean of Armagh. He is a man of great merit.

All the other children died either in their infancy, or in the flower of their youth (16), except a daughter, who is ſtill living. She was married to Monſr. Malnoe, Advocate of the Parliament at Paris; and inſtead of following him to Holland, whither he retired for Religion at the time of the Dragoonade, ſhe continued at Paris, where ſhe openly profeſſes the Roman Catholic Religion.

(15) It is intitled, Les Etoiles de l'Egliſe & les Chandeliers myſtiques. It was preached by Laurence Drelincourt before the Synod of Poitou at Fontenai Octob. 25, 1677. The Author of the Dedication is named Mr. Baignoux. He was Miniſter of Poitiers, and married the eldeſt daughter of Laurence Drelincourt.

(16) Among the reſt, a daughter, who died with great ſentiments of devotion, Decemb. 5, 1655. See the Epiſtle Dedicatory of the Faux Paſteur convaincu.

[D] He did great ſervice to the Church by the fruitfulneſs of his pen.] His firſt Eſſay was a Treatiſe of Preparation for the Holy Supper. This, and his Catechiſm, his ſhort View of the Controverſies, and his Conſolations againſt the fears of death, are of all his Works thoſe, which have been the moſt frequently reprinted. Some of them have paſſed through above forty Editions, and have been tranſlated into divers languages, High Dutch, Low Dutch, Italian, and Engliſh. His charitable viſits, in five Volumes, ſerve for a continual conſolation to private perſons, and for a ſource and model to Miniſters. He publiſhed three Volumes of Sermons. His Controverſial Works, which I can recollect, are as follow: The Jubilee: The Roman Combat: The Jeſuit's Owl: An Anſwer to Father Cauſſin: Diſputes with the Biſhop of Bellai concerning the honour due to the Holy Virgin: An Anſwer to la Milletiere (17): Dialogues againſt the Miſſionaries, in ſeveral Volumes: The falſe Paſtor convicted: The falſe Face of Antiquity: The pretended Nullities of the Reformation: An Anſwer to Prince Erneſt of Heſſe: An Anſwer to (18) the Speech of the Clergy ſpoken by the Archbiſhop of Sens: A Defence of Calvin. He wrote ſome letters, which have been printed, one to the Dutcheſs of Tremouille upon her huſband's revolt from the Proteſtant Religion; one of Conſolation addreſſed to Madam de la Tabariere: one upon the Reſtoration of Charles II King of Great Britain: ſome upon the Engliſh Epiſcopacy, &c. I omit the Prayers, which he publiſhed. Some were made for the King, others for the Queen, and the Dauphin.

(17) He had a conference with Milletiere, and confounded him. The Acts of it were publiſhed. See the Hiſtory of the Edict of Nantes, tom. 2. pag. 515, 516.

(18) He wrote it under the name of Philalethes, in 1656.

Rome has confirmed the Proteſtants more than can be expreſſed; for with the arms with which he furniſhed them, thoſe, who had not the advantage of learning, were enabled to oppoſe the Monks and Pariſh Prieſts, and reſolutely contend with the Miſſionaries. His writings have made him conſidered as the ſcourge of the Roman Catholic Controvertiſts; and yet he was beloved by thoſe of the other party [E]. The great Lords of the Reformed Religion always ſhewed a very great regard for him [F]. He died November the 3d 1669 in the moſt pious diſpoſition, which could be expected from a Miniſter, who had always appeared animated by a warm zeal (b), and with indefatigable application conſecrated all his labours to the glory of God and the ſervice of the Church [G]. He had been extremely aſſiduous in prayer; and in the latter years of his life, if he was alone, he never heard the clock ſtrike but he fell down on his knees in prayer to God (c). Paul Freher is miſtaken in many points [H].

(b) See his laſt Hours, which were publiſhed after his death, and annexed to his book of the Conſolations againſt the fears of death, in the later editions.

(c) Extracted from his Manuſcript Life, written by a French Refugee Miniſter in England, who is writing the Lives of the famous Paſtors of France.

[E] He was beloved by thoſe of the other party.] "It is well known, that he had an eaſy acceſs to the Secretaries of State, the firſt Preſident, the King's Advocate, and the civil and criminal Lieutenants: but he never made any other uſe of his intereſt with them, than to aſſiſt the afflicted Churches, or to ſerve an infinite number of private perſons, whom he either raiſed in the world, or ſaved from the whip, the gibbet, and the galleys (19)." It may be affirmed that tho' the Catholics of France were ſuperior to the Proteſtants in every thing, which relates to worldly advantages, the latter did not ceaſe to preach boldly againſt the doctrines of the Romiſh Communion, and to write controverſial Treatiſes, in which they did not ſcruple to give every thing its proper name (20). A great many perſons of merit and authority in the other party, were equitable enough to do juſtice to a Proteſtant Author, who defended his cauſe well, and kept within the bounds of his ſubject. Our Drelincourt is an inſtance of this; and Mr. Claude is another; for he was highly eſteemed among the Roman Catholics (21). We may perceive by this the error or groſs artifice of ſome people, who make it a great merit in them, that they are hated, like the plague, among the Roman Catholics, Arminians, Anabaptiſts, &c. If they had only maintained their cauſe well, they would not have become the object of univerſal hatred: it is therefore to their manner of acting, their perſonal abuſes, their diſhoneſt practices, evident in their writings, that they ought to impute the general averſion, which they labour under.

(19) The Manuſcript Life abovementioned.

(20) See the Hiſtory of the Edict of Nantes, tom. 2. lib. 11. pag. 556.

(21) See Note [E] of the Article CLAUDE.

[F] The great Lords of the Reformed Religion ſhewed a very great regard for him.] "The Duke de la "Force, the Marſhals Chatillon, Gaſcon, and Turenne, the Ducheſs of Tremouille, highly eſteemed "him. They ſent for him to their Palaces, and honoured him from time to time with their viſits. "Foreign Princes (22), and Noblemen, the Embaſſadors of England and France did the ſame, and "all of them often made uſe of his prudent advice (23)."

(22) He was particularly eſteemed by the Houſe of Heſſe, as appears by the Books, which he dedicated to the Princes and Princeſſes of that name.

(23) The Manuſcript Life.

[G] He had with indefatigable application conſecrated all his labours to the Glory of God and the ſervice of the Church.] As he was of a very ſtrong conſtitution, he never ſpared himſelf, when he had any miniſterial function to perform. Upon an extraordinary occaſion he had reſolution and ſtrength enough to preach ſeven times in one day. "It was by the advan"tage of this vigour of body and mind, which God "had beſtowed on him, that for the ſpace of twelve "years he ſerved the Church of Paris, being the "third Miniſter after the removal of Monſr. du Mou"lin. But among other things he had more aſſidu"ity and readineſs in viſiting the ſick, than had ever "been ſeen in any other perſon. . . . He took ſo "much pleaſure in labouring in his function, and "eſpecially in attacking of error, that he wiſhed to "die with his pen in his hand (24)." He preached to the laſt week of his life; for his laſt Sermon was that of the 27th of October 1669.

(24) Ibid.

[H] Paul Freher is miſtaken in many points.] I. He fixes the birth of Charles Drelincourt on the 10th of October (25); whereas it ſhould have been the 10th of July. II. He makes him enter upon his Miniſtry in the Church of Paris in 1619; and yet Mr. Drelincourt, who had been a Miniſter from the year 1618, did not begin to ſerve that Church till 1620. III. He ſays, that at the ſame time (26) Monſr. du Moulin retired to Sedan; and that therefore Charles Drelincourt and John Meſtrezat had alone the care of the flock for ſeveral years. Du Moulin retired to Sedan in 1620, and there remained three Paſtors in the Church of Paris. Mr. Drelincourt was one of the three; and for twelve years he ſerved that great Church, being the third Miniſter (27). IV. He affirms that Mr. Drelincourt not having ſtrength enough to go up into the pulpit on account of the infirmities of old age, preached frequently in the Church-yard near the Church (28). All this is falſe. They never preached in the Church-yard of Charenton but upon Sacrament Days, or upon ſome other ſolemnity, which occaſioned the aſſembly to be more numerous than ordinary. Upon theſe occaſions they preached in the Church according to cuſtom, and beſides that in the Church-yard. A Miniſter, who had not ſtrength enough to go up into the Pulpit, could not have been able to preach in a Church-yard, ſince they preached in a pulpit there. Mr. Drelincourt neither in his youth nor old age was ever pitched upon more than any other Miniſter to preach in the Church-yard. V. What he adds concerning the eighteen laſt months of his life is a very erroneous account; we find nothing in it but what contradicts that truth, that he preached to the laſt week of his life (29). Will not thoſe, who underſtand the practice of the Phyſicians at Paris, think it ſurprizing, that it ſhould be related as a ſtrange thing, that this Miniſter was let blood four times during an indiſpoſition of eighteen months? Seſquianno ante obitum à M. Majo A. 1668. catharris frequenter ad pectus delapſis cum tuſſi & aſthmate miſere affligus; poſtquam INTEREA quater ipſi vena ſecta fuiſſet . . . . . vitam morte beata terminavit 3. Nov. A. C. 1669. (30). I cannot ſay, whether the German Book, cited by Freher, contains theſe errors; but I make no doubt of it.

(25) Theatr. Viror. Erudit. pag. 696.

(26) That is, according to him, in 1619.

(27) See the Note [G].

(28) Viribus tamen ob ſenium diminutis Cathedram conſcendere nequiret, ſæpius in cæmiterio proximo conciones peregit. Freher. in Theatro Virorum eruditor. pag. 696.

(29) The Manuſcript Life. See Note [G].

(30) Freher, pag. 696.

DRELINCOURT (CHARLES) ſon of the preceding, was born at Paris February the 1ſt 1633. He took the Degree of Doctor of Phyſic at Montpellier in 1654, and after having diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the practice of it as well in the army commanded by Marſhal de Turenne in Flanders, as at Paris, he was choſen by the Curators of the Univerſity of Leyden to the Profeſſorſhip of Phyſic in 1668 (a). He accepted of that place, and diſcharged the functions of it with extraordinary ſucceſs. His method of teaching was the moſt clear and exact imaginable; and he diſplayed in Anatomy a dexterity and ſagacity, which was univerſally admired. He was perfectly ſkilled in the Greek and Latin tongues; and from the vaſt extent of his learning one would have imagined, that he had applied himſelf for his whole life to the ſtudy of polite learning. You will find another part of his excellent character in the Remark [C] of the preceding Article. He died at Leyden May the 31ſt 1697, after having ſuffered for ſome time the moſt ſevere pains with a patience truly chriſtian. He had the conſolation to ſee his only ſon

(a) See the Epiſtle Dedicatory to Mr. Van Banning before his Treatiſe de oſſifmeſtri Partu vitali.

CHARLES

(b) Feb. 3. 1693.

CHARLES DRELINCOURT, admitted Doctor of Phyſic (b), and well married, and father of two ſons. He ordered that no funeral Oration ſhould be made for him.

DRESSERUS (MATTHEW) born at Erfort, the Capital of Thuringia, Auguſt the 24th 1536, raiſed himſelf a conſiderable name among the Learned. The firſt Academical Lectures which he heard were thoſe of Luther and Melancthon at Wittenberg. He had not the advantage of them long, becauſe the air of that City diſagreeing with him, obliged him to return ſoon to Erfort, where he ſtudied Greek under Maurice Sideman. When he had taken the degree of Maſter of Arts in 1559, he read Lectures in Rhetoric at home, and afterwards taught in the College of Erfort, and having been admitted among the Profeſſors of Philoſophy, he taught polite Literature and the Greek tongue. After he had taught ſixteen years in his own country, he was invited to Jena to ſupply the place of Lipſius, as Profeſſor of Hiſtory and Eloquence. He pronounced his inaugural Oration (a) in 1574. Some time after he went to Meiſſen, to be Head of the College there; and having continued there ſix years, he obtained in 1581 the Profeſſorſhip of polite Learning in the Univerſity of Leipſic, and a particular penſion was ſettled on him to continue the Hiſtory of Saxony. Upon his coming to Leipſic he found a great many diſputes about the Doctors; ſome of them were for introducing the Philoſophy of Ramus, and others oppoſed it; ſome were deſirous of advancing towards Calviniſm, and others would ſuffer no innovations in Lutheraniſm. He determined to keep clear of theſe conteſts with regard to innovations in Philoſophy; but when he ſaw the connexion of them with the other diſputes [A], he became one of the moſt zealous Anti-Ramiſts that was ever known in that country. He ſpent the remainder of his life at Leipſic, and died there October the 5th 1607. He is the Author of ſeveral works [B]. He married in 1565, and became a widower in 1598, and married again very ſollicitous for the intereſts of Dreſſerus; for he omitted no meaſures for the ſuppreſſing of the Book, which the Ramiſts publiſhed againſt this adverſary, and for puniſhing the Authors. Idem Berlepſchius omnes vias perſecutus eſt quibus ſcriptum adverſus Dreſſerum editum à Ramæis profligaret, & in autores juſta ſeveritate animadverteret (3). We are not to wonder at this, ſince he thought that Ramiſm lead to Calviniſm. Memini, inquit, Pariſiis quantas turbas, quantas cædes pepererit Rami ſecta. Quin & in hæc verba gravitate magna erupit, quid quæritis? Ramiſmus eſt gradus ad Calviniſmum (4). i. e. "I remember, ſays he, what vaſt confuſion and ſlaughter "the ſect of Ramus was the occaſion of at Paris. "And he broke out into theſe words with great gra-"vity; What do you aim at? Ramiſm is the way "to Calviniſm." We at preſent juſtly laugh at thoſe violent conteſts, which divided the Univerſities in the XVIth Century on account of trifles; for ſo we ought to call the diſputes between the Ramiſts and Ariſtotelians. We cannot read the account of ſo many tumults without laughter or pity. Our age will be treated in the ſame manner by the ſucceeding ages; and thus is verified the maxim, that one half of the world laughs at the other; it is verified, I ſay, at the expence of another very juſt maxim:

(a) De Eloquentiæ & Hiſtoriarum ſtudio. It is printed with ſome other Orations of the ſame Author.

(3) Melch. Adam. in Vitis Philoſophor. Germanor. pag. 497.

(4) Idem, ibid.

Loripedem rectus derideat, Æthiopem albus (5).

(5) Juven. Sat. 2. ver. 28.

"Let him cry Blackmoor, Devil, whoſe ſkin is "white,
"And homely legs, who treads himſelf upright.
TATE.

(6) Idem, ibid. ver. 27.

and by the fulfilling of a third very unjuſt maxim.

Clodius accuſat mœchos, Catilina Cethegum (6).

"Clodius tax bawds, Cethegus Catiline."
TATE.

(7) Cum aliis Libellis juventuti Scholaſticæ utilibus. Melchior. Adam. in Vit. Philoſ. Germanor. pag. 497.

(8) It is intitled, De Partibus humani corporis & animæ, ejuſque potentiis libri duo. Adjectæ ſunt ad finem Morborum & Medicamentorum communiſſimorum Appellationes. Merklin. in Lindenio renovato. pag. 793. Paul. Freher. Theatr. pag. 1505.

(9) Freher, ibid. p. 1504, aſcribes it to him.

[A] When he ſaw their connection with other diſputes.] I imagine, that there happened in Saxony at that time what has ſince happened in Holland. The Divines of the Augſbourg confeſſion, who inclined towards Calviniſm, had properly no concern in protecting the Ramiſts; for what connection was there between the hypotheſes of Ramus, and the confeſſion of Geneva? And yet the cauſe of the Ramiſts and that of theſe Divines were combined: both parties thought proper to unite their intereſts, that they might be the better able to reſiſt thoſe, who would not permit any innovations. This was undoubtedly the reaſon why the rigid Lutherans oppoſed the Ramiſts with as much vigour as they did the favourers of Calviniſm. The Reader will underſtand by this what I have ſaid, that Matthew Dreſſerus declared againſt the ſubtilties of Ramus, when he ſaw that they were complicated with the theological diſputes, which diſturbed Saxony. Here is an exact image of the combination, which appeared in Holland between Cocceianiſm and Carteſianiſm; theſe two things have only this in common, that one is conſidered as a new method of explaining Divinity, and the other as a new Philoſophy. As for the reſt, the principles of the Cocceians, and the ſpirit of their hypotheſes are entirely different from the Carteſian ſpirit.

RAMISM and Carteſianiſm combined with Theological Diſputes.

Let us give the very words of Melchior Adamus. Venit autem Lipſiam eo tempore, quo (verba referimus ipſius Dreſſeri) anceps malum in Academiam illam invaſerat: dum nonnulli argutias Rami, repudiata doctrina Ariſtotelis & Melanchthonis, invehere conarentur: alii religionis quædam dogmata ad ſenſum Calvini inflecterent. Utrumque extremum declinare ipſe cupiebat: & quoniam concertatio de Rami novitatibus Philoſophicam communitatem vehementer conturbarat, abſtinendum ſibi ab ejus conſortio eſſe putavit, ne in medium certamen atque diſcrimen ſe objiceret (1). i. e. "He came to Leipſic "at that time, when (to make uſe of Dreſſerus's own "words) a double evil had forced itſelf into that "Univerſity; whilſt ſome endeavoured to introduce "the ſubtilties of Ramus, rejecting the doctrine of "Ariſtotle and Melancthon; others warped ſome "doctrines of Religion to the ſenſe of Calvin. He "deſired to avoid both extremes; and becauſe the "diſpute concerning the novelties of Ramus greatly "diſturbed the Philoſophical Community, he thought "proper to keep clear of it, leſt he ſhould expoſe him-"ſelf to the heat of the conteſt and danger." Berlepſch, the Electoral Commiſſary, diverted him from this pacific deſign, and there happened to Dreſſerus what happens to many perſons, who engage late in this kind of diſputes; they are more zealous than the firſt promoters of them. Ramiſm appeared to Dreſſerus an horrible monſter (2); he entered into all the views of the Electoral Commiſſary, who on his part was

(1) Melch. Adam. in Vitis Philoſophor. Germanor. pag. 496.

(2) Ubi vero cognovit cum Rami doctrina conjunctam eſſe illius dogmatis diſceptationem, magni animi ardore peſtiferum id genus amovere conatus eſt. Idem, ibid. pag. 497.

[B] He is the Author of ſeveral Works.] Of a Rhetorica inventionis, diſpoſitionis, & elocutionis, exemplis ſacris & profanis quam plurimis illuſtrata: of three Books Gymnaſmatum Literaturæ Græcæ, Orationum, Epiſtolarum, & Poëmatum ex Auctoribus ſacris ac profanis, cum exemplis modum ſcribendi monſtrantibus: Of an Iſagoge Hiſtorica per millenarios diſtributa, & ad annum uſque nonageſimum primum ſupra mille quingentos deducta: of ſeveral orations, and other little pieces uſeful to youth (7). This is all that Melchior Adamus mentions concerning the Writings of Dreſſerus. He does not ſpeak of the Phyſical Books, which others aſcribe to him (8), nor of the Treatiſe De feſtis diebus Chriſtianorum, Judæorum, & Ethnicorum (9).

(b) Extracted from his Life among those of the German Philoſophers, compiled by Melchior Adamus. pag. 495, & ſeq.

again two years after (b). He was a man of great induſtry; he ſhewed this at Erfort, for he brought all his Collegues, who except one were Roman Catholics, to conſent that the Confeſſion of Augſbourg and Hebrew ſhould be taught in the Univerſity (c).

(c) Paul. Freher. in Theatr. pag. 1504.

He does not even ſay any thing, that can inſinuate that Dreſſerus ever meddled with Phyſic or any other profeſſion, but that of teaching the languages, hiſtory, and polite literature. Who can tell, but that there may have been a Phyſician named Matthew Dreſſerus, whoſe Works have been aſcribed to our Author? I forgot to obſerve, that he was attacked by Bodin upon the four univerſal Monarchies, and that he defended himſelf (10), and that one Gaſpar Hap publiſhed a Book, intitled, Erratica Hiſtoria Dreſſeri.

(10) Melch. Adam. in Vitis Philoſ. Germ. pag. 497.

DRIEDO (JOHN) in Low Dutch Dridoens, born at Turnhout in Brabant, ſtudied at Louvain, and took there the degree of Doctor of Divinity in Auguſt 1512. Hadrian Florent, who was afterwards Pope Hadrian VI, performed the ceremony of promoting him to that degree; and having obſerved that his ſcholar had applied himſelf too much to human learning, he put him in mind of the diſtinction, which ought to be made between the miſtreſs-ſcience, and thoſe which are her hand-maids. After this advice Driedo directed his chief application to the ſtudy of Divinity (a). He became Profeſſor of that Science in the Univerſity of Louvain (b). He was alſo Curate of St. James, and Canon of St. Peter in that City (c). He oppoſed Lutheraniſm with great vigour; but if we judge of him by a Letter of Eraſmus, he moderated his zeal a little better than the other Doctors of that country [A]. He publiſhed ſeveral books of Divinity [B]; but meddling with Chronological Difficulties, he blundered wretchedly [C]. He died at Louvain in 1535 [D], though thoſe who have publiſhed his Epitaph, have repreſented it as affirming that he died Auguſt the 4th 1555.

(a) Valer. Andreas, Biblioth. pag. 494.

(b) See his Epitaph in Swert. Athen. Belgic. pag. 420.

(c) See the ſame Epitaph.

[A] If we judge of him by a Letter of Eraſmus, he moderated his zeal a little better than the other Divines of that country.] Here is what he wrote to Godeſchalc Roſemond, Rector of the Academy of Louvain in 1519. Diſputationibus veſtris adverſus Lutherum ſemper conſtantiſſime favi: ſed multo magis ſcriptis, maxime Johannis Turenholtii, qui docte & ſine affectibus diſputavit, ut audio (1). i. e. "I always was an hearty "friend to your diſputations againſt Luther; but "much more to your writings, eſpecially thoſe of "John of Turnhout, who, as I hear, has diſputed "learnedly and without paſſion."

(1) Eraſm. Epiſt. 18. lib. 12. pag. 685.

[B] He publiſhed ſeveral Books of Divinity.] They relate to the diſputes between the Roman Catholics and Proteſtants: they treat de gratia & libero arbitrio: de concordia liberi arbitrii & prædeſtinationis: de captivitate & redemptione generis humani; de libertate chriſtiana; de Scripturis & Dogmatibus Eccleſiaſticis.

[C] But meddling with chronological difficulties, he blundered wretchedly.] He muſt neceſſarily do ſo, ſince he took Annius of Viterbo's Beroſus and Metaſthenes for genuine Works. His Treatiſe de Scripturis & Dogmatibus Eccleſiaſticis is divided into four Books, the third of which relates to the times: Ad illuſtrandas obſcuritates in Sacra Scriptura emergentes: ſed erravit in multis toto (ut dicitur) cœlo, eo quod ſtatuerit ſequendam ſupputationem Beroſi Chaldæi, Metaſthenis Perſæ, & Philonis Judæi, aliorumque quorum Chronographiam cum Hebraica Sacræ Scripturæ veritate concordare conatur: at bonus vir alioquin doctiſſimus nondum animadverterat auctores eſſe ſuppoſititios (2). i. e. "To explain the obſcure parts of the Scriptures; but he "blundered extravagantly, ſince he reſolved to follow "the Chronology of Beroſus the Chaldean, Metaſthenes the Perſian, and Philo Judæus, and others, "whoſe accounts he attempts to reconcile with Scripture. But the good men, tho' otherwiſe very learned, "did not then perceive, that thoſe Authors were ſpurious." In this manner ſpeaks Francis Swertius (3). See Poſſevin (4).

(2) Val. André, Bibl. Belg. pag. 494.

[D] He died at Louvain in 1535.] This we are informed of by Aubertus Miræus (5), and Valerius Andreas; but Swert does not write thus; on the contrary he cites the Epitaph of Driedo, where we find obiit atque hic ſepultus eſt a nativitate Domini CIↃ. IↃ. LV. IV. Men. Auguſti (6). i. e. "He died and was bu- "ried here Auguſt 4th 1555." Father Labbe therefore was in the wrong to refer thoſe perſons to Swert, who would correct the error of a certain Author, whom he does not name, who fixes Driedo's death in 1555. De eo plura Valerius Andreas, Swertius, Miræus &c. ex quibus corrigendus qui anno 1555 die 4. Auguſti ſub Paulo IV. Papa mortuum docuit (7). i. e. "Of him "we may read more fully in Valerius Andreas, Swer- "tius, Miræus &c. from whom we may correct that "Writer, who has aſſerted that he died Aug. 4th "1555 under Pope Paul IV." Francis Swert is ſo far from being a proper perſon to furniſh a correction of this miſtake, that he might readily lead one to imagine, that Aubertus Miræus, Valerius Andreas, and the reſt, are miſtaken; for who would not pay more regard to Epitaphs, with reſpect to the time of a perſon's death, than to the ſingle teſtimony of an Hiſtorian? Paul Freher (8) cites Driedo's Epitaph with the ſame error as Swert had done. This ſhould caution compilers to take particular care not to ſuffer Printers to falſify titles and public monuments.

(3) Swert. Ath. Belg. pag. 420.

(4) Poſſev. lib. 2. Bibliotb. Selectæ, cap. 14. & in Apparatu Sacro.

(5) De Scriptor. Sæc. 16. pag. 420.

(6) Swert. Ath. Belg. pag. 420.

(7) Philippus Labbe, de Script. Eccleſiaſt. tom. 1. pag. 558.

(8) In Theatro, pag. 166.

DRUMMOND (a) a very noble and antient family in Scotland, of which the Earl of Perth is now the head. The firſt who bore the name of Drummond in that family was a Hungarian Gentleman named Maurice, who left England with Edward Atheling, the lawful heir of the country, to avoid the cruelty of William the Conqueror, who poſſeſſed himſelf of England in 1066. Maurice commanded the ſhip on board of which Edward Atheling, with Agatha his mother and Margaret and Chriſtina his ſiſter, embarked. A violent ſtorm forced them to put into Scotland; and they landed in a Port on the river Forth, which, to this day, is called by the name of one of Edward's ſiſters (b). It is ſhe, who, being very famous for her piety, was canonized after her death: in a word it is St. Margaret. She married Malcolm III King of Scotland, who beſtowed large poſſeſſions on our Maurice Drummond; raiſed him to very exalted dignities; gave him many lands in the province of Dunbarton, and made him Seneſchal of Lenox. The Queen alſo favoured him with ſome marks of her eſteem, ſhe beſtowing one of her maids of honour on him in marriage. From theſe nuptials ſprung a ſon called Malcolm, who was father of Maurice, father of John, father of Malcolm. Hiſtory does not inform us of their actions and alliances, but we find their genealogical deſcent in Records which were preſerved with great care for ſome ages in the Abbey of Inchafry, and at laſt depoſited

(a) Both the Text and Notes of this Article, (which were ſent to the Bookſeller the 16th of ... 1695) have been printed verbatim according to the Manuſcript.

(b) Called St. Margaret's Road.

(c) In 1695.

ſited in the Archives of the family. Some of them were loſt at the Revolution in 1688; but there are ſtill enough extant to prove what is advanced in this Article, not to mention thoſe which are furniſhed by the Scotch Hiſtorians. The reader will find in the Notes, the ſucceſſors of MALCOLM DRUMMOND II [A], to JAMES DRUMMOND III, Earl of

[A] The reader will find in the Notes, the ſucceſſors of Malcolm Drummond II.] His ſon Malcolm III, ſirnamed Begg, i. e. the little, married Adda daughter of Malduin Earl of Lenox, who had only a brother that left no children; who married the ſiſter of the John Monteith, who ſold to the Engliſh the famous William Wallace or Wallis Viceroy of Scotland. This John Monteith, foreſeeing that the Earl of Lenox and his brother-in-law would leave the Earldom to Malcolm his ſiſter's huſband, adviſed the King to demand her. He flattered himſelf with the hopes that the King would then beſtow her upon him, but was miſtaken; the King giving her to Robert Stuart, whoſe deſcendants were Earls of Lenox. Malcolm Begg had, by Adda his wife, four ſons, JOHN, MAURICE, THOMAS and WALTER. The laſt was Secretary to the King. Maurice married the daughter of the Seneſchal of Strathern, and ſucceeded to his dignity and ample poſſeſſions. Thomas was created Baron of Balfrew. Their elder brother John Drummond ſeventh Chief Juſtice of Lenox, declared war againſt John Monteith. A hatred had long ſubſiſted between their families. Monteith was overthrown, and loſt three ſons in this war. The King obliged the contending parties to conclude a peace. The great men of the Kingdom met together for this pacification, the Guarantees of which were the Earls of Douglas, of Angus, and of Arran, and Lord Robert nephew to King Robert Bruce. Their ſignatures and ſeals are ſtill viſible in the Treaty; and we find that Lord Robert, the King's nephew, owns himſelf one of the neareſt relations of the two families which had been lately reconciled. Drummond having loſt, by one of the articles of the Treaty, the lands poſſeſſed by him in the Earldom of Lenox, and that by the death of the three ſons of John Monteith, retired with his family into the Province of Perth, where he had the eſtates of Stobhall and Cargill. He was married to the eldeſt daughter of William de Montifex, Lord High Treaſurer of Scotland. His eldeſt ſon, Malcolm IV, married Iſabella Douglas hereditary Counteſs of Marr, and was joined in very ſtrict friendſhip with Earl Douglas his brother-in-law. He joined with him in making war upon the Engliſh, and ſignalized himſelf in the bloody battle of Otterburn (1), where he took priſoner Ralph Piercy, a General of great reputation among the Engliſh. For his atchieving this action, a penſion was allowed him for life. His brother William married the daughter of the Baron of Airth, who brought him the Barony of Carnock as her dowry. From this marriage ſprung the branch of Athornden. Some mention muſt be made of the four daughters of John Drummond. The eldeſt was named ANABELLA, and married Robert III King of Scotland. This Queen is greatly applauded by the Scotch Hiſtorians, on account of her virtue and ſingular prudence. She was mother to James I of Scotland. One of his ſiſters was married to Archibald Earl of Argyle; another to Alexander Macdonald Lord of the Iſles, eldeſt ſon of the Earl of Roſs, and another to Stuart of Dually.

(1) In the language of the country Chevy Chace.

Malcolm IV, dying without iſſue, JOHN DRUMMOND his brother became the head of the family. He married Elizabeth Sinclare, daughter of the Earl of Orkney, Caithneſs, Roſſin, &c. as renowned among the Danes as among the Scotch. She brought him three ſons and a daughter. The laſt was married to the Lord Thomas Baron of Kinnaird. We ſhall ſpeak of Walter the eldeſt of the three ſons. Robert his ſecond ſon married the heireſs of Barnbougall. John the youngeſt went to the Iſland of Madera, where his poſterity makes a great figure at this day.

WALTER DRUMMOND, married to Margaret, daughter of Lord Patrick Ruthven, Head of a very noble Houſe, was father to the following Malcolm, to JOHN Biſhop of Dunblain, to WALTER created Baron of Leidcrief, from whom iſſued the branch of Blair-Drummond, which produced two other branches, that of Newton and that of Gardrum.

MALCOLM V married Mary Murray daughter of the Lord of Tullibardin (2), by whom he had John Lord Drummond, created Peer of the Realm. WALTER, Lord of Deanſton; JAMES, Lord of Corrivechter; Thomas, Lord of Druminarinoch, from whom ſprung the branches of Invermay, of Cultmalinder, of Comrie, and of Pitcairns.

(2) The Earls of Tullibardin, now Marquiſſes of Athol, are his deſcendants.

JOHN DRUMMOND, eldeſt ſon of Malcolm V, married Elizabeth Lindſey, daughter of the famous Earl of Crawford (3), and became powerful and illuſtrious. He was a man of very great abilities. He was great Juſticiary of Scotland, which, in that Age, was the higheſt poſt in the Realm. He purchaſed of his kinſman the Baron of Concraig, all the eſtates ſituated in the Province of Strathern, and, with the King's permiſſion, the poſt of hereditary Seneſchal of that Province. He did ſignal ſervice to James IV King of Scotland; he routing the Duke of Lenox, and the Lord Liſle with their aſſociates, who were going to join the Earl Mariſhal and the Lord Gordon, in order to put in execution the conſpiracy he had formed, viz. to ſeize the young Monarch, and govern the Kingdom, upon pretence of revenging the death of James III. He was ſent Plenipotentiary into England, to conclude a Treaty of Peace with Richard III. After the King's death, he was removed from his employments and all his eſtate confiſcated, for having given a box on the ear to a Herald at Arms, who went to ſummon him in the caſtle of Drummond, to appear before the Parliament, there to give an account of the Queen's marriage with the Earl of Lenox (4); but at the ſolicitation of the Queen and upon the interceſſion of the great men of the Kingdom, he, in conſideration of his exalted extraction and eminent ſervices, was reſtored to his eſtates and employments two days after. He had four daughters, one of whom named Margaret appeared ſo charming in the eye of James IV King of Scotland, that he reſolved to marry her; but as a Diſpenſation from the Pope was neceſſary, becauſe of their nearneſs in blood, the impatient Prince cauſed the nuptials to be ſolemnized privately. From this clandeſtine marriage iſſued a daughter, who was afterwards married to the Earl of Huntley. Upon the arrival of the Diſpenſation, the King intended to be married publickly; but the jealouſy which ſome Nobles entertained againſt the Houſe of Drummond, fired them with the horrid reſolution to poiſon Margaret, in order that her Houſe might not have the glory to give two Queens to Scotland. ELIZABETH, his ſiſter, was Counteſs of Angus; EUPHEMIA, his other ſiſter, was wife to the Lord Fleming; ANNABELLA, his other ſiſter, was Counteſs of Montroſs.

(3) He is commonly called Earl Beardie.

(4) This Earl was alſo ſummoned at the ſame time. He was then in Drummond Caſtle.

WILLIAM DRUMMOND, ſon to John, and huſband to Iſabella Campbell daughter of the Earl of Argyle, had two ſons, Walter and Andrew. He and his family engaged in open war with that of Murray; and ſome of his friends were ſo cruel as to burn in a church (5) ſome Gentlemen of the Houſe of Murray. He was altogether innocent of this crime; but not being beloved by the King, he was condemned to loſe his head, which ſentence was accordingly executed. His ſon ANDREW was created Baron of Bellichlon, and founded a branch, of which the laſt male, MAURICE DRUMMOND, left four daughters, who married very honourably in England. One of them was wife to Caryl, Secretary of State to King James I. WALTER DRUMMOND, eldeſt ſon of William, had by Elizabeth Graham, daughter to the Earl of Montroſs, only one ſon, viz.

(5) That of Minniward.

DAVID DRUMMOND, who married Margaret Stuart, daughter to the Duke of Albany, Viceroy of Scotland, and by her he had but one daughter, who was wife to the Lord of Poury Ogilby. After Margaret's death he married Lilia Ruthven who brought him five daughters, I, JANE, wife of John Earl of Montroſs, Chancellor and Viceroy of Scotland: II, ANN, married to John Earl of Marr, Lord High Treaſurer of Scotland: III, LILIA, Counteſs of Crawford: IV, CATHERINE, Lady of Tullibardin: V, MARGARET, of Perth [B], Chancellor of Scotland, the preſent head of the family, who now reſides in Rome, whither he fled for his Religion. The reader will meet with a great number of very illuſtrious alliances, which alone would ſufficiently prove that this family has always lived in very great ſplendor.

GARET, Counteſs of Keir. The two ſons of David Drummond are Patrick mentioned below, and JAMES Lord of Maderly, from whom deſcended the Viſcounts of Strathallan, and the Barons of Marchani. The firſt who was created Viſcount of Strathallan, was named WILLIAM DRUMMOND. He was Lieutenant General in the Armies of King James; and conſpicuous both in the cabinet and the field.

PATRICK DRUMMOND, married to Margaret Lindſey, daughter to the Earl of Crawford, ſprung from the branch of Edzel, had five daughters. I, CATHERINE, Counteſs of Rothes: II, LILIA, Counteſs of Dumferlin, mother of the Counteſſes of Lauderdale, of Kelly, of Balcarres and of Cathneſs: III, JANE, Counteſs of Roxburgh, Governeſs of the children of Charles I: IV, ANNE, Lady of Torray Barclay: V, ELIZABETH, married to the Lord Elphinſtoun. Patrick Drummond had, beſides theſe five daughters, two ſons, JAMES and JOHN.

JAMES DRUMMOND, created Earl of Perth, married Iſabella Seatoun, daughter of the Earl of Winton, and left but one daughter who was Counteſs of Sunderland. He died young, and JOHN his brother, Earl of Perth, ſucceeded him. He was married to Jane Kerr, daughter of the Earl of Roxburgh, by whom he had four ſons and two daughters, one of whom was Counteſs of Wigtown, and the other Counteſs of Tullibardin. The four ſons are, JAMES, mentioned below; ROBERT, who died in France; JOHN, who founded the branch of Logy Almond; and WILLIAM Earl of Roxburgh, from whom ſprung the branch of Roxburgh and that of Bellandine.

JAMES DRUMMOND II, Earl of Perth, married Ann Gordon, daughter to the Marquis of Huntley, by whom he had two ſons and one daughter, viz. JAMES, who will be mentioned in the following remark; JOHN and ANNE. The latter is a Lady of great merit, and married the Earl of Erroll hereditary Conſtable of Scotland. JOHN DRUMMOND, Earl of Melfort, Secretary to James II King of Great Britain, was twice married; firſt to the heireſs of Lundin, by whom he had three ſons and three daughters. Theſe are, ANNE married to the Baron of Houſtoun, ELIZABETH, wife of Viſcount Strathallan, and MARY who is unmarried. The three ſons are, JAMES, Baron of Lundin, ROBERT and CHARLES. He married a ſecond wife, viz. Euphemia Wallis or Wallace, daughter of Thomas Wallis, Baron of Cragie, the head of a very ancient family. He had, by the ſecond venter, ſix ſons and three daughters, viz. JOHN, Lord of Torth, THOMAS, WILLIAM, ANDREW, RINALDO and PHILIP; CATHERINE, THERESA and MARY.

[B] JAMES DRUMMOND III, Earl of Perth.] He was made a Privy Councellor in 1678, Chief Juſticiary of Scotland in 1684, and High Chancellor of Scotland in 1684. He was ſo ſtruck by the peruſal of ſome papers, which were found in the ſtrong box of Charles II, relating to the controverſy between Proteſtants and Papiſts, that having examined the affair of religion very curiouſly and with great attention, he imagined that the Church of Rome was the only true one, and accordingly profeſſed it publickly. His attachment to that Church, and to the ſervice of King James, whom he reſolved to follow to France, expoſed him to very ill treatment, both from the Populace and the Council of Scotland. He was kept very cloſe priſoner in the caſtle of Sterling two years and ſeven months; after which he was allowed to take the air becauſe of his indiſpoſition; he then was again confined; was not releaſed till nine months after, and at laſt was permitted to leave the Kingdom. He withdrew to Rome, where his virtue and zeal for the Romiſh Religion gained him the utmoſt eſteem (6). His greateſt enemies have not been able to lay any thing to his charge but his turning Roman Catholick. He had three wives, I, Jane Douglas, daughter of William Marquis of Douglas; II, Lilia, Counteſs of Tullibardin; III, Mary Gordon, daughter to Lewis Marquis of Huntley, and ſiſter to the Duke of Gordon. From the firſt marriage ſprung MARY wife of William, Earl of Mareſchal, hereditary Marſhal of Scotland: ANNE, who is unmarried; and JAMES Lord DRUMMOND, who, at fifteen years of age, left the Academy in Paris, and went over to Ireland with King James in 1689. He was at the ſiege of Londonderry, at the battles of Newtown Butler, and of the Boyne. Returning to France with King James, he went thro' his exerciſes in the Academies of Paris, after which he travelled into France, Italy, Flanders and Holland. He is now in Scotland. The other two wives of the Earl of Perth brought him each two ſons.

(6) i. e. in 1695.

DRUSBICKI (a) (GASPAR), a Poliſh Jeſuit, entred into the Society Auguſt the 24th 1609, at twenty years of age. He there was raiſed ſucceſſively to the moſt conſiderable employments; he being not only Maſter of the Novices ſeven years, but likewiſe Rector or Principal of the College ſeveral times, and twice Provincial of the Province of Poland. This Province ſent him twice to Rome in quality of its Sollicitor, and he aſſiſted in two general Congregations (b). He uſed to be for ever at prayer, and it is thought that God revealed a great many things to him. His devotion for the bleſſed Virgin was carried to the utmoſt extremities. The ſeverity he exerciſed on himſelf is aſtoniſhing [A]. He died piouſly at Poſnania, the 2d of April 1660; and it is ſaid that his body continued unputrified for many years. He wrote many books, but publiſhed only a few [B]. His Life written by Daniel Pawlowſki (c) contains a great number of remarkable particulars (d) [C].

(a) The true Orthography, in the Poliſh Language, is Druzbicki. I followed that of the Librarian of the Jeſuits above-cited.

(b) At the 8th and 10th.

(c) Printed in Cracow, in the beginning of 1670

(d) Extracted from Nat. Southwell, Biblioth. Societat. Jeſu. pag. 276.

[A] The ſeverity he exerciſed on himſelf is aſtoniſhing.] Witneſs the dreadful gaſhes which were found on his body during his laſt ſickneſs; the effects of the dreadful diſcipline he exerciſed on himſelf. Deſpicientiſſimus ſui, corpus ſuum inclementer admodum tractabat, id quod potuit in extremo morbo quando infirmariis exuentibus eum & induentibus, carnes miſerandum in modum flagris conciſæ apparuerunt (1).

(1) Nathan. Sotuel, Biblioth. Script. Soc. Jeſu, pag. 276.

[B] He wrote many Books, but publiſhed only a few.] During the Interregnum, a Profeſſor of Cracow publiſhed a piece againſt the Jeſuits, which was diſperſed among the Nobility. Gaſpar Druſbicki anſwered this Libel. His Anſwer, publiſhed in Poliſh, is intitled, Declaratio memorialis exorbitantium, & proceſſus Academiæ Cracovienſis inter Ordines diſtributi. By the title alone it appears, that this was not a controverſy carried on againſt the Jeſuits by a Profeſſor of the Academy of Cracow; but that the Univerſity in a body had ſome diſpute with them (2). The other writings of Druſbicki, that have been publiſhed, are in Latin, and are books of devotion, De Paſſione Jeſu Chriſti Filii Dei. Faſciculus Exercitionum & Conſiderationum de præcipuis virtutibus Chriſtianæ fidei. Sol in virtute ſua, ſive Jeſus Chriſtus in ſplendore ſuarum excellentiarum ſpectabilis (3).

(2) There are few Univerſities with which the Jeſuits have not had diſputes; and, in general, they might ſay, with regard to their Controverſies, Quæ regio in terris noſtris non plena laboris? i. e. "What re-" gion has not " ſeen our migh-" ty labours? Virg. Æneid. lib. 1. ver. 464.

(3) Nathan. Sotuel, Biblioth. Script. Societ. Jeſu, pag. 276.

[C] His Life . . . . . contains a great number of remarkable particulars.] I conjecture that theſe do not relate to the management of the affairs of the Society with which he was intruſted; but rather chimæras, viſions, and extaſies, and ſuch other incidents of enthuſiaſtic devotion. Thoſe who have his Book by them, will be ſo good as to inform me whether I am miſtaken, for which I ſhall think my ſelf obliged.

DRUSILLA wife of Agrippa I King of the Jews, was but ſix years of age when her father died. She had before been betrothed to Epiphanes, ſon of Antiochus King of Comagena (a); but this marriage was diſſolved before it was conſummated, becauſe Epiphanes would not fulfill the promiſe he had made of embracing the Jewiſh Religion. Azizus King of the Emiſeni was not ſo ſcrupulous, he conſenting to be circumciſed, upon condition that he ſhould marry Druſilla. She accordingly was given to him in marriage, and he turned Jew (b). She was a woman of exquiſite beauty, and was no ſooner ſeen by Felix, but he fell in love with her. He made propoſals of marriage, and his offers were ſo advantageous, that ſhe accepted of them. Accordingly ſhe left Azizus her huſband, and her Religion, at the ſame time [A]; and married Felix who then commanded in Judea. The jealouſy that reigned between her and Berenice her ſiſter [B], was one of the great motives which prompted her to this ſecond marriage (c). Felix

(a) Joſeph. Antiquit. lib. 19. cap. 7.

(b) Idem, ibid. lib. 20. cap. 5.

(c) Ibid.

[A] She left Azizus her huſband, and her Religion at the ſame time.] I promiſed a remark on this occaſion elſewhere (1). A learned man has obſerved to me, that the words of the Jewiſh Hiſtorian ſignify only, that this marriage of Druſilla was contrary to the Laws; now this does not imply a change of Religion. I own it; but methinks Joſephus declares what I advanced. Here follow his words, Ἡ δ' (Δρούσιλλα) καλῶς πράττουσα, καὶ φυγεῖν τὸν ἐκ τῆς ἀδελφῆς Βερενίκης βλασφημίαν φθόνον, ἀφῆκε μὲν τὸ κάλλος πρὸ ἐκείνης ἐν ὀλίγοις ἐβλάπτετο, παραβῆναι τὰ τῶν πατρίων νόμιμα πείθεται, καὶ τῷ Φήλικι γήμασα. That is, according to Gelenius's verſion: Illa (Druſilla) male conſulta volens evadere moleſtationes ſororis Bernices, invidentis ſibi formæ præcellentiam, conſenſit calcata religione patria Felici nubere: and according to Genebrard's tranſlation, She, being ill adviſed, and deſirous of ſecuring herſelf from the envy of Berenice her ſiſter, who was vexed at her being ſo exquiſitely beautiful, conſented to FORSAKE HER RELIGION, and to marry Felix. Arnaud d'Andilli has given the ſame interpretation, (with reſpect to her abjuration of the Jewiſh Religion) of the Greek text of the Hiſtorian. A circumſtance which perſuades me, that Genebrard has tranſlated this paſſage juſtly is, that it is not probable that Felix, in the employment he enjoyed, would have dared to marry a woman who looked upon the Religion of the Romans as an abomination; that he would have dared, I ſay, to have married ſuch a woman, without repreſenting to her, that ſhe muſt entertain a different idea of the worſhip of the Gods of Rome. It is not probable that Druſilla rejected this condition, ſince ſhe was to marry a man who commanded over Judæa; who had a great ſhare in the Emperor's favour, and had a brother who was that Monarch's favourite. I know very well that the Romans were great friends to toleration in Religion; but there is a wide difference between tolerating a Religion which does not condemn yours; and tolerating a ſect which pronounces an anathema againſt, and damns you. This the Jews did with regard to all other Religions. Farther, there is a great difference between permitting a woman to profeſs, undiſturbed, the Jewiſh Religion; and marrying her notwithſtanding ſhe profeſſes it. We may alſo make an obſervation on the conſtruction of Joſephus's words; for had he meant, only, that Druſilla married a Heathen, and that the Laws of the Jewiſh Religion would not ſuffer her to marry him; he then needed not to have divided his words in the manner he has done. They evidently contain two propoſitions; the one, that ſhe forſook her Religion; and the other, that ſhe married Felix. This is a ſign that there is ſomething in the firſt which is not included in the ſecond. However, I would not inſiſt too much on this proof: for there are but too many examples to ſhow, that Writers ſeldom obſerve with ſtrictneſs, the maxims of Logic in the conſtruction of their words; and it was antiently a figure of Grammar (4) to ſeparate a ſingle object into two expreſſions. Pateris libamus & auro (5) for Pateris aureis. i. e. "We quaff out of cups "and gold, inſtead of golden cups." I would not have my Readers imagine, that I here draw Feſtus as a devout heathen and a conſcientious man; I do but aſcribe to him ſome political ſcruples; and only ſuppoſe that he was not ignorant, that the advances he made in riches and dignity raiſed the jealouſy of ſeveral formidable Courtiers, whom it would not be his intereſt to furniſh with an opportunity of defaming and undermining him at Court, with ſo ſpecious an opportunity, I ſay, as this would have been, had he married a woman who profeſſed an open abhorrence for the houſhold Gods and the Religion in general of the Romans.

(1) In the Remark [E] of the Article BERENICE, granddaughter &c.

(2) Mr. de la Roque a French Refugee Miniſter, living in London.

(3) Joſeph. Antiq. lib. 20. cap. 5. pag. 693.

(4) It was called ἐν διὰ δυοῖν.

(5) Virgil. Georgic. lib. 2. ver. 192.

[B] The Jealouſy which reigned between her, and Berenice her ſiſter.] I have ſpoken elſewhere of this Berenice. She was a beautiful, ambitious, gay, intriguing woman. I am not ſurprized that ſhe did not love her ſiſter, ſhe being exquiſitely handſome, and ten years younger than Berenice. The latter would gladly, on this occaſion, have reſigned to her the right of ſeniority. In the article of beauty, ten years make this right very diſtaſteful. An elder ſiſter would with pleaſure give it up, and exchange it for the title of younger ſiſter; but nature cannot be changed. Berenice's jealouſy was not a hidden ſenſation: Druſilla felt the effects of it; ſo that ſhe was very glad to be enabled by her marrying the Governor of Judæa, a man who was in great favour with the Emperor Claudius (6), to diſpute for priority with Berenice. The Antients had a Proverb declaring, that the hatred of brothers is bitter to the laſt degree, Fratrum inter ſe iræ ſunt acerbiſſimæ (7): now it is my opinion that the hatred between ſiſters is ſtill more violent: and if it may be affirmed, that all thoſe times belong to the iron age, in which a friendſhip between brothers was an unuſual thing, Fratrum quoque gratia rara eſt (8); I believe the ſame may be ſaid with much greater juſtice, with regard to that of ſiſters. Three circumſtances commonly (9) prevent their entertaining a jealouſy one againſt the other, viz. the Grace of God, and want of qualities that excite envy, and an extreme ſtupidity; for if their age gives them an opportunity of exhibiting themſelves advantageouſly at the ſame time, with great beauty, wit and fortune, it is almoſt impoſſible for them to love one another; and it would be the worſt way for a perſon, in order to make his court to the one, to applaud the other. Many have the art and ſtrength of mind not to diſcover the uneaſineſs which that occaſions in them; but then they are not the leſs tortured with it. I ſhall end this remark with the concluſion of a letter written by Mr. de la Fontaine to the Dutcheſs de Bouillon (10), "Thoſe "innocent creatures, Madam, are your Highneſs and "Madam Mazarine. This would be the proper place "for making alſo her Elogium, in order to join it "to yours; but as theſe kind of parallels are ſome-"what delicate, I fancy it will be more proper for "me to wave them.

Vous vous aimez en ſœurs, cependant (11) j'ai raiſon
D'éviter la comparaiſon:
L'on ſe peut partager, mais non pas la louange;
Le plus grand Orateur, quand ce ſeroit un Ange,
Ne contenteroit pas en ſemblables deſſeins Deux Belles, deux Heroes, deux Auteurs, ni deux Saints." That is,

"You love as ſiſters ought to do, and yet
"I've reaſon not to attempt the parallel:
"Gold may be ſoon divided, but not praiſe.
"The greateſt Orator, tho' an Arch-Angel,
"Wou'd not, on this occaſion, ſatisfy
"Two Saints, two Wits, two Beauties or two He-"roes.

(6) He was that Emperor's freedman. Sueton. in Claud. cap. 28. and brother of Pallas. Joſeph. Antiq. lib. 20. cap. 5. Tacit. Annal. lib. 12. cap. 54. Pallas had a great ſhare in the Emperor Claudius's favour. Sueton. ibid. Tacit. ibid.

(7) Eraſmus, in commenting this Proverb, cites Ariſtotle, Politic. 7. who ſays, Ὅθεν εἴρηται, χάλεποι γὰρ πόλεμοι ἀδελφῶν, "Whence the "proverb, the "wars of brothers "are cruel."

(8) Ovid. Met. lib. 1. ver. 145.

(9) I would have the reader lay due ſtreſs on theſe words: for every perſon may know very good and noble exceptions to this rule.

(10) Printed in tome 2. of Retour des Pieces choiſies, printed in 1688; and in the Poſthumous Works of la Fontaine, pag. 85, & ſeq. edit. Amſterdam in 1696.

(11) It were better to ſay on many other occaſions, therefore, that nevertheleſs.

Cunæus argues very well on the motive of the prohibition with regard to the marrying of two ſiſters at one and the ſame time. In Levitici cap. XVIII, ſays he (12), edictum Numinis extat, quo Judæi duas ſorores eodem tempore habere uxores vetantur, non ob aliam cauſam profectò, quàm quòd ardentiſſima eſſe inter has æmulatio

(12) Cunæus, de Repub. Hebr. lib. 2. cap. 23. pag. m. 256. See Polygamia triumphatrix, pag. 373.

(d) Acts of the Apostles, chap. xxiv. ver. 25.

Felix and Druſilla are mentioned in Scripture (d). They had a ſon called Agrippa, who, with his wife, periſhed in the flames of Mount Veſuvius (e). Tacitus is very probably miſtaken, in what is advanced by him relating to the marriage of Felix [C]. Moreri has committed ſome miſtakes which he might eaſily have avoided [D], had he wrote with attention, and accuſtomed himſelf to accuracy.

(e) Joſeph. Antiquit. lib. 20. cap. 5.

æmulatio in tali conjunctione ſolet ; cum cæteræ omninò, quæ eâ conſanguinitate non ſunt, æquiore animo ſub eodem marito ætatem unà agant. i. e. "In chap. "XVII of Leviticus (ſays he) is a decree by which "the Jews are forbid to have two ſiſters, (as wives) "at one and the ſame time ; and for this reaſon "only, becauſe there frequently happens to be the "ſharpeſt ſtrife between them, when thus married ; "whilſt others who are not ſo nearly related, live in "greater friendſhip under the ſame huſband."

[C] Tacitus is very probably miſtaken, in what is advanced by him relating to the marriage of Felix.] Here follow his words (13). Claudius defunctis regibus aut ad modicum redactis Judæam provinciam equitibus Romanis aut libertis permiſit. Et quibus Antonius Felix per omnem ſævitiam ac libidinem jus regium ſervili ingenio exercuit, Druſilla Cleopatræ & Antonii nepte in matrimonium accepta, ut ejuſdem Antonii Felix progener, Claudius nepos eſſet. i. e. "Claudius, when the Kings "of Judæa were all dead, or their power very much "leſſened, gave the government of Judæa as a Pro"vince of the Empire, either to the Roman Knights "or his freedmen. Among the latter was Antonius "Felix, who, behaving with the utmoſt licentiouſneſs "and cruelty, exerciſed the regal authority with the "mean ſpirit of a ſlave. He had married Druſilla, "grand-daughter to Cleopatra and Anthony ; ſo that "whilſt the Emperor was Anthony's grandſon, Fe"lix was huſband to Anthony's grand-daughter." Theſe words ſignify evidently, that Felix was the huſband of Druſilla, grand-daughter of Mark Anthony and Cleopatra, at that time that he commanded our Judæa. Now this has not ſo much as the ſhadow of probability ; for Joſephus, who ought to be credited ſooner than Tacitus on this occaſion, informs us, that Felix made his addreſſes to Druſilla, a little after his arrival in Judæa. But would Felix have preſumed to do this, had he been actually married to a Lady who was Couſin German to the Emperor ? Could he have married Druſilla, ſiſter to Agrippa II, during the life of the other Druſilla grand-daughter to Mark Anthony ? Could he, I ſay, have married her without firſt divorcing the other Druſilla ? And had he divorced her, would Joſephus have concealed an incident like this, ſo proper to caſt an odium on this Governor ? for in this caſe, Felix would have diſſolved two marriages to ſatisfy his paſſions. He would have divorced one Druſilla, and have made another Druſilla forſake her huſband. A national Hiſtorian ſeldom paſſes over ſuch circumſtances of theſe. Tacitus may the more juſtly be ſuſpected of negligence, as it is certain that he is miſtaken with regard to the time in which Felix governed Judea. He ſuppoſes (14), that Felix and Cumanus commanded in that country, at one and the ſame time ; Felix over Samaria, and Cumanus over Galilea. Now nothing can be more falſe than this ; for, according to Joſephus, who certainly had better informations than Tacitus ; Felix was not ſent into Judea, till after Cumanus had been ſent into baniſhment, becauſe of his male-adminiſtration (15). I perhaps may be aſked, how came Tacitus to commit this error ? I believe two cauſes may be aſſigned for it. Hearing that Felix had been married to Druſilla, he might have imagined that this Druſilla was daughter to Juba and Cleopatra Selene, daughter of Mark Anthony and Cleopatra ; and did not give himſelf the trouble to examine, whether there was a Lady in Judea of that name. But on the other ſide, Felix, before he went into Judea, might have married Druſilla grand-daughter of Mark Anthony ; and this Druſilla might have died before he fell in love with the other Druſilla a Jeweſs. This laſt opinion will appear the moſt probable to thoſe who have read in Suetonius, that Felix had married three Queens (16), by which may be underſtood three Princeſſes of the Blood. But beſides, no Hiſtorian mentions a Druſilla, grand-daughter of Mark Anthony and Cleopatra. Thoſe who pretend that Druſilla the Jeweſs, ſprung from the marriage of Agrippa with a daughter of Mark Anthony and Cleopatra, will find themſelves confuted by Noldius (17).

(13) Tacit. Hiſt. lib. 5. cap. 9.

(14) Tacit. Annal. lib. 12. cap. 54.

(15) Joſeph. Antiq. lib. 20. cap. 5.

(16) Nec minus Felicem quem conortibus & aliis provinciæque Judæa præpoſuit trium reginarum maritum. Sueton. in Claud. cap. 18. See Grævius's beautiful remark on this.

(17) Noldius, de Vita & Geſtis Herodum, pag. 469.

(18) Joſeph. Antiquit. lib. 20. cap. 5.

[D] Moreri has committed ſome miſtakes.] I. He ſhould not have ſaid, that Epiphanes promiſed Druſilla to become a Jew. Such promiſes are not made to a child of five or ſix years of age : But it was to Druſilla's father that he thus made this promiſe, as Joſephus obſerves (18). II. He ſhould not have confounded Agrippa the father with Agrippa the ſon : but ought to have ſaid, that the former betrothed Druſilla to Epiphanes, and the latter married her to Azizus. III. It is not ſaid in the Acts of the Apoſtles, that Druſilla was preſent when Paul reaſoned in the preſence of Felix, concerning juſtice and the day of judgment.

DRUSILLA (JULIA), daughter of Germanicus and Agrippina, married Lucius Caſſius, in the year of Rome 786 (a).. Druſilla degenerated very much from the virtue of her parents, ſhe leading a very ſcandalous life [A]. Druſilla, when very young, dallied with Caligula her brother, who was ſurprized in the act before he was of age to wear the Toga virilis (b) [B] : ſhe continued this inceſtuous commerce all her life ; and her paſſion for Caligula was inexpreſſibly flagrant and known to the whole world. He took her from Lucius Caſſius her huſband ; lived publickly with her as though ſhe had been his lawful

(a) Tacit. Ann. lib. 6. cap. 15.

(b) See the Remark [D] of the Article CALIGULA.

AN obſervation on the joke. Et ſequitur leviter filia matris iter.

[A] Druſilla degenerated very much from the virtue of her parents, ſhe leading a very ſcandalous life.] Should any lover of ſcandal come and tell me, that the Latin joke, Et ſequitur leviter filia matris iter. i. e. "As is the mother, ſuch the daughter is," is not true, except where the mother is greatly depraved ; that it is only in this caſe that a daughter treads exactly in her mother's ſteps, I would confute him at once without going out of this family. Druſilla, indeed, had not imitated the good example which Agrippina her mother, who was the moſt virtuous Lady of her time, had ſet her ; but then, on the other ſide, Agrippina had not followed the bad example of Julia her mother, who was the moſt lewd woman of her age.

[B] Druſilla when very young, dallied with Caligula her brother, who was ſurprized in the act before he was of age to wear the Toga Virilis.] One might have applied, on this occaſion, ſomething like the French Proverb, The habit does not make the Friar. Caligula wore the robe of childhood, and yet was not a child : tho' he did not wear the virile gown, he gave ſtrong proofs of his virility. Let us not fancy to our ſelves that he furniſhes us with one of thoſe extraordinary examples mentioned by Authors, I mean of boys who have procreated at ten or twelve years of age. We muſt draw things as they are, and do juſtice to every one. The depraved nature of Caligula might have haſtened his criminal reſolutions, but not the vigour requiſite for him to plunge into inceſt. Though he had the robe of childhood on when he was catched in the act, he yet might have been of a fit age, according to the uſual courſe of nature. He did not put on the Toga virilis till he was twenty. Vigeſimo ætatis anno accitus Capreas à Tiberio, uno atque eodem die togam ſumpſit, barbamque poſuit (1). i. e. "Being ſent for by Tiberius, to Capreæ, "in his twentieth year, on one and the ſame day, "put on the virile gown, and was ſhaved for the "firſt time," and he was eighteen when he went to live with his grandmother. Now it was at her houſe that he was catched ſporting with his ſiſter.

(1) Sueton. in Calig. cap. 10.

lawful wife; and, when ſhe died, in the year of Rome 791, he gave into the moſt impious extravagancies to honour her memory [C]. Dion relates that ſhe was married to Marcus Æmilius Lepidus (d). Moreri has committed two errors, in advancing that Germanicus was brother to Tiberius (e), and that Druſilla was grand-daughter of Auguſtus (f).

(d) Dio, lib. 59. ad ann. 791.

(e) He was ſon of Druſus, brother to Tiberius.

(f) She was his great grand-daughter.

He was brought up firſt at his mother's, ſecondly at Livia's, thirdly at Antonia's. Primum in matris, deinde ea relegata in Liviæ Auguſtæ proaviæ ſuæ contubernio manſit. Quam defunctam prætextatus etiam tum pro roſtris laudavit, tranſiitque ad Antoniam aviam. Idem, ibid. (2). i. e. "He lived firſt with his mother, and "after her being repudiated, with Livia his grand-"mother, who dying, he ſpoke her funeral Oration "before he put on the virile gown; and after this "went and lived with Antonia his grandmother." He did not go to live with the laſt mentioned till the death of Livia, that is, in 782; and he was born in 764 (3). Nevertheleſs, far be it from me to retract what I declared above (4), that Caligula's depravity ſhewed itſelf early. Though he ſhould have been twenty years of age when he committed inceſt, I yet might juſtly ſay of him, that in diſpoſitions naturally wicked, Vice does not wait for the number of years. It is impoſſible to pronounce his name without calling up ideas of the moſt exceſſive wickedneſs that man can poſſibly commit. His life is one continued ſeries of ſuch dreadful enormities, that ſome people are of opinion that Hiſtorians drew him more wicked than he really was. It muſt be confeſſed that ſuch monſters are rarely found, and much more rarely than the greateſt Saints and the moſt accompliſhed heroes; however, Caligula is not the only man in whom nature has ſhewn to how great a height ſhe could carry her depravity and corruption. I queſtion whether ſhe ever exhibited, on the ſame throne, and in ſo ſhort a time four ſuch examples, as ſhe did on that of the Cæſars, from Tiberius to Domitian.

(2) Idem, ibid.

(3) Idem, ibid.

(4) In the text of the Article CALIGULA.

[C] Caligula gave into the moſt impious extravagancies to honour her memory.] Her funeral was ſolemnized with the utmoſt magnificence. He publiſhed decrees, to honour the memory of Druſilla, like to thoſe which had been made for Livia wife of Auguſtus; and beſides this, there was a public decree which declared that Druſilla was ranked in the number of the immortals. A golden ſtatue repreſenting her, was ſet up in the Senate Houſe: There was erected in her honour, in the forum, another ſtatue like that of Venus; and the ſame honours were paid to it as to that Goddeſs. A Temple was conſecrated particularly to her; and men and women were commanded to dedicate ſtatues to her; women were ordered to ſwear by her name in any ſolemn atteſtation; and it was decreed, that on the birth day, the ſame kind of games ſhould be ſolemnized as on thoſe of Cybele. She was called Panthea (5), and divine honours were paid her in all cities. Livius Geminus a Roman Senator declared, that he had ſeen her aſcend into heaven and there converſe with the Gods; and he called down the moſt horrid curſes both on himſelf and his children, if what he then declared was not true; and among other Divinities, he called upon that of Druſilla as a witneſs to the truth of what he ſaid. This procured him a large ſum of money. The Romans were never ſo much puzzled as on this occaſion; and they did not know what face to aſſume. If they appeared ſorrowful, they were accuſed of not acknowledging her Divinity; if they appeared gay, they were accuſed of not regretting her death (6). Caligula made uſe of the human nature of his ſiſter againſt thoſe who did not weep, and of her divine nature againſt ſuch as were afflicted. During the public mourning which was appointed in her honour, it was a crime to laugh, to go into the bath, or to eat with one's family. Eadem defuncta juſtitium indixit, in quo riſiſſe, laviſſe, cænaſſe cum parentibus, aut conjuge liberiſve, capitale fuit (7). A poor man was put to death, for ſelling of hot water as guilty of irreligion. Τὸν πωλήσαντα θερμὸν ὕδωρ ἀπέκτεινεν ὡς ἀσεβήσαντα (8). After her death, Caligula, even in matters of the higheſt importance, never ſwore, either in the Senate Houſe or the Army, but by Druſilla's Divinity (9). Let us add to what is here ſaid, the other marks of his mad fury which have been related in his article. Seneca has given an excellent deſcription of the frantic ſtarts and ridiculous follies of Caligula's mourning (10).

(5) i. e. All divine. Theſe wretched flatterers made a greater progreſs in three days, than the Chriſtians of the Eaſt did in many ages: I ſpeak of thoſe who called the Virgin Mary All holy, Panagia.

(6) Extracted from Dion, lib. 59. ad ann. 791.

(7) Sueton. in Calig. cap. 24.

(8) Dio, lib. 59. ad ann. 791.

(9) Idem, ibid.

(10) Seneca, de Conſol. ad Polyb. cap. 34.

DRUSIUS (a) (JOHN), born at Audenard in Flanders June the 28th 1555, was a man of very great learning among the Proteſtants. He was deſigned for the ſtudy of Divinity, and ſent very early to Ghent to learn the Languages there, and afterwards to Louvain to paſs through a courſe of Philoſophy. His father having been outlawed on account of the Proteſtant Religion in 1567, and deprived of all his eſtate, retired to England. His wife, a good Catholic, omitted nothing to prevent our John Druſius from following the ſame ſteps; ſhe ſent for him back to Audenard, and thence to Tournay; but her regret for being at once deprived both of her huſband and eſtate having thrown her into a ſevere fit of ſickneſs, ſhe could not keep ſuch an eye over her ſon, but that he found means to eſcape to his father at London. He arrived there about the end of the year 1567. His ſtudies were taken care of, and maſters provided for him, and he ſoon had an opportunity of learning Hebrew under Anthony Cevallier, who was come over to England, and taught that language publickly in the Univerſity of Cambridge. Druſius lodg'd at his houſe, and had a great ſhare in his friendſhip. He did not return to London till 1571, and while he was preparing to go to France [A], the news of the maſſacre on St. Bartholomew's day made him change his reſolution. Soon after this, he was

(a) The name of his family was Drieſche.

[A] He was preparing to go to France.] Meurſius for want of attention did not well underſtand this Latin of Curiander. Poſtea cum Cevallerius à ſuis in Galliam revocatus abitum pararet, impetravit à patre (Druſius) ut ibi adhuc annum integrum commorari poſſet (1). The chief difficulty is not here, but in the words, which I am going to cite, Anno poſt diſceſſum Cevallerii Janus noſter profectus eſt Londinum, hac fine, ut in Galliam, Philoſophiæ ſtudium proſequendi gratiâ, denuo concederet (2). Meurſius interpreting one of theſe paſſages by the other, imagined that he might aſſert, that Druſius accompanied Cevallier to France, and upon his return to London, was preparing for a ſecond journey to France, when the maſſacre on St. Bartholomew's Day altered his reſolution. Revocato in Galliam Cevalerio eum comitatus, ad Hebræam ſumma cum contentione animum advertens privatim quoque adoleſcentes duos Anglos docere cœpit. Inde Londinum reverſus cum recurrere eo omnino ſtatuiſſet, laniena Pariſienſis nuntiatur. Qua de cauſa mutato conſilio, &c (3). It is certain that Druſius did not go with Cevallier to France; he ſtaid at Cambridge, and taught there the two Engliſh pupils mentioned by Meurſius. This is evident from the account of Curiander, pag. 6. It is certain likewiſe, that after the departure of Cevallier he applied himſelf to Greek and Philoſophy more than to Hebrew; whence it appears that Meurſius has not well deſcribed the employments of this young man. In the ſecond paſſage of Curiander, a comma ſhould be placed after denuo, and not before it; and this deceived Meurſius. The Author means, that Druſius intended to go to France, in order to proſecute again his ſtudies of Philoſophy. I am certain, that we ſhould meet with an hundred miſtakes of this kind in books, if we were to take the pains to compare abridgments with the works, from which thoſe Abridgments are taken. And we may remark by the way of what conſequence mere faults in pointing are.

(1) Curiander, in Vita Druſii, pag. 5.

(2) Idem, pag. 6.

(3) Meurſius, Athen. Batav. pag. 253.

(b) He was Profeſſor of Divinity.

was invited to Cambridge by Thomas Cartwright (b), and to Oxford by Laurence Humphrey; he accepted of the latter invitation [B], and by that means became Profeſſor of the Oriental Languages at the age of twenty two. He taught them at Oxford four years with great ſucceſs: after this he was deſirous of returning to his own country, and arriving there went to Louvain, where he ſtudied Civil Law. The troubles on account of Religion oblig'd him to return to his father at London; but upon the Pacification of Ghent (c) they both return'd to their own country. The ſon try'd his fortune in Holland, and was ſoon appointed Profeſſor of the Oriental Tongues there (d). While he continued in this ſtation at Leyden he reſolv'd to marry. He marry'd in 1580 a young Gentlewoman of Ghent, who was more than half a convert [C], and became a thorough Proteſtant after her marriage. The ſtipend allow'd to Druſius in Holland not being ſufficient for the ſupport of his family, he gave intimations, that if better terms ſhould be offer'd him elſewhere, he would accept of them (e). The Prince of Orange being inform'd that he had in a manner offer'd himſelf to the beſt bidder, wrote to the Magiſtrates of Leyden, to take care not to loſe a man of his merit. However they ſuffer'd him to remove to Friſeland, whither he had been invited to be Profeſſor of Hebrew in the Univerſity of Franeker. He was admitted into that Profeſſorſhip in June 1585, and diſcharged the functions of it with great honour till his death, which happened on the twelfth of February (f) 1616 (g). It is certain that he was well skilled in Hebrew [D], and had gained a conſiderable knowledge in the Jewiſh Antiquities, and the text of the Old Teſtament. This is evident from ſeveral works which he publiſhed [E]. His abilities in that reſpect were ſo well known, that he had orders to write upon thoſe ſubjects, and was paid for that purpoſe by the States General [F]. He was thought of for a new Tranſlation of the Bible into Low Dutch [G]; but ſome perſons ſucceeded in their endeavours to exclude him.

(c) In 1576.

(d) In 1577.

(e) Quoniam vero familiam ex tam parco ſtipendio, quod annuatim numerabatur, alere nequit hic noſter, alio cogitare incipit, ſuique fruendi, ſi legitime vocetur, ſpem facere. Abel Curiander, in Vita Druſii, pag. 8.

(f) Old Style.

(g) Extracted from his Life written by Abel Curiander, his ſon-in-law.

[B] He was invited to Cambridge . . . and Oxford. . . . He accepted the latter invitation.] It was that of Oxford: we may correct therefore a miſtake of Paul Freher, who writes in his Theatre of illuſtrious Men (4), Hebrææ Linguæ Profeſſor in Univerſitate Cantuarienſi, an. ætatis 22 conſtitutus eſt. Here are two errors for one: it is falſe, that Druſius was Profeſſor at Cambridge; and it is a miſtake, that the Univerſity of Cambridge is called Cantuarienſis. This laſt word is the adjective of Canterbury.

(4) Pag. 1510.

[C] He married a young Gentlewoman of Ghent, who was more than half converted.] Her name was Mary Vander Varent: ſhe choſe rather to renounce her patrimony and country, than her religion, and was extremely charitable to the poor. I believe that ſhe died in 1599 (6). Hæc cum in Flandriâ virgo, guſtum melioris purioriſque doctrinæ percepiſſet, conjux in Hollandiâ ita in illa confirmata eſt, ut citius bonis luculentiſſimis privari, deque civitate & patriâ, quam de ſententia ſua dimoveri potuerit. Præter alia, hoc de illa referunt, quod inexhauſtæ in pauperes fuerit benignitatis, qui unanimi & conſona voce Franekeræ clamitant, cum ejus mentio incidit: Erat illa parens & mater unica egeſtatis, omniſque adverſitatis ſolamen (6). He had three children by this marriage, a daughter, who was born at Leyden 22d of March 1582, and married in 1604 to Abel Curiander, who publiſhed the Life of his father-in-law (7); another daughter, born at Franeker April 1ſt 1587, and married May 29th 1608 to Abraham Valkins; and a ſon, born June 26th 1588. I ſhall ſpeak of him below. The ſecond daughter died at Ghent November 12th 1612, whither ſhe had taken a journey on the account of ſome affairs. A Prieſt knowing her to be very dangerouſly ill went to confeſs her, and give her Extreme Unction; but ſhe ſent him away, and her huſband was ready to beat him. It was with great expence and danger that her body was removed into Zeland, for at Ghent they threatned to deny it burial (8).

(5) There is among the Arminian Letters a Letter of Arminius (it is the 147th) dated in May 1599, in which he condoles with Druſius for the loſs of his wife.

(6) Curiander, in Vita Druſii, pag. 7, 8.

(7) Ibid. pag. 8.

(8) Ibid. pag. 14, 15.

[D] It was certain that he was well ſkilled in Hebrew.] To ſhew that I ſpeak without any hyperbole, I ſhall cite an Author, who cannot be ſuſpected. "Druſius, who holds the ſeventh rank among thoſe "Critics (9), ought, in my opinion, to be preferred "to all the reſt: for beſides that he was well ſkilled "in Hebrew, and could conſult the Jewiſh Books "himſelf, he had read carefully the ancient Greek "Tranſlators, ſo that he had formed a better idea of "the holy language than the other Critics, who have "only applied themſelves to the reading of the Rabbins. We may add to this, that he had alſo read "the works of St. Jerom and ſeveral other Fathers. "In ſhort, Druſius is the moſt learned and moſt judicious of all the critics in that collection (10)."

(9) That is, among thoſe who were printed in England in the Critica ſacra.

(10) Father Simon, Hiſtoire Critique du Vieux Teſtament, liv. 3. chap. 15. pag. m. 443.

[E] He publiſhed ſeveral Works.] Thoſe who have his life will find there an exact liſt of all that he publiſhed, and deſigned for the Preſs: and thoſe who have not that piece may conſult Meurſius (11). One cannot without aſtoniſhment conſider the labours of this learned man: he had reviſed, corrected, and enlarged before his death all the Books, which he had publiſhed (12), and had written ſeveral other new treatiſes, and prepared ſeveral additions to Works written by others, which would have been more conſiderable than thoſe Works themſelves. Sequuntur libri à D. Druſio quamplurimis additamentis aucti, adeo quoque ut ſi recudendi eſſent cum additamentis iſtis, à Druſio potius quam ab Authoribus nomen tracturi eſſent (13).

(11) In Athen. Batav.

(12) Antedictorum nullum eſſe librum qui poſtrema authoris cura non ſit factus melior aut auctior. Curiander, in Vita Druſii, pag. 20.

(13) Ibid. pag. 26, 27.

[F] He had orders to write . . . . and was paid . . . . by the States General.] The States General ordered him in 1600 to write Notes upon the moſt difficult paſſages of the Old Teſtament, and promiſed him a penſion of four hundred Florins a year for ſeveral years. They wrote a letter to the States of Friſeland May the 18th 1601 to deſire them to diſpenſe with all Druſius's employments, which might retard that work. In quibus (Literis) humaniſſime petunt, Druſius ut omnibus iſtis oneribus & incommodis eximatur, quæ opus illud Reipub. Chriſtianæ maximè profuturum ullo modo impedire poſſent (14). Upon the reading this Letter the Deputies of the States of Friſeland diſcharged Druſius from all his academical functions, permitted him to ſubſtitute another perſon for his ordinary Lectures, and paid his Amanuenſis. He deſired his diſcharge in 1603, but was refuſed, becauſe among other reaſons his reputation had drawn a great many foreigners to the Univerſity of Franeker (15). He laboured upon Geneſis, Exodus, Leviticus, the XVIII firſt chapters of Numbers, and particularly upon the moſt difficult paſſages of the Pentateuch, the book of Joſhuah, and the Books of Samuel; he laboured, I ſay, upon them, in conformity to the orders of the States General, but he could not publiſh any part of this work, and was frequently diſturbed in the execution of thoſe orders (16).

(14) Ibid. pag. 14.

(15) Curiander, in Vita Druſii, pag. 14.

(16) Idem, pag. 23, 24.

[G] He was thought of for a new Tranſlation of the Bible into Low Dutch.] The Deputies of the States of Friſeland (17) gave him a Commiſſion in 1596 to undertake this work in conjunction with the Sieur de Sainte Aldegonde and ſome other perſons. Several learned men judging him well qualified for this work recommended him ſtrongly to the States (18). It is proper to ſee what Sainte Aldegonde wrote to him in 1594 (19): De Bibliorum verſione, quæ eſt, quam ad Ordines Belgii commemoras ſententia, etſi video te gravibus commotum rationibus, non poſſum tamen aſſentiri. Ego enim noſtram hanc, quæ vulgo manibus teritur verſionem ejuſmodi eſſe exiſtimo, quæ planè novas lucubrationes, novumque penitus opus requirat. Inter omnes autem omnium verſiones ego ingenuè fatebor, mihi viſam eſſe nullam tanto abeſſe ab Ebraicâ veritate intervallo, atque

(17) They are a Body, who repreſent the States of the Province, while they are not aſſembled.

(18) Curiander, in Vita Druſii, pag. 12.

(19) Ibid. pag. 13.

him. He held a vaſt correſpondence by letters with learned men [H], and he found by this means that his works were eſteemed, and was perpetually exhorted to labour for the advantage of the public. He had occaſion for this conſolation (b); for he had a great many enemies, who threw a thouſand obſtacles in his way [I], and cruelly attack'd his reputation. His modeſty, or his freedom from prejudices made him more reſerv'd than many others in condemning and applauding; this occaſion'd him to be decried as a bad Proteſtant [K]. His (b) See Note [M].

atque ſit Lutheri verſio è qua manavit noſtra: ex vitioſa Germanica facta vitioſior Belgico-Teutonica. De quo ſi nobis liceat aliquando familiariter conferre, pro hermæo duxerim. Id vero vehementer doleo, pleroſque noſtros homines in me videri oculos defixiſſe, qui ſatis intelligam, quanta mihi. Itaque velim Eccleſias noſtras, quod ego multis etiam ſuaſi, in te reſpicere, tibique hanc demandare provinciam. Idque ſi id tibi non ingratum fore intelligam, ero illis author quantum potero, etſi video nihil dum eos certi ſtatuiſſe. De quo ſi tuum mihi animum aperueris, facies gratum. i. e. "With regard to your "opinion concerning the Tranſlation of the Bible, "which you have obſerved to the States, tho' I ſee "you are influenced by weighty reaſons, yet I cannot "aſſent. For I think that our common verſion is "ſuch that it requires abſolutely a new work. But "among all the ſeveral Tranſlations I frankly own, "that I never have ſeen any ſo remote from the He-"brew Text, as that of Luther, from which our Ver-"ſion was taken, from a faulty German Tranſlation "a ſtill more faulty Low-Dutch one. If we ſhall ever "have the opportunity of diſcourſing familiarly up-"on this ſubject, I ſhall account it an happineſs. "But I am extremely ſorry, that moſt of our coun-"trymen ſeem to have fixed their eyes upon me; "who am ſufficiently conſcious how ſmall my abili-"ties are. I could wiſh therefore that our Churches "would pitch upon you, as I have adviſed a great "many perſons, and commit this Province to you. "And if I ſhall underſtand that it is not diſliked by "you, I will perſuade them to the utmoſt of my "power, tho' I do not find they have yet determined "any thing abſolutely. You will oblige me, if you "will tell me your mind upon this affair." This paſſage is ſevere upon Luther's Tranſlation, and ſtill more ſo upon that made uſe of by the Churches of the Low-Countries at that time. Monſr. Simon could not have ſpoken more diſadvantageouſly of it (20). I find among the Arminian Letters (21), that Arminius and Utenbogard recommended Druſius as well with regard to the Commiſſion granted to him by the States General in 1600, as to the new Tranſlation; but their kind offices were undoubtedly prejudicial to him in the latter affair. It was probably thought, that ſince they judged him a proper perſon for that work, he was by no means ſo. However that be, I have read in thoſe Letters (22). that one of the Synods of Holland made an Act, by which he was excluded not only from the Tranſlation, but likewiſe from reviſing it.

(20) See above Note [B] of the Article of AMAMA.

(21) See the 47th, 48th, 49th, 50th, and 51ſt Letters of the folio edition.

(22) In the 53d Letter.

[H] He held a vaſt correſpondence by letters with learned men.] Beſides the Letters, which he received in Hebrew, Greek, French, Engliſh, and Low-Dutch, there were found 2300 Latin Letters among his papers (23).

(23) Curiander, in Vita Druſii, pag. 11.

[I] He had a great many enemies, who threw a thouſand obſtacles in his way.] The Act of the Synod abovementioned relating to the Tranſlation of the Bible, was made merely to exclude Druſius. Tu quidem illius ſolius excludendi cauſa decretum factum eſſe prudenter animadvertebas, ſed juvenis viginti annorum hoc ex ore Roggii aperte eſt profeſſus, ignarus proculdubio quo loco Druſius apud me eſſet (24). He remarked with his own hand at the end of his Commentary on Geneſis, that he had been prodigiouſly croſſed in the execution of the orders of the States General: his words are as follow; Abſoluta fuit hæc in Geneſin commentatio undecimo Aprilis ſtilo veteri, anno Chriſti 1602, quam aggreſſus eram biennio ante auſpiciis illuſtrium Ordinum Generalium Provinciarum Fœderatarum, procurantibus hoc negotium Johanne Wtenbogardo, Jacobo Arminio, Jacobo Baſelio, aliiſque verbi divini Præconibus, non tam facundis quam doctis ac piis, veritatiſque ac ſolidæ doctrinæ ſtudioſiſſimis. Deus illis & mihi largiatur; illis præmium quale merentur, mihi otium & bonam valetudinem, ut poſſim in cæteros libros ſimilia præſtare. Quod futurum puto ex uſu Eccleſiæ Orthodoxæ, quam amo ac veneror, ut contra odi Eccleſiam errantium & imperitorum, quorum illi familiam ducunt qui me in hoc opere non ſemel turbarunt. Deus illis condonet, cui laus & gloria in ævum (25). i. e. "This Commentary on Geneſis was fi-"niſhed on the 11th of April old ſtyle in the year "1602, which I began two years before at the com-"mand of the illuſtrious States General of the Unit-"ed Provinces, at the procurement of John Utenbo-"gard, James Arminius, James Baſelius, and other "Preachers of the Goſpel, men leſs eminent for their "eloquence than their learning and piety, and ſincere "lovers of truth and ſolid doctrine. May God grant "them the reward which they deſerve, and me leiſure "and health, in order to perform the like ſervice upon "the other Books; which I believe will be of ad-"vantage to the orthodox Church, which I love and "reverence, as on the contrary I hate the Church of "the erroneous and ignorant, who are directed by "thoſe, who have more than once diſturbed me in "this work. May God forgive them, to whom be "praiſe and glory for ever." He loſt his patience at laſt; he wrote a piece againſt his perſecutors, (for I do not doubt that he called them ſo;) I have not ſeen it; and know nothing of it but by the following quotation in his life (26): J. Druſii ad Abelum Curiandrum generum ſuum Epiſtola, in qua agitur de vehementia, qua uſus fuit in Epiſtola ſua ad Fratres Belgas. Item Speculum Theologorum miſologorum ex Eraſmo. i. e. "A Letter of John Druſius to his ſon-in-law Abel Cu-"riander, in which he treats of the vehemence, which "he had uſed in his Letter to his brethren in the Low-"Countries. Likewiſe the Mirrour of the miſologiſt "Divines from Eraſmus."

(25) Curiander, in Vita Druſii, pag. 23.

(26) Pag. 26, 27.

[K] He was reſerved in condemning and applauding; this occaſioned him to be decried as a bad Proteſtant.] He was not a man, who in points of Divinity would pronounce magiſterially, that is heretical; this is orthodox. He troubled himſelf with nothing but Grammar, and declared frequently, that if he was miſtaken, he was at leaſt exempt from hereſy, ſince he was not confident and preſumptuous in it, but ready to hear inſtruction, and ſubmitted all his works and himſelf to the Catholic Church. Tenuis mea ſcientia verſatur tota circa Grammaticam & Hiſtoriam (v. ſacram.) Dogmata fidei aliis me doctioribus tractanda relinquo. . . . . Pertinacia facit hæreticum, non ſimplex error, nam humanum eſt errare, humani autem à me nihil alienum ſcio. Monitus non ero pertinax, nec unquam fui. Olim profeſſus ſum quod nunc iterum repeto, me mea omnia ſubjicere judicio Eccleſiæ (27). In another place (28) he ſpeaks thus: Non ſum Theologus: an Grammatici nomen, quod aliquando mihi probroſe objectum, tueri poſſim neſcio. Amici quos noſti negant, ego non contradico. Quid igitur es, inquies? Chriſtianus ſum φιλαληθὴς ſum, qui ſcribendi proficio, & proficiendo ſcribo. i. e. "I am no divine; and cannot tell "whether I can ſupport the character of a Gramma-"rian, which has been ſometimes reproachfully ob-"jected to me. The friends, whom you know, deny "it; and I do not contradict them. What are you "therefore? you will ſay. I am a Chriſtian, and a "lover of truth, who improve by writing, and write "by improving." I ſhall only add the following paſſage: Quod ſupereſt, ſcripſi hæc animo juvandi, non lædendi. Si læſi quempiam jam nunc pœnitet. Si offendi pias aures, monitus libenter mutabo. Si erravi uſpiam, monſtretur mihi error: Non ero pertinax. Denique provoco ad judicium Eccleſiæ Catholicæ, cui me meaque omnia ſubjicio (29), à cujus recto ſenſu diſſentire neque volo neque debeo. Sic mihi Deus faciat, ſic addat (30). i. e. "As for what remains, I have writ-"ten theſe things, with a deſign to do ſervice, not to "injure any perſon; and if I have done the latter, I "am now ſorry for it. If I have offended pious "ears, when I ſhall be ſhewn it, I will readily change "it. If I have been any where miſtaken, let the er-"ror

(27) Druſius, in Libro Haſidæis, pag. 22. apud Curiand. pag. 21.

(28) In Tetragrammato, pag. 81. apud Curiand. ibid.

(29) Hæc & alia quæ hoc libro continentur ut & in aliis omnibus à me unquam editis aut edendis ſubjicio libens Eccleſiæ Catholicæ judicio, à cujus recto ſenſu ſi diſſentio non ero pertinax. Thus he ſpeaks in the Preface to his Enoch apud Curiand. pag. 22.

(30) In Libro Præteritorium, pag. 454. apud eund. pag. 22.

(24) Arminius ad Uytenbogardum, Epiſt. 53. præſt. ac eruditor. Virorum, pag. 102.

His anſwer to this deſerves a reflection [L]; but it did not prevent him from groaning under his hard fate [M]. His ſon would have proved a prodigy of learning, if

" ror be pointed out to me, I will not be obſtinate. " Laſtly, I appeal to the judgment of the Catholic " Church, to which I ſubmit myſelf and all my " writings, and from whoſe true ſenſe I neither would " nor ought to diſſent. May God ſo do to me, and ſo " reward me." This language by no means pleaſed the zealots; they found in it the marks of Scepticiſm; they would have a perſon more deciſive and reſolute than Bartolus; they would have him act like themſelves, that is, embrace an opinion firmly, and anathematize the contrary. They could not conceive a man to be of a religion, when he continues cool in comparing it with others, and moderate againſt the followers of hereſy. Druſius was therefore a perſon, who could not fail of many dangerous enemies. And with regard to this expreſſion, I ſubmit my ſelf and all my writings to the judgment of the Catholic Church, is it not the ſtyle of the Court of Rome? If this gave the zealots an advantage againſt him, to what did he not expoſe himſelf by refuſing to ſign the Formulary? I have read in the Scaligerana, that he did not ſign the Confeſſion of the Low-Countries. Druſius noluit unquam ſubſcribere Confeſſioni noſtræ, & propterea illi malè volunt ſui Collegæ. i. e. " Druſius would never " ſign our Confeſſion, upon which account his col- " legues are enemies to him." Druſius knows not what Religion is; he is not of our Confeſſion: he was always educated at Louvain among the Papiſts (31). Serarius had been informed, that he would not ſign our Confeſſion. This refuſal was an indication, that he did not approve of all the Articles of the Confeſſion of the Low-Countries; but it could not juſtly be concluded, that he was a Papiſt, or did not believe the Communion of the Church in the Low-Countries preferable to that of others. The Author of L'Eſprit de Monſr. Arnaud was was not well verſed in his Scaligerana; for how would he have declaimed againſt poor Monſr. Colomies; if he could have reproached him for having cited in his Icon Preſbyterianorum the teſtimony of a man, who conſtantly refuſed to ſign the Confeſſion of the Low-Countries? This would have given him an opportunity of falling ſeverely upon Druſius and Colomies at the ſame time (32).

(31) Scaliger is miſtaken. Druſius left Louvain in 1567 at 17 years of age, and after that never returned thither but for a few months in the beginning of 1576. This is evident from his Life.

(32) This would not have been una fidelia duos parietes dealbare, but deturpare & conſpurcare.

[L] His anſwer to this deſerves a reflection.] He repreſented firſt, that his father had left almoſt all his eſtate for the Proteſtant Religion. He then urged, that with regard to himſelf, worldly advantages never were of weight enough with him to profeſs the Proteſtant Religion contrary to his conſcience; he had gone thro' his ſtudies at the expence of his father; the ſtipend, which he received at Leyden, was not ſufficient to ſupport him; he had only to retire into Flanders to enjoy a good income there. Laſtly, he obſerves, that thoſe, who exclaimed ſo much againſt him, were perſons, who had grown rich by profeſſing the Proteſtant Religion, while he was empoveriſhed by it. We may ſee ſtill men of this caſt: their profeſſing the Reformed Religion brings them a good revenue, free of all taxes; they enjoy a kind of Papacy, praiſes, honours, flattery, low ſubmiſſions from the people; they would loſe all theſe advantages, if they were to abandon that profeſſion; and yet they never ceaſe to charge with indifference, and perſecute furiouſly under that pretence, many perſons, who are ruined in their worldly views by the very ſame profeſſion. It brings them nothing, and cuts them off from an hundred advantages, which they might obtain by quitting it. I make this remark to ſhew how much ages and nations reſemble each other. The reader may ſee from the following paſſage whether I have rightly tranſlated Druſius's words with reſpect to which I have taken from thence. Sparſerunt de me rumorem vaniſſimum, ſumma eſt, me alienum eſſe ab hac religione. Quid dicam? Poſt natam calumniam non fuit unquam major calumnia. Egone alienus à religione, cujus cauſa pater meus p. m. amiſit anno 67. octodecim millia florenorum? Quum autem exularet Londini una mecum, habebat penes ſe libras Flandricas, quas majores vocant, mille quingentas. Ex illis mille quadringentas impendit in cauſam publicam. Princeps Auriacus partem accepit, aliam Ordines Hollandiæ & Zelandiæ, tertiam pauperes, qui religionis ergo in Angliam confugerant. Centum quæ reſtabant poſtliminio reverſus retuli domum. Quod dico vero verius eſt. Idem propriis ſumptibus me aluit in ſtudiis. A publico nihil unquam accepi. Quum Profeſſorem agerem Leidæ, ſtipendium erat tam parvum, ut coactus fuerim ex meo impendere quotannis trecentos, aliquando quadringentos. Habeo in Flandria reditus non pœnitendos, quibus frui poſſem ſi eſſem in patriâ. Quorſum iſta inquies? Nempe ut ſcias vanum eſſe quod æmuli mei ſparſerunt, qui omnes ſimul tantam jacturam non fecerunt, quantam ego ſolus feci, quos hæc religio divites, ut me pauperem fecit, quem nunc contemnunt propterea, optimè de ipſis meritum (33).

(33) Druſius, Epiſtola ad Pancratium Caſtricomium, dated Feb. 6, 1600. apud Curiand. in ejus Vitâ, pag. 34.

[M] . . . . and did not prevent him from groaning under the weight of his misfortune.] Here is what he wrote in the letter abovecited: Jam nunc experior verum eſſe illud: homo homini Deus: ſed & alii me docuerunt verum eſſe, homo homini lupus. Per eos injecta remora, de qua ſcribis. . . . Tantam experior hominum ingratitudinem, ut propemodum in animo ſit edita prole Machabæorum poſthac quieſcere. i. e. " I now expe- " rience the truth of that ſaying, One man is a God " to another; but others have taught me that it is " true, that one man is a wolf to another. They have " thrown in my way the obſtacle of which you " write. . . . I find ſo much ingratitude among men, " that I am almoſt reſolved to diſcontinue writing af- " ter I have publiſhed the genealogy of the Macca- " bees." Muſt not an Author ſo fruitful as he be very ſenſible of the perſecutions to which he was expoſed, ſince his uneaſineſs made him think of condemning his pen to a perpetual ſterility? I ſhall cite one paſſage more (34), which will furniſh us with ſeveral fine reflections of Druſius: Turbones noſtri nunc quieſcunt, aut pudet eos præteritorum, aut expectant occaſionem novam. Mihi quidem multis de cauſis quies non ſolum optatiſſima eſt, ſed etiam neceſſaria. Sed ſi hanc perſonam Deus humanæ fabulæ choragus mihi impoſuit, partes delegatas oportet agam. In hac harena mihi video moriendum eſſe, nam ut viri iſti quieſcant nihil eſt ſpei. In eo toti ſunt ut me aut latronibus objiciant, aut mœrore confectum occidant. Sed hactenus gratiâ Dei, nec animum à ſuo propoſito labefactare potuerunt, nec ſtudiis meis ita multum detrimenti attulere. Conſolatur me primam conſcientia rectè factorum, deinde favor doctorum & bonorum virorum, quos hactenus æquiſſimos habui erga labores meos. Quod partim Literis, partim donis ac muneribus declararunt. . . . Quis unquam in ſole ambulavit abſque umbra; quis inſignem virtutem exercuit ſine invidiâ? quis bonas literas profeſſus eſt cum aliquâ famâ, abſque odio Theologorum? Capnio, Eraſmus, Arias, Hieronymus experti ſunt. Hunc poſtremum Româ expulſum, cum Bethlehemi in tuguriolo degeret, ne ſic quidem latentem effugit invidia. Ex priſcis Sapientibus quidam interrogatus quid ageret? Nihil, inquit, nondum enim mihi invidetur. Regium eſt, cum benefeceris audire malè, inquit ille. Et profectò ita eſt, induſtria parit virtutem, virtus gloriam, gloria invidiam, qui morbus ferè peculiaris eſt iis, qui alioqui pietatem profitentur, cum nihil ſit alienius à vera pietate. Obrepit enim hæc peſtis pietatis imagine, dum videri vult vitiorum odium, ac virtutis zelus. i. e. " Thoſe who raiſed the ſtorm " againſt me are now quiet; they are either aſhamed " of what is paſt, or wait for a new opportunity. Quiet " is a thing not only deſirable to me on many ac- " counts, but even neceſſary. But if God the diſ- " poſer of human life has given me this part to act, " it is my duty to perform it. I perceive that I muſt " die in the performance, for there is no hope that thoſe " men will continue quiet. Their whole endeavour " is, either to expoſe me to ruffians, or kill me with " grief. But hitherto by the Grace of God they " have not been able either to divert my mind from " its purpoſe, or, to diſturb my ſtudies very much. " In the firſt place the conſciouſneſs of my having " acted rightly gives me comfort; and next to that " the approbation of learned and good men, who " have been hitherto extremely favourable to my la- " bours; which they have ſhewn partly by their let- " ters, and partly by their gifts and preſents. . . . " Who ever walked in the ſun without ſhadow? Who " ever was eminent for any virtue without envy? " Who

(34) In a Letter dated Decemb. 31, 1599. apud Curiand. pag. 32.

if he had liv'd longer [N]. Scaliger has ſpoken well of him; Scaliger I ſay, who otherwiſe was very abuſive to our Druſius [O]; for can any thing be ſaid more terrible and ſhocking againſt a Profeſſor of the Sacred Language, than that his houſe is a brothel? Druſius was ſucceeded by a ſcholar of his, who defended his memory, againſt thoſe who accus'd him of inclining towards Arianiſm (i). He likewiſe took care of the Manuſcripts, and of the daughter of the deceaſed [P]. Monſieur Boſſuet, Biſhop of Meaux, has taken advantage of a thing he read in Druſius, relating to the Pope's Mitre [Q]. A Jeſuit

(i) See above the text of the Article AMAMA between the quotations (f) and (g).

" Who has profeſſed polite Literature with reputation " without the hatred of the Divines? Capnio, Eraſ- " mus, Arias, Jerom, have experienced it. The laſt " was driven from Rome, and tho' he lived in a " little cottage at Bethlehem, even amidſt his ob- " ſcurity could not eſcape envy. One of the an- " tient ſages being aſked what he was doing? an- " ſwered, nothing, for I am not yet envied. It is " a king-like thing to be ill reported of when you " have done well, ſays the Philoſopher. And indeed " the caſe is ſo, induſtry produces virtue, virtue " glory, glory envy, which diſeaſe is almoſt peculiar " to thoſe, who profeſs piety, tho' there is nothing " more remote from true piety. For this peſt creeps " in under the appearance of piety, while it would " ſeem to be only an hatred to vice, and a zeal for " virtue."

[N] His ſon would have proved a prodigy of learning, if he had lived longer.] I have already obſerved, that he was born in 1588. His name was JOHN DRUSIUS as well as his father's. He began at five years old to learn the Latin and Hebrew tongues: at ſeven he explained the Hebrew Pſalter ſo exactly, that a Jew, who taught Arabic at Leyden, was prodigiouſly ſurprized at it. At nine he could read the Hebrew without points, and add the points where they were wanted according to the rules of Grammar, which the Rabbins have loſt the knowledge of at preſent. He ſpoke Latin as readily as his mother tongue; and could make himſelf underſtood in Engliſh. At twelve he wrote ex tempore in proſe and verſe, in the manner of the Jews. At ſeventeen he made a ſpeech in Latin to the King of Great Britain in the midſt of his Court, and was admired by all that were preſent. He had a lively genius, a ſolid judgment, a ſtrong memory, and an indefatigable ardour for ſtudy. He was likewiſe of an agreeable temper, which made him greatly beloved; and had noble inclinations, with a ſingular turn of piety. He died of the ſtone at the age of twenty one in England at the Houſe of Dr. William Thomas Dean of Chicheſter, who allowed him a very conſiderable ſalary. He left divers Works, a great many letters in Hebrew, verſes in the ſame language, and notes on the Proverbs of Solomon. He had begun to tranſlate into Latin the Itinerary of Benjamin Tudelenſis, and the Chronicle of the Second Temple; and digeſted into an alphabetical order the Nomenclator of Elias Levita, to which he added the Greek Words, which were not in the firſt Edition (35). Joſeph Scaliger ſaid (36), that Druſius's ſon knew more Hebrew than his father.

(35) Extracted from the Preface of John Druſius ad lib. X. Præteritorum. The whole account is curious; and we read there theſe words, Quod ſi vita ei longior contigiſſet, & ad juſtam ætatem pertingere potuiſſet, dicam præſiſcine (abſit verbo invidia) fuiſſet interpres literarum ſacrarum eximius, qualem fortaſſe orbis Chriſtianus alium non habuiſſet. This young man deſerves a place in the ſecond edition of the Enfans celebres of Mr. Baillet.

(36) In Scaligeran. pag. m. 68.

[O] Scaliger . . . . was very abuſive on him.] Here are ſome ſtrokes of the character, which he has drawn of him. " He is a man of bad reputation; for he " is a whoremonger and his daughter is a whore; " his houſe is a brothel. He knew more than Du- " jon (*). Druſius's judgment is contemptible; he " knows nothing but his Grammar: he does not " know ſo much as Serarius except in the Hebrew " Grammar. . . . Druſius Lipſii ſimius habet miram " Latinitatem; non Latine ſcribit: i. e. " Druſius " the Ape of Lipſius has a very odd kind of Latin " ſtyle; he does not write Latin. Druſius is nothing " in compariſon with Buxtorf. He has taught Gram- " mar theſe thirty years, and does nothing elſe, and " it would be ſurprizing, if he was not very well " ſkilled in that. Ego bene ſcio quid ſit Druſius, eſt " doctus in Grammaticis & in textu Hebræo. . . . Dru- " ſius non eſt doctus, licet ſe putet eſſe doctiſſimum: " i. e. I know well what Druſius is; he is well ſkilled " in Grammar and the Hebrew Text. . . . . He is " not learned, tho' he thinks himſelf a man of great " learning."

* Francis Junius.

[P] A ſcholar of his . . . . took care of the manuſcripts and of the daughter of the deceaſed.] See the letter, which Sixtinus Amama wrote on the third of December 1626 to Gaſpar Barlæus (37), to deſire him to prevail upon a conſiderable man, to whom the twelve leſſer Prophets of Druſius were deſigned to be dedicated, to accept of the dedication. Amama remarks, that of theſe twelve Prophets eight had been publiſhed long before, but that the other four had never ſeen the light. He repreſents to Barlæus the wretched condition of the only daughter of Druſius, who had been five years a widow of Curiander. He adds, that having publiſhed divers Works of Druſius, he had always dedicated them to ſome generous Mecænas's, who had relieved the neceſſity of that woman by ſome ſmall preſent; and that this was the reaſon why he requeſted Barlæus to engage this man of figure to accept of the Dedication. He tells him that the widow would be ſatisfied with a ſmall preſent, and that fifty Livres would make her happy. Ago cauſam viduæ pauperculæ, quæ nunc cum bonæ mentis ſorore ſtrenue luctatur. Ea eſt filia unica Cl. Druſii quam D. Havelus Curiander ante annos quinque reliquit viduam. Ex MS. parentis ejus b. mem. multa nunc publici juris feci, quæſivique illis ejuſmodi Mecænates, qui aliquo præmiolo ejus paupertatem iverunt ſublevatum. . . . . Non expectabit magnam remunerationem: ſi quinquaginta florenos vel daleros ſimplices obtinuerit, beatam ſe judicabit. Hæc eo dico ut videas & intelligas quam anguſta res ſit hujus fœminæ, vel propter parentem meliori fortuna dignæ, & quam ſit exiguum quod illa expectat (38). What a pity it is, that the only daughter of ſuch an Author ſhould be reduced to ſo diſtreſſed a ſtate, and that the poſterity of ſo many fools ſhould roll in their chariots! Sic viſum numini: i. e. " So " it has pleaſed Providence."

(37) It is the 644th among thoſe of the Arminians, pag. 723. edit. in fol.

(38) Sixt. Amama, pag. 723.

[Q] Monſr. Boſſuet, Biſhop of Meaux, has taken advantage of a thing, which he read in Druſius relating to the Pope's Mitre.] I ſhall firſt cite the paſſage of the Biſhop of Meaux with all that belongs to it, the Summary, Quotations, &c. and then make ſome reflections upon it. He writes thus (39): " It would " not be neceſſary to take the trouble to relate here " a ſtory current among the Proteſtants, if their de- " plorable credulity did not lead them to take for " truth whatever that party affirm. The critics of " England have inſerted among their remarks, that " a perſon of credit had informed Monſr. de Montmo- " renci, when he was at Rome, that the Pope's Mitre " had in the front of it theſe letters in Gold, MYS- " TERIUM, butthat the inſcription was changed. Mr. Ju- " rieu adopts this ſtory, which is very proper to impoſe " upon weak perſons, and repreſents it in ſtrong terms: " It is not without a particular diſpoſition of Providence, " that God permitted formerly the Popes to bear the " word MYSTERY on their Mitres. Joſeph Scaliger " and divers others have teſtified, that they had ſeen " old Mitres with that word upon them. This artful " Miniſter adds of his own invention, that Scaliger " had ſeen this; but we have ſeen above, that what " he wrote was only upon report, and without any " ſufficient authority. Druſius a Proteſtant Writer ac- " knowledges that Scaliger ſpoke merely on the cre- " dit of another; he pays little regard to this trifling " ſtory, for which he requires proofs and better au- " thority. It would be taking pains to no purpoſe " to ſeek for proof; it is a mere chimerical ſtory; " but Monſr. Jurieu will loſe nothing, and eſteems " every thing worthy of credit, which makes ever ſo " little againſt the Pope."

(39) Mr. de Meaux, Avertiſſement ſur l'explication de l'Apocalypſe, num. 6. pag. 319. edit. de Holland.

A RIDICULOUS ſtory of Scaliger rejected by Druſius a Proteſtant, and adopted by Jurieu a Miniſter.

Crit. ad cap. 17. v. 7. col. p. 858, Præj. leg. I. Part. Chap. 7. pag. 121.

Critic. ad Cap. XVII. v. 7. pag. 4857.

It is unjuſt to inſult a whole body under the pretence, that ſome Writers among them have given marks of too much prejudice. The Biſhop of Meaux ſhould have conſidered this. This is my firſt reflection. A man does a great injury to a party without Jeſuit who undertook to criticize upon our Druſius, only expoſed himſelf to cenſure [R].

out doors, when he employs all ſorts of reaſons, good or bad, in its defence, without ever retracting what has been once ſaid: but this conduct is not at all diſadvantageous to the intereſt within doors. It nouriſhes prepoſſeſſion and confidence in the minds of people, and inſpires them with the paſſions of thoſe who diſpute. Theſe people take care not to make any ſtep, of which their parties might take an advantage; they never diveſt themſelves of any right of alledging this or that, ſuch or ſuch pretenſions. This multiplies their writings, this animates and warms them. It is not the temporal intereſt of a Communion, that all perſons in it ſhould be men of judgment: paſſionate people, who embrace it only thro' a ſpirit of faction, do it a thouſand good ſervices, humanly ſpeaking. It is of advantage therefore, to have ſome of theſe infatuated agents; they are a neceſſary evil. This is my ſecond reflection. We are not to imagine that in a large body, learned men of Druſius's character are ſo rare as they appear to be; we ſhould only ſay, that there are few who will expoſe themſelves to raſh cenſures. Moſt of the men of moderation and reaſon ſeeing that the raſh and forward carry away the applauſe and favour of the multitude, let them alone, and ſometimes ſwim with the ſtream, in order to live quiet and exempt from perverſe ſuſpicions. If they were to be aſked in the ear, why do not you write like Druſius, they would ſeek for an anſwer in the Fable (40).

(40) Hor. Epiſt. 2. lib. 1. ver. 70.

Quod ſi me populus Romanus fortè roget, cur,
Non ut porticibus, ſic judiciis fruar iiſdem;
Nec ſequar aut fugiam quæ diligit ipſe, vel odit:
Olim quod vulpes ægroto cauta leoni,
Reſpondit, referam: quia me veſtigia terrent
Omnia te adverſum ſpectantia nulla retrorſum.

That is,

" Should the crowd aſk, why ſince I live in town,
" Walk the ſame ſtreets with them, I do not own
" The ſame opinion? Why I don't approve
" And hate the things, that they do hate and love?
" My anſwer muſt be what ſly Reynard ſaid
" To the old ſickly Lion, I'm afraid,
" Great King of beaſts, for all the treads I ſee
" Are to thy den, none back; that frightens me."

CREECH.

This is my third reflection, to which I ſhall add but one more. Here is therefore my fourth and laſt; I do not examine whether in the particular fact mentioned by the Biſhop of Meaux, Druſius ought to have been ſilent; but I dare venture to affirm, that what he did was better than to cite unfaithfully the teſtimony of Scaliger. This could not be done with impunity at the bar; for there is not much more difference between falſe money and good, than between a witneſs who ſpeaks only upon hearſay, and another who has actually ſeen the thing. So that Scaliger, who was a witneſs merely on report, ought not to have been cited as an eye witneſs by Monſr. Jurieu. This diſpute between a Biſhop and a Miniſter, has given occaſion to divers Books publiſhed in Germany. A Divine of the confeſſion of Augſbourg undertook to maintain that the Biſhop of Meaux was in the wrong to deny, that there had been the word Myſterium upon the Pope's Mitre. He publiſhed a work divided into two parts, the former of which is intitled, Myſterium in Pontificis Romani coronâ apertum, and the ſecond Myſterium in coronâ Pontificis opertum & remotum. He has collected in the former all the proofs, which he could meet with; and in the latter he conſiders for what reaſon and in what manner the inſcription in queſtion was taken away. A Doctor of Philoſophy named John Lewis Hanneman attacked this Divine in a Book, which he publiſhed at Hambourg in 1698 under the title of Myſterium Papali coronæ adſcriptum non ens, ſeu Commentarius in caput XVII Apocalypſeos v. 5. quo demonſtratur Papali coronæ Myſterium nunquam fuiſſe inſcriptum. He has done two things: 1. He refutes all the reaſons of his antagoniſt. 2. He alledges divers proofs to ſhew, that there never was ſuch an inſcription upon the Pope's Mitre (41).

[R] A Jeſuit, who undertook to criticize upon our Druſius, only expoſed himſelf to juſt cenſure.] Father Garaſſe, having affirmed (42), that Charron wanted common ſenſe, in making ſuch ridiculous compariſons (43), adds that this put him in mind of three men very abſurd in their manner of acting: the firſt was the Emperor Heliogabalus, who . . . in the greateſt feaſts which he made, mixed horſe-dung with the beſt diſhes. . . The ſecond was the Emperor Alexander Severus . . . . who placed Jeſus Chriſt among the images of Apollonius Tyaneus, Orpheus, Abraham. . . . In ſhort, the third may be the Miniſter Druſius, who in his Centuries on the Holy Scriptures is as unhappy in his citation of Authors, as Charron in his Liſt of great Perſons; for he commonly quotes half a dozen Writers in this manner, Iſaiah c. 11, Plautus in his Amphitryo, St. Luke in the Acts of the Apoſtles, Ovid in his Book de Remedio Amoris, St. John Chryſoſtom in his Homilies on Geneſis, and Horace in his Book de Arte Poetica. I do not mean to ſay, that we ought out of too great ſtrictneſs to avoid quoting all profane Writers, and not to commend in the great men of the world the valuable qualities, which they have received from God; but what I cannot bear is, ſuch a ſtrange jumbling of perſons, as this, Socrates, Jeſus Chriſt, Papian, the Martyrs, St. John, Plautus, Jeremiah, Ariſtenetus, St. Auguſtin, and Ovid; for in theſe alternations, there is a want of judgment and ſome profaneneſs. It would be very eaſy to ſhew, that this Critic, who charges others ſo ſtrongly with want of judgment, ſays nothing here but what ſhews him to be defective in that point; but I ſhall only inſiſt on what relates to Druſius. The Critic upon him calls him Druſus, and makes him a Miniſter; which ſhews, that he did not know the name or profeſſion of the perſon, whom he criticizes upon; for Druſius was no Miniſter: and we have ſeen above (44), that he declared that he meddled with nothing but Grammar and Hiſtory, and left to others the doctrines of faith, and that he was no Divine. Monſr. Baillet (45) reports, that he was ſo confident of his own merit, that he gave himſelf the title of the divine Grammarian. I put this in the margin (46) in the firſt Edition of this Dictionary, and added, that I ſhould be glad to know where this particular is to be found. Monſr. de la Roque (47) was ſo kind as to write to me, that he had read it in the Tribæreſium of Serarius. Not having that Book, I have recourſe to conjectures: I imagine, that Serarius advanced this upon the credit of ſome adverſary of Druſius, and without any literal proof taken from the writings of that Author. However that be, we have ſeen (48), that Druſius declared publicly, that he did not know whether he could ſupport the character of a Grammarian, which he had been ſometimes reproached with; and that ſome people had denied that he could do it, whom he would not contradict. Here is a modeſty very oppoſite to that aſſurance mentioned by Monſr. Baillet. But to return to Father Garaſſe, his cenſure is worth nothing. It is poſſible that in one and the ſame chapter of Druſius we may meet with a quotation from a ſacred Writer preceded and followed by a quotation from a profane one, but not in the ridiculous order, of which this Jeſuit complains. Druſius's method is to be very conciſe upon every ſubject, and to join together things, which have an affinity with each other. Hence it is, that in one ſhort chapter he ſometimes explains three or four things; he ſhews upon each the conformity of the ſacred Writers with the Heathen Authors; it is neceſſary therefore, that after he has cited paſſages from Scripture, he ſhould quote Greek or Latin Writers, and that afterwards entering upon another ſubject, he ſhould again introduce paſſages of Scripture, and then a Poet, an Hiſtorian, &c. This conduct has nothing amiſs in it, and has been ignorantly and impertinently condemned by the Cenſurer.

(41) Extracted from the Utrecht Journal, Nov. and Dec. 1698, pag. 854, & ſeqq.

(42) Garaſſe, Somme Théologique, pag. 847, 848.

(43) That is, naming together Socrates, Phocion, Seneca, Regulus, JESUS CHRIST, the Martyrs.

(44) In the note [K] Quotation (27).

(45) Baillet, Jugem. des Savans, tom. 4. pag. 226.

(46) In the Note [K].

(47) De quo ſupra, COLOMIES, Quotat. (30).

(43) In the note [K] quotation (28).

DRUSUS, a Roman Family, a branch of the family of Livia, which, tho' Plebeian, had a ſhare in the higheſt poſts of the Commonwealth. It had enjoyed the Dictatorſhip, and and the office of Colonel-General of the Horſe. It poſſeſſed the Conſulſhip eight times, the Cenſorſhip twice, and had three times the honour of a triumph. It produced ſeveral perſons of great merit, and among others, Marcus Livius Salinator, and MARCUS LIVIUS DRUSUS. The latter had the ſurname of Druſus given him, becauſe he had kill'd Drauſus [A], the enemy's General (a). He is ſaid to have recovered from the Gauls the money which had been given to their Anceſtors, when they beſieged the Capital. If this be true, we muſt not believe the report, that Camillus had obliged them to reſtore it (b). We cannot better know when the firſt Druſus liv'd, than by recollecting that CAIUS LIVIUS DRUSUS, his ſon or grandſon, was Conſul with Scipio Africanus the younger, in the year 606 of Rome. The Emperor Tiberius was deſcended by adoption from the family of Druſus; for LIVIUS DRUSUS CLAUDIANUS his grandfather by the mother's ſide, one of the deſcendants of Appius the blind, was adopted by one Druſus (c). There is ſome probability that another Druſus adopted one of the family Scribonia, in which the ſurname of Libo was very common; for we find a MARCUS LIVIUS DRUSUS LIBO Conſul in 738, and a LUCIUS SCRIBONIUS LIBO DRUSUS Prætor, who killed himſelf to prevent the puniſhment which he feared, being accuſed of treaſon under Tiberius in the year 769 of Rome (d). We ſhall ſpeak a word of ſome of the deſcendants of the firſt DRUSUS [B] in the Remarks; but we ſhall give a diſtinct Article

(a) Taken from Sueton. in Tiber. cap. 3.

(b) Traditur etiam Proprætore ex Provincia Gallia retuliſſe aurum Senonibus olim in obſidione Capitolii datum, nec, ut fama, extortum à Camillo. Idem, ibid.

(c) Idem, ibid.

(d) Tacit. Annal. lib. 2. cap. 31.

[A] Marcus Livius . . . . had the ſurname of Druſus given him, becauſe he had killed Drauſus.] This has all the air of thoſe abſurd and fabulous Traditions, which are preſerved in ancient families, and which aſcribe the original of the firſt Name and of their Coat of Arms to ſome warlike action. If the branch of the family of Druſus had owed its name to the Exploit mentioned by Suetonius, we ſhould have known when and where this happened, and againſt what enemy; and Suetonius would not have ſpoken in ſo vague a manner as he has done. Druſus hoſtium duce Drauſo cominus trucidato ſibi poſteriſque ſuis cognomen invenit (1). i. e. "Druſus having killed Drauſus, the enemy's Gene-"neral, hand to hand, gained that ſurname to himſelf "and his deſcendants." Add to this, that he mentions one CLAUDIUS DRUSUS, who lived before the firſt Punic War (2); which proves that this ſurname was either known, before the firſt Druſus of the family Livia ſlew the pretended Drauſus, or at leaſt did not depend upon that combat. For who would venture to ſay, that becauſe one Livius defeated Drauſus, one Claudius was ſurnamed Druſus?

(1) Sueton. in Tiberio, cap. 3.

(2) For Suetonius places him before Claudius Pulcher, who was defeated in a ſea-fight in the firſt Punic War. The Commentators upon Suetonius ſay nothing of this Claudius Druſus.

[B] We ſhall ſpeak a word of ſome of the deſcendants of the firſt Druſus.] I believe that CAIUS LIVIUS DRUSUS, who was Conſul in 606, was deſcended from him; but I cannot ſay whether he was his ſon or his grandſon. He left a ſon named MARCUS LIVIUS DRUSUS, who was Conſul in 641, and fought with great ſucceſs againſt the Scordiſci, a people of Thrace, deſcended from the Gauls (3). We ſhall ſee below, whether he triumphed. He was Cenſor with Marcus Æmilius Scaurus, and died during his office (4). I am not of opinion, that we ought to diſtinguiſh him, as Glandorp has done (5), from that Marcus Livius Druſus, a man of wit and great eloquence, who was Tribune of the people with Caius Gracchus, and ſupported him in his attempts; but changing his party, maintained the Patrician intereſts with ſuch zeal, that he was ſtyled the Protector of the Senate (6). He was Abnepos of the firſt Druſus (7), and had a brother named CAIUS DRUSUS, who was very eminent for his eloquence (8). I perceive, that our Grammarians are not agreed upon the ſignification of Abnepos; for Monſr. Danet quoting Suetonius underſtands by this term great-grand ſon: in Calepin this term is taken for the ſon of the great-grand-ſon. It is even true that Suetonius (9) and many other ancient Authors do not obſerve exactly the degrees of kindred. We find mention made of one CAIUS DRUSUS, a great Civilian, who was ſo laborious, that tho' he was blind and very old, he had always his houſe full of people, who came to conſult him. C. autem Druſi domum compleri conſultoribus ſolitam accepimus, quum quorum res eſſet ſua ipſi non videbant cæcum adhibebant ducem (10). i. e. "I have been informed that Caius Druſus's Houſe "was full of thoſe, who conſulted him, and who not "ſeeing themſelves what was the ſtate of their own "caſe, made uſe of a blind man for their guide." Valerius Maximus ſpeaks very honourably of him. Conſimilis perſeverantiæ Livius Druſus qui ætatis viribus & acie oculorum defectus jus civile populo benigniſſime interpretatus eſt, utiliſſimaque diſcere id cupientibus monimenta compoſuit. Nam ut ſenem illum natura, cæcum fortuna facere potuit, ita neutra interpellare valuit ne non animo & videret & vigeret (11). i. e. "Li-"vius Druſus was an inſtance of the like perſeverance, "who labouring under the infirmities of old age, and "the want of ſight, very generouſly explained the "Civil Law to the people, and wrote Treatiſes of "greateſt uſe to thoſe, who were deſirous to learn "it. For tho' nature had it in her power to make "him old, and fortune to deprive him of ſight; "yet neither of them could cut him off from the "perſpicuity and vigour of his mind." A Commentator (13) imagined without foundation, that this Druſus was the father of him, who occaſioned ſo many diſorders, in order to obtain the Freedom of Rome for the Latins. He is miſtaken; for the father of the latter was named Marcus Livius, and not Caius Livius. He is the ſame, who was honoured with the title of Protector of the Senate. Another Commentator (13) is ſurprized, that Pomponius ſays nothing of the Caius Druſus the Civilian. There is reaſon indeed to be ſurprized at this, ſince that Civilian was an Author, and Celſus makes honourable mention of him in the Digeſt (14). The moderns are divided upon the queſtion, whether this Caius Druſus was the ſame who was Conſul in 606, or whether he was brother of the Conſul in 641. Rutilius embraces the latter opinion: others chooſing the former, confute him by the term accepimus, which Cicero makes uſe of. It is very probable, that Cicero ſpeaks of a man, whom he never ſaw; for he afterwards mentions another blind man, whom he might have ſeen, who gave his vote in the Senate, and anſwered thoſe, who conſulted him, and was engaged in writing an Hiſtory. Now it ſeems that Cicero might have ſeen Caius Livius Druſus, brother of him, who was Conſul in 641. It is probable therefore, that he ſpeaks of the Conſul of the year 606 (15).

(3) Livius, in Epit. lib. 63.

(4) Plutarch. in Quæſt. Rom. pag. 276.

(5) Glandorp. Onomaſt. Roman. pag. 543.

(6) Sueton. in Tiberio, cap. 3.

(7) Idem, ibid.

(8) Cicero, in Bruto, pag. m. 204.

(9) He calls Cæſar Avunculus of Auguſtus; and yet Cæſar was his great uncle. Suet. in Aug. cap. 7.

(10) Cicero, Tuſculan. lib. 5. folio m. 278. B.

(11) Val. Max. lib. 8. cap. 7. num. 4.

(12) Oliverius, in hunc locum Val. Maxim.

(13) Colerus.

(14) See Guil. Grotius, in Vitis Juriſconſult. pag. 33.

(15) See Guil. Grotius, ibid.

WHETHER Marcus Livius Druſus triumphed over the Scordiſci.

Let us ſee now, whether the Conſul of the year 641 triumphed over the Scordiſci. I am not of that opinion; for all the proof, which Sigonius alledges (16), is a paſſage of Pliny miſunderſtood. Here are Pliny's words (17). Frater ejus Allobrogicus primus omnium pondo mille habuit. At Livius Druſus in Tribunatu plebis XI (18). Nam propter quinque pondo notatum à Cenſoribus triumphalem ſenem (19), fabuloſum jam videtur. To underſtand theſe words rightly, we muſt obſerve, that Pliny here oppoſes the frugality of the former times to the luxury of the latter. He ſhews the ſteps, by which luxury advanced. Scipio Africanus left to his heir but ſixty four marks in ſilver plate (20). His brother Quintus Fabius Maximus Allobrogicus was the firſt, who had in plate to the value of two thouſand marks. But Livius Druſus, while he was Tribune of the people, had plate to the value of two and twenty thouſand marks (21); for, adds Pliny, we look upon it as a mere fable, that an old man, who had been honoured with a triumph, ſhould be animadverted upon by the Cenſors on account of the value of ten marks in plate. Nam propter quinque pondo notatum à Cenſoribus triumphalem ſenem, fabuloſum jam videtur. Thus it is, that in every Age one can ſcarce credit what

(16) In Faſtis.

(17) Plin. lib. 33. cap. 11. pag. m. 69.

(18) Father Hardouin puts X inſtead of XI.

(19) He ſhews this in lib. 18. cap. 6. Præcipiebant iſta qui triumphali denas argenti libras in ſupellectile crimini dabant.

(20) Libras 32 argenti Africanus ſequens hæredi reliquit. Plin. lib. 33. cap. 11. pag. 68.

(21) Or twenty thouſand, according to the correction of Father Hardouin.

Article for each of thoſe, who were the moſt eminent. Moreri deſerves correction in ſome points [C].

When luxury is grown to the height, the accounts of the antient frugality are treated as fabulous.

Hiſtories relate of the old times, when it appears too remote from the modern cuſtoms. Thus we may ſay, that Ladies of the firſt quality will conſider it as a romance or fable, when they are told, that formerly perſons of their rank walked on foot in the ſtreets, ſuckled their own children, and ſpent but ſo much every year in clothes. The ſtory, which according to Pliny then appeared fabulous, does not belong to that Livius Druſus, of whom he had juſt been ſpeaking. The ſtory is much more ancient. It was an act of the Cenſors office exerted in the year 478 againſt Cornelius Rufinus, who had been Dictator, and twice Conſul (22). The Cenſors degraded him from the dignity of a Senator on account of his luxury, becauſe they found ten pound weight of ſilver plate in his houſe. He might have had five pound weight; he was degraded therefore for the weight of five pounds: Propter quinque pondo notatum à Cenſoribus triumphalem ſenem. Valerius Maximus in relating this fact falls into the ſame reflection with Pliny. He is apprehenſive leſt he ſhould be look'd upon as a relator of fables; and he owns, that it is ſcarce credible, that the ſame city, which had ſo great a contempt for poverty, ſhould puniſh a man of conſular dignity for having ſilver plate to the value of twenty marks. Ipſæ medius fidius mihi literæ ſæculi noſtri obſtupeſcere videntur, cùm ad tantam ſeveritatem referendam miniſterium accommodare coguntur; ac vereri ne non noſtræ urbis acta commemorare exiſtimentur. Vix enim credibile eſt, intra idem pomœrium decem pondo argenti, & invidioſum fuiſſe cenſum, & inopiam haberi contemptiſſimam (23).

(22) Aulus Gellius, lib. 4. cap. 3. & lib. 17. cap. 21. Valer. Max. lib. 2. cap. 9. num. 4.

(23) Val. Max. ibid.

I am ſurprized, that Sigonius could miſunderſtand the Text of Pliny ſo groſly as he has done. Could he imagine, that after the year 641 of Rome, the antient frugality of the Commonwealth was ſo ſtrictly obſerved, that the value of nine or ten marks in ſilver plate was ſufficient to occaſion a Senator to be degraded? Things were not upon ſuch a foot then. Corruption and luxury had already ſpread in a dreadful manner. But might not Pliny's own words have ſet Sigonius right? They expreſly affirm, that Druſus was Tribune of the people, when he had ſuch a quantity of Plate; and immediately Pliny mentions the cenſure paſſed upon an old man, who had formerly obtained the honour of a triumph. It is evident therefore, that this old man was not Druſus; for if Druſus had been cenſured on account of luxury, he muſt have been ſo during his Tribuneſhip; or elſe Pliny muſt be charged with relating things in a very abſurd manner. Nevertheleſs it is ſcarce credible how much this paſſage of Pliny has miſled Writers (24).

(24) Plerique etiam hunc triumphaſſe volunt. Glandorp. Onomaſt. pag. 543.

[C] Moreri deſerves correction in ſome points.] He ſays, that the family of Druſus was a branch of that of the Claudii, and tho' Plebeian, was eminent for eight Conſulſhips . . . and illuſtrious on account of the great men, which it produced, among whom the principal were Salinator and Druſus. I omit all the defects in his ſtyle, and his faults of omiſſion, and content my ſelf with remarking: I. That the family of Druſus was a branch, not of the Claudii, but the Livii: II. That it was the family of the Livii, and not the particular branch of the Druſi, which was eminent for eight Conſulſhips, &c: III. That Salinator was not deſcended from the family of Druſus, except in the ſame manner, that the Houſe of Bourbon is deſcended of the Houſe of Burgundy. The latter expreſſion would not be ſuffered. Two ſtreams, which flow from the ſame ſource, do not therefore proceed one from the other.

DRUSUS (MARCUS LIVIUS), ſon of him who was the Collegue of Caius Gracchus in the Tribuneſhip of the people, and who merited the title of Protector of the Senate, imitated his Father in ſupporting the intereſts of the Patricians; but the manner in which he did it, occaſioned dreadful diſorders [A]. He had eminent qualifications, great eloquence, great wit, and great reſolution; and if he did not make a good uſe of them,

[A] The manner, in which he ſupported the intereſts of the Patricians, occaſioned dreadful diſorders.] It is not impoſſible, that the reaſon why Paterculus has taken his part ſo zealouſly, was his deſign to pay his Court to Tiberius, who was undoubtedly deſcended from our Druſus. But perhaps he only ſpake as the affair appeared to him. However that be, he aſcribes to him the beſt intentions imaginable, and laments that the Senate ſhould form ſo blind and unreaſonable a judgment of them. He expreſſes himſelf on this point with great eloquence, and this induces me to take the liberty of tranſcribing the whole paſſage, out of regard to thoſe, who without conſulting many Books are deſirous of ſeeing the conduct of a great man diſplayed. Tribunatum iniit Marcus Livius Druſus, vir nobiliſſimus, eloquentiſſimus, ſanctiſſimus, meliore in omnia ingenio, animoque, quàm fortuna uſus, qui, cùm Senatui priſcum reſtituere cuperet decus, & judicia ab equitibus ad eum transferre ordinem; (quippe, eam poteſtatem nacti equites Gracchanis legibus, cùm in multos clariſſimos, atque innocentiſſimos viros ſæviſſent, tum Publium Rutilium, virum non ſeculi ſui, ſed omnis ævi optimum, interrogatum lege repetundarum, maximo cum gemitu civitatis, damnaverant) in iis ipſis, quæ pro ſenatu moliebatur, ſenatum habuit adverſarium, non intelligentem, ſi qua de plebis commodis ab eo agerentur, veluti ineſcandæ, illiciendæque multitudinis cauſſâ fieri, ut minoribus perceptis, majora permitteret. Denique ea fortuna Druſi fuit, ut malefacta collegarum, quàm ejus optimè ab ipſo cogitata, ſenatus probaret magis; & honorem, qui ab eo deferebatur, ſperneret; injurias, quæ ab aliis intendebantur, æquo animo reciperet; & hujus ſummæ gloriæ invideret, illorum modicam ferret. Tum converſus Druſi animus, quando benè cœpta malè cedebant, ad dandam civitatem Italiæ: quod cùm moliens revertiſſet è foro, immenſâ illâ, & incognitâ, quæ eum ſemper comitabatur, cinctus multitudine, in atrio domus ſuæ cultello percuſſus, qui affixus lateri ejus relictus eſt, intra paucas horas deceſſit (1). i. e. "Marcus Livius "Druſus, a man of the higheſt quality, of great elo- "quence and integrity, but more happy in the en- "dowments of his mind, than his fortune, entered "the office of Tribune. He being deſirous of reſtor- "ing to the Senate its ancient grandeur, and to tranſ- "fer the offices of Judicature from the Knights to that "Order; (for the Knights having obtained that "power by the Laws of the Gracchi, exerted the ut- "moſt cruelty upon many men of high rank and ex- "emplary probity, and particularly upon Publius Ru- "tilius, the beſt man, not only of that, but of any "other Age, whom they condemned upon a charge "of Bribery, to the vaſt regret of the City;) he met "with oppoſition from the Senate in thoſe very mea- "ſures which he took for the intereſt of the Senate, "they not perceiving, that what he did for the ſer- "vice of the people, was only with a view to gain "their favour, and draw them in in ſuch a manner, that "by procuring ſmaller advantages, they might give "way in thoſe of more importance. In ſhort, ſuch "was the fate of Druſus, that the Senate approved "the ill conduct of his collegues more than his ex- "cellent deſigns, and rejected the honour offered by "him; received patiently the indignities offer'd them by "others, and envied his ſuperior glory, while they bore "with the moderate honours of others. Druſus ſeeing "the ill ſucceſs of his honeſt attempts, turned his "thoughts to procure the Freedom of the City for "all Italy; and being engaged in this deſign, as "he returned from the Forum, ſurrounded with that "infinite multitude of perſons unknown, which al- "ways attended him, he was ſtabbed in the porch of "his houſe with a knife, which was left ſticking in "his ſide, and he died within a few hours." The reader will have a better opinion of Paterculus's ſincerity, when he knows what were Salluſt's ſentiments of this Druſus; for which reaſon I ſhall give that Hiſtorian's

(1) Velleius Paterculus, lib. 2. cap. 13.

them, it was the fault of his exceſſive ambition, of which he gave proofs, even from his infancy [B]. The factions which divided the city, were that of the Senate, and that of the Knights [C]; the latter, beſides their raiſing the public monies, were poſſeſs'd of all the offices of Judicature (a), which had before belonged to the Senators. By this means they had, if I may ſo expreſs it, their foot upon the neck of the Senate. Druſus ſeeing Cepio his rival in the intereſts of the Knights [D], undertook to relieve and ſupport the cauſe of the Senate; and that he might not want creatures (b), he took meaſures to revive the laws of Gracchus concerning the diſtribution of the land among the people, and promiſed the freedom of Rome to the Latins. The Violence which he uſed towards Philippus the Conſul, who oppoſed thoſe laws, cannot be ſufficiently condemned [E]. The Promiſe which he had made to the Latins, was the ſource of a very terrible war, which was near proving fatal to the Roman People (c). He fell into a fainting fit in a public aſſembly; and whether this was real or counterfeit, he

(a) Paterculus, lib. 2. cap. 13. I quote his words in Remark [A].

(b) Florus, lib. 3. cap. 17.

(c) See Remark [D], quotation (8).

ſtorian's words. M. Livio Druſo ſemper conſilium fuit, in tribunatu ſumma ope niti pro nobilitate: neque ullam rem in principio agere intendit, niſi illi auctores fierent. Sed homines factioſi, quibus dolus, atque malitia, fide cariora erant, ubi intellexerunt, per unum hominem maximum beneficium multis mortalibus dari: videlicet & ſibi quiſque conſcius, malo atque infido animo eſſe, de M. Livio Druſo juxta, ac ſe, exiſtimaverunt (2). i. e. "M. Livius Druſus's deſign, while he was Tribune, was always to exert his utmoſt efforts in favour of the Patricians; and he intended at firſt to do nothing, but by their authority. But factious men, who valued fraud and malice more than integrity, finding that a very general benefit was likely to be procured by one man, and being every one of them conſcious of their own ill intentions, formed the ſame judgment of Druſus as they did of themſelves."

(2) Salluſt. Orat. 2. ad Cæſar. pag. m. 533, 534.

[B] He gave proofs of his exceſſive ambition even from his infancy.] Before he had aſſumed the Toga Virilis, and while he was under his guardians, he took upon him to ſollicit the Judges in favour of the accuſed, and did it with ſo much force and addreſs, that he extorted more than once the ſentences which they gave. Had not he a great deal of reaſon to ſay, that he was the only perſon for whom no holyday had ever been made? Thoſe who begin ſo early to diſtinguiſh themſelves, deſerve to be feared. Let us hear Seneca. Exſecratus inquietam à primordiis vitam, dicitur dixiſſe, Uni ſibi, nec puero quidem, unquam ferias contigiſſe. Auſus enim & pupillus adhuc & prætextatus, judicibus reos commendare, & gratiam ſuam foro interponere tam efficaciter, ut quædam judicia conſtet ab illo rapta. Quo non irrumperet tam immatura ambitio? ſcires in malum ingens, & privatum, & publicum, evaſuram illam tam præcoquem audaciam. Sero itaque querebatur, nullas ſibi ferias contigiſſe: à puero ſeditioſus, & foro gravis (3). i. e. "He curſing his manner of life, "which had been reſtleſs from the beginning, is reported to have ſaid, that he alone, even when a "boy, had never enjoyed a holyday. For while he "was a Minor, and before he took the Toga Virilis, he "ventured to recommend thoſe who were accuſed, to "the Judges, and to interpoſe by his intereſt in the "Forum ſo effectually, that it is certain ſome ſentences "were extorted by him. To what pitch would not "ſo early an ambition proceed? One might determine, "that ſo early an aſſurance would prove of fatal conſequence to the public and private happineſs. He "complained therefore too late, that he had never enjoyed any holydays, ſince he was ſeditious and turbulent in the Forum while a boy." What he did in Aſia during his Queſtorſhip is mentioned as an inſtance of his pride. He exerciſed that office without inveſting himſelf with the exterior ornaments of it, reſolving to diſtinguiſh himſelf only by his perſon. The Latin expreſſes my ſenſe much better. Quæſtor in Aſia nullis inſignibus uti voluit, ne quid ipſo eſſet inſignius (4). A learned man (5) finds it difficult to believe that Druſus had this office, and that of Ædile (6). His reaſon is, that he died in the Tribuneſhip of the people, an office which the Romans generally exerciſed before they were Ædiles. But perhaps Druſus finding it neceſſary to be Tribune, in order to execute his deſigns, procured this office for the ſecond time the ſame year in which he died.

(3) Seneca, de Brevitate Vitæ, cap. 6.

(4) Aurel. Victor, de Viris illuſtribus.

(5) Corradus, in Brutum Ciceronis, pag. 332.

(6) Ædilis munus magnificentiſſimum dedit. Aurel. Victor. de Viris illuſtribus.

[C] The Factions which divided the City, were that of the Senate, and that of the Knights.] The paſſage of Paterculus ſhews us that the Gracchi had deprived the Senators of all the Tribunals of Juſtice, in order to gratify the Knights. Let us ſee how Florus confirms this (7). Judiciaria lege Caij Gracchi diviſerant populum Romanum, & bicipitem ex una fecerant civitatem equites Romani, tanta poteſtate ſubnixi, ut qui fata fortunaſque patrum vitaſque principum haberent in manu, interceptis vectigalibus peculantur ſuo jure rempublicam. i. e. "By the Judiciary "Law of Caius Gracchus, the Roman Knights had "divided the Roman People, and made two heads to "the city from one; being ſupported by ſuch a power, "that they had the lives and fortunes of the Patricians "in their hands, and by ſeizing the revenues plunder'd "the Commonwealth as they thought proper.

(7) Lib. 3, cap. 17.

[D] Druſus ſeeing that Cepio his rival ſupported the cauſe of the Knights.] The rivalſhip of theſe two Romans, which occaſioned ſo many diſorders, and almoſt ruined the Commonwealth, aroſe from a mere trifle. A ring ſold at an auction was the occaſion of their diviſions (8): they bid upon each other, and piqued each other in ſuch a manner, that they ſought afterwards all opportunities of croſſing one another. This confirms what many perſons have obſerved, that great revolutions of ſtate are generally occaſioned by the fancy or fooliſh caprice of ſome particular perſons (9). I cannot tell whether the inſtance which we have here before us, has ever been taken notice of. Paterculus in vain affirms, that Druſus acted out of zeal for the intereſts of the Senate, whoſe power he was deſirous of reſtoring; we ſhould rather believe thoſe, who ſay that he eſpouſed this party, becauſe he ſaw Cepio at the head of the contrary party. In hoc ſtatu rerum pares opibus, animis, dignitate (unde & nata Livio Druſo æmulatio acceſſerat) equitem Servilius Cæpio, Senatum Livius Druſus aſſerere (10). i. e. "In this ſtate of "affairs Servilius Cepio aſſerted the cauſe of the "Knights, Livius Druſus that of the Senate, being both "of them equal in riches, reſolution and dignity; whence a ſpirit of emulation was raiſed in Livius Druſus.

(8) Inter Cæpionem & Druſum ex annulo in auctione venali inimicitiæ cœpere: unde origo ſocialis belli & exitia rerum. Plinius, lib. 33. cap. 1. p. m. 12, 13. This War coſt the lives of above three hundred thouſand men. Paterculus, lib. 2. cap. 15. See Florus, lib. 3. cap. 18.

(9) See Penſées diverſes ſur les Cometes, num. 236.

(10) Florus, lib. 3. cap. 18.

[E] The violence which he uſed towards Philippus the Conſul cannot be ſufficiently condemn'd.] That Conſul's dignity was ſo little regarded, that his throat was ſqueezed, till the blood was ſeen to come out of his eyes and mouth. Some ſay that Druſus himſelf committed this act of violence, and that he was ſo far from relenting at the ſight of the blood, that it gave him a new occaſion to inſult him; he ſaid, that it was not blood, but the ſauce of thruſhes; by which expreſſion he reproached Philip with his gluttony. Philippo Conſuli legibus agrariis reſiſtenti ita collum in comitio obtorſit, ut multus ſanguis effluëret è naribus, quem ille luxuriam obprobrans muriam de turdis eſſe dicebat (11). Others ſay, that Druſus procured this act of violence to be done by one of his creatures, or by one of his officers. Quæ (Senatus Majeſtas) à M. quoque Druſo trib. plebis per ſummam contumeliam vexata eſt. Parvi enim habuit, L. Philippum Conſulem, quia interfari concionantem auſus fuerat, obtorta gula, & quidem non per viatorem, ſed per clientem ſuum, adeo violenter in carcere præcipitem egiſſe, ut multus è naribus ejus cruor profunderetur (12). i. e. "The majeſty of the Senate was violated alſo in a very contemptuous manner by Marcus Druſus Tribune "of the People. For he did not ſcruple to order L. "Philippus the Conſul, who ventured to interrupt him "when he was in his ſpeech, to be ſeized by the "throat,

(11) Aurel. Victor, de Viris illuſtribus. In the Valer. Maximus Variorum printed in Holland, pag. 778. in quoting this paſſage, we read in convivio, and not, in comitio; which is abſurd.

(12) Val. Max. lib. 9. cap. 5. num. 2.

he made advantages many ways of that accident [F]. The reputation which he had gained, did not hinder him from being himself extremely embarrassed with the State to which he had reduced affairs [G]; upon which account every body thought he was kill'd very seasonably in the court of his own house [H], as he return'd from the city surrounded " throat, and draged to prison, not by a public officer, " but by one of his clients; and this in so violent a " manner, that the blood ran plentifully from his " nostrils." This is Valerius Maximus's account, and here is what Florus says. Ausus tamen obrogare de legibus Consul Philippus, sed apprehensum faucibus viator non ante dimisit, quam sanguis in ora & oculos redundaret (13). i. e. " However Philippus the Consul ven- " tured to oppose these laws, but being seized by the " throat by one of the officers, was not permitted to " depart till the blood flowed out of his mouth and " eyes."

(13) Florus, lib. 3. cap. 18.

[F] He made advantage many ways of this swooning.] He had procured all his laws to be passed, except that which related to the freedom of the Latins. They called upon him for his promise, and he knew not what to do, either to amuse them, or give them satisfaction. He fell down suddenly in the Assembly, and this was a just reason for putting them off till another opportunity. Livius anxius ut Latinorum postulata differret, qui promissam civitatem flagitabant, repente in publico concidit, sive morbo comitali, seu hausto caprino sanguine, semianimis domum relatus (14). i. e. " Livius being sollicitous how to delay the de- " mands of the Latins, who required the freedom of " the city, which he had promised, of a sudden fell " down in the Assembly, either of a fit of falling- " sickness, or having drank goat's blood; and was " carried home half dead." It is evident, that the Historian, from whom I have quoted this Latin, has committed an error; the disjunctive particle sive employed by him, makes him say an absurd thing; for if Drusus fell down suddenly, in order to defer the demand of the Latins till another time, it cannot be said that he fell down, either thro' the falling-sickness, or because he had drank goat's blood. A real fit of the falling-sickness is not in our power, and consequently one cannot direct it to a certain end. The other part of the disjunctive proposition is right; for one may take a drug with a design to fall into a swoon three or four hours after. The truth is, that the Authors of Abridgments, endeavouring to draw several different accounts into one period, give us frequently a mere heap of nonsense. Aurelius Victor having heard that Drusus fell down in a fit of the falling-sickness, and that he had drank goat's blood, in order that becoming pale he might complain with the more probability of being poisoned by Cepio (15), endeavoured to join these two things together, but without success. I can easily believe, that Drusus and his partisans would take advantage of the fainting fit, to cast an odium upon the Consul Philippus, as suspected of poisoning his adversary; for what pretences are not made use of in a State-Faction, to supplant an antagonist? This is sufficient to explain the text of this Remark. I have only to observe, that we find in Pliny a curious fact relating to the falling-sickness of Drusus (16).

(14) Aurel. Victor, de Viris illustribus.

(15) Drusus Tribunus plebis traditur caprinum (sanguinem) bibisse, cum pallore & invidia veneni sibi dati insimulare Q. Cæpionem inimicum vellet. Plin. lib. 28. cap. 9. pag. 608.

(16) Drusum quoque apud nos Tribunorum popularium clarissimum (cui ante omnes plebs flans plausit, optimates vero bellum Marsicum imputavere) constat hoc medicamento (elleboro) liberatum comitiali morbo in Anticyra insula. Plin. lib. 25. cap. 5. pag. 391. See Aulus Gellius, lib. 17. cap. 15.

[G] The reputation which he had gained, did not hinder him from being extremely embarrassed with the State, to which he had reduced affairs.] He thought that all sorts of people were obliged to him, and yet the greatest part of them complained of him. He had procured the lands to be given to the people: those to whom they fell were contented; but those who were dispossessed complained. He had obtained for the order of the Knights a power of being admitted into the senatorial rank; those who were chosen for that honour, were well satisfied; but those who had no share in the election, were uneasy. He had restored the Tribunals to the Senate. This pleased that body; but on the other hand they were dissatisfied to see the Patricians and Knights mixed together in the Senate. This threw Drusus into great perplexity. Aurelius Victor expresses this in fewer words (17). Idem ex gratia nimia in invidiam venit. Nam plebs acceptis agris gaudebat, expulsi dolebant: equites in Senatum lecti lætabantur, sed præteriti querebantur: Senatus permissis judiciis exsultabat, sed societatem cum equitibus ægre ferebat. Unde Livius anxius, &c. (18). Mademoiselle le Fevre has made a note on these words, Equites in Senatum lecti lætabantur. She says in that Note, that this passage is extremely suspected by her, and that she cannot believe that the Knights were pleased to see the jurisdictions, which they had been sole masters of, divided between the Senate and them. Hoc certe valde suspectum est, neque adduci possum ut credam equites quæ judicia ipsi possidebant ea ad Senatum æqua parte transmissa libenter vidisse (19). I am of the same opinion with her, that this was not the ground of their joy; but I take the liberty to observe to her, that this is also not what Aurelius Victor says. He does not speak of the general joy of the Knights, but of the particular joy of those, who were advanced to the senatorial rank. With regard to the latter, it is easy to conceive, that the change of their condition was agreeable to them; the gain of the Senate was theirs, and they lost nothing by the diminution of the Order of the Knights, since they were no longer of it.

(17) Aurel. Victor, de Viris illustribus.

(18) See Seneca's words in the following Remark.

(19) Anna Tanaquilli Fabri filia, Not. in Aurel. Victor. pag. 87.

[H] It was thought that he was killed very seasonably in the court of his own house.] Seneca informs us of this. Livius Drusus, says he (20), vir acer & vehemens, cum leges novas & mala Gracchana movisset, stipatus ingenti totius Italiæ cœtu, exitum rerum non providens, quas nec agere licebat, nec jam liberum erat semel inchoatas relinquere, exsecratus inquietam à primordiis vitam dicitur dixisse, Uni sibi, nec puero quidem unquam ferias contigisse. . . . Disputatur an ipse sibi manus attulerit, subito enim vulnere per inguen accepto, collapsus est: aliquo dubitante, an mors voluntaria esset; nullo, an tempestiva. i. e. " Livius Drusus, a " man of great resolution and vehemence, when he " attempted to introduce new Laws, and revived the " ill designs of the Gracchi, being surrounded with " a vast multitude from all parts of Italy, not fore- " seeing the event of the schemes, which he could " neither execute, nor leave, when he had once be- " gun them; cursing his manner of life which had " been restless from the beginning, is reported to " have said, that he alone, even when a boy, had " never enjoyed any holydays. . . It is disputed whe- " ther he killed himself, for having suddenly received a " wound in the groin, he fell down; some doubting " whether his death was voluntary, none whether it was " seasonable." Florus's reflection is not unlike this (21). Sic per vim latæ, jussæque leges: sed pretium rogationis statim socii flagitavere, quum interim imparem Drusum, ægrumque rerum temere motarum, matura, ut in tali discrimine, mors absolvit. i. e. " Thus the " laws were passed and enacted by force; but the allies " immediately required the reward of their votes, " while in the mean time, death, very seasonable in " such a perplexity, cut off Drusus, unequal to the " execution of that design, and weary of the confu- " sion which he had rashly occasioned." The perplexity of Drusus must be so much the greater, as besides his seeing no opportunity of procuring for the Latins what he had promised, he found himself accused of a conspiracy with them against Philippus the Consul. The accusation was founded upon his having advised the Consul to take care of himself. It was concluded from thence, that he knew of their designs. Cum Latini Consulem in Albano monte interfecturi essent, Philippum admonuit ut caveret, unde in Senatu accusatus cum domum se reciperet, immisso inter turbam percussore corruit (22). i. e. " When the " Latins had concerted a scheme for killing the " Consul upon the Albanian Mount, he advised Phi- " lippus to take care of himself, upon which being " accused in the Senate, as he returned home, he " was wounded by an assassin mixed among the crowd, " and fell down dead." Mademoiselle le Fevre has made a false note, in my opinion, upon these words of Aurelius Victor. She begins with quoting Florus (23), who says, Primum fuit belli in Albano monte consilium, ut festo die Latinarum Julius Cæsar & Martius Philippus Consules inter sacra & aras immolarentur. Postquam id nefas proditione discussum est, &c. i. e. " The first opening of the war was designed to " be

(20) Seneca, de Brevitate Vitæ, cap. 6. pag. 700, 701.

(21) Lib. 3. cap. 17.

(22) Aurel. Victor, de Viris illustribus.

(23) Lib. 3. cap. 18.

rounded according to cuſtom, with a prodigious number of people (d); part of whom were not known to him. No information was given againſt the aſſaſſin [I], and moſt writers ſay he was not known. Cicero I think, is the only one who names him [K]. Cornelia, the Mother of Druſus, ſhewed a great firmneſs of mind upon this occaſion [L]. His laſt words as he was dying were no leſs preſumptuous [M], than thoſe, which he had formerly made uſe of, to expreſs the ſervices which he had done [N]. The anſwer which he gave to an Architect, has been much ſpoken of [O]. His (d) Patercul. lib. 2. cap. 12. Appian, lib. 1. Belli Civil. ſays that Druſus durſt not any longer go abroad, and that the multitude, who were for him, came to his houſe.

" be in the Albanian Mount, where Julius Cæſar and " Martius Philippus the Conſuls were determined to " be ſacrificed among the altars upon a feaſt of the " Latins. After this wicked deſign was diſcovered &c." And afterwards ſhe ſays, that Druſus, who had been killed the year before, could not inform Philippus of this: Sed tunc Philippum admonere non potuit Druſus, quem anno ſuperiori mortuum tabulæ notant. It is certain, that Druſus might give the information to Philippus; for according to Florus, the conſpiracy of the Latins was to have been executed under the Conſulſhip of Julius Cæſar and Martius Philippus, ſince their deſign was to have cut off both theſe Conſuls. Druſus, I own, was aſſaſſinated under that Conſulſhip, that is, in the year 662 of Rome; but he lived ſeveral months of that year, as appears from the violence, which he offered to the Conſul Philippus (24). That which might deceive Mademoiſelle le Fevre, was, that ſhe thought that the black conſpiracy, which Florus mentions, relates to the firſt year of the ſocial war. Upon this foot Druſus could not poſſibly give any information to any perſon; for the commencement of that war relates to the year 663, and the Conſulſhip of Julius Cæſar and P. Rutilius (25). The conſpiracy of the Latins ſhould be placed under the former year, ſince it was concerted againſt Martius Philippus and Sextus (26) Julius Cæſar his Collegue, as Florus obſerves. It is certain, that the Latins were big with the war during the life of Druſus (27): he might therefore be living, when they reſolved to kill the Conſul Philippus during the celebration of the Latin Feaſts.

(24) See the Remark [E].

(25) Patercul. lib. 2. cap. 15.

(26) Florus does not give him this Prænomen, nor any other.

(27) Mors Druſi jam pridem tumeſcens bellum excitavit Italicum. Paterculus, lib. 2. cap. 15.

[I] No information was made againſt the aſſaſſin.] Domi ſuæ nobiliſſimus vir, Senatus propugnator, atque illis quidem temporibus pene patronus. . . . Tribunus plebis M. Druſus occiſus eſt. Nihil de ejus morte populus conſultus, nulla quæſtio decreta à Senatu eſt (28). i. e. " M. Druſus, a man of the higheſt rank, the Protector of the Senate, and at the time almoſt the ſupport of it, and tribune of the people, was killed " at his own houſe. The people was not at all conſulted concerning his death, nor any enquiry appointed by the Senate."

(28) Cicero, pro Milone.

[K] Cicero, I think, is the only Writer, who names the aſſaſſin.] It is in his IIId Book of the nature of the Gods. Cur Sodalis meus (29) interfectus domi ſuæ Druſus? i. e. " Why was my companion Druſus " killed in his own houſe?" This is an objection of the Pontiff Cotta againſt Divine Providence. A little after he ſuppoſes that an anſwer is made to him, and he replies, Summo cruciatu ſupplicioque Varius homo importuniſſimus periit, quia Druſum ferro, Metellum veneno ſuſtulerat (30). Sed illos conſervari melius fuit, quam pœnas ſceleris Varium pendere. i. e. " Varius, a man of a " moſt abandoned character, was put to death in " the moſt painful manner becauſe he had killed " Druſus with a ſword, and Metellus with poiſon. " But it would have been much better, that they " ſhould have been preſerved, than that Varius ſhould " ſuffer the puniſhment due to his crimes." Velleius Paterculus, Florus, Appian, Aurelius Victor, &c. only mention that he was killed; and we have ſeen, that according to Seneca it was abſolutely certain, that he did not kill himſelf. The Conſul Philippus and Cepio were ſuſpected of having ſuborned the aſſaſſin (31). The death of Druſus was the deſtruction of the laws, which he had eſtabliſhed with ſo much pains; for they were all abrogated under pretence, that they had been eſtabliſhed againſt the auſpices (32).

(29) Cotta ſtyles him ſo, becauſe Druſus, as Cicero aſſerts in Orat. ad Pontific. fol. 180, A. had been of the College of Pontiffs. If Father Leſcalopier had known this paſſage, he would not have ſpoken of this with an opinor in his Commentary in Lib. III. de Naturâ Deorum, pag. 677.

(30) Thus this word ought to be placed, and not as in the editions after it. See Freinſhemius on Florus, lib. 3. cap. 17.

(31) Invidia cædis apud Philippum & Cæpionem fuit. Aurel. Victor, de Viris illuſtribus.

(32) Aſcon. Pedianus, in Orat. Ciceronis pro C. Cornelio, pag. m. 131, 132.

[L] Cornelia, the mother of Druſus, ſhewed a great firmneſs of mind upon this occaſion.] I believe that nobody would have known any thing of it now, if Seneca had not mentioned it. Cornelia, ſays he (33), Livium Druſum, clariſſimum juvenem, illuſtris ingenii, vadentem per Gracchana veſtigia, imperfectis tot rogationibus, intra penates interemptum ſuos amiſerat, incerto cædis auctore: tamen & acerbam mortem filii, & inultam, tam magno animo tulit, quam ipſe leges tulerat. i. e. " Cornelia loſt Livius Druſus, a youth of great " reputation, and noble genius, who was purſuing " the ſteps of the Gracchi, and was killed within " his own walls, before he had paſſed ſeveral laws, " which he had propoſed; but ſhe bore the melancholy death of her ſon, tho' unrevenged, with as " great reſolution as he had exerted in enacting his " Laws."

(33) Seneca, de Conſolat. ad Martiam, cap. 16. pag. 750.

[M] His laſt words were no leſs preſumptuous.] When, ſays he, will the Commonwealth have a citizen like me? It will be better to ſee this in Latin (34). Sed cum ultimum redderet ſpiritum intuens circumſtantium mœrentiumque frequentiam, effudit vocem convenientiſſimam conſcientiæ ſuæ, & quando, inquit, propinqui amicique, ſimilem mei civem habebit reſpublica? i. e. " But when he was juſt expiring, looking upon " the company, who ſtood round him lamenting, he " uttered theſe expreſſions, which were very ſuitable to " the conſciouſneſs he had of himſelf; When, ſays he, " O my relations and friends, will the Commonwealth " have a citizen like me?"

(34) Paterculus, lib. 2. cap. 14.

[N] . . . . Than thoſe, which he had made uſe of to expreſs the ſervices, which he had done.] I have obſerved in the remark [G], that he thought that the whole body of the Commonwealth, the Patricians, Knights, and People, were greatly obliged to him. Several Writers report, that he boaſted, that unleſs preſents were made of heaven or of dirt, no perſon could poſſibly ſurpaſs him in the profuſions, which he had made. Extat vox ipſius, nihil ſe ad largitionem ulli reliquiſſe, niſi ſi quis aut cœnum dividere vellet, aut cœlum (35). This was putting himſelf above exception and all compariſon; for no body would ever think of diſplaying his magnificence by preſents of dirt; and it was not poſſible for Druſus to imagine, that the time would ever come, when the great men of Rome would diſtribute the places in Paradiſe, and make a lottery of Heaven (36); and even if he had foreſeen this he need not have recanted, for he would have foreſeen not a free-gift, but a mere ſale.

(35) Florus, lib. 3. cap. 17. Cicero, Orat. pro Rabirio, cap. 7.

[O] The Anſwer, which he made to an Architect, has been much ſpoken of.] It is a beautiful one. He was promiſed, that the apartments of his houſe ſhould be diſpoſed in ſuch a manner, that no body ſhould be able to overlook him. Rather, ſaid he to the Architect, take care, that every body may be witneſs of whatever I do at my houſe. Cùm ædificaret domum in palatio in eo loco, ubi eſt, quæ quondam Ciceronis, mox Cenſorini fuit, nunc Statilii Siſennæ eſt; promitteretque ei architectus, ita ſe eam ædificaturum, uti libera à conſpectu, immunis ab omnibus arbitris eſſet, neque quiſquam in eam deſpicere poſſet: Tu verò, inquit, ſi quid intus artis eſt, ita compone domum meam, ut, quidquid agam, ab omnibus perſpici poſſit (37). i. e. " While he was " building an houſe in the Palatium in that place, " where Cicero's and afterwards Cenſorinus's ſtood, " and Statilius Siſenna's now ſtands, and the Architect promiſed him to build it in ſuch a manner, " that it ſhould be entirely free from being overlooked, and that no perſon ſhould be able to ſee into it; " he anſwered, But do you exert all your art in building my houſe in ſuch a manner, that whatever I " do may be ſeen by every body." Eraſmus (38) relates the ſtory, as if part of the houſe was then actually expoſed to the inconvenience of being overlooked, and the Architect had promiſed to remedy this for the ſum of five talents. Druſus's Anſwer, according to Eraſmus, was thus: I will give thee ten, if thou wilt diſpoſe my houſe ſo, that whatever is done in all parts of it may be ſeen by every body. Eraſmus calls this Druſus Julius Druſus Publicola: the firſt of theſe words is an error, and the laſt is ſo too; and proceeded from not knowing that Δημαγωγος ought to be tranſlated Tribune of the People, or rather Favourite of the People.

(36) Venalia nobis Templa, Sacerdotes, altaria, ſacra, coronæ, Ignis, thura, preces, cœlum eſt venale, Deuſque. Baptiſta Mantuanus, de Calamit. ſuor. temporum, lib. 3.

(37) Paterc. lib. 2. cap. 14.

(38) Eraſm. Apophth. lib. 6. pag. m. 491.

His ſiſter Livia was mother of Cato of Utica [P].

DRUSUS (NERO (a) CLAUDIUS), brother of Tiberius, was deſcended by his father's and mother's ſide from Appius Claudius the blind [A]. He was a man of great merit: to ſpeak more properly, he was one of the greateſt men, whom the Roman Commonwealth ever produced [B]; a thunderbolt of war, very capable of managing the affairs of the cabinet, who in the higheſt fortune, and poſſeſſed of all the glory, which a man of his rank and age could obtain, preſerved a ſurprizing modeſty, civility, and integrity.

(a) Sueton. in Claud. cap. 1.

[A] He was deſcended both by the father's and mother's ſide from Appius Claudius the Blind.] Appius Claudius the Blind left among other children two ſons, one of whom was named Tiberius Nero (1). From him was deſcended the father of the Emperor Tiberius. The other was named Appius Pulcher. From him was deſcended Livia the mother of that Emperor. The father of that Livia, who was the adopted ſon of Livius Druſus, took the name of Livius Druſus Claudianus. He followed the republican party, and would not be obliged for his life to Octavius and Marc Anthony, but killed himſelf in his tent, when they gained the battle at Philippi (2). I cannot tell whether he left any children beſides Livia, and I believe, that her adopted father had no natural children (3). All the males therefore of the Druſian Branch, both natural and adopted, ended in the perſon of Livius Druſus Claudianus, father of Livia; and this was probably the reaſon why Livia revived the ſurname of Druſus by giving it to her ſecond ſon, while the eldeſt bore the name of his father; for every one knows, that Livia, before her marriage with Auguſtus, was married to Tiberius Nero. He was a man, who had been of both parties. He was Queſtor under Julius Cæſar during the Alexandrian War, and commanded the Fleet with ſo much conduct, that he greatly contributed to the victory. Cæſar was not ungrateful; he made him Pontiff in the room of Scipio, and gave him a Commiſſion to conduct into Gaul the Colonies of Arles, Narbonne, and ſeveral others. After Cæſar's death our Tiberius gave his vote for decreeing rewards to the conſpirators. Cunctis turbarum metu abolitionem facti decernentibus, etiam de præmiis tyrannicidarum referendum cenſuit (4). He was afterwards Prætor, and joined with the party of Marc Anthony, when the Triumviri had a conteſt with each other. He attended Lucius Anthony the Conſul, brother to the Triumvir, to Perugia, and was the only perſon, who would not ſurrender. He eſcaped firſt to Præneſte, and afterwards to Naples, and not being able to engage the ſlaves by promiſe of liberty to take arms, went over to Sicily. He was diſpleaſed that Sextus Pompey would not immediately admit him to an audience, with the Enſigns of the Prætorſhip; and therefore abandoned him, and went to Marc Anthony in Achaia. Peace being made he returned to Rome, and reſigned his wife Livia to Auguſtus. He had by her a ſon, who was the Emperor Tiberius (5), and he had another three months after Auguſtus married her; this was Druſus, who is the ſubject of this article. Thoſe who were fond of ſcandal, were very pleaſant upon Livia's lying in ſo ſoon. They pretended that Auguſtus was the real father of the child. Livia, cum Auguſto gravida nupſiſſet, intra menſem tertium peperit: fuitque ſuſpicio, ex vitrico per adulterii conſuetudinem procreatum. Statim certe vulgatus eſt Verſus:

Τῷ εὐτυχῆσι γὴ τρίμηνα παιδία (6).

i. e. "Livia having married Auguſtus, while ſhe was "big with child, lay in of a ſon within three months "after; and it was ſuſpected, that his father-in-"law got him in adultery. It is certain that this "verſe was immediately ſpread about:

"Great men have ſons at the end of three months."

But as we are not to depend upon ſuch ſtories with regard to genealogical matters, I here mention Livia's firſt huſband, Tiberius Nero, as the father of our Druſus. The Emperor ſent to him the new-born infant, and noted down in his Diary this act of diligence. Livia's firſt huſband died ſoon after, and left by will his two ſons under the Guardianſhip of Auguſtus (7).

I cannot but obſerve here an error of Monſ. Dacier. He ſays (8), that Druſus and Tiberius were deſcended from the two Conſuls, who defeated Aſdrubal. On the father's ſide, continues he, they were deſcended from Claudius Nero, and on the mother's from Livius Salinator. It is certain, as I have already obſerved upon the credit of Suetonius, that they were equally deſcended from Appius Claudius the Blind, as well by the mother's as the father's ſide (9). It is true, that their mother's father was adopted into the family Livia; but he did not enter into the branch of Livius Salinator, but into that of Livius Druſus. All the deſcendants of Salinator took this ſurname, and never that of Druſus.

[B] He was one of the greateſt men, which the Roman Commonwealth ever produced.] Here is his elogium in Latin: it comes from the pen of Paterculus, and ought not to be ſuſpected, tho' the Hiſtorian flatters Tiberius without any bounds. Cura deinde, atque onus Germanici belli delegata Druſo Claudio, fratri Neronis, adoleſcenti tot tantarumque virtutum, quot & quantas natura mortalis recipit, vel induſtria percipit; cujus ingenium utrum bellicis magis operibus, an civilibus ſuffecerit artibus, in incerto eſt. Morum certè dulcedo ac ſuavitas, & adverſus amicos æqua ac par ſui æſtimatio inimitabilis fuiſſe dicitur. Nam pulchritudo corporis proxima fraternæ fuit. Sed illum, magna ex parte domitorem Germaniæ, plurimo ejus gentis variis in locis profuſo ſanguine, fatorum iniquitas, conſulem, agentem annum triceſimum, rapuit (10). i. e. "The "care and burthen of the German War was after-"wards committed to Druſus Claudius, the brother "of Nero, a youth of as many great virtues, as hu-"man nature is capable of, or human induſtry can "attain. It is doubtful, whether his genius qualified "him more for war, or the management of civil af-"fairs. The ſweetneſs of his temper, and his love "for his friends equal to that of himſelf, were ini-"mitable. The gracefulneſs of his perſon approach-"ed neareſt to that of his brother. But he, after he "had ſubdued the greateſt part of Germany, and "ſhed great quantities of the blood of that Nation in "divers places, was cut off by the cruelty of the fates, "during his Conſulſhip, when he was in the thirtieth "year of his age." What induces me to think, that Paterculus does not flatter Druſus in order to make his court, is, that he might aſſure himſelf, that Tiberius would never have proſecuted him under the pretext of Druſus's Elogium not being magnificent enough; ſince that Emperor could not ſee without regret the flouriſhing ſtate of his brother. This was placed among the misfortunes of his youth. Caſus prima ab infantia ancipites: nam proſcriptum patrem exſul ſecutus; ubi domum Auguſti privignus introiit multis æmulis conflictatus eſt, dum Marcellus & Agrippa, mox Cajus Luciuſque Cæſares viguere, etiam frater ejus Druſus proſperiore civium amore erat (11). i. e. "The ſeries of his life from his infancy was ex-"poſed to many misfortunes: for he followed his "father, when he was proſcribed, into baniſhment; "when he enter'd into Auguſtus's family, as his ſon-"in-law, he had many rivals to contend with, while "Marcellus

(1) Sueton. in Tiberio, cap. 3.

(2) Paterc. lib. 2. cap. 71.

(3) I uſe this word in the ſenſe of the Latin Writers, who do not oppoſe it, as we do, to legitimate, but to adopted children.

(4) Sueton. in Tiberio, cap. 4.

(5) Sueton. in Tiberio, cap. 4.

(6) Sueton. in Claudio, cap. 1. See likewiſe Dion Caſſius, lib. 48. ad ann. 716.

(7) Dio, ibid.

(8) Remarques ſur la IV Ode du Livre IV d'Horace, pag. m. 127. [M. Dacier has rectified this in his 3d edit. printed at Paris in 1709. ADD. de l'Ed. d'Amſt.]

(9) Tacit. Annal. lib. 5. cap. 1. confirms this. Pater ei Nero, ſays he ſpeaking of Tiberius, & utrimque origo gentis Claudiæ, quanquam mater in Liviam & mox Juliam familiam adoptionibus tranſierit.

(10) Paterc. lib. 2. cap. 97.

(11) Tacit. Annal. lib. 6. cap. 51.

(40) In Orat. pro Milone.

(41) In Bruto, pag. m. 329. In lib. 4. de Finib. fol. 237, A. he calls the father of our Druſus, avum Catonis.

(39) See Leopard. Emendat. lib. 10. cap. 17.

tegrity. He procured a diſpenſation of age, in order that he might be advanced to places five years ſooner than the laws allowed (b). He was ſent during his Queſtorſhip (c) with his brother (d) in the year 739 of Rome into the country of the Rhetians (e), in order to ſubdue that nation. Theſe were his firſt exploits in arms, and they were glorious [C]. He afterwards marched into Gaul (f), where he reduced ſome provinces, which had revolted; he defeated the Germans which had advanced on this ſide of the Rhine, he paſſed that river, routed the Sicambri in their own territories, gained a naval victory againſt the Bructeri on the Ems (g), ſubdued the people of Frieſeland [D], and was the firſt Roman General who embarked upon the northern ocean (b). Upon his return to Rome in 743 he obtained the Prætorſhip (i), but did not ſtay long there; he departed in the beginning of ſpring to purſue his glorious ſucceſſes in Germany. He ſubdued there ſeveral nations as far as the Weſer, and built forts in divers places. This gained him at Rome triumphal ornaments, the honour of an ovation, and the dignity of Proconſul (k). He was raiſed to the Conſulſhip in the year 745 (l), and returned to Germany, where he puſh'd his conqueſts as far as the Elbe. He endeavoured to paſs that river, but without ſucceſs (m); however it is thought, that if a ſuperior force had not ſtopped him [E], he would have ſurmounted all other obſtacles. He march'd back towards the Rhine, and died of ſickneſs,

(b) Dio, lib. 54. ad ann. 735, pagm. 604.

(c) In quæſturæ honore dux Rhætici belli. Sueton. in Claudio, cap. 1.

(d) Dio, lib. 54. pag. 613.

(e) It is now called the country of the Griſons.

(f) Livius in Epitome lib. 137, & ſeq.

(g) Strabo, lib. 7, circa init.

(b) Sueton. in Claudio, cap. 1.

(i) Dio, lib. 54. pag. 613.

(k) Idem; ibid. See alſo Sueton. in Claudio, cap. 1.

(l) Monſieur de Larrey in the Hiſtory of Auguſtus, pag. 405. pretends that Druſus ſpent the whole year of his Conſulſhip at Rome, and went to Germany in 745 as Proconſul.

(m) Dio, lib. 55, init.

" Marcellus and Agrippa, and afterwards Caius and " Lucius Cæſar flouriſhed, and his brother Druſus en" joyed a greater ſhare in the people's affection."
We ſhall ſee in the laſt remark a paſſage of Suetonius, which ſhews the advantageous opinion, which the world had of the virtue and probity of Druſus. We ſhall ſee likewiſe there an inſtance of the perfidiouſneſs of Tiberius towards him. We are not therefore to believe all that Valerius Maximus relates of the fraternal tenderneſs of Tiberius (12). That Author has carried his flattery with regard to that Prince to a great exceſs in more places than one.

(12) Val. Max. lib. 5. cap. 5. num. 3.

[C] His firſt exploits in arms .... were glorious.] I ſhall cite Horace, but not as a witneſs, which amounts to a proof. All the proof, which I ſhall give, is, that the Hiſtorians (13) agree that the Rhetians were forced to paſs under the yoke, though their valour, and the advantages of their ſituation rendered them very capable of reſiſting for a long time. I ſhall quote Horace's verſes only becauſe they are beautiful and grand: if they contain nothing but the truth, that muſt be ſuppoſed accidental; for a Poet who ſings of the victories and triumphs of a Prince, does not renounce the fabulous Hyperbole, except when he has no occaſion for it. Thoſe who read the modern Poets, will not diſpute this, but will readily believe that the poets of the court of Auguſtus were animated with the ſame ſpirit as thoſe of the preſent age. I am even of opinion that the Devotees to Antiquity, who are the moſt averſe to the Sect of Monſieur Perrault, will allow, that our age ſurpaſſes that of Alexander and Auguſtus in point of Panegyric; for the modern Panegyric-Writers puſh their ideas much beyond the Antients, though the latter had a more copious ſubject. But let us return from this digreſſion, and cite Horace (14).

(13) Dio, lib. 54. pag. 613, 614. Paterculus, lib. 2. cap. 95.

(14) Horat. Od. 4. lib. 4. ver. 1. ſeqq. ver. 14. & 22.

Qualem miniſtrum fulminis alitem
- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -
Qualemve lætis caprea paſcuis
Intenta, fulvæ matris ab uberè
Jam lacte depulſum leonem
Dente novo peritura vidit;
Videre Rhæti bella ſub Alpibus
Druſum gerentem & Vindelici - - -
- - - - - - - - - - - - ſed diu
Lateque victrices catervæ
Conſiliis juvenis revictæ
Senſere, quid mens rite, quid indoles
Nutrita fauſtis ſub penetralibus
Poſſet, quid Auguſti paternus
In pueros animus Nerones.

" Such as the Royal Bird of Jove
- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -
" Such as the Lyon, which his Dam forſakes,
" And through the ſhaggy herd wild ſlaughter makes,
" Chacing ſome Goat along the Plain,
" That flies, but flies in vain;
" Such Druſus did in arms appear,
" When near the Alps he urged the war.
- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -
" At length, when cruſhed by the young warrior's hand,
" They knew what Heroes under Cæſar train'd
" Could do: to whom the Sire bequeaths
" His ſoul, in whom he breathes."

It muſt be owned, that theſe praiſes are not overſtrained, and I ſhould think it very ſurprizing that Horace did not inſiſt a little more upon the great actions of Druſus, if it were true, that he wrote this Ode after the year of Rome 740 (15); for in this caſe he muſt have known the prodigious things which that young General had done beyond the Alps. How then could the Poet poſſibly confine himſelf to the Rhetian war alone?

(15) Monſ. Dacier aſſerts this in his Remarques ſur la IV Ode du IV Livre d'Horace, p. m. 110.

[D] He ſubdued the people of Frieſeland.] Dion is not the only writer, who obſerves this; Tacitus likewiſe mentions it, and adds that Druſus impoſed only a ſmall Tribute on them. He obliged them to furniſh a certain number of Ox-Hides. Eodem anno Friſii tranſrhenani populus pacem exuere, noſtra magis avaritia quam obſequii impatientes. Tributum iis Druſus juſſerat modicum pro anguſtia rerum, ut in uſus militares coria boum penderent (16). i. e. " The ſame year the " Friſii, a people beyond the Rhine revolted; rather " through our avarice, than becauſe they were impa" tient of the yoke. Druſus had laid on them a
" ſmall tribute ſuitable to the neceſſity of their cir-
" cumſtances, and obliged them to furniſh a certain " number of Ox-Hides for the ſervice of the army."
They revolted ſome time after, becauſe the Collectors of that tribute did a great many acts of injuſtice to them, with all the rigour of the moſt unrelenting Exciſemen.

(16) Tacit. Ann. lib. 4. cap. 72. ad ann. 781.

[E] It was thought that if a ſuperior force had not ſtopped him.] Thus I call the viſion, which it is pretended he ſaw. It is ſaid, that while he was purſuing his conqueſts from place to place, without fixing any where, a woman ſuperior to the common ſize of mortals, cloathed in the Barbarian Habit appeared to him, and commanded him to ſtop. Hoſtem etiam frequenter cæſum, ac penitus in intimas ſolitudines actum non prius deſtitit inſequi, quam ſpecies barbaræ mulieris humana amplior victorem tendere ultra ſermone Latino prohibuiſſet (17). Suetonius and Dion ſpeak of this adventure; but Dion forgot to obſerve, that the ſpectre ſpoke in Latin; which was a capital circumſtance, and which an exact Hiſtorian would never have omitted in his account, if he had known it. On the other hand, Suetonius has forgot a circumſtance, which is no leſs eſſential: he does not tell us, that this woman, after having reprov'd Druſus for not being ſatisfied with any conqueſt, ordered him to retire, and informed him that he ſhould die ſoon after. If Druſus had ſeen ſuch a viſion, I ſhould not be at all ſurpriz'd that he turned back, and even fell ſoon after into a fit of ſickneſs, which proved mortal. I cannot tell whether the moſt reſolute warriors at preſent in the world, whatever their religion may be, would be proof againſt ſuch an Apparition. What dread therefore muſt it occaſion in the mind of Druſus who was accuſtomed to hear at Rome of Auſpices, Prodigies, and good and evil Genii? Let us ſee Dion's words.

(17) Suet. in Claudio, cap. 1.

neſs, before he had gained that river (n), in the year 746, at the age of about thirty years. Some ſay that he died of a fracture of his Leg [F], occaſioned by his horſe falling under him. His brother, who haſtened to him upon the firſt rumour of his illneſs, found him in the agonies of death (o) [G]. He conducted his body to Rome, where he pronounc'd a funeral oration on the deceaſed (p). Auguſtus pronounced another. All kinds of honours were paid to the memory of Druſus, and the ſirname of Germanicus was given him on account of the victories which he had gained in Germany (q). He had cauſed a canal to be dug between the Sea and the Rhine [H]. We have ſpoken elſewhere

(n) Idem, ibid.

(o) Idem, ibid. Livius, Epitome lib. 140.

(p) Sueton. in Claudio, cap. 1. See likewiſe Seneca, Conſolat. ad Marc. cap. 3.

(q) Sueton, ibid.

(18) Dio, lib. 55, init.

words (18). Γυνὴ γάρ τις μείζων ἢ κατὰ ἀνθρώπου φύσιν ἀπαντήσασα αὐτῷ, ἔφη, Ποῖ δῆτα χωρεῖς Δροῦσε ἀκέρτως; οὐ πάντα σοι ταῦτα ἰδεῖν συμβήσεται· ἀλλ' ἄπιθι. καὶ γὰρ σοι καὶ τῶν ἔργων καὶ τοῦ βίου τὸ τέλος ἐνθένδε ἦδη. Etenim mulier quædam humana amplior forma ei obviam facta: Druſe, inquit, quo tandem nullum tuæ cupiditati modum ſtatuens contendis? Non tibi fatis conceſſum hæc omnia videre. Quin tu abi; jam enim & operum tuorum & vitæ inſtat tibi terminus. i. e. "A woman above the human ſize met him, and ſaid, O Druſus, whither "are you proceeding without limiting your deſires "of conqueſt? the fates will not permit you to ſee "all theſe things. Depart therefore, for the end of "your labours and life is near at hand."

Who knows, whether the Germans were not politic enough to dreſs up ſome man of their nation who could ſpeak Latin, and was of an uncommon ſize, in a woman's habit; and direct him to appear like a ſpectre to Druſus on the road. I do not doubt but recourſe has more than once been had to ſuch a ſtratagem.

[F] Some Authors write that he died of a fracture of his leg.] We ſhould have ſeen the particulars of this accident, if we had the laſt book of Livy; for the ſummary, which is ſtill remaining, contains theſe words. Ipſe (Druſus) ex fractura equo ſuper crus ejus collapſo triceſimo die quam id acciderat mortuus eſt. i. e. "He died of a fracture in his leg, occaſioned by his "horſe falling on him; the 30th day after it happened." Moreri has committed a miſtake here, Druſus ſays he, was preparing to purſue his conqueſts at the time when he fell from his horſe, and broke his thigh, of which he died 13 days after. His putting thirteen inſtead of thirty, is not his only miſtake: he is contradicted by Dion in another point; for Dion aſſures us that Druſus returned towards the Rhine, ſo far was he from preparing to purſue his conqueſts. I paſs over his defects in ſtyle: Gentlemen of ſkill do not want them to be pointed out; but if I leave them the trouble of remarking thoſe, which are to be found in the words quoted by me, I cannot do the ſame with regard to the beginning of the Article. Druſus was ſon of Tiberius, Nero and Livia, who afterwards married Auguſtus, brother to the Emperor Tiberius. Thus Moreri begins, Now the words are ſtrangely miſplaced: the word brother may equally refer to three perſons, either Druſus, or Tiberius Nero, or Auguſtus. A perſon not well verſed in the Hiſtory could not tell which of the three relatives to fix on. But here is an error of another kind. Moreri ſays, that Druſus made war in Germany for many years. There are few readers but will underſtand by this ten or twelve compaigns at leaſt; but this is too much by half: I do not think that Druſus made five campaigns in that country. This is the fineſt jewel in his crown. He performed more in one year, than other warriors during their whole life (19).

(19) See another error of Moreri in the Remark [H].

[G] His brother, who haſtened to ſee him upon the firſt rumour of ſickneſs, found him in the agonies of death.] He haſtened with ſuch expedition, that Pliny has placed this Journey among the ſpeedieſt that were ever made. He affirms (20), that Tiberius travelling day and night, and changing horſes but thrice, rode two hundred miles. Valerius Maximus agrees with Pliny with reſpect to the diſtance of the way, but he ſays, that Tiberius changed his horſes frequently (21). I cannot tell how we can acquit Dion Caſſius in this point, who ſays that there was no great diſtance between the place where Auguſtus received the news of Druſus's ſickneſs, and the place where Druſus lay; for though we ſhould ſuppoſe that Pliny and Valerius Maximus have not given us the juſt diſtance, it is ſtill true, that Lombardy is remote from Wetteravia. Auguſtus was at Pavia when he heard that Druſus was ſick. Druſus fell ſick as he was returning from the Banks of the Elbe towards the Rhine, and died before he reached the Banks of the Rhine. Let us ſuppoſe, in order to favour Dion as much as poſſible, that Druſus had a deſign to return to Mentz; it muſt be ſaid according to this ſuppoſition that he fell ſick in Wetteravia. What does this Hiſtorian therefore mean by this Parentheſis (ἐ γὰρ ἦν πόρρω)? Auguſtus, ſays he, being informed of the ſickneſs of Druſus, (for he was not far diſtant) ſent Tiberius immediately to him. The Tranſlators of Dion clear him from this miſtake; for they make him ſpeak in ſuch a manner as may ſignify that Auguſtus ſent immediately for Tiberius, who was at no great diſtance from him. Περυθόμενος δ' ὁ Αὔγυστος ὅτι νοσεῖ (ἐ γὰρ ἦν πόρρω) τὸν Τιβέριον κατὰ τάχος ἔπεμψε. Ad famam ægrotantis Druſi Auguſtus, qui non ita procul ab eo aberat, celeriter Tiberium accerſiit (22). But Caſaubon refutes this Tranſlation by two ſolid remarks (23). I. The Greek Language will not ſuffer ἔπεμψε to be tranſlated ſent for. II. Auguſtus and Tiberius were then at Pavia, as we learn from Valerius Maximus. We muſt therefore conclude, that Dion has expreſſed himſelf like a bad Geographer, or as a man, who did not know the circumſtances of the fact. Let us add another thing, which renders this journey of Tiberius very remarkable. He travelled from Pavia into Germany with all the haſte of a poſt-boy, and returned on foot from Germany to Italy (24) with all the ſlowneſs of a funeral proceſſion. Druſus died during the Summer, and his corps did not reach Padua till the depth of the Winter. It is Tacitus who informs us of this. Ipſum quippe (Auguſtum) aſperrimo hyemis Ticinum uſque progreſſum neque abſcedentem à corpore ſimul Urbem intraviſſe (25). i. e. "Auguſtus himſelf "went as far as Pavia in the midſt of the winter, "and never left the body till it was brought into "the City."

(22) Dio, lib. 55, initio.

(23) Caſaub. in Sueton. Claud. cap. 1.

(24) Druſum fratrem in Germania amiſit, cujus corpus pedibus toto itinere prægrediens Romam uſque pervexit. Sueton. in Tiberio, cap. 7.

(25) Tacit. Annal. lib. 3. cap. 5.

[H] He ordered a canal to be dug between the ſea and the Rhine.] Suetonius ſpeaks in this manner: Trans Rhenum foſſas novi & immenſi operis effecit, quæ nunc adhuc DRUSINÆ vocantur (26). Tacitus calls it foſſam Druſianam, and it is a common name among the Latin Authors. It was not a work of a ſhort duration; for it not only ſerved Druſus's ſon, but remains to this day. The paſſage, in which Tacitus ſpeaks of Germanicus's embarking on this canal, is too beautiful to be omitted. Jamque claſſis advenerat, cum præmiſſo commeatu, & diſtributis in legiones ac ſocios navibus foſſam cui DRUSIANÆ nomen ingreſſus, precatuſque Druſum patrem ut ſe eadem auſum libens placatuſque exemplo ac memoria conſiliorum atque operum juvaret, lacus inde & Occanum uſque ad Amiſiam fluvium ſecunda navigatione pervehitur (27). i. e. "And "now the fleet was arrived with the proviſions, and "the legions and auxiliary troops being put on board "the ſeveral ſhips, Germanicus embarked on "the Druſian Canal, and addreſſed his prayers to his "Father Druſus, that he would be propitious to him, "and by his example and the memory of his advice "and actions, aſſiſt him in the ſame attempt, in which "he had led the way before; and then had a ſucceſsful voyage thro' the lakes and ſea as far as the "river Amiſia." The invocation of the dead was ſo much uſed among the Pagans, that we have here a ſon, who offers up ſolemn prayers to the ghoſt of a father, who had never been deified. I own that an altar had been raiſed to him in Germany, but this was no apotheoſis. Tumulum tamen nuper Varianis legionibus ſtructum & veterem aram Druſo ſitam diſjecerant. Reſtituit aram (Germanicus) honorique patris princeps ipſe cum legionibus decucurrit: tumulum iterare haud viſum (28). i. e. "Yet they had deſtroyed the monu- "ment lately erected to Varius's legions, and an "antient Altar conſecrated to Druſus. Germanicus "reſtored

(26) Sueton. in Claudio, cap. 1.

(27) Tacit. Annal. lib. 2. cap. 8. ad ann. 769.

(28) Idem, ibid. cap. 7.

(r) In the Article of ANTONIA, Remark [B].

where (r) of the extraordinary chaſtity aſcribed to him. He left two ſons and one daughter: one of his ſons was that illuſtrious Prince, who was known under the name of Germanicus; the other was that ſtupid Prince, who was the Emperor Claudius. Their ſiſter Livia was married to Druſus, the ſon of Tiberius, and was a Lady of no reputation (s). It is not at all probable, that Druſus died of poiſon through the guilt of the Emperor his father-in-law [I]. The conſolation, which Ovid wrote to Livia, mother of this illuſtrious deceaſed, is a Poem which deſerves to be read. We ſhall ſee in the Remark [F] the errors of Moreri: they are inconſiderable.

(s) See the following Article, Remark [B].

" reſtored the Altar, and the Prince himſelf with his " legions run the courſes in honour of his father; but " it was not thought proper to repair the monument." Obſerve, that in order to form a juſt idea of the country, which at Rome was conſidered as beyond the Rhine, we ought to repreſent the Hiſtorians, as tranſcribers of the relations, which the Generals ſent to Rome. The Generals marched with their troops into the Provinces of Gaul near the Rhine. With reſpect to them Germany was beyond the river. Suetonius and Tacitus have followed their manner of expreſſion, for in reality Germany with reſpect to Rome is rather on this ſide than beyond the Rhine. I do not propoſe this as a conſiderable remark; but how many are there not more important in Commentaries? For the reſt, we are not to imagine, as Moreri does, that all that is now called the Iſſel was the work of the antient Romans; for Druſus did not join the Rhine to the ocean, that is, with what is now called the Zuider-Zee, but by making a Canal between the River Iſſel and the Rhine (22). I ſhall obſerve occaſionally that he began to make dikes upon the banks of the Rhine, which were finiſhed ſixty three years after (30).

(29) See Cluver, in Germania antiqua.

(30) Ne ſegnem militem attinerent, Paulinus Pompejus inchoatum ante tres & ſexaginta annos à Druſo aggerem coërcendo Rheno abſolvit. Tacit. Annal. lib. 13. cap. 53.

[I] It is not at all probable, that he died by poiſon given him by order of the Emperor his father-in-law.] Slander is a terrible thing. The ſame people who had moſt propagated the report, that Auguſtus was the father of Druſus, were perhaps thoſe who accuſed him of having poiſoned him. Since Suetonius rejects this as a mere fable without any ground, we may conclude, that he ſaw not the leaſt trace of probability in it: for he is not much inclined naturally to juſtify his twelve Emperors, or to conceal their faults. He informs us of the remarkable tenderneſs, which Auguſtus always had for Druſus, and he mentions two particularities, which I cannot omit. Auguſtus wrote the Epitaph in verſe, which was inſcribed on the tomb of Druſus, and compoſed in proſe an hiſtory of that great man. I am not ignorant that the greateſt Princes and the moſt ambitious Monarchs are ſubject to furious jealouſies towards thoſe of their own blood, which make them do things very prejudicial to their intereſt, when they are apprehenſive leſt a riſing glory, which grows apace, ſhould too much charm the people. But I do not perceive in the conduct of Auguſtus ſufficient ſigns of this paſſion, to incline me to think, that he ever ceaſed his affection toward this Prince, of whom he probably imagined himſelf father, and perhaps thought ſo not without good reaſons. However that be, let us ſee Suetonius's words, in which we ſhall find an admirable ſketch of the character of Druſus. Fuiſſe autem creditur non minus glorioſi quam civilis animi. Nam ex hoſte ſuper victorias, optima quoque ſpolia captaſſe, ſummoque ſæpius diſcrimine duces Germanorum tota acie inſectatus: ne diſſimulaſſe unquam priſtinum ſe Reipublicæ ſtatum quandoque reſtituturum, ſi poſſet. Unde exiſtimo nonnullos tradere auſos, ſuſpectum eum Auguſto, revocatumque ex provincia: & quia cunctaretur, interceptum veneno. Quod equidem magis, ne prætermitterem, retuli, quam quia verum aut veriſimile putem: cum Auguſtus tantopere & vivum dilexerit, ut coheredem ſemper filiis inſtituerit, ſicut quondam in Senatu profeſſus eſt; & defunctum ita pro concione laudaverit, ut Deos precatus ſit, Similes ei Cæſares ſuos facerent; ſibique tam honeſtum quandoque exitum darent, quam illi dediſſent. Nec contentus elogium tumulo ejus verſibus à ſe compoſitis inſculpſiſſe, etiam vitæ memoriam proſa oratione compoſuit (31). i. e. " But he is thought to have " been no leſs fond of glory in war than peace. For be- " ſides his conqueſts over the enemies, he took the " opima ſpolia from them, and purſued the German " Generals with his whole army and with the utmoſt " peril; and he never diſſembled, that he would re- " ſtore the ancient ſtate of the Republic, if ever he " ſhould have it in his power. Whence I imagine " that ſome perſons have ventured to affirm, that he " was ſuſpected by Auguſtus, and recalled from the " Province, and becauſe he delayed, was taken off " by poiſon. I have mentioned this, rather that I " might not omit it, than becauſe I think it true or " probable; ſince Auguſtus had ſo great an affection " for him, while he was living, that he appointed " him joint-heir with his ſons, as he formerly de- " clared in the Senate; and when he died, pronounced " a funeral oration on him, in which he entreated " the Gods, That they would make his Cæſars like him, " and grant him as honourable an exit, as they had done " to the deceaſed. And not ſatisfied with this, he " wrote an epitaph in verſe to be inſcribed on his mo- " nument, and compoſed an Hiſtory of his life in " proſe." He was more fond of glory than command, and was entirely actuated by the Roman Spirit. He reſolved to employ all his credit for the reſtoration of the liberty of the Commonwealth, though his private intereſt engaged him to maintain the imperial uſurpation, which was then predominant. It is even pretended, that he wrote to Tiberius to exhort him to join with him, in a deſign to oblige Auguſtus to replace things on their former foot. If any reaſon could render probable the ſlander rejected by Suetonius, it would undoubtedly be this, that Tiberius ſhewed the letter, which he had received from Druſus upon this ſubject. It is Suetonius himſelf, who relates this (32). In general, they were ſo well perſuaded at Rome of this noble and incomparable inclination of Druſus, that it was the firſt cauſe of the prodigious affection, which the people ſhewed towards Germanicus. Druſi magna apud populum Romanum memoria, credebaturque ſi rerum potitus foret, libertatem redditurus, unde in Germanicum favor & ſpes eadem, nam juveni civile ingenium, mira comitas (33). i. e. " The Roman people had a " regard for the memory of Druſus, and it was thought, " that if he had been advanced to the Empire, he " would have reſtored liberty, on which account there " was the ſame eſteem ſhewn to Germanicus, and the " ſame hopes conceived of him; for the youth had " a gentle and mild temper."

(31) Sueton. in Claudio, cap. 1.

(32) Odium adverſus neceſſitudines in Druſo primum fratre detexit (Tiberius) prodita ejus epiſtola, qua ſecum de cogendo ad reſtituendam libertatem Auguſto agebat. Idem, in Tiber. cap. 50.

(33) Tacit. Annal. lib. 1. cap. 33.

DRUSUS, the ſon of Tiberius, by his firſt wife Vipſania, daughter of Agrippa, did not reſemble his father in diſſimulation (a); but he was not unlike him in impurity, drunkenneſs, and cruelty (b). He was Quæſtor in the year 764 (c): he was ſent into Pannonia after the death of Auguſtus, in order to appeaſe the legions which had mutinied. He ſucceeded very well in this affair, and was created Conſul ſoon after his return to Rome (d). He commanded an army in Illyricum in 770. This poſt was given him, as well that he might gain the affection of the ſoldiery, as to remove him from the purſuit of pleaſures, in which he plunged himſelf at Rome (e). He fomented with great addreſs the diviſions, which ſprung up among the Germans, and made conſiderable advantage of them (f): the Senate decreed him the honours of an Ovation. He returned to Rome in the year 773 (g), and was Conſul with the Emperor his father the year following (h). He had in this poſt a dignity ſuperior even to the Conſulſhip, in which he was

(a) Tacitus, Annal. lib. 3. cap. 8.

(b) Dio, lib. 57. pag. m. 699, 701.

(c) Idem, lib. 56. pag. 672.

(d) Tacit. Ann. lib. 1. ad ann. 767.

(e) Idem, lib. 2. cap. 44.

(f) Tacit. Ann. lib. 2. cap. 62, 63, 64.

(g) Idem, lib. 3. cap. 11.

(h) Ibid. cap. 31.

was the Emperor's Collegue; it was the Tribunitian Power [A]. Having obtained this important office of the Senate, he would infallibly have ſucceeded Tiberius, if Sejanus had not prevented it (i). The ambition of that favourite was boundleſs; and beſides the box on the ear, which he had received from Druſus, urged him to all manner of wicked attempts. The execution of them was ſo much the more eaſy, as he had a criminal correſpondence with Druſus's wife [B]. Thus in concert with that Lady he procured Druſus to be poiſoned by the eunuch Lygdus (k). The poiſon had its effect: Druſus died in the year 766. He left ſome children [C], as we ſhall ſee in the remarks. Tiberius

(i) Ibid. cap. 56, & ſeq.

(k) Not Ligius, as Moreri ſays.

[A] He . . . had . . . the Tribunitian Power.] Auguſtus would call the ſupreme authority ſo, in order to avoid the odious titles of King and Dictator, and at the ſame time poſſeſs one ſuperior to all others. He took for his collegue in that office his ſon-in-law Agrippa, and after the death of Agrippa his ſon-in-law Tiberius. After his example Tiberius would have an aſſociate in that power, and choſe his own ſon. The letters which he wrote to the Senate concerning this aſſociation, had all the force of a command. Mittit literas ad Senatum, queis poteſtatem tribuniciam Druſo petebat. Id ſummi faſtigii vocabulum Auguſtus repperit, ne regis aut dictatoris nomen adſumeret, ac tamen appellatione aliqua cætera imperia præemineret. M. deinde Agrippam ſocium ejus poteſtatis, quo defuncto, Tiberium Neronem delegit, ne ſucceſſor in incerto foret. Sic cohiberi pravas aliorum ſpes rebatur: ſimul modeſtiæ Neronis, & ſuæ magnitudini fidebat. Quo tunc exemplo, Tiberius Druſum ſummæ rei admovet: cum incolumi Germanico integrum inter duos judicium tenuiſſet (1). i. e. " He ſends letters to the Senate, in which he demands the Tribunitian Power for Druſus. Auguſtus " found out this word to expreſs the ſupreme authority, " that he might not aſſume the name of King or " Dictator, and yet be diſtinguiſhed by a title ſuperior to all others. He then choſe M. Agrippa his " Collegue in that dignity, and upon his death Tiberius Nero, leſt his ſucceſſor might continue doubtful. By this means he thought the ambitious hopes " of others would be reſtrained; and he had a great " confidence in Nero's modeſty, and his own greatneſs. After this example Tiberius raiſes Druſus to " this dignity, though during Germanicus's life, he " had carried an even hand between them." If Moreri had underſtood this, he would not have ſaid, that Druſus upon his return from Germany exerciſed the office of Tribune. This does not expreſs what Tacitus has juſt told us. I omit two other errors of Moreri contained in theſe words; Druſus was ſent into Illyricum to learn the art of war, afterwards into Germany. The firſt of Druſus's expeditions was that into Pannonia, and the ſecond that into the Illyricum. I do not think, that he was in perſon in Germany with an army, tho' he fomented the diviſions there.

(1) Tacit. Ann. lib. 3. cap. 56. ad ann. 775.

Mistakes of Moreri.

[B] Sejanus . . . had a criminal converſation with Druſus's wife.] Her name was Livia, and ſhe was ſiſter of Germanicus. She was firſt married to Caius Cæſar, grand-ſon of Auguſtus, and after the death of that Prince to Druſus the ſon of Tiberius. She had been at firſt very ordinary in her perſon, and afterwards became extremely beautiful. Sejanus had a bad opinion enough of this Lady, to imagine, that by making love to her, he might engage her to ſecond him in his deſign to deſtroy her huſband. He therefore courted her, and eaſily gained the enjoyment of her, and then propoſed to her, that if ſhe would poiſon Druſus, he would marry her, and make her Empreſs. This uncertain hope induced her to renounce by an abominable crime a certain hope; ſo true it is, that a woman, who has proſtituted her honour, will ſuffer herſelf to be turned any way, according to the caprice of him, to whom ſhe has abandoned herſelf. This reflection is not mine, but Tacitus's. Read the following paſſage, in which you will find an account of a blow of the ear, which Druſus gave Sejanus (2). Druſus impatiens æmuli, & animo commotior, orto forte jurgio, intenderat Sejano manus, & contra tendentis os verberaverat. Igitur cuncta tentanti promptiſſimum viſum ad uxorem ejus Liviam convertere. Quæ ſoror Germanici, formæ initio ætatis indecoræ, mox pulchritudine præcellebat. Hanc, ut amore, incenſus, adulterio pellexit: & poſtquam primi flagitii potitus eſt (neque fœmina amiſſa pudicitia alia abnuerit,) ad conjugii ſpem, conſortium regni, & nectm mariti impulit. Atque illa, cui avunculus Auguſtus, ſocer Tiberius, ex Druſo liberi, ſeque ac majores & poſteros municipali adultero fœdabat; ut pro honeſtis & præſentibus, flagitioſa & incerta expectaret (3). i. e. " Druſus impatient of a rival, and being a man " of warm temper, upon a quarrel, which happened " to ariſe, laid hands on Sejanus, who reſiſting Druſus, ſtruck him on the face. Sejanus therefore a- " mong all his ſchemes of revenge, thought the readieſt way was to have recourſe to Livia Druſus's " wife, and ſiſter of Germanicus, who having been " very homely when ſhe was young, was afterwards diſtinguiſhed for her beauty. Sejanus being " deeply in love with her, had engaged her in a criminal converſation, and having drawn her into this " firſt crime (for a woman having loſt her honour " will not refuſe any thing elſe) engaged her by the " hopes of marriage, and a ſhare in the Empire, to " diſpatch her huſband. This Lady, who had Auguſtus for her uncle, Tiberius for her father-in-law, " and had children by Druſus, diſgraced herſelf, her " anceſtors, and her poſterity, by adultery with a man " of mean quality, ſacrificing her preſent honours for " ſhameful and uncertain views." A ſlow poiſon was given to Druſus, in order that he might be ſuppoſed to die of ſickneſs (4). Livia's Phyſician, whoſe name was Eudemus, and who had alſo been her adulterer, was made privy to the ſecret (5). The widow called upon Sejanus to perform his promiſe (6). Sejanus aſked her in marriage of Tiberius, but could not obtain her. After he was puniſhed for his crimes, Apicata his wife, who had been divorced, informed the Emperor of the poiſoning of Druſus, and the crimes of Livia; upon which Tiberius ordered, that Livia ſhould be put to death. Others ſay, that out of regard to her mother he did not puniſh her; but that her mother ſuffered her to be ſtarved to death (7). The Senate paſſed very ſevere Decrees againſt the memory and the ſtatues of that wicked woman (8). I obſerve, that Sejanus did not marry her; however Glandorp relates the contrary: Primum repulſam patitur, poſtea tamen cum non abſiſteret, ſit voti compos (9). But Suetonius is more to be depended upon, who repreſents to us Tiberius as alluring him with the hopes of his alliance, at the ſame time that he was preparing to deſtroy him, as he did ſoon after. Spe affinitatis ac Tribunitiæ poteſtatis deceptum incipientem criminatus eſt pudenda miſerandaque oratione (10).

(3) Tacit. Ann. lib. 4. cap. 3. ad ann. 776.

(4) Idem, ibid. cap. 8.

(5) Idem, ibid. cap. 39.

(6) Ibid. cap. 3. See likewiſe Plin. lib. 29, cap. 1.

(7) Dio, lib. 58. pag. 721, ad ann. 784. See likewiſe Sueton. in Tiberio, cap. 62.

(8) Tacit. Ann. lib. 6. cap. 2.

(9) Glandorp. Onomaſt. pag. 452.

(10) Sueton. in Tiber. cap. 65.

The Hiſtory of Livia, the daughter of Nero Claudius Druſus, brother of Tiberius.

(2) If we believe Dio, lib. 58. pag. 709. it was Sejanus who gave the blow to Druſus.

[C] He left ſome children.] His daughter Julia was firſt married to Nero her couſin-german, the eldeſt ſon of Germanicus; and afterwards to Caius Rubellius Blandus (11). Soon after the death of Germanicus, his ſiſter Livia, Druſus's wife, had twins, which was ſo agreeable to Tiberius, that he congratulated himſelf in a full Senate (12). One of theſe twins died ſoon after his father; the other, named Tiberius, was to have ſucceeded to the Empire with Caius Caligula; for the Emperor Tiberius declared them both equally his heirs (13): but, as Tiberius had foretold (14), Caligula diſpatched his co-heir (15). We muſt not omit to obſerve, that he procured the Will of Tiberius to be cancelled; by which means he reigned alone. He afterwards adopted Tiberius the grand-ſon. Fratrem Tiberium die virilis togæ adoptavit, appellavitque principem juventutis (16). i. e. " He adopted his " brother Tiberius on the day, when he aſſumed the " Toga Virilis, and ſtiled him Prince of the youth." I find ſome difficulty in this paſſage. If Tiberius the grand-ſon was born ſoon after the death of Germanicus, as Tacitus aſſures us, he was eighteen years old, when his grand-father died. How comes it then, that his grand-father had not made him aſſume the Toga Virilis? This would not have been uſeleſs in ſecuring to him the ſucceſſion. It will certainly be

(11) Tacit. Ann. lib. 6. cap. 27.

(12) Idem, lib. 2. cap. 84. ad ann. 772.

(13) Sueton. in Tiberio, cap. ult.

(14) Dio, lib. 58. pag. 729.

(15) Sueton. in Calig. cap. 23.

(16) Ibid. cap. 15. See alſo Dio, lib. 59 init.

berius ſhewed upon this occaſion all the inſenſibility, which the Stoics require [D]. Nothing appears to me more commendable in Druſus, than the friendſhip which he preſerved for Germanicus [E], his couſin german, and adopted brother.

" anſwered me, that he thought him illegitimate on " account of Livia's adulteries, and that this was the " occaſion of his neglecting him (17). For the reſt, " this youth was put to death for a very ſlight cauſe." He had taken a remedy for a violent cough. It was pretended to be an antidote, and that by this conduct he accuſed Caligula of a deſign to poiſon him. Fratrem Tiberium inopinantem repente immiſſo Tribuno militum interemit . . . . cauſſatus . . . quod antidotum oboluiſſet, quaſi ad præcavenda venena ſua ſumtum, cum . . . propter aſſiduam & vehementem tuſſim medicamento uſus eſſet (18). i. e. " He put to death his brother Tibe- " rius of a ſudden by means of a military Tribune, " whom he ſent to diſpatch him . . . . alledging . . . " that he ſmelled of an antidote, which it was pre- " tended he had taken by way of precaution againſt " poiſon from him, whereas it was only a medicine " on account of a violent cough, under which he had " long laboured."

(17) Dio, lib. 58. pag. 729. Sueton. in Tiber. cap. 62.

(18) Sueton. in Calig. cap. 22. See alſo Philonem, de Legat.

[D] Tiberius ſhewed . . . . all the inſenſibility, which the Stoics required.] He did not appear at all uneaſy while Druſus was ſick, nor forbore to go to the Senate even during the interval between his ſon's death and interment. While the whole Senate was in tears, he alone continued calm and undiſturbed. Tiberius per omnes valetudinis ejus dies nullo metu (an ut firmitudinem animi oſtentaret) etiam defuncto necdum ſepulto curiam ingreſſus: Conſuleſque ſede vulgari per ſpeciem mœſtitiæ ſedentes honoris locique admonuit, & effuſum in lacrymas Senatum, victo gemitu ſimul oratione continua erexit. i. e. " Tiberius, to make a ſhew of the " firmneſs of his mind, appeared without any uneaſy " apprehenſion all the time of Druſus's ſickneſs; and " even after his death, and before his interment went " to the Senate; and when the Conſuls ſate in the " common ſeats, as a mark of their ſorrow, he re- " minded them of their dignity and place, and by a " continued ſpeech without the leaſt ſigh comforted " the Senate, which was diſſolved in tears." He preſerved in his diſcourſe the character of his diſſembling ſpirit in ſuch a manner, that it was eaſy to perceive, that he was not diſordered by the leaſt ſentiment of grief. Read this account in Tacitus; you will not loſe your labour: but I greatly doubt whether in Treatiſes of Conſolation ſuch an example can properly be introduced (20). Tiberius acted thus merely becauſe he had no natural affection. He thought Priam happy, becauſe he had ſurvived all his ſons (21).

(19) Tacit. Ann. lib. 4. cap. 8. See alſo Sueton. in Tiberio, cap. 52.

(20) Seneca, de Conſol. ad Marciam, cap. 15. and many others have made uſe of it.

(21) Sueton. in Tiber. cap. 6.

[E] Nothing apears to me more commendable in Druſus, than the friendſhip, which he preſerved for Germanicus.] Germanicus had been adopted by the Emperor: he was therefore preſumptive ſucceſſor as well as Druſus; he was likewiſe the delight of the people; he had done many glorious actions, and was maſter of very excellent qualifications. Druſus poſſeſſed none of theſe advantages. How could he avoid hating ſuch a rival? How could a mind ſo ill diſpoſed do juſtice to Germanicus, and love Germanicus? We muſt own that there was in this a ſtrange power of conſtitution: vices have not that connection with each other, which we imagine; and there are certain virtues, which are better preſerved in a mind actuated by many enormous vices, than in another leſs vicious. I have not mentioned all the reaſons, which might raiſe jealouſy in the ſoul of Druſus. I have even forgot the principal ones, which the reader will immediately find in the words of Tacitus. The Court was divided between Druſus and Germanicus: their friends had mutual conteſts with each other; and the Heads of the two factions were the only perſons, who agreed. Diviſa & diſcors aula erat: tacitis in Druſum, aut Germanicum ſtudiis. Tiberius ut proprium, & ſui ſanguinis Druſum fovebat: Germanico alienatio patrui amorem apud cæteros auxerat, & quia claritudine materni generis anteibat, avum Marcum Antonium, avunculum Auguſtum ferens. Contra Druſo proavus eques Romanus, Pomponius Atticus, dedecere Claudiorum imagines videbatur, & conjux Germanici Agrippina, fœcunditate ac fama Liviam uxorem Druſi præcellebat: ſed fratres egregie concordes, & proximorum certaminibus inconcuſſi (22). i. e. " The Court was divided; ſome ſecretly favour- " ing Druſus, ſome Germanicus. Tiberius inclined " to Druſus as his own, and of his own blood; but " the little affection, which Germanicus's uncle had " for him, endeared him the more to others; eſpe- " cially as by the mother's ſide he was the more nobly " deſcended, having Marc Anthony for his grandfa- " ther, and Auguſtus for his uncle; whereas on the o- " ther hand Pomponius Atticus, who was only a Ro- " man Knight, and great grandfather to Druſus, " ſeemed to leſſen the honour of the Claudian family, " and Agrippina, wife of Germanicus, ſurpaſſed Li- " via Druſus's wife, in fruitfulneſs and reputation. " However the two brothers continued in perfect " friendſhip, without being ſhaken in any manner " by the conteſts of their parties." Here is likewiſe another paſſage of Tacitus, in which Tiberius highly commends to the Senate Druſus's friendſhip towards the ſons of Germanicus. Addidit orationem Cæſar multa cum laude filii ſui, quod patria benevolentia in fratris liberos foret, nam Druſus (quamquam arduum ſit eodem loci potentiam & concordiam eſſe) æquus adoleſcentibus, aut certe non adverſus habebatur (23). i. e. " Cæſar made likewiſe a ſpeech, in which he " greatly extolled his ſon for his paternal affection to- " wards the children of his brother; for Druſus (tho' " it is difficult for power and concord to reſide in the " ſame place) appeared a friend, at leaſt no enemy " to the young men." The Hiſtorian touches upon the reaſon why we ought to think that Druſus performed a very difficult thing in this; which reaſon was, their rivalſhip in power. Upon this principle when Piſo found himſelf accuſed of the death of Germanicus, he went to Druſus, and hop'd to engage him eaſily in his intereſts (24); he thought that a man, who ſhould have delivered Druſus from a dangerous rival, would not be look'd on with an evil eye, but he received only a very doubtful anſwer, which was conſidered as a leſſon of Tiberius; for it had nothing in it of the frank and uncircumſpect temper of Druſus. Neque dubitabantur præſcripta ei à Tiberio, cum incallidus alioqui & facilis juventa ſenilibus tum artibus uteretur (25). i. e. " And it was not doubted but that " this was done by the directions of the Emperor, " ſince Druſus, who was in other reſpects averſe to " cunning, and eaſy thro' youth, at that time made " uſe of the artifice of old age."

(22) Tacit. Ann. lib. 2. cap. 43.

(23) Idem, Ann. lib. 4. cap. 4.

(24) Piſo præmiſſo in urbem filio datiſque mandatis per quæ principem molliret, ad Druſum pergit, quem haud fratris interitu trucem, quam remoto æmulo æquiorem ſibi ſperabat. Idem, lib. 3. cap. 8.

(25) Idem, ibid.

DRUSUS, ſon of Germanicus and Agrippina, was at firſt advanced to public poſts before he was of competent age, and that by the recommendation of Tiberius himſelf (a); but he was afterwards oppreſſed by the artifices of Sejanus [A]. That unjuſt favourite

(a) Compare Tacitus, Annal. lib. 3. cap. 29. with Annal. lib. 4. cap. 4.

[A] He was oppreſſed by the artifices of Sejanus.] We are going to ſee a deteſtable piece of management. Sejanus had ſpies every where, and ſcrupled no meaſures to aggrandize himſelf. As he aſpired to the Empire, he began with taking off Druſus, who as Tiberius's ſon was the firſt in order of ſucceſſion. Nero the eldeſt ſon of Germanicus was next to Druſus; and for this reaſon he was the ſecond object of the machinations of Sejanus. Every thing, which he ſaid, was reported to the favourite, and this frequently furniſhed matter of accuſation; for tho' Druſus had no ill intentions, he let fall ſome imprudent expreſſions, to which the raſh advice of his friends too much contributed. Theſe men, more out of regard to their own intereſt, than his, being weary of his ill fortune, adviſed him to make uſe of ſome threats, telling him, that this was the true way to power. Upon this ſome words eſcaped him, which were repreſented as criminal.

vourite had the ſatisfaction of procuring him to be impriſoned, but not of ſeeing him dead; for he died himſelf before Druſus. The condition of the latter was not at all mended by this: he was abandoned in ſuch a manner to the rage of hunger, that he gnawed the flocks of his mattreſs [B]. He dragged on life thus till the ninth day. After his death, Tiberius had the cruelty to accuſe him in the Senate, and the imprudence to diſcover by that means the ſeverity which had been uſed againſt that unhappy Prince [C]. While he lay in priſon, there was a rumour that he had been ſeen in the Iſlands of minal. Maximeque inſectarentur Neronem proximum ſucceſſioni, & quamquam modeſta juventa, plerumque tamen quid in præſentiarum conduceret oblitum; dum à libertis & clientibus adipiſcendæ potentiæ properis exſtimulatur, ut erectum & fidentem animi oſtenderet: velle id populum Romanum: cupere exercitus: neque auſurum contra Sejanum, qui nunc patientiam ſenis, & ſegnitiem juvenis juxta inſultet. Hæc atque talia audienti, nihil quidem pravæ cogitationis; ſed interdum voces procedebant contumaces, & inconſultæ; quas adpoſiti cuſtodes exceptas auctaſque cum deferrent, &c (1). i. e. "They particularly aimed at Nero, who was "next in ſucceſſion, and tho' a modeſt youth, yet for "the moſt part forgetful of his preſent intereſt, while "he was hurried on by his freedmen and clients, who "were impatient for power, to ſhew himſelf a man of "ſpirit; that the people of Rome deſired it; and that "Sejanus would not venture to make any oppoſition, tho' "he now inſulted the patience of the old man (Tiberius,) "and the inactivity of Druſus's youth. Theſe and other "things of that kind being ſuggeſted to him, he ſaid "nothing indeed, which ſhewed any ill deſign, but "let fall ſome reſolute and imprudent expreſſions, "which the ſpies placed about him reported with ad-"dition &c." He was never free from informers; for his ſighs, and his behaviour, both waking and ſleeping, were reported to the favourite: his wife informed her mother, and ſhe informed Sejanus. Ne nox quidem ſecura, cum uxor vigilias, ſomnos, ſuſpiria matri Liviæ, atque illa Sejano patefaceret (2). His brother Druſus (3) became his enemy; Sejanus had the addreſs to engage him, by letting him know, that he would be ſecure of the firſt place by the death of Nero. At the ſame time he laid the foundation of the ruin of this Druſus, who fell into the ſnare, not only thro' ambition, but likewiſe, becauſe according to cuſtom he hated his brother, and envied him the preference, which he ſaw him favoured with by Agrippina their common mother. Qui (Sejanus) fratrem quoque Neronis Druſum traxit in partes, ſpe objecta principis loci, ſi priorem ætate & jam labefactum dimoviſſet. Atrox Druſi ingenium ſuper cupidinem potentiæ, & ſolita fratribus odia, accendebatur invidia, quod mater Agrippina promptior Neroni erat. Neque tamen Sejanus ita Druſum fovebat, ut non in eum quoque ſemina futuri exitii meditaretur; gnarus præferocem, & inſidiis magis opportunum (4). i. e. "Sejanus engaged alſo in his party Druſus "Nero's brother, by repreſenting to him, that he "would poſſeſs the firſt place, if he could take him off. "Druſus's temper was fiery, and beſides his ambition, "and the hatred uſual among brothers, he was en-"flamed with envy, becauſe his mother Agrippina "was more favourable to Nero. However Sejanus "did not ſupport Druſus, but with a view to deſtroy "him ſome time or other, knowing that he was of a "violent temper, and more open to be cenſured." Monſr. de Tillemont is miſtaken, when he ſays, that Nero's own wife endeavoured his ruin, by giving the Empreſs Livia an account of his moſt ſecret actions (5). It was to Livia her mother, the wife of Druſus, ſon of Tiberius, that ſhe gave this account, and not to Livia the Empreſs. I forgot to remark, that Sejanus procured Guards to be given Nero and his mother Agrippina, which Guards only took an account of every thing, which they obſerved (6). He ſuborned alſo perſons, who adviſed that Lady and her ſon to go to the army in Germany, or implore the protection of the public. Theſe counſels were rejected, and yet they were accuſed of having given ear to them.

(1) Tacit. Ann. lib. 4. cap. 59. ad ann. 779.

(2) Idem, ibid. cap. 60.

(3) He was the ſon of Germanicus.

(4) Tacit. Ann. lib. 4. cap. 60.

(5) Tillemont, Hiſtoire des Empereurs, tom. 1. pag. m. 146.

(6) Tacit. Ann. lib. 4. cap. 67.

[B] He was abandoned in ſuch a manner to the rage of hunger, that he gnawed the flocks of his mattreſs.] The artifices mentioned in the preceding remark could not fail of ſucceſs in the hands of Sejanus, ſince Tiberius deſired nothing better than to have an occaſion of deſtroying thoſe Princes. He ſuborned people, who excited them to complain and curſe him; and when he had collected a great many heads of accuſation, he filled a Letter with them with exceſſive bitterneſs, and got Nero and Druſus declared enemies to the public good. Upon this one of them was ſent to the Iſle of Pontia, where he was forced to kill himſelf, an executioner coming to him with the inſtruments of capital puniſhment, and declaring to him that he was ſent to execute the orders of the Senate; the other, who was our Druſus, was impriſoned in the palace, where he was ſuffered to periſh with hunger. Let us hear Suetonius (7): Ut comperit ineunte anno pro eorum quoque ſalute publica vota ſuſcepta: egit cum Senatu, Non debere talia præmia tribui, niſi expertis & ætate provectis: atque ex eo, patefacta interiore animi ſui nota, omnium criminationibus obnoxios reddidit: varioque fraude inductos, ut & concitarentur ad convitia & concitati perderentur, accuſavit per literas, amariſſime congeſtis etiam probris, & judicatos hoſtes fame necavit: Neronem in inſula Pontia: Druſum, in ima parte Palatii. Putant Neronem ad voluntariam mortem coactum, cùm ei carnifex, quaſi ex Senatus auctoritate miſſus, laqueos & uncos oſtentaret: Druſo autem adeo alimenta ſubducta ut tomentum e culcitra tentaverit mandere (8): amborum ſic reliquiis diſperſis, ut vix quandoque colligi poſſent. i. e. "As ſoon as he ſaw at the beginning of "the year public vows offered for their ſafety, he re-"monſtrated to the Senate, that ſuch rewards ought to "be conferred only upon thoſe, who had given proofs of "their merit, and were advanced in years; and from "this having diſcovered the ſecret ſentiments of his "heart, he rendered them obnoxious to the accuſa-"tions of every body; and they being drawn in by "artifice to uſe reproachful language againſt him, in "order that this might be a pretence for deſtroying "them, he accuſed them by Letter, having heaped "up thoſe reproaches with great bitterneſs, and ſen-"tence being given againſt them as enemies of the "State, he ſtarved them to death; Nero in the Iſle "of Pontia, Druſus in the loweſt part of the palace. "It is thought that Nero was obliged to kill himſelf; "becauſe an Executioner, who pretended to be ſent by "the Senate, ſhewed him the halter and hook. Dru-"ſus was deprived of food in ſuch a manner, that "he endeavoured to eat the ſtuffing of his bed; "and the remains of both their bodies were ſo diſperſ-"ed, that it was with great difficulty that they were "afterwards collected." Tacitus goes much farther (8): he ſays, that Druſus ſupported himſelf nine days with this nouriſhment. Druſus deinde extinguitur cum ſe miſerandis alimentis mandendo è cubili tomento nonum ad diem detinuiſſet. This happened two years after Sejanus's death (9). We muſt not forget, that Tiberius was ſtruck with ſuch conſternation, when he was acquainted with the machinations of this favourite, that he had thoughts of taking Druſus out of priſon, to oppoſe him to Sejanus. Tradidere quidam deſcriptum fuiſſe Macroni, ſi arma ab Sejano tentarentur extractum cuſtodia juvenem (nam in palatio attinebatur) ducem populo imponere (10). i. e. "Some have related that "Macro received orders, that if Sejanus attempted to "uſe force, the young Prince ſhould be delivered out "of his confinement (for he was impriſoned in the "palace), and appointed to command the people."

(7) Sueton. in Tiberio, cap. 64.

(8) Annal. lib. 6. cap. 23. ad ann. 786.

(9) In the year of Rome 786.

(10) Tacit. Ann. lib. 6. cap. 23. See alſo Sueton. in Tiberio, cap. 65.

[C] Tiberius .... accuſed him .... and had the imprudence to diſcover by this means the ſecurity which had been uſed againſt this young Prince.] Thoſe who guarded Druſus wrote a Journal of his actions, and of all that he ſaid during his confinement. This Journal was ſo exact, that it mentioned the names of the ſlaves, who had beaten or terrified the Priſoner, when he went out of his chamber. It mentioned the curſes which he uttered at his death againſt the author of his cruel perſecution, the refuſal of a morſel of bread to him, the blows which he received from the ſlaves, and other circumſtances of that kind. All theſe particulars Tiberius was not aſhamed to read in the Senate.

of the Ægean Sea. Tacitus, while he informs us by whom this pretended Druſus was taken, does not fail to touch upon the ſecret ſprings, which ſet to work ſuch kinds of impoſtures [D]. I do not find that Druſus had ever any other office than that of Augur (b), and that of Governor of Rome (c). He was very unhappily married [E].

(b) Sueton. in Calig. cap. 12.

(c) Tacit. Annal. lib. 4. cap. 36. ad ann. 778.

Quin & invectus in defunctum, probra corporis, exitiabilem in ſuos, infenſum Reipublicæ animum objecit: recitarique factorum dictorumque ejus deſcripta per dies juſſit. Quo non aliud atrocius viſum: adſtitiſſe tot per annos, qui vultum, gemitus, occultum etiam murmur exciperent; & potuiſſe avum audire, legere, in publicum promere, vix fides; niſi quod Actii Centurionis, & Didymi liberti epiſtolæ, ſervorum nomina præferebant, ut qui egredientem cubiculo Druſum pulſaverat, exterruerat; etiam ſua verba centurio ſævitiæ plena, tanquam egregium, voceſque deficientis adjecerat (11). i. e. "He likewiſe in-
(11) Tacit. Ann. lib. 6. cap. 24. "veighed againſt the deceaſed, repreſenting the deformity of his body; and that he had been cruel towards "his friends and relations, and an enemy to the State: "and ordered the diary of his words and actions to be "read. Nothing appeared more ſhocking, than that perſons had for ſo many years been ſet about him to watch "his countenance, ſighs, and ſecret murmurs; and it "would be ſcarce credible that his Grandfather could "hear, read, and publickly expoſe it; if the letters "of Actius the Centurion, and Didymus the Freedman did not mention the names of thoſe ſlaves who "had either ſtruck or terrified Druſus, when he went "out of his chamber; and if the Centurion had not "ſet down his own words full of cruelty, as if he "had done ſome very meritorious thing, and related "the dying expreſſions of the Prince." Had not the Senators great reaſon to admire and dread Tiberius, who ſo boldly took off the maſk, and abandoned ſo evidently his uſual diſſimulation? Obturbabant quidem patres ſpecie deteſtandi, ſed penetrabat pavor, & admiratio, callidum olim & tegendis ſceleribus obſcurum huc confidentiæ veniſſe, ut tamquam dimotis parietibus oſtenderet nepotem ſub verbere centurionis, inter ſervorum
(12) Idem, ibid. ictus, extrema vitæ alimenta fruſtra orantem (12). i. e. "Some of the Senators interrupted the reading under "pretence of deteſting Druſus's behaviour; but they "were ſtruck with fear and ſurprize, that the Emperor, who had been before ſo cunning and ſecret in "concealing his crimes, ſhould come to that pitch of "confidence, as in a manner to throw down the "walls, and ſhew his grandſon ſtruck by a centurion, "and beaten by ſlaves, and calling for food to ſupport "him, but in vain."

[D] Tacitus when he gives an account of this pretended Druſus .... does not omit to touch upon the ſecret ſprings, which ſet to work ſuch Impoſtures.] Thoſe who were diſcontented with the government, gave ear to the rumour of Druſus's having eſcaped out of priſon; and thoſe who were fond of novelties, revolutions, and adventures were no leſs attentive to it. The freedmen who attended the counterfeit Druſus, and pretended to believe, that he was the real ſon of Germanicus, eaſily found credit. There was nothing talked of, but the great deſigns of this Druſus: this was ſufficient to put all Greece in motion. Every body flocked to this Idol; and they ſo earneſtly wiſhed it to be true, that at laſt they came to believe their own fictions. Per idem tempus Aſia atque Achaia exterritæ ſunt, acri magis quam diuturno rumore, Druſum Germanici filium apud Cyclades inſulas, mox in continenti viſum; & erat juvenis haud diſpari ætate, quibuſdam Cæſaris libertis, velut agnitus, per dolumque comitantibus. Allicie-bantur ignari, fama nominis, & promptis Græcorum animis ad nova & mira: quippe lapſum cuſtodia pergere ad paternos exercitus, Ægyptum aut Syriam invaſurum, fingebant ſimul, credebantque: jam juventutis concurſu, jam publicis ſtudiis frequentabatur, lætus præſentibus, & inanium ſpe (13). "At the ſame time, (13) Idem, Ann. lib. 5. cap. 10. ad ann. 784. "Aſia and Achaia were alarmed by a terrible tho' "ſhort-lived rumour, that Druſus the ſon of Germanicus was ſeen in the Iſlands of the Cyclades, and "afterwards in the Continent; and there was a youth "there of about the ſame age, who was pretended "to be acknowledged for the real Druſus by ſome of "the Freedmen of Auguſtus, who attended him out of "a treacherous deſign. Ignorant people were drawn in "through the reputation of his name, and the readings of the Greeks, to engage in any thing new "or wonderful; for they feigned a ſtory, which they "afterwards believed; that he had eſcaped from priſon, and was going to his father's armies with a "reſolution to invade Egypt or Syria. He had now "a vaſt reſort of the youth and others to him; and "was pleaſed with his preſent condition, and his future though vain hopes." Poppeus Sabinus Governor of Macedonia, was not indolent with regard to this affair; and he had no reaſon to treat it as a thing of no importance. The Seditious might make great advantages of ſuch an Impoſture. He uſed ſuch expedition, that he ſeized the Impoſtor himſelf. We may remember, that at the beginning of the XVII Century, almoſt all the Princes who were at enmity with Spain, were well pleaſed that the Impoſtor, who called himſelf Sebaſtian King of Portugal, was not believed to be an Impoſtor; and if things had been once put in a right train, we ſhould have ſeen all the Powers, who were jealous of the Houſe of Auſtria, haſten to the relief of the counterfeit Sebaſtian. There were ſome people in England, who maintained, that the Duke of Monmouth was not taken (14), and that (14) In the year 1686. the perſon who was beheaded for him, was not he. This fooliſh ſtory was ſeed ſown at that time, and might have brought forth fruit at a proper ſeaſon. Factious ſpirits were well pleaſed that this notion was not extinguiſhed: the time will come, ſaid they, when perhaps we ſhall have occaſion for this Duke to draw in the populace. The Reader will find a great many remarkable things concerning the care, which is taken to foment this deluſion in the Hiſtorical Letters for October 1689 (15).

(15) Pag. 457, & ſeqq.

[E] He was very unhappily married.] We have loſt the place where Tacitus gave an account of Druſus's marriage with Æmilia Lepida (16.) If we had all the annals of that incomparable writer, we ſhould have ſeen the horrid perſecution which Druſus ſuffered from that Lady. She was his accuſer, loaded as ſhe was with a thouſand crimes, which rendered her incapable of being a witneſs. She continued unpuniſhed during her father's life; but upon her father's deceaſe the Informers accuſed her: and it being certain that ſhe had committed adultery with a ſlave, ſhe did not attempt to defend her ſelf; but thought the ſhorteſt way was to put an end to her life (17). Druſus's curſe was viſible upon that race. Germanicus himſelf, and his illuſtrious wife were involved in it.

(16) Æmilia Lepida quam juveni Druſo nuptam retuli. Tacit. Ann. lib. 6. cap. 40. ad ann. 788. We find nothing of this in the preceding books.

(17) Idem, ibid.

DRYADES. This is the name given by the Pagans to certain female Deities, of the ſecond rank, who preſided over woods [A]. Their condition was much more happy than that of the Hamadryades, who, as I ſhall obſerve in their Article, were united ſo cloſely each to her tree, that they ſprung up and died with it. But the Dryades had the liberty of walking about, and diverting themſelves [B], and could ſurvive the deſtruction

[A] Who preſided over Woods.] This name is derived from thence; for the greek word δρῦς, which properly ſignifies an Oak, ſignified alſo in a leſs ſtrict and more general ſenſe all kinds of trees. Servius ſtops at the former ſignification; Dryades, ſays he, a quercubus (1). He had ſaid in another place, Dryades ſunt, quæ inter arbores habitant: Oreades in montibus (2). i. e. "The Dryades are thoſe Nymphs, which dwell "among the trees; the Oreades, which inhabit the "mountains."

(1) Servius, in hæc verba Virgil. Georg. lib. 1. ver. 11. Ferte ſimul Faunique pedem Dryadeſque puellæ.

(2) Idem, in Virg. Eclog. 10. ver. 62.

[B] The Dryades had the liberty of walking about, and diverting themſelves.] If we believe Ovid, they danced frequently round the Oak, which the impious Eryſichthon then cut down.

Sæpe

ſtruction of the woods, of which they had the ſuperintendence.

Sæpe ſub hac Dryades feſtas duxere choreas:
Sæpe etiam, manibus nexis ex ordine, trunci
Circumiere modum (3).

(3) Ovidius, Metam. lib. 8. ver. 752.

" Full oft the Dryades, with Chaplets crown'd,
" Danc'd in his ſhade, full oft they tript around
" About his Bole." SANDYS.

They had likewiſe the liberty of marrying. Pauſanias tells us, that the wife of Arcas the ſon of Jupiter and Calliſta was a Dryad (4). Some aſſert that Eurydice was one alſo (5), and ground this upon thoſe words of Virgil:

(4) Pauſan. lib. 8. pag. 604. edit. 1696.

(5) Servius in Georg. lib. 4. ver. 460.

At chorus æqualis Dryadum clamore ſupremos
Implerunt montes (6).

(6) Virg. Georg. lib. 4. ver. 460.

" Her fellow Dryades the mountains tear,
" With loud laments, and break the yielding air."

Virgil ſays this, after having related the misfortune of Eurydice the wife of Orpheus. Obſerve that the Poets often confound the Dryades with the Naiades &c, and that there were ſome Hamadryades who lay with men. We ſhall treat more fully of this in another place (7).

(7) In the Article HAMADRYADES.

DRYANDER (a) JOHN a Proteſtant Martyr, was of Burgos in Spain. John Dias, whom the barbarity of his brother has made very famous [A], owed to him the inſtructions which led him to abandon the Church of Rome, and embrace the Reformation. Dryander was obliged to continue at Rome in obedience to his father; but he could not forbear ſpeaking upon ſome occaſions his ſentiments concerning the diſorders of the Church. He was juſt upon the point of going to Germany to join his brother FRANCIS DRYANDER [B], when he was accuſed as an Heretic. The Pope aſſiſted by the Cardinals thought proper to examine him: Dryander did not at all ſubmit, but declared his faith boldly, upon which he was condemned to the flames. He was burnt at Rome in the year 1545 (b).

(a) His Spaniſh name was Enzinas, which he turned into the word Dryander. The Spaniards call a ſort of oak Enzina.

(b) Taken from Theodore Beza in Iconibus, and Criſpinus's Acta Martyrum. Obſerve that Criſpinus, fol. m. 152. places his martyrdom in 1546.

[A] John Dias, whom the barbarity of his brother has made very famous.] Sleidan relates at length the manner in which this unhappy man was murdered (1). Alphonſus Dias his brother went to Germany purpoſely to murder him; and uſed ſo many artifices, that at laſt he found an opportunity to get him knocked on the head with an axe by his ſervant on the 26th of March 1546. The Proteſtant Martyrology (2) ſuppoſes that our Dryander was burnt after the murder of John Dias. I have followed Beza, who places the martyrdom of Dryander before that fact.

(1) Sleid. lib. 17. pag. m. 433.

(2) Acta Martyrum, pag. 331. edit. 1556, in 8°, and folio 152. edit. 1560, in 4to. L'Hiſtoire des Martyrs, 159. edit. 1582, in fol.

[B] His brother Francis Dryander.] He is Author of a Spaniſh Tranſlation of the New Teſtament. Mr. Simon (3) calls him Francis Enzinas, and tells us that this verſion was dedicated to Charles V, which made a great noiſe in the Low Countries. It was printed at Antwerp in 1543. He has given his judgment of it very fully in his new obſervations upon the text and tranſlations of the New Teſtament (4). This Dryander was recommended to Cranmer with a great encomium by Melancthon in 1548. See the 43d Letter of Melancthon. He was impriſoned at Bruſſels, after he had dedicated his work to Charles V, and continued there fifteen months. He eſcaped February the 1ſt 1545, by taking an opportunity which was offered; which was ſeeing the priſon door open about eight a' clock in the evening (5).

(3) Hiſtoire Critique du Nouv. Teſt. tom. 2. chap. 41. pag. 494.

(4) Chap. 2. of the 2d Part, pag. 151, & ſeqq.

(5) Criſpin. Act. Mart. folio m. 151.

☞ DRYDEN (JOHN), one of the moſt eminent Engliſh Poets of the ſeventeenth Century, was deſcended of a worthy family in Huntingtonſhire, often ſerving as Repreſentatives for that County (a). He was ſon of Eraſmus Dryden of Tichmerſh in Northamptonſhire, third ſon of Eraſmus Dryden of Canons Aſhby in the ſame County Baronet (b). He was born at Oldwincle or Aldwincle near Oundle in that County, Auguſt the 9th 1631, and educated in Grammar Learning in Weſtminſter School under Dr. Richard Buſby, being one of the King's Scholars upon the Royal Foundation, as he tells us himſelf in an Advertiſement prefixed to his Tranſlation of the Third Satyr of Perſius, where he obſerves, that he had tranſlated that Satyr, while he was at that ſchool, for a Thurſday-night's exerciſe, and believed that this and many other of his exerciſes of that nature in Engliſh Verſe were ſtill * in the hands of Dr. Buſby. While he was here likewiſe in 1649 he wrote a Poem upon the death of the Lord Haſtings [A]; and the year following was elected thence a Scholar of Trinity College in the Univerſity of Cambridge (c). In 1658 he publiſhed Heroick Stanza's on the late Lord Protector: written after his Funeral [B]; and in 1660 a Poem, intitled Aſtræa redux, a Poem on the happy Reſtoration

(a) A Letter to the Author of Reflexions Hiſtorical and Political, occaſioned by a Treatiſe in Vindication of General Monk and Sir Richard Glanville, &c. By the Right Honourable George Granville, Lord Lanſdowne, pag. 6. edit. London 1732, in 4to.

* Mr. Dryden wrote this about the year 1692.

(b) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 414. 2d edit. London 1721.

(c) Idem, ibid.

[A] In 1649 he wrote a Poem upon the death of the Lord Haſtings.] It is reprinted in the Firſt Part of Miſcellany Poems publiſhed by Mr. Dryden (1). In this Poem there is a great deal of fancy; but the verification is rough. The following lines, in which he ſpeaks of the diſeaſe, of which the Lord Haſtings died, would ſcarce have paſt him in his more mature age:

(1) Pag. 116, 117, 118, 119. 4th edit. London 1716, in 24mo.

Was there no milder way but the ſmall-pox,
The very filth'neſs of Pandora's box?
So many ſpots, like Næves, our Venus ſoil?
One jewel ſet off with ſo many a foil?
Bliſters with pride ſwell'd, which through's fleſh did ſprout,
Like Roſe-buds ſtuck i'th' Lilly-ſkin about.
Each little pimple had a tear in it,
To wail the fault it's riſing did commit:
Who rebel-like, with their own Lord at ſtrife,
Thus made an inſurrection 'gainſt his life.
Or were theſe gems ſent to adorn his ſkin,
The Cabinet of a richer ſoul within?
No Comet need foretell his change drew on,
Whoſe corps might ſeem a conſtellation.

[B] In 1658 he publiſhed Heroick Stanza's on the late Lord Protector: written after his Funeral.] We ſhall give the reader a few of theſe Stanza's.

VI.

" His Grandeur he deriv'd from heaven alone,
" For he was great e'er fortune made him ſo;
" And wars like miſts that riſe againſt the ſun
" Made him but greater ſeem, not greater grow.

VII.

" No borrow'd bays his temples did adorn,
" But to our crown he did freſh jewels bring;
" Nor was virtue poiſon'd ſoon as born
" With the too early thoughts of being King.

IX.

" He private mark'd the faults of others ſway,
" And ſet as ſea-marks for himſelf to ſhun;
" Not like raſh Monarchs, who their youth betray,
" By acts their age too late would wiſh undone.

tion and Return of his ſacred Majeſty Charles the Second [C]; and a Panegyric to the King on his Coronation the ſame year. On New-Year's-Day 1662 he preſented a Poem to the Lord Chancellor Hyde [D]. In 1665 he wrote a Poem to her Royal Highneſs the Ducheſs on the memorable Victory gained by the Duke againſt the Hollanders, June the 3d 1665: and on her journey, afterwards into the North [E]; and the year following he publiſhed his Annus Mirabilis: The Year of Wonders 1666. An Hiſtorical Poem [F]. In 1668, upon the death of Sir William D'Avenant, he was made Poet Laureat (d), and the ſame year publiſhed an Eſſay of Dramatick Poeſy, London 1668 in 4to [G]. In 1669

(d) Idem, ibid.

X.

" And yet dominion was not his deſign;
" We owe that bleſſing not to him, but heaven,
" Which to fair acts unſought rewards did join;
" Rewards that leſs to him than us were given.

XI.

" Our former Chiefs like ſticklers for the war,
" Firſt ſought t'inflame the parties, then to poiſe;
" The quarrel lov'd, but did the cauſe abhor,
" And did not ſtrike to hurt, but made a noiſe.

XII.

" War, our conſumption, was their gainful trade;
" He inward bled, whilſt they prolong'd our pain;
" He fought to hinder fighting, and aſſay'd
" To ſtanch the blood by breathing of the vein.

XXXIII.

" Such was our Prince, yet own'd a ſoul above
" The higheſt acts it could produce to ſhew:
" Thus poor mechanick arts in publick move
" Whilſt the deep ſecrets beyond practice go."

XXXIV.

" His lateſt victories ſtill thickeſt came,
" As near the center, motion doth encreaſe;
" Till he preſs'd down by his own weighty name,
" Did, like the Veſtal, under ſpoils decreaſe.

XXXV.

" But firſt the ocean as a tribute ſent
" That giant Prince of all her watry herd;
" And th' Iſle, when her protecting genius went,
" Upon his obſequies lough ſighs conferr'd.

XXXVII.

" His aſhes in a peaceful urn ſhall reſt,
" His name a great example ſtand, to ſhew
" How ſtrangely high endeavours may be bleſt,
" Where Piety and Valour jointly go."

[C] His Poem, intitled, Aſtræa redux &c.] It is reprinted in the Firſt Part of the Miſcellany Poems (2). In this Poem is the famous line, which has been treated with great ridicule. We ſhall give the verſes, which introduce it, as they ſtand in the Miſcellany Poems:

(2) Pag. 241, & ſeqq.

Thus when black clouds draw down the lab'ring ſkies,
E'er yet abroad the winged thunder flies,
An horrid ſtillneſs firſt invades the Ear,
And in that ſilence we a tempeſt fear.

Capt. Alexander Radcliff alludes to this in the following lines (3).

(3) News from Hell, reprinted in the Miſcellany Poems, Part 2. pag. 100.

" Laureat (4), who was both learned and florid,
" Was damned long ſince for ſilence horrid:
" Nor had there been ſuch clutter made
" But that his ſilence did invade:
" Invade! and ſo 't might well, that's clear;
" But what did it invade? an Ear.
" And for ſome other things, 'tis true,
" We follow fate that does purſue."

(4) Dryden.

[D] In 1662 on New-Year's day he preſented a Poem to the Lord Chancellor Hyde.] It is reprinted in the Firſt Part of the Miſcellany Poems publiſhed by Mr. Dryden (*).

(*) Pag. 253, & ſeqq. 4th edit. London 1716.

[E] In 1665 he wrote a Poem to her Royal Highneſs the Ducheſs &c.] This is inſerted in his account of his Poem intitled Annus Mirabilis, in a Letter to Sir Robert Howard; where he tells us, that ſome who had ſeen thoſe verſes to the Ducheſs, accuſed them of that only thing, ſays he, I could defend in them; they ſaid I did humi ſerpere; that I wanted not only height of fancy, but dignity of words to ſet it off. I might well anſwer with that of Horace, Nunc non erat his locus: I knew I addreſſed them to a Lady, and accordingly I affected the ſoftneſs of expreſſion, and the ſmoothneſs of meaſure, rather than the height of thought; and in what I did endeavour, it is no vanity to ſay I have ſucceeded.

[F] His Annus Mirabilis: The Year of Wonders, 1668: An Hiſtorical Poem.] It was printed at London 1667 in 12mo. There is prefixed to it an Account of the Poem in a Letter to Sir Robert Howard, dated at Charlton in Wiltſhire, Nov. the 10th, 1666. In the Letter he obſerves, that he choſe to write in Quatrains or Stanza's of four in alternate rhyme, becauſe he ever judged them more noble and of greater dignity both for the ſound and number, than any other verſe in uſe amongſt us. The learned languages have certainly a great advantage of us in not being tied to the ſlavery of any rhyme; and were leſs conſtrained in the quantity of every ſyllable, which they might vary with ſpondees or dactyles; beſides ſo many other helps of grammatical figures for the lengthening or abbreviation of them, than the modern are in the cloſe of that one ſyllable, which often confines, and more often corrupts the ſenſe of all the reſt. " But " in this neceſſity of our rhymes, continues our Author, " I have always found the couplet verſe moſt eaſy " (though not ſo proper for this occaſion,) for there " the work is ſooner at an end, every two lines con- " cluding the labour of the Poet. But in Quatrains " he is to carry it farther on; and not only ſo, but " to bear along in his head the troubleſome ſenſe of " four lines together. For thoſe who write correctly " in this kind, muſt needs acknowledge, that the laſt " line of the Stanza is to be conſidered in the com- " poſition of the firſt. Neither can we give our- " ſelves the liberty of making any part of a verſe " for the ſake of rhyme, or concluding with a word, " which is not current Engliſh, or uſing the variety " of female rhymes; all which our fathers practiſed; " and for the female rhymes, they are ſtill in uſe " amongſt other nations; with the Italian in every " line, with the Spaniard promiſcuouſly, with the " French alternately; as thoſe who have read the Ala- " rique, the Pucelle, or any of their late Poems will " agree with me. And beſides this, they write in " Alexandrins, or verſes of ſix feet, ſuch as amongſt " us is the old tranſlation of Homer by Chapman; all " which by lengthening of their chain makes the ſphere " of their activity the larger." He afterwards remarks, that Virgil was his Maſter in this Poem; and that he has followed him every where, I know not, ſays he, with what ſucceſs; but I am ſure with diligence enough. My images are many of them copied from him, and the reſt are imitations of him. My expreſſions alſo are as near as the idiom of the two languages would admit of in tranſlation. However the XVIth Stanza of this Poem is hardly ſuitable to the ſimplicity of his Maſter Virgil:

" To ſee this fleet upon the ocean move,
" Angels drew wide the curtain of the ſkies.
" And heav'n, as if there wanted lights above,
" For tapers made two glaring Comets riſe."

[G] His Eſſay of Dramatick Poeſie.] There was another Edition printed at London 1693 in 4to. and dedicated by the Author to Charles Earl Dorſet and Middleſex; in which dedication he obſerves, that the writing of this Eſſay ſerved as an amuſement to him in the country, when the violence of the laſt plague in 1665 had driven him from the town; and that he finds many things in it, which he does not now approve, his judgment being not a little altered ſince the writing of it; but whether, ſays he, for the better or worſe

1669 his Comedy, intitled, The Wild Gallant, was acted at the Theatre-Royal; after which he wrote a great number of dramatick performances, which we ſhall give a liſt of in the note [H], and which Mr. Gerard Langbaine (e) has for the moſt part treated with great ſeverity, and repreſented our Poet as a Plagiary; upon which account Mr. Langbaine has been cenſured by the anonymous writer of the lives and characters of the Engliſh Dramatick Poets (f); tho' the latter owns, that "Mr. Dryden has borrowed from "the French, at the ſame time that he ſeems to contemn them; unleſs it may be pre- "tended

(e) Account of the Engliſh Dramatic Poets, pag. 230, & ſeqq.

(f) Lives and Characters of the Engliſh Dramatic Poets, &c. Firſt begun by Mr. Langbain, improved and continued down to this time by a careful Hand, pag. 40, 41. edit. London in 8vo.

worſe I know not; neither indeed is it much material in an Eſſay, where all I have ſaid is problematical. For the way of writing Plays in verſe, which I have ſeemed to favour, I have ſince that time laid the practice of it aſide, till I have more leiſure, becauſe I find it troubleſome and ſlow. But I am no way altered from my opinion of it, at leaſt with any reaſons, which have oppoſed it. For your Lordſhip may eaſily obſerve, that none are very violent againſt it, but thoſe who either have not attempted it, or who have ill ſucceeded in their attempt. In the Preface to the Reader, he informs us, that the drift of this Eſſay was chiefly to vindicate the honour of our Engliſh Writers from the cenſure of thoſe, who unjuſtly prefer the French before them. This he intimates, leſt any ſhould think him ſo exceeding vain, as to teach others an art, which they underſtand much better than himſelf. "But "if this incorrect Eſſay, ſays he, written in the "country without the help of Books, or advice of "friends, ſhall find any acceptance in the world, I "promiſe to my ſelf a better ſucceſs of the Second "Part, wherein I ſhall more fully treat of the vir- "tues and faults of the Engliſh Poets, who have writ- "ten either in this, the epique, or the lyrique way." Sir Robert Howard in the Preface to his Great Favourite, or the Duke of Lerma, printed at London 1668 in 4to. made ſome animadverſions upon this Eſſay; to which Mr. Dryden replied in his Defence of it prefixed to the ſecond Edition of his Indian Emperor: but upon ſome conſiderations, ſays Mr. Langbaine (5), our Author was obliged to retract it. In this Defence he tells us, that his chief endeavours are to delight the age, in which he lives. "If the humour of this age, "ſays he, be for Low Comedy, ſmall accidents and "raillery, I will force my genius to obey it, tho' "with more reputation I could write in verſe. I "know I am not ſo fitted by nature to write Comedy. "I want that gaiety of humour, which is required in "it. My converſation is ſlow and dull, my humour "ſaturnine and reſerved. In ſhort, I am none of "thoſe, who endeavour to break jeſts in company, "or make repartees. So that thoſe, who decry my "Comedies, do me no injury, except it be in point "of profit: Reputation in them is the laſt thing, to "which I ſhall pretend." Mr. Gildon tells us (6), ihat in this Eſſay, as well as in his Prefaces, there is ſcarce one juſt criticiſm in ten.

(5) Account of the Engliſh Dramatic Poets. By Gerard Langbaine, pag. 165. edit. Oxford 1691 in 8vo.

(6) Laws of Poetry, as laid down by the Duke of Buckinghamſhire in his Eſſay of Poetry. By the Earl of Roſcommon &c. pag. 61. edit. London 1721.

[H] He wrote a great number of Dramatic Performances, which we ſhall give a Liſt of in the Note.] The Indian Emperor: or The Conqueſt of Mexico by the Spaniards; being the ſequel of the Indian Queen. London 1667 in 4to. The Dedication to Anne Ducheſs of Monmouth and Bucclugh is dated October 12th 1676. Tyrannick Love: or The Royal Martyr, a Tragedy. London 1670 in 4to. He tells us in the Preface, that it was contrived and written in ſeven weeks. The Tempeſt; or The Inchanted Iſland, a Comedy. This Play was originally Shakeſpear's, and was alter'd by Mr. Dryden and Sir William D'avenant. The comical parts of the Sailors were of Sir William's invention, and for the moſt part of his writing. An Evening's Love, or The Mock-Aſtrologer, a Comedy. London 1671 in 4to. Secret Love: or The Maiden-Queen, a Tragedy. Amboyna, a Tragedy. London 1673 in 4to. Marriage a la mode, a Comedy. London 1673 in 4to. The Miſtaken Huſband, a Comedy. London 1675 in 4to. Mr. Langbaine tells us (7), that our Poet "was not the Author "of it, tho' it was adopted by him, as an orphan, "which might well deſerve the charity of a ſcene, "which he beſtowed on it." Aureng-zebe, a Tragedy. London 1676 in 4to. All for Love: or The World well loſt, a Tragedy. London 1678 in 4to. The State of Innocence: or The Fall of Man, an Opera in Heroic Verſe. London 1678 in 4to. To this piece is prefixed an Apology for Heroic Poetry, and Poetick Licence. Mr. Nath. Lee in his Verſes to our Author upon this Opera has the following lines:

(7) Account of the Engliſh Dramatick Poets, pag. 166.

"To the dead Bard your fame a little owes,
"For Milton did the wealthy mine diſcloſe.
"And rudely caſt what you could well diſpoſe:
"He roughly drew on an old-faſhioned ground,
"A chaos; for no perfect world was found,
"Till through the heap your mighty genius ſhin'd:
"He was the golden ore, which you refin'd."

But theſe lines will, as Mr. Dryden himſelf obſerves (8), rather be eſteemed the effect of Mr. Lee's Love to him, than his deliberate and ſober judgment. Feigned Innocence; or Sir Martin Mar-all, a Comedy. London 1678 in 4to. The Aſſignation: or Love in a Nunnery, a Comedy. London 1678 in 4to. The Conqueſts of Granada, in two parts. London 1678 in 4to. To the firſt part is prefixed An Eſſay on Heroick Plays; and to the latter he has ſubjoined a Defence of the Epilogue, or an Eſſay on the Dramatick Poetry of the laſt Age. Troilus and Creſſida: or Truth found out too late, a Tragedy. London 1679 in 4to. This Play was originally written by Shakeſpear; but the plot is new modelled by our Author. The Preface to it contains a Diſcourſe concerning the Grounds of Criticiſm in Tragedy. Oedipus, a Tragedy. London 1679 in 4to. It was written by Mr. Dryden in conjunction with Mr. N. Lee. Mr. Langbaine affirms (9), that "this "Play is certainly one of the beſt Tragedies we have, "the Authors having borrowed many ornaments, not "only from Sophocles, but alſo from Seneca." The Rival Ladies, a Tragi-Comedy. London 1679 in 4to. The kind Keeper: or Mr. Limberham, a Comedy. London 1680 in 8vo. This Play was ſuffered to be acted but thrice. The Spaniſh Fryar: or The Double Diſcovery, a Tragi-Comedy. The Epilogue, ſaid to be writtten by a friend of the Author, is, as well as the Play, very ſevere upon the Romiſh Clergy. The Duke of Guiſe, a Tragedy. London 1683 in 4to. It was written by our Author in conjunction with Mr. Lee. Albion and Albanius, an Opera performed at the Queen's Theatre in Dorſet-Garden. London 1685 in fol. In the Preface he tells us, that it was originally intended only for a Prologue to a Play of the nature of the Tempeſt, and that "the ſubject of it is wholly al- "legorical; and the Allegory itſelf ſo very obvious, "that it will no ſooner be read than underſtood." Mr. Langbaine obſerves upon this (10), that "by the "man on the pedeſtal, who is drawn with a long, "lean, pale face, with fiends wings, and ſnakes twiſt- "ed round his body, and encompaſſed by ſeveral fa- "natical rebellious heads, who ſuck poiſon from him, "which run out of a tap in his ſide, is meant the "Lord Shafteſbury (11) and his adherents." Don Sebaſtian King of Portugal, a Tragedy. London 1690 in 4to. Amphytrion; or the two Soſias, a Comedy. London 1691 in 4to. King Arthur; or The Britiſh Worthy, a Tragedy. London 1691 in 4to. Cleomenes, the Spartan Heroe, a Tragedy. London 1692 in 4to. In the Preface he tells us, that it was then ſeven or eight years ſince he deſigned to write this Play. It was at firſt prohibited by the Lord Chamberlain to be acted; but upon examination being found innocent of any deſign to ſatirize the Government, was ſuffered to be repreſented, and had great ſucceſs. He obſerves, that "a fooliſh objection was raiſed a- "gainſt him by the ſparks for Cleomenes not accept- "ing the favours of Caſſandra. They would not "have refuſed a fair Lady. I grant, ſays he, they "would not; but let them grant me, that they are "not Heroes; and ſo much for the point of honour. "A man might have pleaded an excuſe for himſelf, if "he had been falſe to an old wife, for the ſake of a "young miſtreſs; but Cleora was in the flower of her "age, and it was yet but honey-moon with Cleome- "nes;

(8) Apology for Heroick Poetry and Poetick Licence.

(9) Pag. 167.

(10) Pag. 152.

(11) Lord High Chancellor in the reign of King Charles II.

" tended that he has uſed them as Virgil did Ennius of old, to extract gold out of their " dung. For I never found him, continues that writer, in any theft indeed, but what he " gave a new luſtre to, when taken even from the beſt of the antients." The ſame Author likewiſe is of opinion that our Poet's Dramatick Pieces, if we take our ſtandard of their excellence from the antients, are the moſt incorrect of any of his productions. There is generally indeed the ſublime, but very rarely the pathetic; for in all his Plays he has not touched Compaſſion above thrice, and that but weakly. Terror he has often hit on. Mr. Gildon has alſo criticiſed upon his Tragedies [I]. But perhaps his greateſt defects aroſe from his conforming himſelf to the popular taſte [K]; and he tells us himſelf (b) that his Spaniſh Friar was given to the people; and that he never wrote any thing to pleaſe himſelf, but Anthony and Cleopatra. In 1671 he with ſome other writers was ridiculed with great pleaſantry in the Rehearſal a Comedy [L]. The year following there was publiſhed the Hiſtory of Henry IV, ſurnamed the Great, King of France and Navarre. Written originally in French by the Biſhop of Rodez, once Tutor to his now moſt Chriſtian Majeſty; and made Engliſh by J. D. (i), whom ſome have ſuppoſed to be our Poet; but it was probably John Davies of Kidwelly, a great Tranſlator of that time. In 1673 his Conqueſt of Granada was attacked by Mr. Richard Leigh a Player belonging to the Duke of York's Theatre, in a Pamphlet intitled, a Cenſure of the Rota: on Mr. Dryden's Conqueſt of Granada, Oxford 1673 in 4to; which occaſioned ſeveral other Pamphlets, particularly, The friendly Vindication of Mr. Dryden from the Cenſure of the Rota. Cambridge 1673, in 4to. Mr. Dryden vindicated in a Reply to the Friendly Vindication of Mr. Dryden; with Reflections on the Rota. London 1673 in 4to; and A Deſcription of the Academy of the Athenian Virtuoſi, with a Diſcourſe held there in Vindication of Mr. Dryden's Conqueſt of Granada againſt the Author of the Cenſure of the Rota. London 1673 in 4to. Mr. Elkanah Settle likewiſe criticiſed on this Play of our Author

(b) Preface to this Tranſlation of Du Freſnoy's Art of Painting, pag. 68. edit. London 1716, in 8vo.

(i) London 1672, in 8vo.

" nes; and ſo much for nature. Some have told me, " that many of the fair ſex complain for want of " tender ſcenes and ſoft expreſſions of love. I will " endeavour to make them ſome amends, if I write " again; and my next Heroe ſhall be no Spartan." Love triumphant: or Nature will prevail, a Tragi-Comedy. London 1694 in 4to.

[I] Mr. Gildon alſo has criticized upon his Tragedies.] That Writer having obſerved (12), that Otway, who was a perfect maſter of the Tragic Paſſions, every where draws them with that natural ſimplicity recommended in the Duke of Buckinghamſhire's Eſſay on Poetry, tells us, that Mr. Dryden, " who affects a " quite different ſtyle, that ſtyle which is condemned by " the Eſſay, ſeldom or never touches the Paſſions, at " leaſt till he had left off in a great meaſure that uni- " formity of Diction, that perpetual ſwelling, and " continual tropological expreſſion, and endeavoured " here and there more nearly to imitate nature, in a " juſt ſimplicity of the language. But this was not " his natural inclination, nor a road, that he was fond " of travelling, but only deviated ſometimes into it by " a happy chance. That this was his true Guſto " is pretty plain from two inſtances; the firſt is, that " when the Tranſlation of Euripides was recommend- " ed to him, inſtead of that of Homer, he replied, " That he confeſſed that he had no reliſh of that Poet, " who was a maſter of the Tragic Simplicity. The " other is, that for the moſt part of his time he com- " monly expreſſed a very mean, if not contemptible " opinion of Otway; tho' at laſt, eſpecially in his " Preface to Freſnoy, he declared in his favour; and " yet even here he could not but throw in ſome ex- " ceptions againſt his Diction." Mr. Gildon afterwards remarks (13), that pompous expreſſion (to give it no worſe a name) was brought into Tragedy ſoon after the Reſtoration by Mr. Dryden, and ſome other Poets, by which they did more injury to Tragedy than they did good to it by their nearer approaches to a regularity in other particulars: for that affectation of fine language (as they call it) and idle deſcriptions, leads the Poets from nature, which ought more to be their ſtudy, than thoſe Dalilah's of the Stage, as Dryden calls them, which have given ſucceſs to Plays above theſe fifty years. The occaſion of Mr. Dryden's taking up this way was his great converſation with French Romances, and little acquaintance with and reliſh of the true and beautiful ſimplicity of nature.

(12) Laws of Poetry, as laid down by the Duke of Buckinghamſhire in his Eſſay on Poetry; by the Earl of Roſcommon in his Eſſay on Tranſlated Verſe; and by the Lord Lanſdowne on unnatural Flights in Poetry, explained and illuſtrated, pag. 211. edit. London 1721, in 8vo.

(13) Pag. 212, 213.

[K] But perhaps his greateſt defects aroſe from his conforming himſelf to the popular taſte.] The late Lord Lanſdowne (14) has the following lines on this ſubject:

" Dryden himſelf, to pleaſe a frantic Age,
" Was forc'd to let his judgment ſtoop to rage:
" To a wild audience he conformed his voice,
" Comply'd to cuſtom, but not err'd thro' choice.
" Deem then the people's, not the writer's ſin,
" Almanzor's rage, and rants of Maximin.
" That fury ſpent, in each elaborate piece
" He vies for fame with antient Rome and Greece."

(14) Concerning unnatural Flights in Poetry.

Mr. Gildon obſerves upon theſe Verſes (15), that Mr. Dryden in one of his Prologues has theſe two lines;

He's bound to pleaſe, not to write well, and knows,
There is a mode in Plays, as well as cloaths.

(15) Laws of Poetry, pag. 350.

" Let the cenſurers of Mr. Dryden therefore, ſays Mr. " Gildon, be ſatisfied, that where he has ex- " poſed himſelf to be criticized, it has been only when " he has endeavoured to follow the faſhion, to humour " others, and not to pleaſe himſelf." Mr. Dryden likewiſe cenſures himſelf in the following paſſage (16): I remember ſome Verſes of my own, Maximin and Almanzor, which cry vengeance upon me for their extravagance, &c. All I can ſay for thoſe paſſages, which are, I hope, not many, is, that I knew they were bad enough to pleaſe, even when I writ them. But I repent of them among my ſins: and if any of their fellows intrude by chance into my preſent writing, I draw a ſtroke over all thoſe Dalilah's of the Theatre, and am reſolved I will ſettle myſelf no reputation by the applauſe of fools. 'Tis not that I am mortified to all ambition, but I ſcorn as much to take it from half-witted judges, as I ſhould to raiſe an eſtate by cheating of bubbles; neither do I diſcommend the lofty ſtyle in Tragedy, which is naturally pompous and magnificent. But nothing it truly ſublime, that is not juſt and proper.

(16) Epiſtle Dedicatory to the Spaniſh Fryar.

[L] The Rehearſal.] This was the firſt time acted on the 7th of December 1671, and ſeveral times after printed in 4to, and the 4th edition was publiſhed in 1683. It is ſaid, that the Duke of Buckingham in writing this Play had the aſſiſtance of Dr. Thomas Sprat, his Chaplain, afterwards Biſhop of Rocheſter, Mr. Martin Clifford, Maſter of the Charter-Houſe, and Mr. Samuel Butler, Author of Hudibras (17). Mr. Wood obſerves (18), that in this piece he ſatyrizes Mr. Dryden, and ſeveral of his Plays; among which Mr. Langbaine (19) particularly mentions the Conqueſt of Granada, Tyrannick Love, and Love in a Nunnery. Mr. Dryden tells us (20), that he anſwered not the Rehearſal, becauſe I knew, ſays he, the Author ſate to himſelf, when he drew the picture, and was the very Bays of his own farce; becauſe alſo I knew, that my betters were more concerned than I was in that Satyr: and laſtly becauſe Mr. Smith and Mr. Johnſon, the main pillars of it, were two ſuch languiſhing Gentlemen in their converſation, that I could liken them to nothing but to their own relations, thoſe noble characters of men of wit and pleaſure about the town.

(17) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 804.

(18) Ibid.

(19) Pag. 546, 547.

(20) Dedication of the Satyrs of Juvenal and Perſius, tranſlated into Engliſh Verſe by Mr. Dryden and ſeveral other eminent Hands, pag. 12. 6th edit. London 1735.

Author [M]. And it is remarkable that ſo inconſiderable a Poet as Mr. Settle was the mighty rival of Mr. Dryden; and for many years bore his reputation above him (*). In November 1679 an Eſſay on Satyr being ſpread about the city in manuſcript, in which many groſs reflections were made upon the Ducheſs of Portſmouth and John Wilmot Earl of Rocheſter, and they ſuſpecting Mr. Dryden to be the Author of it, "one or both hiring three men to "cudgel him, they effected their buſineſs in Will's Coffee-Houſe in Covent-Garden at eight "of the clock at night on Dec. 16, 1679; yet afterwards John Earl of Mulgrave was ge-"nerally thought to be the author (k)." In 1680 he publiſh'd a Tranſlation of Ovid's Epiſtles into Engliſh Verſe by ſeveral hands, ſeveral of which Epiſtles were done by himſelf; and he wrote the Preface to it. In 1681 he publiſhed his Abſalom and Achitophel [N], in which having expoſed the Duke of Buckingham under the character of Zimri, it occaſioned a ſtory that his Grace had procured him to be beaten; but this, as Mr. Wood aſſures us (l), was falſe; ſince the Duke only wrote or cauſed to be written Reflections on that Poem. The ſame year he likewiſe publiſhed his Poem, intitled The Medall, a Satyr againſt Sedition. By the Author of Abſalom and Achitophel [O]. In 1682 his Religio Laici was printed [P]; and the year following the Tragedy of The Duke of Guiſe, written by him and Mr. Nathaniel Lee, gave great offence to the Whigs, and was attacked by ſeveral writers. [Q]. In the reign (*) Diſſertation concerning the Perfection of the Engliſh Language, the State of Poetry, &c. prefixed to Epiſtles, Odes, &c. written on ſeveral Subjects. By Mr. Welſted, pag. 41. 2d edit. London 1725, in 12mo.

(k) Wood, col. 805, 806. See likewiſe the Earl of Mulgrave's Eſſay on Poetry, in that part which relates to Satyr.

(l) Ibid.

[M] Mr. Elkanah Settle likewiſe criticized on this Play of our Author.] Mr. Settle having written a Tragedy, intitled, The Empreſs of Morocco, London 1673 in 4to, it was attacked in a Pamphlet intitled, Notes and Obſervations on The Empreſs of Morocco; or ſome few Errata's to be printed inſtead of the Sculptures with the ſecond Edition of that Play. London 1674 in 4to, which was ſuppoſed by Mr. Settle to be written by Mr. Dryden in conjunction with Mr. Thomas Shadwell and the Author of Pandion and Amphigenia. Upon this Mr. Settle wrote Notes and Obſervations on The Empreſs of Morocco reviſed with ſome few Errata's to be printed inſtead of the Poſtſcript, with the next Edition of The Conqueſt of Granada. London 1674 in 4to. This Pamphlet is probably the ſame with that publiſhed in 1687 in 4to under the title of Reflections on ſeveral of Mr. Dryden's Plays; particularly the firſt and ſecond part of the Conqueſt of Granada. By E. Settle Gent.

[N] In 1681 he publiſhed his Abſalom and Achitophel.] There were ſeveral editions of it printed in a ſhort time; and commendatory verſes written to the then unknown and concealed Author of it by Mr. Nathaniel Lee, Mr. Richard Duke, and Mr. N. Tate. It was tranſlated into Latin by Mr. William Coward, afterwards an eminent Phyſician in London, and printed at Oxford 1682 in 4to; and by Mr. Francis Atterbury, afterwards Biſhop of Rocheſter, in conjunction with Mr. Francis Hickman, and printed at Oxford the ſame year in 4to. In the Preface to the Second Part of this Poem (21), reprinted in the Miſcellany Poems publiſhed by Mr. Dryden (22), we are informed, that our Author undertook the firſt Part of this Poem in 1680 upon the deſire of King Charles II; and that the performance was applauded by every one; and that ſeveral perſons preſſing him to write a ſecond Part, he upon declining it himſelf, ſpoke to Mr. Tate to write one, and gave him his advice in the direction of it; and that part beginning,

(21) It was firſt printed at London 1682, in fol.

(22) Part 2. 4th edit. London 1716.

Next theſe a troop of buſy ſpirits preſs,

and ending,

To talk like Doeg, and to write like thee, containing near two hundred verſes, were entirely of Mr. Dryden's compoſition, beſides ſome touches in other places. In anſwer to the firſt Part was publiſhed Azaria and Huſhai, a Poem. London 1682 in 4to. ſaid to be written by Mr. Elkanah Settle.

[O] His Poem, intitled, The Medal, a ſatyr againſt Sedition.] It was written upon occaſion of a Medal ſtruck on account of the indictment againſt Anthony Earl of Shaftſbury being found Ignoramus by the Grand Jury at the Old Bailey London in November 1681. Mr. Elkanah Settle wrote in anſwer to this Poem another, intitled, The Medal revers'd. London 1681 in 4to.

[P] In 1682 his Religio Laici was printed.] It is intitled, Religio Laici; or, a Layman's Faith. A Poem. In the Preface he informs us, that it was written for an ingenious young Gentleman, his friend, upon his tranſlation of father Simon's Critical Hiſtory of the Old Teſtament; and that the verſes are addreſſed to the Tranſlator of that Work, and the ſtyle of them is, what it ought to be, Epiſtolary. If any one be ſo lamentable a critick as to require the ſmoothneſs, the numbers, and the turn of Heroick Poetry in the Poem; I muſt tell 'em that if he has not read Horace, I have ſtudied him, and hope the ſtyle of his Epiſtles is not ill imitated here. He obſerves likewiſe, that it had always been his thought, "that Heathens, who never "did, nor without a Miracle could hear of the name "of Chriſt, were yet in all poſſibility of ſalvation. "Neither will it, continues he, enter eaſily into my "belief, that before the coming of our Saviour, the "whole world, excepting only the Jewiſh nation, "ſhould lie under the inevitable neceſſity of everlaſting "puniſhment for want of that Revelation, which was "confined to ſo ſmall a ſpot of ground as that of "Paleſtine." He proceeds then to juſtify the following lines in that Poem:

Then thoſe, who followed reaſon's dictates right,
Liv'd up, and lifted high their natural light;
With Socrates may ſee their Maker's face,
While thouſand Rubrick Martyrs want a place.
Nor doth it haulk my charity, to find
*Th' Egyptian Biſhop * of another mind:*
For tho' his Creed eternal truth contains,
'Tis hard for man to doom to endleſs pains
All who believ'd not all his zeal requir'd;
Unleſs he firſt could prove he was inſpir'd.
Then let us either think he meant to ſay
This Faith, where publiſh'd, was the only way;
Or elſe conclude, that Arius to confute,
The good old man, too eager in diſpute,
Flew high, and as his Chriſtian fury roſe,
Damn'd all for heretics, who durſt oppoſe.

* St. Athanaſius.

[Q] The Tragedy of the Duke of Guiſe.] This Play was immediately attacked in a Pamphlet, intitled, A Defence of the Charter and Municipal Rights of the City of London, and the Rights of other Municipal Cities and Towns of England. Directed to the Citizens of London. By Thomas Hunt. London in 4to. In this Piece Mr. Hunt tells us (23), that the Charter and City of London were already condemned, and the Magiſtrates executed in effigy in Mr. Dryden's Duke of Guiſe, "frequently acted and applauded, intended "moſt certainly to provoke the rabble into tumults "and diſorders:" He then makes ſeveral remarks upon the deſign of the Play, and aſſerts (24), that our Poet's Province was to corrupt the manners of the nation, and lay waſte their morals; and that his endeavours were more happily applied to extinguiſh the little remains of the virtue of the age by bold impieties, and befooling Religion by impious and inept rhimes; to confound virtue and vice, good and evil, and leave us without conſciences. About the ſame time were printed likewiſe Some Reflections upon the Pretended Parallel in the Play called, The Duke of Guiſe (25). London 1683 in 4to. The Author of this Pamphlet tells us (26) that he was wearied with the dulneſs of this Play, and extreamly incenſed at the wicked and barbarous deſign it was intended for; and that the fierceſt "Tories "have been aſhamed of this Piece;" in ſhort that he "never

(23) Pag. 24.

(24) Pag. 30.

(25) Mr. Dryden in his Vindication of the Parallel &c. pag. 40. tells us, that Mr. Tho. Shadwell the Poet, made the rough draught of this Pamphlet, and that Mr. Tho. Hunt finiſhed it.

(26) Pag. 1, 2.

reign of James II he reconciled himſelf to the Church of Rome [R]; and in 1686 wrote a Defence of the Papers written by the late King of bleſſed memory, and found in his ſtrong box [S], in oppoſition to Dr. Edward Stillingfleet's Anſwer to ſome papers lately printed, concerning the Authority of the Catholick Church in Matters of Faith, and the Reformation of the Church of England. London 1686 in 4to. Upon which Dr. Stillingfleet publiſhed A Vindication of the Anſwer to ſome late Papers [T]. London 1687 in 4to. In 1687 Mr. Dryden publiſhed his Hind and Panther: A Poem [V]; which was immediately

" never ſaw any thing that could be called a Play, " more deficient in wit, good character, or entertain- " ment, than this is." He remarks, that he was informed, that it was written by another Gentleman with an intention to expoſe the villany of the Papiſts in the maſſacre at Paris; " and Mr. Bays himſelf, as " I am told, continues he, expreſſed then an intention " of writing the ſtory of the Sicilian Veſpers, to lay " open the treacherous, inhumane, bloody principles " of the Diſciples of that Scarlet Whore. But he " is ſince fallen from all modeſty and good ſenſe, and " is not content with his own devil-like fall, but like " old Satan, he tempts his friend, poiſons and per- " verts his good intentions, and by his wicked ma- " nagement of the Play turns it from the honeſt aim " of the firſt Author to ſo diabolical an end, as me- " thinks it ſhould make a civil government bluſh to " ſuffer, or not to put the higheſt mark of infamy " upon it. But it is obſervable, though this could " not be acted as it was firſt written againſt the Papiſts, " yet when it was turned upon Proteſtants it found " reception. . . . It is not enough, when he meets " ſome of his old acquaintance (whom he knows to " be of an opinion, which he once profeſſed to be " of, and much different from what he now pretends) " that he thinks as they do ſtill, but he muſt write as " he does, he is put upon it, &c. For certainly moſt " exemplary puniſhment is due to him for his devi- " liſh parallel; and methinks Magiſtrates, that reſpect " their oaths and office, ſhould put the Law in execu- (27) Ibid. pag. 2, 3. " tion againſt this lewd ſcribler (27)." In anſwer to this and Mr. Hunt's Pamphlet, Mr. Dryden publiſhed, The Vindication: or the Parallel of the French Holy League, and the Engliſh League and Covenant, turned into a Seditious Libell againſt the King and his Royal Highneſs by Thomas Hunt and the Authors of the Reflections upon the pretended Parallel in the Play called The Duke of Guiſe. London 1683 in 4to. In this Vindication he tells us, that in the year of the Reſtoration the firſt Play he undertook was The Duke of Guiſe, as the faireſt way, which The Act of Indemnity had then left, of ſetting forth the riſe of the late Rebellion. As this was his firſt Eſſay, ſo it met with the fortune of an unfiniſhed Piece; that is to ſay, it was damned in private by the advice of ſome friends to whom he ſhewed it; who freely told him, that it was an excellent ſubject, but not ſo artificially wrought, as they could have wiſhed. The ſcene of the Duke of Guiſe's return to Paris againſt the King's poſitive command was then written. He afterwards informs us, that it was at Mr. Lee's earneſt deſire, without any ſollicitation of our Author's, that this Play was produced betwixt them; and that after the writing of OEdipus, he paſſed a promiſe to join with Mr. Lee in another; and he happened, ſays Mr. Dryden, to claim the performance of that promiſe juſt upon the finiſhing of a Poem, when I would have been glad of a little reſpite before the undertaking of a ſecond taſk. . . . . Two thirds of it belonged to him; and then to me only the firſt ſcene of the Play, the whole fourth act, and the firſt half or ſomewhat more of the fifth.

[R] He reconciled himſelf to the Church of Rome.] Mr. Thomas Browne wrote upon this occaſion, The Reaſons of Mr. Bays's changing his Religion conſidered, in a Dialogue between Crites, Eugenius, and Mr. Bays. London 1688 in five ſheets and a half in 4to. The ſame Writer afterwards publiſhed another Pamphlet, intitled, The late Converts expoſed: or the Reaſons of Mr. Bays's changing his Religion conſidered, in a Dialogue. Part the ſecond (28). London 1690 in 4to. There was another Pamphlet likewiſe written againſt our Author, intitled, The Revolter: a Tragi-Comedy acted between the Hind and Panther, and Religio Laici. London 1687 in 4to. pagg. 32.

(28) It was licenſed Jan. 8, 1689.

[S] His Defence of the Papers written by the late King of bleſſed memory, and found in his ſtrong Box.] The Author of the Continuation of the preſent State of the Controverſy between the Church of England and the Church of Rome; being a full account of the Books that have been of late written on both ſides (29), tells us, that this tract of Mr. Dryden " is very light, and " in ſome places even ridiculous, and which ſhews, " that the Author's talent lies towards controverſy no " more in proſe, than it appears by the Hind and " Panther, that it does in verſe." In this Piece Mr. Dryden aſſerts (30), that the Church is more viſible than Scripture, becauſe the Scripture is ſeen by the Church, for which he brings St. Auguſtin's authority. And if by ſaying that the Scripture is in print, be underſtood a thing out of queſtion, then he denies it to be viſible, that the Scripture is in print, becauſe many men do call Scripture in queſtion at this day; and to queſtion whether the Book in print be Scripture, is manifeſtly to queſtion whether Scripture be in print. He affirms likewiſe (31), " that the Pillars of the Church eſtabliſh'd by " Law are to be found but broken ſtaffs by their own " conceſſions. For after all their undertaking to heal a " wounded conſcience, they leave their Proſelytes fi- " nally to the Scripture, as our Phyſicians, when they " have emptied the pockets of their Patients, with- " out curing them, ſend them at laſt to Tunbridge " Waters, or the air of Montpellier;" that we are reformed from the virtues of good living, i. e. from the devotions, mortifications, auſterities, humility, and charity, which are practiſed in Catholick Countries, by the example and precept of that lean mortified Apoſtle St. Martin Luther (32); that the Reformation in England " was erected on the foundation of luſt, ſa- " crilege, and uſurpation; and that no paint is ca- " pable of making lively the hideous face of the pre- " tended Reformation (33)."

(29) Pag. 28. edit. London 1688 in 4to. The Imprimatur of this piece is date! June the 7th 1688.

(30) Defence, pag. 2, 3.

(31) Ibid. pag. 94.

(32) Ibid. pag. 98.

(33) Ibid. pag. 117, 122.

[T] A Vindication of the Anſwer to ſome late Papers &c.] The Author treats Mr. Dryden with ſome ſeverity. If I thought, ſays he*, there were no ſuch thing in the world as true Religion, and that the Prieſts of all Religions are alike, I might have been as nimble a Convert, and as early a Defender of the Royal Papers, as any one of theſe Champions. For why ſhould not one who believes no Religion, declare for any? Mr. Dryden refers to this Vindication in the Preface to his Hind and Panther; where he writes thus: " I " refer my ſelf to the judgment of thoſe who have " read the Anſwer to the Defence of the late King's " Papers and that of the Ducheſs (in which laſt I " was concerned) how charitably I have been repre- " ſented there. I am now informed both of the Au- " thor and Superviſors of his Pamphlet, and will re- " ply when I think he can affront me; for I am of " Socrates's opinion, that all creatures cannot. . . . . " He would have inſinuated to the world, that her " late Highneſs died not a Roman Catholick. He " declares himſelf to be now ſatisfied to the contrary; " in which he has given up the cauſe; for matter of " fact was the principal debate betwixt us. In the " mean time he would diſpute the motives of her " change: how prepoſterouſly let all men judge, when " he ſeemed to deny the ſubject of the controverſy, " the change itſelf. And becauſe I would not take up " this ridiculous challenge, he tells the world, I can- " not argue. But he may as well infer that a Catho- " lick cannot faſt, becauſe he will not take up the " cudgels againſt Mrs. James, to confute the Prote- " ſtant Religion."

* Pag. 2.

[V] His Hind and Panther: A Poem.] It was licenſed for the Preſs April the 11th 1687. In the Preface he tells us, that it was neither impoſed on him, nor ſo much as the ſubject given him by any man. " It was written, ſays he, during the laſt winter, and " the beginning of this ſpring, though with long in- " terruptions of ill health, and other hindrances.

" About

diately attacked by Mr. Charles Mountague's afterwards Earl of Halifax, and Mr. Matthew Prior, in a Pamphlet intitled The Hind and the Panther tranverſed to the Story of the Country-Mouſe and the City Mouſe [W]. London 1687 in 4to; and by Some Reflections upon the Hind and Panther, ſubjoined [X] to a Pamphlet intitled Some Notes upon Mr. Dryden's Poems, in four Letters. By Mr. Clifford, late Maſter of the Charter-Houſe London [Y]. London 1687 in 4to. Not long before this, our Author was ſuppoſed to be engaged in tranſlating Monſieur Varillas's Hiſtory of Hereſies [Z]; but this Tranſlation never appeared in print, though in the year 1688, he publiſhed The Life of St. Francis Xavier, tranſlated from the French of Father Bohours. Upon the Revolution he loſt his Place of Poet Laureat and Hiſtoriographer Royal; in which he was ſucceeded by Thomas Shadwell Eſq; againſt whom he entertained an implacable reſentment, as appears from his Mac Flecknoe, one of the ſevereſt Satyrs in any Language. In 1693 he publiſhed at London in folio a Tranſlation of Juvenal's Satyrs by ſeveral hands (m), and a Tranſlation of Perſius, done entirely by himſelf; and to the whole prefixed a long and (m) Mr. Dryden tranſlated the 1ſt, 3d, 6th, 10th, and 16th Satyrs.

" About a fortnight before I had finiſhed it, his " Majeſty's declaration for liberty of conſcience came " abroad, which if I had ſo ſoon expected, I might " have ſpared my ſelf the labour of writing many " things, which are contained in the third part of it. " But I was always in ſome hope that the Church " of England might have been perſuaded to have " taken off the Penal Laws and the Teſt, which was " one deſign of the Poem, when I propoſed to my- " ſelf the writing of it. 'Tis evident, that ſome " part of it was only occaſional, and not firſt intend- " ed; I mean that defence of myſelf, to which every " honeſt man is bound, when he is injuriouſly attack- " ed in print."

[W] Immediately attacked . . in a Pamphlet, intitled, The Hind and the Panther tranſverſed to the ſtory of the Country-Mouſe and the City-Mouſe.] The Authors in the Preface obſerve, that the favourers of the Hind and Panther will be apt to ſay in its defence, that the beſt things are capable of ridicule; that Homer has been burleſqued, and Virgil traveſted, without ſuffering any thing in their reputation from that buffoonry; and that in like manner the Hind and Panther may be an exact Poem, tho' it is the ſubject of raillery in this Piece. To this it is anſwered, that there is this difference, that thoſe Authors are wreſted from their true ſenſe, and this naturally falls into ridicule: there is nothing repreſented here as monſtrous and unnatural, which is not equally ſo in the original. They afterwards remark, that we have this comfort under the ſeverity of Mr. Dryden's Satyr, " to ſee his abilities " equally leſſened with his opinion of us; and that " he could not be a fit champion againſt the Panther, " till he had laid aſide all his judgment. But we " muſt applaud his obedience to his new mother " Hind; ſhe diſciplined him ſeverely (34); ſhe com- " manded him it ſeems, to ſacrifice his darling fame, " and to do it effectually, he publiſhed this learned " Piece. This is the favourable conſtruction we would " put on his faults, though he takes care to inform " us (35), that it was done from no impoſition, but " out of a natural propenſity he has to malice, and a " particular inclination of doing miſchief. What elſe " could provoke him (56) to libel the Court, blaſ- " pheme Kings, abuſe the whole Scotch Nation, rail at " the greateſt part of his own, and lay all the indig- " nities imaginable on the only eſtabliſhed Religion? " And we muſt now congratulate him this felicity, " that there is no ſect or denomination of Chriſtians, " whom he has not abuſed.

" Thus far his arms have with ſucceſs been crown'd. " Let Turks, Jews, and Infidels, look to themſelves; he " has already begun the war upon them. When once a " Conqueror grows thus dreadful, it is the intereſt of all " his neighbours to oppoſe him; for there is no alliance " to be made with one that will fall about and de- " ſtroy his friends, and like a ſecond Almanzor, " change ſides merely to keep his hand in uſe. This " heroic temper of his has created him ſome ene- " mies, that did by no means affect hoſtility; and he " may obſerve this candour in the management, that " none of his Works are concerned in theſe Papers, " but his laſt Piece; and I believe he is ſenſible this " is a favour."

(34) Hind and Panther, pag. 90.

(35) Preface to Hind and Panther.

(36) Hind and Panther, pag. 87.

[X] And by Some Reflections upon the Hind and Panther.] The Author conſiders the ſeveral points inſiſted on by Mr. Dryden in his Poem, and for the ſake of brevity and diſtinction, he denominates them after this manner, and in this order: I. Tranſubſtantiation. II. Reformation. III. Infallibility. IV. Novelty and Schiſm. V. The paſſive Church. He treats Mr. Dryden with great ſeverity, and obſerves (37), that the Proteſtant Poets ſay, that Mr. Bays could never have been an Author without ſtealing from Milton, and many others, that have been helps for his wit to furniſh out the ſtage. And how many good thoughts hath he made his own, as he phraſes it in the Rehearſal, by tranſproſing and tranſverſing; as now he hopes, theſe arguments for Popery may paſs for his, becauſe he hath put them into an unuſual dreſs, and hath tagged them with rhimes. And to ſpeak the truth, there is very little of his own in any Book, that he hath publiſhed but the arrogance and unparallelled cenſoriouſneſs, which he exerciſes over all other Writers.

(37) Pag. 32.

[Y] A Pamphlet intitled, Notes upon Mr. Dryden's Poems, in four Letters. By M. Clifford, &c.] The fourth Letter is dated at the Charter-Houſe July 1, 1672; but the former Letters have no date. In the firſt Letter he aſſures Mr. Dryden, that he will detect his thefts, letting the world know, ſays he, how great a plagiary you are; and that for all your pretences to wit and judicious cenſure, you do live in as much ignorance and darkneſs as you did in the womb; that your writings are like a Jack of all Trades Shop; they have variety, but no value. In the ſecond and third Letters he criticizes on the Conqueſt of Granada; and in the fourth animadverts upon Mr. Dryden's Similes; and concludes with theſe words: " Canſt thou after this " have the confidence to ſay, thy Plays are written " with more flame than art? I vow to thee, I can- " not perceive either art, flame, or the leaſt ſpark of " fire in thy Poetry. I muſt acknowledge it has all " the qualities of another element, I mean the earth; " 'tis cold, dry, and ſo heavy, that at the hearing " of it, the judicious part of thy company fall aſleep; " one would have thought thou hadſt done ſo too at " the writing."

[Z] Not long before this our Author was ſuppoſed to be engaged in tranſlating Monſr. Varillas's Hiſtory of Hereſies.] Dr. G. Burnet has the following paſſage (38): " I have been informed from England, that a Gen- " tleman, who is famous both for Poetry and ſeveral " other things, had ſpent three months in tranſlating " Mr. Varillas's Hiſtory; but that as ſoon as my Re- " flections appeared, he diſcontinued his labour, find- " ing the credit of his Author was gone. Now if " he thinks it is recovered by his Anſwer; he will per- " haps go on with his Tranſlation; and this may be, " for ought I know, as good an entertainment for " him as the converſation, that he had ſet on between " the Hinds and Panthers, and all the reſt of animals, " for whom Mr. Varillas may ſerve well enough as an " Author; and this Hiſtory and that Poem are ſuch " extraordinary things of their kind, that it will be " but ſuitable to ſee the Author of the worſt Poem be- " come likewiſe the Tranſlator of the worſt Hiſtory, " that the Age has produced. If his grace and his wit " improve both proportionably, we will hardly find, " that he has gained much by the change he has " made, from having no Religion to chooſe one of " the worſt. It is true, he had ſomewhat to ſink from " in matter of wit; but as for his morals, it is ſcarce " poſſible for him to grow a worſe man than he was. " He has lately wreaked his malice on me for ſpoil- " ing

(38) Defence of the Reflections on the Ninth Book of the firſt Volume of Mr. Varillas's Hiſtory of Hereſies. Being a Reply to his Anſwer. By G. Burnet, D. D. pag. 138, 139. 140. edit. Amſterdam 1687, in 24mo.

and beautiful diſcourſe by way of Dedication to the Earl of Dorſet (n). Mr. Congreve wrote to him a Poem on his Tranſlation of Perſius. In 1695 he publiſhed a Tranſlation of Monſieur Du Freſnoy's Art of Painting [AA]; and in 1697 a Tranſlation of Virgil's works [BB]. His laſt work was his Fables, which were printed at London in folio. He died on the 1ſt of May 1701 at his houſe in Gerard-ſtreet, where he had lived many years, and was interred in Weſtminſter-Abbey [CC], where (n) This Dedication is dated Auguſt the 18th 1692.

" ing his three months labour; but in it he has done " me all the honour that any man can receive from " him, which is to be railed at by him. If I had " ill nature enough to prompt me to wiſh a very bad " wiſh for him; it ſhould be that he would go on " and finiſh his Tranſlation. By that it will appear, " whether the Engliſh Nation, which is the moſt " competent judge in this matter, has upon the ſeeing " our Debate, pronounced in Mr. Varillas's favour or " in mine. It is true Mr. D. will ſuffer a little by it, " but at leaſt it will ſerve to keep him in from other " extravagancies; and if he gains little honour by this " work, yet he cannot loſe ſo much by it as he has " done by his laſt employment."

[AA] His Tranſlation of Monſr. Du Freſnoy's Art of Painting.] It was printed in 1695 in 4to under the following title: De Arte Graphicâ: The Art of Painting by C. A. Du Freſnoy, with Remarks, and a Parallel between Painting and Poetry, by Mr. Dryden. With the Lives of the Painters. The ſecond Edition, printed at London 1716 in 8vo, has the following title: The Art of Painting by C. A. Du Freſnoy, with Remarks: tranſlated into Engliſh, with an original Preface, containing a Parallel between Painting and Poetry. By Mr. Dryden. As alſo a ſhort account of the moſt eminent Painters, both ancient and modern. By R. G. Eſq; The ſecond Edition corrected and enlarged. This Edition is dedicated to Richard Earl of Burlington by Richard Graham Eſq; who obſerves in the Dedication, that ſome liberties have been taken with Mr. Dryden's excellent Tranſlation, becauſe for want of a competent knowledge in painting, he ſuffered himſelf to be miſled by an unſkilful guide. " Monſr. de Piles told him in his Preface, that his " French Verſion was made at the requeſt of the Au- " thor himſelf; and altered by him, till it was wholly " to his mind. This Mr. Dryden taking upon con- " cent, thought there was nothing more incumbent on " him, than to put it into the beſt Engliſh he could; " and accordingly performed his part here (as in every " thing elſe) with accuracy. But it being manifeſt, " that the French Tranſlator has frequently miſtaken " the ſenſe of his Author, and very often alſo not " ſet it in the moſt advantageous light; to do juſtice " to Monſr. Du Freſnoy, Mr. Jervas (a very good " Critick in the language, as well as in the ſub- " ject of the Poem) has been prevailed upon to cor- " rect what was found amiſs; and his amendments " are every where diſtinguiſhed with proper marks." To this edition are prefixed Mr. Pope's Verſes to Mr. Jervas with Freſnoy's Art of Painting tranſlated by Mr. Dryden. Mr. Dryden in his Preface tells us (39) that when he undertook this work, he was already engaged in the Tranſlation of Virgil, from whom, ſays he, I borrowed only two months; and he afterwards obſerves (40), that this Preface containing a Parallel of Poetry and Painting, was begun and ended in twelve mornings; and perhaps, ſays he, the judges of Painting and Poetry, when I tell them how ſhort a time it coſt me, may make me the ſame Anſwer, which my late Lord Rocheſter made to one, who, to commend a Tragedy, ſaid it was written in three weeks, How the Devil could he be ſo long about it? For that Poem was infamouſly bad; and I doubt this parallel is little better; and then the ſhortneſs of time is ſo far from being a commendation, that it is ſcarcely an excuſe.

(39) Pag. 4. 2d edit. London 1716.

(40) Ibid. pag. 60.

[BB] His Tranſlation of Virgil's Works.] It was attacked with great ſeverity by the Reverend Mr. Luke Milbourn in a piece printed at London 1698 in 8vo; but " he did Mr. Dryden juſtice, in printing at the " ſame time his own Tranſlations of him, which were " intolerable (41)." Dr. Henry Felton tells us (42), that if our Author has failed in ſome parts of his Tranſlation of Virgil, " we may in part aſcribe it to " his uſing, as it is ſaid, ſome French and foreign " aſſiſtance, and partly to ſome defects of our language, " for he was an abſolute maſter of its whole reach and " compaſs; but chiefly to the inimitable perfections " and elegance of the Author, who hath weighed and " choſen every word, that is moſt beautiful and ſig- " nificant, and beſt adapted to the purpoſe it is uſed for. " Virgil is not only the greateſt and correcteſt of the " Roman Poets, but of the Roman Writers; and as " he is numerous, various, and rich in his verſe and " expreſſions, his expreſſions are ſo full and abundant " with his ſenſe, his ſenſe is ſo crowded, and yet ſo " clear in the admirable choice of his words, that unleſs " the Engliſh were equal to the Roman, and the " Tranſlator to the Poet, it is impoſſible but that the " natural diſadvantages of our Tongue muſt appear in " the Tranſlation. And yet, my Lord (43), give me " leave to ſay in commendation of Mr. Dryden, we " ſhall never ſee it better performed in the whole; and " thoſe who may excel him, where they obſerve he " hath failed, will fall below him in a thouſand inſtances " where he hath excelled." Mr. Gildon is of opinion (44), that this Tranſlation, if we allow for the time Mr. Dryden did it in, is better done than any Poet in any other language has performed, and I am apt, ſays he, to believe than any one will do in our own. Dr. Joſeph Trapp (45) having obſerved in general, that our Author's writings have their dark as well as their bright ſide; and that what was ſaid of ſomebody elſe may be as well applied to him, Ubi benè, nemo melius; ubi malè, nemo pejus; tells us, that with regard to his Tranſlation of the Æneis, " as he was the great " Refiner of our Engliſh Poetry, and the beſt Mar- " ſhaller of words, that our Nation had then at leaſt " produced; and all, who have followed him, are " extremely indebted to him, as ſuch; his verſificati- " on here, as every where elſe, is generally flowing " and harmonious, and beauties of all kinds are ſcat- " tered through the whole." But then, continues the Doctor, beſides his often groſly miſtaking his Author's ſenſe; as a Tranſlator he is extremely licentious. Whatever he alledges to the contrary in his Preface, he makes no ſcruple of adding or retrenching, as his turn is beſt ſerved by either. In many places, where he ſhines moſt as a Poet, he is leaſt a Tranſlator; and where you moſt admire Mr. Dryden, you ſee the leaſt of Virgil. Then whereas my Lord Roſcommon lays down this juſt rule to be obſerved by a Tranſlator with regard to his Author,

Fall as he falls, and as he riſes, riſe;

nothing being more abſurd than for thoſe two counterparts to be like a pair of ſcales, one mounting as the other ſinks; Mr. Dryden frequently acts the contrary to this precept, at leaſt to the latter part of it. Where his Author ſoars, and towers in the air, he often grovels and flutters upon the ground. Inſtances of all theſe kinds are numerous, Dr. Trapp produces ſome few; and with regard to Mr. Dryden's ſinking where Virgil moſt remarkably riſes, he makes this general remark (46); that " it is acknowledged by every body, that " the firſt ſix Books in the original are the beſt, and " the moſt perfect; but the laſt ſix in Mr. Dryden's " Tranſlation. Not that even in theſe Virgil properly " ſinks or flags in his genius, but only he did not " live to correct them, as he did the former. However " they abound with beauties in the original; and they " have many indeed in the Tranſlation; more, as I " ſaid, than in the firſt ſix; which is viſible to any " one that reads the work with application."

(43) Dr. Felton's Diſſertation is addreſs'd to the preſent Duke of Rutland.

(44) Laws of Poetry, pag. 303.

(45) Preface to the Æneis, pag. 83. See the Works of Virgil tranſlated into Engliſh Blank Verſe with large explanatory Notes and critical Obſervations. By Joſeph Trapp, D. D. late Fellow of Wadham College, and Profeſſor of Poetry in the Univerſity of Oxford, vol. 1. 2d edit. London 1735, in 12mo.

(46) Ibid. pag. 89.

(41) The Dunciad with Notes Variorum, and the Prolegomena of Scriblerus. In the Remark on ver. 325. B. 2. pag. 166. edit. London in 12mo.

(42) Diſſertation on reading the Claſſics, and forming a juſt Style. pag. 128, 129, 130. 4th edit. London 1730.

[CC] Interred in Weſtminſter-Abbey.] A very remarkable ſtory concerning his funeral, is related in the Memoirs of the Life of Mr. Congreve (47); in which we are informed, that Mr. Dryden dying on the Wedneſday morning, Dr. Thomas Spratt then Biſhop of Rocheſter, and Dean of Weſtminſter, ſent the next day to the Lady Elizabeth Howard, Mr. Dryden's Widow, that he would make a preſent of the ground, which was 40 pound, with all the other Abbey Fees. The Lord Halliſax likewiſe ſent to the Lady Elizabeth, and Mr. Charles Dryden her ſon, that where a monument is erected to him by John late Duke of Buckinghamshire. He married the Lady Elizabeth Howard, daughter of the Earl of Berkshire, and sister to Sir Robert Howard, Colonel Philip Howard, and Edward Howard Esq; Author of the British Princes. She survived Mr. Dryden about eight years. He had by this Lady three sons, Charles, John, and Henry; the last of whom entered into a religious Order. Charles was Usher of the palace to Pope Clement XI, and upon his return to England, left his brother John to officiate in his room, and was drowned in swimming cross the Thames near Windsor in 1704. He wrote several pieces, and translated the sixth Satyr of Juvenal. His brother John translated the 14th Satyr of Juvenal, and was Author of a Comedy intitled, The Husband his own Cuckold, printed at London 1696. He died at Rome not many months after his father. Mr. Dryden's Ode on St. Cecilia's Day is perhaps one of the most perfect pieces in any language [DD]; and he observes in an original that if they would give him leave to bury Mr. Dryden, he would inter him with a Gentleman's private funeral, and afterwards bestow 500 pound on a monument in the Abbey; which, as they had no reason to refuse, they accepted. On the Saturday following the company came, the Corps was put into a Velvet Hearse, and eighteen Mourning Coaches filled with company attended. When they were just ready to move, the Lord Jefferies, Son of the Lord Chancellor Jefferies, with some of his rakish companions coming by, asked whose funeral it was? and being told Mr. Dryden's, he said; "What shall Dryden, the greatest honour "and ornament of the nation be buried after this "private manner? No, Gentlemen, let all that loved "Mr. Dryden, and honour his memory, alight and "join with me in gaining my Lady's consent, to let "me have the honour of his interment, which shall "be after another manner than this; and I will "bestow a thousand pounds on a monument in the "Abbey for him." The Gentlemen in the coaches not knowing of the Bishop of Rochester's favour, nor of the Lord Hallifax's generous design, (they both having, out of respect to the family, enjoined the Lady Elizabeth and her son to keep their favour concealed to the world, and let it pass for their own expence;) readily came out of the coaches, and attended Lord Jefferies up to the Lady's bed-side; who was then sick: he repeated the purport of what he had before said; but she absolutely refusing, he fell on his knees, vowing never to rise till his request was granted. The rest of the company by his desire kneeled also; and the Lady being under a sudden surprize fainted away. As soon as she recovered her speech she cryed No, No. "Enough Gentlemen, replied he; my Lady is very "good, she says Go, Go." She repeated her former words with all her strength, but in vain; for her feeble voice was lost in their acclamations of joy; and the Lord Jefferies ordered the Hearsemen to carry the corps to Mr. Russel's an Undertaker's in Cheapside and leave it there till he should send orders for the embalment, which he added, should be after the royal manner. His directions were obeyed, the company dispersed, and Lady Elizabeth and her son remained inconsolable. The next day Mr. Charles Dryden waited on the Lord Hallifax and the Bishop, to excuse his mother and himself by relating the real truth. But neither his Lordship nor the Bishop would admit of any plea; especially the latter, who had the Abbey lighted, the Ground opened, the Choir attending, an Anthem ready set, and himself waiting for some hours without any corps to bury. The Undertaker, after three days expectance of orders for embalment, without receiving any, waited on the Lord Jefferies, who pretending ignorance of the matter turned it off with an ill-natured jest, saying, "that those who observed the "orders of a drunken frolick, deserved no better; "that he remembered nothing at all of it; and that "he might do what he pleased with the corps." Upon this, the Undertaker waited on the Lady Elizabeth and her son, and threatened to bring the corps home, and set it before the door. They desired a day's respite, which was granted. Mr. Charles Dryden wrote a handsome letter to the Lord Jefferies, who returned it with this cool answer, that he knew nothing of the matter, and would be troubled no more about it. He then addressed the Lord Hallifax and the Bishop of Rochester, who absolutely refused to do any thing in it. In this distress Dr. Garth sent for the corps to the College of Physicians, and proposed a funeral by subscription, to which himself set a most noble example. At last a day, about three weeks after Mr. Dryden's decease, was appointed for the interment. Dr. Garth pronounced a fine Latin Oration at the College, over the corps; which was attended to the Abbey by a numerous train of coaches. When the funeral was over, Mr. Charles Dryden sent a challenge to the Lord Jefferies, who refusing to answer it, he sent several others, and went often himself, but could neither get a letter delivered, nor admittance to speak to him; which so incensed him, that he resolved, since his Lordship refused to answer him like a Gentleman, that he would watch an opportunity to meet, and fight off hand, though with all the rules of honour; which his Lordship hearing, left the town: and Mr. Charles Dryden could never have the satisfaction of meeting him, though he fought it till his death with the utmost application. Mr. Dryden had no monument erected to him for several years; which Mr. Pope alludes to in his Epitaph intended for Mr. Rowe, where he says (48)

(47) Memoirs of the Life, Writings, and Amours of William Congreve Eſq; Interſperſed with miſcellaneous Eſſays &c. Compiled from their reſpective Originals by Charles Wilſon Eſq; Part 2. pag. 3, & ſeqq. edit. London 1730, in 8vo.

Beneath a rude and nameless stone he lies.

In the note upon which verse he tells us, that "the "Tomb of Mr. Dryden was erected upon this hint "by the Duke of Buckingham, to which was origi-"nally intended this Epitaph,

"This Sheffield rais'd. The sacred Dust below
"Was Dryden once; the rest who does not know?

"Which the Author since changed into the plain "inscription on it, being only the name of that great "Poet.

"J. Dryden.
"Natus Aug. 9, 1631.
"Mortuus Maii 1, 1701.
"Johannes Sheffield, Dux Buckinghamiensis, fecit.

Mr. Welsted, in his Epistle to the late Dr. Garth, occasioned by the death of the Duke of Marlborough (49), alludes to this monument in the following Lines;

From Joys of Paradise witheld too long,
A moment yet attend the ling'ring song,
While thy low'd Poet's marble I explore,
And the proud Fane, but half adorn'd before!
Without a tomb, 'till late, forgot he lay,
While the Muse mourn'd, and Ages wore away;
At length the Stone, so long delay'd, is rear'd;
An awful Image, and a Front rever'd!
No verse engrav'd, records at length his fame,
But Dryden's epitaph, is Dryden's name (50)

[DD] His Ode on St. Cecilia's Day is perhaps one of the most perfect Pieces in any Language.] Mr. Gildon having observed (51) "that one of the greatest obsta-"cles perhaps to the perfection of our songs, is the "slavish care or complaisance of the writers to make "their words to the gout of the Composer or Musi-"cian; being obliged often to sacrifice their sense to "certain sounding words, and feminine rhymes, or "the like, because they seem most adapted to furnish "the composer with such cadences which most easily "slide into their modern way of composition:" tells us, that of instances to the contrary, the most eminent is Mr. Dryden's Ode abovementioned; admirable in its sense, and the most harmonious in its numbers of any thing in the English Tongue; numbers so harmonious, that had

(48) The Works of Alexander Pope Esq; vol. 2. pag. 166. edit. London 1735, in 12mo.

(49) Epistles, Odes, &c. written on several subjects: with a Dissertation concerning the Perfection of the English Language, the State of Poetry, &c. By Mr. Welsted. pag. 43, & seqq. 2d edit. London 1725, in 12mo.

(50) Ibid. pag. 51.

(51) Laws of Poetry, pag. 83, 84.

original Letter of his (o) that he was almoſt a fortnight in compoſing and correcting it. It has been ſeveral times ſet to muſic, and particularly in the winter of the year 1735 by Mr. Handel, and publickly exhibited on the Theatre in Covent-Garden with great ſucceſs. Mr. Congreve, in the Dedication of our Poet's Dramatic Works to the Duke of Newcaſtle, has drawn his character to great advantage [EE]. Biſhop Burnet having ſtiled him a Monſter of Immodeſty and Impurities of all ſorts (p), occaſioned a reflection upon that paſſage by the late Lord Lanſdown, which was ſoon after anſwered by Tho. Burnet Eſq; [FF]. It is ſaid, that he had once a deſign of entering into holy Orders, but was refuſed; and

(o) Communicated by the very learned and ingenious Richard Graham, Jun. Eſq;

(p) Hiſtory of his own Time, vol. 1.

one of the antient Maſters been to compoſe it, it had been one of the moſt tranſporting and raviſhing pieces of Muſic, that had been ſeen in the world theſe thouſand years. Mr. Pope has the following beautiful lines on this Ode (52):

" Hear how Timotheus' vary'd Lays ſurprize,
" And bid alternate paſſions fall and riſe!
" While at each change, the ſon of Libyan Jove
" Now burns with Glory, and then melts with love,
" Now his fierce eyes with ſparkling fury glow,
" Now ſighs ſteal out, and tears begin to flow:
" Perſians and Greeks like turns of nature found,
" And the world's Victor ſtood ſubdu'd by ſound.
" The power of muſic all our hearts allow,
" And what Timotheus was, is Dryden now."

(52) Eſſay on Criticiſm, ver. 376, & ſeqq.

[EE] Mr. Congreve . . . . has drawn his character to great advantage.] He tells us, that Mr. Dryden had perſonal qualities to challenge both love and eſteem from all who were truly acquainted with him. He was of a nature exceeding humane and compaſſionate, eaſily forgiving injuries, and capable of a prompt and ſincere reconciliation with them, who had offended him. Such temperament is the only ſolid foundation of all moral virtues and ſociable endowments. His friendſhip, where he profeſſed it, went much beyond his profeſſions; and I have been told of ſtrong and generous inſtances of it by perſons themſelves, who received them; tho' his hereditary income was little more than a bare competency. As his reading had been very extenſive, ſo was he very happy in a memory tenacious of every thing that he had read. He was not more poſſeſſed of knowledge, than he was communicative of it. But then his communication of it was by no means pedantic, or impoſed upon the converſation, but juſt ſuch, and went ſo far, as by the natural turns of the diſcourſe, in which he was engaged, it was neceſſarily promoted or required. He was extreme ready and gentle in his correction of the errors of any Writer, who thought fit to conſult him; and full as ready and patient to admit of the reprehenſion of others, in reſpect of his own overſight or miſtakes. He was of very eaſy, I may ſay, of very pleaſing acceſs. But ſomething ſlow, and as it were diffident in his advances to others. He had ſomething in his nature that abhorred intruſion into any Society whatſoever. Indeed it is to be regretted, that he was rather blameable in the other extream; for by that means he was perſonally leſs known, and conſequently his character might become liable both to miſapprehenſions and miſrepreſentations. To the beſt of my knowledge and obſervation, he was, of all men that ever I knew, one of the moſt modeſt, and the moſt eaſily to be diſcountenanced in his approaches either to his ſuperiors or his equals. . . . " As to his writings, I may " venture to ſay in general terms, that no man hath " written in our language ſo much, and ſo various " matter, and in ſo various manners, ſo well. Another " thing I may ſay was very peculiar to him; which " is, that his parts did not decline with his years; " but that he was an improving Writer to the laſt, " even to near ſeventy years of age; improving even " in fire and imagination, as well as in judgment. " Witneſs his Ode on St. Cecilia's Day, and his Fables, " his lateſt performances. He was equally excellent " in verſe and in proſe. His proſe had all the clear- " neſs imaginable, together with all the nobleneſs of " expreſſion, all the graces and ornaments proper and " peculiar to it, without deviating into the language " or diction of Poetry. I make this obſervation only to " diſtinguiſh his ſtyle from that of many poetical Wri- " ters, who meaning to write harmoniouſly in proſe, " do in truth often write mere blank verſe. I have " heard him frequently own with pleaſure, that if he " had any talent for Engliſh Proſe, it was owing to " his having often read the writings of the great Arch- " biſhop Tillotſon. His Verſification and his Numbers " he could learn of nobody; for he firſt poſſeſſed " thoſe talents in perfection in our Tongue. And " they who have beſt ſucceeded in them ſince his time, " have been indebted to his example; and the more " they have been able to imitate him, the better have " they ſucceeded. As his ſtyle in proſe is always " ſpecifically different from his ſtyle in Poetry; ſo on " the other hand in his Poems his diction is, where- " ever his ſubject requires it, ſo ſublimely and ſo " truly poetical, that its eſſence, like that of pure " gold, cannot be deſtroyed. Take his Verſes, and " diveſt them of their rhimes, diſjoint them in their " numbers, tranſpoſe their expreſſions, make what " arrangement and diſpoſition you pleaſe of his words; " yet ſhall there eternally be poetry, and ſomething " which will be found incapable of being reſolved in- " to abſolute proſe: an inconteſtable characteriſtick of " a truly poetical genius. I will ſay but one word more " in general of his writings, which is, that what he " had done in any one ſpecies or diſtinct kind, would " have been ſufficient to have acquired him a great " name. If he had written nothing but his Prefaces, " or nothing but his Songs, or his Prologues, each of " them would have entitled him to the preference and " diſtinction of excelling in his kind." Mr. Congreve had for many years reſolved to vindicate the character of our Author, as appears from the following paſſage in a Letter of Mr. Pope to Mr. Wycherley, dated December 26th 1704 (53): It was certainly a great ſatisfaction to me to ſee and converſe with a man, whom in his writings I had ſo long known with pleaſure. But it was a high addition to it, to hear you at our very firſt meeting doing juſtice to your dead friend Mr. Dryden. I was not ſo happy as to know him; Virgilium tantum vidi. Had I been born early enough, I muſt have known and loved him. For I have been aſſured, not only by yourſelf, but by Mr. Congreve, and Sir William Trumball, that his perſonal qualities were as amiable as his poetical, notwithſtanding the many libellous miſrepreſentations of them; againſt which the former of theſe Gentlemen has told me he will one day vindicate him. I ſuppoſe thoſe injuries were begun by the violence of party; but 'tis no doubt they were continued by envy at his ſucceſs and fame. And thoſe ſcribblers, who attacked him in his latter times, were only like gnats in a ſummer's evening, which are never very troubleſome, but in the fineſt and moſt glorious ſeaſon; for his fire, like the Sun's, ſhined cleareſt towards its ſetting.

(53) Letters of Mr. Pope and ſeveral eminent Perſons from the year 1705 to 1735, vol. 1. pag. 9, 10. edit. London 1735, in 12mo.

[FF] Occaſioned a reflection upon that paſſage by the late Lord Lanſdown, which was ſoon after anſwered by Thomas Burnet Eſq;.] " Why, ſays his Lordſhip (54), " is Mr. Dryden ſtigmatized as a Monſter of Immodeſty, " and Impurities of all ſorts? He was ſo much a " ſtranger to Immodeſty, that Modeſty in too great a " degree was his failing. A Monſter of Impurities of " all ſorts? Good God! what an idea muſt that give? " Is there any wickedneſs under the Sun, but what is " comprized in thoſe few words? But as it happens, " he was the reverſe of all this, a man of regular life " and converſation, as all his acquaintaintance can " vouch. And I cannot but grieve that ſuch raſh expreſ- " ſions ſhould eſcape from a Biſhop's pen. If bearing " falſe witneſs againſt one's neighbour is a breach of the " commandment, can there be a more flagrant one than " this?" Then follows an honourable account of Mr. Dryden's Birth, Parentage, Alliance, and Behaviour; and my Lord Lanſdowne concludes with obſerving, that his writings will do immortal honour to his name and country, and his Poems laſt as long as the Biſhop's Sermons, ſuppoſing them equally excellent in their kind. Mr. Burnet, the Biſhop's ſon, replies to this paſſage of Lord

(54) Letter to the Author of the Reflections Hiſtorical and Political &c. pag. 5, 6.

and that he follicited for the Provoſtſhip of Eaton-College, in which he likewiſe failed [GG]. A great number of his pieces are publiſhed in the ſix volumes of Miſcellany Poems [HH]. It appears from the Dedication of his Aureng-Zebe to the Earl of Mulgrave, that he had (54) Remarks upon the Right Honourable the Lord Lanſdowne's Letter to the Author of the Reflections &c. as far as it relates to Biſhop Burnet, edit. London 1732 in 4to, pag. 25, 26, 27.

(55) Pag. 26.

Lord Lanſdowne (54), and obſerves, that the Biſhop's own words, and one matter of fact avowed from Mr. Dryden's own pen, will decide the point. "The "Stage, ſays the Biſhop, was defiled beyond all example, "Dryden the great Maſter of Dramatic Poeſy, being "a monſter of immodeſty and impurities of all ſorts." This, ſays Mr. Burnet (55), is all that is ſaid of Mr. Dryden throughout the whole Hiſtory. And is it not evident, firſt that Immodeſty is not here oppoſed to Modeſty, but chaſtneſs; and that this expreſſion as well as that of Impurities of all ſorts (which perhaps a Writer more accurate in his ſtyle would have termed obſcenities) can only be meant of his Dramatic Poeſy, of which alone the Biſhop was ſpeaking, by which alone the Stage could be defiled. His life and converſation, his parentage and alliance have nothing ſure to do with this. Are not Dryden's Comedies then full of obſcenities, of immodeſty, and impurities? Does not he in one of them introduce a whole Bawdy-houſe upon the Stage; or does it after that remain pure and undefiled? What does he himſelf ſay of his Play, called Limberham or the Kind Keeper, in his Dedication of it to my Lord Vaughan? "How it would have ſucceeded, I can but "gueſs; for it was permitted to be acted only thrice. "The crime for which it ſuffered, was that which is "objected againſt the Satyrs of Juvenal and the Epi- "grams of Catullus, that it exprett too much of the vice "which it decry'd. Your Lordſhip knows what an- "ſwer was returned by the elder of theſe Poets, "whom I laſt mentioned, to his accuſers:

"Caſtum eſſe decet pium Poetam
"Ipſum, Verſiculos nihil neceſſe eſt;
"Qui tunc denique habent ſalem at leporem,
"Si ſunt molliculi & parum pudici.

"But I dare not make that apology for my ſelf; and "therefore have taken a becoming care, that thoſe "things, which offended on the Stage, might be either "altered or omitted in the preſs." And yet where is the Clergyman, who would not merit his Lordſhip's eſteem inſtead of cenſure, for calling this very printed Comedy, thus reformed and garbled, a Monſter of Immodeſty and Impurities of all Sorts? And this, this only is Dr. Burnet's crime, for which he is to be unbiſhoped, unchriſtianed, and ſtigmatized as a flagrant falſe witneſs againſt his neighbour.

[GG] It is ſaid, that he had once a deſign of entering into holy Orders, but was refuſed; and ſollicited the Provoſtſhip of Eaton-College, in which he likewiſe failed.] Mr. Thomas Browne, the ſuppoſed Author of The late Converts expoſed: or the Reaſons of Mr. Bays's changing his Religion conſider'd, in a Dialogue. Part the ſecond; has the following paſſage in the Preface. "But prithee why ſo ſevere always upon the Prieſt- "hood, Mr. Bays? . . . . You, I find, ſtill continue "your old humour, which we are to date from the "year of Hegira, the loſs of Eaton, or ſince Orders "were refuſed you." Mr. Langbaine likewiſe ſpeaking of our Author's Spaniſh Fryar, tells us (56), that "the truth is, ever ſince a certain worthy Biſhop re- "fuſed Orders to a certain Poet, Mr. Dryden has de- "clared open defiance againſt the whole Clergy; and "ſince the Church began the war, he has thought it "but juſtice to make reprifals on the Church."

(56) Pag. 171.

[HH] A great number of his pieces are publiſhed in the ſix volumes of Miſcellany Poems.] In the 1ſt vol. I, Mac Flecknoe. II, Amaryllis, or the third Idyllium of Theocritus paraphraſed. III, Tears of Amynta for the death of Damon. IV, Epilogue intended to have been ſpoken by the Lady Hen. Maria Wentworth, when Caliſto was acted at Court. V, A Prologue. VI, An Epilogue. VII, A Prologue to the King and Queen upon the Union of two Companies in the year 1689. VIII, An Epilogue on the ſame occaſion. IX, An Epilogue to Conſtantine the Great. X, A Prologue, ſpoken by Mr. Betterton. XI, An Epilogue. XII, The entire Epiſode of Niſus and Euryalus. Tranſlated from the fifth and ninth Book of Virgil's Æneid's. XIII, Theocritus's Idyllium the XVIII. The Epithalamium of Helen and Menelaus. XIV, Idyllium the XXIII. The Deſpairing Lover. XV, Horace, Ode 3. Lib. 1. Inſcribed to the Earl of Roſcommon on his intended Voyage to Ireland. XVI, The fourth and ninth Eclogues of Virgil tranſlated into Engliſh. In the ſecond Volume are the following pieces. XVII, The entire Epiſode of Mezentius and Lauſus, out of the tenth Book of Virgil's Æneids, tranſlated into Engliſh. XVIII, The Speech of Venus to Vulcan, tranſlated out of the eighth Book of Virgil's Æneids. XIX, The Beginning of the firſt Book of Lucretius, tranſlated into Engliſh. XX, The Beginning of the ſecond Book of Lucretius, tranſlated into Engliſh. XXI, Tranſlation of the latter part of the third Book of Lucretius, againſt the Fear of Death. XXII, The fourth Book of Lucretius, concerning the Nature of Love, tranſlated into Engliſh. XXIII. Tranſlation from the fifth Book of Lucretius. XXIV, Daphnis. From Theocritus Idyllium XXVII. XXV, Horace Lib. 1. Ode 9. tranſlated into Engliſh. XXVI, Horace, Ode 29. Book 3. paraphraſed into Pindarique Verſe, and inſcribed to the Right Honourable Laurence Earl of Rocheſter. XXVII, From Horace, Epod. 2. XXVIII, A Song. XXIX, A Letter from Mr. Dryden to Sir George Etheridge. XXX, Prologue to the Univerſity of Oxford, ſpoken by Mr. Hart, at the acting of the Silent Woman. XXXI, Epilogue to the ſame. XXXII, Prologue to the Univerſity of Oxford, 1674. Spoken by Mr. Hart. XXXIII, Epilogue, ſpoken at Oxford by Mrs. Marſhall. XXXIV, Prologue to the Univerſity of Oxford. XXXV, The Prologue at Oxford, 1680. XXXVI, The Prologue to Albumazar. XXXVII. Prologue to Avirogus reviv'd. Spoken by Mr. Hart. XXXVIII, Prologue ſpoken the firſt day of the King's Houſe acting after the Fire. XXXIX, Prologue for the women, when they acted at the Old Theatre in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields. XL, A Prologue ſpoken at the opening of the New Houſe, March 26*th* 1674. XLI, Epilogue upon the ſame occaſion. XLII, An Epilogue. XLIII, An Epilogue for the King's Houſe. XLIV, Prologue to the Princeſs of Cleves. XLV, Epilogue to the ſame. XLVI, Prologue to his Royal Highneſs upon his firſt Appearance at the Duke's Theatre, ſince his return from Scotland, 1682. In the third Volume are the following pieces. XLVII, The laſt parting of Hector and Andromache; from the ſixth Book of Homer's Iliads. Tranſlated from the original. XLVIII, Threnodia Auguſtalis; a funeral Pindaric Poem ſacred to the happy Memory of King Charles II. In the fourth Volume are the following. XLIX, To Sir Godfrey Kneller, principal Painter to his Majeſty. L, The Art of Poetry: written in French by the Sieur de Boileau. Made Engliſh by Sir William Soame. Bar. And reviſed and altered by Mr. John Dryden. In the Advertiſement prefixed to it we are informed, that this Tranſlation of Monſr. Boileau's Art of Poetry was made in the year 1680 by Sir William Soame of Suffolk Bart.; who being intimately acquainted with Mr. Dryden, deſired his Reviſal of it. Mr. Dryden made very conſiderable alterations in it, particularly in the beginning of the fourth Canto; and it being his opinion, that it would be better to apply the Poem to Engliſh Writers, than keep to the French names, as it was firſt tranſlated, Sir William deſired he would take the pains to make that alteration; and accordingly that was entirely done by Mr. Dryden. This Poem was firſt publiſhed in 1683. Sir William was afterwards ſent Embaſſador to Conſtantinople in the reign of King James II, but died in the voyage. LI, Prologue to the Propheteſs; ſpoken by Mr. Betterton. LII, To my honoured Friend Sir Robert Howard on his excellent Poems. By Mr. John Dryden. LIII, To the Lady Caſtlemain, upon her encouraging his firſt Play. In the fifth Volume are the following pieces. LIV, On the Death of Amyntas: a paſtoral Elogy. LV, On the Death of a very young Gentleman. LVI, To my honoured Friend Dr. Charleton on his learned and uſeful Works; but more particularly his Treatiſe of Stone-Heng, by him reſtored to the true friends. VII, Upon the Death of the Earl of Dundee. LVIII, The Lady's Song. LIX, Upon young Mr. Rogers of Glouceſterſhire. LX, To Henry Higden Eſq; on his Tranſlation of the had formed a plan for an Heroic Poem [II]. The Author of the Spectator Num. 341 (q) obſerves, "that if he was not the beſt Writer of Tragedies in his time, he was allowed "by every one to have the happieſt turn for a Prologue or an Epilogue." He has been charged with engaging Mr. Creech in his Tranſlation of Horace, (in which that Gentleman had very ill ſucceſs) out of jealouſy of his riſing reputation [KK]. Beſides the Works already mentioned, he wrote the Life of Lucian, and that of Plutarch prefixed to the Tranſlations of thoſe Authors by ſeveral hands; the Life of Polybius, publiſhed before Sir Henry Sheer's Tranſlation of that Hiſtorian; the Preface to A Dialogue concerning women, being a defence of the ſex, written by William Walſh Eſq; and printed at London 1691 in 8vo. He tranſlated alſo Maimbourg's Hiſtory of the League. Dr. Henry Felton (r) obſerves, that our Author "at once gave the beſt rules, and broke them in ſpite "of his own knowledge, and the Rehearſal. His prefaces are many of them admirable upon "Dramatic Writings; he had ſome peculiar notions, which he maintains with great addreſs; "but his judgment in diſputed points is of leſs weight and value, becauſe the inconſtancy of his temper did run into his thoughts, and mixed with the conduct of his "writings, as well as his life." Monſieur de Voltaire ſtyles (s) him "a Writer whoſe "genius was too exuberant, and not accompanied with judgment enough;" and tells us, that if he had writ only a tenth part of the works he left behind him, his character would have been conſpicuous in every part; but his great fault is his having endeavoured to be univerſal. Mr. Dennis among his Letters (t) has one (u) on the Conſpiracy againſt the Reputation of Mr. Dryden; in which he tells us, that he "infinitely eſteemed him for the ſolidity of his "thought, for the ſpring, the warmth, and the beautiful turn of it; for the power, and "variety, and fulneſs of his harmony; for the purity, the perſpicuity, the energy of "his expreſſion, and (whenever the following great qualities are required) for the pomp, "and ſolemnity, and majeſty of his ſtyle."

(q) Vol. 5. pag. 86. edit. London 1713, in 12mo.

(r) Diſſertation on reading the Claſſics, and forming a juſt ſtyle, written in the year 1709. Preface, pag. 17, 18. 4th edit. 1730.

(s) Letters concerning the Engliſh Nation, Letter XVIII.

(t) Original Letters familiar, moral and critical. By Mr. Dennis, vol. 2. pag. 289, & ſeqq. edit. London 1721, in 8vo.

(u) It is dated June 4, 1715.

10th Satyr of Juvenal. LXI, A Song. LXII, A Song. LXIII, An Epitaph on the Lady Whitmore. LXIV, An Epitaph on Sir Palmes Fairborne's Tomb in Weſtminſter-Abbey. LXV, Eleonora: A Panegyrical Poem, dedicated to the Memory of the late Counteſs of Abingdon. LXVI, Rondelay. LXVII, To the pious Memory of the accompliſh'd young Lady, Mrs. Anne Killigrew, excellent in the two Siſter Arts of Poeſie and Painting. An Ode. LXVIII, Veni Creator Spiritus, tranſlated in paraphraſe. LXIX, Song to a fair young Lady going out of town in the ſpring. LXX, To the Ducheſs on her Return from Scotland in the year 1682. LXXI, To his dear Friend Mr. Congreve on his Comedy call'd, The Double Dealer. LXXII, To the Earl of Roſcommon, on his excellent Eſſay on Tranſlated Verſe. LXXIII, Prologue to the Univerſity of Oxford, 1681. LXXIV, A Prologue. In the ſixth Volume are the following pieces. LXXV, A Familiar Epiſtle to Mr. Julian, Secretary to the Muſes. LXXVI, Upon Mr. Milton's Picture, before his Paradiſe loſt.

[II] It appears from the Dedication of his Aureng-Zebe to the Earl of Mulgrave, that he had formed a plan for an Heroic Poem.] We ſhall give the paſſage, wherein he mentions it, at length. "The truth is, "the conſideration of ſo vain a creature as man is "not worth our pains. I have fool enough at home "without looking for it abroad; and am a ſufficient "theater to myſelf of ridiculous actions, without ex"pecting company, either in a court, a town, or "play-houſe. It is on this account I am weary with "drawing the deformities of life, and Lazars of the "people, where every figure of imperfection more "reſembles me than it can do others. If I muſt "be condemned to rhyme, I ſhould find ſome eaſe "in my change of puniſhment. I deſire to be no "longer the Siſyphus of the ſtage, to rowl up a ſtone "with endleſs labour, (which, to follow the Proverb, "gathers no moſs,) and which is perpetually falling "down again. I never thought myſelf very fit for an "employment, where many of my Predeceſſors have "excelled me in all kinds; and ſome of my con"temporaries, even in my own partial judgment, "have outdone me in Comedy. Some little hopes I "have yet remaining, and thoſe too, conſidering my "abilities, may be vain, that I may make the world "ſome part of amends for many ill Plays by an He"roic Poem. Your Lordſhip has been long acquaint"ed with my deſign; the ſubject of which you know "is great, the ſtory Engliſh, and neither too far diſ"tant from the preſent age, nor too near approach"ing it. Such it is in my opinion, that I could not "have wiſhed a nobler occaſion to do honour by it "to my King, my country, and my friends; moſt "of our ancient Nobility being concerned in the ac"tion. And your Lordſhip has one particular rea"ſon to promote this undertaking, becauſe you were "the firſt who gave me the opportunity of diſcourſing "it to his Majeſty and his Royal Highneſs. They "were then pleaſed both to commend the deſign, and "to encourage it by their commands. But the un"ſettledneſs of my condition has hitherto put a ſtop "to my thoughts concerning it. As I am no ſucceſ"ſor to Homer in his wit, ſo neither do I deſire to "be in his poverty. I can make no Rhapſodies, "nor go a begging at the Grecian doors, while I "ſing the praiſes of their anceſtors. The times of "Virgil pleaſe me better, becauſe he had an Auguſ"tus for his Patron. And to draw the allegory nearer "you, I am ſure I ſhall not want a Mecænas with "him. It is for your Lordſhip to ſtir up that remem"brance in his Majeſty, which his many avocations "of buſineſs have cauſed him, I fear to lay aſide. "And (as himſelf and his Royal Brother are the "Heroes of the Poem) to repreſent to them the "images of their warlike predeceſſors; as Achilles is "ſaid to be rouſed to glory with the ſight of the "combat before the ſhips. For my own part, I am "ſatisfied to have offered the deſign, and it may be "to the advantage of my reputation to have it re"jected."

[KK] He has been charged with engaging Mr. Creech in his tranſlation of Horace, (in which that Gentleman had very ill ſucceſs,) out of jealouſy of his riſing reputation.] Mr. Dryden is ſaid to have written a copy of verſes to Mr. Creech prefixed to the tranſlation of Lucretius by the latter, in which he adviſed him to tranſlate Horace. But Mr. Gildon obſerves (57), that thoſe verſes were not written by Mr. Dryden, but by a Right Reverend Prelate, whom, ſays Mr. Gildon, I ſhall not name, though dead, becauſe he thought fit to conceal his name, when alive. In the next place, there is no impartial judge (let Mr. Creech's reputation be what it will for his tranſlation of Lucretius,) who can believe that Mr. Dryden had the leaſt cauſe to be apprehenſive of Mr. Creech's growing applauſe, when he has given us his tranſlation of ſeveral parts of that Latin Poet ſo much beyond what Mr. Creech has done. T.

(57) Laws of Poetry, pag. 319, 320.

DUAREN (FRANCIS) Profeſſor of Civil Law at Bourges in the ſixteenth Century, was of St. Brien, a City of Bretagne. He was the firſt of the French Civilians, who cleared the Civil Law Chair from the barbariſm of the Gloſſators, in order to introduce the pure ſources of the antient juriſprudence. As he was deſirous not to ſhare this honour nour with any perſon, he viewed with an envious eye the reputation of his collegue Eguinard Baron, who blended likewiſe polite Literature with the ſtudy of the Law. This jealouſy prompted him to write a book, in which he endeavoured to leſſen the eſteem which the world had for his collegue (a) [A]. We find the maxim, Paſcitur in vivis livor, poſt fata quieſcit, verified in him; for after the death of Baron he ſhewed himſelf one of the moſt zealous to immortalize his memory, and erected a monument in honour of the deceaſed at his own expence (b). He had other collegues, who revived his uneaſineſs. He could not ſee without regret, that the reputation of Baudouin, who was younger than he, roſe to a great height (c); and after he was delivered from that thorn, he perceived, that Cujas, who ſucceeded that dangerous rival (d), had ſtill greater merit. He did not at all love this new comer, and there aroſe between them ſuch conteſts, that the conſequences of them might have occaſioned great diſorders in the Univerſity of Bourges, if Cujas had not left the field and retired to Valence, in order to teach Civil Law there (e). Duaren died in 1559 at the age of fifty years, without having ever married (f). You will find in Moreri many particulars, which I have omitted to avoid repetition; but it will be neceſſary that I ſhould explain, better than he has done, what relates to Duaren's want of memory [B]. He has ſaid nothing of a remarkable incident, which I ſhall not paſs over in ſilence; it is, that Duaren was a Proteſtant, and that he never had the courage to ſeparate from the Church of Rome. Baudouin treated him as a Nicodemite and Prevaricator [C], and reproached him with being a plagiary from Calvin.

(a) Ex Sammarthano, in Elogiis, lib. 1. pag. m. 38.

(b) Poſito ſua pecunia in ejus honorem monumento. Sammarth. in Elogiis, lib. 1. pag. m. 38.

(c) Papyr. Maſſo, Elog. Part. 2. pag. 257.

(d) Bullart, Academ. des Sciences, tom. 1. pag. 228. See the Article BAUDOUIN Remark [L].

(e) Thuanus, Hiſt. lib. 23. pag. m. 471.

(f) Sammarth. Elog. lib. 8. pag. 38.

[A] He wrote a Work, in which he endeavoured to leſſen the reputation of his Collegue.] This deſign has been expreſſed in very ſtrong terms by Sammarthanus. Hominum opinioni de Baronis doctrina conceptæ nonnihil detrahere conatus eſt, edita in eum de juriſdictione & imperio apologia malevoli animi teſte in poſterum futura (1). i. e. "He endeavoured to detract a little "from the opinion, which mankind had entertained "of the learning of Baron, having publiſhed againſt "him an apology concerning juriſdiction and empire; "which will be a witneſs of his malevolent diſpoſition "to poſterity." I ſought for this treatiſe among Duaren's Works, and have been ſurprized to find it ſo ſhort (2), that it does not quite fill five pages; but it appears from the preamble that the Author had reduced his apology to what is called Summa Capita; and that he had ſuppreſſed the reſt in order to ſhew ſome kind of complaiſance to Baron. He addreſſes this Abridgment to him, and dates it January the 1ſt 1549. He obſerves, that the Apology had been printed without his knowledge the year before, under the name of Ambroſius Lætus. Monſr. Teiſſier divides this Work into two; he diſtinguiſhes the Treatiſe de Juriſdictione & Imperio from the Apologia adverſus Eguinarium Baronem.

(1) Sammarth. Elog. lib. 1. pag. m. 38.

(2) In the edition of Geneva 1608, in fol.

[B] It will be neceſſary, that I ſhould explain better than Moreri has done, what relates to Duaren's want of memory.] Moreri tells us, that Francis Duaren was obliged to read the Speeches which he made; that this want of memory prevented him from communicating to the learned men of Germany his knowledge in the Civil Law, which was the reaſon that they loſt ſome part of the eſteem, which they had entertained of him. He ſhould have ſaid, that Duaren not having a very good memory, he never recited his lectures by heart, but read them from his papers; ſo that when he travelled in Germany without his collections, he never would venture to go up into the pulpit. He was requeſted to do ſo in divers places; his refuſal led ſeveral ignorant perſons, and incompetent judges of things, to doubt of his capacity. Erat Duarenus acerrimo quidem judicio, ſed memoria minus felici, neque unquam niſi ex ſcripto prælegebat. Quo factum eſt ut in Germanico itinere cùm paſſim à doctiſſimis viris ad prælegendum provocaretur, nec eorum utique deſideriis obtemperare (quòd à ſuis commentariis deſtitutus omninò ſibi diffideret) à nonnullis rerum imperitis & iniquè judicantibus habitus ſit indoctior (4). i. e. "Duaren had an excellent "judgment, but a bad memory, upon which account "he always read his lectures from his notes. And "therefore in his travels in Germany, when he was "frequently importuned by learned men to give them "ſome lectures, and was not able to gratify their "deſire, (being diffident, becauſe he wanted his notes,) "he was accounted a man of little learning by ſome "ignorant and perverſe judges." This is the original, which Moreri endeavoured to tranſlate, and has ſpoiled in three places. He has put Speeches inſtead of Lectures; he has communicated his knowledge (5) in the Civil Law, inſtead of reading Lectures in Civil Law; he has applied to the learned what belonged only to the ignorant. Theſe were in effect none but the ignorant, who were capable of deſpiſing a famous Doctor upon pretence, that he did not mount the Pulpit, when he paſſed as a traveller thro' a place, where there was an Academy. Suſpect as much as you pleaſe, that he is diffident of his memory, and that it depends on the collections, which he has left in his cloſet; you cannot poſſibly conclude, if you know how to judge of things rightly, that he is not a man of abilities. Obſerve, that Sammarthanus inſinuates, that Duaren refuſed to mount the pulpit, not becauſe he would have been obliged to read, but becauſe not having his Papers, he was apprehenſive of not being able to draw up a Lecture, in which every thing would be exactly quoted. Moſt Profeſſors have their Notes under their eyes, when they read a Lecture: their office does not require them to do otherwiſe; and hence it is that the title of Reader in ſuch a ſcience is ſynonomous to that of Profeſſor. We muſt therefore believe, that the Profeſſors and Students of Germany would not have been ſurprized to ſee Duaren read. Thoſe then who judged amiſs of him, did not proceed upon this ſuppoſition, that his memory would not enable him to pronounce by heart a diſcourſe of an hour long, but that he had not memory enough to compoſe ſuch a diſcourſe without the aſſiſtance of his Papers. It ſignifies little whether he reads, or recites by heart; one is as good as the other. They are appointed to enlighten the underſtanding, and not to move the paſſions. If the queſtion was about preaching, the difference would be very conſiderable, and yet at preſent the greateſt part of the Engliſh Preachers read their Sermons to the people.

We may obſerve by the way, that modes change even in Univerſities. It was a general cuſtom in the XVIth Century for Profeſſors, who were ſtrangers, when they paſſed through a city, where there was an Academy, to be deſired to give public Lectures. This cuſtom, I think, is now diſcontinued. But among Miniſters, civility abſolutely requires thoſe of the place to offer the pulpit to ſtrangers. And hence it is, that a Miniſter never travels without carrying in his Portmanteau his beſt Sermons; for he knows well enough, that he ſhall be deſired to preach in other towns. Jokers call theſe Sermons Pocket Piſtols.

(3) See pag. 283. Part 2. of de Duaren's Works, edit. Aurel. Allobrog. 1608.

(4) Sammarth. Elog. lib. 1. pag. m. 38.

(5) One may communicate by writing; ſo that Moreri puts the genus for the ſpecies.

[C] Duaren was a Proteſtant (§ α) Baudouin treated him as a Nicodemite and Prevaricator.] Mr. Catherinot, the King's Advocate at Bourges, obſerves that in 1550 Duaren publiſhed his Treatiſe of Benefices (§ β), in which he made himſelf ſuſpected of hereſy by his doctrines and raillery. It was inſerted in the Index Expurgatorius at Rome (6). Baudouin having retired from Bourges, and making an open profeſſion of the Proteſtant Religion at Straſbourg, wrote againſt Duaren under the name of the Chriſtian Civilian (7), and reproach-him with being a Papiſt only in appearance, and oppoſing the Religion of his heart. Thoſe, who have not this Book, will find ſome extracts from it at the beginning of Theodore Beza's Anſwer to the railings

(6) Catherinot, Calviniſme de Berri, pag. 4.

(7) This book was printed at Strasburg in 1556.

Calvin [D]. There are very few who remark what I am going to relate. Duaren having quitted his office of Profeſſor, it was given to Baudouin, who three years after adviſed them to recall him, and reſigned to him the firſt place [E]. I ſhall mention ſome other particulars, of Baudouin, who had deſcribed himſelf in the re-reproaches, which he caſt upon Duaren. We find in theſe extracts, that the Sorbonne obliged Duaren to recant. Tu nos fortaſſe alio trahere vis auribus conſtrictos. Ecquonam? an ad tribunal Sorbonicum ubi palinodiam turpem & nefariam canere tuo exemplo & more nobis perſuadeas? Ignoſce, Duarene, non poſſumus, malumus (ut ille olim Philoxenus) ad Latumias. i. e. " You would perhaps drag me by the ears to ſome " other quarter. But whither? To the Tribunal of " the Sorbonne, where you would perſuade us after " your example and cuſtom to make a ſhameful and " wicked Recantation? Pardon me, O Duaren; we " cannot do it; I had rather (as Philoxenus ſaid for- " merly) dig in a quarry." We ſhall ſee in the following remark the correſpondence, which he had with Calvin.

(8) Balduinus, fol. 112. apud Theodor. Bezam, pag. 199. tom. 2. Operum.

§ [α] Teiſſier, Tom. I. pag. 376 of his Elogies, laſt Edition, remarks from Catherinot, that in 1535 Duaren, and all the reſt of the Profeſſors at Bourges, to the number of eight, were ſuſpected of being Lutherans; and it is well known, that this ſuſpicion with regard to Duaren, particularly related to his Treatiſe of Benefices. But every body is not acquainted with another particular, which muſt neceſſarily have increaſed the ſuſpicion which Duaren had already given of his attachment to the Catholick Religion. Henry Stephens in the 38th chap. of his Apology for Herodotus, mentions certain ſcandalous Leonine Verſes, engraved on a free-ſtone table, which had been for a long time fixed with iron hooks over the poor's box, to a pillar of the Cathedral Church of Bourges; which table in 1566 had been ſome years before taken down, in order to remove that ſtone of offence from the eyes of the Lutherans. It was Duaren, who by his reiterated remonſtrances, at laſt prevailed to have the table removed and deſtroyed. The contents of it are to be ſeen in Hofman's Fulmen brutum, pag. 58 of the Leyden Edition enlarged (*), in 8vo, large paper, and in a bigger character than the Edition of Geneva, Ex eodem genere (Traditionum) ſays the Addition which follows immediately after the eight verſes in praiſe of the Agnus Dei, illud eſt carmen impium, ac plane nefarium, quod non multis ante annis Biturigæ in ſummo Epiſcopali in tabula lapidea inciſum, & ad caput trunci ſive tigilli pauperum affixum erat: ſed Franciſci Duareni admonitu, qui tum in illa Academia Jus Civile profitebatur, exemptum ac diſturbatum eſt.

(*) Scaligerana, under the word Hotomanni Franco-Gallia.

CRIT. REM.

§ [β] A miſtake: the licence for publiſhing of this treatiſe is dated November the 19th of the following year 1551.

CRIT. REM.

[D] Reproached him with being a Plagiary from Calvin.] Baudouin affirmed, that what is contained in Duaren's book relating to the Prieſthood, was taken out of Calvin's works. It is ſaid, that he made this remark merely to expoſe him to the rage of Perſecutors. Duaren was prodigiouſly enraged at this fraud; he complained by letter and word of mouth to Calvin, who pacified him. In ea pugna quum veris armis deſtitui ſe videret Balduinus, ad illiberales inſidias deſcendit, & Duareno ex puræ orthodoxæ fidei approbatione invidiam conflando, carnificum furori eum objecit. Capitale, ut ſcitur, in Gallia erat, non tantùm doctrinæ noſtræ ſubſcribere, ſed libros etiam noſtros furtim legere. Bonus hic pietatis ſectator, dum oſtendere conatur Duarenum ex me didiciſſe, & ex meis libris eſſe mutuatum quicquid in libro De ſacerdotiis probè & ſincerè docuerat, non aliò ſpectavit quam ut furioſis Eccleſiæ hoſtibus gladium homini jugulando porrigeret. Si barbara hæc immanitas mihi diſplicuerit, nihil mirum: quin potius hoc uno ſtratagemate deteſtabilem ſe piis omnibus reddidit. Et tamen cùm de ea per litteras, & coràm conqueſtus eſt Duarenus, hominem ingenio, facundia, eruditioneque ſic inſtructum, ut in certamine longè futurus eſſet ſuperior, mitigavi (10). i. e. " In that conteſt, when Baudouin found himſelf " deſtitute of a juſt defence, he had recourſe to a diſho- " nourable artifice; and by raiſing an odium againſt " Duaren on account of his approbation of the pure " and orthodox doctrine, expoſed him to the fury of " the Perſecutors. It is known to have been capital " in France, not only to ſubſcribe to our doctrine, but " likewiſe to read our books privately. This honeſt " Friend of Religion, while he endeavours to ſhew " that Duaren had learned from me, and borrowed " from my writings what he had rightly taught in " his book concerning the Prieſthood, had no other " view but to furniſh the furious enemies of the Church " with a ſword for the deſtruction of that gentleman. " It is no wonder, that this barbarity of his diſpleaſed " me; and by this ſtratagem he made himſelf deteſta- " ble to all pious men. However when Duaren com- " plained to me of it by letters, and in perſon; I ap- " peaſed him, who was ſo eminent for his genius, " eloquence and learning that he would have been " much ſuperior in the conteſt." Add to this a paſſage of his in the anſwer of Theodore Beza to the ſame Baudouin (10).

(9) Calvinus, Reſponſ. ad Balduin. pag. 368. Tractat. Theol.

(10) It is in pag. 231. of the 2d volume of Beza's Works.

[E] Duaren having quitted his office of Profeſſor, it was given to Baudouin, who three years after adviſed them to recall him, and reſigned to him the firſt place.] Here is my proof (11): Certe tam habitus jam tunc fuit pro Juriſconſulto minime vulgari, ut non ſolum Gratianopolitani talem profeſſorem requirerent (tametſi quia iſtic (12) vixerat exiſtimationem ſuam minuiſſet) ſed & Bituriges eum accerſerunt ut Duareno qui tunc abdicarat ſuccederet. i. e. " It is certain, that even " then he was eſteemed a Civilian ſo much above the " common rank, that he was not only deſired by the " city of Grenoble for their Profeſſor, (though he had " leſſened his reputation by living there) but likewiſe " was invited to Bourges to ſucceed Duaren, who had " reſigned his place." This relates to Baudouin in the year 1538. Cum Barone conjunctiſſimus quamdiu is deinde vixit, hoc eſt, triennium docuit totum Jus Civile Balduinus .... mortuo Barone auctor fuit ut Duarenus revocaretur, atque ut illi redeunti ultro conceſſit priorem, in quo conſiſtere poterat, locum, ſic habuit toto quadriennio ſine ullius ſimultatis ſignificatione bonum collegam (13). i. e. " Baudouin lived in the ſtricteſt friendſhip with Baron " as long as the latter lived; that is, for three years, " and taught Civil Law .... upon the death of Baron, " Duaren was recalled upon his ſollicitations, and " Baudouin yielded to him at his return the firſt place, " which he might have inſiſted upon; and found him " a good Collegue without the leaſt ſign of envy or " reſentment, for four years together." I omit the remainder of this paſſage, in which he owns, that at laſt there aroſe a conteſt between theſe two Profeſſors, after Baudouin was retired. I paſs over the contradiction which we meet with in the other ſide of the page: it is a very groſs one. Neque vero dubito quin ſi nunc Duarenus viveret Balduinum tam complecteretur à vobis nunc vexatum, quam ob eo veſtratum partium ſuſpecto fuit interdum ABALIENATUS (14). i. e. " I " do not doubt, but that if Duaren was living, he " would as cordially embrace Baudouin, now he is " perſecuted by you, as he was AVERSE to him, when " he ſuſpected him to be of your party." He had juſt ſaid, that while Baudouin taught at Bourges, he did not receive any marks of enmity from Duaren, and afterwards he owns that he had received ſome, becauſe he was ſuſpected of Calviniſm. Theſe ſuſpicions cannot relate to the time which followed Baudouin's departure; for he went to Geneva upon his leaving Bourges, and afterwards to Straſbourg, and declared himſelf openly of the Reformed Religion (15). They relate therefore to his ſtay at Bourges, during which, as he owns himſelf, he was greatly ſuſpected of favouring the Proteſtants. His contradiction then is manifeſt and inexcuſable. Illud vere dicere poſſum Balduinum in ea urbe ſæpe veſtro nomine in periculum veniſſe dum vobis amicior eſſe credebatur, & erat fortaſſe quam eſſe debebat, neque certe aliud habebant illi quos laudas, inimici quod huic odioſe objectarent (16). i. e. " I can truly affirm " this, that Baudouin was frequently in danger in " that city on your account, being ſuppoſed to be in- " clined

(11) Reſponſ. ad Calvinum & Bezam pro Franciſco Balduino, fol. 83. See other proofs in the following Remark.

(12) That is at Geneva.

(13) Reſponſ. ad Calv. & Bezam, folio 84.

(14) Ibid. folio 84 verſo.

(15) See his Article, Remark [B].

(16) Reſponſio ad Calvinum & Bezam, folio 83 verſo.

particulars, which will ſerve as a ſupplement to Moreri [F]. An edition of his works was

" clined to your party, as he was perhaps more than " he ſhould have been; and thoſe enemies which you " extoll, had nothing elſe to object againſt him." One of the paſſages which I have tranſcribed, diſcovers an error in the writer, who has made the elogium on Baudouin. Reverjus Lutetiam (Balduinus) ſays he (17), magna jam quæſita fama accerſitur à Biturigibus ad docendi munus ſuſcipiendum futurus collega Baronis & Duareni Juriſconſultorum. i. e. " Baudouin returning to " Paris, and having now raiſed himſelf a great repu- " tation, was invited to Bourges to be Profeſſor and " Collegue of Baron and Duaren the Civilians." This ſignifies that the Univerſity of Bourges ſent for Baudouin to be Collegue with Baron and Duaren. This is a palpable miſtake, for he was invited to the Chair which Duaren had quitted. We muſt not forget that Baudouin read Lectures in that Univerſity, before he received the Degree of Doctor. Cum publice Juris civilis obſcuriores titulos interpretatus fuiſſet, incredibili omnium ſtudio Doctor eſt renunciatus voce Baronis (18). i. e. " When he had publicly explained " the obſcure titles of the Civil Law, he was created " Doctor by Baron with univerſal applauſe." Now he received that Degree March 12th 1549 (19). It ſhould be ſaid therefore that he began his Lectures the year before; for he taught Civil Law at Bourges for ſeven years (20), and left that Univerſity in 1555. We muſt remark this, in order to correct an error relating to the time when Eguinaire Baron died. Some ſay that he died in 1556 (21). They are miſtaken; for he lived but three years after Baudouin became his Collegue. If Mr. Spondanus has rightly fixed his death on the 22d of Auguſt 1550 (22), we have new reaſon to conclude, that Baudouin entered on his Profeſſorſhip at Bourges in 1548. If he had entered on in it in January, there would be above two years and an half between his firſt Lecture and the death of Baron; and this is ſufficient to ſay that they were Collegues three years; for in ſuch books exact calculations are not regarded. It is certain, that Baron died September the 22d 1550, aged 55 years (23).

[F] I ſhall mention ſome other particulars, which will ſerve as a ſupplement to Moreri.] Francis Duaren was the ſon of John Duaren, who exerciſed a place of judicature in Bretagne. He ſucceeded him in that place, and performed the functions of it for ſome time. Juriſdictioni ante annos quindecim in Celtica noſtra Britannia non omnino infeliciter præfui, eoque magiſtratu in quo patri jam ſeni ſucceſſeram vixdum adoleſcentiæ annos ingreſſus ita functus ſum ut &c (24). i. e. " Fifteen " years ago I diſcharged an office of judicature in our " country of Bretagne, not without ſucceſs; and in " that poſt in which I ſucceeded my father, who was " advanced in years, when I was very young, I acted " in ſuch a manner, that &c." He read Lectures on the Pandects at Paris in 1536, and among other ſcholars he had three ſons of the learned Budeus (25). He was ſent for to Bourges in 1538 (26) to teach Civil Law, three years after Alciat was retired (27). He quitted his place in 1548, and went to Paris in order to frequent the Bar; for he was deſirous to join the practice to the theory of the Law. This he declares, in a letter written to Francis Baudouin who had ſucceeded him. Cooptatum te in juris doctorum collegium & unum ex omnibus delectum cui nos velut emeriti lampadem curſu traderemus valde ita me Deus amet lætor (28). i. e. " I proteſt, I ſincerely rejoice that " you are choſen into the College of the Civilians, and " ſelected from all the Candidates to ſucceed me, who " am worn out in the ſervice." This letter is dated January the 13th 1549; but we muſt remark that the year began then at Eaſter, ſo that in comparing that date with the letter which he wrote to Sebaſtian de l'Aubeſpine, we ſhall not find any contradiction in his calculations. He ſays in his letter to Francis Baudouin, that he had for two years frequented the Bar of the Parliament of Paris (29). He affirms in the other letter dated November the 4th 1550, that he had frequented it for three years: In Baſilica Pariensi ad tres annos libenter verſatus ſum (30). Theſe two dates relate to the ſame year 1550, if we begin the year at January. He was tired with the chicanery of the Court, and was very glad that the advantageous offers made him by the Ducheſs of Berri ſiſter of Henry II, gave him a favourable opportunity to retire from the bar, and to reſume with honour the employment at Bourges, which he had there. He returned to his Profeſſorſhip of Civil Law there in 1551. No Profeſſor except Alciat had ever ſo large a ſtipend in this Univerſity as our Duaren. Decretum mihi eſt ex ærario publico ſtipendium annuum ad vicena milla ſeſtertiorum nummum, id eſt longe amplius & honorificentius (ſi unum Alciatum excipias) quam Juriſconſultus adhuc ullus habuiſſe in ea civitate dicatur (31). Beſides this he was Maſter of the Requeſts to the Ducheſs of Berri (32). Obſerve that in his Letter to Sebaſtian de l'Aubeſpine dated Nov. the 24th 1550, he mentions the funeral of Eguinaire Baron, which was an authentic proof of the reſpect, which the ſcholars had for the memory of the deceaſed. Obſerve likewiſe, that in 1554 he had a ſtrong inclination to go to Valence, where he was offered a Profeſſorſhip of Civil Law. Dum enitor, elaboro, contendo ut vobis morem geram cum bona hereæ meæ . . . venia . . . interim vobis hunc quaſi arrhabonem quendam propenſi mei in vos animi ac voluntatis mitto (33). i. e. " While I uſe my utmoſt efforts to gratify your " requeſts with the good leave of my Miſtreſs. . . I " ſend you in the mean time a pledge of my ſin- " cere regard for you, and diſpoſition to ſerve you." Thus he ſpeaks in the dedication of a Book in 1554 to the Curators of the Univerſity of Valence.

I have only touched by the bye upon his averſion to the Chicanery of the Bar: but as he has given a very eloquent deſcription of it, I think my ſelf obliged to tranſcribe here part of his words (34). In Baſilica Pariſienſi ad tres annos libenter verſatus ſum: tametſi (ut verum fateor) immodicos ac prope inexplicabiles litium amfractus, quibus illud forum præ cæteris abundat magis quam lites ipſas ac judicia, quibus humanum genus carere non poſſe videtur, perinvitus nec abſque ingenti faſtidio illic viderim. Vix enim credibile eſt quanta ibi hominum eorumque graviſſimorum & lectiſſimorum multitudo quàm minutis, ac puſillis in rebus quotidie occupata ſit. Ac ut de ampliſſimo purpuratorum Patrum ordine & conventu loquar, num tibi videntur pleraque eorum judicia, quæ ſtatis legitimiſque diebus ὡς ἐν τάξει palam eduntur, non dicam auguſto illo conceſſu, ſed infimo aliquo tribunali ſatis digna eſſe? Nam cum &c. i. e. " For three years I thought proper to frequent the " Parliament of Paris; (tho' to ſpeak the truth) it " was with great reluctance and diſſatisfaction " that I ſaw the exceſſive and almoſt inextricable la- " byrinth of controverſies, which that Court abounds " in above all others, rather than the Law-Proceedings, " which ſeem as it were neceſſary to mankind. For " it is ſcarce credible how great a number of men " even of the beſt quality are daily engaged in the " moſt minute and trifling diſputes. And to ſpeak " of the moſt venerable order of the Senators, do " you think that moſt of their deciſions delivered on " ſtated days, are worthy, I will not ſay of that au- " guſt Aſſembly, but even of the meaneſt Tribunal? " For when &c." All this is full of good ſenſe. Thoſe auguſt Aſſemblies, which are ſtiled Parliaments, are too important for the inconſiderable cauſes, determined by them; and one cannot but regret a fine genius, who employs a great deal of time in preparing to plead a cauſe there. What muſt he ſtudy and examine? The Phraſes made uſe of by a Notary in a will or contract of marriage to expreſs the mind of a mean private perſon. I have heard a Counſellor of the Parliament of Mets obſerve, that this ſort of ſtudy is the more diſagreeable, as it does not in the leaſt improve the genius, or enlarge its ideas. Let us inſert here the Verſes of Monſr. Perrault concerning the diſadvantage of our advocates compared with thoſe of antiquity (35):

Je la voy s'applaudir de ſes grands Orateurs,
Je voy les Cicerons, je voy les Demoſthenes,
Ornemens eternels & de Rome & d'Athenes,
Dont le foudre éloquent me fait déja trembler,
Et qui de leurs grands Noms viennent nous accabler.
Qu'ils viennent, je le veux, mais que ſans avantage
Entre les combatans le terrain ſe partage;

Que

(17) Papyr. Maſſo, Elog. tom. 2. pag. 257.

(18) Idem, ibid.

(19) Catherinot, Calviniſme de Berri, pag. 4.

(20) Balduin, Reſponſ. ad Calvin. & Bezam, folio 86.

(21) Menage, Remarques ſur la Vie de Pierre Ayrault, pag. 157.

(22) Spondan. ad ann. 1550. num. 12.

(23) Mr. Pinſon de Riolles, whom I have conſulted, informs me of this.

(24) Franc. Duarenus, Epiſt. ad Sebaſt. Albaſpinæum, pag. m. 297. Part. 2. Oper. It is dated Novemb. 24, 1550.

(25) Gulielm. Budæus, Epiſt. ad Jo. Duarenum. It is amongſt Duaren's Works, pag. m. 300. Part 2.

(26) Annus jam agitur nonus ex quo in hanc civitatem Juris docendi cauſa publice accitus ſum. Duaren. Præf. Diſput. anniv. dated at Bourges in 1547.

(27) Triennio poſt diſceſſum Alciati profiteri Jus civile hic cæpi. Duarenus, in Orat. recitata in cooptatione Buguerii, pag. m. 305 Oper. Part 2. Obſerve that he is miſtaken in his calculation; for Alciat left Bourges in 1534.

(28) Idem, ibid. pag. me 297.

(29) Studia jam biennium interміſſa. Idem, pag. 294.

(30) Idem, Epiſt. ad Sebaſt. Albaſpin. pag. 297.

(31) Idem, ibid. pag. 298. See Remark [B] of the Article BAUDOUIN.

(32) Idem, ibid.

(33) Duaren. Epiſt. Dedicat. Comment. in Titul. de Verborum Obligationibus. It is in the beginning of the 1ſt vol. of his Works.

(34) Idem, Epiſt. ad Sebaſt. Albaſp. pag. 297.

(35) Perrault in his Poem intitled, Le Siecle de Louïs le Grand, pag. m. 175. of the 1ſt vol. of his Parallele des Anciens & des Modernes.

was publiſhed at Francfort in 1561 in folio [G]. His Treatiſe of Plagiaries is not omitted in it: it is a very curious diſcourſe, but too ſhort for ſo copious a ſubject. It might be enlarged with many other thoughts [H]. I ſhall give ſome extracts from a letter which he wrote againſt Baudouin [I].

DUELLIUS

Que dans noſtre Barreau l'on les voye occupez
A défendre d'un champ trois ſillons uſurpez;
Qu'inſtruits dans la Couſtume, ils mettent leur eſtude
A prover d'un egouſt la juſte ſervitude;
Ou qu'n riche appareil la force de leur Art
Eclatte à ſouſtenir les droits de Jean Maillart.

That is,

"I ſee antiquity applauding herſelf on account of "her great Orators; I ſee the Cicero's and Demoſthe- "nes's, the eternal ornaments of Rome and Athens, "the thunder of whoſe eloquence ſtill makes me trem- "ble, and who confound me with their great names. "Let them enter; but let the fields be impartially "divided between the combatants. Let us ſee them "at our Bar engaged in defending three ridges of "land uſurped by ſome other perſon; let them being "will ſkilled in cuſtom employ their ſtudies to prove "the right of a drain; and let them exhibit the "whole pomp of their art in ſupporting the cauſe "of ſome mean Client."

[G] An Edition of Duaren's Works was publiſhed at Francfort in 1592 in fol.] The catalogue of the Oxford Library, Sir Thomas Pope Blount (36) and ſeveral others mention only this Edition; but I add that during the life of Duaren there was printed a collection of his Writings at Lyons in 1554 in fol. printed by Rouille; and that after his death another Edition more compleat was publiſhed in the ſame city and by the ſame Bookſeller in 1579 in fol. Nicholas Ciſner, who had been his ſcholar, and was afterwards Profeſſor of Civil Law at Heidelberg, furniſhed the Printer with ſeveral Pieces. This appears from the little Preface, which he prefixed to that Edition, and wrote at Spires in 1578. I call it little, to diſtinguiſh it from that which he prefixed to the ſecond part of Duaren's Works, and which may be conſidered as a juſt Diſſertation de modo & arte docendi atque diſcendi jura. He wrote it at Spires in 1575. I have not ſeen the Edition mentioned in the text of this Remark; but I know that it was reprinted at Francfort in 1607. I make uſe of that of Geneva in 1608 apud Petrum de la Roviere, and am very ſorry not to find in it the two Pieces of Duaren againſt Baudouin (37).

(36) Pope Blount, Cenſ. Author. pag. m. 466.

(37) Epiſtola de Franciſco Balduino. Defenſio adverſus Balbini Sycophantæ maledicta.

[H] It might be enlarged by a great many other thoughts.] I am going to furniſh one. Theſe perſons are ſcarce ſpoken of without being compared to Eſop's Daw (38).

(38) Or rather Jay. See Monſ. Dacier, ſur la III Epitre du I Livre d'Horace, pag. m. 207.

We find this thought in Horace:

Quid mihi Celſus agit? monitus, multumque monendus,
Privatas ut quærat opes, & tangere vitet
Scripta, Palatinus quæcunque recepit Apollo:
Ne, ſi fortè ſuas repetitum venerit olim
Grex avium plumas, moveat cornicula riſum,
Furtivis nudata coloribus (39).

That is,

------ "And how doth Celſus do?
"Whom ſtill I warn, as I have often done,
"To get ſome ſtock, ſome riches of his own:
"And not from others labours, kept for fame
"In wiſe Apollo's temple, ſteal a name;
"Leſt all the Birds ſhould come and claim their "own,
"And th' chough be his, when her ſtol'n plumes "are gone. Creech.

(39) Horat. Epiſt. 3. lib. 1. ver. 15.

Duaren made uſe of this; for he boaſts, that he is able to reduce eaſily the Plagiary to the condition of that Bird. Corniculam Horatianam plane mihi deprehendiſſe videor, quam furtivis nudare coloribus nihilo mihi difficilius eſſe puto quàm Ariſtophani illi poëtarum Alexandrinorum furta detegere ac convincere (40). i. e. "I think I have plainly diſcovered Horace's Daw, "which it is as eaſy for me to ſtrip of his ſtolen fea- "thers, as it was for Ariſtophanes to detect the Pla- "giariſm of the Alexandrian Poets." But I have not yet ſeen any perſon compare Plagiaries to Partridges. As the Partridge ſitteth on eggs and hatcheth them not; ſo he that getteth riches, and not by right, ſhall leave them in the midſt of his days, and at his end ſhall be a fool (41). Theſe are the words of the Prophet Jeremiah, and declare that thoſe who enrich themſelves with the ſubſtance of others, ſhall not keep their ill-gotten wealth to their death. Interpreters obſerve upon this paſſage, that the Partridge ſteals the eggs of other Birds, and ſits on them, but that the young ones, which ſhe hatches, do not own her for their mother, but leave her and go to the birds which laid the eggs (42). This is the uſual fate of Plagiaries. They reap what they had not ſown; they educate other people's children; they raiſe themſelves a ſurreptitious family: but theſe ſtolen children do like ill-gotten wealth, malè parta malè dilabuntur, they take wings and fly to their real father. An Author who has been robbed, claims his own property; and if he be prevented by death, his ſon, relation, or friend, purſues his right. A perſon likewiſe, who is no friend of his, will do him this good office, in order to have the honour of diſcovering the theft, or to cover the Plagiary with confuſion. What the love of juſtice would not inſpire him with, vanity, ill-nature, deſire of revenge will ſuggeſt to him; ſo that ſooner or later ſtolen productions abandon the thief. Obſerve, that ſome Plagiaries do not imitate the Partridge in all points; they do not take the pains to ſit on them; they ſeize on the ſentiments and expreſſions of another ready formed: it is true, they ſometimes torment themſelves, in order to give them another air, to prevent the theft being ſo eaſily diſcovered; and then they may the more properly be compared to the Partridge. I am ſurprized, that the name of this bird has not been given to thoſe men who bring up the children, which another has gotten at their houſe. It is more ſuitable to them than the name of that bird (43), which goes and lays in another bird's neſt, and leaves it to hatch and breed the young one. Perhaps they were perſuaded of the truth of this ſtory of the Partridge. A learned critic has long ago inſinuated, that St. Jerom is miſtaken in citing the teſtimony of three excellent Naturaliſts (44): Hieronymus teſtes citat hujus rei ſanè luculentos, & quos, ut minus idoneos, rejicere nemo poſſit, Ariſtotelem videlicet, Theophraſtum, & Plinium; ſed an verè, fides penes ipſum eſto, ego ſanè apud illos authores nihil tale legere memini. Locus Hieronymi eſt in commentariis ad eum locum (45): Aiunt, inquit, ſcriptores naturalis hiſtoriæ tam beſtiarum & volucrum, quàm arborum herbarumque, quorum principes ſunt apud Græcos Ariſtoteles & Theophraſtus, apud nos Plinius ſecundus, hanc perdicis eſſe naturam, ut ova alterius perdicis, id eſt, aliena furetur, & eis incubet foveatque: cumque fœtus adoleverit, avolare ab eo, & alienum parentem relinquere. i. e. "St. Jerom "alledges in proof of this ſome witneſſes, whoſe "authority I can by no means reject, viz. Ariſtotle, "Theophraſtus, and Pliny; but whether truly, muſt "be left to his credit. For my part, I do not re- "member to have read any ſuch thing in thoſe Writers. "The paſſage of St. Jerom is in his Commentaries "on that place: The Writers, ſays he, of the "Natural Hiſtory of beaſts and birds, as well as trees "and herbs, the chief of whom among the Greeks are "Ariſtotle, and Theophraſtus, among the Latins Plinius "Secundus, tell us, that it is the nature of the Par- "tridge to ſteal the eggs of another Partridge, and "ſit upon them; and that when the young ones are "grown up, they fly away from their foſter-parent."

(40) Duaren. Epiſt. de Plagiar. pag. 296. Part 2. Oper.

(41) Jeremiah xvii. 11.

(42) See Druſius, Obſervation. lib. 4. cap. 24. pag. 100.

(43) The Cuckow.

(44) Druſius, Obſervat. lib. 4. cap. 24. pag. 100.

(45) That is, the 11th verſe of the 17th chap. of Jeremiah.

[I] I ſhall give ſome extracts of a Letter, which Druſius wrote againſt Baudouin.] I found it among the pieces, which are joined to Calvin's Anſwer ad Balduini Convicia (46). Duaren wrote it after he had ſeen an Oration, which Baudouin had publiſhed in Germany, and which was very ſevere upon the Profeſſors of Bourges. No perſon was named in it, but it was eaſily ſeen whom the Orator meant, and that Duaren in particular was ill treated in it. If we credit this Letter of Duaren, thoſe who were moſt favourable to Baudouin, who loved and eſteemed his talents, commended him in ſuch a manner, that an unlucky But generally entered into their commendations;

(46) See the Remark [H] of the Article of BAUDOUIN.

DUELLIUS (a) (CAIUS) Conſul in the year of Rome 493, vanquiſhed the Carthaginian Fleet, and was the firſt Roman to whom a naval triumph was granted (b). A column was erected in honour of him with a fine inſcription. It was one of the columns which were called roſtratæ (c), on account of the prows of the ſhips, with which they were adorned. A fragment of this column was dug up at Rome about the end of the XVI Century. The learned have employed themſelves in decyphering the inſcription (d). Some Authors ſay that Duellius, in acknowledgement of his victory, had the privilege granted him of being conducted to his houſe with the ſound of flutes, and by the light of flambeaux; when he ſupped in the city [A]; but others aſſert, that he aſſumed this by his own authority [B]: the latter opinion is more

(a) Others write it Duillius.

(b) Florus, lib. 2. cap. 2.

(c) Pliniur, lib. 34. cap. 5.

(d) Peter Ciaconius wrote a Treatiſe on this ſubject, which was printed at Rome in 1608.

ons; that is to ſay, but he is vain, ambitious, and a diſſembler; we are ſorry that this blemiſh appears on ſo fair a face. Ita eum laudant fere ut in ejus laudibus excipiant ἀλαζονίαν, faſtum, ambitionem, φιλαυτίαν: præterea mirum ſimulandi diſſimulandique artificium, & hoc veluti nævo decoram admodum ſpecioſamque faciem nonnihil deformari doleant (47). When he was at Paris in 1548 or thereabouts (48), he paid a viſit to Duaren, and preſented to him a Book, which he had dedicated to him (49). He wanted to ſucceed Duaren in the Profeſſorſhip, which he had juſt quitted in the Univerſity of Bourges, and deſired Letters of Recommendation of him. He obtained them, and they were of advantage to him, for the Magiſtrates of Bourges immediately granted him a penſion, and ſoon after he was admitted Profeſſor of Civil Law without the leaſt expence in the ceremony of admiſſion. He was obliged to ſurmount the oppoſition made to him by Eguinaire Baron and ſome other adverſaries, and from that time was upon ill terms with that Collegue, and raiſed ſuch diſturbances againſt him, that it is ſuppoſed he died of grief. Nec ulla fuit ex eo tempore ſimultatis inter eum & Baronem intermiſſio . . . . adverſus quem (Baronem) iſte vindictæ cupiditate flagrans tantas excitavit tragœdias, ut à pleriſque credatur Baro ob mœrorem ex ea re conceptum deceſſiſſe (50). Duaren returned to Bourges after the death of Baron, and received all kinds of civility and reſpect from Baudouin; but he was adviſed not to truſt him, ſince he had by a thouſand artifices endeavoured to prevent his return, or at leaſt his recovering the rank, which he had held before. The diſtruſt, which they had endeavoured to infuſe into him, was eaſily removed by the proteſtations, which Baudouin made of his ſincerity; but at laſt he opened his eyes, and expoſtulated with him very ſtrongly; and from that time there was a real enmity between them, tho' there was the appearance of an agreement. Nihil amplius diſſimulandum ratus cum homine, expoſtulavi & de jure amicitiæ neceſſitudiniſque violato conqueſtus ſum paulo liberius ac ſtomachoſius (51). i. e. "I thought proper to diſſemble "no longer with him, but expoſtulated with him, "and complained with great freedom and reſent- "ment of his violation of the rights of friendſhip." The outward appearance of their friendſhip was likewiſe laid aſide upon three or four occaſions, when Baudouin broke out into an exceſſive rage againſt Duaren. This was the ground of the firſt quarrel. Baudouin diſcontinued his public Lectures upon pretence that he could contribute more to the advantage and reputation of the Univerſity and the City by his Writings than his Lectures. He was cenſured by the Magiſtrates after Duaren had informed them of this neglect of his (52). Some time after there happened a ſedition in the Civil-Law-Schools. Baudouin being obliged to anſwer for it before the Magiſtrates, pleaded that cauſe, and loſt it very diſhonourably. He thought that Duaren had done him this ill turn. The affair happened thro' Baudouin's having choſen the time of his Lectures according to his own convenience, and not according to the hours aſſigned to each Profeſſor. This occaſioned the tumults; for Baudouin would not change the hour, which he had choſen, though it was that of another, who would not relinquiſh it. Horam ſubinde mutabat arbitrio ſuo & in aliorum poſſeſſionem non minus ſuperbe & inſolenter quam turbulentè & ſeditioſè invadebat. Qua ex re ii motus atque tumultus excitati ſunt, ut, &c (53). Soon after he again broke out againſt Duaren, when he was deprived of his ſtipend for ſome months, in which he had diſcontinued his Lectures; for we may obſerve that about three months before he quitted Bourges, he left off reading without ſaying one word to his collegues to excuſe the intermiſſion of his Lectures. This was aſcribed to his reſentment on account of the ſentence pronounced by the Judges againſt him. Quod hominis ſtudium plerique ſic interpretabantur, ut dolori acerbiſſimo & ægritudini ex recente illa damnatione judicioque ſuſceptæ, vulgo tribuerent (54). His anger for being refuſed his ſtipend during the time, in which he had diſcontinued his Lectures, made him fall outragiouſly upon his collegues, and he left the city two days after without taking his leave of them (55). But he promiſed the Magiſtrates to return. Obſerve that for two years he had been very importunate for the enlargement of his ſtipend, but that all his ſollicitations were ineffectual. He could not obtain half the ſtipend, which Duaren enjoyed. The latter declares (57), that after he had ſeen that the Proteſtants gave ear to the ſlanderous diſcourſes of ſuch a deſerter, he found his inclination of going over to them abated. He quotes a ſaying of Simonides, that we ought to conſider thoſe as ſlanderers, who eaſily give credit to ſlander. Scitum eſt illud Simonidis, Non deſines me auribus calumniari, cum oſtendere vellet eos quoque calumniatores habendos eſſe, qui aures calumniatoribus faciles præberent (58). His Letter is dated July 15, 1555. I muſt not forget, that he obſerves there (59) that Baudouin, who quitted Bourges on account of the inſupportable uneaſineſs, which he ſuffered there, perſuaded thoſe of the Reformed Religion, that he left this Univerſity merely to procure liberty of conſcience. Such is the way of mankind: they give other people falſe reaſons of their conduct, and conceal the true ones. They all deſerve, ſome more, ſome leſs, to have the pun, made upon the famous Aſtrologer of Provence, applied to them:

Noſtra damus cum verba damus, nam fallere noſtrum eſt,
Et cum verba damus nil niſi noſtra damus..

[A] Some Authors ſay that Duellius . . . had the privilege granted him of being conducted to his houſe with the ſound of flutes, and by the light of flambeaux, when he ſupp'd abroad.] Livy is very expreſs on this point (1): C. Duillius Conſul adverſus claſſem Pœnorum proſpere pugnavit, primuſque omnium Romanorum ducum navalis victoriæ duxit triumphum: ob quam cauſſam ei perpetuus honos habitus eſt, revertenti à cœna tibicine canente funale præferretur. i. e. "C. Duillius the "Conſul fought with ſucceſs againſt the Carthaginian "Fleet, and was the firſt of all the Roman Generals, "who had the honour of a Naval Triumph; and "had this perpetual privilege granted him, that "when he returned from ſupper, he was conducted "with muſic and flambeaux." After a witneſs of ſo much weight, it is not neceſſary to introduce Aurelius Victor, who ſays, Duilio CONCESSUM eſt ut prælucente funali & præcinente tibicine à cœna publice rediret (2). i. e. "It was granted to Duillius, that he ſhould re- "turn publicly from ſupper with flambeaux and "muſic."

[B] Others aſſert, that he aſſumed this by his own authority.] Cicero is as expreſs in this point as poſſible. C. Duillium M. filium qui Pœnos claſſe primus devicerat redeuntem à cœna ſenem ſæpe videbam puer, delectabatur crebro funali & tibicine quæ ſibi nullo exemplo PRIVATUS ſumſerat; tantum LICENTIÆ dabat gloria (3). i. e. "When I was a boy, I have often "ſeen Duillius the ſon of Marcus, who gained the "firſt naval victory over the Carthaginians, returning "from ſupper; he was pleaſed with the flambeaux "and muſic, which attended him, which honour "he, though a private man, had aſſumed to himſelf "without any example, ſo much liberty did his re- "putation procure him." Florus is of the ſame opinion. Duillius Imperator non contentus unius dici triumpho,

(47) Duaren. Epiſt. de Fr. Balduino, pag. m. 58.

(48) Ibid. pag. 61.

(49) He had printed at Lyons.

(50) Duaren. Epiſt. de Fr. Balduino, pag. 61.

(51) Ibid. pag. 63.

(52) Ibid.

(53) Ibid. pag. 64.

(54) Ibid.

(55) Ibid. pag. 65.

(56) Ibid.

(57) Ibid. pag. 68.

(58) Ibid.

(59) Ibid. pag. 66.

(1) T. Livius, in Epit. lib. 17.

(2) Aurel. Victor, de Viris illuſtribus.

(3) Cicero, de Senectute, cap. 13.

more probable than the former [C]. He built a temple to Janus in the herb-market (e). One thing is related of him, which appears to me more remarkable than all the honours which he poſſeſſed in the Commonwealth. It is ſaid, that his wife lived to old age without knowing that her huſband, who had a ſtinking breath, differed in that point from other men [D]. Her name was Bilia: it was juſt to preſerve her name; and yet it would have been entirely loſt to us, if St. Jerom had not inſerted it in his works. Coſtar had no reaſon to quote Eraſmus concerning this Lady's Anſwer [E].

(e) Tacit. Ann. lib. 2. cap. 49.

pho, per vitam omnem ubi à cœna rediret prælucere funalia, præcinere ſibi tibias JUSSIT, quaſi quotidie triumpharet (4). i. e. "Duellius the Admiral not being "content with one day's triumph, as long as he lived "had flambeaux and muſic attending him by his or- "der, whenever he returned from ſupper, as if he "reſolved to triumph every day."

(4) Florus, lib. 2. cap. 2. See alſo Val. Maximus, lib. 3. cap. 6. num. 4.

[C] The latter opinion is more probable than the former.] For it is more eaſy to imagine falſely, that there have been public Decrees upon certain points, than to be ignorant of a Decree actually made public. Livy thought it ſo probable, that the Senate or people had decreed peculiar honours to Duellius, that he was eaſily led to believe, that all the privileges enjoyed by Duellius, were grants of his Country; and it is not to be doubted, but the deſcendants of Duellius countenanced this error: theſe flutes and flambeaux would be a greater honour to them, if they were a public gift, than if they were only an uſurpation. An Hiſtorian might therefore be deceived in this point. two hundred years after; but it would not have been eaſy to be miſtaken, if there had been a public Decree for it: the family would have been ſo careful in preſerving the titles of it, that Cicero and ſo many other Writers could not have pretended any plea of ignorance. However I am ſurprized not to find in any Commentator (5) any reflection upon the two different accounts of Duellius's nocturnal Honours. The difference does not conſiſt in trifles; Duellius had a great deal to gain or loſe by it; and yet this is not the occaſion of my making this remark; it is with a view to accuſtom young people to ſeek, among the variations of Hiſtorians, the ground of the greateſt probabilities.

(5) I do not pretend to have conſulted all.

[D] His wife lived to old age, without knowing that her huſband, who had a ſtinking breath, differed in that point from other men.] Duellius complained one day to his wife, that ſhe had not told him of a defect, which he had been juſt reproached with, that is, having a ſtinking breath. I thought, anſwered ſhe, that all men were like you. St. Jerom relates this ſtory more at large. Duellius qui primus Romæ navali certamine triumphavit Biliam virginem duxit uxorem tantæ pudicitiæ, ut illo quoque ſæculo pro exemplo fuerit, quo impudicitia monſtrum erat, non vitium. Is jam ſenex & trementi corpore in quodam jurgio audivit exprobari ſibi os fœtidum, & triſtis ſe domum contulit. Cumque uxori queſtus eſſet quare nunquam ſe monuiſſet, ut huic vitio mederetur, feciſſem, inquit illa, niſi putaſſem omnibus viris ſic os olere (6). i. e. "Duellius, who was the "firſt who triumphed for a naval victory, married Bi- "lia, a virgin of ſuch modeſty, that ſhe was a pat- "tern even in that Age, when immodeſty was a "monſter, not a vice. He being now old, and his "body feeble, was reproached in a conteſt, which he "had, with having a ſtinking breath. He went home "melancholy upon it, and complaining to his wife, "that ſhe had never told him of it, that he might "have procured ſome remedy for it; ſhe anſwered, "I would have told you, if I had not thought, that "all men had ſtinking breath as well as you."

(6) Hieron. adver. Jovin. lib. 1.

[E] Coſtar had no reaſon to quote Eraſmus concerning this Lady's Anſwer.] He had aſcribed to Cicero what related only to Brutus, and had been cenſured for it. He vindicates himſelf, among other reaſons, by the example of ſeveral great men, who had committed miſtakes of the ſame kind. Seneca, ſays he (7), has aſcribed to Stilpo a ſaying of Bias, and to Ovid a verſe of Tibullus (8). "According to Plutarch, it was "Hiero, the Uſurper of Syracuſe, to whom his wife an- "ſwered ſo modeſtly, You are in the wrong to complain "of me; I do not underſtand men's breath; I imagined "all men had been ſo too. And yet according to "Eraſmus that wiſe and witty reply was made by the "wife of that Duellius, who firſt defeated the Car- "thaginians at ſea." Girac did not fail to obſerve to him, that Eraſmus had no concern here (9): in ſhort, we have ſeen that St. Jerom aſcribes this Anſwer to Duellius's wife; ſo that Eraſmus did not miſtake one name for the other. It was Coſtar, who was ignorant of what the antients had ſaid concerning the Roman Lady. He was right in ſaying that Plutarch mentions this adventure as applied to other perſons, as Hiero and his wife; but Eraſmus was not at all ignorant of this; he takes notice of it in another part of this Book (10). What I think is too ſtrong and unjuſt in Girac's reply, is, that he accuſes Coſtar of having pretended that Eraſmus committed a groſs blunder, which extremely diſgraced his memory, Coſtar pretended nothing leſs than this: his own intereſt obliged him to repreſent it as a very ſlight miſtake.

(7) Coſtar, Suite de la Defenſe de Voiture, pag. 55.

(8) That verſe is Arida nec pluvio ſupplicat herbi Jovi. See Senec. Quæſt. Natur. lib. 4. cap. 1.

(9) Girac, Replique, chap. 15. pag. m. 130.

(10) He mentions the Anſwer of Hiero's wife, Apothegm. lib. 5. pag. 341. and that of Duellius's wife, ibid. lib. 8. pag. 619.

☞ DUGDALE (Sir WILLIAM), an eminent Engliſh Antiquary in the XVII Century, was ſon of Mr. John Dugdale, and grandſon of Mr. James Dugdale of Cletherow in Lancaſhire Gent. His mother was Elizabeth daughter of Mr. Arthur Swynſon, a younger ſon of William Swynſon of Swynſon in Staffordſhire Eſq; (a). He was born at Shuſtock in Warwickſhire September the 12th (b) 1605, and was educated in grammar-learning till he was ten years of age under Thomas Sibley, Curate of Nether Whitacre near Shuſtock; and afterwards ſent to the Free-School of Coventry, where he continued under Mr. James Cranford till he was near fifteen years of age, when he was taken home and inſtructed by his father in the Law, in which by his indefatigable application he ſoon made a conſiderable progreſs. March the 17th 162$\frac{2}{3}$ he married Margery daughter of John Huntbache of Seawell in Staffordſhire Gent. his father being then grown infirm, and willing to ſee him ſettled; and upon his death in 1625 he purchaſed the manor of Blythe in the pariſh of Shuſtock, at which place he ſoon after ſettled, and wrote moſt of his books. His inclination leading him chiefly to the ſtudy of antiquity and hiſtory, eſpecially that of his own country, he contracted an acquaintance with thoſe perſons, who could be moſt aſſiſtant to him in that affair [A]; and

(a) Life of Sir William Dugdale, written by himſelf, and prefixed to his Hiſtory of St. Paul's Cathedral at London, 2d edit. corrected and enlarged by the Author's own Hand. Publiſhed by Edward Maynard D. D. Rector of Boddington in Northamptonſhire. London 1716, in fol.

(b) Father Niceron, Memoires pour ſervir à l'Hiſt. des Hommes Illuſtres, tom. 15. pag. 383. edit. Paris 1731, ſays the 22d of that month, meaning very probably according to the New Style.

[A] His inclinations leading him chiefly to the ſtudy of Antiquity and Hiſtory, eſpecially that of his own country, he contracted an acquaintance with thoſe perſons, who could be moſt aſſiſtant to him in that affair.] He was encouraged in thoſe ſtudies by Samuel Roper Eſq; a Barriſter of Lincoln's-Inn, who was eminent for his knowledge in that way, and with whom (by reaſon he was couſin-german to Mr. Richard Seawell, who had and particularly Sir Henry Spelman, to whom he was introduced at London in the beginning of the year 1638; and by him recommended to Thomas Earl of Arundel, then Earl Marſhal of England; who in September following appointed him a Purſevant at Arms Extraordinary by the title of Blanch Lyon (c). Upon the removal of Mr. Edward Walker to the office of Cheſter Herald, his Lordſhip obtained his Majeſty's letters patents for creating our Author Rouge-Croix Purſevant in Ordinary, bearing date March 18th $16\frac{39}{40}$. By this means he had a lodging aſſigned him in the Herald's office at London, and an annual ſalary of 20 pound out of the Exchequer, beſides the perquiſites of his office. Mr. Dugdale continued at London augmenting his collections out of the records in the Tower and other places in or near the city, till the breaking out of the civil wars; when his Majeſty by a warrant under his royal ſignet manual dated at York June the 1ſt 1642, commanded him to repair thither; where he continued till the middle of July, when he received his Majeſty's command to attend Spencer Earl of Northampton, Lord Lieutenant of the county of Warwick, who was then endeavouring to ſecure the chief places of that county, and diſperſe the forees under the Lord Brook; and Mr. Dugdale was employed to ſummon the adherents of the Parliament-Party to ſubmit to the King. He attended his Majeſty at the battle of Egehill on the 23d of October 1642 [B] and afterwards to Oxford (d), where he was created Maſter of Arts on the 1ſt of November (e), and thence to Reading and Brainford. Upon his return to Oxford he continued there by his Majeſty's command till the ſurrender of that Garriſon to the Parliament, on the 24th of June had married his ſiſter) he became firſt acquainted in 1618. After Mr. Dugdale was ſettled at Blythe-Hall. he read the Deſcription of Leiceſterſhire (1), written by William Burton (2) of Lindley (3) in that County Eſq; and being pleaſed with that work, reſolved to undertake one of the ſame kind for Warwickſhire, and was introduced into Mr. Burton's acquaintance by Mr. Fiſher Dilke of Shuſtock, a near relation of Mr. Burton, who encouraged our Author in his deſigns. By this Gentleman's means Mr. Dugdale in the year 1630 became acquainted with Sir Simon Archer of Umberſlade in the Pariſh of Tamworth in Warwickſhire Knt.; who being much pleaſed with the ſtudies of Heraldry and Antiquities, and having made very choice and conſiderable collections out of divers antient Writings relating to the ſaid County and the Families thereof, not only communicated to Mr. Dugdale theſe Collections, but procured him the acquaintance of moſt of the Gentlemen of Note in the County. Theſe Gentlemen having peruſed Mr. Burton's Book abovementioned, were deſirous, thro' Sir Simon Archer's incitement, to preſerve the honour of their families by ſuch a work, for which purpoſe they communicated to Mr. Dugdale their antient deeds and evidences; and particularly Sir Simon Clarke of Brome-Court in the pariſh of Salford, who imparted to him not only divers old writings of importance, but likewiſe the Leiger-Book of the Priory of Kenelworth, in which he found a great variety of materials, as appears from his frequent quotation of it in his Antiquities of Warwickſhire. He was very aſſiduous in cultivating his friendſhip with theſe Gentlemen, and eſpecially Sir Simon Archer, who in Eaſter-term 1638 intending with his Lady to go to London, importuned our Author to accompany them in that journey, aſſuring him, that it would be worth his labour, if he could ſpare ſo much time from his beloved ſtudy. This being readily aſſented to, they had ſeveral diſcourſes on the way for the promotion of his deſigns; and when they came to London Sir Simon introduced him to Sir Henry Spelman, then near eighty years of age; who received him with great humanity, and after ſome diſcourſe and ſight of ſome of his Collections relating to the Antiquities of Warwickſhire, entertained ſo high an opinion of him, that he told him, that he thought him a very fit perſon to ſerve the King in the Office of Arms, and accordingly recommended him to Thomas Earl of Arundel, then Earl Marſhal of England. He informed him likewiſe, that Mr. Roger Dodſworth a Gentleman of Yorkſhire had taken indefatigable pains in ſearching of Records and other antient Memorials relating to the Antiquities of that County, but eſpecially concerning the Foundations of the Monaſteries there and in the Northern parts of the Kingdom; which work he did not a little commend to the care of ſome induſtrious ſearchers into Antiquities, affirming, that in his younger years he had procured tranſcripts of the Foundation-Charters of divers Monaſteries in Norfolk and Suffolk (himſelf being of Norfolk;) and importuning Mr. Dugdale to join with Mr. Dodſworth in that work, which, by reaſon of his youth, and readineſs to proſecute thoſe ſtudies, might in time be brought to ſome perfection. Mr. Dugdale a few days after accidentally meeting with Mr. Dodſworth at the lodgings of Mr. S. Roper at Lincoln's-Inn, and they acquainting each other with their deſigns, they readily engaged to proceed mutually in their collections for the work abovementioned; but ſtill with this reſervation, that Mr. Dugdale ſhould not neglect his collections relating to the Antiquities of Warwickſhire, wherein he had now made a conſiderable progreſs. During his ſtay in London, he became acquainted with Mr. Richard Gaſcoigne a Yorkſhire Gentleman, who was much inclined to theſe ſtudies, eſpecially with relation to pedigrees, wherein he had taken ſome pains for divers Northern Families; and having great intereſt with Sir Chriſtopher Hatton of Kirby in Northamptonſhire Knt. of the Bath, afterwards created Lord Hatton, a perſon highly affected to Antiquities, and who had not ſpared any expence in obtaining ſeveral choice collections from public Records, Leiger-Books, and antient Charters, and divers old Manuſcripts, he introduced Mr. Dugdale to that Gentleman at London, who received him with great civility, and promoted his ſtudies. For which purpoſe Sir Chriſtopher brought him acquainted with Sir Thomas Fanſhaw, then the King's Remembrancer in the Exchequer, by reaſon of which office he had the cuſtody of divers Leiger-Books and other valuable Manuſcripts, eſpecially that curious Record call'd the Red-Book, as alſo Teſta de Nevill, Kerby's Queſt, Nomina Villarum, and others; to which Mr. Dugdale, by his favour, had free acceſs. He procured him likewiſe acceſs to the Records in the Tower of London, by his intereſt with Mr. Collet, then chief Clerk under Sir John Burroughs. Mr. Roper alſo introduced him into the acquaintance of Sir Thomas Cotton Bart., by which means he had the uſe of the incomparable Library begun by his father Sir Robert Cotton; and of Mr. Scipio Squire, then one of the Vice-Chamberlains of the Exchequer, by whoſe means he had the liberty of conſulting Domeſday-book, and the Fines, Plea-Rolls, and other Records there (4).

(c) He was created ſo at Richmond Sept. 24. Life of Sir William Dugdale, ubi ſupra.

(d) Life of Sir William Dugdale, ubi ſupra.

(e) Wood, Faſti Oxon. vol. 2. col. 7. 2d edit. London 1721.

(1) It was publiſhed at London 1621 in fol.

(2) He was born Aug. 24, 1575, and died April 6, 1645.

(3) It is about eight miles diſtant from Blythe-Hall.

(4) Wood, Faſti Oxon. vol. 2. col. 7, & ſeqq. and Life of Sir Will. Dugdale, ubi ſupra.

[B] He attended his Majeſty at the battle of Edgehill on the 23d of October 1642.] Soon after this he committed to writing the moſt remarkable paſſages in that battle; and that the relation of all particulars might be the better underſtood, he went to the place in February following, being accompanied with ſome Gentlemen of note, and took with him a ſkillful Surveyor, and exactly ſurveyed the field of battle, noting where each army was drawn up, where the canons were placed, and the graves where the ſlain perſons were buried; and obſerving from the relation of the neighbouring inhabitants the certain number, which lay buried in each pit or grave, which by a juſt computation did not amount to full one thouſand, though the report of the vulgar made them at leaſt five thouſand.

June 1646, having been created Cheſter Herald on the 16th of April 1644, upon the promotion of Sir Edmund Walker to the place of Norroy. After the ſurrender of Oxford he went to London, where he compounded for his eſtate, which had been ſequeſtered, paying 168 pound for his compoſition at Goldſmith's Hall. In May 1648 he attended the Lady Elizabeth Hatton to France, where he continued three months; and having made ſeveral curious collections there [C], returned to England, having letters of ſafe conduct from Henrietta the Queen-Mother, dated Auguſt the 3d. He now began to prepare ſeveral works for the preſs; which when publiſhed gained him a very great reputation [D]. June the 18th 1660 he procured by the intereſt of the Lord

[C] Having made ſeveral curious Collections there.] Through the favour of Francis du Cheſne, ſon of the learned Andrew du Cheſne, he had a view of divers excellent Collections made by the latter relating to ſeveral Monaſteries in France, Normandy, and other parts of that Kingdom; among which diſcovering divers remarkable things touching ſeveral Religious Houſes in England, formerly called Priories Aliens, (which had been cells to ſeveral great Abbies in foreign parts) he took copies of them, of which he made good uſe in his Monaſticon Anglicanum.

[D] He began now to prepare ſeveral Works for the preſs, which when publiſhed gained him a very great reputation.] His Works are as follow. I. Monaſticon Anglicanum; ſive Pandectæ cœnobiorum Benedictinorum, Cluniacenſium, Ciſtercenſium, Carthuſianorum, à primordiis ad eorum uſque diſſolutionem, ex MSS. ad Monaſteria olim pertinentibus, Archivis Turrium Lond. Ebor. &c. London 1655 in fol. The ſecond Volume was printed in 1661 in fol. under this title: Monaſtici Anglicani Volumen alterum, de Canonicis Regularibus Auguſtinianis, ſcilicet Hoſpitaliariis, Templariis, Gilbertinis, Præmonſtratenſibus, & Maturinis ſive Trinitariariis. Cum Appendice ad Volumen primum de Cœnobiis aliquot Gallicanis, Hibernicis, Scoticis, necnon quibuſdam Anglicanis antea omiſſis, à primordiis &c. Tho' theſe two volumes were publiſhed under the names of Roger Dodſworth of Yorkſhire and William Dugdale of Warwickſhire, yet Mr. Wood aſſures us (5), that the principal perſons in the College of Arms had informed him, that they were both collected and totally written by Dodſworth, as the original, which they had ſeen, did teſtify. " And Dr. Barlow (6), continues Mr. Wood, hath ſeveral times told me, that much about the time of " the death of Dodſworth they were offered to him " to be bought, that he might take ſome order to " have them publiſhed. Howſoever it is, ſure I " am, that Sir William did take great pains to " have them publiſhed, did methodize and order them, " correct them when at the Preſs, and made ſeveral " Indexes to them." This Roger Dodſworth was the ſon of Matthew Dodſworth Eſq; Regiſter of the Church of York, by Eleanor, daughter of Ralph Sandwith Eſq; and was born July the 24th 1585 at Newton-Grange in the Pariſh of St. Oſwald in Ridale in Yorkſhire, which was the ſeat and eſtate of his mother's father. Mr. Dodſworth having a natural inclination to the ſtudy of Hiſtory and Antiquities, began early to make Collections of them, eſpecially ſuch as related to Yorkſhire; and afterwards was much encouraged in his labours by Sir Thomas Fairfax, afterwards Lord Fairfax, who for ſeveral years allowed him a penſion. He was a perſon of wonderful induſtry, but leſs judgment and was always collecting and tranſcribing, but never publiſhed any thing. He died in Auguſt 1654, and was interred in the Church of Rufford in Lancaſhire. After his death the Lord Fairfax took into his poſſeſſion not only all the old manuſcripts, which Mr. Dodſworth had obtained from ſeveral hands, but likewiſe all his Collections, and communicated them to Dr. Nat. Johnſon, a Phyſician of Yorkſhire, with hopes that he would extract from them a compleat account of the antiquities of the Weſt Riding of that county. The Lord Fairfax by his laſt will bequeathed theſe manuſcripts and collations, which amounted to 122 Volumes at leaſt, to the public Library in Oxford, to which they were conveyed in June 1673 (7). But to return to the Monaſticon, after the collections of the two Volumes were compleated, an offer was made to ſeveral Bookſellers of the copy, upon ſuch terms, as might have defrayed the charge of the tranſcripts from the records. But the Bookſellers not being willing to venture on them, Mr. Dodſworth and Mr. Dugdale joined together, and hired ſeveral ſums of money to defray the expence of the Edition. The care of printing the Work lay on Mr. Dugdale, becauſe Mr. Dodſworth died before the tenth part of the firſt Volume was printed. The firſt Volume being finiſhed in 1655, the publication of the ſecond was ſuſpended for ſome years, till the greateſt part of the impreſſion of the former was ſold, whereby the expence of the ſecond might be ſupported (8). In 1673 he publiſhed a third Volume under this title, Monaſtici Anglicani Volumen tertium & ultimum: Additamenta quædam in Volumen primum ac Volumen ſecundum jampridem edita; necnon Fundationes ſive Dotationes diverſarum Eccleſiarum Cathedralium ac Collegiatarum continent, ex Archivis regiis, ipſis autographis, ac diverſis Codicibus Manuſcriptis decerpta. London 1673 in fol. Mr. Wood obſerves (9), that as ſoon as this Volume was publiſhed, " the faction common-" ly reported, that it was made extant purpoſely to " introduce Popery, they being then exaſperated a-" gainſt it." Mr. Dugdale's name alone is prefixed to this, without any mention of Mr. Dodſworth; tho' ſome of the collections of the latter were undoubtedly made uſe of in it (10). Some time before it was publiſhed, Mr. Dugdale defired Mr. Wood, that if in his ſearches with relation to his Work of the Hiſtoria & Antiquitates Univerſitatis Oxonienſis he could meet with any materials towards the compleating of the third Volume of the Monaſticon, he would ſupply him with them; upon which Mr. Wood ſent him ſeveral curious Collections (11). Mr. Dugdale was likewiſe aſſiſted in that Volume by Sir Thomas Herbert Bart. (12). II. The Antiquities of Warwickſhire illuſtrated from Records, Leiger-Books, Manuſcripts, Charters, Evidences, Tombes and Arms: beautified with Maps, Proſpects, and Portraitures. London 1656 in folio. Mr. Dugdale was at the whole charge of publiſhing this Work, and continued in London to correct the Preſs himſelf, becauſe the ordinary Correctors were not ſkilled at all in the pedigrees (13). Mr. Wood (14) ſtiles this Work his Maſter-piece; and Archdeacon Nicholſon tells us (15), that our Author was Maſter of all the advantages requiſite for ſuch performance; and that no man can ſo well judge of the great labour and pains beſtowed on the bringing of this excellent Work . . . . to perfection, as he that has viewed the many Volumes of Materials (16), which he gathered in order to the compiling of it. His great zeal againſt the ſacrilegious deſtruction of ſome religious ſtructures carried his ſearches into every corner of the Hiſtory, that related to that matter; and his early inclination to the ſtudy of Heraldry obliged him carefully to preſerve whatever might be grateful on that head to the Nobility and Gentry of the country. Another Writer (17) likewiſe gives this Work the title of the beſt methodized and moſt accurate account that ever was wrote of this nature. III. The Hiſtory of St. Paul's Cathedral in London from its foundation till theſe times: extracted out of original Charters, Records, Leiger-books, and other Manuſcripts: Beautified with ſundry proſpects of the Church, figures of Tombes, and Monuments. London 1658 in fol. There was a ſecond Edition of this Book corrected and enlarged by the Author's own Hand. To which is prefixed his life written by himſelf. Publiſhed by Edward Maynard D. D. Rector of Boddington in Northamptonſhire London 1716 in fol. IV. The Hiſtory of imbanking and draining of divers fens and marſhes, both in foreign parts and in this Kingdom, and of the improvement thereby. Extracted from Records, Manuſcripts, and other authentic inſtruments. London 1662 in fol. adorned with ſeveral Cuts. V. Origines Juridiciales; or Hiſtorical Memorials of the Engliſh Laws, Courts of Juſtice, Forms of Tryal, Puniſhment in Caſes Criminal, Law-Writers, Law Books, Grants and Settlements of Eſtates, Degrees of Serjeant, Inns of Court and Chancery. Alſo a Chronology

(5) Col. 14.

(6) Biſhop of Lincoln in the reign of King Charles II &c.

(7) Idem, col. 14, 15.

(8) Idem, col. 11, 12.

(9) Col. 15.

(10) Idem, ibid.

(11) Idem, ibid.

(12) Idem, ibid. and Athen. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 692.

(13) Idem, Faſti Oxon. col. 12.

(14) Col. 15.

(15) Engliſh Hiſtorical Library, Part 1. pag. 63. edit. London 1696, in 8vo.

(16) In the Aſhmolean Muſeum at Oxford.

(17) The Engliſh Topographer: or an Hiſtorical Account (as far as can be collected from printed Books and Manuſcripts) of all the pieces that have been written relating to the Antiquities, Natural Hiſtory, or Topographical Deſcription of any part of England, By an impartial Hand, pag. 233. edit. London 1720, in 8vo.

Lord Chancellor Hyde letters patents under the great ſeal for the place of Norroy vacant by the promotion of Sir Edward Walker to the office of Garter King at Arms; and upon Sir Edward's deceaſe February the 20th $167\frac{6}{7}$ (f) he ſucceeded him in the poſt of Garter [E]; his patent being paſſed on the 26th of April 1677, and being ſolemnly created Garter in the College of Arms May the 24th (g) by Henry Earl of Peterborough, (g) Memoirs of the Life of Elias Aſhmole, pag. 57. and Wood, col. 14.

(f) Memoirs of the Life of that learned Antiquary Elias Aſhmole Eſq; drawn up by himſelf by way of Diary. With an Appendix of Original Letters. Publiſhed by Charles Burman, Eſq; pag. 56. edit. London 1717 in 24°. Wood, Faſti Oxon. vol. 2. col. 17. ſays that Sir Edward died on the 19*th.*

nology of the Lord Chancellors and Keepers of the Great Seal, Lord Treaſurers, Juſtices of the King's Bench, &c. London 1666, 1672 and fol. Mr. Wood tells us (18), that in the Chronology or Chronica ſeries are many faults. VI. The Baronage of England: or an Hiſtorical Account of the lives and moſt memorable actions of our Engliſh Nobility in the Saxon's time to the Norman Conqueſt; and from thence of thoſe who had their riſe before the end of King Henry the IIId's Reign. Deduced from public Records, ancient Hiſtorians, and other Authorities. London 1675 in fol. The ſecond Volume was printed in 1676 in a thin fol. under this title: The Baronage of England, or an Hiſtorical Account &c. from the end of Henry the Third's Reign, and before the eleventh of King Richard II. deduced &c. The third Volume was printed at London the ſame year in a thin fol. under this title: The Baronage of England, or an Hiſtorical Account &c. from the tenth of Richard II untill this preſent year 1676, deduced &c. Theſe two laſt Volumes were printed, and always go together. Auguſtin Vincent, formerly Windſor Herald, and Clerk of the Records in the Tower of London, had laid a foundation of a Baronage of England; but he dying before it was finiſhed, it was undertaken and continued by his ſon John Vincent, who intitled it, Heroologia Anglica: or a Genealogical Hiſtory of the Succeſſion and Creation of all our Princes, Dukes, Earls, and Viſcounts ſince the Norman Conqueſt to this day. "This, ſays Mr. Wood (19), I have ſeen in a thick "folio Manuſcript, (for it is not yet publiſhed) con"taining many quotations from the Records in the "Tower of London; but it is a very ſlight and trite "thing in compariſon of that of Sir William Dug"dale's. The ſaid three Tomes of the Baronage of "England he gave, with other of his Books, to the "College of Arms; but two of the Kings, and other "Heralds there, tell me, that there are a world of "faults in them; and they dare not depend upon "the generality of matter relating to pedigree there"in." Mr. Dugdale ſent to Mr. Wood copies of all the Tomes, with an earneſt deſire, that he would peruſe, correct, and add to them what he could obtain from Records and other Authorities; upon which Mr. Wood ſpending a whole long vacation in that matter, drew up at leaſt ſixteen ſheets of corrections, but more additions; which being ſent to the Author he remitted a good part of them into the margin of a copy of large Paper of his three Tomes of the Baronagium. VII. A Short View of the late Troubles in England; briefly ſetting forth their riſe, growth, and tragical concluſion. As alſo ſome parallel thereof with the Baron's Wars in the time of King Henry III; but chiefly with that of France, called the Holy League, in the Reign of Henry III and Henry IV. late Kings of that Realm. Oxford 1681 in fol. To this Book is added A perfect Narrative of the Treaty at Uxbridge. This Short View was preſented by the Vice-Chancellor of Cambridge, in the name of that Univerſity, to Queen Catherine on the 27th of Sept. 1681, at which time their Majeſties were entertained there (20). VIII. The ancient Uſage in bearing of ſuch Enſigns of Honour as are commonly called Arms. Oxford in 8vo. There are two Editions of this Book, one of which was publiſhed at Oxford February the 4th 1681, and the other in the beginning of the year 1682. It is chiefly taken from Mr. William Wyrley's Book, intitled, The true uſe of Armory, ſhewed by Hiſtory, and plainly proved by example, London 1592 in 4to. IX. A true and perfect catalogue of the Nobility of England. Printed with The antient Uſage &c. To this is added, A true and perfect Liſt of all the preſent Knights of the Garter &c. as they now ſtand in St. George's Chapel in Windſor-Caſtle, Sept. the 10*th.* 1681. X. A Catalogue of the Baronets of England, from the firſt erection of that Dignity until the 4*th of July* 1681 inclusive. Printed alſo with The antient Uſage &c. The ſecond Edition reacheth to the 6th of December the ſame year. To both theſe Editions are added, I, An exact alphabetical Catalogue of all the Shires, Cities, Borough-Towns, Cinque-Ports in England; ſpecifying the Number of the Knights of the Shires, Citizens, Burgeſſes, and Barons of the Cinque-Ports, they do reſpectively elect to ſerve as their Repreſentatives in Parliaments; &c. collected and written by Charles Hatton Eſq; ſon of Chriſtopher Lord Hatton. 2. A true and perfect Catalogue of the Nobility of Scotland, with a Liſt of the Royal Burroughs therein, &c. collected and written by the ſame hand. 3. A true and perfect Catalogue of the Nobility of Ireland, with a liſt of all the Shires, Cities, and Burroughs of Ireland, which make Returns of Parliament &c. collected and written by the ſame hand. XI. A perfect copy of all the Summons of the Nobility to the great Councils and Parliaments of this Realm from the 49*th of Henry III. to this preſent; with Catalogues of ſuch Noblemen as have been ſummoned to Parliament in right of their wives.* London 1686 in fol. Our Author likewiſe took great pains in publiſhing Sir Henry Spelman's Concilia, Decreta, Leges, & Conſtitutiones in re Eccleſiarum Orbis Britannici, Tomus II. London 1664 in fol. which he undertook at the requeſt of Dr. Gilbert Sheldon, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the Earl of Clarendon, and made Collections out of the Cotton-Library and other places, and methodized the whole Work; and the whole Volume amounting to 200 ſheets, all of it except fifty ſeven was entirely of Mr. Dugdale's collecting. The Edition is full of faults occaſioned by the abſence of that Gentleman. Mr. William Somner of Canterbury took a great deal of pains to correct a printed copy of it with his pen in the margin; which copy is ſtill remaining in the Library belonging to the Cathedral of Canterbury (21). About the ſame time the ſecond part of Sir Henry Spelman's Gloſſary which begins with the letter M, was brought to Mr. Dugdale to have it fitted for the Preſs, Sir Henry having left it imperfect, and a great deal being on looſe pieces of paper; upon which Mr. Dugdale digeſted them into proper order, and reviſed and prepared the firſt part for the Preſs (22), which was publiſhed with the ſecond part at London 1687 in fol. under the following title; Gloſſarium Archaiologicum, continens Latino-Barbara, peregrina, obſoleta, & novæ ſignificationis Vocabula.

(18) Faſti Oxon. vol. 2. col. 15.

(19) Ibid. col. 16.

(20) Idem, col. 16.

(21) Idem, col. 12.

(22) Idem, col. 12, 13.

[E] Upon Sir Edward Walker's deceaſe February the 19*th* $167\frac{6}{7}$, he ſucceeded him in the poſt of Garter.] Upon the death of Sir Edward there aroſe a great diſpute between Henry then Earl of Norwich, and afterwards Duke of Norfolk, as Earl Marſhal of England, and the King, about the nomination of a perſon to ſucceed in the office of Garter: the Chancellor of the Garter on the King's part, as Sovereign of the Order, ſtrenuouſly inſiſting upon his Majeſty's right to nominate, by reaſon the ſaid office of Garter was an employment merely belonging to that Order, and chiefly for attending at all inſtallations and feſtivals, and performing other ſervices unto the Sovereign and Knights Companions thereof. The Earl on his part as Earl Marſhal and chief Superintendent of the Officers of Arms, pleading the uſage of his Predeceſſors in that honourable office of Earl Marſhal to nominate and recommend to the King, upon the death and vacancy of any King at Arms, Herald or Purſevant, ſuch perſon or perſons to ſupply the place, as he ſhall think moſt fit, and moſt properly qualified for that ſervice. In this conteſt Sir William Haward Knight, a Gentleman well accompliſhed with learning, eſpecially in points of Heraldry, having obtained the favours of ſeveral great men to move his Majeſty on his behalf; the King inclined to confer that office on him. The Earl of Norwich, on the other hand, thinking it a conſiderable derogation to his office of Earl Marſhal to be refuſed the privilege which his Predeceſſors had enjoyed, and for which he produced ſome late precedents, obtained the favour of the Duke of York to ſpeak to his Majeſty in his behalf. The King therefore aſked the Earl, whom he deſigned to nominate and recommend? who anſwered, Mr. Dugdale; though it is well known, ſays borough, who then exerciſed the office of Earl Marſhal, or Deputy to the Earl of Norwich; and the day following he was knighted by his Majeſty at Whitehall. December the 18th 1681 his Wife died; as he did himſelf ſuddenly in his chair at Blythe-Hall on the 10th of February $168\frac{5}{6}$, and was interred at the Pariſh Church of Shuſtock on the 12th of that month, where he had in his life-time erected a monument for himſelf of free-ſtone in form of an altar, with an epitaph written by himſelf. By his laſt will he left all his manuſcripts and collections to the Muſæum of Elias Aſhmole Eſq; who had ſeveral years before married Elizabeth one of his daughters. Mr. Wood obſerves (b), that "had this indefatigable perſon ſequeſtered himſelf from "wordly troubles, and totally addicted himſelf to his ſtudies, and had minded the "public more than his private concerns; the world might have juſtly enjoyed more of his "lucubrations, and thoſe more true and accurate than ſuch as are already publiſhed, "eſpecially thoſe in his latter days. Yet however what he hath done is prodigious, "conſidering the great troubles that he had endured for his loyalty, and the cumbrances "of this world, that he had run through; and therefore his memory ought to be vene-"rated and had in everlaſting remembrance for thoſe things, which he hath already "publiſhed; which otherwiſe might have periſhed and been eternally buried in ob-"livion." He had a ſon named JOHN, who was created Maſter of Arts in the Univerſity of Oxford September the 9th 1661, being then chief Gentleman in the chamber of Edward Earl of Clarendon Lord High Chancellor of England (i); and was afterwards appointed Windſor Herald October the 26th 1675, upon the reſignation of Elias Aſhmole Eſq; (k) [F], and at laſt Norroy King of Arms in the beginning of March $168\frac{5}{6}$ [G], about which time he was knighted by his Majeſty. He publiſhed A Catalogue of the Nobility of England, according to their reſpective precedencies, as it was preſented to his Majeſty on New-years day, ann. 1684. To which is added, The Blazon of their paternal Coats of Arms, and a Liſt of the preſent Biſhops. Printed at London 1685, on the broad ſide of a large ſheet of paper; and reprinted with additions in 1690.

(b) Faſti Oxon. vol. 2. col. 17.

(i) Ibid. col. 143.

(k) Memoirs of the Life of Elias Aſhmole Eſq; pag. 54.

(23) Col. 13. Mr. Wood (23) that he had another perſon (Thomas Leigh, Cheſter Herald) in his eye, againſt whom ſuch objections might have been juſtly taken, as that he would have failed of his aim had he ſtuck to him. His Majeſty immediately replied, Nay then I am content. So that the affair being thus concluded, the Earl Marſhal ordered his Secretary to inform Mr. Dugdale of it by the poſt that night, and to deſire him to come up as ſoon as poſſible to London from Blythe-Hall. This news did not a little ſurprize him, becauſe he was ſo far from any thought of that office, that upon ſome letters from ſeveral perſons of honour after Sir Edward Walker's death, earneſtly urging him to come immediately to London in order to ſollicit for that office; he excuſed himſelf on account of his age, he being then twenty years older than any other Officer in the College of Arms. After ſerious conſideration what to reſolve upon, having a far greater deſire to wave than accept it, he grew apprehenſive leſt his Majeſty ſo readily aſſenting to the Earl Marſhal's nomination of him, ſhould be offended in caſe he refuſed the favour offered him; and leſt the Earl Marſhal ſhould be diſpleaſed with his not complying; upon which he determined to accept it (24). Mr. Aſhmole tells us (25), that upon Sir Edward Walker's deceaſe, the Biſhop of Saliſbury (26) wrote to him on the 22d of February $167\frac{3}{4}$ that he had ſollicited the King to beſtow the Garter's place on him; who wrote back to excuſe his acceptance of it. On the the 26th the Earl Marſhal ſent his Secretary Mr. Hayes to have Mr. Aſhmole's opinion whether that place was in the King's or Earl's diſpoſal; and Mr. Aſhmole gave his opinion that it was in the King's Diſpoſal. March the 6th the Biſhop of Saliſbury came to his houſe to acquaint him with the King's command, that he ſhould aſſiſt him in making good the King's title to that place. On the 30th of that month there was an hearing before ſome of the Lords of the Council, and ſome Knights of the Garter, between the King and Earl Marſhal; at which the Garter's place was adjudged to be ſolely in the King's diſpoſal. The day following Mr. Bartie earneſtly preſſed Mr. Aſhmole to accept of that place, which he refuſed; and on the 2d of April Mr. Dugdale was pitched upon to be Garter, and the King gave his conſent; whereupon the Earl Marſhal ſent for him out of Warwickſhire by that night's poſt; who came to London on the 10th (27).

(24) Idem, col. 13, 14.

(25) Memoirs of the Life of that learned Antiquary Elias Aſhmole Eſq; drawn up by himſelf by way of Diary. With an Appendix of original Letters Publiſhed by Charles Burman Eſq; pag. 57.

(26) Dr. Seth Ward.

(27) Ibid. pag. 56, 57.

[F] Appointed Windſor Herald October the 26th 1675, upon the reſignation of Elias Aſhmole Eſq;] Mr. Aſhmole tells us (28), that on the 25th of February $167\frac{4}{5}$ he deſired Mr. Hayes, the Earl Marſhal's Secretary, to move his Lord to give him leave to reſign his Herald's place; and October the 28th following, Mr. Aſhmole ſollicited his Lordſhip for that purpoſe (29). January the 29th $167\frac{4}{5}$ he obtained the Earl's leave to reſign (30); and April the 17th his brother-in-law Mr. John Dugdale having agreed with him for that place, moved the Earl that he might ſucceed him, which his Lordſhip granted (31). July the 21ſt Mr. Aſhmole ſurrendered his place of Windſor Herald to his Majeſty, before one of the Maſters in in Chancery (32); and October the 26th Mr. Dugdale was created Windſor Herald in his room (33).

(28) Ibid. pag. 49.

(29) Ibid. pag. 51.

(30) Ibid. pag. 52.

(31) Ibid. pag. 52, 53.

(32) Ibid. pag. 53, 54.

[G] At laſt Norroy King of Arms in the beginning of March $168\frac{5}{6}$.] On the 14th of February Mr. Aſhmole ſollicited the Duke of Norfolk on his brother-in-law Mr. Dugdale's behalf, for his Grace's intereſt with the King, that he might ſucceed his father Sir William Dugdale in the place of Garter: the Duke promiſed his favour, tho' he ſeemed more inclinable to prefer Sir Thomas St. George. On the 19th his Grace propoſed to Mr. Aſhmole to give Mr. Dugdale the place of Noroy; and the next day gave him aſſurance of it (34).

(33) Ibid. pag. 54.

(34) Ibid. pag. 77.

T

DURANT (SAMUEL), Miniſter of Charenton, gained the love and reſpect of his flock by the ſeveral excellent qualities of which he was poſſeſſed. He was eſteemed a great Preacher. He died, I think, in the year 1626, and was ſucceeded by Monſieur Daillé (a). Among his friends was Monſieur Arnauld Counſellor and Secretary of the King, and Comptroller General of the Reſtes [A]. This we learn from the Epiſtle Dedicatory

(a) See the Life of Monſ. Daillé, pag. 12.

[A] Among his friends was Monſr. Arnauld, Counſellor and Secretary of the King, and Comptroller General of the Reſtes.] I have remarked this, in order to ſhew, that the ſeveral perſons of the family of Arnaud were of the Reformed Religion. The Gentleman, of whom I am ſpeaking, was very careful to go to Charenton, and contributed very readily both his pains and money for the advancement of the ſervice of God.

Dedicatory of ſeven of his ſermons printed in 1627. Frederic Spanheim his kinſman (b), and heir to his books, publiſhed theſe ſeven ſermons at Geneva, and wrote the Dedication.

(b) See the Remark [B] of the Article SPANHEIM.

(1) Spanhem. Epit. Dedic. de Sept Sermons de Durant.

God. Some of his relations having turned Papiſts, he expreſſed his diſpleaſure at it in ſtrong terms. He and his ſiſters particularly aſſiſted Samuel Durant to the end (1). The Epiſtle Dedicatory, which I quote, mentions Monſr. de Montfermeil his nephew. This may be added to the latter part of the Remark [D] of the article ANTHONY ARNAUD the Advocate.

DURER (ALBERT) deſcended of an Hungarian family [A], and born at Nuremberg May the 20th 1471 (a), was one of the beſt Engravers and Painters of his age. "Having (b) made a ſlight beginning with the pencil in the ſhop of his father, who "was a Goldſmith, he aſſociated himſelf with an indifferent Painter, named Martin "Hupſe, who taught him to engrave on copper, and to manage colours. Albert pro- "cured himſelf likewiſe to be inſtructed in Arithmetic, Perſpective, and Geometry; "and then he undertook at twenty ſeven years of age (c) to exhibit ſome of his works "to the public. The firſt works of his graver was the three Graces repreſented by "three naked women, perfectly well ſhaped, having over their heads a globe, in which "was engraved the date of the year 1497. He engraved..... ſeveral pieces of the "paſſion, which were ſo highly eſteemed, that Marc Antonio of Bologna, an experi- "enced Engraver at Venice, took the liberty to copy them [B], and put the Author's "mark to them, in order to make them paſs for originals.... As he did not make ſo "much uſe of the pencil as the graver, we meet with few of his pictures except in the "palace of the Emperor and ſome ſovereign Princes; they are done in ſo elegant a "manner, that nothing can be more beautiful or better expreſſed [C]." The particular account

(a) Melch. Adam. in Vitis Phil. Germ. pag. 66.

(b) Bullart, Academ. des Scienc. tom. 2. pag. 383, 384.

(c) He ſhould have ſaid 26; for the year 1497 is not the 27th of his age, as Bullart ſuppoſes, who makes him born in 1470. Mr. Felibien has committed the ſame miſtake in his IV Entretien ſur les Vies & ſur les Ouvrages des Peintres, pag. 330, 351.

[A] He was deſcended of an Hungarian Family.] His father was born at Cula, a village near Waradin. Thus I venture to tranſlate theſe words of Melchior Adamus: Fuit ejus pater Albertus ex vico Cula prope Voradium civitatem Hungariæ, natus (1). I ſuſpect, that there is an error of the preſs of Voradium inſtead of Varadium in this Author. This error has been faithfully tranſcribed by Paul Freher: See page 1439 of his Theatrum. Moreri did not underſtand what I am going to quote. Albertum Durerum è Pannonia oriundum accepimus, ſed cujus majores in Germaniam commigrarint (2). i. e. "We have been informed "that Albert Durer was deſcended originally from an "Hungarian Family, but that his Anceſtors removed "into Germany." He thought the ſenſe of this was, that our Albert was the ſon of an Hungarian, whoſe Family was notwithſtanding originally German. Nothing is more falſe. Vaſari did not know the Country of Albert Durer; he ſuppoſes him to have been a Fleming, and makes him begin his copper-plates at Antwerp. E nel vero, ſays he (3), ſe queſt' huomo ſi raro, sì diligente e sì univerſale haveſſe havuto per patria la Toſcana, COM' EGLI HEBBE LA FIANDRA, e haveſſe potuto ſtudiare le coſa di Roma, come habbiamo fatto noi, ſarebbe ſtato il miglior Pittore de' paeſi noſtri, ſi come fù il più raro, e più celebrato, che habbiano mai havuto i FIAMMINGHI. i. e. "It is certain, that if "this extraordinary, induſtrious, and univerſal man "had had Tuſcany for his Country, as HE HAD "FLANDERS, and could have ſtudied at Rome, as "we have done, he would have been the beſt Painter "of our Country, as he is the moſt extraordinary and "famous one, which the FLEMINGS ever had." He had ſaid in the preceding page: Dopo queſto Martino, comincio Alberto Duro in Anverſa, con più diſegno, e miglior giudicio, e con più belle inventioni a dare opera alle medeſime ſtampe. i. e. "After this Martin, Al- "bert Durer begun at Antwerp with better deſigns "and more judgment, and much finer invention, to "apply himſelf to the ſame kind of prints."

(1) Melch. Adam. in Vitis German Philoſoph. pag. 66.

(2) Idem, ibid.

(3) Giorgio Vaſari, Vite de Pittori, Part 3. pag. m. 301.

[B] His pieces of the Paſſion were ſo highly eſteemed, that Marc Antonio of Bologna . . . took the liberty to copy them.] Mr. Bullart has committed here a groſs blunder: he confounds Marc Antonio of Bologna with another Marc Antonio, who from his having been the diſciple of Franceſco Francia was ſurnamed Franci (4). Marc Antonio of Bologna was ſo far from attempting to counterfeit this work of Albert Durer, that he joined with him both in the impreſſion and ſale of it (5). It was Marc Antonio Franci, who plaid the tricke here mentioned. Vaſari ſpeaks at large of this; but he does not ſay, that Durer, who proſecuted this Copyer, was obliged to ſollicit his pardon. He ſays expreſly, that the Plaintiff obtained only, that this Marc Antonio ſhould no longer put Albert Durer's name and mark to his works. Havendo dunque contrafatto in ramo d'intaglio groſſo, come era il legno, che haveva intagliato Alberto, tutta detta Paſſione, e vita di Chriſto in 36 carte, e fattovi il ſegno, che Alberto faceva nelle ſue opere, cioè queſto A E (6), riuſcì tanto ſimile di maniera, che non ſapendo niſſuno, ch' elle fuſſero fatte da Marc' Antonio, erano credute d' Alberto, e per opere di lui vendute, e comperate: La qual coſa eſſendo ſcritta in Fiandra ad Alberto e mandatogli una di dette Paſſioni contrafatte da Marc' Antonio, venne Alberto in tanta collera, che partitoſi di Fiandra, ſe ne venne a Venetia, e ricorſo alla Signoria, ſi querelò di Marc' Antonio, ma però non ottenne altro, ſe non che Marc' Antonio non faceſſe più il nome, e ne il ſegno ſopradetto d' Alberto nelle ſue opere (7). i. e. "Having therefore counterfeited upon copper- "plates with rude graving, as Albert Durer had done "on wood, the whole Paſſion and Life of Chriſt in "thirty ſix cuts, and put the mark uſed by Albert "in his work, viz. A E, they were ſo much like his, "that no body knowing they were done by Marc An- "tonio, they were thought to be Albert's, and ſold "as his. An account of this being written to Albert "in Flanders, and one of the counterfeit cuts of the "Paſſion by Marc Antonio being ſent to him, Albert "was ſo enraged, that he immediately left Flanders, "and came to Venice, where he applied himſelf to "the Government, complaining of Marc Antonio; "but he obtained no other ſatisfaction, but that Marc "Antonio ſhould not again put the name and mark "abovementioned of Albert to his works." See margin (8).

(6) This is a miſtake; it ſhould be A. D. See quotation (12)

(7) Vaſari, Vite de Pittori, Part 3. pag. 301.

(8) Bullart. Academ. des Scienc. tom. 2. pag. 384. is therefore miſtaken; for he ſays, that the Senate of Venice would have puniſhed this impoſtor with great rigour, if Albert had not obtained his pardon.

[B] His pictures are done in ſo elegant a manner . . . that nothing can be better expreſſed.] His picture of Adam and Eve is one of the moſt conſiderable of his paintings: it is in the palace at Prague. Gaſpar Velius commended it in a fine manner; for he wrote two verſes in which he ſuppoſes, that an Angel admiring this repreſentation of Adam and Eve, cries out, You are more beautiful than when I drove you out of the Garden of Eden.

Angelus hos cernens, miratus dixit: ab horto
Non ita formoſos vos ego depuleram.

Mr. Bullart, from whom I borrow thoſe particulars (9) adds (10), I. "That there is ſtill to be ſeen in the pa- "lace a picture of Chriſt bearing his Croſs, which "the City of Nuremberg preſented to the Emperor; "an Adoration of the Wiſe Men; and two pieces of "the Paſſion. II. That he made for a Monaſtery at "Francfort an Aſſumption, the beauty of which was "a good income to the Monks by the preſents made to "them for the ſight of ſo exquiſite a piece. III. "That the people of Nuremberg carefully preſerve "in

(4) Vaſari, Vit. de Pittori, Part 3. pag. 302.

(5) Idem, ibid.

(9) Bullart. Academ. des Sciences, tom. 2. pag. 384.

(10) Ibid.

account which we find in Vaſari (d) of his engravings, is very curious; and it is no ſmall compliment to him, that this Italian Author owns, that the prints of Albert Durer being brought to Italy, excited the Painters of that country to perfect that part of the art, and ſerved them for an excellent model. He is infinitely copious in his extolling the delicacy of this admirable Engraver, and the fruitfulneſs of his fine imagination. It is certain that Albert Durer had an inexhauſtible fund of deſigns; and as he could not flatter himſelf with the hopes of executing them all while he worked on copper, ſince every piece of that kind coſt him a great deal of time, he bethought himſelf of working on wood (e). The two firſt works which he performed in that way, are the beheading of St. John Baptiſt, and the head of that Saint preſented to Herod in a charger. They were publiſhed in 1510 (f). His St. Euſtachius is one of his beſt pieces [D]. I cannot tell whether we can eaſily reconcile thoſe, who ſay that Albert Durer was very unhappily married, with thoſe who relate, that in painting the Virgin Mary he took his wife's face for his model and original [E]. The Emperor Maximilian had a great affection for him, and treated him with a particular regard, and gave him good penſions (g), and letters of (d) Giorgio Vaſari, Vite de Pittori, Part 3. pag. m. 300, & ſeq.

(e) Idem, ibid. pag. 301.

(f) Idem, ibid.

(g) Melch. Adam, Vitæ Philoſ. German. pag. 67.

" in the Senators-Hall his portraits of Charlemagne, " and ſome Emperors of the Houſe of Auſtria, with " the twelve Apoſtles, whoſe Drapery is very agree- " able. IV. That he ſent to Raphael his portrait " done by himſelf upon canvas, without any colours, " or touch of the pencil; only heightened with ſhades " and white, but with ſuch ſtrength and elegance, " that Raphael was ſurprized at the ſight of this ex- " cellent piece, which coming afterwards into the " hands of Julio Romano, was placed by him among " the curioſities of the palace of Mantua."

[D] His St. Euſtathius is one of his beſt pieces.] Let us ſee what Vaſari ſays. Et appreſſo un S. Euſtachio inginocchiato dinanzi al Cervo, che hà il Crocifiſſo frà le corna, la qual carta è mirabile, e maſſimamente per la bellezza d'alcuni cani in varie attitudini: che non paſſono eſſere più belli (11). i. e. " And a St. Euſta- " chius kneeling before a ſtag, which has a crucifix " between its horns: this cut is wonderful, and par- " ticularly for the beauty of the dogs repreſented in " various attitudes, which cannot poſſibly be finer." John Valentin Andreas, Doctor of Divinity in the Duchy of Wirtemberg, ſent this piece to a Prince of the Houſe of Brunſwic, with whom he had the honour of a long correſpondence by Letters. Let us ſee the thanks, which were returned for this preſent. Beaſti me iterum novo munere, ſculptura magis quàm æruâ, inſignis illius pictoris Norici, quod litera A. D. ad Baſin initiali incarceratâ inuit, cui facile nihil deeſſe crederem, niſi ut Zeuxis aut Parrhaſius, aut alius aliquis, cui æquè prona favet Minerva, colores adderet, & nativam formam (12). i. e. " You have extremely ob- " liged me by your new preſent, a cut which merits a " nobler metal than braſs, done by the celebrated " Painter of Nuremberg, as appears from the Letters " A. D. at the foot of it; and which, I think, wants " nothing, unleſs Zeuxis or Parrhaſius, or ſome per- " ſon equally favoured by Minerva, ſhould add co- " lours, and the native form." Let us alſo mention the praiſes, which the ſame Divine gave to Durer in his Anſwer to the Letter of this Prince. Euſtachium Dureri, ſi non à meâ, certè ſummi artificis manu non ingratum Tibi fore, facilè divinare potui, in quo Viro illud mirandum eſt, quòd ex rudi & barbaro ſeculo primus Germanorum, non tantùm artis ſuæ perfectione, ad naturæ imitationem emerſerit, ſed nec ſecundum poſt ſe reliquerit, omnibus ejus partibus, ſcalptura, ſculptura, ſtatuaria, architectonica, optica, ſymmetria, & ſimilibus ita abſolutis, ut niſi Mich. Angelum Bonarotum, Italum, coævum & æmulum ſuum, parem, non habuerit, iis operibus, (quorum maximam partem olim poſſedi) poſt ſe relictis, quæ unius hominis ætatem facilè ſuperent, & paupertate in frugali etiam vitâ, perpetuâ comite. Hunc Itali hodie plurimi faciunt, nobiſque ſuccenſent, qui domeſtica noſtra bona & ornamenta non agnoſcamus (13). i. e. " I could eaſily gueſs, that the Euſtachius of Du- " rer would not prove an unacceptable preſent to you, " from whatever hand a performance of that admirable " Artiſt came. It is very ſurprizing with regard to " that man, that in a rude and barbarous age he was " the firſt of the Germans, who not only arrived to " an exact imitation of nature by the perfection of his " art, but likewiſe left no ſecond, being ſo abſolute " a maſter of it in all its parts, in etching, engraving, " ſtatuary, architecture, optics, ſymmetry, and the " reſt, that he had no equal, except Michael Angelo " Buonaroti the Italian, his contemporary and rival, " and left behind him ſuch works (the greateſt part " I formerly was poſſeſſed of) as were too much for " the life of one man. He lived always in a frugal " manner in mean circumſtances. The Italians high- " ly eſteem him, and reproach us for not ſetting a due " value on the ornaments of our own country." Let us not forget the care, which the Emperor Rodolphus II took to get the plate of St. Euſtachius gilded; and we ſhall ſee at the ſame time that Durer corrected in it a fault which Pirkheimer had pointed out to him; it was, that the horſe's ſtirrups were too ſhort. Dureriana manu Te apprimè delectari crediderem, theſe are the words of John Valentin Andreas (14), cum pro accurato judicio diſcernas, quantum hic unus omnibus aliis artificio, diligentiâ, & naturæ æmulatione antecellat. Ex omnibus verò ejus ſpeciminibus Euſtachium in Cælatura primas tenere, à peritis rerum acceptum, cujus cupream laminam cum Imperator RUDOLPHUS II fel. mem. magno redemiſſet, inaurari voluit, ne amplius atteretur. Memini tamen legiſſe, à Bilibaldo Pirkheimero, Viro nobili, & in Repub. Noribergenſi Triumviro clariſſimo Dureri Mecænate, & Nutricio prope unico, cùm nihil haberet, quod in Euſtachiana tabula improbaret, tamen notaſſe, Stapedes breviores eſſe, quàm ut Euſtachius huic equo inſidere commodè poſſit, pœnamque artifici indixiſſe, ut equum inſtructum depingeret, ad equiſonum inſtitutum, quod ille egregiè præſtitit, quem ſæpe cum voluptate vidi. i. e. " I ſhould believe, that you are greatly delighted " with Durer's performances, ſince from exquiſite " judgment you perceive how much ſuperior he is to " all others in art, induſtry, and imitation of nature. " But of all his cuts, I have heard men of taſte ſay, " that his St. Euſtachius claims the firſt rank; the " copper-plate of which being purchaſed for a great " ſum by the Emperor Rodolphus II, he ordered it to " be gilded, to prevent it from being worn any " longer. But I remember to have read, that Bili- " bald Pirkheimer, a man of quality, and one of the " Magiſtrates of Nuremberg, the patron of Durer, " and almoſt his only benefactor, was not able to object " to any thing elſe in that plate, but that the ſtirrups " were too ſhort for Euſtachius to ſit commodiouſly " on horſeback; and that by way of puniſhment he " ordered the Artiſt to paint a manag'd horſe accord- " ing to the direction of the Jockeys, which he per- " formed admirably well; and I have often ſeen it " with great pleaſure."

[E] I cannot tell whether we can eaſily reconcile thoſe, who ſay, that Albert Durer was very unhappily married with thoſe, who relate that in painting the Virgin Mary he took his wife's face for his model and original.] I find the firſt of theſe two facts in a Letter of Prince Anthony Ulric of Brunſwick (15). Quod addis, non ſolùm memorabile, ſed & admirabile fuiſſe, inſignem illum Pictorem Noricum, (quem meritò majuſculâ literâ hic veneror) deſperato etiam illo, abortivoque tempore, ad tantam perfectionem, & artis ſuæ excellentiam pervenire potuiſſe, id non minus & me afficit, dum inſuper illud memoriâ repeto, quod à Studiorum noſtrorum Ductore chariſſimo, non ita pridem mihi dictum, ipſum domi Xantippen habuiſſe peſſimam, ac divinæ ſuæ mentis flagellatricem acerrimam. Sed uti multos magnos Viros calamitas facit, ita non obſtante hoc, fama de Durero noſtro apud exteros nihilominus adeò percrebuit, ut plurimi, Italorum cumprimis, ductum ipſius artificioſiſſimum ſequi,

(11) Vaſari, Vite de Pittori, Part 3. pag. 303.

(12) See the book intitled, Seleniana Auguſtalia, printed at Ulm. This I collect from pag. 201. in a Letter dated Nov. 10, 1646.

(13) Ibid. pag. 203.

(14) Ibid. pag. 308.

(15) Seleniana Auguſtalia, pag. 309.

of Nobility, and for a coat of arms three escutcheons argent in a field azure (h). Charles the Vth and Ferdinand King of Hungary his brother followed this example of the Emperor Maximilian in favour and liberality (i). Notwithstanding this it is said, that this great Painter died very poor [F], and was forced to be buried at the public expence. His conversation was charming (k); he was fond of mirth and diversions, but in a manner not the least opposite to good manners. He was virtuous and wise, and never employed his art in obscene representations [G]. He wrote several books, which were printed. That which he undertook to write upon the rules of Painting, is one of them; but as it was difficult for him to please himself, he proceeded slowly in it, and did not live to see the edition of that work finished [H]. He died at Nuremberg April the 6th 1528 (l), and was interred in the Church-yard of St. John's Church, where Bilibaldus Pirckheimer his good friend erected a very honourable sepulchral inscription to him. Vasari

(b) Bullart, Acad. des Sciences, tom. 2. pag. 385.

(i) See the Epitaph of Albert Durer, Melchior Adam, Vitæ Philos. German. pag. 70.

(k) Idem, ibid. pag. 66.

(l) Melch. Adam. in Vitis Philosph. Germanor. pag. 70. But according to Reusnerus in Diario, pag. 35. it was in 1527.

sequi, impari tamen conatu & successu, ausi fuerint, neque adhucdum erubescant, aliorum picturas camino propius admovere, fumosa quadam caligine, ut vetustatem eò melius mentiantur; obducere, atque addito Dureri consuetò signo non rarò simplicioribus pro genuino ipsius artificio malè vendere. i. e. "What you add, that it is "very remarkable and surprizing, that this famous "Painter of Nuremberg, (whom I here profess my "due regard to by the great Letter, which I make "use of,) in so barbarous and unseasonable an Age "should arrive to so great perfection in his art, no less "affects me likewise, while I likewise consider what I "heard not long ago of my dear Tutor, that he had "at home a Xantippe, who was a perpetual torment to "his divine mind. But as Calamity makes many great "men, so notwithstanding this the reputation of our "Durer is so high among foreigners, that many, especially of the Italians, have attempted, tho' with "unequal success, to pursue his excellent plans, and "are not yet ashamed to place the pictures of other "men in chimnies, in order that they may have the "air of antiquity, and by adding Durer's usual mark "sell them frequently for his genuine performances to "the bad judges." You see here our Durer exposed to the same fate with Socrates, to the continual persecution of his wife, which however did not hinder him from producing works, that are still the admiration of the Italians. The other fact is to be found in a Letter of Dr. John Valentin Andreas to the same Prince. De morioſiore ejus Conjuge, nihil mihi prius auditum: hoc verò accepi ab artificibus desiderari, quòd in effingenda Virgine Matre, cum puerulo Jesu, unam suam uxorem, quæ tamen minus elegantis & formæ & vultus fuerit, subinde expresserit, cùm cætera Symmetriæ humani corporis observantissimus fuerit. Ego tamen contrarium ipse possedi, & maximo dolore meo in Calvensi busto perdidi, faciem sc. Deiparæ, vivis coloribus, justâ humani vultus magnitudine depictam, quâ elegantius, concinnius & formosius excogitari nihil potuit, & quam magno ære meo redemptam velim (16). i. e. "I "never heard any thing before of the perverseness of "his wife's temper; but I have been informed, that "Artists have complained, that in painting the Virgin Mary with the Child Jesus he frequently copied "his wife, who was far from being a beauty, tho' in "other respects he was very careful in observing the "Symmetry of the human body. But I had in my "possession the reverse of this, but lost it to my great "regret in the fire of Calva, viz. the face of the blessed Virgin in lively colours, as large as the life, "than which nothing could be imagined more elegant and beautiful; and which I would give a great "deal of money to recover." The Doctor does not refute what he had undertaken to refute; for tho' he had a very beautiful picture of the Virgin by Durer, it does not follow, but that several other pictures of that Saint might have the defects, which were complained of, and for which this reason was assigned, that Albert Durer had a fancy to draw his wife, who was far from a beauty.

(16) Ibid. pag. 311.

[F] It is said, that this great Painter died very poor.] Fiovaranti has inserted this in one of his books, and pretends that the prodigality of this Painter occasioned that misfortune. Our Doctor has confuted him in this manner (17). Sed & alia Viro egregio exprobrantur, quæ Noriberga constanter pernegat, ex quibus est, quod Fioravanti in memorabilibus refert, tam malæ frugis Oeconomum fuisse, ut tot operum confector, defunctus ex publico efferendus fuerit, cum mihi probatis documentis sit assensum, non contemnendam æris & supellectilis sortem post se reliquisse. Quod si ex publico ipsi funus decretum, id virtutis potius precium, quam infamiæ notam Sen. populusque Nuribergensis prudentiss. haud dubio voluit. i. e. "Other things are likewise "objected to this excellent man, which are constantly "denied by the City of Nuremberg; among the rest "is what Fioravanti relates, that Durer was so bad "an Oeconomist, that tho' he made so many works, "he was obliged to be buried at the public charge; "whereas I have seen authentic proofs, that he left "no small sum in money and effects. If he was "buried at the public expence, it was undoubtedly "intended by the prudent Senate and people of Nu-"remberg as a reward of his virtue, rather than a "mark of his shame."

(17) Ibid. Observe that he confesses above quotation (13), that Albert Durer was always poor, though he lived frugally.

[G] He never employed his art in obscene representations.] There were too many Painters who took this liberty at that time; but he never followed such bad examples. Cui autem obscurum est non paucos laudem & admirationem vulgi quæsivisse obscœnitate pingendi, dum quæ non nisi occultè fieri honestè nequeant, imò quæ ne occultè quidem facta, nefario scelere & probro vacent, tabulis expressa publicarunt: hos ne pudicos quisquam credet, quorum mens & dextera talia fugerit molita . . . (18). Hoc igitur loco optimo jure admirabimur Durerum sanctimoniæ & pudoris diligentissimum custodem . . . . . (19). Nulla spurcities, nullum dedecus, in ipsius operibus extat, refugientibus scilicet talia omnia castissimi animi cogitationibus. i. e. "Who does not know, that not a few "hunted after the praise and admiration of the vulgar "by painting obscenely, exhibiting publickly in their "pictures not only those actions, which cannot be decently done except in private, but also those which "when done secretly are enormously scandalous. Can "such persons be thought chaste, whose head and "hand are employed in such works? . . . . Upon this "occasion therefore we may justly admire Durer, "who was always an inviolable observer of decency "and modesty. . . . No kind of obscenity appears in "his performances, his chaste mind being wholly averse to such things."

(18) Melch. Adam. in Vitis Philosoph. Germ. pag. 67.

(19) Idem, ibid. pag. 69.

[H] His Treatise on the rules of painting was printed: but as it was difficult for him to please himself, he did not live to see the edition of that work finished.] Let us continue to cite Joachim Camerarius; for it is from him that Melchior Adamus borrows all that he relates concerning Albert Durer. Priusquam absolvere omnia & correcta edere, ut cupierat, posset, morte est ereptus, placida illa quidem & optabili, sed profecto multorum judicio præmatura. Erat autem si quid omnium in illo viro quod vitii simile videretur, unica infinita diligentia & in se quoque inquisitrix sæpe parum æqua. Hinc igitur mors ab incepta editione operis sustulit, quam tamen consummarunt amici ex illius præscriptione (20). i. e. "Before he could compleat the whole, and correct it "in such a manner as he desired, he was cut off. His "death indeed was calm and to be wished for; but in "the opinion of many too early. If any thing in him "had the appearance of a fault, it was his excessive "application and too great rigour with regard to his "own performances. Hence it was that he died be-"fore the Edition of his work was compleated; tho' "his friends afterwards finished it suitably to his di-"rections." The Edition was published after his death. Observe that Durer wanted learning, and that he wrote his book in High-Dutch; and what we have of his in Latin is a translation done by others. The treatise abovementioned was translated into Latin by Joachim Camerarius, and is intitled, De Symmetria Partium in rectis formis humanorum corporum. It was printed at Nuremberg

(20) Melch. Adam. in Vitis Philosoph. German. pag. 70. Ex Præfat. Joach. Camerarii, in Librum de Symmetria Partium.

Vaſari calls him DURO. Mr. Felibien, who calls him Durer in the place where he ſpeaks of him at large, calls him Dure in other places (m).

(m) Entretien 2. pag. 224. See alſo pag. 383, & ſeq.

Nuremberg in folio in 1532, and at Paris in 1557 (21). An Italian verſion was publiſhed at Venice in 1591. The other works of Durer are Inſtitutiones Geometricæ, printed at Paris by Wechel 1532 (22): De Urbibus, arcibus, caſtelliſque condendis & muniendis, printed at Paris by the ſame in 1531 (23); De Varietate figurarum, & flexuris partium, ac geſtibus imaginum, Nuremburg 1534 (24). A Diſcourſe of his concerning the ſymmetry of the parts of an horſe, was ſtolen from him. He knew well enough who had ſtolen it; but he choſe rather to bear the loſs and trouble ſecretly, than to deviate from his uſual moderation and mildneſs, as he muſt have done, if he had proſecuted thoſe thieves (25).

(21) Epit. Bibliotb. Geſner. pag. 19.
(22) Geſner. in Biblioth. folio 17 verſo.
(23) Idem, ibid.
(24) Epit. Bibliotb. Geſneri, pag. 19.
(25) Melch. Adam. in Vitis Philoſ. Germ. cap. 70.

DURY (JOHN) in Latin Duræus, a Proteſtant Divine, a Scot by Nation, in the 17th Century, laboured with great zeal for the reunion of the Lutherans and Calviniſts. The ſtrong inclination which he had for this great work, and the hopes of ſucceſs in it, induced him to let his ſuperiors know, that he could employ his talents to better advantage by travelling through the world, than if he was confined to the care of one flock. They agreed to his propoſals, and permitted him to go from place to place, to negotiate an accommodation between the Proteſtant Churches. He obtained likewiſe the approbation and recommendation of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury (a). I have obſerved in another place (b) that he was aſſiſted by the Biſhop of Kilmore; and alſo by Dr. Joſeph Hall Biſhop of Exeter, as he acknowledges in the Preface to his Prodromus. He began by publiſhing his plan of a reunion [A], and he appeared at a famous Aſſembly of the Evangelics in Germany at Francfort in 1634 (c). The Churches of Tranſylvania ſent to him their advice and counſel the ſame year (d). He negotiated afterwards with the Divines of Sweden and Denmark; he turned himſelf every way, he conſulted the Univerſities, he communicated their anſwers, and was not deterred by the unſucceſsfulneſs of the pains, which he had taken, even in the year 1661 [B]. But at laſt he was diſcouraged in 1674; and he had no longer any hopes of ſerving the Church by the methods which he had till then taken; he raiſed new batteries; he had recourſe to another expedient, which was to labour on a new Explication of the Apocalypſe [C], as a ſure method of reuniting

(a) See the Prodromus Tractatuum Irenicorum Joh. Duræi, pag. 122.
(b) See the Article BEDELL, Remark [D].
(c) Prodromus Tract. Irenicor. pag. 111.
(d) Ibid. pag. 50, & ſeq.

[A] He began by publiſhing his Plan of Re-union.] I find in the Catalogue or the Library of Oxford, his Aliquot Theologorum Galliæ & trium Eccleſiæ Anglicanæ Epiſcoporum (ſc. Davenantii, Mortoni, & Halli) Sententia de pacis rationibus inter Evangelicos uſurpandis, printed in 1634. I omit the Treatiſes which followed that, as his Hypomnemata de ſtudio pacis Eccleſiaſticæ, à Amſterdam, 1636. Informatio de eis quæ in ſtudio Eccleſiaſticæ concordiæ inter Evangelicos proſequendo, agitare inſtituit Duræus erga Eccleſiarum Danicarum Theologos.

[B] He was not deterred by the unſucceſsfulneſs of the pains, which he had taken, even in the year 1661.] See the book which he publiſhed that year at Amſterdam, and intlted, Johannis Duræi Irenicorum Tractatuum Prodromus, in quo præliminares continentur Tractatus de I. Pacis Eccleſiaſticæ remoris è medio tollendis. II. Concordiæ Evangelicæ fundamentis ſufficienter jactis. III. Reconciliationis Religioſæ procurandæ argumentis & mediis. IV. Methodo inveſtigatoria ad controverſias omnes, ſine contradicendi ſtudio & præjudicio, pacifice decidendas. Cui præmittuntur collectorum inter Proteſtantes conſiliorum pacificorum harmoniæ, propediem Deo permittente adornandæ & in lucem edendæ. The Preface of the book is dated at Amſterdam October 1ſt 1661. He there gives an account of the books which he had promiſed the public, and propoſes the expedients which he thinks moſt capable of rendring his deſign ſucceſsful. He aſſerts that the firſt Article which was agreed upon in this preliminaries of this future peace, is, that the affair ſhould not be managed by a ſcholaſtical diſputation. It was of great importance to agree upon this; for the manner of diſputing could not but tend to foment the obſtinacy of parties, and to lead them ſtill farther from the concluſion. Dury at that time appeared as much poſſeſſed as ever with hopes of ſucceeding; and going for Germany deſired of the Divines of Utrecht an authentic teſtimony of their good intentions, after having informed them of the ſtate in which he had left the affair with the King of Great Britain and the Elector of Brandenbourg; and of what had paſſed at the Court of Heſſe, and the meaſures which were actually taken at Geneva, Heidelberg and Mets. He deſired to have this teſtimonial of the Divines of Utrecht, in order to ſhew it to the Germans. He obtained it, and publiſhed it at the end of his Prodromus.

[C] He had recourſe to another expedient, which was to labour on a new explication of the Apocalypſe.] He publiſhed at Francfort a little Treatiſe in French in 1674, intitled, Of underſtanding the Apocalypſe by itſelf; as all the Holy Scripture ought reaſonably to be underſtood. He declares in the Epiſtle Dedicatory (1), that he has nothing to reproach himſelf with, though he abandons the pacific negotiation, which had been carried on for many years with the Lutheran Miniſters. He plainly intimates, that he abandoned it only out of neceſſity, that is, becauſe they would no longer hear him, or have any correſpondence with him upon this ſubject, Having finiſhed, ſays he (2), with regard to all the perſons concerned, the labour which could be expected of me, as a Sollicitor of the Evangelical Counſels, I have nothing more to do with the particular heads on that ſide, ſince they ſeem to have taken a reſolution to be ſilent with reſpect to me, though they continue ſtill to foment the uſual animoſity among the vulgar.... But ſince I now find myſelf obliged to put an end to theſe proceedings, becauſe they will no longer have any correſpondence with me concerning the propoſitions, which have been regularly offered to them all, and are abſolutely unexceptionable: Since, I ſay, for theſe reaſons I am obliged to deſiſt from my purſuit (for I ought not to urge any thing by importunity; what is not done voluntarily, and from conſcience, is not of God;) I have taken a reſolution more general (3). It will be proper to ſee his confeſſion of the unſucceſsfulneſs of his travels and labours. "Being now come to this point, I "thought fit to conſider the advantage which the pub-"lic or myſelf have received after ſo much labour. "When I conſider the public therefore, I ſee, that God "does not permit the fruit of this ſeed to grow up "or appear before the time of harveſt be come. And "when I reflect on myſelf, the chief fruit I have "reaped by my labour both within and without is "this, that without I ſee the miſery of Chriſtians, "which is much greater than that of the Pagans "and other nations. I ſee the cauſe of this miſery; "I ſee the want of a remedy, and I ſee the cauſe of "the want. This is the ſum of the advantage, "which I have made by my labour without. And "within I have gained nothing but the comfortable "teſtimony of my own conſcience (4)." Do not imagine, that after this confeſſion he is going to take a reſolution of ſitting down at reſt; for on the contrary he engages in a much greater attempt. He could not ſucceed in reconciling the Reformed and the Lutherans, and yet he undertakes to reunite all the ſects of Chriſtians.

(1) The book is dedicated to the Princeſs of Heſſe.
(2) Dury, Epiſtle Dedicatory, pag. 3, 4.
(3) Ibid. pag. 7, 8.
(4) Ibid. pag. 4, 5.

reuniting all Christians. He enjoyed then a quiet retreat in the country of Hesse [D]. I cannot tell what year he died. Some have confounded him with the Jesuit JOHN DURÆUS [E]. It was thought that the Lutherans would look upon him with a less favourable eye, when they found the Episcopal Party begun to decline in England [F]. We shall see an account of his journey to Mets, and some other particulars in the Article of FERRI.

The Letter which he wrote to Peter du Moulin concerning the state of the Churches of England, Scotland, and Ireland under Cromwell, was printed with some other pieces at London in 1658 in 12mo by the care of Lewis du Moulin. It is very curious, and shews that he was no enemy to the Independents.

(5) Idem, Preface, pag. 16.

stians. My new attempt, says he (5), is not at all different from the former with respect to the substance of the Evangelical Work, but only with regard to the extent of the application of my labour, and the method of insinuating into the consciences of those, to whom I address myself; for I would no longer confine my application to the Protestants alone, but my view is to comprehend all Christians divided into factions contrary to the end of the heavenly calling, which is proposed in the Gospel, and attested in the Holy Scripture. But was the method which he took, capable of giving him hopes of great success? Nothing less; and yet he promises wonders by it (6). We shall speak of this in another place (7).

(6) Quidlibet impotens Sperare. Horat. Od. 37. lib. 1.

(7) In Remark [F] of the Article FERRI.

[D] He enjoyed a quiet retreat in the country of Hesse.] Hedwige Sophia, Princess of Hesse, who had the Regency of the country, had assigned to Dury a very commodious quarter, with a table well furnished, and had given him free postage for his Letters. He returns her thanks for this in the Epistle Dedicatory to the Book abovementioned.

[E] Some have confounded him with the Jesuit JOHN DURÆUS.] This Jesuit was a Scotsman, and wrote a Book against Dr. Whitaker's Answer to Campian's Ten Reasons. This Book was printed at Paris in 1581, and at Ingolstad in 1585 (8). The Catalogue of the Library at Oxford ascribes it to Dury the Pacificator. Monsr. Baillet thought, that Duræus, the antagonist of Dr. Whitaker, was a Protestant (9).

(8) Alegambe, Biblioth. Soc. Jesu, pag. 237.

(9) Baillet, Jugemens des Savans, tom. 3. pag. 136.

[F] It is thought that the Lutherans would look on him with a less favourable eye, when they found that the Episcopal Party declined in England.] This is what Vossius wrote to Grotius in January 1641. Joannes Duræus jam quasi hebdomas est, quod è Germania huc venit, à suis in Britanniam revocatus. Quid promoverit, ex literis ejus intelliges, quas ad te ut mitterem jussit. Plurimum autem metuo, ne in irritum cadant, quæcumque hactenus inter Lutheranos egit. Jam decennio, antequam ille hanc provinciam susciperet, nihil æquè objectabant Lutherani, quam pacificatores omnes agere hanc causam malo dolo. . . Quamquam vero adventu D. Duræi, non omnino suam opinionem mutârant Lutherani: plerique tamen aliquanto meliorem de eo sententiam conceperunt, eo quod missus foret à Clero Anglicano (10). i. e. "It is about a week since John Dury came hither out of Germany, being recalled into England by his friends. What success he has had, you will learn from his letters, which he desired me to send you. But I am greatly apprehensive, lest what he has hitherto done among the Lutherans should prove abortive. Ten years ago, before he undertook this Province, the principal objection of the Lutherans was, that all the pacificators acted upon sinister views. . . . . But though upon Mr. Dury's coming among them, they did not absolutely alter their mind, yet most of them conceived a more favourable opinion of him, because he was sent by the Clergy of England." The rest of the passage is in the margin (11).

(10 Vossius, Epist. 401. pag. m. 367. See also Epist. 405.

(11) Sed quid animi nunc, ad iuendum cum Ecclesiis Gallicis, & Belgicis, fore putabimus, ubi cognorint, hoc agi in Britanniæ, ut accusatis, damnatis, ejectis omnibus, quos non longè à se abire, & omnino modestiæ, & pacis amantiores credebant, triumphent soli, quos ipsi Calvinianos, in Anglia autem Puritanos nuncupant? Idem, ibid. i. e. "But what disposition shall we think they will now be in, to unite with the Churches of France and the Low-Countries, when they know, that the whole design in England is, to accuse, condemn, and eject all those, whom they thought to be very near their own sentiments, and most inclined to moderation and peace, and to advance those only, whom they stile Calvinists, and who are called Puritans in England?"

EBED-JESU.

E.

(a) This shews that he lived in the 17th Century.

(b) Mr. de Breves, Ambaſſador at the Port, had brought him to France in the year 1614. Gaſſend. in Vita Peireskij, lib. 3. pag. m. 281.

EBED-JESU. See HEBEDJESU.

ECCHELLENSIS (ABRAHAM) a learned Maronite whom the Preſident le Jai employed in the Edition of his Polyglott Bible (a). Gabriel Sionita (b), who was his Countryman, had drawn him to Paris, in order to make him his fellow labourer in publiſhing that Bible [A]. They fell out in ſuch a manner, that their quarrel made a ſcandalous noiſe: Gabriel Sionita complained to the Parliament, and cruelly defamed his Aſſociate (c). Monſieur Claude has made uſe of this defamation to diſcredit the teſtimony of Ecchellenſis alledged by Mr. Arnauld [B]. Thoſe who anſwered Mr. Claude did not repair the honour of the defamed Maronite [C]. The Congregation

(c) See the Remark [A], Citation (2).

[A] Gabriel Sionita had drawn him to Paris, in order to make him his fellow Labourer in publiſhing the Polyglott Bible of Mr. le Jai.] This does not agree with what is ſaid in the Supplement of Moreri: I cannot help it; I have good authority for what I advance, ſince I only follow Father Simon; and I have the greater right to depend on his teſtimony, as he has deſigned it to ſave the honour of our Ecchellenſis in an affair which made a great deal of noiſe. All the world knows that the diſpute between Monſr. Arnauld and Monſr. Claude paſſed for a matter of very great conſequence. Father Simon took part in it to oppoſe Monſr. Claude with relation to the opinion of the Greeks; it was neceſſary for his purpoſe that Ecchellenſis ſhould be an honeſt man, and Gabriel Sionita a Calumniator. Now this is one of his proofs as to the laſt fact. Gabriel invited Ecchellenſis to Paris, and owned him for his brother: he did not therefore ſuppoſe him to be the Author of all thoſe rogueries of which he afterwards accuſed him (1). Every body ſees that Father Simon would not have alledged an uncertain fact, when he intended to draw ſo great an advantage againſt Mr. Claude from what he returned him in anſwer; could he imagine Mr. Claude would be ſatisfied with a doubtful fact? I have reaſon, therefore, to believe that what he advances is preferable to theſe words of the Continuator of Moreri: Mr. le Jay, at whoſe expence the Great Bible was printing, having fallen out with Gabriel Sionita the Maronite, ſent for Abraham Ecchellenſis from Rome. This is ſufficient to give us to underſtand that theſe two Maronites were not fellow-labourers in the Edition of Mr. le Jai's Polyglott; and yet Father Simon aſſerts the direct contrary. Gabriel Sionita adverſus Abrahamum Ecchellenſem ſupremæ curiæ Pariſienſi libellum quendam ſupplicem obtulerat in quo graviſſimè de Abrahamo, qui ei SOCIUS in editione Bibliorum Pariſienſium adjunctus fuerat, conqueritur (2). i. e. "Gabriel Sionita had preſented to the Parliament of Paris a Petition againſt "Abraham Ecchellenſis, wherein he grievouſly complains of Abraham, who had been ASSOCIATED "with him in the Edition of the Paris Polyglott." Mr. Nicolle aſſerts it likewiſe, as we ſhall ſee below.

(1) Si impoſtor erat Abraham, cur Gabriel ante quam lis inter eos mota fuiſſet eum fratris nomine compellavit? Si hæc vera ſunt quæ de Abrahamo Gabriel affirmavit, hunc impoſtorem potius eſſe exiſtimaverim: cum ille ipſius ROGATU ET ACCERSITU Pariſiis venerit. Richardus Simon, in Fide Eccleſiæ Orient. pag. 198.

(2) Idem, ibid.

[B] Mr. Claude has made uſe of this defamation to diſcredit the teſtimony of Ecchellenſis, alledged by Mr. Arnauld.] What Mr. Arnauld had alledged concerning the faith of the Melchites was taken from the Notes of our Ecchellenſis on the Catalogue of Chaldee Books made by Hebedjeſu. Here is the anſwer which was returned him. "The teſtimony of Abraham Ecchellenſis deſerves no credit, and I appeal to Gabriel Sionita his countryman, who has deſcribed him "as an ignorant troubleſome fellow, a raſcal, a liar, "an impoſtor, and a rogue. Theſe two men had "both ſtudied in the ſeminary of the Maronites at "Rome, and they were both abſolutely attached to "the intereſts of the Church of Rome; but having "quarrelled on account of an Edition of the Bible "in Syriac, Gabriel thought himſelf obliged to tell "him his own, and to expoſe his faults to the public. To this end he addreſſed a Piece to him which "he calls Commonitorium Apologeticum, wherein he repreſents him in the manner I have mentioned. He "reproaches him with having ſet the whole Seminary "of Rome at variance, with having betrayed the "Patriarch of the Maronites, with having deceived "Prince Fachraddin, with having tricked the Duke "of Florence, with having been baniſhed his native "country, with having been impriſoned for his crimes "at Florence, and at laſt, he threatens him, for his utter "confuſion, to print the Letters he has received from "Mount Libanus, Rome, and Florence, concerning his "Life. This is enough, in my opinion, to juſtify my "calling in queſtion the ſincerity of ſuch a man (3)."

(3) Claude, Réponſe à la Perpetuité de la Foi defendue, liv. 2. pag. m. 30. of the 2d volume in 8vo.

[C] Thoſe who anſwered Mr. Claude did not repair the honour of the defamed Maronite.] Father Simon agrees that the occaſion of the quarrel between Sionita and Ecchellenſis was their having too eager a deſign on Mr. le Jai's purſe: Ita fit ut dum quiſque nummis D. le Jay, cujus ſumptibus Polyglotta illa Biblia in vulgus edita ſunt, inhiat, illi pacem diu tenere non potuerint. This is no extraordinary preparative for a man's juſtification. One cut-purſe may well draw another into a place where he obſerves the harveſt is very great; but afterwards he may wiſh to be alone, if he finds himſelf incommoded by the ſharing of the plunder. Wherefore the proof I have mentioned in the preceding Remark is not a very ſtrong one; for ſince Father Simon, owns theſe two Maronites were Sharpers, nothing hinders but that Sionita might invite the other to Paris, tho' he knew him to be a rogue. So that Father Simon inſtead of juſtifying Ecchellenſis, only blackens his companion. The good Teſtimony which Father Morin bore Ecchellenſis (4) is of no ſervice againſt Mr. Claude; for Father Morin does not warrant the time Sionita had ſpoken of: he contents himſelf with ſaying that Ecchellenſis had appeared honeſt and very laborious during his ſtay at Paris; but the Accuſer does not charge his Aſſociate's rogueries to have been committed in that time. Let us ſee whether another of Mr. Claude's Antagoniſts has defended the cauſe of the accuſed any better.

(4) Multa ſilentio præterire viſum eſt, qua in commendationem Abrahami proferri poſſent, atque imprimis Epiſtolam, qua doctiſſimus Joannes Morinus ampliſſimum Cardinalem Franciſcum Barberinum, de illius probitate, vigiliis aſſiduis, & labore indefeſſo quandiu Pariſiis commoratus eſt, certiorem facit. Richardus Simon, in Fide Eccleſiæ Orient. pag. 198.

Here are his Words: "Nor is there more good "ſenſe in the contempt with which Mr. Claude treats "the Paſſages cited by Ekellenſis, under pretence that "Gabriel Sionita, whoſe aſſociate he was in correcting "the Polyglott Bible printed at Paris, having fallen "out with him, charged him with ſeveral crimes "which have no relation to the falſification of thoſe "Paſſages. It does not much become Mr. Claude to "make himſelf judge of the difference between the "two Maronites, and yet leſs to declare himſelf a "party againſt Ekellenſis on the bare teſtimony of "his adverſary. But, however it be, all thoſe perſonal reproaches give him no manner of right to "reject the Paſſages which are cited in that Author's "Books, becauſe they do not make it credible that "quoting, as he does, the Books from whence he has "taken them, which are moſt of them in the Vatican Library, he had the impudence to invent them "according to his own fancy (5)." Nothing can be more vague than ſuch a juſtification; and ſince the Author does not refer the Reader to the Anſwers of Ecchellenſis, but contents himſelf with ſaying that we ſhould remain neuter in this quarrel, it is very probable that Maronite either anſwered nothing, or anſwered very ill. What the Janſeniſt Writer depends on as his laſt refuge, is better than all the reſt; for after all, there are circumſtances wherein we may believe a knave would not dare to be guilty of forgery.

(5) Réponſe générale au nouveau Livre de Mr. Claude, lib. 1. chap. 13. pag. 214. This Anſwer is attributed to Mr. Nicolle.

tion de propaganda fide associated him, about the year 1636, with those whom they employed in making an Arabic Translation of the Scripture (d). They recalled him from France, and he laboured in that Translation at Rome in the year 1652. He published something in the same City, and died there in the month of July 1664 (e). Consult the Supplement of Moreri (f) where you will find a very curious Article concerning this person.

(d) The Abbot Nazari, in his Giornale de Letterati of the 29th of Jan. 1672.

(e) Nazari, ibid.

(f) Under Abraham Ecchellensis.

While he was Professor of the Oriental Languages at Rome, he was pitched upon by the Great Duke Ferdinand II to translate from Arabic into Latin the 5th, 6th, and 7th Books of Apollonius's Conics. He was assisted in this Translation by John Alphonso Borelli [D], a famous Mathematician, who added Commentaries to it. The whole was printed at Florence with Archimedes's Book de assumptis (g), in the year 1661, in folio. The Preface contains some Facts [E], which would be the best part of this Article, if I could display them with their principal circumstances. I shall speak of the quarrel which arose between Mr. de Flavigny and Abraham Ecchellensis, and we shall there see a very sensible example of the disorder which faults of the press may occasion, and of the insupportable vexation they give an Author [F].

(g) Translated likewise from Arabic into Latin by Ecchellensis.

☞ ECHARD

[D] He was assisted in the Translation . . . . of Apollonius by John Alfonso Borelli.] This was very necessary; for he who was to translate did not understand the Mathematics (6), and therefore, how skilful soever he might be in the Arabic tongue, he must have stumbled at every step. On the other hand, Borelli was perfectly ignorant of that tongue (7), but he understood the subject of the Manuscript, and by means of the Geometrical figures guessed the true sense of Apollonius, if the Translator did but explain a few words to him ever so slightly. Porro quod hac in re magis mirandum est, it is the testimony which Ecchellensis bears to Borelli's great genius, nec silentio prætereundum, ea erat Viro illi doctissimo singularis ingenii perspicacitas, ut sæpe in abstrusis quibusdam locis, non ex integris, inquam, præmissis, sed ex unica dictione totam illationem inde colligeret, non sensu, sed totidem pene verbis, ac si Arabica legeret verba, & linguæ veteranus esset professor (8). i. e. "But the most wonderful circumstance of this affair, and what must not be passed over in silence, is, that the uncommon genius and penetration of that great man was such, that frequently, in certain abstruse passages, he collected the intire conclusion, not from the whole premisses, but from a single word, and not in sense only, but almost in so many terms, as if he read the Arabic words, and had been an old professor of the language."

(6) Versabatur (difficultas) circa disciplinæ vocabulorum intelligentiam & notionum quarum ignari eramus, & penitus jejuni. Ecchellensis, Præf. ad Apollon. Conica.

(7) Licet Arabici idiomatis sim prorsus ignarus. Jo. Alfonsus Borellus, Præf. ad Apollon.

(8) Ecchell. Præf. ad Apollon. Conica.

[E] His Preface . . . . to Apollonius's Conics contains some facts.] He acquaints us that he received a thousand favours from the Great Duke Ferdinand II, not only when he resided at his Court in full prosperity, with the character of the Amir Fachraddin's Deputy, but also after the ruin of his affairs. Let us see how he expresses himself: Memini profecto, nec ex animo meo excidet, imo clavo fixum trabali manet, quanta in me contulit Magnus Ferdinandus Secundus ornamenta, quanta in me usus est liberalitate, & beneficentia, non tantùm dum fortuna mihi arridebat, non solùm dum res succedebat prosperè, non modo dum ad illum ab Amiro Fachraddino missus singulari felicitate fruebar, sed etiam in naufragio, & jactura illa barbarica, in Carrellina conjuratione & proditione, in adversissima fortuna (9).

(9) Idem, ibid.

[F] Here is an example . . . . of the disorder which faults of the press may occasion, and of the . . . . vexation they give an Author.] "It is well known that "M. de Flavigny wrote two Letters against this magnificent Edition of the Bible in seven languages published at the expence of M. le Jay. A learned "Maronite, the King's Professor of the Syriac and "Arabic languages, named Abraham Ecchellensis, "who had come from Rome to Paris, had some "share in that Work. It was he who had given the "Arabic and Syriac Text of the Book of Ruth, with "the Latin version. Mr. de Flavigny wrote in the "year 1647 his third Letter against Ecchellensis and "his Book of Ruth, pretending it was full of faults. "In the middle of the second page of the first sheet "he placed these passages by themselves, taken from "the seventh Chapter of S. Matthew: Vers. 3. Quid "vides festucam in oculo fratris tui, & trabem in oculo "tuo non vides? Vers. 5. Ejice primùm trabem de "oculo tuo, & tunc videbis ejicere festucam de oculo "fratris tui. He designed by these words to give "Ecchellensis to understand that, having left a great "many faults in the Book of Ruth, it was very improper for him to reproach his brother Maronite "Gabriel Sionita, the King's Professor as well as himself, with having left some in the Arabic and Syriac "Books which he had caused to be printed in M. le "Jay's Bible. The Maronite, finding himself obliged "to answer, began by accusing the Doctor of an "enormous crime with regard to the abovequoted "passage; of having designed, by an impiety without example, to correct the Sacred Text of the Gospel, and to strike out a decent word in order to "make room for another which was not so. He exaggerates this pretended crime in a sharp and outragious style. He expresses himself thus in his first "Letter, which he intitles Epistola Apologetica prima, "printed in 8vo. in the year 1647, page 11: Ad "primum quod attinet, tua Judaïca modestia ac pietas, "humanissime Flavignane, summoperè elucescit, ut alia "cætera loca omittam, ex iis verbis quæ in me retulisti "ex cap 7. divi Matthæi v. 3. & v. 5. quomodo autem Sacro-sancti Evangelii verba depravasti, & illusisti in hoc loco, ac sacra immiscuisti profanis, ne expecter à me ut illa secundùm sacrilegam emendationem "tuam hic referam, solùm enim meminisse animus horret, "luctuque refugit. Quamobrem non in meis, sed in tuis "scriptis id legatur. ô acerrimum Hebraïcæ veritatis "propugnatorem! Hebraïcus Textus, ubi verbum aliquod "inhonestum occurrit, honestis velat verbis: Tu verò "Hebraïcæ Linguæ Professor, illiusque Textus importunè "ad stomachum usque defensor ac rabula, Sacro-sancti "Evangelii Sacrosancta verba impietate inauditâ turpas, "fœdas, & spurcè illis abuteris. Ex quo liquidò apparet, quos mirabiles progressus in pietate & Lectione "sacrarum Scripturarum, quas crepas semper, feceris. "Ex verbis tuis, Flavignane, quisnam sis optimè cognoscimus, quia qualis homo est talis etiam ejus erit oratio, orationi autem facta simillima, factis vita, ut "ex Socrate refert Cicero lib. 5. Quæst. Tuscul &c. i. e. "As to the first point, your Judaical modesty and piety, "most humane Sir, shine forth in the strongest manner, "to omit other passages, from those words which you have "quoted against me out of the seventh Chapter of Saint "Matthew, Verses the 3d and 5th: but in what manner you have corrupted the words of the Holy "Evangelist, and played on this passage, by mixing profane things with sacred, expect not that "I should set forth according to your sacrilegious emendation; for my soul shrinks for horror and affliction "at the bare remembrance of it. Wherefore let it be "read in your writings, and not in mine. O the zealous champion of the Hebrew Text! which, when any "indecent word occurs, throws a veil of modesty over it; "but you, a Professor of the Hebrew language, and whose "importunate and clamorous defence of that Text raises "the indignation of every one, defile the sacred words of "the Gospel with unheard of impiety, and filthily abuse "it. From whence it plainly appears what admirable "progress you have made in piety and reading of the "holy Scriptures, which you are continually bragging of. "What a sort of a man you are, we best know from "your own words: because as the man is such also will "be his speech; his actions must be agreeable to his "words, and his life to his actions, as Cicero tells us "from Socrates; and so on for six whole pages. These "are high words, and contain a hainous accusation.

(11) 171.

(12) 172.

(13)

"Here

ECHARD (JOHN), an Engliſh Divine of great learning and wit in the ſeventeenth Century, was born of a good family in the County of Suffolk; and having been inſtructed in grammar-learning was ſent to Katherine-Hall in the Univerſity of Cambridge, where he took the Degree of Bachelor of Arts in 1656, and of Maſter of Arts in 1660 (a). In 1670 he publiſhed, without his name, a book intitled, The Grounds and Occaſions of the contempt of the Clergy and Religion enquired into. In a Letter to R. L. [A]. London 1670 in 12mo. This was ſoon after attacked by an anonymous Writer in a Tract intitled, An Anſwer to a Letter of Enquiry into the Grounds and Occaſions of the contempt of the Clergy [B]. London 1671 in 12mo; and by Mr. Barnabas

(a) From the Univerſity Regiſter.

" Here is a great deal of noiſe made, and a great ma" ny abuſes caſt on a reverend Doctor. He is accuſed
" of an act of impiety, and charged with ſacrilege;
" and a ſuſpicion is raiſed againſt his morals. Who " would believe that ſuch bitter reproaches are ground-
" ed merely on a fault of the preſs (10)?" Mr. Chevillier, who furniſhes me with this long paſſage, explains to us wherein this fault conſiſted, and how it had been committed by the Printer after Mr. Flavigni had reviſed the laſt proof-ſheet. The miſchief happened by the firſt letter of the word oculo accidentally ſlipping out of the form, upon the Printer's touching a line which was ill ſet. Mr. de Flavigni, being informed what Abraham Ecchellenſis reproached him with, could not find the fault in his printed copy: his friend M. d'Auvergne, Regius Profeſſor of Arabic, was obliged to point it out to him, before he could diſcover it. He immediately wrote his fourth Letter . . . he publickly made oath of his innocence in terms of Scripture . . . (11): he ſaid a raging fever muſt have turned the Printer's brain, and that he muſt have been mad, when he printed the word with that fault (12). His anger was not perfectly appeaſed (13) thirty years after the printing of this Letter.

(10) Chevillier, Origine de l'Imprimerie de Paris, Part 2. chap. 5. pag. 169, &c.

(11) Ibid. pag. 171.

(12) Ibid. pag. 172.

(13) Ibid.

[A] His Grounds and Occaſions of the Contempt of the Clergy enquired into.] This Tract is ſigned T. B. and dated Auguſt 8th 1670. In the Preface he obſerves, that many perhaps upon the very firſt ſight of the title, will imagine, that the Author does either want the great tithes, lying under the preſſure of ſome pitiful vicarage; or that he is much out of humour, and diſſatisfied with the preſent condition of affairs; or laſtly, that he writes to no purpoſe at all, there having been abundance of unprofitable adviſers in this kind. With regard to theſe particulars, he tells us, that as to his being under ſome low Church-diſpenſation, he wrote not out of a pinching neceſſity, or out of any riſing deſign. " You may pleaſe to believe, ſays he, that although I " have a moſt ſolemn reverence for the Clergy in gene" ral, and eſpecially for that of England; yet for " my own part, I muſt confeſs to you, I am not of " that holy employment; and have as little thoughts
" of being Dean or Biſhop, as they that think ſo,
" have hopes of being all Lord Keepers. Nor leſs
" miſtaken will they be, that ſhall judge me in " the leaſt diſcontented, or any ways diſpoſed to " diſturb the peace of the preſent ſettled Church. For
" in good truth, I have neither loſt Kings nor Biſhops
" lands, that ſhould incline me to a ſurly and quar-
" relſome complaining; as many be, who would have " been glad enough to ſee his Majeſty reſtored, and " would have endured Biſhops daintily well, had " they loſt no money by their coming in. I am not,
" I'll aſſure you, any of thoſe occaſional Writers,
" that miſſing preferment in the Univerſity, can pre-
" ſently write you their new ways of education; or " being a little tormented with an ill choſen wife, ſet
" forth the doctrine of Divorce to be truly evangeli-
" cal (1). The cauſe of theſe few ſheets was honeſt
" and innocent, and as free from all paſſion, as any
" deſign." As for the laſt objection, that this Book is altogether needleſs, there having been an infinite number of Church and Clergy menders, that have made many tedious and unſucceſsful offers; he confeſſes, that it would be unreaſonable for him to expect a better reward: only thus much he thinks may with modeſty be ſaid, that he cannot at preſent call to mind any thing that is propounded, but what is very hopeful, and eaſily accompliſhed. For indeed, continues he, ſhould I go about to tell you, that a child can never prove a profitable inſtructor of the people, unleſs born when the Sun is in Aries; or brought up in a ſchool, that ſtands full ſouth; that he can never be able to govern a Pariſh, unleſs he can ride a great horſe: or that he can never go through the great work of the Miniſtry, unleſs, for three hundred years backward, it can be proved that none of his family ever had a cough, ague, or grey hair; then I ſhould very patiently endure to be reckoned amongſt the vaineſt, that ever made the attempt. But believe me, reader, I am not, as you will eaſily ſee, any contriver of an incorruptible and pure chryſtalline Church; or any expecter of a reign of nothing but Saints and Worthies; but only an hearty and honeſt wiſher, that the beſt of our Clergy might for ever continue as they are, rich, and learned; and that the reſt might be very uſeful, and well eſteemed of in their profeſſion.

(1) This is levelled at Milton, who publiſhed at London 1645 in 4to. The doctrine and diſcipline of divorce.

[B] An Anſwer to a Letter of Enquiry into the grounds and occaſions of the contempt of the Clergy.] It is ſigned W. S. and dated January 10th 1670. The Author of this Anſwer in his Preface obſerves, that the ſerviceableneſs of the Clergy does very much depend upon the credit and eſteem, that they can have in the world; but that the Enquiry would probably do them this unkindneſs, to make them more obnoxious and contemptible than yet they are. The ſtyle and manner of it, ſays he, is enough to provoke willing readers to make us their table-talk, not in order to our amendment, but to our farther diſgrace. In the Anſwer itſelf he enquires, I. Whether Mr. Echard has ſufficiently reckoned up the grounds and occaſions of that contempt, under which the Clergy lay? II. Whether there be ſo much ignorance among the Clergy, as Mr. Echard ſuppoſes? III. Whether that ignorance, which there is amongſt them, proceeds from all thoſe things, which Mr. Echard aſſigns as the cauſes of it? IV. Whether all thoſe be faults, which he expoſes them for? Or if they be faults, whether they be guilty of all, which he reckons? V. If that be the caſe, whether he has taken a likely courſe to deliver them from that contempt? Under the ſecond head the Author obſerves (2), that it is manifeſt, that the Engliſh Clergy were then much improved in learning ſince the beginning of Queen Elizabeth's reign; when Oxford itſelf was ſo ill provided with men fit to preach, that the High-Sheriff of the County (3), being as the times then were a learned man, came up into St. Mary's pulpit, and in charity to thoſe, who wanted good preaching, gave them a Sermon, whereof this was the beginning; Arriving at the Mount of St. Maries, in the ſtony ſtage where I now ſtand, I have brought you ſome fine biſkets, baked in the oven of charity, and carefully conſerved for the chickens of the Church, the ſparrows of the ſpirit, and the ſweet ſwallows of ſalvation. He remarks likewiſe (4), that the Canons and Articles, which were eſtabliſhed in ſome of the firſt Convocations after Queen Elizabeth began her reign, ſuppoſe that there were in thoſe days divers unpreaching Miniſters, who were not thought of abilities ſufficient to be permitted to open the Scriptures, but were therefore directed to the reading of thoſe Homilies, which were compiled for the ſupply of this defect; but " that now
" the writings of our practical Divines (many of which
" are very little more elaborate than when they were " firſt preached) are in ſo great eſteem beyond the
" ſeas, that it hath been much a practice for Ger" mans and Tranſilvanians, who intend to preach
" when they return back, to come into England, and " learn enough of our language for their purpoſe,
" which is to tranſlate ſome of our Authors into their " own tongue; and when they get home, it is hard
" to ſay, whether they reckon to do more honour to " our Country, or more ſervice to their own. And " I know where a foreigner of good note and learning
" (Spanhemius)

(2) Pag. 25.

(3) Mr. Tavernour of Water-Eaton in Oxfordſhire. See Fuller's Church Hiſtory of Britain, Book 9. pag. 65. and the Preface to Sir John Cheek's True Subject to the Rebell, printed at Oxford 1641.

(4) An Anſwer, &c. pag. 28, 29, 30.

nabas Oley in his Preface to Mr. George Herbert's Country Parſon, his Character and Rule of Holy Life [C]; and by ſeveral other Writers [D]. To the firſt of theſe pieces Mr. Echard publiſhed Some Obſervations upon the Anſwer to an Enquiry into the Grounds and Occaſions of the contempt of the Clergy, with ſome Additions. In a ſecond Letter to R. L. By the ſame Author (b). London 1671 in 12mo. To the reſt he replied in ſome Letters [E] printed at the end of his book, intitled, Mr. Hobbs's State of Nature conſidered, in a Dialogue between Philautus and Timothy [F]. London 1672 in 8vo. Some Opinions of Mr. Hobb's conſidered in a ſecond Dialogue between Philautus and Timothy. By the ſame Author [G]. Sir Richard Blackmore in his Eſſay on Wit (c) recommends this Dialogue of our Author, in which he obſerves there is contained a vein of ſolid reaſoning mixed with a great many ingenious ſtrokes of raillery. Upon the deceaſe of Dr. John (b) It is dated May 2, 1671.

(c) Eſſays upon ſeveral Subjects: by Sir Richard Blackmore Knt. M. D. and Fellow of the College of Phyſicians in London, edit. London 1716, in 8vo.

" (Spanhemius) acknowledges to the everlaſting cre" dit of our Nation, that ſuch Books are tranſlated in-
" to other languages, and that Practical Divinity is
" in a manner peculiar to England."

[C] Attacked . . . . by Mr. Barnabas Oley in his Preface to Mr. George Herbert's Country Parſon, his Character, and Rule of Holy Life.] In this Preface Mr. Oley addreſſes himſelf to our Author in theſe words: I am ſorry, that that wit of yours is not under the conduct of more wiſdom. You have reproved divers things worthy of reproof; but in a manner worthy to be reproved, i. e. ſcopticè, ſarcaſticè, with wit ſatyrical; not with that gravity, wherewith ſuch faults ought to be reproved; like one puffed up, and not like a mourner. You have rightly pitch't upon two ſluices, that let into the Church men not duely qualified: 1. Promiſcuous admiſſion into the Univerſities. 2. Indiſcriminate or prepoſterous ordinations, which latter is often but a conſequent of the former. . . . . I will ſuppoſe, that you neither intended to give that offence, which your Book has given to divers eminent grave and learned men in both Univerſities, nor to yield that nutriment to prophaneneſs, which your Book hath done. For I hear (by thoſe that are ſorry for it) that as ſome things in your Book were matter of chat in coffee-houſes in C (5), before it was printed; ſo now ſince it was printed, they be matter of paſtime in taverns at L (6), where wit, and wine, and profaneneſs ſport themſelves in their own deceivings. He then obſerves, that there are two main occaſions of contempt, which our Author takes no notice of, viz. Envy, and the Affectation of Gallantry; but that his defect in aſſigning real grounds is recompenſed with a great exceſs of inſtances in a long Legend of Clerks, οἱ πολλοὶ καπηλεύοντες τὸν λόγον τοῦ Θεοῦ; ſome of whom " were dead nigh ſixty years before, and I pray " you, ſays he, conſider what reputation he is like " to gain, that in a Church having eight or nine " thouſand Pariſhes, and perhaps as many Clerks or " more, ſhall make it his buſineſs to ravel into ſixty " years backward (twenty of which were a miſerable " Anarchy) and to collect the imprudenter dicta of " young and weak Preachers, to read their Books, " and make a compoſure loathſome to all good men, " delightful only to ſuch as make a mock of ſin. Be-" ſides you have impoſed upon the reader by charg-" ing the Clergy of the Church of England with the " wild notions, which were delivered by Fanatics, " qualified neither with orders nor arts."

(5) Cambridge.

(6) London.

[D] And by ſeveral other Writers.] An anonymous Writer publiſhed a Vindication of the Clergy; and one T. D. wrote a piece, intitled, Hieragoniſticon: or Corah's Doom. Dr. John Owen likewiſe in his Epiſtle to the Reader prefixed to Seven Sermons by Mr. William Bridge, formerly Fellow of Emanuel-College in Cambridge, and a famous Independent Miniſter, printed after Mr. Bridge's death, has made ſome animadverſions on our Author.

[E] To the reſt he replied in ſome Letters &c.] The firſt intitled, A Letter to B. O. the Publiſher of Mr. Herbert's Country-Parſon. From T. B. The ſecond is intitled, A Letter to the Author of the Vindication of the Clergy from T. B. The third is intitled, A Letter to T. D. the Author of the Hieragoniſticon, or Corah's Doom, from T. B. dated in Devonſhire Jan. 20th 1671. The fourth is intitled, A Letter to J. O. from T. B. In this Letter he takes notice of ſeveral very peculiar expreſſions in Mr. W. Bridge's Seven Sermons publiſhed and highly recommended by Dr. John Owen; and among other paſſages thoſe, where Mr. Bridge tells us, that none but God alone can rate off Satan; and that there is a time when God will hew down ſinners, and lay them upon the ground a-frying for hell; and paraphraſing upon that text of St. John, " A new Commandment I give unto you, that " you love one another," obſerves, that becauſe many times there are breakings and looſings in the love of the Saints, upon this account it is, that the Commandment of Love is called a new Commandment, becauſe it is broken ſo often and ſo often renewed.

[F] His Book intitled, Mr. Hobbs's State of Nature conſidered in a Dialogue between Philautus and Timothy.] It is dedicated to Dr. Gilbert Sheldon, Archbiſhop of Canterbury; and the Dedication ſigned J. E. is dated December 20th 1671; and in it he obſerves, that human nature has been ſo vilely aſperſed and perſecuted by our adverſary's malicious ſuggeſtions, that he is willing indeed to ſuffer ſuch a word as man ſtill to remain amongſt us, but what was always meant and deſigned thereby, he has endeavoured to chaſe quite out of the world. He remarks, that in this diſcourſe he has endeavoured to ſhew, " that thoſe, that are wicked " and unrighteous, are not ſuch by reaſon, or any " advice of human Nature, but only becauſe they have " a mind to be ſo." With regard to the manner of his writing, which is to appearance not ſo grave and ſolid, he ſays, " that ſince Mr. Hobbs by affected " garbs of ſpeech, by a ſtarch'd mathematical method, " by counterfeit appearances of novelty and ſingula-" rity, by magiſterial haughtineſs, confidence, and " the like, had cheated ſome people into a vaſt opi-" nion of himſelf, and into a belief of things very " dangerous and falſe; I did preſume, with your " Grace's pardon, to think his writings ſo fond and " extravagant, as not to merit being oppoſed in good " earneſt; and thereupon I was very loth to give " them too much reſpect, and add undue weight to " them by a ſolemn and ſerious confutation."

[G] In 1673 he publiſhed at London in 8vo. Some Opinions of Mr. Hobbs conſidered in a ſecond Dialogue between Philautus and Timothy. By the ſame Author.] In the Dedication of this book to Dr. Gilbert Sheldon Archbiſhop of Canterbury, dated May the 20th 1673, he obſerves, that if upon review of Mr. Hobbs, he had found that he had given the Readers ſenſe and argument anſwerable to the miſchiefs and wickedneſs of his opinions, I ſhould then, ſays Mr. Echard, have endeavoured to have now appeared to your Grace in another ſtyle and dreſs. For I am not ſo utterly given over to toying, nor ſo conceited of this way of writing, nor ſo indifferent about a good life and religion, nor ſo careleſs of offending ſober men, nor ſo bent and reſolved always to preſume upon your Grace after this kind; but that I think it poſſible that upon a juſt account, and a good ſubject, for a need, I could make two or three grave periods, as well as Mr. Hobbs has made thouſands, about thoſe things, which are either impudently falſe, or notoriouſly frivolous. " But I muſt confeſs, continues he, that of all " Triflers, 'tis the ſet, the grave, the philoſophical and " mathematical Trifler, to which I have the greateſt " averſeneſs; whom when I meet very gravely making " out all men to be rational beaſts both in nature and " converſation; and every man when he pleaſes, a " rational rebel, and upon any fright or pinch, a ra-" tional Atheiſt and Antichriſtian, and all this perform-" ed with all demureneſs, ſolemnity, quotation of Scrip-" ture, appeals to Conſcience and Church-Hiſtory; I " muſt humbly beg your Grace's pardon, if then I have " endeavoured to ſmile a little, and to get as much " out of his road and way of writing as poſſible." In the Preface to the Reader he tells him, that it is not the deſign of this, nor was it of the former Dialogue, to make ſport for idle people, (though, ſays he, if John Lightfoot, who died at Ely December 6th 1675, our Author was choſen in his room Maſter of Catherine Hall (d); and the year following was created Doctor of Divinity by the Royal Mandate. He died about the year 1696, and was ſucceeded in his Maſterſhip of Catherine Hall, by Sir William Dawes Bart. afterwards Archbiſhop of York.

(d) The Hiſtory of England. By Laurence Echard, M. A. ad ann. 1675.

I have written all thoſe books, that I am appointed to own, thou mayeſt juſtly ſuſpect that I never did, nor do intend any other thing,) but to preſerve thee from being laughed at by all who can diſtinguiſh ſenſe from words. For though I cannot think how I ſhould any ways be uſeful or ſerviceable to the public; yet (I thank God) I have not ſpent my time ſo very ill, as only to collect a few tales and proverbs to make others merry. Nor was it my deſign either to pleaſe the Churchmen, whoſe Office, Power and Bible Mr. Hobbs cunningly hath diſpoſed of; nor to oblige the Lords and Commons, who may all ſtay at home, if the Prince takes his advice; but it was, if poſſible, to cure a company of eaſy, giddy, ſmall-pated Gentlemen, who ſwagger that Mr. Hobbs hath ſaid more for a bad life, and againſt any other life after this, than ever was pleaded by Philoſopher or Divine to the contrary. Now to effect this cure (at leaſt among ſome of them) is ten times more difficult than to anſwer all Mr. Hobbs's works. H.

ECHARD (LAURENCE), an eminent Engliſh Hiſtorian of the eighteenth Century, was ſon of a Clergyman, who by the death of his elder brother became poſſeſſed of a good eſtate in the county of Suffolk. He was born at Baſſam near Beckles in that county (a), and educated at Chriſt's College in the Univerſity of Cambridge, where he took the Degree of Bachelor of Arts in 1691, and of Maſter of Arts in 1695 (b). He afterwards entered into holy Orders, and was preſented to the livings of Welton and Elkinton in Lincolnſhire, where he ſpent above twenty years of his life, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his writings [A], eſpecially his Hiſtory of England, which was attacked by Dr. Edmund Calamy in his Letter to Mr. Archdeacon Echard [B] upon occaſion of his Hiſtory of England: wherein the true principles of the Revolution are defended; the Whigs and Diſſenters vindicated; ſeveral perſons of diſtinction cleared from aſperſions; and a number of hiſtorical miſtakes rectified (c). And it has been ſeverely animadverted upon by Mr. John Oldmixon in his Critical Hiſtory of England, and his Hiſtory of England during the Reigns of the Royal Houſe of the Stuarts. His General Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory from the Nativity of our bleſſed Saviour to the firſt Eſtabliſhment of Chriſtianity by human Laws under the Emperor Conſtantine the Great, has paſſed through ſeveral editions, and is recommended by Dean Prideaux (d) as "the beſt of its kind in the Engliſh Tongue." Mr. Echard was likewiſe made Prebendary of Lincoln, and on the 12th of Auguſt 1712 inſtalled

(a) From Memoirs communicated to us.

(b) From the Univerſity Regiſter.

(c) London 1718 in 8vo.

(d) Connexion of the Old and New Teſtament, vol. 3. pag. 658.

[A] Diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his Writings.] His Roman Hiſtory in two Volumes has paſſed through a great many Editions, and was tranſlated into French. He reviſed likewiſe the Continuation of that Hiſtory, and wrote a Preface to it. Beſides his Tranſlation of Terence and Plautus, and his Gazetteer's or Newsman's Interpreter, he wrote The Hiſtory of the Revolution; A General Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory from the Nativity of our bleſſed Saviour to the firſt Eſtabliſhment of Chriſtianity &c. printed at London in fol. and 8vo. and The Hiſtory of England in three Volumes in folio, and a Tract intitled, Maxims extracted from Archbiſhop Tillotſon's Works, London 1719 in 8vo.

[B] Attacked by Dr. Calamy in his Letter to Mr. Archdeacon Echard &c.] This Letter is dated at Weſtminſter October the 20th 1718. The Doctor obſerves (1), that when he took Mr. Echard's Work into his hands, he was rather prejudiced for, than againſt him; and looked upon him as well qualified to draw up ſuch a work: and that when he had read over the whole, he was ſo little inclined to detract from Mr. Echard, that he could freely ſay a great deal in his commendation. The clearneſs of your method, ſays the Doctor, and the perſpicuity of your Language, are two very great excellencies, which I admire. I am ſingularly pleaſed with the refreſhing diviſion of your matter, and the chronological diſtinction of the ſeveral parts of your Hiſtory (3) I neither make any objections againſt the form of it as irregular or diſproportionate, nor the general method as intricate and confuſed, nor the colouring as weak and unaffecting, nor the ſtile as mean, flat and inſipid; which are the things about which you appear peculiarly concerned. And yet I thought a public animadverſion both proper and neceſſary, and can meet with none of your readers, how different ſoever in their ſentiments, views, and principles, but what herein agree. The Doctor gives his reaſons for drawing up this Letter by way of animadverſion on Mr. Echard's Hiſtory, and makes ſome few remarks on the firſt Volume of it, which he eſteems much the beſt of the three (4); and then proceeds to the ſecond and third Volumes. He obſerves (5), that though Mr. Echard has ſeveral things new and entertaining, yet there are ſome omiſſions not eaſily excuſed; particularly with regard to the meeting of Divines in the Jeruſalem Chamber in the latter end of the year 1641, who were to draw up propoſals, in order to a peaceable ſettlement of Eccleſiaſtical Matters, about which there were then ſuch warm debates; and with regard to Captain Yarranton's account of ſham-plots after the Reſtoration of King Charles II; and the conference of the Lords and Commons about the meaning of the words aſſent and conſent in the Act of Uniformity. He afterwards (6) cenſures his remarkable redundancies, as his ſtory of Cromwell's contract with the Devil; and his inconſiſtency in applauding the Revolution, in the Dedication of the ſecond Volume, and the Preface to the third; and yet frequently declaring againſt that reſiſtance, without which it could not be brought about. The Doctor then examines ſeveral paſſages of the Hiſtory; and concludes with obſerving (7), that he neither admires many of the Authors which Mr. Echard cites, nor his way of citing them. "And I "have ſome reaſon, continues he, to think I am not "ſingular in either. Many of the Authors that are "cited by you, have ſo little credit in the world, "as to be far from giving ſufficient warrant to juſtify "your inſerting things from them into an Hiſtory, "that ſhould give an account to poſterity of paſt "tranſactions: and your way of citing them is liable "to very great objections. You mention a number "of names in your margin at the beginning of a "ſection. But as to the particulars produced, there's "no diſtinction between what you had from one, "and what from another. So that if your Reader is "deſirous to know your authority for any particular "that occurs, he may ſtill be to ſeek for it, and not "find it without a great deal of pains in ſearching. "Nay I cannot perceive there is any certain way of "diſtinguiſhing what is purely your own, from what "you produce Authors for. This is a method that "looks ſuſpicious. And though perhaps your taking "it might be ſome eaſe to yourſelf, yet it naturally "adds to the trouble of your readers, who many times "muſt look into all your Authors, before they can be "fully ſatisfied where you had a paſſage, which they "enquire after; and whether your Author is fairly "cited or miſrepreſented. You beſt know your deſign "in this method, which is peculiar to your ſelf. But "I am very much miſtaken, if upon conſulting any "number of your Readers, you find it all adds to the "credit of Hiſtory, or renders it the more authentick." H.

(1) Pag. 8.

(2) Ibid. pag. 8, 9.

(3) Echard's Preface to the 2d vol. of the Hiſtory of England.

(4) Letter to Mr. Archdeacon Echard, pag. 11.

(5) Ibid. pag. 18.

(6) Ibid. pag. 21, 22, 23.

(7) Ibid. pag. 98, 99.

inſtalled Archdeacon of Stowe. By King George I he was preſented to the Livings of Rendleſham, Sudborn, and Alford in Suffolk, at which places he lived about eight years in a continued ill ſtate of health. Being adviſed to go to Scarborough for the uſe of the waters, he proceeded as far as Lincoln, but there declining very faſt, he was uncapable of proſecuting his journey; and on the 16th of Auguſt 1730, going to take the air he died in his chariot, and was interred on the 29th of the ſame month in the Chancel of St. Mary Magdalen's Church in Lincoln, but without any grave-ſtone, or any other memorial of him. He was a Member of the Antiquarian Society at London. He married two wives; firſt Jane, daughter of the Reverend Mr. Potter of Yorkſhire; and ſecondly Mrs. Juſtina Wooley, daughter of Robert Wooley of Well in Lincolnſhire Gentleman. But he had no children by either of his wives. All his papers went firſt into the hands of Mr. Yallop his nephew; ſince whoſe deceaſe they are ſuppoſed to be in the hands of the Reverend Mr. Chriſtopher Echard, our Author's younger brother, who is now living at Cransford in Suffolk.

EDWARD IV, King of England, was ſtiled Earl of March before he came to the Crown in the year 1461. He was the ſon of a Duke of York, who had endeavoured to deprive Henry VI of the Crown, and would have ſucceeded in that deſign, had not ſome little regard for outward appearances checked his ambition (a): his ſon, who had no ſuch regard, was more ſucceſsful [A]. He did not trifle his time away to get the title of Lord Protector, but aimed directly at the Royal Dignity, and ſeized it immediately, though Henry VI was ſtill alive. Soon after he marched againſt that Prince, gained a ſignal victory over him near York, and forced him to fly into Scotland with Margaret of Anjou

(a) See the Remark [A].

[A] Edward . . . . who had no ſuch regard, was more ſucceſsful.] A modern Hiſtorian having followed the thread of his narration as far as the battle, in which the Earl of Pembroke (1), who was of Henry the VIth's Party, was beaten, adds the following reflection. "It was then, that one could obſerve, that "the Earl of March, who with regard to ſeveral qualities was like the late Duke his father, had a different "genius. The Duke had done like them, who laboured in vain to untie the Gordian knot: he had "been a long while diſpoſing of every thing for a "deſign, which at laſt he could not compaſs. The "Earl imitated Alexander, and cutting at once the "fatal knot, he gained the Crown directly. No "ſooner was he at London, but he aſſembled the "Prelates, the Nobles, and the chief Citizens, and "laid before them in a very lively manner the ancient "claim of his family, and the agreement made in "the laſt Parliament, between the Duke his father "and Henry, which the latter having broken thro', "he aſſerted, the crown did lawfully devolve to the "heir of the former. He urged this affair ſo earneſtly, that he was immediately declared King under the name of Edward the fourth, March the 3d, "in the year 1461 (2)." This paſſage will be better underſtood, if I lay before the Reader, what the Author had obſerved before concerning the Duke of York's cautious behaviour. The Duke was reſolved to ſupplant Henry the VIth, but he took the precautions, that were ſuitable to ſuch an undertaking. He did not appear in it himſelf till late; and when he did appear in it, it was with that ſolemn declaration which all rebels make, that he did not intend any thing againſt the King, but only againſt thoſe Miniſters, who did not govern the Kingdom well (3). His faction was diſtinguiſhed by the name of the White Roſe, and the other by that of the Red Roſe. In the year 1454 (4), they began to make open war againſt each other (5). The two armies were in ſight, ten miles diſtant from London, when the King ſent to the Duke to know what were his pretenſions, and why he appeared in arms. The Duke, whoſe intereſt it was to hide his deſigns from his army, anſwered, that his intention was not to attack the King, but only to remove from him a wicked Miniſter, who made an ill uſe of the King's authority (6): And in order to ſhew, that he ſpoke ſincerely, he promiſed to diſband his army, if that wicked Miniſter was put in priſon (7): He was taken at his word, and thus found himſelf extremely diſappointed, for he durſt not retract his promiſe. Some time after the King being ſick, the Duke of York took hold of that opportunity to have the Duke of Somerſet arreſted in the very apartment of the Queen: but the fear he was in, leſt men ſhould dive into his ſecret deſigns deeper than he wiſhed, was probably the reaſon, why he did not by a bold ſtroke prevent thoſe long and tedious formalities, which in a Parliament were neceſſary to make his adverſary periſh, and thus he was again diſappointed through his own policy (8). The King recovered, and by the Queen's inſtructions, he ſpoke like a King, which was the reaſon why Somerſet was ſet at liberty. The Duke of York retired from Court, raiſed troops and led them to London, ſtill proteſting that he did not intend any thing againſt the King, but only againſt his Miniſter (9). He routed the Royal Army, and took the King priſoner. He was conſiſtent with himſelf, and purſuing his firſt ſcheme . . . he affected more than ever to treat the unfortunate King with a great deal of reſpect, . . . he cauſed him to make a ſolemn entry into London, which had all the appearance of a triumph, but which, conſidering what followed, was a real captivity (10). They obliged him to ſummon a Parliament, which named him three guardians, of whom the Duke of York was the firſt with the title of Lord Protector of the Kingdom. So that of all the Kingly Power nothing remained to Henry but the empty name of a King; the Duke had the reality of it, and had but one ſtep more to make in order to enjoy the whole: but he waited till the voice of the publick excited him to make that peremptory ſtep: for with the Crown he would have the glory, that he had been forced to accept of it. Yet things did not anſwer his expectation (11). For the Queen formed a ſtrong party, which cauſed it to be declared in a new Parliament." That "the King being of age and in his right ſenſes, the "Kingdom had no occaſion for a Protector; and that "therefore the Parliament thought it proper, to eaſe "the Duke of York of an unneceſſary care, which "reflected on the King's wiſdom, into whoſe hands "the Great Seal ſhould be immediately returned, to be "by him committed to the perſon, whom he ſhould "think the moſt proper for that great truſt (12)." After ſeveral events, a battle was fought at Northampton (13), in which the King was taken priſoner. The Duke of York was in Ireland when he heard this good ſucceſs: he came immediately to England, and ſhewed ſo openly that he aimed at the Crown, that it was no longer queſtioned: He even aſked it from the Parliament (14) in plain and expreſs words; but as thereupon the whole aſſembly kept a deep ſilence, he could eaſily perceive that his affairs would not go ſo well as he wiſhed. He would be King, but he deſired to be ſo with the conſent of his ſubjects (15). They found out a medium which ſatisfied both parties. It was agreed, that the King ſhould keep the Crown during his natural life, and that after his death it ſhould go to the Duke of York and his children. The Queen would not conſent to an agreement, which was ſo injurious to her ſon the Prince of Wales. She raiſed an army with all ſpeed to aſſert her right; the Duke marched againſt her, but was killed in the battle, which was fought a few days after (16).

Thus his ambition, becauſe it was too nice and refined, diſappointed his expectations. The dignity of a King was not ſufficient to ſatisfy him, he would have the glory, that he had been deſired to reign. He durſt not make uſe of violent means, to get himſelf elected;

(1) He was King Henry VIth's brother by the mother's ſide.

(2) D'Orleans, Hiſtoire des Revolutions d'Angleterre. liv. 6. pag. 284. tom. 2. of the Paris edition 1693, 4to.

(3) Ibid. pag. 253.

(4) Ibid. pag. 257.

(5) Moreri, in the Article of Edward IV, places the beginning of this war in 1461; but it is a miſtake.

(6) D'Orleans, Revolut. d'Angleterre. tom. 2. pag. 261.

(7) It was the Duke of Somerſet.

(8) D'Orleans, Revolut. d'Angleterre. pag. 264.

(9) Ibid. pag. 265. under the year 1456.

(10) Ibid. pag. 266.

(11) Ibid. pag. 267. under the year 1457.

(12) Ibid. pag. 268.

(13) Ibid. pag. 776. under the year 1460.

(14) Ibid. pag. 278.

(15) Ibid. pag. 279.

(16) Ibid. pag. 251. under the year 1460.

Anjou his conſort, a very couragious Princeſs, and who was much more capable than her huſband, to retrieve the affairs of a vanquiſhed party (b). She went into France to aſk for aſſiſtance, and obtained but little. Yet as ſoon as ſhe was returned to Berwick, ſhe aſſembled a ſufficient number of ſoldiers to form a ſmall army, and entered with her huſband into the County of Northumberland, and advanced as far as Durham, while her army was joined by a conſiderable ſupply. But they were all overthrown by Edward's troops in the year 1463 (c). She and her huſband were a ſecond time obliged to fly into Scotland (d). The moſt conſiderable perſons of their party either fell in the battle, or were executed. At York only twenty five perſons periſhed by the common executioner's hand (e). That party's deſolation was ſtill much greater [B], when King Henry, who had ventured to return into England in a diſguiſe, had been carried to London with his legs tied under his horſe's belly (f): he was impriſoned in the Tower. Edward's good fortune failed him ſome time after. He diſobliged the Earl of Warwick ſeveral ways, who had been the chief inſtrument of Henry VIth's downfall [C]. He married a perſon below

(b) D'Orleans, Revolutions d'Anglet. tom. 2. pag. 285. edit. de Paris en 1693.

(c) Ibid. pag. 292.

(d) Ibid. pag. 294.

(e) Ibid.

(f) Ibid. pag. 296.

elected; he feared that this would be a blot in his reputation; and whilſt he expected the Crown to be put upon his head with the moſt ſolemn ceremonies, he died without having enjoyed it. If he had done, what his ſon did afterwards, his reign would have been very long: he loſt the whole fruit of his pains, becauſe he did not make uſe of all his ſtrength: Diſcretion in ſuch affairs is almoſt always detrimental. Fortune is not diſpleaſed, when we ſnatch her favours from her (17); ſhe will have us be hot, ſhe ſpues the luke-warm out of her mouth (18). Res eſt profecto ſtulta nequitiæ modus (19). i. e. "It is a fooliſh thing "indeed, to ſet bounds to one's wickedneſs." I remember a reflection of Mezerai, which is not amiſs. As there are as few great crimes carried to the higheſt degree, ſays he (20), as there are heroical virtues, theſe men (21), having begun a crime without neceſſity, they did not know how to commit a ſecond crime, which was neceſſary to hide the former. Thus it is, that God repreſſes evil; he does not ſuffer men to carry it to the greateſt exceſs, and generally ſpeaking he diſpoſes things in ſuch an order, that thoſe whoſe courage is boundleſs, have but a moderate ſhare of wit, and that they who have wit and ſenſe enough to know all that it would be proper to do, have not courage enough to perform it. By this means oppreſſed innocence gets ſome reſpite, and even is often enough entirely delivered. Hoc uno modo, judices, ſæpe multorum improbitate depreſſa veritas emergit, & innocentiæ defenſio intercluſa reſpirat: quod aut ii, qui ad fraudem callidi ſunt, non tantum audent, quantum excogitant; aut illi, quorum eminet audacia atque projecta eſt, à conſiliis malitiæ deſeruntur: quod ſi aut confidens aſtutia, aut callida eſſet audacia, vix ullo obſiſti modo poſſet (22). An exceſſive boldneſs joined with an inventive and ingenious wickedneſs would carry all before them (23), it would be a thunderbolt, which would overthrow whatever it ſtruck: No throne in the world could be ſecure againſt factious men, who ſhould enjoy both theſe qualities. Crimes are ſupported by crimes (24). I could quote a great many more ſayings upon this topic: but this is ſufficient at preſent: let us cloſe this Remark with obſerving, that the text of it required, that I ſhould give ſome account of the Duke of York's conduct, not ſo much, becauſe it ſerves to clear up this article, as becauſe I intended to ſhew that his ſon excelled him in the art of bringing about Revolutions.

(17) See the Article of CHARLES V, Remark [K].

(18) Fortuna fortes metuit, ignavos premit. Seneca, in Medea, Act. 2. ver. 159.

(19) Seneca, in Agamemnone, Act. 2. Scen. 1. ver. 150.

(20) Mezerai, Abrége Chronol. tom. 6. pag. m. 66. under the year 1591.

(21) That is to ſay, the Sixteen, who had put the Preſident Briſſon to death.

(22) Cic. Orat. pro Cluent. cap. 65.

(23) Vis & nequitia quicquid oppugnant, ruit. Phœdrus, Fab. 7. lib. 2.

(24) Da frena, & omnem prona nequitiam incita, Per ſcelera ſemper ſceleribus tutum eſt iter. Seneca, in Agamemn. Act. 2. Scen. 1. ver. 114.

[B] The deſolation of Henry the ſixth's Party was much greater.] As ſoon as it was known that Henry the VIth was in priſon, the remains of the Lancaſter Party diſperſed themſelves through the neighbouring countries. The Queen carried her ſon into France. The Earl of Pembroke wandered ſecretly and unknown over England. Edmund, the new Duke of Somerſet ſince the death of his brother Henry, retired into Flanders, with John his younger brother, and Henry Holland Duke of Exeter. Though the Ducheſs of Burgundy was an Infanta of Portugal, grand-daughter of a Princeſs of the Houſe of Lancaſter, and well affected for that Houſe, yet every thing ſeemed ſo ſuſpicious to thoſe Princes, that they durſt not venture to diſcover themſelves, till after they had been a long while hid at that Court, where they barely found wherewithal to ſubſiſt. Philip de Comines relates, that he ſaw one of them begging for his bread, walking barefoot, and in a miſerable condition, till being known he obtained a ſmall penſion, as well as the two Somerſets, when they had diſcovered themſelves (25).

(25) D'Orleans, Revolutions d'Anglet. tom. 2. pag. 296, 297. under the year 1464.

[C] He diſobliged the Earl of Warwick, who had been the chief inſtrument of Henry the VIth's downfal.] "The ſervices which Kings cannot acknowledge, "make them commonly ungrateful. A man who "has done a great deal for them, ſeems to have a "right to aſk a great deal: and whoever has a right "to claim all, is troubleſome even when he demands "nothing. Edward was indebted for his Crown to "the Earl of Warwick; this was a ſervice beyond "all reward, and which being attended beſides with "very glorious actions, had gained the Earl a great "applauſe from the people. The King grew jealous "of it, and imagining that they compared him with "the Earl of Warwick, in the ſame manner as Saul "had been compared with David, he feared leſt they "ſhould ſay in England, as formerly in Iſrael, Saul "has ſlain his thouſands, and David his ten thou-"ſands (26)." This was the firſt cauſe of diſcontent: The Earl was not rewarded as he deſerved (27), and he perceived that Edward looked upon him with a jealous eye. This includes a great many diſagreeable things, for it is impoſſible for a King who envies the glory of one of his ſubjects, not to diſoblige him ſeveral ways.

(26) Ibid. liv. 7. pag. 300.

(27) And yet he had received from King Edward wherewithall to increaſe his yearly revenue by 18 thouſand crowns. Matthieu, Hiſt. de Louis XI, liv. 5. chap. 6. pag. 239.

The ſecond cauſe of diſcontent was the Earl's being ſent Embaſſador to negotiate his maſter's marriage with Bonne of Savoy, the Queen of France's ſiſter. This marriage was agreed upon, and nothing more was waited for but the return of an Embaſſador, whom the King of France had ſent to Edward to ſign the treaty (28), when it came to be known, that the new King of England had married a Knight's widow. "(29) All England beheld this match with the ut-"moſt indignation. But none were more vexed at "it, than the Earl of Warwick, who did not doubt "but the King deſigned to expoſe him and make "him appear ridiculous before all Europe, by ſending "him to aſk a great Princeſs for him, whilſt he "married a Gentlewoman only.... Edward's beha-"viour towards the Earl, after his return to London, "exaſperated him entirely. This Lord was in hopes "that the King would at leaſt endeavour to mitigate "his vexation by good words or lame excuſes; "but he mentioned nothing to him, and treated him "with ſuch an haughtineſs, that a man leſs proud "than the Earl, could hardly have ſuffered it. And "to compleat the injury, he heard that this vicious "King had attempted to debauch his niece, others "ſay, his ſiſter, and would have taken a miſtreſs in "his family (30), whilſt he took a wife in another."

(28) D'Orleans, Revolutions d'Anglet. tom. 2. pag. 302.

(29) Ibid. pag. 305.

The Earl of Warwick, with a heart full of revenge, determined to reſtore Henry VIth to the throne, and happily ſucceeded in that deſign. Thus he made ſport with the Crown; he deprived Henry VIth of it, to give it to Edward, and then took it again from him, to return it to Henry VIth. An evident argument this is, that he hearkened neither to the laws, nor juſtice, but followed only his own intereſt and his paſſion. He would have had credit enough to raiſe himſelf to the Throne, but he thought it more glorious to make Kings than to reign himſelf (31). The character of his ambition was ſuch, that it inclined him not to reign, but to govern thoſe that reigned (32). Let us obſerve by the by, that it ſeldom happens, that they, who raiſe an

(30) Here follow the words of Polydore Virgil. Nec abhorret à veritate Edouardum tentaſſe, ut aiunt, neſcio quid in domo Comitis, quod ab honeſtate omnino abeſſet, cum homo eſſet, qui facile puellas oculis alliceret, eaſque deperiret.

(31) D'Orleans, Revolutions d'Anglet. tom. 2. pag. 306. He quotes Sir Thomas Moor.

(32) Ibid. pag. 338.

low his dignity [D], and by that unequal match drew the hatred of all the Engliſh upon him. The Earl of Warwick having drawn the Duke of Clarence, Edward's brother, on his ſide, gave him his daughter in marriage, and they reſolved together to reſtore Henry VI to the Throne: and they were like to have performed that deſign; for they ſurprized an Uſurper to the Throne, enjoy his favour long. It is not always owing to this maxim, Men love treaſon, but hate the traytors; it is not always, becauſe men imagine, that they, who laboured to dethrone their firſt Maſter, will not ſcruple to dethrone their new Sovereign; it is chiefly becauſe theſe men think, that they are never rewarded as they deſerve, and that a Prince, who owes his Crown to them, ought to grant them, whatever they requeſt of him (33). He cannot and ought not to do it. Hereupon they are vexed, they complain, and thus fall under their Prince's diſpleaſure. Let us make a ſhort Commentary upon theſe words. The ſervices which Kings cannot acknowledge, make them commonly ungrateful, &c. (34).

(33) See above Remark [B] of the Article COLONNA (POMPEY).

(34) I have quoted them in the beginning of this Remark.

PASSAGES concerning ingratitude.

The firſt paſſage, which I ſhall quote, is from the Duke de la Rochefoucaud's Memoirs (35). "It was "a difficult thing for the Queen to have a gratitude "anſwerable to the great ſervices, which the Prince "had done her; and for the Prince, to keep within "the bounds of that modeſty, which was his duty, "after he had ſerved her ſo effectually; for as ſuch "debts cannot be paid, they generally raiſe the Sove-"reign's hatred, and fill the heads of the ſubjects "with ambitious thoughts." Monſieur de la Chatre affords me another paſſage. When a perſon has laid very great obligations upon us, we ſeem to dread his preſence, as tho' he were continually exciting us to gratitude, and blamed our ungratefulneſs in the leaſt delay (36). Philip de Comines has tranſmitted to us a very good thought of Lewis the eleventh; he relates it after he has mentioned ſome great men, who did not find their account in putting too high a price on the ſervices, which they had done their maſter: he names amongſt others the Earl of Warwick. "It happens often, "that this preſumption is owing to the ſervices a man "has done. They, who are thus preſumptuous, ima-"gine, that their merit is ſuch, that any thing muſt "be ſuffered from them, and that nothing can be done "without them. Princes, on the contrary, are of o-"pinion, that men are bound to ſerve them well; "this they give ſufficiently to underſtand, and deſire "nothing more than to get rid of thoſe, who ſhew "their diſcontent. Hereupon I muſt quote our King "upon two things, who told me once, ſpeaking of "thoſe, who have done great ſervices (and he named "the perſons from whom he had it) that to have ſerv-"ed too well is ſometimes a man's ruin, and that "very often great ſervices are rewarded with great "ingratitude. But that this may as well happen by "the fault of them, who have done thoſe ſervices, "who behave with too much pride, and make an un-"becoming uſe of their good fortune, both towards "their maſters, and towards their fellow-ſubjects, as "by the Prince's ungratefulneſs. He told me alſo, "that in his opinion, to be well at Court, it was a "greater happineſs for a man, when the Prince he "ſerved conferred great favours upon him, than it "would be, if he had done the Prince ſo great a ſer-"vice, that the Prince ought to be extremely oblig-"ed to him; and that a Prince loves more naturally "thoſe who are obliged to him, than thoſe to whom "he is himſelf obliged (37)." Let us hear Montagne's opinion upon this. When I read Philip de Comines, ſays he (38), ſeveral years ago, a very good Author indeed, I obſerved this as an uncommon ſentence. A man ought to take care not to ſerve his Maſter ſo well, that he cannot reward him in a juſt proportion. I ſhould have commended the ſentence, but not him; for I met with it in Tacitus ſome time ago. Beneficia eò uſque læta ſunt, dum videntur exolvi poſſe; ubi multum antevenere, pro gratia odium redditur *. i. e. "Favours are acceptable, as long as it appears, that "they can be returned; but when they are too conſi-"derable, they beget hatred inſtead of gratitude." And Seneca ſays very ſtrongly, Nam qui putat eſſe turpe non reddere, non vult eſſe cui reddat †. i. e. "He "who thinks it ſhameful not to return a favour, "wiſhes, that there was no perſon to whom he is "obliged ‡." Cicero with leſs energy ſays, Qui ſe non putat ſatisfacere, amicus eſſe nullo modo poteſt §. i. e. "He, who thinks he does not fully return a fa-"vour, cannot be a friend." I wiſh Montagne had not curtailed this paſſage of Seneca; he has left out the beginning and the end, which were very much to the purpoſe. See the margin (39), and conſider what follows, it is the ſequel of the paſſage quoted by Montagne. Tibi habe, quod accepiſti, non repeto, non exigo. Profuiſſe tutum ſit; nullum eſt odium perniciоſius, quam ex beneficii violati pudore. i. e. "Keep what you have "received; I do not aſk any return, I do not require "it: But let not my favours me detrimental to me. "There is no hatred more dangerous than that, which "flows from ingratitude." The nineteenth Letter of Seneca might alſo have been quoted, for we find there, that favours beget hatred. Nullum habet majus malum occupatus homo, & bonis ſuis obſeſſus, quàm quod amicos ſibi putat, quibus ipſe non eſt; quod beneficia ſua efficacia judicat ad conciliandos amicos, quum quidam, quo plus debent, magis oderint. Leve æs alienum debitorem facit; grave inimicum (40). i. e. "The greateſt evil "that can befal a man, who is in buſineſs, and em-"ployed about his own affairs, is, that he thinks "thoſe perſons his friends, to whom he is not a friend "himſelf; that he imagines, his favours are able "to procure him friends, whereas ſome, the more "they are obliged, the more they hate. A ſmall "debt makes a debtor, a large one an enemy." Pliny the younger, who was perfectly well acquainted with all the common topics of Panegyrick, did not forget to obſerve, that his Hero was not like other Princes; they ſeldom think they are obliged to any perſon, and if they think ſo, they do not love that perſon. Utriuſque cura, utriuſque vigilantia obſtrictus es Cæſar: Sed in Principe rarum, ac prope inſolitum, ut ſe putet obligatum, aut ſi putet, amet. Debes ergo Cæſar, & ſolvis (41). i. e. "You are obliged to both for their "care and watchfulneſs, Cæſar: But it happens ſel-"dom, and almoſt never, that a Prince thinks him-"ſelf obliged to any perſon, or if he thinks it, he "hates that perſon. As for you, Cæſar, you owe, and "requite."

(35) Rochefoucaud, Guerre de Paris.

(36) La Chatre, Memoires.

(37) Philippe de Comines, liv. 3. chap. dernier, pag. m. 191, 192.

(38) Montagne, Eſſais, liv. 3. chap. 8. pag. m. 280.

* Tacit. Annal. 4. cap. 18.

† Seneca, Epiſt. 81.

‡ Thus Montagne himſelf tranſlates that paſſage. Car cettuy là, qui croid que celui ſeroit honte de manquer à la recompenſe, voudroit qui celui qui la doit recevoir, ne fuſt point.

§ Cicero, in Epiſt.

(39) Eo perductus eſt furor ut periculoſiſſima res ſit beneficia in aliquem magna conferre, nam qui putat, &c. Senec. Epiſt. 81. i. e. "Men are come "to that degree "of madneſs, "that it is the "moſt danger-"ous thing to "beſtow great "favours on any "perſon, for he "&c."

(40) Idem, [Ep. 19. pag. m. 200.

(41) Plin. in Paneg. cap. 61.

[D] He married a perſon below his dignity.] "He "was of a very amorous temper, capable of all kinds "of love; he had ſome looſe amours, and ſome fix-"ed; ſome gay intrigues, and ſome ſerious, attacking "all women out of lewdneſs, and now and then fix-"ing himſelf to ſome from a real paſſion. Such was "that, which he had for Elizabeth Woodwill, the "daughter of the Lord Rivers, and of Jaqueline of Lux-"emburg, who being left a widow by the Duke of "Bedford, had married that Lord. Edward was gone "a hunting towards Grafton the Baron's ſeat, and "was gone in to pay a viſit, out of civility to the "Baron's Lady.... Her daughter was with her; ſhe "was the widow of Sir John Gray, who had been "killed in King Henry VIth's Service, in the ſecond "battle of St. Albans; and all his eſtate having been "forfeited, ſhe had thereby loſt part of her own. "This young widow, willing to take hold of ſo fa-"vourable an opportunity for recovering her eſtate, "took artfully a proper time during this viſit, to beg "that favour of the King (42)." She obtained it, but ſhe did not grant the King the favour he deſired of her. I do not value my ſelf ſo much, ſaid ſhe to him, as to imagine that I can become a Queen. But I value my ſelf too much to be a miſtreſs. I cannot love any man but an huſband: and ſince you cannot be mine, be content, that I honour you as my King, and that I have for you all the gratitude, that is owing to a benefactor. "She "perfectly inflamed his heart by the arguments, by "which ſhe would ſeem to perſuade him to ſmother "his paſſion, at the ſame time that ſhe perceived he "was abſolutely incapable of following her advice. By "this artifice ſhe made him go ſuch a length, that he "promiſed to marry her, notwithſtanding his other en-"gagements; and all that the Ducheſs of York his "mother could ſay, to diſſuade him from it: When "the Ducheſs had employed in vain the ſtrongeſt ar-"guments, ſhe went ſo far as to entreat one of the "King's miſtreſſes, called Elizabeth Lucy, to declare, "that surprized and took Edward in his camp (g); but as he found means to make his escape from the place, where he was confined, they could not reap any benefit from the good fortune they had in seizing his person. The General of their army was routed and taken by Edward, who caused him to be beheaded. This misfortune obliged the Earl and the Duke to go over to France, to beg for such supplies, as they expected to obtain from Lewis XIth (h). They were very well received; and Margaret of Anjou, the imprisoned King's consort, joined her intrigues with theirs; the Prince of Wales her son married the Earl's second daughter: Lewis XI had procured that match as a thing that would considerably strengthen their party; on the other hand it increased greatly in England; for the Earl's friends there made all possible preparations to dethrone Edward, who far from taking care how to secure himself, as his brother-in-law the Duke of Burgundy advised him to do, did not lose one day's hunting, nor one of those parties of pleasure, which he often made with the Ladies (i). The Earl landed safely at Dartmouth with the troops which the French King lent him, and was soon joined by a great many English. Edward marched against him with a fine army, and was ready to draw up his troops in order of battle, when he was told, that the Marques of Montague, on whom he had depended till then, was the first, who cried, Long live King Henry, and that several others having followed his example, the evil spread successively through all the quarters, and that from every part one heard this cry, Long live King Henry (k). Edward "consulted with his "friends what course to take; but his affairs appeared to be so desperate, that the best "advice they could give him was . . ., to cross the sea, and to ask for a supply amongst "foreigners, whilst the King's faithful servants should dispose every thing for his re-"turn (l)." He went on board accordingly, and set sail for Flanders: some pirates (m), great enemies to the English, attacked him, and pursued him to Alkmaer (n), where he landed (o). In the mean while the Earl of Warwick led his army to London, and restored King Henry to the throne (p). A Parliament was convened, in which Edward was declared a traitor, and an usurper of the Crown, his estates were forfeited, and the acts passed under him made void (q). He could not obtain from the Duke of Burgundy but a small supply, and that secretly; yet he ventured to return into England, relying on the friends he had there, on the letters he received from them, and more still on the love of novelties, which is natural to the English Nation (r). He landed, and went up the country without any opposition: he was met by the Duke of Clarence, who inticed as many soldiers away as he could from King Henry's party, which he forsook without any regard. In a word, though the King was at London with a considerable number of Lords of his party, and though the Earl of Warwick (s) had sent them word to hold out but three days, and that he would certainly relieve them, yet no sooner did Edward appear, but all the gates were thrown open before him (t). The women were very serviceable to him [E] on this occasion.

(42) D'Orleans, Revolutions d'Anglet. liv. 7. tom. 2. pag. 302. under the year 1465.

(g) Ibid. tom. 2. pag. 312, under the year 1470.

(h) Ibid. pag. 316.

(i) Ibid. pag. 319.

(k) Ibid. pag. 323.

(l) Ibid. pag. 324.

(m) Comines calls them Ostrelins, i. e. Easterlings, coming from the East.

(n) A city in North-Holland.

(o) D'Orleans, Revolutions d'Anglet. tom. 2. pag. 329.

(p) In October 1470.

(q) D'Orleans, Revolutions d'Anglet. tom. 2. pag. 327.

(r) Ibid. pag. 333.

(s) Some important affairs had obliged him to go far towards the North of the Kingdom.

(t) D'Orleans, Revolutions d'Anglet. tom. 2. pag. 335. under the year 1471.

(β) D'Orleans, Revolutions d'Anglet. tom. 2. pag. 334.

"that the inconstant Prince had engaged his faith to "her, and that she yielded to his embraces, only be-"cause he had promised to marry her. The Queen "delayed for some days the marriage of the King "her son by the report of this engagement, and by "the notice she gave of it herself to the Bishop. But "the fact having been duly examined, it appeared "even by the deposition of Elizabeth Lucy, that she "suffered herself to be seduced by the hope, and not "by a promise of marriage. This obstacle being re-"moved, and nothing being capable to contradict "Edward's will and pleasure in this respect, he mar-"ried my Lady Gray with all the solemnity and pomp "(α) of a royal wedding (43)."

(43) Ibid. pag. 304. He quotes Sir Tho. Moor.

One does not know what might have happened, if Edward had been married, when he declared his love to the young widow. He would not perhaps have met with so great a resistance, and she did not perhaps shew so much disdain for the title of a mistress but only she saw him at liberty to take a wife. Sir Thomas More hints, that the conduct of this Lady was very artful, she began to preach when the hearer could no longer improve by her preaching. After all, a woman of quality and wit does always answer as the Lady Gray did; such an answer may be useful and can do no harm; for there are very good means to remedy the evil, which a repulse may have occasioned at first, and a man is made to go great lengths, when he is deeply in love, and a batchelor, and he is given to understand, that he will never obtain the least favour, if he does not love with an intent to marry. The reader has seen in another place (44), that by an artifice of the same kind, a mistress of Henry VIIIth obliged him to divorce his spouse.

(44) In the text of the Article BOLEYN, between the quotations (d) and (e).

[α] With all the solemnity and pomp &c.] Rapin says on the contrary *, that King "Edward married "Elizabeth Woodville only in the presence of a few "persons, so that his marriage was not made publick,

* Rapin, Hist. d'Anglet. tom. 4. liv. 13. pag. 224.

"but by the orders that were given to prepare every "thing for the Coronation of the new Queen." ADD. REM.]

[β] Some important affairs &c.] These important affairs were the very landing of Edward in England: For as soon as the news of his arrival came to Court, the Duke of Clarence and the Earl of Warwick set out from London, to go and raise troops §. But Father D'Orleans's words are so general, that one cannot guess what affairs the Earl of Warwick had in the North of England. ADD. REM.]

§ Rapin, Hist. d'Anglet. tom. 4. liv. 13. pag. 257.

[E] The Women were very serviceable to him.] "Philip de Comines says, that three things rendred "the entry of this King into that great city (London) "so easy. The first was the great number of his "friends, who had taken sanctuary in the Churches, "which at that time were still looked upon as invio-"late Asylums. The second was the great debts, "which Edward had contracted in London: his cre-"ditors were glad to see him in a condition to pay "them. The third was the citizen's wives, who "had had a share in his favour, and gained their "husbands over to him (45)." Philip de Comines's words with regard to this last particular are as follows (46). Several Women of Quality, and rich Citizen's Wives in the city, with whom he had been formerly very private and familiar, gained him their husbands and relations. This is a pretty singular happiness. Other Kings, especially in other countries, would have lost their Crown, if they had been too free with their subjects wives, and here is a King, who recovers his Crown by that very means. Let us give a description of his voluptuous life. He had been already used to indulge his ease and pleasures for twelve or thirteen years, more than any Prince who lived at that time; for he minded nothing but the Ladies, even beyond measure, and hunting, and feasting. When in the season he went a hunting, he used to carry several tents

(45) D'Orleans, Revolutions d'Anglet. tom. 2. pag. 335. under the year 1471.

(46) Comines, liv. 3. chap. 7. pag. m. 164.

ſion. He ſent Henry again to the Tower, and not one perſon oppoſed it, though that King was a very good Prince [F]. Edward marched directly to engage in battle againſt the Earl. He overthrew his army entirely (u), and ſlew him; and ſoon after he gained ſuch another victory over Queen Margaret. He put a great many perſons to death, amongſt whom was the impriſoned King himſelf; but the Queen was ſpared; ſhe was even ſet at liberty, after they had kept her in priſon for ſome time (x). The Duke of Clarence having diſpleaſed the Court, was capitally puniſhed [G]. It was natural to expect that ſo many executions, and ſo much blood ſpilt would exaſperate the people againſt Edward; yet he enjoyed a quiet reign, and gained the admiration of his ſubjects. He joined in a confederacy with the Duke of Burgundy againſt Lewis XI, and there never was, perhaps, a fairer opportunity to conquer all France, but King Edward choſe rather to conclude a peace, that he might lead a voluptuous life. This peace, which in ſome reſpect was a diſgrace to France, yet was excuſable conſidering in what condition the affairs of that Kingdom were at that time [H]. The two Kings

(u) April the 14th 1471.

(x) D'Orleans, Revolutions d'Anglet. tom. 2. pag. 346.

with him for the Ladies; and indeed, on theſe occaſions he entertained them ſumptuouſly; and he was the moſt proper perſon for it I ever knew, for he was young, and as handſome as any man of his time; I mean when theſe misfortunes happened to him; for he is grown very fat ſince (47).

(47) Comines, ibid. chap. 5. pag. 156. under the year 1470.

[F] He ſent Henry again to the Tower, and not one perſon oppoſed it, tho' that King was a very good Prince.] I have made ſomewhere an obſervation, which I muſt be allowed to confirm by ſome inſtances, when occaſion offers. Any Author has a right to ſupport his opinions, and to make uſe for that purpoſe of what his reading furniſhes him with. I have obſerved (48) that more good-natured or weak Princes have been driven from the Throne by reaſon of their good-nature or weakneſs, than bad Princes, by reaſon of their wickedneſs. Henry VI, the Sport of Fortune, who was more than once a captive, and who was murthered at laſt in priſon, was the beſt-natured man that ever lived. "He was poſſeſſed of all thoſe virtues, "which are eſſential to an honeſt man: but he had "few of thoſe qualities, which conſtitute a great "King; he wanted even the art to affect an outward "appearance of thoſe qualities. So that he was no "ſooner come to that age, in which men begin to ſhew "what they are, when they cannot feign what "they are not; but he was known to be good, meek, "ſober, juſt, and a good Chriſtian; but remiſs, eaſy, "weak, lazy, acting only by the impulſe of others, "and having taken the habit, followed the direction "of thoſe who once got poſſeſſion of him (42)." He was very near being placed in the catalogue of thoſe Saints who are worſhipped. He was a Prince of a ſmall capacity, but of great virtues; very unhappy according to the world, but very happy according to the Goſpel. He was deſpiſed by men, who thought him weak, imprudent, and even ſtupid and ſenſeleſs: after that manner Comines ſpeaks of him, treating thus the memory of that pious Prince unjuſtly; which is againſt his conſtant method. But heaven has heightened his glory by the miracles that happened at his tomb; and for which he has been honoured as a Saint. Henry VII petitioned at Rome for his canonization; and it is not known, why he did not inſiſt upon it, or obtained it not. Some think, that this King, who was naturally ſaving, was afraid the ceremony would coſt too much; but this can hardly be believed of ſo great a King: others ſay, it was anſwered at Rome, that there is a great difference between a pious man and a ſaint: but this is ſtill leſs probable, ſince the Church knows not a more eminent holineſs, than that of a man who leads a holy life amidſt the corruptions of a Court, and preſerves a conſtant patience under a long adverſity. What others have written is much more probable; namely, that Henry VII died before all informations requiſite and neceſſary for that canonization were made, and that his ſucceſſor had neither an opportunity nor inclination to proſecute it (50). If inſtead of ſo many chriſtian virtues Henry VI had been adorned with the qualities of a Warrior and Politician, who knows how to employ every artifice to make himſelf be dreaded, they would not have found it ſuch an eaſy taſk to alienate his ſubjects againſt him. If he had been as wicked as the chief of the rebels, he would ſoon have ſubdued them, and would have died on the Throne. He was forſaken by every one even in his capital city; and for what reaſon? Could they complain of his vexations and tyranny? by no means; for what reaſon then? it was becauſe he was ſurrounded and armed only with his virtue; ſola majeſtate armatus. It is but a weak help in a civil war to have nothing to depend upon, but the teſtimony of a good conſcience, and a lawful claim. In order to overthrow a Monarch, who makes himſelf dreaded per fas & nefas, there muſt be a ſtorm or hurricane: but to throw down a ſcrupulous and meek Prince, you need only blow upon him.

(48) In the Remark of the Article AMPHARES.

(49) D'Orleans, Revolutions d'Anglet. tom. 2. liv. 6. pag. 234.

(50) Ibid. liv. 7. pag. 343, 344.

[G] The Duke of Clarence . . . was capitally puniſhed.] It was becauſe he had talked too boldly when he knew that the Queen's brother aſpired to marry the Heireſs of Burgundy. "Jealouſy, indignation and ſpite made him "ſpeak ſo much the more indiſcreetly on this occaſion, "that he himſelf aimed at marrying that Princeſs, and "for that purpoſe negotiated ſecretly with her ſiſter the "Ducheſs of Burgundy. In his paſſion he exclaimed "againſt the King himſelf, of whom he ſpoke diſreſpect-"fully, ſaying among other things injurious to that "Prince, that he was not the ſon of the Duke of York, "that he uſurped the Throne diſhoneſtly over Henry, "who by a ſolemn treaty confirmed in Parliament, "ought to have enjoyed the Crown during his life. "The Queen and her Relations did not fail to reflect "upon thoſe words, and to put ſuch a conſtruction upon "them, as they thought neceſſary to make them be "taken in the ſenſe that beſt ſuited their purpoſe . . (51). They made ſo deep an impreſſion upon Edward, that he impeached his brother before the Parliament, and had him tried and condemned. It is ſaid that he ſoftened his puniſhment by changing the kind of death to which he had been condemned, and ordering that he ſhould be drowned in a veſſel of Greek Wine: but this is an odd kind of puniſhment; and whatever Chancellor Moore may ſay, who would repreſent this action, as an effect of the King's clemency, yet I find ſomething barbarous in it, and more inconſiſtent with humanity than the moſt cruel puniſhment (52). See the margin (53).

(51) Ibid. liv. 7. pag. 347. under the year 1476.

(52) Ibid. pag. 248.

(53) George Duke of Clarence, and brother to the King of England, choſe to die in a veſſel of Malmſey, that he might dye, non ſine quadam voluptate, quam afferri ſolet levis diſſolutio animi. i. e. "not without "that hand "of pleaſure, "which uſually "is occaſioned "by a ſoft fainting away of the "ſoul," ſays Seneca; or to make himſelf drunk, and thus to free himſelf from the horror and ſenſe of death. Matthieu, Hiſt. de Louis XI. liv. 10. pag. 550.

[H] This peace, which was . . . a diſgrace to France, yet was excuſable conſidering in what condition the affairs of that Kingdom were at that time.] The Author, whom I cite, mentions it as the Maſter-piece of Lewis XIth (54). But, adds he, it was ſo honourable to Edward, that thoſe amongſt the French, who did not conſider the main point ſo well as their King did, and had not ſo great a foreſight, were aſhamed of it, and would ſtill have run a greater danger, rather than been ſecure at that price. And indeed the King of England made himſelf be courted after ſuch a manner, as the dignity of France could hardly bear even in the greateſt diſtreſs. A penſion of fifty thouſand crowns, to be paid during ten years to that Prince for the expence of his expedition, was the moſt mortifying clauſe for France, in the whole Treaty, and the moſt honourable for Edward, who returned into his Kingdom loaded with the ſpoils of a Prince, whoſe friend he had profeſſed to be. See one of the Remarks in the article of LEWIS XI (55); I have quoted there a long paſſage from a French Author, who obſerves, that this Prince was accuſed of cowardice on this occaſion. Father d'Orleans is in the right, when he ſays, that this penſion payable during ten years, was the moſt diſhonourable part of the Treaty; for it muſt be known, that it is for this reaſon, that the Engliſh boaſt, they made the French Monarchy Tributary to the Crown of England. I leave it to Stateſmen to examine, whether this be a ſolid foundation; it does not appear ſo to me; and I think,

(54) D'Orleans, Revolutions d'Anglet. tom. 2. pag. 350.

(55) Remark [G].

Kings had an enterview at Pequigni in Picardy, and ſhewed one another a great deal of kindneſs. The French King deſired Edward to come and divert himſelf with the Ladies at Paris; but he would have been very ſorry, had he been taken at his word [I]. He feared very much leſt the Engliſh would repent their bargain [K]. The declaration of war contained a very remarkable circumſtance; for Edward ſignified therein, that he would think, that a Nation cannot reaſonably boaſt that another has been tributary to her, unleſs that word has been expreſſed in the Treaty, and that Nation has been forced to confeſs, that the money ſhe is to pay, ſhall be called a Tribute. Now this is not to be found in the Articles of the Treaty concluded between Lewis XIth, and Edward IVth; and it is certain, that the French and the Engliſh always gave a different name to the ſums paid; the former called it a Penſion (56), and the latter a Tribute. But farther, Philip de Comines aſſerts, that it was neither (57). After all, what great cauſe of boaſting had there been, ſhould Lewis XIth have been obliged to pay a tribute to England during ten years: ſince his Kingdom was full of malecontents, and he knew that his high Conſtable betrayed him, and that there would be very dangerous conſpiracies in the heart of his Kingdom, as ſoon as the forces of England joined with thoſe of the Houſe of Burgundy ſhould invade his Territories? If Edward, making an advantage of theſe opportunities, and ſupported, as he was, by ſo many confederates, both within and without the Kingdom, had forced his enemy to promiſe him a tribute, would that be a ſtrong proof of his ſuperiority? Is there a Nation ſufficiently powerful and couragious to avoid ſuch a neceſſity when all her neighbours conſpire againſt her at the ſame time that ſhe is diſturbed within by civil diſcords? I do not think, that France had had any reaſon to boaſt, or to inſult over Holland, if after the taking of Utrecht in the year 1672, ſhe had conſented to a peace with the Dutch, on condition that they ſhould pay her a tribute for a certain term of years. France was at that time aſſiſted by England, and by two Princes of the Empire, and attacked a Country full of inteſtine diviſions, and which was not aſſiſted by any other Power.

(56) See Philip de Comines, liv. 6. chap. 9. pag. 390, 391.

(57) And the penſion, which he (Edward) received from us, was ſtopt, which he called a Tribute, but it was neither, as I have ſhewn it above. Comines, liv. 6. chap. dernier, pag. 343.

However, we ought not to wonder that Edward's conduct was blamed; for in all probability he would have conquered ſome Provinces if he had proſecuted his deſign, and he would perhaps have been able to ſhare the Kingdom of France with the Duke of Burgundy. Philip de Comines aſſerts, that Lewis the XIth feared very much, leſt the Engliſh ſhould repent the loſs of ſo fair an opportunity. Let us quote what he ſays upon this ſubject. A Gentleman of Gaſcony, named Lewis de Bretailles, who was a faithful ſervant of the King of England, was very much diſpleaſed with this peace; and as he had been acquainted with me a great while, he ſpoke his mind to me privately, and ſaid, that we ſhould extremely ridicule the King of England. I aſked him how many battles the King of England had gained: he anſwered nine, in which he was in perſon. I aſked him how many he had loſt, he replied, but one, which was that which we made him loſe at that time, and that he reckoned, the ſhame of being thus ſent back into his own dominions, greater than all the glory he had gained by his nine victories. I related this to the King, who told me this man was a wicked rogue, and that I muſt by no means mention what he had ſaid. He ſent for him at his dinner, made him dine with him, and made him very conſiderable propoſals, if he would but continue with him: but finding that he would not, he gave him a thouſand crowns ready money, and promiſed him that he would take care of his brothers who were on this ſide of the water. I alſo mentioned ſomething in his ear, that he might cultivate the friendſhip that began to be between the two Kings. The King dreaded nothing more than that ſome word ſhould drop from him, which might make the Engliſh think, that he had deceived them* (58). You will find in the Remark [K] ſuch another paſſage from the ſame Author. It is certain, that this Peace would not have been laſting, if Lewis the XIth had not bribed the King of England's Miniſters and favourites with preſents and penſions (59). Obſerve, that there are ſome circumſtances in which both the Princes, who conclude a peace, are blamed by all the world. That

* He means by the late peace, which King Edward had concluded with the French King.

(58) Philippe de Comines, liv. 4. chap. 10. pag. 238, 239.

(59) See Philip de Comines, liv. 6. chap. 2.

of which we are ſpeaking, was diſliked by the French and by the Engliſh; by the former, becauſe they did not think it honourable, and by the latter, becauſe they were of opinion that they loſt by it the faireſt opportunity of making uſeful and glorious conqueſts. But as we are ſometimes diſappointed in our moſt probable expectations, the war would not perhaps have been attended with ſo many advantages to the Engliſh, as the peace was. If France after the taking of Utrecht in 1672, had been ſatisfied with the conditions which the Dutch, who ſued for peace, would have accepted, would not ſuch a treaty have been condemned by a great many perſons, who would have ſaid, that Lewis the XIVth did not know how to make an advantage of his ſuperiority, and that he might have conquered the whole country, had he improved the opportunity he had to do it? It is ſaid, that it was for this reaſon, that the Miniſter who had the direction of the affairs of war, rejected all the arguments which Monſr. de Pomponne offered, who adviſed to conclude a peace. Before the end of the campaign the French had reaſons to repent, that they did not follow his advice; and it is aſſerted, that when the King was forced to give over his conqueſt, he ſaid aloud, Pomponne was in the right. What an odd turn things will take! France was the worſe for refuſing to make peace with an enemy that was almoſt entirely ſubdued; and at the ſame time the Turk was alſo the worſe for making peace with an enemy, who was reduced to a very great extremity. The Turks were impoſed upon by the advantageous terms, which the Polanders offered them, after the taking of Kaminiec they accepted them, and left them quiet. But the Polanders took courage again, after the Sultan's retreat; they did not keep their promiſes, and diſappointed him. So that at the ſame time there were reaſons to blame the conduct of two Princes; of the one, becauſe he did not conclude a peace, and of the other, becauſe he did. Who knows but Edward IV would alſo have expoſed himſelf to cenſure, had he rejected the offers of Lewis the XIth.

A COMPARISON between France and the Port in 1672.

[I] The French King deſired Edward to come and divert himſelf with the Ladies at Paris, but he would have been very ſorry, had he been taken at his word.] I cannot do better than to tranſcribe in this place Philip de Comines's account. "After the oath was "taken, our King who was a well ſpoken man, ſaid "to the King of England with a ſmile, that he "muſt go to Paris, and that he would entertain him "there with the Ladies; and that he would give him "Cardinal de Bourbon for his Confeſſor, who would "eaſily abſolve him of that ſin, if there was any ſin "in it. The King of England was very much pleaſed "with this; and they both talked together in a free "manner, for he knew very well, that the Cardinal "was a good-natured man . . . . (60). When the "King came from this interview, he ſpoke to me "along the road upon two points; he found the King "of England ſo ready to go to Paris, that he did "not in the leaſt like it; and ſaid, He is a very "fine man, and very much beloved by the women. He "might meet at Paris with ſome delicate Lady, who "would tell him ſo many fine things, as to make him "take a fancy to come again: He alſo told me that "Edward's Predeceſſors had been but too much at "Paris and in Normandy, and that his company "was not at all agreeable on this ſide of the water; "but that on the other ſide of the water he would "readily look upon him as a good brother and "friend (61)."

(60) Comines, liv. 4. chap. 10. pag. 236.

(61) Ibid. pag. 237.

[K] Lewis the XIth feared leſt the Engliſh would repent their bargain.] This appears by the paſſage which I have quoted above (62) from Philip de Comines, and by that which I ſhall now quote. One of theſe Engliſhmen (63) began to repent of that agreement, and told me at a window, that if they had ſeen a great many ſuch perſons with the Duke of Burgundy,

(62) Quotation (58).

(63) That is, of the Engliſh, whom Edward left as hoſtages with Lewis XI, and whom Lewis took with him, when he had an interview with the Duke of Burgundy's Embaſſadors.

would be King of France, in order to do good to the French Nation [L]. He died April the 13th 1483, in the forty first year of his age. Some ſay, that the vexation he ſuffered when he was diſappointed in his hopes of marrying his daughter to the Dauphin [M], was the occaſion of his death. All the precautions which he had taken to ſecure the Crown to his ſon Edward V proved uſeleſs; for the very perſon whom on his death-bed he charged to ſettle the Crown on his ſon's head, ſnatched it from him (y). This perſon was the Duke of Glouceſter, Edward's brother. He put to death Edward V, and another ſon of Edward IV, and cauſed their two ſiſters to be declared illegitimate [N]. He met in his turn with a Competitor, who killed him in a battle, and ſeized the Kingdom: this was Henry VII. Never were there more frequent and more bloody revolutions. During theſe diviſions in England, ſays Philip de Comines (z), there died to my remembrance full fourſcore perſons of the royal iſſue of England; ſome of whom I have known my ſelf, and I have been told of the reſt by thoſe Engliſhmen who lived at the Duke of Burgundy's Court while I was there. Nor did England ever produce greater men than at that time, men capable to form and to execute great deſigns; who were reſolute, intriguing, and crafty to the higheſt degree. It is commonly fatal to a State, when it abounds with ſuch men, and probably there would not have been leſs frequent revolutions in the following Age, if theſe great men had left ſucceſſors behind them [O]. But they who aſſert, that ſuch things have not been obſerved in other countries,

(y) Ibid. pag. 352.

(z) Philippe de Comines, liv. 1. chap. 7. pag. m. 41. See alſo liv. 3. chap. 4.

gundy, they would not perhaps have conſented to a peace. My Lord of Narbonne, who now is called Lord of Fouez, heard this, and told him, Were you ſo ſilly as to think, that the Duke of Burgundy had not a great number of ſuch perſons? He had only ſent them to refreſh themſelves. But you did ſo much long to go back, that ſix hundred pipes of wine, and a penſion which the King gives you, has ſoon ſent you again into England. The Engliſhman flew into a paſſion, and ſaid, this indeed is what all the world told us, that you only bantered us; do you ſtile the money which the King gives us, a penſion? It is a tribute, and by St. George, you may talk ſo much, that you will make us come back again. I interrupted them here, and turned their diſpute into a jeſt: but the Engliſhman was not pleaſed with it, and mentioned ſomething of it to the King who was extremely angry at the Lord de Narbonne (64). It was not without reaſon, that the King was angry at this Jeſter's indiſcretion, for it might have proved a very great prejudice to his affairs (65). But he himſelf had not been diſcreet enough, for he dropped once a jeſt concerning the wines and the preſents, which he ſent to the Engliſh army (66). He perceived immediately the bad conſequence it might be of, and neglected nothing to prevent it (67).

(64) Comines, liv. 2. chap. 11. pag. 244.

(65) See Matthieu, Hiſt. de Louis XI, liv. 6. chap. the laſt, pag. m. 332.

(66) Comines, liv. 6. chap. 10. pag. 239.

(67) Ibid. See alſo Matthieu, Hiſt. de Louis XI, liv. 6. chap. the laſt, pag. 329.

[L] Edward ſignified therein that he would be King of France, in order to do good to the French Nation.] The Herald brought King Lewis a letter of challenge from the King of England, written in very good language and an elegant ſtile. . . He demanded of the King to ſurrender to him the Kingdom of France which belonged to him, that he might reſtore to the Church, to the Nobles and to the people their ancient liberty, and deliver them from the great taxes and vexations under which they groaned. And in caſe of a refuſal, he declared that he ſhould not be anſwerable for the evils that might enſue (68). That was a fair pretence indeed: and yet it is a groſs ſnare, into which men ſeldom fall; for if they do but ever ſo little conſider, what are the conſequences of a foreign government, grounded on the right of conqueſt, they do not like ſuch deliverers. Such a Manifeſto would now a days be greatly laughed at.

(68) Comines, liv. 4. chap. 5. pag. 213.

[M] He was diſappointed in his hopes of marrying his daughter with the Dauphin.] This marriage had been agreed upon in the treaty of Pequigni in the year 1475. It had been ſworn and promiſed, that within the year the King of England's daughter ſhould be ſent for, who already was ſtiled Madame la Dauphine (69). Lewis the XIth always evaded the ſollicitations that were made him, to perform this article. He never intended that this marriage ſhould be celebrated; for the Dauphin and the Princeſs of England were not of an age ſuitable to each other; the Princeſs * who is now Queen of England being much too old for the Dauphin who at preſent is our King. By theſe diſſimulations the French King gained a month or two, which were ſpent in the going and coming of meſſengers, and thus made his enemy loſe the proper ſeaſon to attack him effectually. For if it had not been for the hope of this marriage, the King of England would never have ſuffered the French to take ſo many places ſituated near his dominions, without thinking of defending them (70). At laſt the Dauphin was promiſed to Margaret of Auſtria (71), which greatly vexed the King of England, for he looked upon it as a diſgrace and a banter: nay he ſuſpected that it would be a great diſhonour to him even in England, and would be the occaſion of a rebellion againſt him, eſpecially becauſe he refuſed to follow the advice that had been given him: Beſides he knew that the French King was at the head of a great army and near him; this affected him ſo deeply, that as ſoon as he heard the news of it, he fell ſick, and died ſoon after, ſome ſay of a Catarrhe. However it be, it is ſaid, that the grief which the marriage cauſed him, occaſioned the ſickneſs of which he died in a few days (72).

(69) Ibid. liv. 6. chap. 2. pag. 353.

* Her name was Elizabeth, and ſhe was afterwards married to Henry VII King of England, and father of Henry VIII.

(70) Comines, liv. 6. chap. 2. under the year 1477, pag. m. 354.

(71) The daughter of Maximilian of Auſtria, and of Mary, who was to inherit the Dutchy of Burgundy.

(72) Comines, liv. 2. chap. 9. pag. 390, 391. See alſo pag. 388.

[N] The Duke of Glouceſter cauſed the two ſiſters of Edward V to be declared illegitimate.] Let us quote again Philip de Comines's plain expreſſions (73). "After King Edward's death, the ſaid Duke of Glo- "ceſter paid homage to his nephew as to his King "and ſovereign Lord; and ſoon after committed that "horrid fact (74), and in a full Parliament of Eng- "land he cauſed the two daughters of the ſaid King "Edward to be degraded and declared baſtards, pre- "tending to ground this proceeding on ſome parti- "cular fact, which he proved by the teſtimony of the "Biſhop of Bath in England. This Biſhop had been "formerly very much in favour with King Edward, "but he fell afterwards under the King's diſpleaſure, "who kept him in priſon, and did not ſet him at "liberty but for a ſum of money. The Biſhop aſ- "ſerted, that King Edward had made a promiſe of "marriage to a certain Lady of England whom "he named, in order to enjoy her, becauſe "he was in love with her: and the promiſe "was made before him the ſaid Biſhop, and upon "that promiſe had laid with her; but that he made "it only to deceive her; yet ſuch ſports are very "dangerous, witneſs the caſe before us. I have "known ſeveral Courtiers, who would not have loſt "ſuch a good opportunity for want of a promiſe. "This wicked Biſhop kept his reſentment hid in his "heart perhaps for twenty years."

(73) Ibid. pag. 391.

(74) That is to ſay, the putting this young King, and the other ſon of Edward to death.

[O] There would not have been leſs frequent Revolutions . . . . if theſe great men had left ſucceſſors behind them.] That is to ſay, if after their death there had been in England ſome Lords as ambitious, as intrepid, and as capable to proſecute artfully the ſcheme of a plot, as they had been: for theſe are the cauſes and ſprings of revolutions. You ought not to look for them in the inconſtancy of the people; how inconſtant ſoever they be, they will keep quiet, if ſome exterior force do not ſtir them up, if their Tribunes, their Demagogues, or ſome great Lords do not rouſe them by the ſtrength of their ambitious intrigues, &c. They are like the waters of the Sea, which are uſually calm, when the wind does not blow (75): and if like ſome places in the Sea, where the fermentation of ſome ſubterraneous matters produces ſometimes a kind of a ſtorm without the aſſiſtance of the wind, the people riſe tries, are not well acquainted with Hiſtory [P]. Obſerve, that the Navy was not in a good condition under the reign of Edward IV [Q].

(75) Ex quo intelligi potuit id quod ſæpe dictum eſt, ut mare quod ſua natura tranquillum ſit, ventorum vi agitari, atque turbari, ſic & populum Romanum ſua ſponte eſſe pacatum, hominum ſeditioſorum vocibus ut violentiſſimis tempeſtatibus concitari. Cicero, in Orat. pro Cluentio, cap. 49.

riſe up of their own accord, it is but a ſudden blaze if ſome perſons of note do not put themſelves at the head of a party. Our Edward IVth was very well apprized of this: He told Philip de Comines, that in all the battles he had won, as ſoon as he found himſelf ſuperior, he took horſe, and cried to ſave the people, but kill the Lords; and of the latter none or but a few eſcaped (76). By this means he came at laſt to reign quietly. If he had ſpared his brother the Duke of Clarence, he would have expoſed himſelf to new troubles. He only put in practice the old maxim of Periander (77), and that of Tarquin the Proud (78). I do not pretend to deny, that there was another cauſe in the ſixteenth Century, which put a ſtop to thoſe tranſlations of the Crown of England againſt the natural order of ſucceſſion, which happen'd ſo frequently in the fifteenth Century. This cauſe was the ſublime genius, and great courage of thoſe who governed, or of their Miniſters. But if it were not for this, you may eaſily underſtand, that thoſe tranſlations muſt have been more frequent in the ſixteenth Century than in the fifteenth: for this kind of revolutions are like falſe miracles, of which the firſt gains credit with much more difficulty, than thoſe that follow. As ſoon as one has found means to make people believe one miraculous ſtory, the ſecond is more eaſily admitted. The firſt paves the way for the ſecond, the two firſt for the third (79), and thus it is with the reſt, not without end, but to certain limits, which depend on times and places. We may aſſert the ſame thing of the violation of the laws relating to the ſucceſſion to the Crown. The firſt inſtance of it is not ſo eaſily eſtabliſhed as the ſecond; but if once it paſſes, it makes a breach, which is not ſtopped but after a long time. So that if men do but make haſte, they find the breach ſtill open for a ſecond encroachment, which ſtill widens the breach, ſo that a third Uſurper goes thro' it eaſier than the two former, and ſo it is ſucceſſively for the following. When you have read in the Hiſtory of the Emperors, that the Senate has been forced twice or thrice to acknowledge for Emperors thoſe who had been choſen by the ſoldiers, you ought not to wonder, that ſo few Emperors ſucceed one another according to Law. You ought rather to wonder, when you ſee three or four Emperors ſucceſſively of the ſame Family. For a General, who obliged the ſoldiers to put him in the room of the Emperor, whom he killed, has no reaſon to pretend that his General ſhould be ſatisfied with his poſt of a General. Why, will the latter ſay, ſhould I be ſubject to a man, who being in my place would not be ſubject to his Sovereign? He has killed him, and got himſelf proclaimed Emperor by his ſoldiers. Can I not do the ſame? Have I not as much right as he had, to riſe from the poſt of a General to that of Maſter of the whole Empire? You ſee then, that by a natural conſequence, one revolution draws on another, and that the more frequent they are in one age, the more they ought to be ſo in the following. And they would really be ſo, were it not for the interpoſition of divine Providence, or the ſmall number of perſons capable to carry on ſuch intrigues, or the ſuperior courage and prudence of thoſe who govern.

Obſerve, that nothing contributed more to the troubles, which happened during the reign of Henry VI, than the pretence, which was grounded on that Prince's being the ſon of an Uſurper. For ſince the fundamental laws had been infringed in behalf of his father, it was not very ſtrange, that a Duke of York ſhould endeavour to dethrone him. Could not the Duke of Glouceſter, who ſnatched the Crown from Edward IVth's ſon, aſſert, that he only expelled the ſon of an Uſurper? For Edward IVth aſcended the Throne during Henry VIth's life, tho' by Act of Parliament Henry VIth was to reign till his death. By the ſame Act Henry VIth was excluded. All this gave the Duke of Glouceſter an authority to have no regard for Edward IVth's children, and to require, that the Parliament ſhould make ſuch Acts in his favour, as were made for his brother, and to the prejudice of Henry VIth's ſon.

[P] They who aſſert that ſuch things have not been obſerved in other Countries, are not very well acquainted with Hiſtory.] The bare reading of Juſtin acquaints us with greater diſorders in Syria, under the Seleucidæs, and in Egypt under the Ptolemies; nor do they come up to the frequent revolutions, which happened in Macedonia after Alexander's death. The ſame Hiſtorian relates them with an exclamation (80).

[Q] The Navy was not in a good condition under the reign of Edward IVth.] When the Earl of Warwick returned into England in the year 1470, with the ſupply the King of France gave him, he had nothing to fear but the Duke of Burgundy's fleet. Not the leaſt mention is made of Edward's ſhips. That fleet would have prevented the paſſage of this ſupply, had it not been diſperſed by a ſtorm (81). Five years after the Duke of Burgundy was obliged to ſend five hundred veſſels from Holland and Zealand to Edward, to tranſport the Engliſh Army from Dover to Calais (82).

(76) Comines, liv. 3. chap. 5. pag. 155.

(77) See Ariſtot. Politic. lib. 3. cap. 11. and lib. 5. cap. 10. Herodot. lib. 5. cap. 92. pag. m. 324. and Diog. Laert. lib. 1. num. 100. pretend that Thraſybulus gave Periander that advice.

(78) Ibi inambulans tacitus ſumma papaverum capita dicitur baculo decuſſiſſe &c. Livius, lib. 1. cap. 54.

(79) Prodigia eo anno multa nunciata ſunt, quæ quo magis credebant ſimplices ac religioſi homines, eo etiam plura nunciabantur. Livius, liv. 24. cap. 10.

(80) Tanta vel mobilitas militum, vel fortunæ varietas erat, ut viciſſim reges nunc exules nunc reges viderentur. i. e. "Such was either the inconſtancy of the ſoldiers, or the changeableneſs of fortune, that Kings ſeemed to be ſometimes exiles, and at other times Kings." Juſtin. lib. 26. cap. 2. pag. m. 457.

(81) See Philip de Comines, liv. 3. chap. 5.

(82) Ibid. liv. 4. chap. 5.

The End of the FOURTH VOLUME.

E D W